Just to talk a little bit more about – I want to break down that $5.4 million because I think I maybe didn't get a chance to get that specific before. That was where we had dollars that were not used in the critical worker benefit. Again, it was really just because we used our best, educated estimate based on how many educators we thought we would have in the system. We did in fact extend the second phase of the critical worker benefit to other support workers within the child care system because we wanted to get those dollars out the door. That's an area, too: if the member opposite wants to know why the estimate wasn't as accurate, it's because while we do track early childhood educators, given our system for wage top-ups and given the supports that we do provide educators, we don't always know what operators are doing when it comes to other support staff in their operations. Again, that's something that typically we don't have a specific line of sight into, and that's where that additional $5.4 million came from. Again, that was just due to what we saw in terms of our numbers and the number of staff that were working in the field.

We also did reach out to operators a number of times to make sure that they knew that all of their staff were eligible for this benefit in the phases where they were able to apply and receive the benefit. Again ...

The Chair: I hesitate to interrupt; that concludes the first 20-minute block.

Would you like to continue on? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: I would, Madam Chair. Thank you so much. Actually ...

The Chair: Sorry. Would you like to continue to share time with the minister?

Ms Pancholi: Yes.

The Chair: Minister, is that amenable? All right. Please proceed.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Chair. Actually, I'll follow up on the response that the minister was just giving with respect to page 16 of the supplementary supply estimates and the lower than anticipated participation in the critical worker benefit. As we see, it indicates that there's about $5 million less than anticipated in terms of what was paid out for that critical worker benefit. I wonder if the minister can please indicate how many child care workers or staff, actually both if possible, child care workers and then non child care educators, actually received the critical worker benefit.

As well, if the minister can comment on – as we know, unfortunately, throughout this pandemic there were a number of situations where federal dollars were available to the UCP government to access to support Albertans during the pandemic and the UCP was slow to actually participate in those programs or to take the funding available through the federal government because they were reluctant to match federal funding with their own provincial dollars, and we know that there was a delay in the rollout of the critical worker benefit, particularly as compared to other provinces, by the UCP government. Part of my question to the minister is – I understand that while the ministry cannot track non early childhood educator staff, part of the situation is that we know that last year the sector lost thousands of early childhood educators, and had this program been rolled out earlier, perhaps there would have been more early childhood educators still in the system who would have received this benefit, potentially might have even stayed in the work had they received that critical worker benefit. So how many more child care workers would have received this benefit had the UCP government rolled this critical worker benefit out at the same time as other provinces?

Ms Schulz: Madam Chair, while that is not necessarily specific to my program area when it comes to the critical worker benefit, what I can say is that the positive is that Alberta actually did do something different than other provinces, and we offered it to a wider range of workers in this province. I am very proud that we are one of the few provinces that included child care workers. Why? Because I think that they are exceptionally important. And you know what? When child care program operators reached out to us and said that, you know, they wanted support staff included, I know – I have two young children; they are almost 7 and 4 – that support staff are just as important, so we stepped up to expand that eligibility. We did communicate to programs to make sure that they were aware of the benefit, and all workers who were eligible in this phase in the programs who applied received the benefit. Children's Services sent out a number of e-mails on that front, including things like application forms, and we responded any time there was a question. I know, certainly, a number of them came to my office about eligibility, and we were able to make that work for our very important educators and support staff.

We also talked about that on a number of our town hall calls. You know, I don't have the specific numbers, Madam Chair, but given the numbers around $1,200 per worker, it would be an equivalent of over 300 support staff, and I think that's probably a fair estimate given the budget we have and the amount that would have gone out for those eligible workers.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Chair. To clarify, there were a number of other provinces that also provided critical worker benefits to child care workers and, in fact, did so much earlier than the UCP government did. I just wanted to clarify that for the minister's understanding as well as for the record of the Assembly.

With respect to the supplementary supply, it indicates that there's an increase in $1 million in capital spending for IT for child care initiatives and that that, of course, is federally funded, as most of the child care budget is. This amounts to about a $1 million reduction to the policy, innovation, and Indigenous connections line of the budget. Specifically, this will come out of 5.1, policy, or 5.2, Indigenous connections. If the minister could clarify which line that comes out of and what area of Children's Services' responsibility will see this reduction, intervention or child care.

The $1 million in line 5 was originally covered by provincial dollars, is that correct? Now it appears to be federally funded. I believe it originally showed up in the estimates as provincially funded, and now it appears we're, through supplementary supply, seeking federal funding to cover that cost. I guess the question, if it is actually federal funding that's now being used to fund something that was originally supposed to be funded by the province: is this not federal funding replacing provincial funding, which, again, is contrary to what our understanding is of the Canada-Alberta ELCC agreement? If the minister can answer those questions, that would be appreciated.

The Chair: The hon. minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. These are separate numbers, I would say. When we look at the IT, every province has the ability and the agreement with the federal government – certainly, Alberta's does identify that there will be some IT and staffing costs related to the Canada-wide early learning and child care agreement. That million dollars is not replacing provincial funding; that is federal funding to roll out this new program. We just signed that agreement back in November, but we knew there were going to be changes required to address the changes within the physical system to add the operating grant and handle the increased volume of subsidy applications that we were going to see.

When we look at program area 5.1, the million dollars that the member is asking about was a $1 million, one-time reallocation, and that actually was to the Ministry of Indigenous Relations to support the residential schools unmarked graves research initiative led by Indigenous Relations. Those dollars were moved from my policy, innovation, and Indigenous connections area over to support the residential school grants.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'll turn my time over to my colleague the Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

The Chair: All right.

Hon. member, who would you like to speak with?

Member Ceci: Municipal Affairs.

The Chair: Municipal Affairs. Would you like to share your time?

Member Ceci: Sure.

The Chair: Hon. minister, is that good? All right.

Hon. member, please proceed.

Member Ceci: Thank you. The government is asking, of course, for supplementary supply for this ministry to take advantage of the federal funding through the Canada community-building fund, a fund that provides capital funding for municipalities to help them build and revitalize their local public infrastructure. The program is fully funded by the federal government and administered by the province. That permanent source of funding from the government of Canada is provided up front twice a year to provinces and territories to go on to municipalities and Métis settlements. It's the second-largest supplementary supply number in this document. I'm just wondering if the minister can tell me how that fund will be distributed to municipalities and Métis settlements and when that will be done.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. McIver: Thanks, Madam Chair. The member is right; this estimate is almost completely the federal additional money to the Canada community-building fund. I'm just looking here through my notes for how it's distributed. It will go to municipalities. The fund, of course, used to be called the gas tax fund, and in fact the number that we're getting from the feds is actually, I believe, well, it's $15,695,000 more than the $231,208,000 – there's that number – then $15,695,000 that municipalities were not able to get spent through ICIP grant approvals. I think the hon. member knows that when you're doing construction projects, some of them go faster; some of them go slower. What you can see as part of this, Chair, to the member, is that you can look forward to us moving that $15,695,000 into next year's budget once the municipalities confirm that that's when they need it, and that's just a matter of: they didn't get things built as fast as they anticipated this year. In other words, to make sure that they don't lose the money and that the federal money comes with them, we'll do that.

The municipalities have quite a range of ability to choose what projects. I'm just trying to see – I've got quite a few numbers in front of me here – trying to sort out the CCBF ones. In 2022 the city of Calgary is estimated to receive $77.05 million, or 30.3 per cent of the total CCBF, and the city of Edmonton $58.26 million of the total CCBF for all municipalities. It is for capital expenditures. I don't have, necessarily, the detailed amount for all of it. I'm looking through my notes to see if I can get you something here. There's a $5,000 base amount for summer villages out of the CCBF and a $50,000 minimum amount for other small municipalities. I think it's safe to say . . . [interjection] Oh, I guess I didn't use the word "million." The Treasury Board president is helping me to use my words. I left out the word "million," but I think the hon. member knows that. Nonetheless, I'm grateful for the assist.

I think what's most important is that we administer this. It's a federal program. Municipalities have a great deal of autonomy on how they spend that money, and in my opinion and, I dare say, our government's opinion, they do a great job of making wise choices. This is, I think, as the hon. member understands, simply a flow through. As he rightly described, the federal government provides the money to the municipalities, the province administers it, and that number that is coming here is actually the full number, so I could say it out loud for the record. It's $246,903,000 from the Canada community-building fund. The reason, again, that the supplementary estimate is $231,208,000 is because of that unspent money through ICIP, $15,695,000.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Member Ceci: Thanks. Thank you for that information.

Can I just clarify, then? It sounds like, other than for summer villages and smaller communities, where there's a $5,000 and a $50,000 amount, the balance of the money is split out on a per capita basis. I think you talked about 33 per cent going to the city of Calgary. Is that correct?

Mr. McIver: I could tell the hon. member, through you, Chair, that the gas tax fund, what was formerly called the gas tax fund, which is now the Canada community-building fund, is governed by an agreement signed between Canada and Alberta back in 2014, and all the expenditures will be according to that agreement. Now, there you go. It is funded based on populations, but again, as I mentioned as part of my earlier answer, the formula includes a $5,000 base amount, a minimum amount, if you will, for summer villages and a $50,000 minimum amount for other small municipalities so that they get enough.

The federal government structured it this way, and I think it's actually a good idea; in other words, so that municipalities, hopefully, get enough money to do something with. When you're doing construction, well, in some cases $5,000 won't get a lot done. In other cases $50,000 won't get a lot done, but in many cases it actually will make a difference either in creating a new project or in some cases actually enhancing or improving a capital project that the municipality would have done. At any rate, this is, again, as per the agreement between Alberta and Canada. Yeah, we are grateful for the federal government's support of municipalities, and I think that answers the question: largely population based.

Member Ceci: Just one further clarification on the $16.7 million made available from lower than budgeted expense in other programs. That program, as I understand it, was ICIP, and it was because construction didn't happen that would need to be billed in this year, so it's carried forward to a subsequent year, where it will be fully expended at that time.

The Chair: The hon. minister.

Mr. McIver: Yeah. Not to be critical, but I'll just correct the number. I think he used a $16 million and some number. It's $15,695,000. I don't say that to be anything but helpful, okay? The hon. member described it accurately. It's ICIP money through the federal ICIP program that was allocated to municipalities.

As the vagaries of construction go, sometimes you can't get all the work done in the year through some delay. It could be a contractor who was behind, it could be that some part or some supply in the supply chain was late, it could be weather based – so many reasons – but the important point is that what we taketh away here from the municipalities, we will giveth back next year. We just need to confirm with the municipalities first that they can spend that next year. Then don't be surprised to see me standing up here or else a piece of paper in your hand for that same amount being added as a supplementary estimate for next year, but probably not until we get some indication that the municipalities actually can use the money. I fully expect they will be able to use all of it as well as whatever ICIP is available to them next year, but of course we'll do that work with the municipalities first.

Member Ceci: I cede to my colleague from Edmonton–City Centre.

The Chair: Hon. member, would you like to share your time?

Mr. Shepherd: Yes, if I could.

The Chair: With the Minister of Health?

Mr. Shepherd: Yes, please.

The Chair: All right. Minister of Health, is that amenable? Absolutely.

Mr. Shepherd: And a time check, Chair?

The Chair: There are four minutes remaining in the second 20-minute block.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. In regard to, I guess, the supplementary supply for Health, the amount of $375,500,000 for lab testing, contact tracing, and rapid test distribution, during the height of the third wave, in May 2021, our contact tracing workforce here in Alberta numbered about 2,500. Now, by August, in the midst of the best summer ever, we had the announcement from the government of the ending of testing, tracing, and isolation. That's hundreds of contact tracers that were laid off or did not have their contracts renewed as the government told them they would no longer be needed to notify close contacts and only continue to investigate high-risk settings.

But what we do know, Madam Chair, is that as of October 5 the Premier and the ministers of Education and Health announced that we were indeed going to reimplement contact tracing because, indeed, we found ourselves in the midst of a fourth wave. That contact tracing would not begin again until October 12, after the Thanksgiving long weekend. By that October 12, in the midst of that fourth wave, AHS had a total of approximately 1,124 contact tracers. They were in the midst, then, of racing to fill these positions which the government had prematurely chosen to end in its rush to declare the pandemic as an endemic.

My question to the minister is: can he clarify how much, if any, of this $375,500,000 for lab testing, contact tracing, and rapid test distribution was to cover the cost of needing to rapidly rehire the contact tracers his government chose to fire during its best summer ever? How much, if any, of it is for payments to those contact tracers that they did not fire but who may have had and likely did have to work overtime to address the gaps that his government created?

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thanks to the hon. member for the question. I can say that in regard to the $375 million that was for lab testing, contact tracing, and rapid test distribution a total amount of $144.7 million was for contact tracing and case notification. I'd like to point out to the hon. member that we did re-engage contact tracers during the fourth wave, and we actually were able to increase the staff to be able to respond within 24 hours in terms of being able to contact trace once we actually, you know, got into the fourth wave.

Madam Chair, I'd also like to point out that, you know, like all other jurisdictions, as we got into the fifth wave, we limited our contact tracing in the fifth wave only to high-risk settings and high-risk individuals. This was the same response that was done, quite frankly, across the entire country given the widespread nature of the omicron variant, and we were able to run that area and then actually leverage rapid tests. We knew that when we actually had to deal with the omicron variant, we needed to spend more money in terms of rapid tests to be able to get that to Albertans, because the PCR testing couldn't keep up. Given the nature of omicron, as part of this budget as well, we spent $153.6 million for rapid tests and inventory acquisition – that was in order to buy 14.3 million tests – and that's in addition to the tests that we received from the federal government. But that was the appropriate response.

I'd like to just point out to the hon. member that, you know, as we moved through the pandemic and we had different variants hit us, we responded accordingly. We put the resources in place, and that's really, quite frankly, what the supplementary amounts are all about. The total amount is . . .

The Chair: Hon. members, this concludes the second 20-minute block. Would you like to continue?

Mr. Shepherd: Yes, please.

The Chair: Please proceed.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the minister for the answer. Indeed, I would be happy to talk about rapid tests. I would note that the minister has just spoken about how they responded to each variant appropriately, not his precise words but what he was suggesting. I'd say that a large number of Albertans, certainly a large number of health professionals, would have some thoughts on how appropriate it was. Again, I think we saw a government that repeatedly responded last and least, at the great cost, I think, probably, unfortunately, of some lives but certainly also to our health care system.

Speaking of rapid tests and this government's planning ahead, what we do know is that as of December 21, 2021, the government indeed, as the minister said, announced that it was going to purchase an additional provincial stockpile of 10 million tests. Now, they at that time said that they intended to secure that before the new year. We know, ultimately, that that was unsuccessful due to the fact that so many other jurisdictions were all trying to acquire rapid tests at the same time.

Now, we also do know that the province of Saskatchewan had shown some actual forethought here. In the fall the government of Canada had approached the provinces – and this was, of course, during the midst of the fourth wave, at which time this government was not distributing any rapid tests to the wider public despite the fact that it had a significant stockpile that it had not distributed at all. What we saw was, indeed, that the province of Saskatchewan had the foresight to take the government of Canada up on their offer, so Saskatchewan had a significant stockpile of rapid tests ready to go in December. Alberta chose not to do that. Now, by our calculations, if Alberta had taken the advantage that Saskatchewan did on a per capita basis, we would have had an additional 25.5 million rapid tests available for Albertans, but of course this government chose not to do that.

We also know that this government, again, despite the protestations of the minister at multiple times, did not act quickly to respond to the fifth wave. They waited until just before Christmas, just before the holidays, as our numbers were beginning to climb, and they were trying to go the other way but realized rapidly they had to do something, so they made this announcement about the distribution of rapid tests, on very short notice, at the end of December.

A couple of questions based on this, Madam Chair. Can the minister clarify how much, if any, of the $153,600,000 that's listed here for rapid test kits might have been saved if his government had had the foresight and the good judgment shown by Saskatchewan and taken advantage of the opportunity they had in the fall to purchase rapid tests through the government of Canada rather than scrambling to get those 10 million during a time of incredibly heightened scarcity and demand in the midst of the fifth wave? Actually, I'd be curious, if he's able to tell us, too, how many of those 10 million he was actually able to get and when they arrived in the province.

Secondly, how much of the $375,500,000 that was set aside for lab testing, contact tracing, or rapid test distribution was specifically for the rapid test distribution, and might those costs have been reduced if his government had taken the time to prepare a plan for distribution before being forced to do so by the rising of the omicron-driven fifth wave at the end of December?

The Chair: The hon. minister.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Madam Chair. First off, I'd like to point out to my learned colleague that actually Alberta began distributing the rapid test program in March 2021 and distributed over 8.8 million tests to over 2,000 locations, including priority settings like continuing care, schools, postsecondaries, and workplaces. Now, we did begin broad public distribution of rapid tests through pharmacies and AHS sites on December 17, 2021, and as of February 28 we had made over 12 million tests available to Albertans. Throughout January and early February over 8.5 million rapid tests were distributed to schools, and in February over 1.1 million tests were sent to First Nations and Métis communities for distribution.

Now, as pointed out in the supplementary estimates, $375.5 million was for lab testing. Of that – and this goes to the question asked by the hon. member – $24.8 million was for rapid test distribution costs. Again, as previously noted, for inventory acquisition, the 14.3 million tests, it was $153.6 million to actually acquire that. Madam Chair, the Alberta government, you know, in recognizing, responding to the upcoming omicron wave not only had been distributing rapid tests as part of a program for months prior; we recognized that a wider distribution would be helpful given the nature of omicron as we were learning the impact that it could have on Alberta and our health care system, so we responded. Again, as I was saying before the timer went off in the first 20-minute block, which I only had four minutes of, that is really what the supplemental estimates and the additional funding are all about.

Madam Chair, we responded to COVID. You know, in terms of total funding associated with COVID, we're looking for just under $716 million, but that's in addition to the $1.1 billion that was already allocated the previous budget year to be able to respond to COVID. We fully appreciate – and this is part of the challenge in terms of when you don't know what you don't know. COVID was brand new to us the year previous. We made an estimate in terms of the budget, what it would cost, but you don't know what you don't know for how it would evolve and change over the period of time.

Madam Chair, we made one commitment to Albertans, and that was mentioned already by my colleague the Minister of Finance, that we would spend the money necessary to be able to respond to COVID as we could see it coming at us and respond appropriately to this given the changing nature of it. We saw differences, different approaches in delta and differences in omicron. We did exactly that. We had rapid tests throughout last year. We expanded the application in December as omicron came at us. Because of challenges with the federal government, who we had requested additional tests from – quite frankly, the federal government indicated that they'd give them to us, but they couldn't deliver – we went out, and we spent additional dollars to make sure we could get those tests in the hands of Albertans. We did accomplish that.

Again, Madam Chair, I am thankful that we are now moving into the endemic phase. We have come out of the omicron wave and moved to the endemic phase, and the numbers and the hospitalizations are continuing to go down.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Chair. Indeed, we don't know what we don't know, but we certainly do know that Alberta had some of the worst outcomes in Canada. So it's quite clear that other governments were quite able to understand, were able to make some decisions that were able to lower the number of excess deaths, that were able to prevent the same number of cases, that were able to indeed take actions that were more prescient than those we saw taken by our government, which at times was quite clearly so caught up in its own internal politics that it was not considering what was best for Albertans but, rather, what was best for itself.

I would note that, you know, the Minister of Finance commented that Alberta will no longer be an expensive outlier when it comes to health care spending. Well, Alberta, unfortunately, was an outlier when it came to the costs of this pandemic. Indeed, Dr. Tara Moriarty, in her study that was released last year looking at excess deaths across Canada from COVID-19, reported that Alberta had nearly 150 excess deaths per 100,000 residents. That equates to about 4,800 more deaths than would be expected during the time period, the highest rate of any province in Canada, Madam Chair, and that is because of choices made by this government when there were things that it did know.

Speaking of which, when we're talking about, again, the spending of $375,500,000 for lab testing, contact tracing, and rapid test distribution and we're talking about staffing speech-language pathologists, Madam Chair, they were part of the staff which were required to help fill gaps due to poor judgment on the part of this government. Now, we recognize, of course, that in the initial redeployment that took place, I think starting from March 2020, even through, we'll be generous and say, that second wave in December 2020 most SLPs were quite all right with that. They understood the enormity of that, as many other health care workers did, and they were willing to step up and do their work. But by that point there were many things this government did know. Yet we found ourselves in the third wave where speech-language pathologists – and I've learned this by speaking with them – were again redeployed. Again, remember that this was when this government was sitting back and refusing to take action as several of its own MLAs were crusading against this government to end all public health measures as case numbers and hospitalizations were growing during the third wave.

What speech-language pathologists have told me is that there were times they would be called in, even at the last minute, which meant an overtime shift, where they were being paid double time, as much as $100 an hour to be a line leader; that is, simply making sure that people were in their chairs and ready to go in to get tested. Now, again, that is important and essential work, Madam Chair, but by that point the government had the opportunity to begin to staff up for those positions. During that third wave I understand that speech-language pathologists were very happy to hear that AHS had taken the opportunity to begin to hire some folks to be line leaders, admin staff at the vaccine centres, and swabbers at their testing sites that would allow speech-language pathologists to get back to their important work supporting youth and supporting other people who needed their assistance.

But they found themselves called back again in the fourth wave in September 2021 because this government, which, again, had moved to end all testing, tracing, isolation in August as part of its best summer ever, at a time when it had had three waves to learn, to know, Madam Chair, had effectively gone radio silent, utterly absent, refusing to take action even as cases and hospitalizations were rising and, as we have heard, were locked in backrooms fighting amongst themselves about whether to take any steps to actually meet this growing fourth wave. As a result, my understanding is that they waited until four days prior to when they had to renew the contracts of the newly hired swabbing staff, which meant that many of those staff had gone on to find other work, so once again speech-language pathologists were pressed into being redeployed to man testing sites and others, again, at a premium cost of up to $100 an hour.

Can the minister clarify how much, if any, of the $375,500,000 set aside for lab testing, contact tracing, and rapid test distribution would have been used to cover the costs of the premiums paid to speech-language pathologists or other health care workers who had to step in to cover the gaps because his government waited too long to take the action to follow through on the contracts of the folks that had been hired to cover those positions?

The Chair: The hon. minister.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Madam Chair. You know, before I sort of respond to the breakdown of the $375 million, I'd like to first comment on some of the comments that the hon. member across the aisle started out talking about, that Alberta has the worst outcomes in terms of deaths. Don't get me wrong. I feel for every individual who has been impacted and everyone who has lost a loved one during this pandemic, but the comments that Alberta has had the worst outcome in terms of deaths is quite simply incorrect. Although we've had deaths, if you compare Alberta in terms of the Canadian average, we are below the Canadian average. In fact, we are several times below the average you find in U.S. states and even so when you actually look at Europe. I appreciate the comments being made over there, but the fact is that the characterization of our government's response to COVID is simply incorrect.

Madam Chair, we committed to Albertans that we would spend the money necessary for an appropriate response to COVID, and quite frankly we have done that. If you look at the year previous in terms of the amount spent in 2021, that was $1.5 billion. This year – right? – we're talking $1.867 billion to respond and so that we can respond appropriately and make sure that Albertans and AHS have the resources that they need to be able to respond.

The response was varied and many. It involved lab testing, contact tracing, and rapid test distribution, supports for continuing care, vaccine deployment, purchases for PPE, rapid test kits, which we spoke to earlier, acute-care and entry screening, and then support for, you know, isolation facilities, border programs, public health guidance, department EOC operations, the COVID critical drug reserve. Madam Chair, we spent the money, and quite frankly our government, under the leadership of the Minister of Finance and Treasury Board, gave the commitment to us that the health system would have the money that it needs to be able to appropriately respond. We did provide that, and that's, quite frankly, what we're here doing today.

Now, Madam Chair, the question that the hon. member asked was sort of like: what is the breakdown of that $375 million? I can tell you and share with this House that it's $166 million for testing and assessment centres, $144 million for contact tracing and case notification, $40 million for testing supplies – this is the inventory acquisition – and another $24.8 million for the distribution costs, already mentioned, for the rapid tests.

One more comment. I do appreciate, you know, the challenges that our health care system has faced. This has been a very challenging time, and our jurisdiction, Alberta, is no different than many other jurisdictions across the country in having the need to redeploy resources to be able to respond to the pandemic.

Madam Chair, I want to first of all thank all the health care workers, who actually stepped up to the plate through multiple waves. We saw in this fiscal year part of wave 3 but also wave 4. I thank them for stepping up. You know, we needed to be able to redeploy these workers, to be able to put health care professionals who had some training into different roles, whether that be moving individuals with health care training into contact tracing roles. But then, of course, as we moved out through a wave, we could actually move them back into their role to be able to provide the health care services that they were originally trained to provide. So I want to thank them for that. That was necessary, and it's been necessary not only in our jurisdiction but across the entire country and in jurisdictions around the world.

That's why Budget '22 is so important, Madam Chair. Budget '22 is so important because we recognize that we need to increase overall our capacity in the health care system so that there needs to be less moving of resources from one location to another to be able to respond to future waves of COVID. We have an additional $600 million this year, $600 million next year, $600 million the year after that, a $1.8 billion addition to our operating expenses over the next three years, $3.5 billion in capital. The hon. member and I had a lengthy conversation about the investment in capacity when we spoke about estimates.

But, Madam Chair, we recognize that we need to, quite frankly, normalize the resources that we have within the system – you know, the additional $100 million a year, for example, for ICU – so that we can respond better without having to pull resources from other areas of health care, without having to postpone surgeries. We're doing that in Budget '22 to be able to increase capacity. Again, the estimates here are all about the monies that we have spent in the past fiscal year to be able to respond to the COVID pandemic appropriately and fully and make sure that our health care workers, who have done a tremendous job, had the resources to be able to step up and respond to the crisis and provide services to Albertans.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate that response from the minister. Certainly, there is something to be said for providing the financial resources that are needed to respond to COVID-19, but what I would note is that indeed Alberta faced the same pressures as other jurisdictions, Alberta faced the same challenges, and certainly there are uncertainties that are baked into responding to a pandemic with a previously unknown novel coronavirus. But there were repeated decisions by this government that made that situation, that uncertainty so much worse for our front-line health care workers.

Indeed, spending of dollars does not make up for lack of leadership, it does not make up for putting politics ahead of public health, and indeed that is what we saw repeatedly throughout this pandemic, not unlike previous Conservative governments who put health care spending on a roller coaster. It would rise and fall with the price of oil, and the chaos, the uncertainty that created within the health care system made health care less efficient, more expensive, and created far more stress for health care workers, and indeed that is what we had throughout this pandemic thanks to this government's repeated decisions to act last and act least, to let its own political infighting get in the way of making the decisions to support those health care workers that the minister now stands in this House and purports to thank.

Now, respectfully, I recognize we're here to talk about the dollars, and, hey, if you want to talk about the dollars, the fact is that the costs of this pandemic are undoubtedly higher than they needed to be because of this government's decisions to repeatedly push our health care system to the limits, to repeatedly push the limits of our ICU and hospitalization capacity, and the ongoing impacts that we're going to have, which, indeed, I had the opportunity to talk about with this minister during the estimates process. The fact is that the minister and his government can congratulate themselves and pat themselves on the back . . .

The Chair: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt; that concludes the first 60-minute block for the Official Opposition.

We will now move to the independent members of this House. There's a 20-minute block remaining.

Just to confirm, Hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat, would you like the first 10-minute block and the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley the second 10-minute block?

Mr. Barnes: Yes, please.

The Chair: Yes. Perfect.

Would you like to share your time with the minister's?

Mr. Barnes: Yes. I have a couple of questions for Health and one for Energy.

Ministers, do you mind if we go back and forth? Thank you.

The Chair: Just a reminder to direct your comments through the chair. I'm happy to facilitate that for you.

Mr. Barnes: Okay. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you again, Madam Chair. First of all, to the Minister of Health: $25 billion spent last year, and now we're dealing with another $726 million in supplemental supply. I want to start with the $174 million for increased physician compensation, please.

You know, again, thank you so loudly to our physicians, our nurses, all our front-line workers through what was absolutely an incredible two years, and I just couldn't imagine. But there were lots of things that we heard last year that were COVID and pandemic response related but not quite. Rural Alberta: I heard time and time again about communities being short of doctors for locum, about emergency wards not being open, about service not being able to be provided. Of course, two or three years ago there was quite a controversy with our rural doctors especially, and there was some talk of withdrawal of service, and I believe $180 million was added to the budget for that. Mr. Minister, I'd like to ask you: of the $174 million, is any of that for locums? Is any of that to increase the number of rural front-line providers and physicians, and how much of that would be related to their extra work and their extra stress during COVID?

Thank you.

Mr. Copping: Thanks to the hon. member for the question. You know, broadly speaking, I can break down the numbers for the roughly $174 million. The vast majority of it, ballpark $85 million, was really associated with increase in fee-for-service billings, and that sort of had two components to it. One is a catch-up. You may recall the year previously, when we got into the first year of COVID, there was a delay, so people reduced the amount of time that they were actually seeing their doctors given the restrictions in place, and some people were just not comfortable seeing their doctors. What we saw this fiscal year was a catch-up, so people actually seeing their family doctors that they actually hadn't seen before, and you had an increase in billings as a result of that.

As well, we also put in place virtual codes to be able to make it easier, and in particular for omicron we put a new array of codes because we didn't want the same thing to happen as it did, you know, the first year that we were actually dealing with COVID. As a result, we changed the codes so that patients and doctors could build, like, for example, complex modifiers that they couldn't under the previous virtual codes so that they could continue to see their patients and see their patients virtually, which actually increased the costs associated with it, but it really was to make sure that we didn't create that backlog of individuals seeing their doctors. That was one portion of it.

Another portion that was associated, $43 million, was an increase in clinical alternate relationship plans due to the introduction of new and expanded ARPs. As the hon. member may recall, this was part of the initiative to be able to not only manage costs but better services – right? – in terms of a capitation plan and being able to expand that. Partly, it was to be able to enable family physicians, not only in urban centres but in rural centres, to be able to provide better services to Albertans.

Then I think the last piece, which is what the hon. member is driving at, is that $43.4 million of this was associated with the rural, remote, northern program, and that was actually the increased funding associated with that due to the changes in terms of the approach to billing.

This was part, last year, of the overall $90 million, between the supplemental estimates and then what already was budgeted, to be able to support doctors in rural areas. That $90 million had a number of different components. If the hon. member just gives me a moment, I can pull them up here. Yeah. That included the rural medical education program, $6 million; the rural integrated community clerks program, $4 million; the rural health profession action plan, $9 million; the locum program, $3 million, which included a rural locum of $1.4 million, a specialist locum program at $1.5 million, and the rural physician on-call program, $12 million. Now, some of this was built into the original budget, and then, as indicated previously, the other amount is in that $173 million.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Mr. Barnes: Okay. Thank you. Keeping with the same minister, $726 million more for COVID measures on top of about $1.1 billion for the pandemic transferred from contingency already. I believe I have a number of $169 million that is beside a line item for acute care and front-line services. Minister, I guess what I want to ask you is that we all know that Albertans fell thousands and thousands behind for their surgeries, and we saw an announcement for this year's budget of I think it was $300 million for 100 beds, so I'd like to ask you: of that $169 million extra that you're asking for today, how much is going towards reducing these wait times for our much-needed surgeries, and is any of that money going to increase ICU capacity?

The Chair: The hon. minister.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Madam Chair. The hon. member is quite right. In Budget 2022 we put an additional $100 million in terms of expanding capacity by 50 ICU beds. So that is the focus, and we've actually funded that over the next three years. That's based on the premise that we understood that even though we did flex up and flex down throughout this current budget year, to be able to respond in particular to the fourth wave, where at just under 380 beds we had to flex up into typically 173, the $100 million in Budget 2022 is to be able to expand that 50 from 173, an additional 50 beds.

Now, in terms of the $169 million for acute-care and entry screening, $138.6 million is for hospital and ICU beds. That was actually to enable us to flex up beyond the 173. Also, because we had to flex up – that was wave 4, but in wave 5 we had to do some increase in ICU, not as much. We didn't have to head up to that 380 number, but we did, you know, go over 225 – right? – to be able to do that.

Plus, also, on the non-ICU beds, we had to increase our capacity there, but again it wasn't a large amount. So of that $169 million, just $130.6 million was for hospital and ICU beds to enable us to be able to respond to COVID during the pandemic. I guess my point is that it wasn't – it's not base funding, right? It is the flex up to be able to do this in response to COVID. Now, the $100 million that we're putting in Budget '22 and for the next three years is base funding for the additional 50 beds, to make it easier for us to be able to respond to whatever happens next.

The Chair: One minute, 37 remaining, hon. member.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Minister. To the Minister of Energy, please: this is really an Energy budget. Two years ago we were a $16.9 billion deficit. This year we're a $3.2 billion deficit, plus the $1.2 billion being asked for here tonight. Oil and gas royalties went from $3 billion to $13.2 billion, and that brings me to the $300 million you're asking for residential support. Of course, your share of supplement is $96 million, not the $300 million, rather, that is going out to residential consumers.

So I congratulate you, first of all, on approximately $200 million of savings in your department, but, Minister, I don't hear about – Albertans aren't complaining to me about the high cost of electricity. They're complaining to me about the transmission and distribution, the extra charges. Is any money going into researching how we can bring those costs down long term for them?

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you. Exactly. We are actually doing a lot in that area, led by Associate Minister Nally. Anybody looking at their bill sees the distribution and the transmission costs to be the most significant part of the bill. One of the things we're doing: the AESO is conducting a 2022 long-term transmission plan. Alberta Energy is reviewing the transition policy. They'll be taking feedback and reviewing the feedback from 2021 stakeholder consultation.

The Chair: I hesitate to interrupt; the first 10 minutes have elapsed.

The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley for the second 10 minutes. Would you like to share your time?

Mr. Loewen: Yeah. Share my time, and just maybe have the minister continue answering that last question, and then I'll ask mine.

The Chair: If that's amenable to the minister, you may proceed.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you. As I mentioned, there are a lot of things under way to look at getting the costs of electricity down. In particular, the AESO's 2022 long-term transmission plan is under way. They're reviewing it. Alberta Energy has feedback on stakeholder input last fall. We're looking to identify solutions to address the rising trajectory of transmission costs. We're also looking at a number of things within the grid to try to get the price of electricity down, including self-supply and export. We're looking at energy storage, and the Alberta Utilities Commission has completed an inquiry into the future of the distribution system. So there are a number of things under way.

In terms of getting the energy price down, I would note that the return to the energy-only market, not proceeding to the NDP capacity market, has brought a number of announced investments into the electricity system: $5 billion of investments announced for new generation projects, including 50 power plants. The more electricity we have in the system, the more we'll get the costs down.

We do know that while utility prices are high right now, we are very concerned with the distribution and the transmission costs. But, as I noted, there are several policies under way looking at innovative solutions to get the transmission costs down.

The Chair: The hon minister to supplement.

Mr. Toews: All right. Thank you, Madam Chair. The member is right to ask this question. Albertans are paying very high transmission fees right now right across the province, especially in rural Alberta. As we consider what options we have, what levers we might have to pull, I think it's important that we understand what gave rise to these high transmission costs. It bears repeating tonight that the previous government – and previous governments before them – spent almost $8 billion on transmission costs, and those costs must be recovered by consumers. The system was overbuilt, and those costs are real.

Madam Chair, I can say this, that there's been a lot of work done to understand the recovery curve, the methodology to ensure that it's most advantageous and appropriate that we're assigning the transmission costs, which were an overbuild by the previous government, to consumers who might benefit. And I can say this, that there's not a silver bullet out there based on everything that we can see. The fact of the matter is that the members opposite overbuilt the system; consumers are now paying.

But there's more. Madam Chair, the members opposite – when the NDP were in power, they hastily moved from coal to gas-fired electricity. We were on that trajectory, but they hastily, prematurely made that transition, costing Alberta consumers about $1.4 billion. That's included in the bill. Moreover, they added a carbon tax, and when you add all three pieces up, it makes for significantly higher electricity bills than consumers would otherwise be paying today.

The Chair: The hon. member. Would you two like to share time?

Mr. Loewen: Yeah.

Mr. Barnes: We could.

The Chair: Okay.

Mr. Barnes: Minister, I'm confused. I'm very grateful that I was elected in 2012, but in 2012 it was all about the fact that the PCs had approved these transmission lines and the overbuild of these transmission lines through the province. Maybe the NDP government built the lines that a previous Progressive Conservative government approved. I ask you: should they have not honoured a contract, or am I wrong? Bill 50: I remember lawyers, I remember town halls of 350 people in Medicine Hat concerned not only about the Alberta Land Stewardship Act but the fact that Bill 50 was going to way overbuild the transmission lines, and, Minister, it was clearly a Progressive Conservative government. Please help me.

The Chair: Hon. member, I'm going to take a moment to remind all members to speak through the chair.

The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you. Just to give some details on the transmission overbuild, from 2015 to 2019 $7.5 billion in new transmission infrastructure was built, as noted by the Minister of Finance, that included approximately $5.2 billion in critical transmission projects such as the eastern and western Alberta transmission lines and the Fort McMurray west 500-kV line. Since 2020, since our government came into power, we've spent $100 million on transmission infrastructure versus $7.5 billion.

I don't want to get into a debate of which government in the past authorized the approval. It doesn't matter. It's there in the budget, and those are coming up with higher electricity prices. The fact is that between 2015 and 2019 $7.5 billion of overbuild in infrastructure happened, and consumers are paying for that right now, Madam Chair. That's why we are taking an innovative look at how to get down those costs through the various reviews I mentioned earlier.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Mr. Nally: Could I provide a little colour?

The Chair: Hon. member, would you like a supplement from the associate minister?

Mr. Barnes: How much time is left, please?

The Chair: You have just under four minutes.

Mr. Loewen: I'll do this question, and we'll see what's left after that.

The Chair: Okay.

Mr. Loewen: My question is fairly simple. It's to the Minister of Culture, and it's more of a question as far as, I guess, maybe just an explanation. I'm not questioning the amount, I'm not questioning the need for the money that's funding going to Ukraine for humanitarian and nonlethal defence military equipment, but I guess I'm curious as to why that amount of money is in Culture and not in intergovernmental affairs. I'm just wondering if there'd be a simple explanation of why that is, because when I look through the business plan of Culture, I don't see anything that relates to any kind of transferring money between governments, especially internationally, though intergovernmental affairs could qualify for that. I just wondered if I could get an explanation for that.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Culture.

Mr. Orr: Yeah. Thanks for the question. The reason it was put through Culture is because Culture is set up with all of the granting staff to qualify and review and preview grant applications. These were put through under all of the rules. Even though we offered it, the organizations still had to apply and provide all of their financial data and their legal society data and all the rest of it to the department so that there was good tracking and record keeping for it. It was put through under the other initiatives program, which is a very broad, open program that allows for a real wide variety of specific programs. It was the cleanest, best reporting vehicle, I think, that we could have used, and that's the main reason that it was put through my department.

Thank you.

Mr. Loewen: Just a follow-up and, again, just an honest question here. What organization made the grant application? Was it the Ukrainian government? Just trying to get that straight.

The Chair: The hon. minister.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Madam Chair. I can give you the exact details; $350,000 of it went to the Alberta provincial congress of the Ukrainian Canadian Congress. That was for local Alberta services. Actually, there was a previous $1 million in an initial grant and then $5 million also added to it for a total of $6 million to the Canada-Ukraine Foundation, which is registered within Canada – so it's, again, within Canada – then the further $5 million for the Ukraine World Congress for its Unite with Ukraine campaign. So that's where the money went, and those are the amounts that went to each.

Mr. Loewen: Perfect. Thanks, Minister. I appreciate that.

I'll turn the rest of the time over to the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

The Chair: The hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Chair. How much time do I have?

The Chair: Fifty-two seconds.

Mr. Nally: I just want to provide a little bit of colour, and I'm glad that the member has picked up on the fact that there is a continuity of government. In 2015, when the NDP were elected, it's not like everything that the PCs were working on stopped. In short, the NDP were not guilty of being the first government to overbuild the system; they were guilty of continuing the overbuild that began on the NDP. They were also guilty of not stopping the overbuild, and in addition they are guilty of allowing the overbuild to literally explode on their watch. Madam Chair, as the Minister of Energy pointed out, we saw $100 million in 2020, and in 2021 there were zero dollars spent on transmission. So they are guilty of not stopping the overbuild, which is the exact restraint that we brought to the electricity grid.

The Chair: Well timed.

Hon. members, we will now move to a 20-minute block with government caucus members. I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East to share time with the minister, I'm going to assume?

Mr. Neudorf: Yes, Madam Chair. I'd like to share time with the Minister of Children's Services to begin.

The Chair: And that's okay? All right.
Please proceed.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you very much, Chair. First off, I would like to thank the minister for all of the time that she's put into this file, particularly the time she's spent with many of my constituents talking and answering questions about Children's Services and the new agreement as well as her work on getting the agreement with the federal government, working very hard and diligently on behalf of Alberta and the unique composition of our constituents all across the province, making sure that this program worked as good as it could with the constraints put on her by the federal government on their half of the negotiation.

[Mr. Hanson in the chair]

To begin, I'd like to start on page 16 if possible. There is a total of $134,726,000 requested with another $1 million that is being reprofiled from lower than budgeted expenses in other programs. Can the minister tell us how many children this funding is expected to benefit?

The Acting Chair: Go ahead, Minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Chair. The majority of this funding is in fact due to the new Canada-Alberta early learning and child care agreement, to which we've spoken a little bit about tonight. I do want to point out – it's one thing that I didn't quite have enough time to mention when the members opposite were asking questions – that there is really one taxpayer. One taxpayer. And bringing these hard-earned Alberta tax dollars back to this province is something that Alberta parents wanted to see. This is a positive, so we did invest. We invested in supporting child care providers throughout COVID. We've got excellent news for parents and operators right across this province with $1 billion in funding starting in the next budget year.

But in December 2021, to answer the member's specific question, there were approximately 70,000 children from birth to kindergarten age enrolled in licensed child care. That's about 73 per cent enrolment where we're at right now.

Affordability grant funding and subsidy supports will result in an average reduction of 50 per cent, and that is based on the average child care fees that we see. Programs do report that information to the ministry, so we use that as an average. With the operating grant we will reduce fees for all parents in every single space, Mr. Chair, and that is in licensed day homes and preschools and child care facilities because we respect parent choice. This is an average, so some families may see less of a reduction when it comes to a percentage. Some will receive a greater reduction than that, but every single parent right across this province, in every corner, in a licensed space will see a decrease. They already have seen that. Those dollars started to roll out in January. Some operators had the flexibility to roll it out in February or March and then retroactively support parents.

We're also committed to creating another 42,500 spaces as a minimum over the next five years.

The Acting Chair: Go ahead, Member.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Chair, and thank you, through you, to minister for their work on that. I deeply appreciate it, and I'd again just reiterate that I appreciate the time that she spent in Lethbridge and area speaking to many of those operators there, answering their questions.

Again, I know that the minister put a lot of work in negotiating an agreement with the federal government that would work for Albertan families. This government knows that there is no one-size-fits-all solution to child care, and I would like to again thank the minister for her work specifically on this file. The Canada-Alberta early learning and child care agreement includes child care worker supports, which I see are being allocated at $28,167,000 on page 16 of the supplementary estimates. Can the minister tell us what supports this funding will provide for these workers? I know many of these workers have contacted my office, and they're seeking just to understand the complexities of this agreement and which part was the responsibility for the federal government and which is the responsibility for us as a provincial government. I'd appreciate a response on that.

Thank you, Chair.

The Acting Chair: Go ahead.

Ms Schulz: Thank you so much, Chair. I do want to thank the member for just being so engaged on this file. It is true that we've had a number of discussions with operators in Lethbridge and area, and specifically the last meeting we had was on areas where there's still some work to do. We committed to rolling this out over five years, and I firmly believe that to do that, we need feedback from Albertans, so I do want to thank the member for organizing that and making sure that he is well connected with operators in Lethbridge and organizing opportunities for me to speak directly to operators and educators because we want to make sure we get this right, and that's exactly how we do that.

The $28.2 million is made up of three things: $3.3 million from the new Canada-Alberta early learning and child care agreement; $30.3 million from the federal child care workforce agreement. There was a total in that funding of $56 million to support the workforce in that federal agreement. This funding is to strengthen the workforce through skills training and professional development. It will also support child care staff recovery and retention, wage top-ups for child care and preschool educators, which is something we heard was very important, and it's off-set by $5.4 million due to lower than anticipated uptake of the child care critical worker benefit, as we've discussed this evening.

The Acting Chair: Go ahead, Member.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Chair, and thank you to the minister yet again. It is my understanding from page 16 of the supplementary estimates that related to this $28.2 million is a partial offset of the $5,414,000 due to the lower than expected enrolment in the critical worker benefit program, so I've got a number of questions on this topic and this line item in particular. I'll ask maybe a couple and allow the minister to respond. Can I assume that this lower enrolment is why we did not use the full critical worker benefit program, and would the minister be able to provide insight as to why we saw a lower than anticipated enrolment in that same program?

Ms Schulz: Thank you. Those are excellent questions, Chair. First of all, the number of eligible workers was estimated based on ratios of support to front-line staff, and we wanted to make sure that there were enough dollars set aside to support all of those front-line workers, educators, and support staff who might be eligible for this program. It was estimated based on the highest possible uptake because that is the responsible thing to do.

As mentioned, phase 2 was expanded to make sure that we could include non front-line staff, those that may not be trained early childhood educators levels 1, 2, 3, those educators that we provide a wage top-up for in our licensed spaces and facilities. We heard from child care operators that this work was very important, especially during a time like COVID. Those who may come in as supports, those who made sure that facilities were kept clean and they could adhere to all of the guidance put forward by the chief medical officer of health, those who provide healthy, nutritious meals for our youngest citizens are very important. In my case, you know, my own son maybe ate bread for probably a good six months. They prepared exceptional meals, Mr. Chair, but my son didn't always appreciate them. But I know lots of children and parents very much do. These are very important roles. We heard that feedback. We expanded that program.

Staff levels are also, though, based on child care enrolment, and those numbers fluctuated, of course, throughout the pandemic. Children's Services did in fact communicate a number of times to programs to make sure that they, first of all, were aware of the benefit, that they knew exactly who was eligible in each of the phases. We did make sure that all workers who were eligible in this phase who applied received the benefit.

The Acting Chair: Thank you.

Go ahead. Carry on, Member.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Chair. Continuing on the same topic for the minister's sake, given that it is a cost-shared program, will the federal government approve the reallocation of the $5.4 million that went unused? Going hand in hand with this last question, having already established this as a cost-shared program, can the minister provide some insight into how the federal government determines Alberta's allocation under the Canada-Alberta early learning and child care agreement?

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much. To answer the first question, the Ministry of Labour and Immigration is providing the oversight to this program and will address the use of any unspent federal dollars, so that's not something that I should probably speak to specifically.

To answer the second question, the federal government's 2021 budget allocated $30 billion for a five-year commitment for all provinces and territories. The Canada-Alberta early learning and child care agreement designated amounts to be transferred in total to all provinces and territories under this initiative. The formula includes funding on a per-child population, and that's zero to 12 for each of the provinces. Those were the numbers that they used for their basis, so we work within those parameters.

The Acting Chair: Thank you.

Go ahead, Member.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Chair. Two final questions on the same line of thinking, and then I can move on. Will the amount change year over year, and will we require additional supplementary supply each year? If the minister can explain a little bit of that process. Then perhaps the minister can explain why we need supplementary supply if there's an agreement in place that allocates the federal amount. Just last bits of clarity on that topic.

Thank you, Chair.

Ms Schulz: Those are excellent questions, Chair to the member. To answer the first question: no. The funding for the new Canada-Alberta early learning and child care agreement is included in Budget 2022. It's based on our estimated requirements to meet the new terms of the agreement. Each province has an action plan that specifically outlines how those dollars are going to be allocated. Like I said before, we do have some wiggle room to make sure that we're meeting the demands and what we're seeing as we roll this out. I think some of the flexibility is a positive thing, but only changes to funding allocations might require supplementary supply, which would be something like carry-over funds. In previous years we did have some flexibility to use some of those dollars, for example to address COVID-related needs, specifically in the first year of the pandemic.

To answer the second question, the ministry still needs the authority to disburse the funds. Additional details for that – that is, you know, as per, I would say, the Financial Administration Act. We still need the authority to draw from general revenue fund and then disburse those federal dollars received from the federal government.

The Acting Chair: Thank you.

More questions, Member?

Mr. Neudorf: Yeah. Thank you very much, Chair. Carrying on, then, still on page 16 of the supplementary supply estimates, it is mentioned that the funding requested in supplementary supply is partially off-set by a reduction of $49,300,000 due to lower than expected enrolment in child care facilities. On that topic and that amount I also have a number of questions. These are a little bit longer, so I'll probably just take them one at a time. Can the minister tell the Chamber if that's a result of the pandemic and the adjustments being made there with some families keeping their children at home or if there's another reason for this enrolment reduction or something else that can be anticipated? If the minister can unpack that portion of that amount.

The Acting Chair: Go ahead, Minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you so much. You know, one of the very important places that we get this information is not only from parents but also from child care operators, and we do keep in touch with them and have throughout the pandemic.

In Budget 2021 the ministry did plan for enrolment rates to return closer to pre-pandemic levels. Obviously, none of us knew what each additional wave would look like. I think it's fair to say that there was some uncertainty due to COVID but also due to the economic situation that we saw at the time. However, levels have returned to just over 70 per cent enrolment. I think that's positive. They're still lower than the pre-pandemic levels of about 80 per cent. We do want to have a little bit of wiggle room there to make sure that there are spaces available for parents when they need them, but this, of course, did result in less spending in 2021-22.

We do continue to support Albertans applying for child care subsidy. This reduction has been restored in Budget 2022. Since the pandemic began, again, we've allocated $165 million in supports so that child care programs could remain open and support parents who really, truly needed those dollars to take part in the workforce. Of that, provincial funding was $26 million, and federal was $139 million.

The Acting Chair: Thank you, Minister.
Go ahead, Member.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Chair. Continuing on that thought, how does lower enrolment in child care facilities result in an additional $49.3 million? I think you partially answered this, but if you can expand a little bit more fully: I would assume that we would expect enrolment to continue to increase as we move away from the pandemic, and if so, how will this affect future budgets, and how will you make your decisions in light of that trend as we proceed towards recovery?

Ms Schulz: No. You know, we do not expect it to affect future budgets. As I've said, the agreement that we have with the federal government does require us to not replace provincial investments with federal, so we're going to continue to invest at budgeted levels in the past, and we'll continue to support the increasing demand of Albertans applying for child care subsidy. The one-time reduction has been restored in Budget 2022. This is something that we know Albertans are going to rely on. Again, as we roll this out, it's things like making sure we have spaces in areas that we need them, specifically rural, remote, northern communities, and making sure that we have lots of options like day homes and preschools, that we're focusing on as well, and I think that will help us better meet the needs of Alberta working parents who want choice, flexibility, and different options when it comes to care.

The Acting Chair: Thank you.
You can carry on, Member.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you. Can the minister also provide the Assembly with an explanation as to why we are doing supplementary supply when child care programs were undersubscribed and federal funding via the bilateral child care agreement increased significantly? Again, I think that's what some of my constituents would like to ask and just understand, how that relationship all works, in this format here tonight.

Ms Schulz: As I've said, this funding has been restored in Budget 2022 to continue to support the recovery of the child care sector. We know that parents really were counting on these dollars, whether it is to take part in postsecondary or education and skills training. I know, obviously, Chair, that there have been major investments made in that area because we know that our unequivocal focus is making sure that Albertans can get back to work and drive our economic recovery. We were one of the first provinces, as I've said, to roll out the affordability dollars to parents, again, knowing how important those supports are for working parents, especially for children zero to five. You know, that was a parameter of the federal government's program, but it also is where we see that child care fees are high or higher. We know that a strong child care sector supports all working parents. It's absolutely vital in getting parents back to work.

It is, like I said, $3.8 billion over five years for this made-in-Alberta plan. We'll continue to fight for the flexibility that we need or push for the flexibility that we need to meet the unique needs of Alberta working parents. That's also something that I think Albertans expect, the flexibility to meet the needs here and not have a child care program that was designed in Ottawa or in other provinces where the market is different, the needs of parents are different. Rest assured, Chair, that we will continue to push for that. There's $135.4 million allocated for this agreement in '21-22.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you again to the minister through you, Chair.

Two final questions. On page 16 a supplementary amount of $1 million is requested to provide information technology for child care initiatives, which is federally funded. Can the minister tell us what this capital funding is going towards? It's not necessarily, at least in my thinking, my first thought for child care, that we're talking about information technology. I think many people have a question: what is this allocated toward, and how will it be used?

Thank you.

Ms Schulz: Chair, I had the exact same question when I first saw that within the agreements. You know, I would say this. We talk about red tape and reducing red tape. One of the first things we did in our ministry was work with Service Alberta and the ministry of red tape reduction to overhaul the subsidy application system where it used to take two weeks, three weeks, a fax machine, maybe a bus pass or a taxi or definitely a car to get down to the library. I mean, who has a fax machine in 2020? I think 2020 was when we made those changes. Now parents can apply from their smart phone or their computer wherever they are and know within 10 minutes what they can probably expect in terms of a subsidy.

You know, IT doesn't sound like a direct link to in-person child care services – it's not people's go-to – but we did have to make some changes to that system. Again, that was to allow us to add an affordability grant, because typically our system manages wage top-ups for early childhood educators and subsidy up to – back then, at that point it was $90,000 of household income a year. We had to make changes to the subsidy threshold, the eligibility threshold, as well as for those affordability grants but also the volume.

Obviously, Chair, as parents we're quite excited about this program. We saw the volume of applications coming in for subsidy go up, and we needed to make sure that the system can handle that. I mean, hopefully, as we move forward, the system will become even more responsive to changes that we're seeing. We also know that we need data to, I would say, effectively make future investments and get these dollars out to programs so that they can help support parents.

The Chair: Five seconds remaining.

Mr. Neudorf: If I could just read it into the record?

The Chair: No. Sorry. Next time.

We'll now move to members of the Official Opposition for 10-minute blocks. Hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, would you like to share your time?

Ms Hoffman: I would, yeah.

The Chair: With which minister?

Ms Hoffman: The first question is to Culture and then the remainder for Energy, if possible.

The Chair: Okay. Is that amenable for Culture and Energy? Okay. Perfect.

Please proceed with your 10 minutes.

Ms Hoffman: Thanks so much. I want to recognize the public servants who are here tonight to support us in this important discussion as we consider supplementary supply. Thank you very much to them and to all members of the Assembly. I also want to say how I appreciate the tone we've had here tonight, and I hope that we're able to keep it going. I think that having the back and forth and having some opportunity to probe more deeply is certainly beneficial to getting better information to answer questions.

My first question, the only one I really have to the Minister of Culture. I understand there was a $1 million commitment and then a $10.3 million commitment made on separate dates about a month ago and about three weeks ago. I'm just looking for clarification that that money has actually made its way out the door. We know that every day people in Ukraine are continuing to defend their territory, and their sovereignty matters, so I just want to make sure that the announcements that have been made have actually resulted in the, you know, helmets and first aid kits that have been announced.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Culture.

Mr. Orr: Thanks, Madam Chair. Yes. The grants have been through the process. Well, I've signed off on them. My understanding is that they are out the door, but I don't actually sign the cheques – they're direct transfers – but I have signed off on them, so they should be, if not already. That's as close as I can give you for an exact answer on that.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. If either the Minister of Culture or the Minister of Finance would take it upon themselves to confirm that that money has actually been distributed and notify the House tomorrow in whatever fashion they see fit. I just think Albertans would like the confirmation as quickly as possible that the commitments that have been made have materialized. I know the pledges were very well received, and rightfully so, but, yeah, every day people are putting their lives on the line, and I think we'd like to make sure that we have that confirmation. I appreciate that it's been signed. I just want to make sure that the resources are actually being provided, especially in hearing about things like medication and, you know, a lot of these very things that people there need to sustain their own lives. Waiting for three or four weeks to get money to buy medication that's much needed would not be sustainable for many people.

The remainder of my questions relate to Energy, and I just want to start by acknowledging that there are a couple of areas of overspend in this budget. The primary one relates to the recent announcement of an energy rebate, $50 a month for three months postdated. I think that's January, February, March, but I imagine the money won't get out the door till probably April. But because it's in the current fiscal year, I think that's why we're being asked to approve the expenditure today. I'd like just some confirmation from either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Energy that with the $50 per month, because it's for the first three months, which are in the fiscal year that we're already about to leave, that's why it's being asked for even though people probably won't actually see the cheques until the next fiscal year in their own mailboxes.

Mrs. Savage: Madam Chair, the member is correct. It's $50 per month, for a total of $150, to help address the electricity costs for the months of January, February, and March. This targeted relief will be provided to residential, farm, and small-business operators, consumers who consume less than 250 megawatt hours per year. We anticipate that that will cover up to 1 million homes and farms and businesses.

The exact eligibility criteria are being determined right now and will be announced very shortly. The government is working with utilities and regulators to determine the exact details. That includes working to enable the retroactive rebates to be applied to the consumers' bills as soon as possible. We'll be releasing those details as soon as possible. This rebate, combined with the natural gas rebate announced in Budget 2022, will provide some real relief to Albertans. We also think that the electricity rates, just to give an example of how the $50 will help, have gone up, on average, by between $50 and $75 per month for the typical Albertan household, so a $50 rebate per month for that period of time should significantly help those consumers.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Except, what I'm hearing and what I imagine most members of the Assembly are hearing is that most people are saying that their bills are doubling or more than doubling. I've been door-knocking a lot this late winter, early spring, and many people on fixed income are talking about $300-plus increases to their actual bills. So it's $900, over that same period that they'll be getting $150 for, that they're seeing as the increase over what their bill was before. I know that members have had it raised with them. I am aware that other people have been raising it with members of the government.

So it certainly isn't as substantial as I think many would hope to see when the government is celebrating this unplanned revenue that they have come across for the people of Alberta. Again, that revenue belongs to Albertans. It doesn't belong to one party or even to this Assembly. It's the benefit from primarily natural resource revenue, that we are all owners of and therefore should all see the benefit of.

The government is asking the Legislature to appropriate funds to provide some relief to Albertans, but at the same time they're spending $30 million on the war room. I know that we have asked questions about why the government is continuing to prioritize that, and I think that we deserve some more clarity about why that $30 million isn't being passed on to consumers to help reduce their personal burden that they're facing and why the government is seeking to, instead, ask for more money when they could simply reprofile some of the money from the war room, which hasn't seen the kind of returns that I think most Albertans would hope from a $30 million investment.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you. The funding for the Canadian Energy Centre comes from the overall industry advocacy budget of $27 million. The portion that goes to the Canadian Energy Centre is $12 million, so it's not the $30 million. The remaining money in the industry advocacy budget goes to cover government advocacy for things like hydrogen, for things like critical and rare-earth minerals, for geothermal, for all the energy advocacy that we could anticipate and undertake. So it's only $12 million that goes to the Canadian Energy Centre.

When you compare that to the hundreds of millions of dollars that have been spent targeting environmental initiatives in Canada and in Alberta to land-lock our resources, it's money well worth it to protect our energy sector and to ensure that we're able to continue to get our energy product to market. We've seen the impact in the past of what happens when you don't stand up and support your energy sector. It's vetoed pipelines. It's delayed projects. It has impacts on royalties collected. It has impacts on the differentials. We ended up in curtailment because we didn't have enough pipeline capacity to move our resources to market. Again, to emphasize, the budget for the Canadian Energy Centre is $12 million.

The remaining budget is extremely important to Albertans if we want to be able to develop a hydrogen economy, if we want to be able to diversify. We know that the funding that has been used to target our oil and gas sector in the past is money looking for the next cause, it's money looking for a home, so we have to stand up and make sure that we're supporting hydrogen and all the sorts of energy that are going to be needed to bring in a lower carbon future.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Ms Hoffman: Sure. Chair, may I have a time check?

The Chair: One and 20.

Ms Hoffman: Hopefully, I'll get to hear more supplementals in a further exchange, but I will take this one minute to just say that many Albertan families are facing a really tough time right now in terms of their personal bills and particularly as it relates to their power bills and energy costs. When I think about the government celebrating the $300 million, which works out to about 50 bucks a month just for three months – and, of course, that continuation of the program isn't in Budget 2022, so we don't see any anticipated relief for Albertans in the out-months.

When I think about the $1.3 billion, at least, that was gambled on the re-election of Donald Trump, what a difference that money could have made if it would have been extended through this budget to actually help family budgets rather than a failed bet on who would be the President of the United States. I can't help but think of the opportunity that that could have created. It could have been 250 bucks for those three months, or it could have been $50 a month for an extended period of time. I think most Albertans would like to see some kind of stability, certainty, a return to some type of rate cap. Has the government considered what would be possible if that money that was gambled on that re-election bid instead had been focused on supporting everyday Albertans, particularly as it relates to their power bills?

Thank you.

The Chair: Hon. members . . .

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Madam Chair. I would also note . . .

The Chair: Sorry.

We'll now move to members of the government caucus for the next 10-minute block. Hon. Member for Calgary-Klein, would you like to share your time with the minister?

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: I would, yes, with the Minister of Culture.

The Chair: Minister of Culture, is that amenable?

Please proceed.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Excellent. I actually appreciated the Member for Edmonton-Glenora talking about Ukraine and, of course, the challenges that we've seen there. I'm certainly thankful to see our budget addressing some compassionate work and making sure that we as Albertans are helping out as best we can. I think it's fair to say that the horrors of the ongoing war in Ukraine are top of mind for many of us, and I've certainly heard from a lot of my constituents about this as we've seen images of bombed maternity hospitals, the one in Mariupol, a site which was supposed to be a place of life and hope, that have been circulating online and on our TV screens, a sickening example of the atrocities that are being committed. These images can leave many of us here feeling helpless and unsure of what we can do to help the people in Ukraine, and that is why, again, I'm so glad to see that our government is planning to commit funding to Ukraine.

If the supplementary estimates are passed, I see that on page 20 it says that the ministry is requesting supplementary funding "to provide funding to Ukraine for humanitarian and non-lethal defensive military equipment." I just wonder if the minister can tell us about what organizations this is going to be funding and what they will be using the funding for specifically.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Culture.

Mr. Orr: Thank you. Yes. I did briefly state a few minutes ago that the initial $1 million went to the Canada-Ukraine Foundation, then $5 million more to the same, which makes a total of $6 million to the Canada-Ukraine Foundation, and then $5 million to the Ukrainian World Congress, which is actually sort of a support organization for Ukrainians around the world to support their country, to support what happens with them. I can just confirm that the two organizations have a slightly different focus in terms of what we have committed to them for. The Canada-Ukraine Foundation is almost entirely for humanitarian aid: food, hygiene products and materials, medical. Those sorts of things are the primary purpose for the Canada-Ukraine Foundation. The Ukrainian World Congress is more for nonlethal defence to go to Ukrainian defence personnel in Ukraine. It includes things like helmets, night-vision goggles, boots, protective vests, also some communications equipment and logistics resources. That's sort of the general direction for those.

I can be even a little bit more specific on the $350,000 for the Ukrainian Canadian Congress, Alberta chapter, because I just happen to have the actual page with me. That money specifically, according to the agreed-upon grant application: part of it will go for a public information campaign to educate Albertans about the war in Ukraine and, particularly, its impact on Alberta. I should say that that will also be in anticipation of refugees that may end up here, to facilitate joint fundraising projects – they're going to use it, actually, to multiply what we've given them through fundraising efforts to, hopefully, make it substantially a lot more than that, in fact – for humanitarian purposes and refugees to Alberta and to enable a number of organizations to use organizations of the Alberta provincial chapter to liaise and provide co-ordination of volunteers with Alberta's professional immigrant settlement agencies. There is the anticipation that there will be a need to help some folks, whether it's for a shorter term of a few years or permanently – I don't know – to help settle immigrants that end up here because they are refugees of war.

That $350,000 expense is associated with that: $225,000 of it will be for staffing costs to achieve these objectives, another $100,000 of it will be for general operations, and the last $30,000 for social media marketing. That's $350,000 to the Alberta chapter. That's the one I can give you the most details on because I happen to have it here with me tonight.

I hope that answers the question, and I'm open to whatever else.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I'd just like to rise and respond to the I think very good question from the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, and that is in terms of the status of the funds. It was certainly the belief of the Minister of Culture that the funds had gone out, and it was my belief. We can confirm right now that the funds have gone out to all three organizations, and I think all members of this House would be interested in that.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: I'm glad we could get a double in there.

I'm also just excited to hear about the partnerships with civil society organizations and the ability to leverage these great organizations to just get that much more done with the government dollars here. Great to hear. Thank you, through you, Madam Chair, to the minister for that initiative.

Alberta has a large population, obviously, of Ukrainians, many of whom live in Calgary-Klein and have friends and relatives who have been severely impacted by Russia's aggression in their country. The fear and anxiety of these Albertans, what they're facing each and every day, is just unfathomable. I couldn't even imagine having to turn on the TV and log on to Twitter each morning to see how the war is moving and what area most recently has been hit with the air strikes, hoping to get confirmation that their loved ones are still okay and alive. The question here is: can the minister tell us how this funding will support those who are currently being impacted by the war here and in Ukraine?

Mr. Orr: I mean, this is truly a tragedy almost beyond belief, and the needs for just urgent humanitarian aid products are sort of the immediate urgency of the hour: food, clothing, baby care supplies. All of these different kinds of things are being delivered. I can also add that I know even from Alberta here there have been a number of individual voluntary organizations that have sent aid to Ukraine. I've received pictures of the plane landing in Ukraine, it being distributed to different cities. There's sort of the immediate physical support that will come but also, you know, the long-term trauma, the separation of families, the death of loved ones.

Like I said, these are tragedies almost beyond belief. The need to welcome and to help people settle and be accepted, those that end up here in Alberta as refugees: I think there'll be a tremendous need for us as Albertans and in particular the Ukrainian community to gather around their people to try and provide for them that sense of welcome, of belonging.

I don't know that we can even begin to imagine the struggles that they will face, but I know that there is an intent to be able to provide housing, of course, employment opportunities, resettlement issues, counselling and supports, and all those different kinds of things. It's the full spectrum, really, of the immediate physical need to much longer term mental, economic, social supports, that will be there to help the people particularly that arrive here in Alberta.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Excellent. Thank you, Madam Chair, and again thank you to the minister for all of his efforts to help make things better for the people in Ukraine as well as those who have loved ones here that have people impacted by this war.

Talking about our civil society partners and ways people can get involved, I'm just curious, with the numerous ways that you've mentioned, if there's going to be a site available or if you can reference how people can get connected so they can volunteer and they can help contribute financially or in other ways if possible.

The Chair: The hon. minister.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Madam Chair. I think the best answer to that would be to connect with the Alberta council of the Ukrainian Canadian Congress. That is their role to sort of be that clearing house. That's what we've funded them for, to be that resource and that centre guide, and I think they'll do a great job of that. That would be my answer, to connect with them, and they'll be the ones that will be the most informed, the most connected and aware of what the specific needs are in that regard.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. member will not have enough time.

The next 10-minute block will go to members of the Official Opposition. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: I just wanted to paraphrase the last question, and I know the minister didn't have a chance to respond. Just the question around the significant investment – we believe it was reported at least $1.3 billion – on the re-election of Donald Trump in one specific energy project and how that money could have instead been used to support family budgets. It would either be $250 a month, I believe, following the same formula that the minister outlined around $300 million being $50 a month, or it could have been extended for many more months. Does the minister have any thoughts about how that money could have been reprioritized to address family budgets?

The Chair: I'm assuming you're sharing your time.

If the minister is amenable, please proceed.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you. One of the things that could've helped us with having more funds available was if there hadn't been the NDP crude-by-rail deal. Madam Chair, it would have cost the government $2.7 billion to run that program. We've achieved a significant cost reduction by renegotiating the contracts, and we saved at least $400 million from that.

One of the significant things here is that some of the money – you'll notice in the supplementary estimates that their overall savings from Budget 2021 in the Department of Energy budget was $203 million. Over $50 million of that was some further savings in the crude-by-rail contracts, about $51 million, which has been available. Certainly, if there hadn't been the crude-by-rail contracts negotiated in the very last days of the former government's tenure, we would have had additional funds. On top of that is the Balancing Pool allocation, $1.3 million in ratepayer money, which is now being paid back, due to the NDP's disastrous management of our electricity system. So those two things, $2.7 billion in crude by rail plus $1.3 billion in the Balancing Pool, are fairly significant.

I would just point out that with respect to the KXL claim we are pursuing a NAFTA claim in the United States, under a CUSMA claim, for arbitration to recover those costs. Madam Chair, that investment in KXL was to derisk a project due to political risk. The crude-by-rail deal was just simply a bad deal, as was the Balancing Pool. Those things would have significantly returned money. But, as I said, we are providing $300 million electricity support to consumers through the budget.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Madam Chair. What I was hoping we would have heard was some discussion around what could actually be done for Alberta families instead of trying to lay blame for skyrocketing costs that Alberta families are facing today under the current government's leadership.

I do want to touch base on page 26 of the supplementary supply estimates. There's a line item where it says, "cost of selling oil." The budget we're asking for here in the Assembly is almost double what the current estimate was, with the supplementary estimate an additional $63 million. I'd like to have the minister explain a little bit why that number is so much higher than anticipated.

Mrs. Savage: Madam Chair, the cost of selling oil refers to the APMC costs to market the BRIK barrels, bitumen royalty in kind. It goes up and down depending on the volume of oil marketed. There's been a greater amount of – it also goes up and down dependent on the costs of transportation and other logistics. So over last year the cost of selling oil went up because there were more BRIK barrels being marketed, transportation costs were higher. Also, some more of the costs for selling oil were pulled back into APMC. Previously, in prior year's budget, there was a third-party agent that was engaged to do it. That's been pulled internal, in-house, to do that by APMC, which has saved significant costs overall from the third party. Those various factors of the cost of selling oil have increased it. One of the parts is that it's a good thing. It's a good thing if there's more oil being marketed by APMC because there will be a revenue associated in another part of the budget. That's basically background on that additional cost.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Ms Hoffman: May I have a time check again, Madam Chair?

The Chair: Just over five minutes.

Ms Hoffman: Oh, wow. Excellent. I will ask one more question and then probably will, if there's still time remaining, pass to one of my colleagues, probably the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

The minister just highlighted that moving staffing from a third party to internal hire within APMC has seen cost savings, significant cost savings, I think she just highlighted. I just wanted to say that I'm glad that she has shared that information with the House, and I hope that when colleagues around the cabinet table are looking at privatizing or outsourcing to third parties, they consider some of the feedback that we just received about some of the benefits when you actually do things internally, in-house, and how you can see significant savings that can, in turn, be passed on to Albertans at large, including, of course, the taxpayer. So thank you, Minister, for that clarity.

I'm happy to pass the remainder of my time to my colleague for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

The Chair: Hon. member, would you like to share your time with the minister?

Member Irwin: Yes, please, if you don't mind.

The Chair: Which minister?

Member Irwin: Let's stay on the Energy train, why not.

The Chair: Hon. minister, are you amenable to sharing time?

Mrs. Savage: Sure.

The Chair: All right. Please proceed.

Member Irwin: Thank you.

Thanks very much. I would like to touch on a few pieces that have been said before but maybe just get a little bit of clarity. You know, well, I will preface this a little bit. I am going to get to my question here in estimates, but I did hear the minister railing a bit against – when asked about the war room by my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora, her response was to talk about activists and that sort of thing.

I just really hope that this minister, you know, reflects on the fact that – she did make a comment about, I think, a low-carbon economy, which was nice to hear. But we are hearing today – and I didn't get a chance to speak in the Legislature at all, or I would have noted it – just where we're at with climate change these days: 30 degrees above normal in the Arctic today, 40 degrees above normal in the Antarctic today. So we are definitely seeing the devastating effects of climate change. I do hope that this minister is very aware of that.

I'll connect that to the war room and to the budget line estimates, to just, again, think about how that money, the $30 million on the failed war room, could be instead used. I mean, we could point to countless examples like, you know, perhaps reindexing AISH. To ask it again and maybe in a different form: if you're not going to shut down the war room – and I feel like the prior answer was unsatisfactory – why not look at reinvesting that money in, say, diversification projects? I'd love for the minister to just talk a little bit more about why we're paying for the failed war room.

Mrs. Savage: I've got to get a question just to address some of the questions around climate change, and I can tie some of that background into some of the work that the Canadian Energy Centre is doing. Let me talk about the tremendous project that our Canadian oil sands producers are undertaking in their pathways initiative to net zero. That's to get our entire oil sands to net zero by 2050. That's a significant initiative that the Canadian Energy Centre is promoting. In fact, their recent advertising campaign in New York City, in the Wall Street Journal, on billboards in New York City was: cleaner, closer, committed to net zero.

Talking about the importance of Canadian energy, I can't think of a better use of Canadian Energy Centre funds than to promote how great our country is and how great our oil sands producers are in addressing climate change. So that's one of the significant things that the Canadian Energy Centre is doing, and I would think and I would hope that the members opposite would be proud of that, would be proud of our oil production here in Canada, would be proud of the fact that our pathways initiative is getting our oil sands to net zero.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Chair, and I appreciate the opportunity to rise. Just on the question of the energy centre and the important work that it does, we certainly heard from the Minister of Energy of the great progress that our oil sands producers are making in terms of reducing emissions. I think we all agree that that's important work, but I would assert that there has been an inordinate focus . . .

The Chair: My apologies, hon. minister. Perhaps in the next round.

We will now go to members of the government. Hon. Member for Grande Prairie, would you like to share your time and with which minister?

Mrs. Allard: Yes, please, Madam Chair. I'd like to start with the Minister of Energy, please.

The Chair: The Minister of Energy says that's okay. Please proceed.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you so much, Madam Chair. Energy is a hot topic tonight, and it should be in Alberta these days. I just wanted to highlight – again, I'm reading from the fiscal plan update that there's a $300 million increase in Energy for the $50 per month fixed rebate for electricity costs, and these increases are for January, February, March of 2022, to be provided to these consumers who are using less than 250 megawatt hours per year consumption.

That said, I guess my first question for the Minister of Energy is – I note and I'm referencing page 23 of supplementary supply. The supplementary estimate is only $96 million out of $300 million, and I just wondered if the minister could expand. She started to answer that in one of the previous questions from the members opposite, but I was curious to understand why that is so much less than $300 million. As the Minister of Children's Services said earlier, there's only one taxpayer, so I'd really like the taxpayer to understand what this government has been doing to be fiscally responsible with this budget and, in fact, to bring in a balanced budget. Through you, Chair, to the minister, I'd love to hear her answer on why the supplementary supply is so much lower than the required $300 million.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. The Member for Grande Prairie is correct. Of the $300 million allocated to the electricity rebates, $96,246,000 is in the supplementary estimates. The other $203.8 million is coming from surplus funds in the Department of Energy budget, funds that we did not use last year in 2021.

That's a good-news story, and I can go over some of the areas where we've achieved savings significantly. First off was the crude by rail, the divestment of the contracts, and due to the very good work of our officials in APMC with the divesting of those contracts, they found another $51 million in savings this year which is available and is now in that surplus of $203 million.

We have some surplus with lower spending in the resource development and management part of our budget, so that's a savings. With discipline and the government's emphasis on essential spending only, we've achieved $13 million in savings in that area.

We've achieved some savings in the site rehabilitation program. That's the allocation of spending from year to year, so there are some cost-reduction savings in the site rehabilitation program.

In the renewable electricity program, which was a program from the previous government, there are lower anticipated payments, $5 million in savings, as a result of favourable electricity market prices. That amount is partially off-set by the $63 million increase in the cost of selling oil, that the Member for Edmonton-Glenora had asked about.

So this is a good-news story. We've saved $203.8 million from the budget last year, which has been applied and can go to lowering electricity costs for Albertans.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you again, Madam Chair, and, through you, my thanks to the minister and her team on behalf of the Alberta taxpayer for those savings.

I did want to go back to something that we were talking about with the Minister of Energy and also with the Minister of Finance from the members opposite around the Canadian Energy Centre. I know the ministers got cut off in their answers. I was just wondering if either minister would rise and respond.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. Again, I have been quite interested in the conversation around the value of the Canadian Energy Centre and the important work that they do advocating for Canadian energy. We've heard the Minister of Energy stand up and talk about the great progress that our oil sands producers have been making – we can certainly add our conventional producers as well to that – in emissions reduction.

Madam Chair, right now there has been an inordinate focus on one part of the E in ESG, simply on reducing emissions at the expense of social and governance issues. CIBC Capital Markets just issued a report. I picked it up tonight on BNN, and I'm going to just read a bit of it into the record.

CIBC noted that the focus on carbon emissions has led ESG funds to make the "shocking" decision to load up on Russian energy firms.

"In the most shocking example we have come across to date, the ESG fund universe owned twice as much Russian oil and gas as Canadian oil and gas at the end of last year."

Madam Chair, the Crown rests.

Our investment in the Canadian Energy Centre to advocate for Canadian and Alberta oil and gas is essential. It's not only an opportunity but a deep responsibility to get responsibly produced, ethically produced oil and gas on to the market to displace Russian production, Russian production that's fuelling the war against Ukraine, the atrocities against Ukrainian people.

The Chair: Hon. minister, I'll have you table that document at the appropriate time.

The hon. member.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Madam Chair. Could I have a time check, please?

The Chair: You have four minutes left.

Mrs. Allard: Perfect. Thank you so much.

I want to go back to the electricity costs and the electricity rebate. Again, I'm referencing page 24, I believe, of the supplementary estimates. I see that the $96,246,000 has been requested along with the $203,754,000 which is being reprofiled. Again, I want to highlight for the taxpayers this evening that are watching that the ministry has managed to save over $200 million to help them, to support them in their electricity expenses.

In order to pay for this electricity rebate program, estimated at $300 million, I have a couple of questions, through you, Madam Chair, to the minister. First, can the minister tell the House how many households this funding is expected to support with the $150 rebate over three months? Then my second question. We've seen some criticism that this program should have been extended longer than three months. Can the minister tell the House what the projections are for electricity rates after the rebate period has concluded?

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you. The electricity rebate program for the $50 per month, totalling $150, applies for three months – January, February, and March – and we estimate that it will cover over 1 million homes, farms, and businesses to help retroactively pay the costs. The homes, farms, and businesses that qualify are those who consume fewer than 250 megawatt hours per year, so that will be quite significant. It's offered for three months over the winter. That's when consumers are struggling the most.

Madam Chair, we're taking a number of efforts in the long term to bring down the costs of electricity. We spoke earlier – and the associate minister of natural gas also spoke to it – on a number of things and initiatives that are under way to reduce electricity costs long term, including addressing the long-term problems and costs associated with distribution, transmission. This amount for the $150 per month will help over 1 million homes, businesses, and farms to weather the electricity prices over the winter months.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you again, Madam Chair and, through you, to the minister. To aid in transparency for all Albertans, I'm hoping the minister will be able to provide a bit more clarity around how this program will actually be delivered to Albertans, those that qualify. Through you, Madam Chair, to the minister: how will this electricity rebate be received by Albertans? Can they expect to be receiving a $50 cheque three months in succession? Is it one cheque for $150, or will this rebate just show on their electricity bills?

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. minister.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Madam Chair. The exact eligibility criteria are being determined and will be announced in the very near future. The government right now is working with the utilities and the regulators to determine the exact details, including timing. It takes a little bit of time to work those details out, and this work includes working to enable retroactive rebates to be applied to consumer bills as soon as possible. This work is under way, and the exact mechanism and details will be released – and transparently released – as soon as possible.

The Chair: The hon. member, with 25 seconds.

Mrs. Allard: Perfect. I'll be really fast, Madam Chair.

My final question. The cost estimate is about $300 million, and I'm just wondering: is there a possibility that this rebate program will cost more, and if so, how will that be funded?

The Chair: The hon. minister, with 13 seconds.

Mrs. Savage: We're anticipating – the estimate is that it will cost $285 million to $300 million. That's based on an estimate of how many consumers and how many businesses qualify.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. I'm assuming you're sharing your time. With what minister?

Member Irwin: You know what? I'm having a lot fun with Energy, so if we could continue.

The Chair: That's great to hear. The hon. minister seems amenable to sharing time. Please proceed.

Member Irwin: So kind, so kind. I appreciate that I had the chance to just mention climate change because, you know, I fear it's a topic that doesn't get enough attention in this Chamber. There are a lot of folks out there, young and old, who write to me every day, that are incredibly concerned about the very real impacts of climate change and that we're seeing, as I noted earlier, just shocking increases in the temperatures in both the Arctic and the Antarctic. It's truly a crisis, and it should compel all of us in this Chamber to take action.

You know, I'd like to switch gears to talk a little bit about – switch gears for me, but it's actually been a topic that's come up a lot tonight, and that's on utilities. I have to say that, just so I don't get called out on it, I am, of course, referring to page 25 in the supplementary estimates. I haven't had a chance, actually, to talk a lot about my constituents lately in the Chamber. Like, I'm sure, most MLAs, we're hearing from so many of our constituents who are struggling with their bills. Even tonight I was talking with someone on Instagram who said that she's going to face, likely, having to very much choose between paying her power bills and paying for groceries. She said that she's immunocompromised. Anyways, it's one story out of many. I know I don't have time to talk about how many folks we really are hearing from. It's not an exaggeration. There are a lot of people who are struggling.

I think, too – and maybe the associate minister would even want to chime in. You know, I was actually just door-knocking in his riding on the weekend, and it was fantastic to meet some of his constituents in Morinville-St. Albert. It really was. We had some wonderful conversations. I did hear from folks. I always ask people when I'm at the doors: what issues are top of mind for you? Utility bills. It's interesting that where we were door-knocking is quite different demographically than Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood: fairly big houses and a lot of folks who are doing fine financially, they would say. But even many of them said: "You know what? It's been hard." We're seeing the concerns about rising utility bills transcend socioeconomic backgrounds, right? Like, everybody is struggling it seems.

You know, can I ask this minister or this associate minister to further clarify how it is – if we're hearing from our constituents, I'm certain they are as well if they're listening – justifiable to offer to Albertans simply a $50 rebate. How is that sufficient? I need that again clarified on the record for my constituents and for theirs as well.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thanks. I'm just going to make a couple of comments and turn it over to the associate minister, seeing that he can talk in reference to his constituents. I would note that we do recognize the pressures that high electricity costs can place on Albertans. We hear it, too. I hear it in my constituency, Calgary-North West. We do note that the electricity rates are based on market conditions, namely supply and demand. There are several options to help alleviate some of the high costs, including fixed-price contract, equalized payment plan. But we recognize, on top of that, that people are struggling. That's why we brought in the electricity rebate program, $300 million of support for Albertans, totalling $150 for each consumer.

I'll turn the time over to my colleague the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity to speak to his constituents.

The Chair: The hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Yeah. Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. I'm quite aware that the hon. member was in my riding. They met at Mercado's, which was my unofficial campaign residence during the nomination. In fact, my son works there. Certainly, it's a very meaningful location for me.

What I will say to the hon. member is: let's stop underpinning what we're actually – the support we're providing: it's not $50. We're providing $150. That is going to hit their bills in the form of a credit of $150. Where we landed on that is that we know the average bill increased between $15 and $75, and that's per month, so $50 is on the high end of that, and we are paying it retroactively for the months that had the highest increases, which would be January, February, and March.

I want to reach out to that member, you know, through you, Madam Chair, to them and to their entire caucus because they seem to be speaking to a lot of members, they're speaking to a lot of individuals that are struggling with utility costs, and I hope that they are making those individuals aware of a couple of things. One is that if they are on a variable rate, then they should encourage them to take a look at a fixed-rate contract because not everybody saw their electricity bills go up double and triple. They would have seen small increases through usage, but the individuals who saw the big increases are because they had variable rates. I would encourage the hon. member to direct those folks that are struggling with higher costs to the Utilities Consumer Advocate and have them take a serious look at fixed-rate contracts.

The other thing that I'd encourage the member to do is that if they actually have someone that is struggling with utility insecurity and is at risk – I mean, they're not even listening, Madam Chair. They're either talking amongst themselves or looking down at their shoes, but I would encourage them to refer those members to the Utilities Consumer Advocate, where they can actually get supports. There are supports for low-income seniors. There are supports for low-income Albertans that are struggling with utility and security.

Lastly, if we have an individual that is on the verge of having their utilities cut off, Madam Chair, my office has been reaching out to the utilities, and they have provided assurance to us that they have no interest in cutting anybody's electricity off. They have said to us that they will work with any Albertan that works with them and they will provide flexible payment terms that will allow them to keep their lights on. If nothing else, encourage those individuals to contact their retailer because as long as they're contacting the retailer, they will work with them, and then there's no reason to have their utilities cut off.

Again, between that and referring them to the Utilities Consumer Advocate, where there's some really good information on fixed-rate contracts, that would be my advice, Madam Chair, through you, to the hon. members, if they could share that with these Albertans that are struggling with a higher cost of electricity.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. member. Two minutes.

Member Irwin: Wow. You know, this is very good timing because I wasn't able to mention her name before; I just asked her if I could, if I could share. This is Patti, the person I was referring to earlier: "We've been unable to pay rent and the extreme utilities and buy food. I prioritize rent, gas. I owe over $1,200 on both of my bills." She says: "I'm immunosuppressed due to medications. I have not worked since January 2020. I've run through my savings RRSP. I went and got a job in January. Three days in I caught COVID, and I'm dealing with the effects of that."

That's just one example, somebody who is a low-income Albertan who's struggling every single day, and this minister is asking those folks to just go figure it out, go navigate a fairly complicated system. I admit that I'm not, you know, a rocket scientist, but it is hard to navigate the system of trying to figure out how to move to a fixed rate. I just think it's quite rich of this minister to offer that as a solution to Albertans when he and his government could be taking that real action to make Albertans' lives easier.

I think, you know, this government even co-opted one of our sayings from a while ago: making life more affordable. You're certainly not making life more affordable. You're making life more expensive and you're making it very difficult, particularly for folks who are working three jobs, folks who are a single mom who is being told to just go and change your contract or go and figure it out. That is just not enough. Very much a pull-yourself-up-by-your-own-bootstraps mentality, and that's incredibly frustrating because that assumes that everybody has boots.

All right. I don't think I have a lot of time left, but I would again just, you know, get on the record that, as my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora did as well . . .

The Chair: My apologies.

Hon. members, we will now go to members of the government. The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul. Would you like to share your time with the minister?

Mr. Hanson: I'll share my time with the Minister of Health. Shockingly, Minister.

The Chair: Happy to do so. Please proceed.

10:50

Mr. Hanson: Awesome. Thanks. Just a few questions here. In the Health supplementary supply estimates, page 28, there's additional money for physician compensation, with page 29 under line item 3.2 further clarifying that this additional funding is for physician services. Can the minister explain how this increase relates to the number of doctors in Alberta?

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Well, thank you very much to the hon. member for the question, Madam Chair. The supplementary estimate is due to higher than budgeted costs primarily for fee-for-service billings, alternate relationship plans, and the rural, remote, northern program rather than the actual number of active physicians in Alberta. Now, the growth in expenditure relates to an increase in fee-for-service compensation for physicians. This is due largely to an increase in demand for services, sort of a catching up of the previous year. As I indicated in a previous set of questions, during the first year of COVID there were a large number of Albertans who decided not to see their family physicians, for example. They held off on doing that, but then in the most recent fiscal year, as vaccines became more available and more people got vaccinated, they felt more comfortable to go and see their doctors, and there was a catch-up. So that's a big part of it. Another part of it is also associated with ARPs, and then, lastly, in regard to the rural, remote, northern program.

Now, all of this growth is not directly targeted at increasing the numbers, but I can share with the hon. members that, you know, the number of physicians billing in Alberta actually increased this budget year over the previous budget year, and the number of doctors coming to Alberta, when we do a year-over-year comparison, also increased. That is in part in terms of particularly the rural, remote, northern allowances. That was additional money particularly for rural doctors where there are challenges and shortages in certain areas.

As well, as I indicated earlier to the House, Madam Chair, for the omicron wave we increased flexibility for billing of virtual codes by doctors. One reason we did that was because we actually understood that there were some challenges of doctors doing billings when people wouldn't see them, a loss in revenues and a risk that family doctors would be closing their doors. We didn't want to see that happen, so we made the change in terms of the virtual codes. Although it doesn't relate directly to the number of doctors in terms of the payments here, it helps to retain and then also attract, because we have, especially in our rural areas, some of the highest pay rates for family doctors so that we can attract them and retain them.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much. I know that the minister is probably shocked that I'm asking these questions about rural health care and rural physicians, but I just have to get it off. One of the biggest issues facing rural communities, as has been discussed, with regard to health care is a lack of physicians who are able to operate clinics and provide medical care. This is by no means a new problem; however, it is a persisting problem that needs to be treated. I see on page 28 of the supplementary estimates that $173,857,000 would be allocated toward physician compensation if these estimates were granted. My question is: how does this increased spending on physician compensation attract physicians to rural Alberta, and will it be different for more remote areas?

Mr. Copping: Thanks again to the hon. member for the question. As the hon. member knows, our government is focused on ensuring that there is equitable access to health care across the entire province, including in rural Alberta. Quite frankly, this $173 million: part of that is actually to do just that. You know, spending more on physician compensation means more efforts and better ability to recruit and retain doctors across our entire province. Two of the categories that I mentioned in my earlier answer of $173 million is $43 million in clinical alternate relationship plans, or ARPs, to provide 15 new ARPs, 12 of which are related to clinical stipends plus three additional ARPs, and an increase of $43.4 million in the rural, remote, northern program.

Now, Madam Chair, the rural, remote, northern program compensates physicians who practise in underserved areas, particularly northern Alberta. The program pays a percentage premium on services in geographical locations depending on the latitude where the services were provided. There are higher percentage premiums for locations with fewer physicians that are more remote, considering the availability of general practitioners and specialists' proximity to regional centres and proximity to Edmonton and Calgary. Communities are given isolation scores and are assigned a premium amount as well as a flat fee, details of which – if the hon. member is interested, you can go online and check it out. These estimates also include a $2 million increase for the rural health physician action plan.

Madam Chair, this is part of our $90 million commitment that we made last year in terms of improving doctor recruitment and retention in Alberta, particularly in rural areas. Let me just give you a breakdown of this. This includes, as I indicated, the rural, remote, northern program, which is in total $57 million, which includes the $43 million increase, which is part of these estimates; the rural medical education, which is $6 million; the rural integrated community clerkship program, which is $4 million; the Rural Health Professions Action Plan, which is $9 million; there's also a locum program that's $3 million, and that is comprised of a rural locum program of $1.4 million and a specialist locum program of $1.6 million; and a rural physician on-call program of about $12 million.

Madam Chair, I'd like to point out that this $90 million that we made in this year's budget: it's in Budget 2022 because we understand the importance to be able to attract and retain doctors, particularly in our rural communities. Also, we have a new program, the RESIDE program. As the hon. member knows, $6 million over three years to target certain areas where there is a lack of particularly family physicians in those areas, to be able to pay for some of the education of residencies so that they could actually sign a contract and go and live there, hopefully settle, raise a family, and stay in that particular area and be able to provide services to rural Albertans.

Madam Chair, not only will the estimates in this budget help pay for that in the current budget year, but we are investing in the next budget year in Budget '22.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Minister. I'm sure that you will agree that getting people from one community to go to school and come back to their community – they're more likely to stay, so I thank you for that program.

During the COVID pandemic a major focus of this government has been protecting our most vulnerable, primary among them being seniors in continuing care homes. On page 28 of the supplementary estimates under the additional $716,120,000 estimated for COVID-19 pandemic response, I see over $260 million dedicated towards continuing care. To the Minister of Health: what outcomes are expected in Alberta's continuing care services as a result of this increased funding?

The Chair: The hon. minister.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thanks to the hon. member for the question. In terms of the breakdown of that $260.4 million, that includes just under $258 million in support to continuing care operators and just approximately $2.7 million for continuing care audits.

Madam Chair, as you know and as the hon. member knows, our COVID-19 response has focused on protecting continuing care residents and staff since the beginning of the pandemic with ongoing adjustments as new evidence has emerged. Continuing care settings are uniquely high risk for COVID-19 outbreaks and severe outcomes. We recognized this early in the pandemic and provided incremental funding for continuing care operators starting in May of 2020.

As continuing care measures remained in place until the province reached step 3, the government of Alberta has continued this funding throughout this fiscal year to support clients, residents, and staff in these settings. Specifically, this funding helps contracted designated supported living and long-term care operators to pay for increased costs during the pandemic, including enhanced staffing, extra cleaning supplies, and a wage top-up of an additional $2 per hour for health care aides. The funding also includes a $2 wage top-up for HAs in contracted home care agencies to help retain current and recruit additional staff and allow more Albertans to be cared for in their own homes.

Madam Chair, you know, this is critically important. Not only does this supplemental pay for and support continuing care homes in the existing budget year, but Budget '22 also continues on this because we recognize that even though we're heading into the endemic phase, COVID is not over; it's still with us. We need to support our continuing care homes.

I was also, Madam Chair, incredibly excited to be able to make the announcement of – you know, Budget '22 is not only about supporting continuing care homes through the pandemic, but we are also making significant investments in capital. We will have this in the upcoming budget; 1,515 new spaces for continuing care. We increased the budget by over $200 million for the upcoming . . .

The Chair: I hesitate to interrupt.

The remaining six minutes will go to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods to likely share time with the minister.

Ms Gray: I would love that. With the Health minister, to begin along the same line that was just being debated. Thank you very much. On page 28 of the supplementary supply estimates the increase to physician compensation, which you've had the opportunity to speak to a number of times through this debate. Minister, if I was listening carefully enough, I believe at one point you were saying that the physician compensation increase, spending more on compensation, allows you to better recruit and retain doctors. That was one of the things that you said.

Looking at the supplementary supply and thinking about the previous year, I'm curious. We do not see any additional dollars for other health care workers when it comes to their compensation. We know strongly that the heroes of this pandemic struggled with burnout, struggled with staffing issues, and I don't see anything in this supplementary supply for other health care workers, allied professionals, other than physicians, and, in fact, in the media recently bargaining positions of pay cuts.

While physician compensation is increased to better recruit and retain, I'm concerned that the supplementary supply estimates do not include compensation increases for other health care professionals, and I'm curious about your department's, Health, human resources plan because I think there are some serious concerns, particularly coming out of the pandemic, in this regard.

Mr. Copping: Well, thanks to the hon. member for the question. I appreciate that, you know, this is the way – partly it's how budgets are broken down. In regard to physician compensation there is a specific line item that was associated with that, so we can actually talk specifically to that. I can say, for example, that for continuing care we did provide a $2 wage top-up, as I just spoke to earlier. That was in the supplemental estimates, and then we actually will continue that into the next budget and Budget '22.

In regard to other health care professionals, for example nurses, for some of these we didn't need a supplemental benefit because this is actually either – you know, in terms of the most recent nurses settlement this was either captured within the current AHS budget or, quite frankly, its budget is budgeted in Budget '22 in terms of the other changes associated with that.

But I would like to make one comment about – you know, the hon. member sort of raised the negotiations that are ongoing, and this goes more to a Budget '22 question. Similarly, in terms of Budget '22 with physician compensation we did not make a significant change because we don't know what the outcome of that bargaining will be. Similarly, in terms of the bargaining that's going on between the HSAA and AHS at this point in time, bargaining is just that: bargaining. As the hon. member knows, with experience dealing with unions as a former Minister of Labour and Immigration, the parties put a position on the table and then they move from there.

Again, as I've indicated in this House earlier, I'm very hopeful and optimistic that the HSAA and AHS will move towards an agreement just like UNA and AHS moved towards an agreement. Any costs associated with that in the current year were such that we didn't need a supplemental estimate, but the fact is that, as the hon. member knows, Budget 2022 includes the costs in that. We will do the same thing as necessary for any other agreements that we reach.

The Chair: The hon. member.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the minister. Then I will just very quickly, because we're running out of time – part of the supplementary supply estimates refers to the lower than budgeted expense in some programs off-setting some of the increases in others, and we learned through Budget 2022 that one of the areas of underspending is in the EMS budget. So in relation to these supplementary supplies I simply want to ask the minister why that underspending may be happening given the number of red alerts that we have across this province. EMS is so critically important to Alberta families and is an issue of concern. So I raise that as one of the items of lower than budgeted expense in your Budget 2022.

Mr. Copping: Well, thank you for the question from the member. Like, in supplementary estimates, if I can point your attention to it, there's a $164 million savings which off-sets the $173 million, so the net is a $10 million increase. I can tell you, though, that when we look at the major dollars associated with that, the savings is not associated with EMS, quite frankly. You know, we can see that the biggest element of that is a $65 million decrease in the drugs and supplemental health benefits, a $59 million – sorry; a $45 million decrease for a capital grants requirement. This is in regard to the continuing care beds and because we – this was an RFP that was done on the expense side to increase the continuing care beds. Given COVID we weren't able to actually implement that last year, so that money we moved over to Budget 2022. When I make reference to the 1,515 new beds that we actually have coming this year, that's what it relates to, the $44 million.

There's a $10 million decrease in out-of-province health services due to lower demand as a result of the pandemic, an $8 million decrease in addiction and mental health as a result of the delay in opening recovery communities, but we've actually just moved the money. Moving on, a $4 million decrease in regard to information technology. These are the changes . . .

Vote on Supplementary Supply Estimates 2021-22 General Revenue Fund

The Chair: Hon. minister, I hesitate to interrupt, but pursuant to Government Motion 14, agreed to on March 17, 2022, the allotted time of three hours has elapsed. We shall now proceed to the final vote on the supplementary supply estimates.

Those members in favour of the resolutions for the 2021-22 supplementary supply estimates, general revenue fund, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2022, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Chair: Any opposed, please say no. That is carried.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Chair. I move that the committee rise and report the 2021-2022 supplementary supply estimates, general revenue fund.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. The Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions, reports as follows, and requests leave to sit again. The following resolutions relating to the 2021-22 supplementary supply estimates for the general revenue fund for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2022, have been approved.

Offices of the Legislative Assembly: the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner, $55,000.

Children's Services: expense, $134,726,000; capital investment, $1 million.

Culture and Status of Women: expense, $10,350,000.

Energy: expense, $96,246,000.

Health: expense, $725,974,000.

Municipal Affairs: expense, $231,208,000.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. That is carried.

Hon. members, I would like to alert hon. members that pursuant to Standing Order 61(3) following the Committee of Supply's report on the supplementary estimates, the Assembly immediately reverts to Introduction of Bills for the introduction of the appropriation bill.

Introduction of Bills

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I request leave to introduce Bill 8, the Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022. This being a money bill, Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor, having been informed of the contents of this bill, recommends the same to the Assembly.

Bill 8 will provide authority for government to pay from the general revenue fund for additional costs that are not already covered or otherwise provided for during the current fiscal year. Supplementary estimates include $1.2 billion in expense and $1 million in capital investment.

The funding in Bill 8 will ensure that the government can cover the health care costs of the pandemic while also sending aid and equipment to Ukraine, provide electricity rebates to Albertans struggling with rising costs, support child care workers and parents of young children, and build municipal infrastructure.

Other items in this bill are funded by the federal government or are off-set by savings in other areas, meaning the overall increase to the deficit forecast for '21-22 will be limited to approximately, in fact, just over $200 million. Responsible fiscal management, a growing economy, and strong energy prices have helped the government successfully shrink this year's deficit by about 81 per cent since Budget 2021 was first tabled. I ask all my colleagues in the Legislative Assembly to support this bill and help the government move forward with these important supports.

Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 8 read a first time]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to seek unanimous consent for the Chamber to move to one-minute bells for the remainder of the evening sitting.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Government Motions

Canadian Pacific Railway Service

16. Mrs. Sawhney moved on behalf of Mr. Jason Nixon:
Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government of Canada to immediately invoke provisions to declare rail transport an essential service and implement back-to-work legislation to prevent any disruption or CP work stoppage to ensure Canada's economy remains uninterrupted.

[Debate adjourned: Mr. Rutherford speaking]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to join the debate?

I will give just one minute for our officials to exit the Chamber.

Okay. Any members to speak to Government Motion 16?

Seeing none, I will call the question on Government Motion 16.

[The voice vote indicated that Government Motion 16 carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 11:12 p.m.]

[One minute having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, March 22, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interest and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, seated in the galleries today is Cyndi Bester, the executive director of the Lethbridge Chamber of Commerce, a guest of the Member for Lethbridge-East.

Also seated in the gallery are guests of the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

I would like to ask that the Ncube family as well as the Taylor family and Ms Bester please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Provincial Fiscal Policies

Ms Renaud: Modest sacrifices: that's how the Premier characterized the massive cuts and sneaky schemes to take more money directly out of the pockets of Albertans. This means $500 less for every Alberta family. It means $750 less for a senior couple, and it means $3,000 less for people living on AISH. Mr. Speaker, last year I spent a month living on the same amount of money as an AISH recipient. It was nearly impossible, and I had so many advantages that others do not. I did this well before we saw a 30-year high in inflation. Groceries, rent, cost of clothing: all of these things are skyrocketing.

That's not enough. This government had to turn it around and make it worse. They're hiking property taxes, school fees, tuition, and so much more. Even when they're prepared to help, they fail. Their natural gas rebate program is a fake. Their electricity rebate amounts to $50 when Albertans are staring down bills in excess of $700. The Premier stands there claiming modest sacrifices when we have Albertans that are homeless, others that fear they soon will be, and even more facing the potential shut-off of electricity and heat in their homes. For the Premier, who enjoys being driven around by security and enjoys a six-figure salary, the horrible, cruel decisions from this government may simply be modest sacrifices, but for everyday Albertans it is much worse.

This Premier is out of touch. He has lost the trust of the people that put him in his office, and it's time for him to go. Albertans watching this, I want you to know that hope and help are on the way. We stand in this House every day ready to serve you and to make life more affordable for you and your family.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat has a statement to make.

Federal Liberal-NDP Agreement

Mrs. Frey: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Last night under the cover of darkness the Liberals and the NDP struck a shady backroom deal that will secure power for Justin Trudeau until 2025. The reaction from Canadians was swift: anger, frustration, betrayal. I share in those feelings, but unlike some, I am neither shocked nor surprised by this unholy left-wing alliance. The NDP, the same party as the members across the aisle, at this point only exist to serve the interests of Justin Trudeau. The party of Tommy Douglas and Jack Layton is long, long gone, and the NDP has sold out every value and principle it once had for a taste of power that Canadians did not bestow upon them.

Albertans know this all too well as the NDP members across the aisle have been good friends and allies with Justin Trudeau and have been doing his bidding for him at every single turn. They backed Trudeau's vetoes over the Energy East and Northern Gateway pipelines. They refused to back a motion saying Albertans, not Justin Trudeau, should decide who represents them in the Senate. Just last week they refused to support a common-sense motion telling Justin Trudeau to drop his pointless travel restrictions. On April 1 they will support yet another massive increase to Justin Trudeau's carbon tax, a policy that they support. Funny, given they claim to care about the rising energy costs.

Anyhow, for the rest of Canada, I'm going to tell them what they can expect from an NDP-Trudeau alliance. They will jack up your taxes every chance they get, they will continue to block pipelines and energy development even as the demand for responsible Alberta energy soars, and they will abandon support for our Armed Forces at a time when the world needs countries like Canada to stand up for freedom and democracy. That's just who they are.

But all is not lost. Conservative governments across Canada will continue to push back against Justin Trudeau's policies and the Jagmeet-Justin bromance. In 2019 Albertans fired the NDP in part for supporting Justin Trudeau's antienergy policies, and in 2023 I'm confident Albertans will do the same.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Aviation Industry

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The aviation industry has a long, rich history in Alberta. It employs thousands of Albertans and has contributed significantly to our province's GDP, economic growth, diversification, and connectivity to the world. The aviation industry in Alberta is both entrepreneurial and resilient, but we cannot hide the fact that it has been one of the hardest hit by the pandemic and the enduring and heavy hand of federal health-related restrictions. Major airlines laid off people across the country, and at one point almost all routes were suspended.

But, Mr. Speaker, the good news is that bad times will pass, and our aviation industry, along with our economy, is coming back stronger than ever. Just last week WestJet announced that Alberta will lead Canada's travel and tourism rebound as the airline restores its summer 2022 schedule to near prepandemic levels. WestJet is also investing in Alberta's connection to global and business economies with more nonstop routes to London, Heathrow, Gatwick, Rome, Paris, and Dublin.

Flair Airlines, headquartered right here in our capital, has also announced that they are confident in travel demand over the coming year and has announced significant growth in both routes and capacity. Lynx Air, whose headquarters are in Calgary, will take flight soon with a growing network, having added Victoria as its sixth destination, and a month ago Swoop, another Alberta-based airline, added five new routes to the U.S. from its operational base right here in Edmonton.

Mr. Speaker, I'm thrilled to see our aviation industry growing and our province rising as a hub for aviation, aerospace, and logistics and, at the same time, providing hope for a rejuvenated visitor economy. Now that the federal government, at the urging of this Assembly, is moving towards easing travel restrictions and with spring in the air, it's time for all Albertans, not just our snowbirds, and visitors from around the world to spread our wings and support an industry that is so vital to our bright and ambitious future.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Racism

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday was the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, a day to recognize and show solidarity with all peoples fighting against racism, and while we've arguably made real progress since it was first observed, in 1979, the hard truth is that racism remains. In recent years we've seen repeated attacks on Black Muslim women, the ongoing genocide of Indigenous women, attacks on mosques and synagogues, anti-Asian hate, and the return of overt White supremacy promoted in media, on social media, and, sadly, even by some in political power. Less than five years ago we saw Nazis march openly in Charlottesville. It was only last year that we saw their flag flown in Alberta, only last month on Parliament Hill.

Now more than ever we each have a duty to stand against these voices of hatred and their attempts to gain power and influence, but let's be clear, Mr. Speaker, that racism runs deeper than its most visible face. As recognized by members on both sides of this House, systemic racism is real. It has deep effects on the lives of racialized people. From our justice system to health care, education, economic opportunities, social supports, racialized Canadians face more barriers and have poorer outcomes not because of any moral failing, lack of personal effort, or failure of will but because of unchecked biases and discrimination baked into our systems and institutions that govern our lives.

That's why in their recommendations last year the Alberta Anti-Racism Advisory Council called on the government of Alberta to mandate the collection of race-based data in all departments and its use to identify existing gaps between racialized and nonracialized communities and to track progress to address it. Tomorrow I'll introduce a bill, the Anti-Racism Act, that would create a structure and process to do just that, a thoughtful path to empower all public bodies to take on that important and essential work, and it's my hope that on this crucial issue we will be able to come together on both sides of this House to make Alberta a leader in working to end all forms of racial discrimination.

Alberta Health Services

Mr. Guthrie: Mr. Speaker, prior to COVID many boasted about Canada having one of the greatest health care systems in the world, but when stress-tested, capacity declined and wait times increased. The system failed to adapt and meet expectations. Dedicated front-line staff did their utmost working in a stressful environment, dealing with countless managers and supervisors in a bureaucracy resistant to change.

Now, our government put forward a number of great initiatives in this budget: $2.2 billion to build health facilities, $100 million to expand hospital capacity and ICU beds, $64 million towards EMS, and $23 million to Alberta's 911 system, to name a few. But a problem remains. Canada ranks second as the priciest universal health care system in the world but among the bottom in performance. With Alberta being the most expensive in the country and considering the failures at AHS over the last two years, it is clear that higher levels of spending do not translate to better results.

Budget 2022 calls for the addition of 850 new full-time positions at AHS, but under the same ineffective management, is this money well spent? AHS staff dissatisfaction is another factor. Without meaningful interaction with the front line to create a positive work environment, fundamental change will be difficult.

Mr. Speaker, AHS is a bloated and underperforming entity that requires reform to ensure its future success. Professional consultation, restructuring management, and meaningful implementation of publicly funded, privately delivered services will help. One does not leave a struggling system to continue struggling. It's imperative that we have trust in our public institutions, trust in government, and trust in leadership to do the right thing. To satisfy trust and generate competence, change becomes necessity.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Education Concerns

Ms Hoffman: I knew it wouldn't be good, but I didn't know it would be this bad: those are words I hear often from Albertans when they talk about the current government. The UCP keeps making life more expensive and more difficult for everyday families. School fees are going up. Ride times are going up. We need replacement schools. We need new schools. And the UCP is failing.

Families living in Calgary choosing public or Catholic schools got only one each over the last three years. Public school families in Edmonton, Lethbridge, St. Albert, and most of the province, to be honest, were completely shut out of this year's budget. At a time when the government stumbled backwards into additional revenue because of a spike in the international price of oil, oil that belongs to each and every Albertan, families across Alberta are saying that you just can't trust the UCP to build public schools.

Then there's the curriculum. The UCP has trashed our international reputation through their desire to ram through their Dumpster fire of a curriculum. Teachers don't want it. Principals don't want it. Indigenous leaders don't want it. Parents don't want it. Academics don't want it. I asked the minister to name one – just one – employer who would stand with her publicly and say that her curriculum would set kids up for success in the world of work, and she couldn't do it, because her broken curriculum is rooted in a desire to amplify the voices of people like Chris Champion instead of helping kids be successful.

And teachers: this government is so focused on going after the very professionals entrusted to educate children. They went after their pensions. They fired them from the curriculum partnership. They fired the educational assistants who support disabled students, and then they cut the funding to the point where we have 1,000 fewer teachers in Alberta classrooms today than when the NDP was in government.

To all the voters thinking, "I knew it wouldn't be good, but I didn't know it would be this bad," it is this bad, and Alberta children deserve so much better. It's clear that you can't trust the UCP with public education. To the Premier: you keep saying that you have a mandate to do whatever you want with public education. Let's test that. Call the election, and let Albertans decide.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Budget 2022

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The government's focus on responsible fiscal management and relentless pursuit of economic growth have put the province on a more sustainable fiscal path. Budget 2022 moves Alberta forward by building health care capacity, getting more Albertans working, and sticking to the fiscal plan, resulting in a balanced budget for only the second time in more than a decade.

To expand system capacity, the budget will grow Alberta Health's total operating expenses budget by $600 million this year, and it will grow by a total of $1.8 billion by 2024-25 in order to scale up capacity. Budget 2022 ensures that Alberta remains one of the most affordable provinces in Canada to live and work. Alberta's lower cost of living combined with relatively high average earnings and the lowest overall taxes mean that Albertans keep more money in their pockets.

Budget 2022 provides funding for an energy rebate program, an increase of more than $700 million over the next three years to support teachers and to address cost pressures in transportation as well as growth in enrolment, $6.2 billion which supports Albertans by providing the education and training opportunities they need to prepare for the workforce, and $5.8 billion for postsecondary operations. Budget 2022 includes about $2.5 billion over three years in support of the child care agreement with the federal government. Alberta is moving forward to a prosperous financial future through a well-developed set of fiscal anchors to guide decision-making, bringing per capita spending in line with other provinces, keeping net debt to GDP low, and finding a path back to balance.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont has risen.

Member for Edmonton-South

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Member for Edmonton-South has a lot of explaining to do. In December the Alberta RCMP Cybercrime Investigative Team executed a search warrant on the member's home, and he's now under criminal investigation for, quote, unlawful access to private information related to the vaccination quota.

Mr. Speaker, this ongoing vax hack scandal does not look good for that member or the NDP. In the months leading up to the police raid, he was obsessed with the vaccination status of government MLAs. He was even obsessed with the timelines of MLA vaccinations, posting online about when the government MLAs got their shots and when they were eligible to receive them. We posted his history of harassing government MLAs over private information online, but there are still a lot of questions that are yet to be answered. How did he know any of this? Why was he so obsessed with private medical information of MLAs, and did he take it upon himself to find this information?

He certainly has the ability, Mr. Speaker. In fact, believe it or not, he brags about being, quote, an ethical hacker. Yes, you heard that right. The self-styled hacker is now under police investigation for – surprise, surprise – hacking. But the real question here is not for the Member for Edmonton-South, because he already confessed to Postmedia today. Therefore, the NDP leader, who may have been directly involved in this hacking scandal, has yet to come clean about what exactly she knew about the member's hacking when he was in her caucus. Did she benefit politically from any of his online activities? Would she have? Albertans need to know: is this the first time, or is this an isolated incident?

Mr. Speaker, we are just starting to scratch the surface of the NDP vaccination hacking scandal, but let me be clear. If the NDP leader, any of the MLAs, or her staff knew or benefited from this illegally obtained information, then the NDP leader must resign. The NDP leader has been very defensive about what she knew about this scandal, and hopefully soon we will find out why.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

Bullying and Racism

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to read part of a statement written to the RCMP by Thabo Ncube, a 14-year-old student who was wrongfully accused but who along with his family earnestly and patiently sought justice.

If ever I've learned anything, it is that you should not make bad decisions based on other bad decisions. There are always people who may not like you or who will try to get a rise out of you, and all that you can do at that moment is to keep your cool and not retaliate. In my situation I tried to protect myself, and it ended me in a bad place. For me, unfortunately, I had to make hard decisions and choices more frequently than other people who do not look like me. I face more; therefore, I have more decisions to make every day.

I'd gone back to school, and everyone thought I pulled a knife on that girl when I didn't. School is not the same anymore. It was tough losing friends during the time, but I had real friends who stuck by me the whole way. The culture of snitches getting stitches is very bad, and it is not okay to use that against someone who wants to stand up for the truth. People should not have to live with the fear of being punished for saying the truth. Everyone should be able to speak freely and proudly about what they think is right without negative consequences or fear of being shamed.

In life, before we go on to confront others, I think it is important to hear all sides of the story. When the school came to some decisions, I was confused about why nobody asked me about my side of the story, not even the police officer when he charged me. It was not right, and the kids and the adults would assume that I did pull a knife on someone without having both sides of the story. At that time I wasn't at school, the rumours were spreading, and more and more were made. People were saying I had killed someone, stabbed her and cut her. I knew better than to retaliate, so then again I kept my cool. Any reaction I make is almost always taken the wrong way. If I ever say something back, I know I will get the worst punishment because of the colour of my skin.

I hope I am the voice for many and that everything that I've been through was a lesson for me and can be used as a teaching for many.

Thank you to Thabo and Sinikiwe and the Ncube family for your courage; to Blake and Crystal and the Taylor family for standing by them; to the RCMP, who listened; and to the MLA for Highwood for being an advocate. All charges have been withdrawn.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has question 1.

Physician Recruitment and Retention

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, rural doctors continue to flee Alberta at alarming rates thanks to the UCP's mismanagement of our health care system. According to the College of Physicians & Surgeons of Alberta 140 doctors left our province in 2021, a trend that's, unfortunately, increasing because of the UCP. Communities in northern, southern, and in central Alberta have fewer doctors this year than last, families are left without a doctor, emergency rooms have to close, expectant mothers are left to drive hundreds of kilometres to cities to deliver their child, all because of the UCP's attacks on health. When will this government stop their attack on health care, acknowledge the damage they've done, and reverse this all?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, only the NDP would call a $2 billion increase in the baseline budget of health care an attack. Alberta spends more per capita than eight provinces on health care. We have more physicians working in the system, in fact, than ever before in our history, more nurses, and this government has announced major capital projects, including the largest ever hospital redevelopment program in the history of the province, the $1.8 billion Red Deer regional hospital, in addition to the completion of the Calgary cancer centre, the expansion of the Peter Lougheed surgical facility, the new La Crête medical centre, and so much more.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, new facilities need new doctors, and this UCP government has left the south zone with 41 fewer doctors this year than they had in 2019. The primary care network said in December that up to 43,000 residents in Lethbridge cannot access a family doctor. With these trends in the south of the province, I'm afraid that even more residents will soon be left without a doctor, unable to access care they need. The UCP says that they're addressing the problem, but the data says otherwise. The UCP balanced their no-help budget by cutting the care that Albertans are able to access. What does this Premier have to say to 43,000 people in Lethbridge who do not have a family doctor?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, the no-help budget: that includes $22 billion for health care; that includes a $600 million increase in the baseline for health care on top of last year's $900 million increase in the baseline budget for health care. In 2021 we saw a net gain of 33 physicians across the system in Alberta. In February 2019 we had 28,735 nurses, but in February of this year we had 30,517 RNs, more than ever in Alberta history.

Mr. Shepherd: And we have 43,000 Albertans in Lethbridge who have no doctor thanks to the devastating impacts of this government's attacks on doctors. Yet we see the UCP again using the same scare tactics against Albertans who've dedicated their careers to saving the lives of our families, friends, and neighbours. The UCP are trying to cut the wages of health care professionals, heroes of the pandemic, like respiratory therapists, who helped COVID-19 patients in the ICU breathe. Aren't doctors fleeing the province enough? Why is this government now trying to drive out all these other health care professionals, too?

Mr. Kenney: One of the reasons that Albertans don't buy the NDP medi-scare campaign is because it's so obviously false. They're claiming that we've cut the Health budget when we've increased it by $2 billion. They claim that doctors are leaving the province when the number of doctors is at a record high. They claim that we've laid off nurses when there are 1,800 more nurses working in our health system now than when the NDP was in office, Mr. Speaker. They claim that we're shutting hospitals when we're building new hospitals and investing in record and increasing health care capacity, increasing the number of ICU baseline beds by 50 above what the NDP had.

Personal Income Tax Deindexation

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Premier refused yet again to help families fighting record inflation. Instead, he doubled down on his bracket creep plan, taking more and more of Albertans' income, and when I asked what it would take for the Premier to stop taking from those with the lowest incomes, he mused about cutting taxes for the wealthy. Those earning seven figures will be the first to catch a break. How very on brand. Is the Premier really saying that he would rather cut taxes for the top earners instead of scrapping his billion-dollar income tax grab on families?

Mr. Kenney: You know what's on brand for the NDP, Mr. Speaker? It's their coalition with Justin Trudeau, a coalition that was just cemented today by their leader, Mr. Singh, in Ottawa, who has kept their ally Justin Trudeau in office for the next three years. Now, I know the NDP's favourite research technique is to hack into people's private information, so here's a research tip for them: they could hack into our public policy and see that we are giving Albertans $1.7 billion of consumer relief on the fuel tax and the electricity rebate.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's amusing hearing the Premier talk about a coalition when he may not even pass his own confidence motion inside his party.

Now, the Premier is taking a billion dollars from Alberta families on the back of inflation. Instead of fixing that issue, he wants to hand that billion dollars back to top earners: $700 million to the top 1 per cent alone. Why does a single mom earning $50,000 a year get $500 less while a CEO with a $2.7 million salary gets $100,000 more in his bank account?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, the NDP opposition hacked into Alberta's tax system when they came to office, and they drove revenues down. They drove jobs and investment out of the province. They raised income taxes by 50 per cent. And guess what? They got less revenue. They raised taxes on businesses by 50 per cent, and they got less revenue. This government is cutting taxes, and jobs are taking off. We're leading the country in growth, and we have a balanced budget.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, the government has a windfall. That's it.

Meanwhile they gave wealthy corporations a $4.7 billion handout with no jobs in return. He let big insurance companies hike premiums by 30 per cent, pocketing millions. He gave 40 per cent raises to government money managers while threatening the wages of respiratory therapists and social workers, all this while his tax on inflation takes more from the poorest Albertans. Why is the Premier robbing from the poor to give to the rich? When he watches Robin Hood, is the sheriff the good guy?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, the NDP leader is partly right, because Albertans are experiencing a windfall of economic growth and diversification. Last year was the best year ever for Alberta exports, the best year ever for Alberta manufacturing, the best year ever for high tech, the best year ever for venture capital, the best year ever for ag revenues, the best year ever for forestry. I want to give them a trigger warning. They won't like it, but last month was the best month on record for Alberta oil and gas. This economy is taking off. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The Leader of the Opposition for her second set of questions.

Ms Notley: And this Premier had absolutely nothing to do with it.

Provincial Fiscal Policies

Ms Notley: Now, I want to read part of a message that I received from an Albertan named Joelle Powell, and I quote: I want to be kind to others, to open my heart and my wallet, but today I have to borrow money for food and utilities, and I'm fearful of being destitute. End quote. Yesterday the Premier said that he won't stop his plan to keep more income tax because he's asked Albertans to make, quote, modest sacrifices. A simple question: is Joelle not being able to afford food his definition of a modest sacrifice?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I forgot to mention the windfall for film and television workers – we've seen a 10-fold increase in that industry as a result of our policies – and the forthcoming windfall for Alberta workers with the $18 billion of new investment in petrochemicals, the billions of dollars of new investment in hydrogen. Yes, Albertans are experiencing the strongest economic growth in the country, a windfall that is a result of this government's open-for-business, low-tax policies and Alberta's recovery plan, that's working to get our economy back on track.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, Calgary mother Tiffaney Hill works three jobs to make ends meet, and her son Riley suffers from extreme sensory sensitivity and an anxiety disorder. He's one of 10 children in his class with learning disabilities. Riley and every single one of those children has lost their educational assistant, lost support in the classroom to help them grow and learn, their entire lives forever altered by cuts to a single line item in this Premier's budget. To the Premier: is Riley's future a modest sacrifice?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, there have been no layoffs of educational assistants. What she's referring to is that in the first quarter of COVID, when the schools were closed – by the way, at the insistence of the NDP – there were some temporary furloughs for people who were not at work. But when it comes to educational assistants, this government, to defend Alberta's great tradition of school choice, has just provided additional funding to ensure equitable access for special-needs kids in our charter schools and, yes, those who benefit from home-schooling as well.

Ms Notley: The Premier's Education minister has cut teachers and PUF funding and EAs, and the Premier knows it, and he should be truthful about the facts in this office. Meanwhile Albertans have sacrificed their health after the Premier chased away their family doctor. They've sacrificed their dreams, no longer able to afford the postsecondary education they'd planned. They've sacrificed the family vehicle, unable to pay the spiralling insurance costs. I could go on and on. One thing I know is that none of those Albertans want to hear this Premier call their sacrifices modest. Why won't he stand and apologize for talking that way to Albertans?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, once again the divisive leader of the socialist party seeks to mislead Albertans. Last year the budget included an additional $40 million in support for special-needs kids. This year's budget includes a 1.7 per cent increase for K to 12 education, that represents $700 million over two years. But here's the thing. We're able to do that in the context of a balanced budget because, yes, we made some responsible spending choices. If the NDP was still in office, we would have a $6 billion structural deficit this year, and we would be mortgaging the future of those kids.

Coal Development Policies

Mr. Schmidt: Two years ago in May the UCP lifted the Lougheed coal policy after conversations with coal companies and their lobbyists to open up the eastern slopes to strip mining. This UCP decision was opposed loudly by Albertans across the province: farmers, ranchers, businesses, country music stars, Indigenous communities, and more. In response, this government implemented a ministerial order to reinstate the policy, an order that can be rescinded at any time for any reason. What assurances does the Premier have that this order won't be lifted? Is it something more concrete than asking us to trust him?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, we appreciate the good work of the advisory committee on coal. The recommendations have been adopted. That includes the policy in question. We have a long and proud tradition that goes back for 140 years of responsible mining across the province, including for coal – the NDP's historic roots were in the coal mine unions that operated off the eastern slopes – but we must do that in an environmentally responsible way. That's exactly the policy of this government, as clarified recently by the hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mr. Schmidt: Last year our leader introduced a bill that would ban coal mining in the eastern slopes of the Rocky Mountains, providing more protection than a ministerial order that can be lifted at the whim of the minister. UCP MLAs at the time agreed that this bill should be debated in the Chamber last year, but today they completely reversed their position and blocked the bill. Given that this bill would have restored trust in the government that lost it with their sneaky plan to blow up mountains for coal, can the Premier tell us when the minister plans on lifting the ministerial order since her party and government are so clearly opposed to protecting the eastern slopes?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the bill was just a bad case of political theatre. The government policy already establishes that protection with respect to sensitive ecosystems in the eastern slopes. But I think the real question for the NDP today is: why did the Leader of the Opposition engage in such a long campaign of personal vilification against myself and other members of this government that a member of her caucus felt he was justified by illegally tapping in to personal information? Why doesn't she take responsibility for that outrageous conduct by her caucus?

Mr. Schmidt: If the Premier wants to ask questions, he can call the election.

The shameful hypocrisy of the UCP voting to block debate on a bill that only months ago they agreed should be debated fuels distrust in this government. Trust in the UCP is already at an all-time low because his minister lifted the Lougheed coal policy with no consultation. Rather than debate real protections for the eastern slopes, the government is asking Albertans to just take them at their word, which actions have shown isn't likely. Will the Premier commit to not lifting this ministerial order unless a motion of the Legislature authorizing them to do so has been passed?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, our position is absolutely clear, that we are for responsible resource development, yes, including responsible coal mining, but we are going to protect sensitive ecosystems in the Rockies, as Alberta governments always have done.

Mr. Speaker, the real question here is: what did that member know about his colleague purposefully hacking into sensitive, private information? Who else's private information did they seek to access? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.
The Premier has the call.

Mr. Kenney: Who else's private information did the NDP seek to hack into, Mr. Speaker? And what did the leader of the NDP know about this outrageous NDP violation of privacy?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright.

Federal Liberal-NDP Agreement

Mr. Rowswell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last night the Liberals and the NDP made a shady backroom deal that will secure power for Justin Trudeau until 2025. This brought back terrible memories for Albertans who watched the opposition NDP leader form a similar alliance with Justin Trudeau, that still exists to this day. Alberta is finally back on track, but Albertans are rightfully worried about how this formal NDP-Trudeau alliance will affect our province and our economic recovery. To the Premier: how can we ensure Alberta remains strong and free in the face of this disastrous left-wing merger?

Mr. Kenney: I thank the member, Mr. Speaker, for the very important question about the formalization of the NDP-Liberal coalition. We always knew it, that the NDP here was in cahoots with Justin Trudeau to increase inflation and taxes, punish people for consuming energy, for heating their homes, and filling up their gas tanks. But now they've made it formal in a political marriage in Ottawa that will keep Trudeau's anti-Alberta policies in place for the next three years. I put them on notice. This government will fight to defend our economy against the Liberal-NDP coalition every day. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.
The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright.

Mr. Rowswell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the Premier for that answer. Given that both the NDP and Justin Trudeau have a long record of opposing and actively blocking pipelines in Canada, from the Northern Gateway to Energy East to Keystone XL, and given that Alberta's oil and gas sector is a critical component of our province's economic recovery and stability on world markets, to the Premier: what can Alberta do to safeguard our critical oil and gas sector from this radical antipipeline, anti-Alberta alliance?

Mr. Kenney: The member is absolutely correct, Mr. Speaker. This is a coalition of parties that are clearly opposed to the vital economic interest of Alberta and to the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who work in this country's largest industry. After Putin's invasion of Ukraine the world knows now more than ever that we need to increase and produce more Alberta energy to displace dictator oil, and that is why we will use every tool that we can to fight the Trudeau-Singh alliance and their effort to kill pipelines and damage Canada's largest job-creating industry.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Rowswell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the Premier for that answer. Given that the NDP support Justin Trudeau's carbon tax, which is set to increase by another eye-popping 33 per cent on April 1, and given that energy prices are already too high due to short-sighted NDP policies, the Justin Trudeau carbon tax, and other global factors, to the Premier: what is our government doing to lower the cost of energy for Albertans now that we're all facing an NDP-Trudeau alliance intent on making them go even higher?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Canadians are struggling to cope with 30-year high inflation, inflation that, according to the Bank of Canada, will go even higher with the Liberal-NDP hike of the carbon tax on April 1. But if you think that's bad, the Liberal-NDP coalition intends to more than quadruple the carbon tax, making groceries, home heating, and fuel for your car unaffordable. The Liberal-NDP coalition wants to drive Canadian families into energy poverty. We will fight them every step of the way.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Government Policies and Youth

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Despite the picture that this Premier is trying to paint, the truth is far less bright. Last year there were 9 per cent fewer 25- to 29-year-olds in Alberta than there were five years ago according to a report from the Canada West Foundation. Young people, especially young Calgarians, are interested in leaving Alberta, the report said. The government's policy of deep cuts to postsecondary, killing interest rates will only make matters worse. This puts Alberta at risk of loss of talent, skills, and brain power like we've never seen before. Is this UCP government really willing to risk a total brain drain of Alberta's youth?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, he's right. Since 2017 – since 2017 – since the NDP's disastrous economic policies that drove tens of billions of dollars of investment out of this province and created a jobs crisis, felt particularly by young people. But here's the good news. With this government's recovery plan and our pro-growth policies, Alberta is once again leading the country in population growth and in the last quarter of 2021 experienced the first significant net interprovincial migration that we've seen in years and years.

Mr. Eggen: Well, given that Alberta's youth are looking for opportunities that this UCP government is making harder and harder to come by, they're leaving the province as a result. Given as a result as well that they are making postsecondary more unaffordable for those who want to access our institutions, hiking property taxes, utility rates, even making it more expensive to access our parks and natural areas, because of this UCP government young Albertans are less able to see opportunities here in this awesome province. Does the UCP really not see the problem that they are creating?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, it's clear that this government inherited the economic devastation of the NDP's policies, the record unemployment that they left us with. It's also true that we went through two tough years of COVID. It's also true that we are leading Canada in economic growth and in job growth with dynamic diversification across every sector and region, and we're bringing the Alberta advantage back in a big way with the lowest cost of living of any major province, the lowest taxes, the highest economy, and the highest incomes in the . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that the Canada West report also highlights how investment in safe public transit is one strategy to attract people to Alberta's communities, one thing that all Albertans have seen loudly and clearly is that there's no worse friend to public transit than this UCP government, who stalled, delayed, even threatened the existence of the Calgary green line from the day that they took office. Even now we hear from Calgarians worried that the UCP will stop this critical project. Will the UCP take this recommendation and their fights about public transit and show young Calgarians looking at moving here that they're willing to learn from their past . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, first of all, this government just invested an additional $80 million into mass transit. We are making multibillion-dollar investments into LRT systems in Edmonton and Calgary. Maybe young New Democrats would rather move to Toronto to pay three times the housing prices, pay higher taxes in a weaker economy in order to ride the subway, but the young Albertans I know want to work hard in the home of free enterprise: Alberta, Canada.

Physician Recruitment and Retention in Lethbridge

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, we learned today that over the last two years Lethbridge and surrounding areas have lost 41 doctors, more than doubling the number of folks without a family doctor to 46,000. In the fall it was 24 that we had lost; now it is 41. While my constituents are looking for doctors, we heard the Premier just now say that there is no problem with doctors. But the fact is, the reality is that half of folks in Lethbridge don't have a family doctor. To this Premier: where are the doctors? What is he going to do about it?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the hon. member for the question. I'd like to point out, first of all, that the members opposite only provide half the story. They talk about 140 doctors leaving last year. Yes, that's true, but they don't talk about the doctors coming in. There was a net increase of doctors in this province, so if they're going to share facts, then share the whole story. We commented in this House – actually, when we talked about supplemental estimates right here in this Chamber last night, we talked about there being challenges in having doctors at the right places to be able to serve Albertans. Our government is focused on that. We focused on it last year in terms of supplemental estimates, and we're focusing on it this year in budget . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, given that it is a fact that 41 doctors have left the south zone, Minister, and given that the UCP continues to break trust with the people of Lethbridge by driving doctors out of the city, doing nothing about it, and then trying to turn around and tell us that, wait, there is actually no problem here, will the minister report to this House and the people of Lethbridge just what he is doing to fill the gap of family physicians and why he keeps trying to tell us that there's no problem? We all know there is a problem. Half of us don't have a doctor.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member knows, because we talked about it in this House, about the plans that AHS is doing to be able to provide doctors in Lethbridge. We know that there is an issue in Lethbridge and rural Alberta. We know that this issue is not unique to Alberta. In fact, it's across the entire country, and Alberta has more docs per capita overall than the national average, but we are working extremely hard. We invested $90 million to be able to deal with the issue in rural Alberta last year. That's $90 million again this year in this budget. We are hiring doctors in Lethbridge as we speak.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, given that we've been having this conversation for over a year and given that the problem is only getting worse and given that none of these so-called spin answers or plans or meetings or whatever the minister is doing are working at all, will the minister level with the people of Lethbridge and tell them how many doctors we are getting, when they are arriving, and when they can start serving the people of Lethbridge so that we can get on with this just grotesque mismanagement of the primary health care system in Lethbridge?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I indicated to the hon. member before, AHS is active in seeking new doctors, family physicians. They're sponsoring a number of physicians, nearly 20. Offers have been made, and we expect doctors to start working there over the coming weeks. In addition, at AHS we are funding a nurse practitioner to be able to assist. I have been to Lethbridge numerous times, met with the local docs there, met with AHS. You know, this problem wasn't created in a day, and it won't be solved in a day, but we are dedicated to solving it. We will solve it. If the hon. member would like to talk more details as opposed to 45-second sound bites, I'd be pleased to have that conversation.

Agriculture in Southern Alberta

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, agriculture is a pillar of our provincial economy. In southern Alberta we are blessed with amazing conditions that allow us to grow many high-yield, high-margin specialty crops. We have 70 per cent of Canada's irrigation system right in southern Alberta. Our government recognizes the importance of southern Alberta agriculture to our overall economy and has been working to develop Canada's agrifood corridor between Lethbridge and Medicine Hat. Can the minister of agriculture please update this House on the work being done to develop Canada's agrifood corridor?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud to share that over the past two years Alberta has attracted about 105 projects, resulting in $886 million in agrifood-sector investments. Fourteen of these investments were within Canada's Premier Food Corridor and account for more than $368 million in investment. This comes in addition to the $27.8 million investment we're making in the agrifood hub in Lethbridge and the great work my colleague the Minister of Transportation is doing in twinning highway 3 from Taber to Burdett. Currently we're also facilitating 15 additional investment projects within the corridor valued at over $450 million.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for the response. Given that only 5 per cent of Alberta's farmland is irrigated, yet our irrigators produce more than 20 per cent of the crops, and given that these crops are high-yield, high-margin specialty crops and given that much of our irrigation was due to the forward-thinking farmers of years past, to the minister of agriculture: what are we doing to ensure our irrigation is up to standard so that we can continue producing high-quality crops in southern Alberta?

Mr. Horner: It's a great question, and the answer is the biggest investment in irrigation in the history of the province: in partnership with the Canada Infrastructure Bank and 10 irrigation districts, a $933 million investment to modernize our irrigation infrastructure and increase water storage in southern Alberta. This is going to create 7,300 direct and indirect permanent jobs and 1,400 construction jobs. We're going to increase the irrigated acres by 230,000, a 15 per cent increase across all affected IDs. Every year these projects will contribute $477 million to the GDP.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again to the minister for his reply. Given that agriculture is the backbone of Alberta's economy and given that farmers commit their entire lives in often uncertain conditions to produce high-quality food to feed the world and given that many consumers are unsure of where their food comes from, to the minister of agriculture and forestry: what are you doing to recognize farmers' hard work and to ensure that consumers continue to know where their food comes from?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm sure everyone in this House, even the hecklers and hackers, are proud of our producers and processors and manufacturers. They're all top-notch, and we're proud of the products made in this province. One example is that my department is supporting local businesses and products with a new made-in-Alberta-by-Albertans label that processors and manufacturers alike can use. We've met with the local food producers to talk about changes to improve farmers' markets. We're very excited about this proposal. Hope to have news soon.

2:20 Government Data Security

Mr. Dang: The personal data of Albertans is being digitized at an ever-increasing speed. The government regularly stores and transmits highly sensitive personal information of Albertans and is increasingly relying on the Internet for everything from transmitting health care data to the administration of justice at a time of unprecedented cybertech from both domestic and foreign actors. Since the government of Alberta published a website that left the personal and private information of Albertans vulnerable to a malicious attack, will the Minister of Health tell this House whether anyone was held accountable for failing to enact even the most basic security measures that would have protected Albertans' information?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's great to see the NDP chief hacker up in the Chamber today. The first thing I would suggest to the Minister of Health is: do everything they can to protect Alberta's computer systems from that member, who today admitted that he broke the law and tried to hack into private information of a member of this Chamber.

Mr. Dang: Point of order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: It's shameful. He should apologize for that. Further to that, today he admitted that the NDP knew about this months before they made it public. It's time for that member to stand up and say what the Leader of the Official Opposition knew and when she knew it. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. A point of order is noted at 2:22.

Mr. Dang: To the same minister. Last year I discovered and reported a vulnerability in the government's initial release of their COVID-19 vaccine passport website. Given that a vulnerability that exposed Albertans' personal health information existed on one of the most accessed government portals at the time and given that no process exists for vulnerability disclosure, will the minister admit that the government's current measures to protect Albertans' data are insufficient and that the information I provided aided in fixing the vulnerability before malicious actors exposed the data of potentially millions of Albertans?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, for that member to even ask a question in this place without first apologizing is appalling, let alone about hacking. He had a full press conference today, almost an hour long, where he brags about trying to hack using the personal information of the Premier of Alberta. Through you, shame on him. Further to that, we have an e-mail, which has been released to the press, that shows that the NDP knew about this hacking months in advance of talking, but they then sent an e-mail to the then Minister of Health and claimed it was an anonymous person. Again, what did the Leader of the Official Opposition know?

Mr. Dang: To the Minister of Service Alberta. Given that the government's 2016 five-year IT modernization plan now appears to be a six-year plan and counting and given that the government's digital innovation office does not have cybersecurity in its mandate and given that the government does not appear to provide any transparency for Albertans on our cybersecurity readiness and given that security through obscurity actually makes us more vulnerable to these types of attacks, will you commit to providing an annual state of the IT infrastructure report to provide accountability to Albertans on the state of Alberta's cyber readiness?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, that hon. member published a document today titled How I Did It, describing illegal hacking actions trying to get the private information of members of this place. Further to that, he has admitted he ended up getting a private citizen of Alberta's information. Through you to him, he has no right to even ask a question in this place until he stands up and apologizes and explains what has taken place here and makes clear what the Leader of the Official Opposition knew. If she knew about this and covered this up for six months, it's time for her to resign.

Traffic Ticket Administration

Mr. Sabir: In January the UCP announced their plan to strip Alberta drivers of their right to dispute a traffic ticket without paying a nonrefundable $150 fee within a week of getting the ticket. It is simply disgusting that the UCP believes that only the people who have plenty of cash laying around on a week's notice should have access to justice. Now a report in the media surfaced that the UCP is going to scrap this horrible idea. My question is: can the current Attorney General confirm that he's indeed scrapping this horrible policy put forward by his predecessor?

Mr. Shandro: I can confirm, Mr. Speaker, that it is being scrapped. We have announced that it is being scrapped. Thank you. The JTI initiative is being scrapped and will not be proceeding any further.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Minister, for that answer. Given that the minister who represented the scheme was found to have called the Edmonton police chief and attempted to interfere in the administration of justice and given that despite this egregious abuse of his office that minister faced no consequences and remains in the UCP cabinet, does the current Attorney General believe that every Albertan should be able to call their local police chief to dispute their ticket, or is that a privilege only afforded to the UCP ministers?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, in an independent review the judge was absolutely clear that the former Minister of Justice, now the minister of labour, did not interfere with justice. That is a fact.

But that member is part of a caucus that we now know has covered up hacking of private medical information of members of this place. Through you to him, when did he know that his colleague was hacking members of this place's health information? Did he help cover it up? Again, Mr. Speaker, what did the Leader of the Opposition know and when? If she helped cover this up for months, she should resign immediately.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this minister has also made changes to victim of crime . . . [interjections] Shut up.

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. Member for Highwood.

Emergency Medical Services

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta EMS Provincial Advisory Committee, known as AEPAC, brings together Indigenous, AHS, municipal, and rural leaders to discuss issues and bring forward solutions to the EMS delivery model in Alberta. As the co-chair of this committee I have heard Albertans' concerns on all aspects, including air ambulance, front-line support, and dispatch processes, just to name a few. But many Albertans are worried about the approach to deal with the current situation. To the Minister of Health: can you explain how the Alberta government will implement the work done by this committee?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to, first, start off by thanking the Member for Highwood and the Member for Grande Prairie for their work in co-chairing the EMS Provincial Advisory Committee, to which the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo is also contributing. As the member knows, we created the advisory committee because we wanted thoughtful engagement with stakeholders from across the EMS sector to deliver working solutions to the rising demand for EMS services. My office will continue to work closely with this committee to review any recommendations that come forward. Where it makes sense to implement them, we will do so immediately.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for that answer. Given that rural communities are long distances from hospitals, which creates a unique logistical challenge, and given that rural ambulances have regularly been pulled into larger centres to provide support and given that during the time rural communities can be sitting without ambulances, which is an obvious concern for rural Albertans, to the Minister of Health: can you update the House on the results from recent changes made to assist rural communities?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member knows and the House knows, we're spending an additional $64 million this year to address EMS pressures across Alberta. That's part of Budget 2022. AHS is also in the process of implementing the majority of their 10-point action plan to boost EMS capacity, and quite frankly we're already seeing results. As part of the metro response plan, nine communities have seen a drop in ambulances being called into neighbouring urban centres, meaning they can respond to calls closer to home. For example, trips from Beaumont to Edmonton dropped by almost 50 per cent. Trips from Airdrie to Calgary are down by 43 per cent. Response to high-priority events has improved, and nearly 70 more staff have been hired.

The Speaker: The Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again to the minister. Given that AEPAC was implemented to help identify and establish solutions to deal with serious matters such as paramedic mental health issues and given that it is critical for us to provide immediate health and wellness supports to our EMS workers, who work tirelessly to protect our communities, to the Minister of Health: can you provide details on how the budget will improve wellness support for our front-line EMS providers?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Being a paramedic is an incredibly stressful job, and the pandemic, quite frankly, hasn't helped. Preventing burnout and improving wellness for Alberta's paramedics has never been more important. As part of the 10-point plan and as part of our Budget 2022 we announced $14 million to support AHS's hours of work project. That project will help address crew fatigue by adjusting working hours, shifts, and scheduling among paramedics in 14 rural communities. We're also excited to see the recommendation coming from AEPAC on additional ways we can support the mental health of our emergency responders. Once again I want to thank the committee for their tremendous work.

2:30 Family Support for Children with Disabilities

Ms Renaud: Family supports for children with disabilities can improve the quality of children's home lives, family relationships, and increase educational inclusion while supporting mental health. Last year there were more than 3,400 families and children on a wait-list. The UCP calls that: in planning. Imagine my surprise during budget estimates this year when I asked the minister how many families and children were on the FSCD wait-list, and the minister said that for FSCD there is no waiting list. Poof, gone. To the minister: how many families and children have met eligibility for service and have not yet received service?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for that question. We recognize how vulnerable Albertans who have children with disabilities – it's very important to receive the support from this government. With Budget 2022 we protected the funding for children with disabilities. We actually increased $61 million there. The way this was inherited from the previous government: we're taking every way possible to address that. This increased budget is a way to respond to that.

Ms Renaud: Given that I and very likely many of us receive alarming and heartbreaking e-mails and messages about the dangers and hardships families experience when there's a significant delay in starting or renewing services and given that delays to early intervention such as speech and language therapy, occupational and physical therapy harm children and families in ways that can cause lasting damage to family wellness and resilience, not to mention the well-being of the child, can the minister assure this House that all 3,400 families and children that were published in the open-data FSCD wait-list last year have signed agreements in place and are getting supports?

Mr. Luan: Mr. Speaker, our government is proud that we're working diligently on this. We're providing transparent services. We also committed to release the public data on a quarterly basis. With Budget 2022 we increased funding for FSCD with $61 million. Day in, day out this government works with families who have children with disabilities, making life better for them. We're taking concrete actions.

Ms Renaud: Given that it's clear this UCP government is the most secretive in Canada and that it's obvious that the UCP budget is best described as a shell game with underestimated costs and misleading jargon and given that we know that the 2022 budget for family supports for children with disabilities is not sufficient to meet cost pressures, population growth, and inflation, will the minister please commit here today to resume publishing data on the status of supports of all Alberta families and children who are eligible for FSCD and not actively receiving supports? We're asking for a number. Where did they go?

Mr. Luan: Mr. Speaker, while this government is busy day in, day out working with families and communities to improve the lives of vulnerable Albertans, that hon. member there keeps making empty promises, doing nothing to help those communities. We committed $61 million for Budget 2022 to continue to help families with children with disabilities.

Personal Income Tax and Benefit Deindexation

Ms Phillips: Well, Mr. Speaker, yesterday I brought forward a motion to protect Albertans from inflation and stop the Premier's income tax grab that's taking a billion dollars out of Albertans' pockets through inflation eating away at our income. But lo and behold, the Premier's closest friends jumped at the opportunity to defend jacking up our income tax by thousands a year through so-called bracket creep. Will the Minister of Finance explain to Albertans who can't make ends meet, who could really use all of that money why neither he nor a single MLA voted yesterday to give Albertans back the billions of dollars they've crept from them?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Because we've not raised taxes, contrary to the wrongful assertion of the members opposite. Our revenues are going up, but we took a different approach than the members opposite. The members opposite raised taxes, increased regulatory burden . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: The hon. minister shouldn't have to yell at the Speaker for him to be able to hear.
The minister.

Mr. Toews: The members opposite raised taxes, increased regulatory burden, sent billions of dollars of investment out of the province, Mr. Speaker. Wages went down, Albertans lost their jobs, and income tax revenues declined.

Ms Phillips: Well, given, Mr. Speaker, that that wasn't the question at all and given that we are talking here about bracket creep and deindexing the tax system and given that the minister has not provided this House a rationale as to why he can justify taking a billion dollars out of Albertans' pockets in personal income tax, why didn't the Finance minister at least tell Albertans he cares about the rising cost of living by getting the UCP's bracket creeping hands out of Albertans' pockets?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, this government took a different approach than the members opposite. We did not raise taxes, but we actually dropped taxes. We dropped corporate taxes. As a result of that, tens of billions of dollars of investment is pouring into this province. There are additional job opportunities for small businesses and for Albertans looking for a job. Wages are going up. That's why our fiscal house in this province is improving.

Ms Phillips: Well, given that it wasn't just the Finance minister yesterday, Mr. Speaker – it was also the Minister of Community and Social Services – who couldn't resist the opportunity to justify letting inflation creep up for Albertans living with disabilities, claiming that AISH recipients should be lucky to receive 1,600 bucks a month, and given that he's taking $3,000 a year from every single Albertan on disability supports because he's letting inflation take away those folks' benefits, will the minister of social services stand in the House, look into that camera right there, and explain to Albertans living on AISH why yesterday he voted to take $3,000 a year from people on AISH and why he's so smug and self-satisfied about it?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, that's ridiculous. We have maintained AISH payments. We continue to be, by far and away, the province that supports our disabled in the most significant way. We're over $400 higher per month than the next nearest province, and that's why we know Albertans care for the vulnerable. This government believes in supporting the vulnerable.

Mental Health Services

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, in a time when people should come together as one, the complexities of COVID-19 have kept us apart. As one consequence, current research indicates that there has been an increased need for mental health supports during the pandemic. This includes mental health supports that ensure that everyone has access to the resources they need when and where they need them. My question for this government is: what have you done during the COVID-19 pandemic to support people in Fort McMurray and other communities across the province, to support their mental health?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. You know, the COVID-19 pandemic public health restrictions, quite frankly, over the past two years have had a real impact on mental wellness. That's why early on we committed $53 million, more than any other province, to help make sure people have access to addiction and mental health supports that they need during this pandemic. As part of the COVID-19 plan our government has provided grants in the Fort McMurray area to Fort McMurray's Legacy Counselling Centre, the Fort McKay Métis community association, Wood Buffalo's integrated youth support network, and many other organizations in that jurisdiction.

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, it is a given that the pandemic restrictions had disproportionate impacts on people between the ages of 16 and 24. This resulted in stunting their emotional growth, increased psychological distress, and other mental health concerns. These young people are the future, and we should be doing everything we can to support them because they are still growing in maturity and they're still developing the character to cope with such distress. To the same minister: can you identify the actions being taken to increase access to supports that help the youth improve their mental health and wellness?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much again, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. The new youth suicide prevention grant program has partnered with local youth-focused organizations who know their communities well. Of course, they do important work to support mental health and for Alberta's youth. These grants are going to be built upon and are already doing the support for the youth in mental health. I was proud to announce even last year in the Fort McMurray area the 10 other communities across Alberta that are implementing the youth mental health hubs. These mental health hubs are supporting children between the ages of 11 and 24. We're very proud of the work they're doing.

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, it is a given that this minister worked tirelessly to get more than $1 billion allocated annually towards addiction and mental health services through strengthening and building capacity for our recovery-oriented systems of care. Currently, though, mental health service providers in Fort McMurray are dependent on seeking out funding from organizations like the Red Cross, United Way, even organizations like Suncor for annual support. Is there a thought that this minister could provide consistent funding for mental health agencies in Fort McMurray and across Alberta so they don't have to apply year after year?

The Speaker: The associate minister.

Mr. Ellis: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. Budget 2022 continues our commitment to invest $140 million over four years to enhance the recovery-oriented addiction and mental health system of care, with $50 million allocated for '22 and '23. This budget also commits an additional $60 million over three years to improve access to mental health and addiction services in Alberta. We're focused on providing consistent funding to nonprofits across Alberta so that they can provide services in their communities. Communities are an integral part of the recovery-oriented system of care that we're building, and we're proud of the work that they do.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will continue with the remainder of the daily Routine.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont has a report to present.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills I'm pleased to present the committee's final report on Bill 202, Public Health (Transparency and Accountability) Amendment Act, 2022, sponsored by the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley. This bill was referred to the committee on March 8, 2022. The report recommends that Bill 202 proceed. I request concurrence of the Assembly in the final report on Bill 202.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the Member for Leduc-Beaumont has requested concurrence in the report on Bill 202, Public Health (Transparency and Accountability) Amendment Act, 2022. It is debatable pursuant to Standing Order 18(1)(b). Are there any members who wish to debate concurrence? Hon. members, a member has noted that they would like to debate concurrence. That debate will take place next Monday under the item of business Motions for Concurrence in Committee Reports on Public Bills Other than Government Bills.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Bill 9 Public's Right to Know Act

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce a bill being Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act.
Thank you.

The Speaker: I'd like to point out the first reading speech just given by the hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General as a perfect example of the introduction of bills.

[Motion carried; Bill 9 read a first time]

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Calgary-South East.

Bill Pr. 1 Calgary Young Men's Christian Association Amendment Act, 2022

Mr. Jones: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to request leave to introduce Bill Pr. 1, Calgary Young Men's Christian Association Amendment Act, 2022.

This bill modernizes the objects and powers of the YMCA Calgary and gives the YMCA Calgary the rights, powers, and privileges of a natural person in a manner consistent with other modern incorporating statutes. Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill Pr. 1 read a first time]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Bill Pr. 2 Calgary Heritage Authority Amendment Act, 2022

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to request leave to introduce Bill Pr. 2, Calgary Heritage Authority Amendment Act, 2022.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill Pr. 2 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont, I understand, has a number of tablings.

Mr. Rutherford: I do, Mr. Speaker. In accordance with section 20(1) of the Auditor General Act it is my pleasure as chair of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices to table the following reports from the office of the Auditor General: (1) the Alberta Energy site rehabilitation program; (2) the Alberta Labour and Immigration delivery of COVID-19 emergency isolation support program; (3) Alberta Health grant management processes; (4) Alberta Environment and Parks pesticide management; (5) assessment of implementation reports Alberta Energy Regulator, Alberta Health and Alberta Health Services, Alberta Justice and Solicitor General, and Alberta Labour and Immigration.

The Speaker: I saw the Minister of Energy. Were you rising for a tabling?

Mrs. Savage: Yes. I rise to table the requisite number of copies of written questions from the Committee of Supply main estimates on March 16, 2022, for the Ministry of Energy.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. At 2:22 the hon. Member for Edmonton-South rose on a point of order.

Point of Order Accepting a Member's Word

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At approximately 2:22 the Government House Leader stated: he admitted he broke the law. I rise under 23(h), (i), and (j). I believe the Government House Leader is making allegations against another member, imputing false or unavowed motives to another member, and also using abusive and insulting language that did create disorder in this place. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader to rise.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. A matter of debate, certainly. If the hon. member has concerns about communications inside this Assembly about what is taking place with the criminal investigation into the hon. member, I would suggest that he doesn't hold one-hour-long press conferences, have long newspaper columns in which he outlines his criminal activities. That said, I think he's referring to – actually, I'm not sure what he's referring to, so I'm going to stick with that. It sounds like it's a matter of debate.

The Speaker: Well, I do have the benefit of the Blues, and the hon. the Government House Leader said the following: "Do everything they can to protect Albertans' computer system from that member, who today admitted that he broke the law and he tried to hack into private information."

Hon. members, I'm sure that all members are familiar with both House of Commons Procedure and Practice as well as Beauchesne's paragraph 494, that statements by members respecting themselves must be accepted. House of Commons Procedure and Practice, page 619: "Remarks which question a Member's integrity, honesty or character are not in order."

The hon. member to this point has said that he didn't break the law. We have to take his statement as fact until it is proven otherwise, should it be so. While I appreciate that this could be considered a matter of debate, I won't find a point of order at this point in time, but I will ask that the Government House Leader governs himself accordingly in the future with respect to these remarks.

Hon. members, I consider this matter dealt with and concluded. We are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day Government Bills and Orders Second Reading Bill 7 Appropriation Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to move second reading of Bill 7, the Appropriation Act, 2022.

This act will provide funding authority to the offices of the Legislative Assembly and the government of Alberta for the '22-23 fiscal year. This includes the following amounts from the general revenue fund: $173 million for the Legislative Assembly; $45 billion for the public service, including the government's various ministries and departments; $3.7 billion for capital investments; $1.4 billion for financial transactions; and $1.75 billion in contingency funding, which will ensure the government is well equipped to respond to disasters and emergencies as well as any future pandemic-related cost pressures. This funding will ensure the government has the resources it needs to continue providing the programs and services Albertans will rely on over the coming fiscal year.

I would also like to note that within these amounts the government is living within its means. We've reined in the government spending, and this has allowed us to present only the second balanced budget in more than a decade. Budget 2022 is moving Alberta forward by strengthening our health care system, getting more Albertans working, and bringing our finances back into the black.

The pandemic has brought with it significant challenges for all Albertans, and nowhere has this been more evident than in health care. The past two years have revealed a lack of health care capacity, specifically ICU, surgical, and critical care. Budget 2022 will prioritize strengthening our health care system by investing $600 million per year to Health's budget to provide additional capacity on a permanent basis, including adding new ICU beds. This will improve health outcomes for Albertans and ensure the province is more prepared for future pandemics or other system-wide health challenges. The budget includes a $750 million contingency fund specifically to fight the pandemic, address the surgical backlog, and ensure the province can cover other pandemic-related costs that are evolving or remain uncertain.

Budget 2022 will help more Albertans improve their mental health, with an additional $20 million per year on top of the $140 million that was committed over four years for mental health and addiction supports. Helping Albertans improve their mental health is a top priority for the government, and this additional funding will support the continued building of a comprehensive recovery-oriented system of care. We will partner with local nonprofit organizations in every corner of the province to bring better mental health services to every Albertan. As we move forward beyond this pandemic, keeping Albertans healthy will be instrumental in our overall economic recovery.

Budget 2022 reflects our government's continued focus on investment attraction, economic growth, and diversification as we move forward to a time where all Albertans will have opportunities to build their skills, pursue their passions, and support themselves and their families. Alberta has gained back all of the jobs and more lost during the pandemic, but, Mr. Speaker, some people are still struggling to find good jobs, and employers are dealing with labour shortages because they can't find workers with the skills they need.

That’s why Budget 2022 includes more than $600 million in new strategic investments for Alberta at work. This important initiative will help Albertans, no matter where they are in their career path, to participate in the local labour market with jobs that support their aspirations and improve their lives.

Over the course of the fiscal plan the government will expand the collegiate learning model, assisting high school students on their path to postsecondary education, trade designations, and in-demand jobs. We will add 7,000 additional postsecondary seats in high-demand areas such as computer and data science, information systems technology, finance, agriculture sciences, health, and aviation. New capital investments will also help address critical labour shortages; for example, the expansion of the veterinary school at the University of Calgary will result in more veterinarians for rural Alberta.

To help Albertans develop new skills in a practical and hands-on environment, the government will create additional job placement and integrated learning opportunities, and to increase accessibility and ensure more Albertans can participate, low-income students will benefit from a new nonrepayable support when enrolled in high-demand programs.

Mr. Speaker, the government is aiming to roll out these new learning and work programs and achieve our health care goals while also balancing the budget. Again, I’m pleased to say that Budget 2022 is only the second balanced budget in more than a decade.

We committed to carefully and thoughtfully bringing down the per capita cost of programs and services so that Alberta is no longer an expensive outlier in Canada. With this budget we expect to achieve our goal of bringing our spending in line with other comparable provinces. This means that the government is operating efficiently and that Albertans are getting more value for their tax dollars. I’m also pleased to say that over the last three years the government’s operational spending has remained largely flat, since 2019. Prior to 2019 it was increasing by 4 per cent per year despite the fact that Alberta was already spending much more than other provinces and debt was rapidly growing. Without the flattening of operating expenses, we would not be presenting a balanced budget. In fact, we would be presenting a budget with a $6 billion deficit had we continued on the 4 per cent increase spending trajectory that we inherited from our predecessors.

The government also committed to keeping Alberta’s net debt below 30 per cent of its gross domestic product, or GDP. Alberta has one of the lowest net debt to GDP ratios in the nation, and the government’s responsible fiscal management will ensure the province keeps its position as a leader in Canada. Alberta’s projections for the net debt to GDP ratio have continually improved over the course of the current fiscal year, and it is expected to fall to 18.3 per cent by March 31.

Budget 2022 puts Alberta on the path for a stronger and more diversified economy, a path towards a labour force with the skills and experience required for growth in new and emerging sectors and to a future where the burden of debt is not the legacy left to the next generation.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Budget 2022 is a blueprint for the bright, thriving, and prosperous future that Albertans deserve. I urge all of my fellow members in this House to support this bill today and help us deliver on Albertans’ priorities.

Madam Speaker, I now move to adjourn. Thank you.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion to adjourn debate carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 2:57 p.m.]

Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I move second reading of Bill 8, the Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022.

The funding in Bill 8 will ensure that the government can cover the health care costs of the pandemic while also sending aid and equipment to Ukraine and provide electricity rebates to Albertans struggling with rising costs. It will support child care workers and parents of young children, and it will build municipal infrastructure.

This funding will go to the following office and five government departments: the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner, Children’s Services, Culture and Status of Women, Energy, Health, and Municipal Affairs. If passed, these estimates will authorize an approximate increase of $1.2 billion in voted expense funding and $1 million in voted capital investment.

The largest amount in this bill is for the Department of Health. An additional $726 million will help cover the health care costs of the pandemic. This funding will go towards lab testing, contact tracing, rapid test kits, continuing care, acute care, vaccine deployment, and personal protective equipment. The costs of the pandemic have been large, but we’ve continued to provide the necessary resources to keep Albertans safe.

I’d like to note that Budget 2022 will provide further funding, above and beyond what’s in this bill, to build the health care system Albertans need by expanding capacity, adding ICU beds, and addressing surgical backlogs. These are important steps to improve Albertans’ health outcomes and make our province and economy more resilient to system-wide challenges.

The next-largest expense in the estimates comes from the Department of Municipal Affairs; $231 million will be distributed to municipalities under the Canada community-building fund to support infrastructure projects across the province.

The supplementary amount for Children's Services is related to funding from the federal government. The bill includes a total of $134.7 million for child care subsidies and worker supports under the Canada-Alberta early learning and child care agreement. The bill also includes a capital investment of $1 million to provide information technology for child care initiatives, which is also off-set by federal funds.

With the help of this bill we will provide $150 in electricity rebates to over 1 million homes, farms, and businesses. The bill includes a supplementary amount of $96.3 million for the Department of Energy, which will go towards a total of $300 million for the utility consumer support electricity rebate program.

While Alberta is not immune to the rising cost of living, we're striving to ensure this province is a more affordable place to live than virtually any other Canadian jurisdiction. Due in no small part to our competitive business environment, Albertans earn more than Canadians in any other province, and this is true in both the energy and nonenergy sectors. Albertans also have some of the lowest home prices and rents among Canadian urban centres. Our gasoline and diesel prices are the lowest in Canada, owing in part to low fuel tax rates and no provincial sales tax.

In fact, Madam Speaker, we recently announced that starting April 1, we will not collect any fuel tax while overall energy prices remain elevated, which is another measure we're implementing to provide real relief to Albertans.

On top of this, our tax policy continues to ensure that Albertans pay less in overall taxes than any other province, with low personal income tax, no provincial sales tax, payroll tax, or health care premiums.

The last ministry that will receive a supplementary amount is Culture and Status of Women. This is another important item as it will allow Alberta to support Ukrainians during the Russian invasion of their country. Alberta's government is contributing $11.4 million in support for Ukraine, $10.4 million of which will come from the funding in this bill. This includes $5 million to the Ukrainian World Congress to equip 5,000 members of the Ukrainian territorial defence force with defensive equipment, $5 million to the Canada-Ukraine Foundation for humanitarian aid, and $350,000 to the Ukrainian Canadian Congress Alberta Provincial Council for co-ordinating the shipment of first aid and defensive equipment to Ukraine.

In addition to the supplementary amounts for the five ministries I mentioned, the last item in the bill is a supplementary amount of $55,000 for the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner. This amount will cover reasonable expense increases in staff compensation due to the changes in the salary restraint measures on non bargaining unit staff.

Since some of the items in this bill are funded by the federal government or are off-set by savings in other areas, the overall increase to the deficit forecast for '21-22 will be limited to just over $200 million. While the supplementary estimates reflect a modest increase in spending, it's important to note the government has taken significant steps to get the province's finances back in order.

It bears repeating, Madam Speaker, that in 2019, when we took office, as per the MacKinnon report we inherited a government that on a per capita basis spent $10 billion more than similar-sized provinces. Moreover, the previous government's operating spending was increasing by 4 per cent per year, and again, had we stayed on this trajectory, many of the programs and services essential to Albertans would have simply become unsustainable and out of reach. Over the last three years we've brought that 4 per cent annual operating spending increase down to less than half a per cent per year, and if we exclude health spending increases of nearly 2 per cent per year, our operating spending has essentially remained flat over the term.

With increased economic and fiscal capacity and by maintaining discipline in our spending decisions, our fiscal future as a province is vastly improved. The government acted swiftly to adjust the fiscal plan and help address emerging issues like the rising cost of living and the war in Ukraine, and we've done so without losing sight of our commitment to long-term fiscal responsibility and accountability to taxpayers.

I respectfully urge my colleagues in this House to support this bill, and with that, I move to adjourn debate. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to move second reading of Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

This bill consists of several legislative amendments which support government's commitment to responsible financial management, red tape reduction, and respect for Albertans' tax dollars.

I'd like to start with changes that directly relate to implementing Budget 2022 decisions and legislation under Treasury Board and Finance. The first proposed change would require online marketplaces such as Airbnb and VRBO to collect and pay Alberta's tourism levy on behalf of their Alberta hosts. This will be accomplished through an amendment to the Tourism Levy Act. Currently if you are the host of a short-term rental through Airbnb or other platforms, you have an additional step when renting your property where you must collect and pay the levy yourself. This change would ensure that the levy is collected more efficiently and consistently and minimize red tape for Alberta hosts. This is a change hosts have been asking for, and we're pleased to reduce the red tape and level the playing field for accommodations in the tourism sector. This also aligns with the processes in other provinces, notably British Columbia and Quebec.

Another change in this bill would establish a new tobacco tax category and accompanying tax rate for smokeless tobacco products effective March 1. This will be accomplished through an amendment to the Tobacco Tax Act. Since neighbouring jurisdictions have a lower tax rate for smokeless tobacco, Alberta's current tax rate is not deterring people from using these products. Instead, we're seeing Albertans crossing into Saskatchewan to buy products at a lower rate. With this decision we're reducing the tax differential between Saskatchewan and Alberta, and we're reducing the incentive to purchase this product outside of the province.

Further proposals in the area of provincial tax administration included in Bill 2 contain largely technical updates to Alberta's tax statutes. These are annual updates done to ensure the legislation is up to date, aligned as necessary, and continues to support the effect of efficient collection of Alberta's taxes. This will be accomplished through amendments to the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act, Alberta Corporate Tax Act, and Fuel Tax Act.

Finally, on legislative items related to Treasury Board and Finance, Bill 2 proposes amendments to the Financial Administration Act. If passed, these amendments would ensure designated provincial corporations, regulated funds, and other consolidated entities participate by holding their surplus cash in a new cash pooling structure. The new cash pooling structure would replace an outdated and administratively complex system currently in place. The new structure would use surplus cash held in pooled accounts to pay down debt and lower debt-servicing costs. This would reduce the amount of money the government has to borrow by at least $1 billion and lower debt-servicing costs by a minimum of $25 million per year. These amendments also respond to the Auditor General's recommendation to examine the government's current cash management practices.

Now on to amendments related to other departments. Bill 2 proposes a number of updates to the Alberta Health Care Insurance Act. These are intended to strengthen the current legal framework for the delivery of health benefits and give the government flexibility to make decisions in an ever-changing health environment. In Budget 2022 we addressed the need for a stronger health care system now and took steps to build capacity and provide an excellent standard of care for all Albertans well into the future. We committed record investments in health care, and as a result, Albertans will see expanded access through additional ICU beds, new facilities in their communities, and more mental health and addictions care around the province. The proposed changes to the Alberta Health Care Insurance Act contained in Bill 2 build on these commitments and would ensure our regulatory framework for health benefits is responsive to the needs of Albertans.

Essentially, the amendments address the current lack of authority in the Alberta Health Care Insurance Act to make necessary adjustments to how benefits are paid for basic health services; for example, affording Albertans virtual care options for allied health benefits, adjusting benefits based on medical necessity, age, health status, and other criteria. We're fixing this by adding new regulation-making authority for setting coverage eligibility for health benefits delivered by allied health providers such as optometrists and podiatrists. This will help ensure care goes to those who need it most. Additional changes would also increase financial accountability through the health system by strengthening audit and compliance activities.

Bill 2 also proposes an update to the Emissions Management and Climate Resilience Act which would reduce red tape and remove an obsolete power for extending loan guarantees under the TIER loan guarantee program, a program that hasn't been used since 2019. This change helps reduce undesirable financial risk to government, that often comes with loan guarantees, and is aligned with our approach to prudent financial management.

Lastly, amendments to the Public Transit and Green Infrastructure Project Act and related regulation would help the province deliver on its financial commitments for the light rail transit construction projects in Calgary and Edmonton. The province's overall commitment to provide $3 billion for the light rail transit construction projects in Calgary and Edmonton recognizes that strong and vibrant communities are vital to Albertans' personal and professional well-being. This is more important now than ever as Alberta is moving forward to a time of economic recovery and prosperity where Albertans have opportunities to build their skills, pursue their passions, and support themselves and their families. Madam Speaker, Bill 2 builds on Budget 2022 by further integrating financial responsibility across government operations. Fiscal discipline and better use of tax dollars will ultimately yield better outcomes for Albertans and a stronger financial position for the province.

Madam Speaker, I move second reading of Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, and I look forward to healthy debate moving forward.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I am rising to provide my initial comments on Bill 2 and to note that there are a number of things in this bill that the Official Opposition does not find any particular quarrel with given that they serve pedestrian, I would say, what I call drumbeat of government, initiatives, including aligning the tax codes, which happens every year or roughly every year alongside every budget, and a number of other sort of perfunctory changes such as the changes to how Airbnb hosts collect and remit their tourism levy. That's all fine as far as it goes.

I think what we need to zero in on here are a couple of things. One, when we open up this act, we're making changes to the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act. That is fine as far as it goes to align the changes to the federal personal Income Tax Act, but omitted here was an opportunity to reindex Alberta's personal income tax system to address the rise in inflation.

Now, rising inflation is, of course, not at all a surprise. Debates have raged among economists, particularly south of the border, on the coming inflation. Certainly, more hawkish observers, like Larry Summers and others, in early 2021 were pulling the fire alarm over inflation. There was a lively debate. Now, I think it is true on both sides of the border that we are in fact returning to an inflationary period in our economic history. It has been a generation, but inflation is back.

Many of us have made a number of our large consumer choices – buying a house, buying a car, and so on – in a very low inflationary environment, Madam Speaker. Albertans have not seen these levels of inflation for 30 years. Certainly, you know, my parents used to tell stories of the '70s and '80s, when they first bought their house and then interest rates went up to 20 per cent. Those are really hard on people. Certainly, the national energy program didn't help, or at least it certainly didn't help my dad and so many folks like my parents who were working in oil and gas.

Inflation is back. This is not a surprise. What used to once preoccupy Main Street and Bay Street is now a real concern for Albertans. The fact of the matter is that we have a number of decisions that were taken in 2019, in a relatively low inflationary period, that we have absolutely blown by, and there is no question that we are no longer living in that world. When we are reopening the Personal Income Tax Act, there is an opportunity here to ensure that our income tax brackets align with the rise in the cost of living.

Let me just provide some context for folks for what is actually happening here and why both the now Premier of this province – back in the '90s he used to call this an insidious tax grab, which is why the Official Opposition has asked so many times why he is now strangely comfortable with this given that it was one of his first acts in terms of decisions as Premier. The basic personal exemption in 2019 under the NDP was $19,369, Madam Speaker. That is the amount that you do not pay taxes on. You pay taxes above that $19,000 threshold. The basic personal exemption in 2025 under the UCP, according to what they have put forward since 2019 and have indicated no change on particularly – this was the opportunity for them to do that, in this Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022 – will be $19,369.

Now, if they had continued to index the income tax system to inflation – that is to say, not taken the decision to let inflation eat away at our incomes – then the basic personal exemption in 2025 would have been $22,219. In other words, you're paying taxes on $3,000 more of your income than you would have otherwise been. Over the course of the fiscal forecast period this means that the statistically average family will pay more than $500 more under this decision in personal income tax alone. And then we add, on top of that, that the child and family benefit is also no longer indexed to inflation, so it's not going up every year, and those benefits will then be lost by $485 a year because that benefit is not increasing with inflation.

Now, there have been other measures that have resulted in deindexing of benefits from inflation. I'm thinking here of the assured income for the severely handicapped and the Alberta seniors' benefit. Leaving those aside for a moment, the fact of the matter is that this Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, before the House today could remedy that problem of indexing our income tax brackets to inflation. It does not.

You know, it's very clear to me that this budget did submit to a rewrite in January. I was noting in the budget speech that there were a couple of typos on the fake natural gas rebate. There was a misspelling of Ralph Klein's name. It's fairly clear to me that somebody just kind of tossed that in there at the last second to kind of meet the – this was their idea of meeting the moment, I guess, for a rebate that is not going to happen for people's rising cost of living as this issue was starting to boil in late January, early February. Although, I mean, certainly on the Official Opposition side we could have told the folks across the way, and did, in fact, that rising property taxes, insurance, school fees, tuition, and other costs were eating away at the family budget in a very significant way.

Be that as it may, it's very clear that this was a bit of slapdashery that is before us in terms of this budget, you know, as evidenced by the fact that there is actually no line item for the natural gas rebate. It doesn't really exist. The electricity rebate was sort of thought of after the fact, and we just rammed through the supplementary estimates in order to finance it. There's no question that there could have been a retroactive rewrite on this decision to tax people more at a time when, as discussed, their insurance is going up, their property taxes are going up, their school fees are going up, interest on their student loans is going up, their tuition is going up. Pretty much everywhere that the province of Alberta could exercise a public policy choice in terms of saving people money, they chose to do the opposite.

This is a real missed opportunity, Madam Speaker. Even though, you know, under normal circumstances this would be a perfunctory exercise, we are not supporting this bill because we cannot in good conscience allow this bill to go through when we have a Finance minister who has told the public: oh, yes, I think we will reindex sometime at a later time. But people need that help today. They need to know that they're going to be paying – that their personal income taxes are going to be indexed to inflation and that the, generally speaking, very high inflation that people are now seeing is not going to eat away at their take-home pay when they file their 2021 taxes.

You know, the fact of the matter is, Madam Speaker, that the absence of indexation in this bill just fundamentally signals to the people of Alberta just how incredibly tone deaf they are to people's challenges right now. When we are hearing from people who are looking at $500 and $700 electricity bills from January, February, and they've – the pool price has abated a little bit, but people are still looking at pretty high bills, and it hasn't exactly been a warm spring across the province. At that level, when people are already reeling from the pandemic – there's been lots of job disruption, lack of paid sick leave, all kinds of financial challenges for people. You know, you just have to go out and talk to any random person on the street, and they will tell you that the last two years have been difficult. Many people have different stories to tell, but the foundational theme is that, yeah, it's not exactly been easy on anybody.

From the fact that we're now bringing in this piece of legislation that doesn't take that opportunity and is just wilfully blind to what's actually on people's minds, you know, I just think it's no wonder that the government caucus is in the public opinion quandary it finds itself in. They're just simply not meeting people where they are at in terms of their legitimate concerns.

You know, I think it's fair to say that in this sort of slapdashery of getting mixed signals from the Finance minister, it's fundamentally unhelpful to people, and I think it goes to trust. People simply do not trust that this Minister of Finance, this government caucus, has people's best interests and financial security at heart when he sort of muses publicly: oh, we might reindex at a later time; maybe we will, and maybe we won't. We have an opportunity to do so in this legislation here. Just to give people that certainty would certainly, I think, go some way to restoring that breach of trust as well. It's very, very clear that Albertans, as I often hear from people out on the doorsteps, on the left or the right or the exhausted middle, Madam Speaker, all have trust issues when it comes to this government and have all had experience in some way, shape, or form with these folks not keeping their word with Albertans. When we hear open musing from the Finance minister that "Oh, we might rewrite the budget in this way or that," including reindexing, it would go some way to including that measure within this. It would be exactly within this Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, that that goal would be in fact accomplished.

Our firm commitment to Albertans is relatively simple on this matter, Madam Speaker. You know, to go back and talk a little bit about the history of indexation of income tax brackets – I know it's an extremely exciting topic to the dozens of people at home who are at the edge of their seats, to hear about that economic history – the fact of the matter is that there was a previous era of high inflation, and there was a policy consensus that emerged that governments in Canada would index the income tax system to account for inflation every year. This is a pretty boring economic accounting concept. That meant that the amount that Albertans and Canadians pay on their income taxes would be adjusted annually to account for inflation. Each year the basic personal income tax exemption and brackets would increase in line with inflation.

Now, the fact of the matter is that this Premier has actually played an integral part in the history of this particular policy initiative. There's no end to the Hansard. There is a forest of Hansard, Madam Speaker, with the Premier on the record on this matter, calling the lack of indexation of the income tax system a pernicious and sneaky and insidious – and all these big words – tax grab. Yet at the first available opportunity that's what the Finance minister did in his first budget, in 2019.

You know, over the course of 20 years since that conversation in the 1990s, of which the now Premier was a part, both federally and provincially policy-makers did reach a consensus. This was across the aisle. It was very uncontroversial until this government reintroduced the controversy to it. Whatever the rate of inflation, citizens would be protected. It should be a very simple concept. The income tax system and benefits would be indexed, and there would be no tax on inflation.

I want to use my remaining time to just touch very briefly, Madam Speaker – and I may speak to this further as the bill progresses – on the matter of cash pooling and the GOA essentially having access to all funds and being able to cash pool for their associated agencies, boards, and commissions. While on the face of it I don't particularly have much in the way of quarrel in terms of this provision, the GOA could take the U of A or AIMCo's cash on hand and pool those resources centrally. It seems to make sense on the face of it, and there are a number of Auditor General recommendations with respect to cash management that do need to be satisfied. We all understand that.

Having said that, the government has given themselves in this act the power to charge lower than market rates, costing the associated government entities funds. The government argues that by centrally pooling cash, they improve overall liquidity, therefore need less cash overall across all public entities. That may well be true, which will save on debt-servicing costs; also may well be true. But on the other hand – and we have very recent experience of this, Madam Speaker – it limits the autonomy and independence of organizations that are generally thought to be at arm's length from government; for example, AIMCo, universities and colleges, school boards, et cetera.

Because the government has given themselves the right to charge below market rates, it may be that a commitment now to not do such a thing will be reneged upon in the future. I'm thinking here of the decision to charge municipalities more in interest for their infrastructure projects as a result of changes to the Alberta Capital Finance Authority, a commitment that they said they were not going to do, Madam Speaker, to municipalities. Lo and behold, they just turned around and did it with absolutely no remorse. You know, it's in writing, that they weren't going to do it, and they just absolutely don't care. What they said before: don't care about their word, don't care about establishing relationships of trust with anybody, and went back on their word. Now they're raising those interest rates from municipalities borrowing for infrastructure projects, which will cost those of us who are property tax payers potentially a lot of money over the course of these very large infrastructure projects, depending on which municipality we live in.

This provision of the act, I will say, is not problematic on the face of it if you can actually trust the government at their word, and that's a bit of a tall order these days. There is no question that if this is going to happen, there probably needs to be a bit of legislative protection or a dial turned on this because nobody trusts this government to do what they said they were going to do, because two minutes later they turn around and do the opposite. I can't support this as it is written right now although I do not disagree with the principle or what it is trying to achieve.

I think this business of the reduction to the provincial tax on chewing tobacco piece – I'll just say a few things on this. You know, this does bring us roughly in line with other provinces. Despite the lower rate it is not unlikely that revenues will increase. Revenues are a function of rate multiplied by volume, after all, so if people are indeed doing sort of cross-border adventures for this particular product, then it may be that the revenues actually go up.

My questions here would be around whether the government, in fact, spoke to any of the tobacco reduction advocates, any health professionals, or others on this move, whether they consulted with them or if they just left them completely in the dark. I would argue that these are folks who have been really important partners to government and for public health for a really long time, and it would be unfortunate indeed if they were left out of that process. I hope that perhaps, as we go along through the bill debate process, the government can shed a little bit of light on what kinds of public consultations were done and if there was any sort of health or other revenue analysis done associated with this decision.

With that, Madam Speaker, I will conclude my remarks for now and just simply conclude by saying that it is unfortunate indeed that this is the time that I rise to speak to this Financial Statutes Amendment Act seeing as we just did pass through supplementary supply and the government also cut off any opportunity for the opposition to provide some comments on that. You know, it's hundreds of millions of dollars in new spending. It would seem to me that it is only right and proper for the people of Alberta to have at least some window on what the government is up to there when they come to this House to ask for hundreds of millions of dollars in supplementary supply. On the face of it some of these initiatives are supported by the NDP opposition, others less so. But either way it is up to this Chamber to be able to communicate to the people of Alberta on what's in those bills, what the government is actually asking for in terms of sups, and to be able to judge for themselves based on the debate in this House.

With that, I will conclude my remarks, Madam Speaker, and look forward to the debate on this bill.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to join the debate on Bill 2? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and offer a few comments on Bill 2, Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. I want to start off by thanking my friend from Lethbridge-West for her thoughtful comments and just say that I agree in large part with all of the things that she said about this bill, particularly her concerns with respect to the lack of changes to the tax code that we've been pushing for.

I think it's important from the outset, Madam Speaker, to just clearly state what I believe the NDP's view of fair taxation is. We all agree that government has a role to provide goods and services to the people of Alberta. We don't necessarily agree what those goods and services should be, but we know from word and deed that we all agree that government should provide goods and services to people. Those goods and services come at a cost, and the question is who should pay and who should be let off the hook when it comes to footing the bill for the goods and services that government provides. Now, as members of the New Democratic Party we've long believed that a fair taxation system asks those who benefit from the economy of the province to pay the most and those who are benefiting the least should also pay the least. That, to me, seems to be a fair way of covering the expenses of government.

Unfortunately, that is something that we don't see from our Conservative friends across the way. They seem to have an opposite view of what constitutes fairness: if you are benefiting a great deal from the economic situation, you're actually asked to pay less, and if you're suffering, struggling to get ahead, you're actually asked to pay more. That's why we have a tax system now that has been constructed to allow the most profitable corporations in our province to pay $5 billion less in taxes than they would have under the old tax code while simultaneously asking the average personal income tax payer to pay $500 a year more at a time when they can least afford it, Madam Speaker.

Not only that, not only are we asking the people who can least afford to foot the bill to pay more while letting those who can well afford to pay more off the hook; we're asking those who receive government services to do without because this government doesn't have the courage to implement a fair taxation system. Who am I thinking of, Madam Speaker? Of course, I'm thinking of AISH recipients. I'm thinking of students in the postsecondary system. I'm thinking of people who access the Alberta child and family benefit, those seniors who are eligible for seniors' benefits. All of the people who receive those benefits are now receiving substantially less than they would have if the tax code from 2018 had been carried forward to this present day.

With respect to the issue of deindexing the tax code, there are a couple of comments that I'd like to make. It is astounding to me, Madam Speaker, to hear the Member for Lethbridge-West essentially channel the 1997 Reform Party on this issue. I find that my head is spinning because the world has come full circle. I clearly remember in 1997, as a 19-year-old who didn't know any better, voting for the Reform Party candidate who was running in my constituency in that election. Now . . . [interjections] Don't cheer, because that Reform Party member ended up going to jail for illegally confining people as an RCMP officer, not exactly the kind of person that you would want to have holding public office. I am not proud of the fact that I voted for that person.

It is incredibly interesting to me, Madam Speaker, to find myself in a party that I thought was the New Democratic Party but is echoing lines from the 1997 Reform Party. There's something called horseshoe theory that says that people on the extreme left and the extreme right converge on certain issues, and perhaps this issue of tax deindexation is one of those issues on which we're converging. I don't know.

The fact of the matter is, though, that deindexing the tax code has had a very real cost for the average income tax payer here in the province of Alberta. We heard as much this morning at the Public Accounts Committee, where we met with officials from the Department of Finance and Treasury Board. My colleagues questioned officials from the Department of Finance and Treasury Board to give exact figures for how much additional personal income tax has been collected in the fiscal 2019-20 year, the fiscal 2020-21 year, as well as the fiscal '21-22 year. That number adds up to somewhere north of $300 million additional taxes that have been collected from average working Albertans. That number is projected to increase significantly over the next few years as, hopefully, wages go up. But tax brackets don't rise along with them.

You know, it's interesting to me, Madam Speaker, when the Member for Lethbridge-West pressed the Premier on this issue of deindexing the tax brackets, that he loudly and proudly proclaimed that 40 per cent of Albertans don't pay taxes under our tax system. Well, as my friend from Lethbridge-West clearly stated, the personal exemption is not quite $19,500, so when the Premier brags about 40 per cent of Albertans not being eligible to pay taxes, what he's saying is that 40 per cent of working Albertans earn less than $19,500.

I hear members opposite say that they're not working hard enough, and I think that that's exactly the attitude that has made Albertans so upset with members of this government, because we know full well that Albertans are working harder than ever before. They continue to fall behind, and this government, instead of offering them any hand up, kicks them while they're down, at the same time turning around and allowing profitable corporations to get away with not paying $5 billion in taxes that are rightfully owed to the people of Alberta, approving 40 per cent pay raises for executive managers at AIMCo, and then, if that weren't enough, the Premier is musing idly about giving people who earn $300,000 a year a tax break.

It's quite clear to me whose side the government is on, and it's those who don't need any help from government. The people who earn $19,500 or less are on their own. Not only is the government continuing to shovel money into the pockets of the people who already have the most in this province; they continue to claw back money from the people who have the least to give. We heard clearly this morning, also in Public Accounts, about changes that were made to the Alberta child and family benefit. Hundreds of dollars every year are taken because of the changes to the Alberta child and family benefit that this government made. Hundreds of dollars a year are taken out of the pockets of families who are living at the poverty line. The government wants to claim that they made this wonderful change because a very small section of people who were living in deep poverty got a slight increase in the child benefit. But they took that money from people who were living in poverty that wasn't as deep, and that's clearly unfair.

Not only that, but that is not the only change they made. The decision to deindex AISH was one that has cost the average AISH recipient $3,000. Now, $3,000 to somebody who receives – what is it? Is $1,600 a month the average for AISH? I'm not getting any help here from my colleagues, unfortunately. They are deep in their phones. [interjection] Approximately $1,600. That's the equivalent of two months' worth of benefits that have been clawed away from AISH recipients. And what's the justification that we heard from officials in the Ministry of Finance and Treasury Board? Well, similar recipients in other provinces make less, so the people of Alberta who are on this program should make less, too.

What's insulting, Madam Speaker, the insult that is added to the injury that has been visited upon AISH recipients, is this government's continual perpetuation of this myth that AISH recipients in Alberta receive the highest benefits of anybody in the country, which is patently untrue. My friend from St. Albert this morning challenged department officials on the fact that similar recipients in the Northwest Territories, for example, receive higher benefits, and when she asked them to confirm whether or not that was true, you know, the ministry officials shuffled papers on their desk and looked awkwardly at their shoes and avoided answering the question.

The fact remains that this government had no justification for clawing back AISH benefits to those recipients other than the fact that they believe that because people in Ontario and British Columbia are suffering, we should visit an equal amount of suffering on people in similar situations here in the province of Alberta. It's grossly unfair.

The same is true with seniors' benefits. We asked a similar line of questions about the deindexation of seniors' benefits to officials at the Department of Treasury Board and Finance. Again, when we highlighted that the changes that this government has made have cost the average seniors' benefit recipient $750 a year, the only answer they had to justify that decision was that seniors in other jurisdictions receive less, so seniors in Alberta should receive less, too. It doesn't make sense.

Their version of the Alberta advantage is that if you are a multibillion-dollar corporation, you should receive more here than in any other province in the country and you can send that money to foreign investors, you know, move your headquarters out of Calgary to Denver or wherever. That's fine. People in this government can't do enough to make sure that they benefit companies way more than any other province would, but when it comes to AISH recipients or people on seniors' benefits, well, they should suffer as much as any other Canadian should because that's their version of fairness, Madam Speaker. I find it incredibly frustrating and incredibly offensive.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to join the debate on Bill 2? The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a great opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 2 and clarify, I think, some of the comments that we've been hearing throughout the course of debate thus far. You know, there's no question that Albertans are feeling some of the pinch when it comes to fuel prices and utility bills. That's precisely why Alberta's government has stepped up to provide assistance. When it comes to utility bills, the government of Alberta is providing a $50 rebate for three months, $150 in total over three months, to help off-set some of the increased costs of utilities that Albertans are feeling. [interjection] As you can hear, members opposite – I don't know – don't like that approach and want to heckle, but it is important. The members opposite want to object to us providing assistance to Albertans who are feeling the pinch, but we believe that it's important to provide relief to Alberta families through that initiative.

Furthermore, Madam Speaker, I also wanted to rise to talk a little bit more about the cost of gasoline and the cost of fuel prices. As it relates to fuel prices, the government of Alberta is removing the provincial tax on gas, on fuel. What really is a challenge when it comes to this issue is the fact that the NDP stands up here all day, every day and talks about the issue of affordability, but on April 1 their ally, their governing partner – we know their federal leader, of course, Jagmeet Singh, and the federal NDP have . . . [interjections] You can hear how angry they get. They know where I'm going. I haven't even gotten there, but they know where I'm going, and they get so angry. [interjections]

The Deputy Speaker: Order. Order. It's becoming very difficult to hear the hon. member who has the floor. Only that hon. member has the floor.

The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: It's unfortunate. I've been sitting here for most of the afternoon listening intently, but unfortunately the members opposite can't do that.

Regardless, Madam Speaker, as I was saying, their federal counterparts – not just their counterparts; they actually belong to the same party, being the federal NDP – have just signed a deal to hang onto power with the Liberals until 2025. We know that a key part of the federal Liberal agenda is to increase the carbon tax on April 1. What's going to happen when they increase the carbon tax on April 1? It will make life more expensive for Albertans. It will make life more expensive for every Albertan, for individuals on a fixed income, for families, for individuals who want to take their kids to school, who want to take their kids to hockey practice. The NDP hasn't said a word about the federal carbon tax.

Now, I'm willing to give them some latitude. If they really do believe in making life more affordable for Albertans, Madam Speaker, I would look forward to seeing any member stand up and call openly on the federal government and their coalition NDP partners to stop the carbon tax increase on April 1. That is what I would like to see. I invite any member opposite, if they are so concerned and so interested with the issue of affordability, to stand up and speak against the carbon tax increase that is scheduled to happen on April 1. None of them will do that because their allegiance with Justin Trudeau cannot be shattered and cannot be broken. It must be maintained at all measure. We know that, and we see that.

However, again, we are taking action on our side of the House. We are removing the provincial tax on fuel. That'll equate to 13 cents per litre in savings for all Albertans. We firmly believe that Albertans shouldn't be punished for taking their kids to school and for going about their daily business.

That's why, Madam Speaker, you may remember, in 2019, when our government was elected, the first act, Bill 1, of our government and of this Legislature was An Act to Repeal the Carbon Tax to remove the carbon tax that those members put in place when they were in government. Why? Because Albertans did not want to pay more to heat their homes, did not want to pay more to get their groceries and to drive their kids to school.

We have taken direct action on bringing costs down. The members opposite just like to talk a good game, Madam Speaker, but again I would invite any member to stand up and speak against the federal carbon tax increase that is coming.

I wanted to speak a little bit about the issue of affordability – I think we've covered that – but I also wanted to speak on the issue of corporate taxes as well because I understand that several amendments within Bill 2 are making amendments to corporate tax. Madam Speaker, I think we heard it earlier from some of the speakers opposite. Our government took decisive action in bringing corporate taxes down. Do you know what the result of that was? [interjection] I'm so glad the Minister of Finance asked, but I think it's a little bit of a rhetorical question, because he knows the answer well and clear.

The result, shockingly, of course – big surprise – was more revenue, more corporate tax revenue. It's very simple, Madam Speaker. A lower tax regime and a lower tax environment encourage investment, allow investment, and facilitate investment, but unfortunately the members opposite don't understand that. When they were in government, they increased corporate taxes, taxes on corporations, and what happened? Businesses left, divestment occurred, and jobs were lost as a direct result of their action.

It's very clear in looking at the budget documents. Any member of the public can look and see the details for themselves. As a result of our corporate tax decrease, the province now is realizing more revenue from businesses, more corporate tax revenue. But you don't just have to look at the budget documents; just look every other day at the news and see what is happening, Madam Speaker. There is investment from organizations like Amazon Web Services, new investments just the other day from Walmart opening up a new distribution centre, record investment in tech, record investment in film and television. Venture capital investment is also up. All we have to do is look at the signs. Again, if Albertans don't want to look through the mundane details of the budget, just look at the news and look at what's happening on a day-to-day basis. Perhaps the Minister of Finance will disagree with my assessment that there are mundane details in the budget, but of course I think we have a little bit of a different perspective when it comes to that issue.

We see very clearly, Madam Speaker, signs of strong economic growth. We see very clearly signs of opportunity and signs of growth. That also is on the back of having to deal with two years of challenges associated with the COVID-19 pandemic, but through that time Alberta's government has kept its course. We have continued to be focused on the priorities that Albertans want our government to be focused on, and we are now beginning to see the results of that hard work and that diligence.

I know some critics, including the members opposite, will say that the results of some of the successes in the budget are solely the result of increased revenue and solely the result of – I believe I heard one of the members during question period talk about a revenue windfall, that we fell backwards into a revenue windfall and that that's the only reason that we are in the fiscal environment that we are in now.

Madam Speaker, let me say very clearly that Alberta is back with a balanced budget for the first time in eight years, and that is because of diligent and prudent fiscal spending and fiscal restraint. Under the NDP, if you apply the same revenue projections that the NDP had when they were in office, we would still be dealing with massive deficits as a result of their spending trajectory. The math is clear. It's been $6 billion. It's been verified by other economists. Have a look at the information. Under the current trajectory with our forecast that we built into the budget for revenue projections, we would still have billions of dollars in deficit if we followed the NDP spending trajectory.

You know why we don't have deficits anymore? Because our government has been successful in bringing costs under control, bringing costs in line with other jurisdictions. An important part of bringing costs in line with other jurisdictions is allowing us to do more. Madam Speaker, we are investing $171 million over three years to create 7,000 additional seats in our postsecondary institutions, more seats than those members created in our postsecondary system, more seats than have been created in a decade. We're providing new funding for student aid to ensure that every Albertan has the opportunity to access postsecondary education. We are investing more in apprenticeship education, in ensuring Indigenous learners have the opportunity to access postsecondary education, and we are able to do this because we have made the difficult decisions to get our finances under control, to rein in reckless NDP spending.

As I look to the future, I see optimism, I see signs of investment, I see signs of job growth, job creation, and I am confident that if we continue with our plans, we will see even greater results and success. With that, Madam Speaker, I'm happy to cede the rest of my time.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this afternoon to speak to Bill 2, Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. You know, listening to the hon. minister, he made a reference that I just found really interesting. He says: all day every day the NDP talks about affordability. Absolutely. We absolutely are, and when you're still not hearing it, it's a concern. I question why this side of the House is actually listening to Albertans and their concerns about affordability in this province, yet the other side of the House is also hearing the same concerns – we hear them, we're CCed in the e-mails, we talk about it every day in this Chamber – yet they're bringing forward legislation that makes it harder for families.

This piece of legislation is doing nothing that I'm hearing Albertans want. They want affordability. They want to be able to pay their bills. They want to be able to put their kids in post-secondary. But what this government is doing is so out of touch with what actual Albertans are asking for. So I'm confused. They're hearing the NDP, who is speaking on behalf of Albertans, talk about their concerns with affordability yet are doing nothing. I'm just very confused about the cognitive dissonance that's happening on that side of the House when it comes to what Albertans are actually asking for. It is certainly not an increase in cost. It is certainly not this $50 that they're claiming is going to save people with their utilities. When people are paying $800 a month for a utility bill and can no longer afford insurance on their vehicle because that's skyrocketing, they can't afford the cost of living that's happening, I'm just so confused why this government is not understanding what's happening.

As part of my critic role I spend a lot of time talking with nonprofits all across the province. On March 17, 2022, just recently, Vibrant Communities Calgary released a budget review. They did an analysis, they published it, and I would encourage this government to review that report because the title of this article is Alberta Budget 2022's Business As Usual Approach Falls Short: New Spending Priorities Don't Address Issues That Matter to Struggling Albertans. This organization meets with nonprofits and organizations that serve Albertans all across the province. It involves the Calgary chamber of voluntary commerce, Alberta seniors and community, Edmonton Social Planning Council. They're those individuals that are working front line with Albertans. They're concerned with this budget. They're concerned with tax. They're concerned with the lack of investment in what they've claimed are priorities.

We see in this piece of legislation that one of the pieces of the omnibus bill is the Tourism Levy Act. That's one of the pieces that's going to be impacted. It's creating a space where Airbnb-type companies can charge the tourism levy, which is interesting because part of this government's plan is to increase travel and tourism in the province. It's something that they talk about all the time. How are we supposed to entice Albertans to actually travel when they can't afford their bills, they can't afford insurance on their vehicle, they can't afford basic groceries?

I'm hearing from parents who are struggling. Parents call me in tears wanting to know what supports and services are available. They've exhausted the food bank. They've exhausted their church. They've exhausted their neighbours. Pleading with resources, supports, and information, and this government laughs at the NDP talking about affordability.

Madam Speaker, I'm so confused about why this government is prioritizing the way that they are. They're not looking at inflation costs. They're not looking at increasing access to the supports and services that people need. They're creating a space where people that are on a very fixed, limited income, like seniors, like individuals on AISH, are set even further behind than they were before. If they listened to Albertans, if they listened to the organizations that serve Albertans, they would hear loud and clear that something needs to happen. Something needs to change.

We know that we stand up in this House and we talk about what needs to happen, what are potential solutions, and this piece of legislation doesn't answer that. We look at a government saying, "We need to increase travel; we need to increase tourism," but they've taxed parks. It just doesn't make sense. They talk out one side that they understand it, that they're working on building the economy, yet they're not actually doing things that support that growth.

When I talk with the tourism industry – they have come to committee. They've met with individual members. They have pleaded to meet with this government to talk about things that will actually work to increase travel and tourism in the province. One of the things that I brought up in estimates was talking about: what is the province doing to encourage Albertans to enter into the travel and tourism field? There's no plan. The travel industry relies heavily on international people to come and work in the province. Well, we've seen a decline, partly to do with COVID and the inability to travel, but there's no plan to get Albertans working in those sectors. The travel and tourism industry is one of the biggest hit, has the highest unemployment rate out of the industries in the province, yet we don't see a plan to get individuals working.

We have hotels that are struggling – they don't have staff to clean the rooms – and we also have Albertans that are out of work. What is their plan to get those people working in an industry that could be thriving in the province? We have the natural landscape of Banff and Jasper, beautiful places, but simply putting an Airbnb tax does not incentivize Albertans to travel. They can't afford to travel. They can't afford to rent an Airbnb. It just doesn't make sense. It's so out of touch, Madam Speaker.

I think that when we look at what people are saying about this budget, there are some significant concerns about the impacts on the average family. We know that people can't pay bills. We know that they are struggling in job loss. They're struggling in career changes. They're struggling with some significant emotional impacts. None of that is being looked at when it comes to how this government has planned their budget. They have created a space that is so out of touch with what people are actually talking about in the province and what people actually need in the province.

We look at what average expenses are in a household. People cannot afford day-to-day life. It's not luxury things that people are going without, Madam Speaker. It's not that, you know, they can't buy that luxury SUV. They can't afford milk. There's a housing crisis that's happening in the province. People can't find affordable housing. Seniors are struggling. Parents – we're in a sandwich generation. I have my mom who lives with me, and I have my kids who are still at home. When I think about what her life is like, I'm so fortunate to have her in my home. But when I look at some of her peers who are struggling to make ends meet, it breaks my heart. It absolutely breaks my heart that people who have worked their entire working careers to build a life for themselves can't afford milk, can't afford to go and see their grandbabies.

These are the stories that we're hearing, and I know members of government are hearing those stories as well. We're CCed on the e-mails. There's no response on what this government is going to do to actually make life affordable for people. People are in pain. People are asking for some sort of budget that actually has an impact on their day-to-day life, and this isn't that, Madam Speaker.

There are some significant concerns when we look at what average families are being faced with and the pain that they're feeling. Saving to put kids in postsecondary is a big cost, and now it's, unfortunately, unattainable for some families. They cannot afford to have their children attend postsecondary. That has a ripple effect. That has people in our province that aren't being educated to a level that they want to be because they can't afford it. We see postsecondary students leaving the province. Talking to physicians, they're saying that a lot of their graduating doctors don't want to work in this province. They're leaving. They don't want to be told where they have to open up their practice. This government talks about their plan to entice doctors to the province. It's not working.

When we talk about things that make people want to live in Alberta and want to invest here, not having a physician, not having an education system, that has a curriculum that has been rejected on so many levels, not having supports through FSCD, knowing that there are significant wait-lists or what this government refuses to call a wait-list – families that qualify without having access to supports is perhaps a better way to frame it in their language – ultimately that means that families are going without the services that they need and deserve. There's nothing in this budget that shows that that's being supported.

When we talk about the film industry, that is definitely a success in the province. We've seen how there have been some incredible productions that have come out of this province. But when I was in estimates, I asked the minister: out of those big productions, how many Albertans were employed in that production? How many carpenters were Albertans? We see a big production coming here, but how many Albertans actually benefited from working on that production? I couldn't get an answer. We talk about this wonderful film that's been here – everyone is talking about it – and it absolutely brings light to Alberta, but what was the impact on Albertans working? It's hard to hear them talk about all of these wonderful things but not be able to drill down and provide exact examples of what's actually happening.

I know that one of the main concerns from the nonprofits is that they've been hit incredibly hard when it comes to COVID and the lack of supports from government. These are organizations that are all across the province that are struggling to meet the needs, and those needs are going up.

When I talked to my former co-workers in Children's Services about the complexity of the families that they're working with, trying to support, there's such a lack of understanding of the poverty in this province and the lack of resources and supports. By not acknowledging inflation in the budget, it just simply doesn't make sense. The nonprofits know that that's how you calculate. The nonprofits are aware that when you look at the way that you do a budget, you have to account for that, yet this government just simply hasn't done it. They've just simply refused to consider inflation. They've refused to provide any real relief for families. We simply cannot support a budget that doesn't provide real relief for families.

When I look through this piece of legislation, this omnibus, that has, I believe, nine different acts that it's impacting, it's hard to be able to go back to my constituents and say: this is something that's going to have an impact on your budget.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'll be brief. I will move that we adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Today I rise for the second reading of Bill 5, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022.

This bill will allow the government to improve safety on our roads for roadside workers. These amendments proposed under Bill 5 are part of government's ongoing efforts to ensure that our roads are among the safest in the country. This bill will provide improved safety on our roads and highways for roadside workers and enhance existing safety rules for first responders.

Every year there are dozens of collisions and near misses with snowplows on our roads and on our highways. Highway maintenance workers also face considerable risk when they work to keep our roads safe and clear throughout the year. Between March 2018 and March 2021 there were 128 collisions involving snowplows contracted by Alberta Transportation. The Alberta Motor Association reported that since December 2019 there have been 36 near misses and at least 13 serious roadside incidents involving Alberta tow trucks and passing vehicles, collisions resulting in injury, hospitalization, and even death.

Last year we consulted with Albertans and our stakeholders on safety for roadside workers. The result was that Albertans, traffic safety advocacy organizations, and those who work in highway maintenance wholeheartedly agreed that more needs to be done to protect roadside workers and make our highways safer. Bill 5 proposes many changes to do just that.

First, let me talk about what I mean when I talk about roadside workers. We know about construction workers who are building new roads or paving existing roads within construction zones. They already have protections in place, as do first responders, but roadside workers are a different category of workers. They can be doing their work anywhere alongside the road. They are the men and women who maintain our roads and highways and keep them free of debris, tow truck operators, those servicing public utilities, or even sometimes those who do animal control and more. If their vehicle has a flashing lamp – not just hazard lights but separate flashing lamps – they would be protected under this legislation.

Currently motorists are required to slow down to 60 kilometres per hour or the speed limit, whichever is lower, in the adjacent lane when passing a stopped emergency vehicle or tow truck with its flashing lights activated. The changes in Bill 5 will mean that all lanes of traffic travelling on the same side as a stopped emergency or roadside worker vehicle must slow down to 60 kilometres per hour or the speed limit, whichever is lower, when the vehicle's lights are flashing. This also applies to all vehicles travelling in both directions on a single-lane highway.

Similar rules are common in most other provinces across the country, and this leads to improved safety. The proposed changes under Bill 5 will require drivers to slow down to 60 kilometres per hour or the speed limit, whichever is lower, when passing any vehicle that is stopped with their lamps flashing. These changes will come into force on proclamation. To ensure that Albertans and law enforcement are informed and have time to prepare for these changes, government will undertake an education campaign for all drivers in the province prior to the anticipated in-force date in spring of 2023.

Last year my department used a public survey to gauge Albertans' interest and knowledge on the rules around roadside workers. About 15,000 Albertans responded to an online survey from March 16 to April 6, 2021. Respondents were very supportive of extending existing protections to snowplow operators and other roadside workers. A majority, 60 per cent, of respondents felt that the current safe passing laws are inadequate. A shocking 85 per cent supported reducing the current safe passing speed from 60 kilometres per hour to 50 kilometres per hour. And a staggering 92 per cent supported requiring all vehicles to provide one lane of space when passing a roadside vehicle when its lights are flashing. When was the last time that 92 per cent of Albertans agreed on anything? Finally, 75 per cent of respondents agreed they would be less likely to speed past an emergency vehicle when its lights are flashing if fines were increased. So while some of the opposition may complain about so-called cash cows, it seems that fines do work as a deterrent to dangerous driving behaviours.

Some have suggested that we should have made these changes by ministerial order; however, the existing requirement to slow down when passing stopped emergency vehicles and tow trucks is in section 115 of the act. It could not be expanded to other vehicles in other lanes of traffic without an amendment to the act. There is no existing authority that would allow this change to be made by ministerial order.

Further, by keeping this requirement in legislation, which is published and publicly available, it ensures the rules are transparent and accessible to Albertans and enforcement. Moving rules out of legislation and into ministerial orders, which do not have the same publication requirements as acts and regulations, affects transparency. Simply put, it can make the law more difficult for Albertans to find.

It has been asked by some: how many tickets have been written for drivers who didn't move over for stopped emergency vehicles with flashing lights? Currently there's no legal requirement to move over; those may come when we amend the regulations. However, between 2014 and 2019 an average of 700 tickets were issued each year related to speeding past a stopped emergency vehicle or a tow truck. Every single one of those tickets was handed out to protect an emergency worker at the side of the road, each of whom has family, friends, and colleagues who want them to go home safely at the end of their shift.

My office got an e-mail from an Albertan last week asking: why does anyone in the far left lane on a three-lane highway have to slow down when passing emergency vehicles? There are two obvious reasons we are doing this. The first one is obvious: it's safety. Between 2014 and 2018 there were 2,034 collisions involving emergency vehicles in Alberta. Let me state that number again: 2,034. That's more than one collision with a stopped emergency vehicle with its lights flashing each and every day for five years. While most of these collisions only resulted in property damage, sadly, there were two fatal collisions and 191 injury collisions that caused two deaths and 274 injuries. That's two deaths and 274 injuries too many.

The other reason is for consistency across jurisdictions. By making these changes, our rules will mirror those already in place in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and British Columbia. Matching rules in neighbouring jurisdictions simplifies driving for everyone, and it increases safety.

Michelle Chimko, president and CEO of the Alberta Motor Association, had this to say last week, when we introduced Bill 5:

Near misses and collisions are a regular occurrence for Alberta's tow truck operators, emergency responders and other roadside workers. We applaud these changes as an important first step in improving the safety of these essential workers and look forward to our continued work in further improving their visibility and safety. We ask all Albertans to take care when passing a roadside scene. Those few extra seconds can make all the difference in keeping someone's loved one safe.

Ron Glen, CEO of the Alberta Roadbuilders & Heavy Construction Association, stated this about Bill 5:

Alberta's road construction and maintenance industry puts worker safety first. This legislation is greatly appreciated because we need drivers to slow down and do their part to make their highways – our worksites – safe and efficient for all.

It's not just construction workers who support this bill but also those who currently have no protection under the existing legislation. Our highway maintenance contractors work tirelessly to ensure our roads and highways are safe in all forms of weather, whether it's blinding snow and frigid cold in winter storms or in the blistering heat in summer. Roadside maintenance workers support this bill, too.

Kelly McManus, president of transportation and highway operations with the LaPrairie Group of Companies, said this last week:

Highway maintenance crews throughout our industry provide critical services to our province's expansive highway and road network, for the benefit of all Albertans. It is gratifying to see our government taking deliberate and proactive measures to improve safety for all highway maintenance and roadside personnel.

Even municipalities stand firmly behind this bill. Amber Link, reeve of Wheatland county, had this to say about Bill 5:

Road safety and the safety of personnel is a high priority across Alberta. Bill 5 considers the concerns that were raised by Albertans and is intended to protect road users and workers, create safety programs that encompass best practices, as well as a province with the highest quality road infrastructure for the transportation of people, goods, and services.

These changes are exactly what both Albertans and our stakeholders have asked for. These changes will make our roads safer for those who work on or near them.

On that note, Mr. Speaker, I move second reading of Bill 5 and urge my colleagues on both sides of the House to support this important legislation. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the Minister of Transportation has moved second reading of Bill 5, Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022. Are there others wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen.

Member Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to applaud the Minister of Transportation for this particular bill. I think that it's a long time coming. It's a perfect example of why we actually need government legislation and regulation when it comes to the safety of workers in our province. It goes without saying that the Alberta NDP, we've always been on the side of supporting workers and making sure that they're safe not only on the job site but when they're commuting to and from work and around the province, especially with their families. And one could honestly say that this piece of legislation is a no-brainer, right?

You know, there are people who don't believe that there should be government intervention in matters when it comes to safety. Some people don't understand that: okay; well, in order to change cultural or even sometimes human behaviour, government can implement a piece of legislation or introduce a regulation that would actually help people to understand why something as simple as moving to the left and slowing down on the highway in order to protect a tow truck driver or a construction worker that's doing their duty on the side of the road is actually essential and life-saving.

I'm glad to see that the Minister of Transportation has brought this in. When I was the critic for Transportation, I had the opportunity to meet with several truck drivers, and this was a really important issue. As the minister highlighted, unfortunately, yes, there were two fatalities, but a number of near misses and a number of accidents that occurred where people were injured, unfortunately, because of this. It was 13 serious incidents involving tow trucks and passing vehicles, according to the AMA. They reported this in December 2019. In that same report they communicated that it was actually 36 near misses.

Now, I remember that when I was meeting with the tow truck drivers, they were saying that – and it's not necessarily when visibility is not at its ultimate because of snow flurries and things like that. This is sometimes when visibility is perfectly within, one would deem, normal range. You know, a truck driver is doing their work on the side of the road. It has to do, again, Mr. Speaker, with the behaviour, the human behaviour, thinking: "Okay. Well, even though there's this person working on the side of the road, I'm just going to fire right past them. I'm not going to slow down."

A lot of the time, as we know, Mr. Speaker – and I'm sure you see it in your commute up to Edmonton. Along highway 2 I imagine is the highway that you take in order to get here. We see that people are actually going even greater than the speed limit. You know, when workers are working on the side of the road, tow truck drivers are doing their thing, they don't see a need to actually slow down. Tow truck drivers, I remember, communicated to me heart-wrenching stories of incidents where members of theirs, friends of theirs, were actually in accidents on the side of the road. Individuals were hit and actually just thrown, like – I don't know – tens or hundreds of metres into the ditch because of these accidents. What seems like a no-brainer, that someone would simply just slow down when they see someone on the side of the road: people, unfortunately, weren't doing it, and it was the cause of these types of accidents.

Many a tow truck driver communicated to me that there needed to be greater visibility for the tow trucks as they were working on the side of the road. They came together and they did a lot of advocacy, so I'm assuming that the Minister of Transportation actually did meet with tow truck drivers when coming together with this bill. That makes me very happy, that she consulted with tow truck drivers, took the time to listen to them and hear what their issues and their concerns were regarding this really important piece of legislation. Of course, I just want to say that I support this wholeheartedly. It's something that I believe is a long time coming, in fact. These are common-sense reforms to our traffic laws that will reduce confusion for drivers, who will now hear just one consistent message, and that is: slow down when passing folks on the side of the road.

I'm really eager to hear more about the education campaign that will be complementing this particular piece of legislation because I think that's really important. Now, I know that this is something that will be developed through the ministry, of course, with people, but I can't stress enough how important it is that this be communicated to the public in the most effective way. I'm sure that the minister, having consulted with tow truck drivers, with construction workers that do this kind of work, the number of stakeholders that she mentioned during the passing of Bill 5, as she just finished stating, will be consulting with these people in order to actually determine what would be the best way to educate the public when it comes to this new piece of legislation, that is bound not only to save lives but also to contribute to the safety of workers and of tow truck drivers here in the province of Alberta as we continue moving forward.

On that note, of course, this opens the Traffic Safety Act. And because I heard directly from truck drivers, my questions is: well, why aren't there more amendments that could potentially take place with the opening of this act? Although I applaud the minister for making this change that I believe will save a number of lives, there are also other issues that need to be highlighted here. One of them, of course, is that during the Coutts blockade we called upon the minister to exercise her authority under the act to revoke the operating licences of folks engaged in illegal activity. It was a good idea, one that we thought was feasible.

At estimates we heard that the minister did a legal analysis and that she believed that she needed more authority under this act. So here's an opportunity. The act could be amended to actually provide that authority to the minister, to this government to be able to deal with situations where individuals that, you know, although they're very passionate about their politics, are engaging in illegal activity within the province of Alberta, and of course that needs to be addressed.

This would be an opportunity for the minister to actually implement a change in regulation at this time by opening up the act. I would ask her to please consider this. It's something important. As we all know, the Alberta economy suffered greatly with the Coutts blockade. Businesses were suffering. It wasn't just businesses in southern Alberta and even the community as well. You know, like, millions of dollars were lost daily because of the Coutts blockade. Here's an opportunity for you, Minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, of course, to actually make a change when it comes to that.

It appears that the government is more worried about alienating members of their caucus that support the illegal blockaders than they are about ensuring that the government has the tools that they need to keep our borders and our supply chains open. Unfortunately, I'd have to say that this is a missed opportunity.

Again I ask the minister to consider this as an important opportunity for her to introduce other amendments that would give her the authority to actually make the changes that on this side of the House we think are also a no-brainer, very similar to simply moving to the left and slowing down a little bit while you're going down the highway in order to protect the lives of people. In this instance it's simply to protect our economy, to actually make sure that there are no negative impacts.

Honestly, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that I am the first one to stand up in this House and protect the right of every person to demonstrate, to participate in demonstrations, in protests. I think it's an important part of our democracy. I got up many times in this House to actually talk about those particular rights of people, their human right to freedom of speech. I know that members on that side of the House want to protect that right as well. But, at the same time, while individuals are engaging in free speech, they cannot be permitted to engage in illegal activity.

Now, as was pointed out by several when it came to the Coutts blockade – we talked about it – it's perfectly plausible, it's perfectly allowable that people would want to demonstrate. They simply could have just done it on the side of the road instead of actually blocking the highway entering into Alberta. This is not something that's over the top. It's not as if a simple change in legislation or regulation would take the rights of individuals away when it comes to being able to voice their political perspective on a particular issue or concern, and it's a shame that the minister isn't taking this opportunity, since she's opening the act, to actually make amendments to this particular aspect of this piece of legislation.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I think that it's important for individuals to be able to speak their minds both inside and outside of this House. I have to say that, you know, some days it's a little bit difficult being inside this House because, of course, not only do we not see eye to eye on particular priorities when it comes to Albertans; sometimes the communication style used when in debate actually creates more discord inside of the House. And I get it. I mean, we're all passionate, on both sides of the House, when it comes to many issues and concerns. But I think it's very important, though, that people, when they do get up to speak in the House, be permitted to do so and that they're not chastised or judged for bringing in the voice of Albertans when it comes to particular issues.

Now, members on the other side of the House say their piece, and, you know, we engage in debate. But again, when it comes to the Coutts blockade, Mr. Speaker, I believe that although people should be able to participate in demonstrations and protests, they still need to follow the law. I would hope that members on the other side of the House would agree with that. I'm sure that many do, but history and matters have demonstrated to us that some members support questionable perspectives not only when it comes to the Coutts blockade, I would argue, but on a number of things – right? – which is important for us especially, because we are examples.

Now, by no means, Mr. Speaker, do I think I'm any more important than any other Albertan. You know, although having been elected to this House, I don't think I'm any more privileged or more important. I mean, I understand I have privilege as part of the House, but I shouldn't take advantage of those privileges, is what I'm trying to get at. People look to us as examples in our community and across the province, so when the minister has an opportunity to actually have – and I would state that this is an opportunity to amend the bill to actually help Alberta's economy.

You know, members on the other side of the House like to think of themselves as the champions of the Alberta economy and that they're the best at implementing legislation, but as has been discussed in the House a number of times, Mr. Speaker, what we see is that they're good at making decisions that profit already-wealthy individuals. The rest of Albertans? Well, you know, especially at this difficult time they're finding it hard to make ends meet.

Actually, Mr. Speaker, I had a wonderful phone call with a member from my community just last night. This member of the community was actually talking about how her parents, grandparents, and even she were long-time conservatives, and that for the very first time she was not going to be voting Conservative or United Conservative because of the arrogance displayed by members not only of this government but the entire caucus. She was telling me how this next election can't come soon enough so that as Albertans we can replace a government that truly isn't listening to the people of Alberta.

It's unfortunate. It really is unfortunate because, of course, that's who we're here to serve, Mr. Speaker. When people are going through financial hardship, you'd think that the government would take the opportunity to actually make sure that Albertans have every opportunity or access to government programming. While in debate I heard one of the members on the other side of the House say, "Well, they're not working hard enough," which, to me, is a complete display of the type of arrogance that the community member that I was talking about previously . . .

An Hon. Member: I can't understand what you're saying with your mask on.

Member Loyola: How dare – how dare – the member . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Members are welcome to join in the debate through a variety of ways. Doing it from their seats with other members also in their seats is not one of the approved ways. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, however, is using the approved form of debate.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for that friendly reminder. I know that we need it from time to time in this House. Of course, as I was saying previously in debate, we're very passionate when it comes to our particular perspectives.

As I was saying, stating that Albertans aren't working hard enough when they are engaging with their political representatives and stating that the current economy is making it difficult for them to make ends meet – I can tell you how I've had a number of conversations with constituents, not only in my own riding but across the province, where it's becoming very hard to make it to the end of the month.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Bill 5. The hon. Member for Grande Prairie has risen.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise this afternoon and speak to Bill 5. I appreciate the minister and her work on this and her team, so I wanted to take this opportunity to thank them. I believe that this will be a bill that is truly in service to all Albertans, and I appreciate the comments from the members opposite, that they are also, as far as I can tell, in support of this bill. One of the things that I found interesting from the last speaker, though, was that he talked a little bit about not hearing and not listening to Albertans. You know, I'm speaking to Bill 5, and with respect to Bill 5 – the minister said it herself – we heard from over 15,000 Albertans, and 92 per cent of them agreed that this was a good change, so I would argue that that is definitely listening to Albertans and what they want, and I'm happy to support this bill as a result.

It's a fairly simple bill. I don't have a lot that I need to say about it. I think it's fairly straightforward for people. I do think it will simplify the traffic rules for drivers. I'm a proud parent of three young drivers, three young adults, and I think simplifying rules for young, new drivers is never a bad idea, to be quite frank, as a parent of those drivers on the road.

I wanted to take an opportunity to say hello to the folks at Ledcor. I had the opportunity a couple of months ago to visit some snowplow operators at Ledcor in my constituency of Grande Prairie, and I just wanted to say thank you to them for the work they do, through you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to them and thank you for the sacrifices they make to go out when the road conditions are terrible and the rest of us don't want to be on them and, if at all possible, choose not to be on them, but those guys have to go out and those women have to go out and clean the roads and keep them safe for us. This is one small way that we can do our part to keep them safe for them as well. I just wanted to say hello and thank you. Thank you for the great ride on the snowplow and for the education. I did pass the simulator, to my surprise, so that was exciting.

With respect to the bill, though, Mr. Speaker, really, the goal of this bill is simple, to improve safety on our roads and highways for roadside workers and enhance existing safety rules for first responders. I can't think of an Albertan, certainly not in my constituency, that would debate that. Road safety is something that's important to all of us. I know that when I spoke with those plow drivers, they talked a lot about safety. They talked a lot about when they have to stop on the side of the road when there's poor visibility, the lighting that's important, and the fact that other vehicles, especially on major highways – I travel highway 43 a lot back and forth from my constituency into the capital here, and I so appreciate not only the good road maintenance but the safe driving practices of those that I'm driving around, and I know it's critical to slow down. This bill is pretty simple, making it a requirement for us all to slow down as we pass and if possible, if there's an extra lane, to leave that space between the stopped worker and our car as it's passing.

I don't have a lot of other things I need to say. I'm happy to rise and support this bill. I want to again thank the ministry for their work on this. I know the members opposite touched on the education, and I think they had a really good point about that. I'm happy to see in the plan for the bill that there is a plan for robust education on the bill and the requirements before they take effect in 2023. I think that's important and fair for drivers, to understand what the changes are and how they'll be affected by them, what the potential fines would be, and why this legislative change is needed.

I don't have a lot else to say, Mr. Speaker. With that, I will cede my time. Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to say a couple of words in regard to Bill 5, Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022. Again, I concur with other members of the Legislature that this appears at second reading, my first reading, to be a good bill. You know, we all travel around the province from time to time or quite a lot, depending on where you live and where you go, and certainly we do see, I guess, a lack of consistency – right? – with dealing with workers and snowplows and tow trucks and different vehicles on the side of the road. We know that this is a potentially unsafe place to be. If you're on, let's say, highway 2, which does have four lanes, but people are travelling at quite high speeds, to perhaps protect professionals who are working – snowplow operators and tow truck operators and emergency vehicles and so forth, construction workers on the side of the road – so that we have more consistency in regard to the laws that do protect them, this bill seems to be a good one generally.

You know, I do have a couple of questions that the minister can perhaps provide clarity for in regard to the different sorts of roads, right? This bill, as far as I can tell, compels vehicles to slow down to 60 kilometres an hour when passing any of these vehicles or people in the different categories. I'm just curious to know if that is 60 kilometres an hour for the adjacent lane or for both lanes on a four-lane highway.

I mean, I think that is something that everyone would like to know more specifically because, of course, you know, we want to make sure that we're following the law, and we want to make sure that that's part of the education program for drivers when this new law comes into force, presumably sometime next year, 2023. Talking about the speed limit and reducing your speed in both lanes or one of the lanes: I think that needs a good clarification point for drivers.

You know, this education thing: we just need to perhaps expand on it a little bit. We all know that some people are slowing down and other people are not slowing down, and that lack of consistency is also unsafe – right? – especially when the road is slippery, like on Sunday on highway 2. If someone is slowing down and somebody else is not slowing down, then it really does endanger potentially multiple vehicles, piling up and slipping and sliding, along with the workers that are on the side of the road, too. I think a pretty robust education program needs to be with this bill, and it has to be quite emphatic and enforced straight away and consistently as well. I'm sure everyone can think of a time, or just even the last time you drove, when there were some people slowing down for activity on the side of the road and other people that weren't slowing down. That just creates an unsafe circumstance, for sure.

Another element to this – again, you know, opening up the Traffic Safety Act, I would suggest perhaps having more consistency around the lights that denote an emergency vehicle or a tow truck or a snowplow, say, for example, to have perhaps more consistency around those lights so that people can have an instant reaction when they see those things and to know: action, reaction. You see that certain coloured light, a certain resonance in that light, and you slow down straight away, right? Right now you have sort of a whole bunch of different colours and a bunch of different strengths of light. If that could be standardized somehow, I think that that would really help as well because, of course, when you're dealing with moving from 110 kilometres an hour down to 60, it's almost like it has to be fast enough so you don't even have to have a conscious thought about it; you just slow down.

You know, again, that's how the human brain works. If you see a consistent stimuli, then you can get a more consistent response, right? Certain colour, certain intensity of light and, boom, you know what to do straight away. That would be something that I would suggest in this amendment, since we're opening up the Traffic Safety Act in the first place, in regard to roadside safety.

I think that that probably – you can always learn from other jurisdictions as well, right? I mean, I know that B.C., Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Ontario have all put in legislation like this to cover emergency vehicles, so perhaps we could explore what they've done and what their experience has been in those other provinces so that, you know, we can learn from best practices and make our roads as safe as possible.

Again, in regard to the fine structure I just have a question about – certainly, the fine structure is in keeping with how fast somebody is going. I'm just curious to know for clarification. Can I get the minister to tell us more about: are there demerits involved with that as well? Of course, that's a good deterrent – right? – not just the money that comes from the fine but, you know, insurance issues down the road if you are receiving demerits for that kind of traffic infraction.

Yeah. Those are my first thoughts about this bill. I mean, I certainly think that I and our caucus can support it. We're always looking for ways to make sure we keep our roads safe. You know, we have, I think, still an unacceptable amount of crashes and injuries and fatalities in our province. Every weekend we hear about these things, especially on our roads, and it's incumbent upon this Chamber to ensure that we have maximum safety while travelling the roads and byways of our province.

Those are my comments on this bill, Bill 5. I certainly welcome the balance of the debate here over the next few days.

Thank you very much.

5:30

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise at this late afternoon hour to provide some initial thoughts at second reading of Bill 5, Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022, as brought forward by the Minister of Transportation, to provide some assurances to the minister and to Executive Council and to the Chamber of the people of Alberta that indeed, as has been discussed by my hon. colleagues for Edmonton-North West and Edmonton-Ellerslie, we do not have any concerns with this particular piece of legislation, concerns for the substance that is in the act. What we primarily concern ourselves with is what is not in the act.

Certainly, the basis for our support of this particular amendment act is that we support keeping workers safe, and we support keeping our highways safe. I spend an awful lot of time on highway 2 and highway 3 and various others, and I know that, you know, driving by car is statistically one of the most dangerous things that we do in the course of our lives. We should probably take it more seriously given the risk that we undertake every time that we get on the highways. Of course, that's even doubly so given the kind of weather conditions with which Alberta drivers grapple on a far too regular basis, as the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West points out; for example, on Sunday night, where things were quite treacherous between Red Deer and Edmonton.

I think there's no question that this is a common-sense reform to our traffic laws, and there's no question that safety for people stopped on the side of the highway has been a concern of the members of this House because it has quite frankly affected one of our own. We have seen the tragic passing of the Member for Calgary-Greenway at the time, the hon. Manmeet Bhullar, who in 2015 was stopped at the side of the road, and a collision occurred, and he, in fact, lost his life.

You know, I will never forget that day, Mr. Speaker, because both the Minister of Energy and I were slated to drive to Calgary on that very same road going the other direction. We were just discussing in the Speaker's lounge, just behind the chair, whether we were going to go or how we were going to get there or whether we were going to cancel our next day's activities because a blizzard had come in when we received that shocking news that Member Bhullar had been involved in a traffic collision while stopped at the side of the road. There's no question that the Minister of Transportation bringing forward this Traffic Safety Amendment Act is of central concern to many of us. Everyone deserves to be safe at work or on their way to work.

I do think that some of the clarification questions, for example, around the extent of the public education campaign, that the hon. Member for Grande Prairie has raised, the extent to which the Traffic Safety Amendment Act could either via legislation, ministerial order, or a simple matter of policy begin to work on some of the pieces the Member for Edmonton-North West flags with respect to the colour of lights and the required sort of signals for people to slow down – they are, you know, quite different between different tow truck companies or tow truck styles and snowplows, et cetera. I certainly wouldn't mind knowing a little bit more, perhaps at the committee stage, from the minister around the public education campaign piece. I mean, many Albertans are already used to slowing down, obviously, for law enforcement and others given that that came in – I think it was in 2005. It was some time ago.

Many of us already do at least try to get over and moderate the speed when there are tow trucks for the reasons that I identified, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, the members of this Chamber are not alone in knowing someone who has been involved in a collision on the side of the road. It's an extremely dangerous place to be. You know, some of those public education pieces, I think, would be really great for the members to have a bit more information on simply because our constituents are going to be asking, because it is a fairly common experience for those of us over 16 to drive down the road. These are conversations that are really important to people's daily lives.

There is no question that this is a missed opportunity to not clarify in the act some of the ministerial powers around a commercial or even a private driver's, any operator's licence revocation if vehicles are used for unlawful activities. Now, I was a little confused why it wasn't undertaken in the first instance given how these laws work and how some of the law enforcement powers, as soon as the operator of a vehicle is doing something unlawful – indeed, the one place where we don't have much in civil liberties is in the operation of a motor vehicle. Even the Supreme Court has ruled on this, that we are not subject to the same sorts of rules around unreasonable search and seizure, ability to stop, provide identification, all of these sorts of things. As soon as there's a vehicle involved, the legal rubric that surrounds us as individuals changes considerably.

Having said that, you know, the Official Opposition at the time in particular – I really did support using every possible tool, including an injunction and suspension of commercial vehicle licensing and/or taking actions on commercial vehicle insurance, as was done by the Ford government in Ontario, simply because it would have given law enforcement more indication of the provincial government's seriousness and the seriousness with which the province took the economic harms that were being visited upon the people of southern Alberta, agricultural producers, manufacturers, exporters, and others. Certainly, I was probably the first person putting up their hand, saying: yes, I will make haste to the Legislature, if need be, to amend this act immediately.

There is no question that now, even when we find ourselves here some weeks later, the Official Opposition would facilitate a hasty and uneventful addition of this ministerial power to the act, and there is no reason at all why Parliamentary Counsel could not be expeditiously put to work on an amendment. We could all work together for the betterment of this province and ensure that law enforcement has every tool that they need should this sort of practice be repeated once again. I don't think that this is the last time that we will see these sorts of tactics, these sorts of disruptive tactics using heavy equipment, in order to essentially hold an economy hostage and interfere with the movement of people and goods across an international border crossing. There's no question that we encourage the minister to do so, and we would be happy to work with whomever in this Chamber would like to work with us on this matter.

Now, in terms of the consultations I commend the minister. You know, government surveys can often shed some degree of light on where the people of Alberta are at, and 92 per cent is, of course, a clear indication of where Albertans are at on this. It's certainly better than 50 per cent plus one; I'll say that right now. But I think that the government could provide, at the committee stage potentially, some analysis or assessment on collision prevention because according to the Alberta Motor Association there have been 36 near misses and 13 serious incidents involving tow trucks in Alberta. Some overall assessment around traffic safety, I think, would be great because it might actually shed some light for the folks in this House on other amendments to the Traffic Safety Act that we could make and that we could work together on, as we are doing in the instance of this piece of legislation, incomplete as these amendments are.

I do think that some interjurisdictional analysis, if the minister would like to share it with us, again, at the committee stage, such as in Ontario and British Columbia, where these sorts of amendments have been made, would be helpful both for the public to understand where this train may be going, to mix metaphors a little bit, and where we can actually make our roads safer in a common-sense way that ensures the free flow of people and goods up and down our highways.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my comments on this bill except to say this. There is no question that we can provide our concurrence with this piece of legislation fairly quickly. It seems to me that it is a rare opportunity for us to do so in a time that is extremely polarized. The elements that are not contained within this legislation are further evidence of that polarization, that we couldn't even do that simple thing to ensure the free movement of people and goods, to ensure the uninterrupted flow of commerce in southern Alberta and elsewhere. That is, I think, a lamentable commentary on the state of political life and, in particular, on what holds us together in terms of the guardrails of the rule of law in a liberal democracy. The fact that a very simple amendment couldn't be made for, ostensibly, reasons of political calculation, that we couldn't get it through caucus is a darn shame, Mr. Speaker. I hope to see it remedied at the committee stage.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and offer some of my thoughts on Bill 5, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022. Now, it's my understanding that this bill would require drivers to slow down where possible when passing roadside workers, including snowplows. First of all, as a resident of the city of Edmonton I have to ask: what exactly is a snowplow? [interjections] I see that we have bipartisan support for that sentiment here. I sincerely hope that the people at city hall hear our complaints because I spent the entire winter trying desperately to drive up and down the roads in this city and being unable to most of the time because apparently the city of Edmonton is a snowplow-free zone. It's unfortunate that the amendments to the Traffic Safety Act don't apply within the city of Edmonton. Maybe it's an issue of safety that we don't see any snowplows on the roads of Edmonton – I don't know – but certainly it is my sincere wish, as it is the majority of the residents of Edmonton, that we see these things called snowplows moving up and down the streets of our city more than once a winter.

In all seriousness, the issue of traffic safety is an incredibly important and personal one to me, Mr. Speaker. When considering the policy options that are available to the province of Alberta to make our highways safer, I'm reminded of my beloved aunt who was killed in a car accident in 2001 after taking her daughter to Augustana College in Camrose and making her way home to Hanna, Alberta. Unfortunately, the road conditions were not good. She was travelling with my grandmother at the time, who was driving. My grandmother made an error that cost my aunt her life and significantly injured herself, and she was never the same as a result of the physical and emotional injuries that she sustained in that accident.

You know, she was cut down in the prime of her life. She was in her mid-40s, and she worked really hard to raise her family. She ran a small farm with her husband, my uncle, and enjoyed that work tremendously, and it all came to an end too soon because of a highway vehicle collision. I think about her every time I get behind the wheel and drive up and down the highways of this province. I hope that I'm not the next victim of a highway collision, or I hope that I don't cause an accident and cause somebody else to be the victim of a highway collision, because I have experienced, personally, the loss of unsafe highway conditions.

You know, Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, it is not an uncommon situation. I have in front of me right now data from the government of Alberta, that was updated in February 2021, that showed that between the years 2014 and 2018 on average somewhere between 250 and 300 Albertans lost their lives driving up and down Alberta's highways. On top of that, the fatalities are, of course, the most extreme example, but tens of thousands of people every year suffer some nonfatal injury due to collisions on Alberta's highways. So it's absolutely appropriate that the government of Alberta do everything it can to make our highways safer for the people of this province, and I'm so pleased that the Minister of Transportation is making this amendment to the Traffic Safety Act to require drivers to slow down when they're passing workers on the highway, including snowplow and maintenance workers and other roadside workers. That is the proper and rational response when hundreds of people die every year from a preventable cause.

Let me just say, Mr. Speaker, that that's not the only thing that the government of Alberta has done throughout its history or that people in general have done throughout our history to make highways safer. We've implemented speed limits that are appropriate. We've changed the design of highways to make sure that they're wider, that the curves are the right design to be taken at the speed for which the road is designed. We've changed the design of vehicles to make sure that the glass doesn't shatter, that when vehicles come into contact with one another, the force of that collision isn't transmitted to the people in the vehicle. We require them to wear seat belts. We mandate the presence of airbags. We require them to turn their lights on when they drive at night. We've improved the kinds of lights, the kinds of headlights that vehicles have so that they're more visible, not just in the evening but also in the daytime. Those are changes that we've made in my lifetime that have had tangible results in improving the safety of people driving up and down Alberta's highways.

It's hard to remember, Mr. Speaker, but not all of those changes were without controversy. I remember quite clearly the passionate debate that was held when seat belts were required to be worn at all times when people were in a vehicle. My parents and grandparents said that no government was going to take away their freedom to die on the roads, and for a while they refused to wear seat belts. But after a couple of tickets that totalled a hundred bucks, they were happy to give up their freedom. In the end, most of them lived to a ripe old age because they didn't die in fatal vehicle collisions.

Similarly, I remember the debate that was held when jurisdictions passed requirements to turn the lights on on vehicles. There wasn't Facebook at the time but the equivalent of Facebook, right-wing radio, the Alberta Report. These kinds of jurisdictions made all kinds of conspiracy claims about the supposed lack of science behind lights improving visibility. Like, it shocks me to think that there were people who actually thought that cars were as visible with their lights off as they were with their lights on during the daytime. That was a matter of intense debate at the time. But, again, governments mandated that people drive with their lights on, and after people were hit with a few hundred-dollar tickets, everybody started to do it. In fact, it's not even an issue anymore. I don't think you can even buy a vehicle that doesn't have automatic daytime running lights anymore. Like, if I wanted to shut the lights off on my vehicle, I would have to go in and rewire it so that it didn't work.

My point is this, Mr. Speaker. As a society we've collectively decided that the number of people who were dying and being injured on highways was unacceptable, and we've moved heaven and earth to do everything in our power to protect people from dying from these preventable causes. I would very much appreciate it if this government took the same approach to managing COVID. I sincerely hope that the government realizes that the power to prevent people from dying and getting sick from COVID is also in their hands and that they can take measures to do that and that those measures may be controversial today, but by sticking to it for just a little while, they will be widely adopted as well.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote in favour of this legislation, and I encourage members of the government to go even further and do everything that they can to protect the people of Alberta from every public health issue that currently faces this province, traffic safety as well as COVID.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Second reading of Bill 5. Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise in the House to speak to Bill 5, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022. I have to say that, you know, you brought up a lot of memories, Member, when you talked about the previous laws that were controversial. I remember being a child with the seat belts and crossing the border into B.C. and it being a big crisis within our family vehicle of having to get us out of the back of the station wagon and putting all of the kids in a seat belt. As a child I had no idea what was going on, but I knew it upset my parents greatly that they required us in seat belts. Just a trip down memory lane.

When I look at this piece of legislation, I think that it's clearly a no-brainer when it comes to supporting worker safety. We have the ability as government to make decisions that can improve the lives of Albertans, and I think that this legislation does that. When we talk about safety of those working on the roadsides, I think it's really important to acknowledge that anybody that's going to work deserves the right to come home safely, and when it comes to those that are responding to emergencies in traffic, I think there's a lot more that can be done to support them.

I know that when I was doing my PTSD Awareness Day consultations across the province, I met with many workers that work in roadside assistance, and PTSD was quite prevalent in that community. They weren't necessarily the first responders on the scene, but they were responders that cleaned up the mess of a car accident. They were the individuals driving the tow trucks, those kinds of things, and there was significant trauma that was experienced by those individuals. I think that when we're looking at the importance of safety of those individuals, it can't just be about their physical safety. We need to broaden the conversation to include mental health.

While I think that this is easy to support and it clearly acknowledges that their safety is important – and I wholeheartedly agree – I would like to see this government take this same theory and apply it to mental health. When we watched this government roll back PTSD requirements for supports in the workplace, it was very, very concerning. I think that we have a government that acknowledges that worker safety is important, so we have this legislation, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022, that will create legislation that requires drivers to be safe around more than just emergency vehicles. I think that expanding those workers that it requires us to be safe around is so important, but I would encourage the government to apply that same theory to their mental health.

When we look at the impacts of a collision as a result of a roadside accident, the impact on those workers is huge. It's not just the fatalities that have an impact. It's the mental health of those workers that I think is so important, and it's not discussed. I would just really, really encourage that with this theory, this piece of legislation that creates a space for physical safety on the road, we need to talk about the trauma that can happen to these same individuals.

When I look at the legislation and I see that it's been expanded to include snowplows and trucks with lights, I think a question that I have is: does this legislation also expand the lanes? Right now my understanding is that if there is an emergency vehicle pulled over, it's only the direct lane that is responsible to reduce their speed. If you're on a two-lane or three-lane roadway, are all of the lanes impacted? Does this legislation address that? I know that that's something I've heard specifically from tow truck drivers, that it's nice to be able to have all traffic flowing at a reduced speed . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but time for debate this afternoon has elapsed, and pursuant to Standing Order 4 the House stands adjourned until this evening at 7:30.

[The Assembly adjourned at 6 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Tuesday, March 22, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading Bill 3 Special Days Act

The Speaker: I see the chief government whip has risen.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise on behalf of the Minister of Culture to move second reading of Bill 3, the Special Days Act.

We all know the importance of recognizing special anniversaries or occasions in our lives. They serve as opportunities to come together with ones that we love, celebrate the achievements we have made, or make new traditions that strengthen our families. The same is true for many special days, weeks, and months that Albertans recognize together. They unite people, and right now we need to find ways to find joy and work together, whether it's the anniversary date the first Ukrainians arrived in Alberta, which we celebrate on Ukrainian Canadian Heritage Day, or Month of the Artist, which celebrates creative work and artists in the province. Alberta's government has recognized these types of days through ongoing proclamations, one-time declarations, or through passing legislation. Proclamations, declarations, and acts have been used as ad hoc solutions depending on the significance of the date. This has caused confusion for Albertans and within the government as well.

Bill 3, the Special Days Act, proposes a simple, standardized way to establish dates in perpetuity. Ministers will be able to issue ministerial declarations through ministerial orders. All dates recognized this way will be tracked on a centralized web page. Dates that have been previously proclaimed or created through legislation will also be listed online. Not only will this help reduce confusion and duplicate requests; it will also help more Albertans learn about the cultures, causes, and histories behind each date. Dates that are only recognized once will be recognized through ministerial statements.

There are some requirements for dates to be officially designated by the government of Alberta. Dates must be submitted by groups, not individuals. They must also follow the guidelines that have always applied to these types of requests. The special days, weeks, months, or years must be directly connected to the province of Alberta. They must also be nonpartisan, not offensive, and adhere to the principles of the Alberta human rights code.

This legislation will help foster more cultural awareness, celebrate Alberta's diversity, and inspire people to take a stand on important issues. I hope that all members, on both sides of this House, will support this legislation.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members – sorry. Were you about to say . . .

Ms Issik: I was going to move to adjourn debate.

The Speaker: Perfect.

Hon. members, the hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women and chief government whip on behalf of the Minister of Culture has moved second reading of Bill 3, the Special Days Act, and has also moved that that debate be adjourned.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 7 Appropriation Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate: Mr. Toews]

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to speak to the Appropriation Act, 2022? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, I think this is my first opportunity to speak to the Appropriation Act, 2022, which I believe was tabled last night. It definitely is one of the overarching government bills as it relates to the budget, the no-help budget that's been presented in this Assembly.

I will say that I think when we all saw the fortunate increases – and it's complicated. Obviously, I'm very grateful as an Albertan that the resources we have have hit a new, very high price that appears to be sustaining for at least a bit. And, obviously, there are complicating emotional factors when we think about the people in Ukraine and the horrific situation there as they continue to fight to defend their land and their right to self-government, self-determination, because, of course, the global price of oil has been impacted by this horrific conflict.

The price of oil, of course, the oil here in the province of Alberta – we all own the natural resources that we benefit from here in the province of Alberta. That is something that every single one of us as residents of this province has a sense of ownership over and a right to ownership, not just a sense. We are the owners. We are the stewards of the riches that we have here in the province of Alberta. And we, of course, have a responsibility to ensure that we harness those resources in a sustainable way that brings full benefit and maximum economic opportunities to the people of Alberta, including the benefits that are created through good, full-time jobs, not just in the extraction but also in opportunities where we do upgrade here locally and, of course, all of the additional products that can be created from waste products that are related to those natural resources as well.

We are here today considering a budget that is impacted by global factors significantly when it comes to the revenue side. I am grateful that we have additional revenue in this province for the first time in a number of years because of the extremely successful price in oil right now that we are experiencing. When I think back on other governments and having lived in Alberta my whole life – I did spend three summers in Toronto, but the remainder of my life has been right here in Alberta. When I think about all of the lessons that we've learned or hopefully have learned about – you probably all remember the bumper stickers, at least those of you who have lived here for more than a few years, the bumper stickers about, you know: please, God, give us another boom; we promise not to waste it this time.

An Hon. Member: That's not quite the words.

Ms Hoffman: Yeah. Maybe that's the G-rated version, but that's how I paraphrase it. Happy to be corrected on the record later by my colleagues.

When I think about the opportunities that I think that bumper sticker was speaking to, one of the biggest ones was an opportunity to invest in a diversified economy. Certainly, we made a number of inroads in a number of sectors, particularly tech sectors, during the four years that we had to govern in this province. The current government, today's government, has an opportunity to extend those. Unfortunately, they cancelled a number of the different programs that we had in place to support economic diversification, but the good news is that some of them are coming back. Some of them are even coming back through the budget that we're here considering tonight.

I really wish that we had more of a focus on taking this opportunity we have right now through this boom and investing that and making sure that we have strong jobs in the oil and gas sector; strong jobs in the offshoots from that, including hydrogen; strong jobs in the manufacturing sector; strong jobs in tech and AI; strong jobs in the public service; strong jobs in health care and education; strong jobs in renewables; and, of course, the list goes on. I want every kid who goes to school in Alberta to see themselves living their full lives here, to see themselves as creating a long-term, permanent path for them and their families to be successful here at home. No matter what their personal interests are, their political ideation, their values are, I want them to see themselves here for the long term.

Far too many young people have been leaving Alberta for a number of reasons, I am sure. One that many talk to me about, especially recently, in the last year or so, is the cost of a postsecondary education in this province. It has gone from being one of the most affordable places, because we brought in a cap on tuition and we funded postsecondary for population growth and inflation when we were in government to make sure that we could keep those tuition rates more affordable – we were one of the most affordable in the country. That is no longer the case here in Alberta as tuition has continued to be jacked up over and over and over again by the current government.

Another one is employment opportunities. There are many Albertans who don't see themselves feeling success and finding success here in the long term. We saw recently a scientifically validated report, from a survey of teachers in the province of Alberta, that shows about a third of Alberta teachers, a third – if you think about your child's school, a third of the teachers in that school – planning on either not teaching next year or moving to another province to teach next year. If we're to think back just one or two budget cycles, to earlier in the pandemic, when we talked about the need to provide more supports to students here in the province of Alberta, when we talked about the benefits of reducing class size, the government would say: well, where can we possibly find all these teachers to hire in order to reduce class sizes? But they sure don't seem to have a problem right now with chasing teachers out of the province or out of the profession. That should be a massive reality check for every Albertan who thinks, "Well, it's bad, but it's not that bad," because it is already that bad, and it is only going to keep getting worse if we continue to look to the current government to guide public education in this province.

The truth is that the UCP can't be trusted with public education. They can't be trusted to work in partnership with teachers. One of the first things they did when they came in – and this, of course, relates to Bill 7, Appropriation Act, 2022, Mr. Speaker, because it's about where the government chooses to put its money, and where you put your money reflects what your values are as well, of course. One of the first things they did was tear up the memorandum of understanding, the agreement that was reached between the Education minister of the day and the teachers of the province when it comes to creating the curriculum that guides the education system, that puts the requirements in for instruction, and the legal obligations that teachers have to share and instill and to support students in their learning, in reaching curricular outcomes.

When they tore that up, what they said to teachers at that moment and what continues to be the case through action is that this isn't a partnership. There are employers and employees, and the government thought that the government knew better and that teachers would not be partners in creating the bones of the curriculum to ensure that all students had an opportunity to be successful.

That maybe wasn't a budget issue, but then shortly thereafter the government decided that teachers' pensions were going to be the next thing on the chopping block. I don't know what the obsession is that specifically this Premier and a number of Conservative governments have with attacking public-sector pensions, but it is so disrespectful to people who have rightfully negotiated and planned and invested and deferred their payment – those are their wages being put into a retirement savings plan to benefit those who retire from the profession.

They were taken to court, because that's what teachers had to do, and the government lost, so that's on pause for now, thank goodness, but again we see an intention to tear up an agreement, a long-standing agreement between teachers and their employer, the province, because the government feels that they know best. The courts had to say: "No, you don't. You don't get to do that."

That's where we're at in those couple of decisions. Then, of course, we see in this budget in black and white – and the minister will only talk about one year. They won't talk about actually looking back the three years this government has been already in a leadership position in this province, but in the tables as part of the fiscal plan there are tabs and numbers for certificated and noncertificated staff. If you look at the adjustments that the government made to the certificated staff number for teachers – that means teachers in the province of Alberta – they show that it isn't going down this year, but what they did is that they put an adjustment to show that it went down significantly last year, and they just didn't tell anybody about it in the budget. Then if you go to the year before, you see that it went down that year, too.

So what you actually look at when you look back three years is that the difference, between when the NDP was in government and today with the UCP in government, is about a thousand teachers fewer working in Alberta classrooms. That's in the budget. That's the Appropriation Act we're being asked to ratify in this place.

So the government continues to say, "Oh, no, no; teachers are great," but all of their actions show that they are cutting teachers, they are tearing up agreements around involving them and making decisions about the curriculum, they are going after their pensions and lost in court, so thank goodness for that, but why should teachers have to take the government to court to be able to defend their own earnings that they're deferring for their retirement? Well, it's because clearly this current government, today's government, can't be trusted with education, and they can't be trusted to work with educators.

Those are a couple of the points I want to make as the Appropriation Act relates to education on the operational side. There are other significant issues on operations. Actually, I will touch on a few others. Insurance, as I'm sure all members of this place have heard from their constituents and their stakeholders – I'm sure school boards have reached out to many of the MLAs in this place; many have reached out to me – has gone up and up and up under the UCP. For school divisions that own a number of school buildings, sometimes a few dozen, sometimes more than 200, having your insurance on all of those assets go up cuts into the amount of money that is available to support student learning because you have to pay your insurance. You can't operate without having insurance.

By failing to actually properly regulate the insurance industry and provide stability for schools and for students, the government is taking money out of classrooms because that money needs to be spent on insurance for buildings or insurance for school buses, fuel for school buses. There's a variety of different systems here in Alberta. I know the minister of children likes to talk about how unique Alberta is in the child care sector because we have public, nonprofit, and private, and it's essentially the same – it is absolutely the same – in transportation for schools as well. We have some school authorities that run their own transportation system. When their fuel costs and their insurance costs and their staffing costs go up, they see that and eat that immediately in terms of their budget.

Then we have some that work through outside contractors. I will tell you that there are some contractors who are losing money every day right now because they signed an agreement one, two, or three years ago with the school authority to provide transportation services for that school, and then their costs have gone up significantly because the government has lifted caps on insurance, and they've also seen increased costs with their insurance and with their fuel. There are a number of contractors who are losing money right now and are at the point where they either have to decide to take their buses off the road or go back to the school authority to plead for a top-up so that they can afford to keep operating, or they're going to have to continue to eat significant losses. Then, of course, they will have to negotiate them into the next year. What kind of government thinks it's okay to have the transportation of children from their home to their school, a right to education, a right that I hope all members of this place share, at risk because the government continues to fail to properly fund for transportation?

Now, the minister will say: we launched a task force. That's true; there was a task force to review student transportation. It submitted its report well over a year ago to the minister, and the minister will probably say: see, there was an increase to the transportation budget. There was. It's, in transportation, about the equivalent of population growth and inflation if inflation were only population growth and inflation, but what it actually is, as we've rightfully pointed out in this place over and over again: increased cost of fuel far exceeds the cost of inflation; increased cost of insurance far exceeds the cost of inflation. This 4 per cent increase is far from sufficient to cover the massive cost that right now contractors and school boards are eating. When I say, "eating," that means they're taking money again out of the classroom to pay for those additional costs to get kids to and from school.

When the minister says, "Well, there can't possibly be fewer teachers because we gave zeros last year," well, zeros when you're dealing with an increased population and increased inflationary costs as well as, let's absolutely mention, the increased educational needs that students are facing everywhere in this province – the last few years have been very difficult for Alberta families, and instead of stepping up and saying, "You know what? You're a mom with a disabled child; we're going to make sure that your child gets as much support and nurturing right now as possible," one of the first things the government did during COVID was fire more than 20,000 educational assistants who were dedicated to work with those students. The member is right to be outraged and disappointed in the actions of the government. The member is right to be upset and outraged. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The Deputy Government House Leader will come to order. I've made a lot of comments about having conversations with other members who are also seated in the

Ms Hoffman: One of the first things that happened, Mr. Speaker, was that the government chose to lay off more than 20,000 educational workers, and that included bus drivers. Just a few days earlier, when we were asking about school nutrition programs and hungry children who weren't going to be able to be fed at school, the minister decided to talk about bus drivers in southern Alberta who were delivering food hampers to families in need, what a great thing that those bus drivers were doing. They also got their pink slips. They got laid off. Educational assistants who are dedicated to work with disabled children got laid off.

Oh, and all of this at the same time the government has cut the supports for PUF, which is specific program unit funding dedicated to three-, four-, and five-year-olds – or at least it was three-, four-, and five-year-olds – who have measurable delays. All of the research shows that if you invest that money in the early years – and I am sure that the Minister of Children's Services is well aware that investment in the early years pays significant dividends and that particularly if you catch kids up on those areas of deficit when they're the preschool ages – three, four, and five – and get them ready for an even start in grade 1, their educational attainment tracks much more consistently with students who were assessed at three years old as having no delays.

Part of the rush now that the government gave through the budget process was: "Well, we don't have as many supports when they turn six, so that's not fair to the kid that turns six, that when they were five, they had more supports. Therefore, we'll get rid of those supports a year earlier. Therefore, we'll take the supports away when they turn five instead of taking them away when they turn six." Totally counter to what all of the research shows. Totally counter to all of the lived experience that those kids have been through.

Also, I want to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that we've been living through the pandemic chaos through this current government continuing to have children and their families and the staff who work with them have to react last minute to closures, being shifted online, being sent back in person. There are kids who are three, four, and now five who haven't had the level of PUF intervention that they should be entitled to, that the research shows will make a huge difference to their learning outcomes, their earning potential, their ability to contribute back to the broader economy. They have been deprived because of the chaos caused under the current government's leadership when it comes to schools. They were deprived of full supports for the year that they were three. They were deprived of full supports for the year that they were four because of the response to COVID, and now that they're five, they don't get the funding that they were once entitled to. That is something that is shameful.

Again, I started the conversation by talking about how fortunate we are that we have additional revenue in this budget, significantly increased revenue because of the price of natural resources, particularly oil and gas, and how those resources belong to every single Albertan. The fact that here we have three-, four-, and five-year-olds continuing to make massive sacrifices, sacrifices to their self-esteem, to their ability to be successful in school, to their ability to be successful in terms of their earning potential, their ability to go on to postsecondary and the world of work as equal partners in the world of work and the fact that the government now, with all of this additional revenue, refuses to go back on some of the most cruel cuts they've made to vulnerable children, I think, is – I was going to say embarrassing – shameful, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Bill 7, the Appropriation Act, 2022, is before the Assembly at second reading. Are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to address this for the first time in second reading and to my colleague the Education critic, who spent a great deal of time talking about her disappointment with regard to the appropriation of monies or the lack of monies going into the Education expense and capital investment lines. This piece of legislation, of course, that appropriates funds for Budget 2022: we have it before us, and that codifies the government's agenda. I would just like to go through some of the difficulties, the disagreements that I have with various ministries and their appropriations, starting on page 4.

The first one – and it hasn't been talked about a great deal yet – is Advanced Education. Of course, postsecondary education is critical for our future leaders, and without it we as a province don't really get the best out of the young minds that are growing up in this province and aren't able to attract more people for postsecondary education if we don't have quality educational institutions. What I'm disappointed in, of course, in this $2.5 billion for expense and the low amount of capital investment and then the financial transactions, which is the on-lending to institutions through the Finance department, is – well, on the on-lending piece now those institutions are going to be paying half a per cent to .75 per cent on top of what the government of Alberta is able to get, bonds or being able to attract money into Alberta. That's an additional cost, and it never was there before, Mr. Speaker. This government has decided to charge for the on-lending of monies to both advanced education institutions as well as municipalities as well as health authorities as well as airport authorities. That's a cost that will make life more expensive, and it already is getting quite expensive.

Back to advanced education. Of course, we know that tuitions are going up. We've seen some incredible raises to the actual cost of education. Some of those are more than 50 per cent of what they were last year. That is a problem when you look at people going through a four- or six- or eight-year program and getting out of that program with tens and tens of thousands of dollars in debt. As well, now they'll have more of that. We put a great deal of time and energy as a government into capping tuition fees, and students appreciated that. Universities appreciated the fact that they could be competitive, that they weren't at the top of the pack. Now, very much so, they're getting to be in some courses priced out of the market for attracting students.

The next one I want to talk about briefly. I'll skip over Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development for a second and go to Children's Services. Just over $2 billion in expenses and some smaller amount in capital investments. The things that aren't in this that disappoint me are – well, it is in there, but it was far too long in taking place, and that's the child care agreement. We know that it took several months of delay before that was brought into this province for parents. It's still at a point where parents were having to pay pretty high amounts for their child care, their daycare for their young ones. This government seemed to be bickering back and forth with the federal government instead of doing what other provinces did, signed on and took part. [interjection] No, Thank you. No. Thank you. Instead of what other provinces did: quickly signed on to that program and got those monies to parents. That is unfortunate that that's taken place.

Truth and reconciliation is another area that hasn't been given enough time and attention in this file. The Indigenous youth who are part of the care of the province of Alberta need additional supports, and unfortunately we're not seeing that in this budget to the extent that it needs to be for Children's Services.

The next one is Community and Social Services. There's an expense line of about $4 billion. You know, my colleagues on this side were very proud of the fact that we indexed income support programs and made that something to be really, really proud of in this province. Other provinces are doing that now, but we were one of the first ones to get that done and to backdate financial supports to people on income support programs that would reflect the indexing of each year. The fact that it was taken away and that it is only kind of mused about by this government is a total disappointment to me.

There's FCSS under this file as well, I believe, Mr. Speaker. We were the government that brought that up to $100 million back in I think 2016, perhaps, well, probably 2016. We increased it from $77 million, that was set in place by the previous PC government for a long, long time. I was going to say dog's years, but it was a long time, and it hadn't improved. FCSS dollars are one of the best investments this government can make in communities through nonprofits and charities, because there's no profit motive, of course, taken off that $100 million to the people who are managing that money. It's leveraged up in the community by at least 20 per cent, and many municipalities or counties put far more than that in because they believe in the power of their volunteers. They believe in the opportunity to address the preventative social services needs of their communities, and the fact that this budget line under Community and Social Services has not taken the opportunity to increase this particular budget line of FCSS is another failure of this government.

Ms Hoffman: Can I intervene?

Member Ceci: Sure.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the Member for Calgary-Buffalo, for the opportunity to intervene. When the member was talking about FCSS, I was reflecting on the excellent work that Meals on Wheels provides. Most recently I had the opportunity to thank the executive director here in Edmonton, Liz Tondou, who is retiring after 20 years in the role of executive director for Meals on Wheels, something that has seen a significant increase, particularly during the last two years, about a 40 per cent increase to the demand that they have to feed, primarily seniors, who are stuck at home and trying to be as safe as possible.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Member for Calgary-Buffalo, I wonder if he could talk about that their only funding comes from FCSS and about the importance of FCSS as it relates to feeding hungry seniors or others throughout the community. I think that the services they provide are fundamental to keeping people safe during, especially, the last few years but moving forward as well. I would welcome an opportunity to hear more about that from the member.

Member Ceci: Yeah. Thank you for the intervention.

Of course, operational funding is what they might use their FCSS dollars for, to pay for their staff. They get a lot of donations, probably of foodstuffs, and FCSS is the grease that makes many of these community organizations work on a regular basis. Brown bagging for kids was mentioned by someone in the House either today or yesterday, and of course for that, providing lunches for kids in schools, FCSS is very helpful because it provides a small stipend for volunteers, to support volunteers, or even for staff so that they're not totally taking out of their pockets all the time.

I just want to flip over and talk about Culture and Status of Women for a second. CFEP, I believe, is under Culture and Status of Women, and I did see where it was suspended for a couple of years here, and now I think it's coming back under this budget. That's a good thing, but the fact that it's probably coming back at the same amount of money as it was two years ago, when it was cut, really leaves those organizations and the communities that depend on CFEP for ongoing support dollars out in the cold. Many have struggled, many have closed, and the fact that CFEP dollars come in at the same amount – again, it's one of the best kinds of investment you can make because it's leveraged up in the community.

My colleague the critic for Education talked a great deal about the challenges, the difficulties, the problems with the Education budget that's before us: $5 billion in the expense line and about half a million in capital investment and then on-lending. Frankly, there are too few schools started in this province. There needs to be more investment in K to 12 schools, and we're hearing that. I know that there are many advocates in the Calgary area public system that are looking for schools on the west side of town, and the fact that this budget leaves that part of the city out in the cold again is a tragedy.

As my colleague was saying, there are too few educational supports in schools, and the fact that we're not seeing more money put in the expense line so that school boards can do that hiring is an oversight of major proportions. The educational assistants, the teachers, the supports for young people in schools are not there in this budget, haven't been there under the support of this government. It's another problem that needs to get rectified in subsequent budgets and may not get rectified until a subsequent government is in place.

The war room, under Energy, is the next one. I'm looking at that, and I know that the war room costs of $30 million a year, or $82,000 a day, could be redeployed and hire a great number of educational assistants. I think $82,000 would probably cover salary and benefits for one educational assistant in one school board location somewhere in the province. The fact that we're wasting 365 educational assistants every year because the war room is still there is a tragedy, in my view.

The Environment and Parks expense line is just over half a billion dollars. The fact that some of those – sorry. I'll just back up. In the Environment and Parks area there are a couple of areas that, really, are unfortunate that they're in this budget. One of them is the Kananaskis pass fee, that is being collected from all users in Kananaskis – or from the users that pay the fee in Kananaskis; I guess that is a better way to say it. The fact that Peter Lougheed set that park up for all Albertans and now there is a fee to access that park is a disappointment not only to me but to lots of Albertans who are not happy with that. The fact that more isn't done to regulate OHVs under this Environment and Parks budget is also an oversight. That seems to be a preference for OHV users and the total opposite for people who have no impact on the environment, which is hikers and campers, well, hikers, for sure, in Kananaskis.

Going on to Health, we see that there's a major expense line there, of course. It's our biggest budget line, at over $22 billion. The difficulties that I have with the Health budget are the fact that EMS – in listening to people at both RMA and AM in the previous two weeks, they were talking regularly and in an unsatisfied way about EMS in their communities and the fact that they see that system as broken. I'll have more to say later.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the Appropriation Act, Bill 7, is for debate, and I see the hon. Minister of Children's Services has risen.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I know the member opposite wasn't interested in taking an intervention, but I do have some points of clarification that I would like to make. I do want to talk a little bit about this budget and the importance I think it has for Alberta families, families like mine. It's part of the reason why I chose to run in the first place. You know you're a fiscal conservative when you tear up during a budget speech when the Finance minister says that we've balanced the budget for the first time in eight years and only the second time in 14. Obviously, the members opposite have a hard time understanding what that is all about. Our approach was not: borrow, tax, spend. It was to bring down our spending in line with other comparable provinces while still maintaining our investments to support those most vulnerable.

Again, Mr. Speaker, it's also about growing the economy. It's positive that we're seeing more investment every day, more jobs every day, again, quite the opposite of the record of the members opposite. I'm happy to remind them: 180,000 jobs lost, chased, in fact, out of this province during those four years. Yet we are seeing 130,000 jobs created last year, in a pandemic, and thousands and thousands of jobs already, a number of thousands of jobs, this year alone.

I also want to talk a little bit about Children's Services. Our budget was obviously increased greatly, partially because of the agreement that we signed with the federal government to support early learning and child care. I do want to talk about that a little bit because, Mr. Speaker, I heard the member opposite say: "You know, they should have signed faster. They took too long. They fought too hard." Why is that a confusing concept? It's because fighting for Albertans means listening to them and pushing back when Ottawa tries to impose their ideology on Albertans. I know that's a tough one for the members opposite.

I mean, today we saw again, obviously, the NDP-Liberal alliance in Ottawa and the commitment to support continued growth in nonprofit and public spaces, Mr. Speaker. What is one of the things we fought for in that early learning and child care deal? It was to support private operators, private operators that are largely female entrepreneurs in every single corner of this province, women oftentimes who stepped up and said: "With the economy growing, with the jobs boom, I'm going to help out my neighbours. I'm going to start a child care centre." We believe in that type of entrepreneurial spirit. In fact, I truly believe that that is what grew Alberta.

I am curious to know. What I was hoping to ask the member opposite is that given that private operators were completely left out of their pilot program, given that we heard from a number of operators who said, "Under the NDP's plan we would have to change ourselves into nonprofits" – we value their contributions. We value the spaces they create, the innovation they bring, the high-quality child care that they offer Alberta families, and we know that they are needed. In fact, we got the federal government to agree to that in our plan. I believe the wording was something like: we will continue to rely on the creativity and innovation of the private sector to continue to step up and meet the needs of Alberta parents.

We're going to do that, but, you know, obviously, what we hear from the members opposite: sign faster. Just like they did, right? "Sign on the dotted line. Don't listen to Albertans. Sell out to Justin Trudeau." Sure, Mr. Speaker. We know what they did. We know their record. That's certainly not something we're interested in. I was really hoping to be able to ask the member opposite if that's, in fact, what they support, selling out to Justin Trudeau.

I think that now we're at the Notley-Singh-Trudeau alliance. Is that where we are?

An Hon. Member: You can't say names.

Ms Schulz: Oh, sorry. Mr. Speaker, I apologize, and I withdraw. I apologize and withdraw.

But, you know, we do have this alliance that we see, obviously, the NDP-Trudeau alliance, alive and well.

One of the things that we are absolutely not going to take advice from the members opposite on is, you know, how best to represent those views of Albertans. We will fight for Albertans. We will never apologize for that, Mr. Speaker. We take their feedback, and we use it to develop the programs that we're going to implement. I think that that's what we see in here.

I also wanted to talk a little bit – and, obviously, this deal is good news for Alberta parents. The feedback we have been hearing, Mr. Speaker, is so positive. Why? Because instead of focusing on ideology, we thought: who are we here to represent? Ultimately, for me, that is hard-working parents right across this province of Alberta. We put them first.

We were not one of the first provinces to sign that agreement with the federal government. No; that is true. We took the time to fight, to get a fair deal, a deal that worked for Alberta parents. But in rolling out those dollars, we were, in fact, one of the first two provinces to roll affordability dollars out to parents. Why? Because we put parents first. Ahead of ideology, ahead of any agenda, we put parents first, because we want them to be able to take advantage of postsecondary opportunities, training, retraining, reskilling so that they can take part in this new economy. We know we have labour shortages that we're about to face, and we want parents to be able to access postsecondary or to just jump right in and take advantage of the thousands of jobs that we're seeing created here every day with the amazing investment we're seeing in Alberta.

Now, child care is obviously something that matters a lot to me as a working parent of two young kids, but I also want to talk a little bit about child intervention. I do think, Mr. Speaker, it is rich to hear the members opposite, or that member, specifically, address the child intervention budget. I do believe that at the time that the members opposite were removed from this side of the House to their new seats on that side of the House, that member opposite was, in fact, the Finance minister, the Finance minister who, even after an all-party panel on child intervention, left child intervention underfunded. You know what they said? "Okay. Great. We're headed into an election. Well, we don't need to really worry about that, so let's leave it to chance." That is irresponsible. It's dangerous.

When we came into these seats, it's something that we take very seriously. It's something that my colleagues on this side of the House talked a lot about, the importance of supporting the most vulnerable children and families in this province. So not only did we fund their encumbrance, all those expenses that they didn't budget for, they didn't invest in – we did that – then we budgeted for that in each and every year after that. I know that sometimes it's hard to remember what happened a few years back, but given that the member opposite was, in fact, the Finance minister, I did want to remind him of his record in that area.

Mr. Speaker, once again, this is an area that I am really passionate about. This budget is very good news, not only for working parents but for vulnerable Albertans. We also maintained our investments in prevention and early intervention services. Instead of just continuing to fund things that had been funded because they've always been funded that way, we redesigned our network of family resource networks. It was new. It started in April 2020. None of us anticipated a pandemic when we undertook transformational change, but we continued to fund $63 million to support this really purpose-built network of community organizations that offer a wide range of support services for families and for kids right across this province.

Just as we committed to doing when we made these changes – I know, obviously, the members opposite made all sorts of accusations about what that was going to look like, but ultimately it was what people were asking for. It's what families were asking for. It was what our community partners offering these services – they were asking for this, so we said: look, we're going to do this. And once again, as opposed to government knows best, we made sure we listened to those community partners. We designed this program with them in mind, and then we saved some money, saying: "Hey, you know what? Sometimes when governments roll out a new program there are things that we miss or areas that were underrepresented or gaps that we see in the system, and it's our responsibility to step up and address those gaps." And we're happy to do that.

These are all things that are funded in this budget, Budget 2022, a budget that is balanced, Mr. Speaker, that brings our spending in line with other provinces and continues to drive economic growth and also invests in those most vulnerable in our province. I'm happy to correct the record on those issues, and I would be very happy at some point if we could get answers from the members opposite on some of those issues.

The Speaker: I'm just going to go to the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View as we try to go back and forth, but that will be followed by the Member for Calgary-East.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm thrilled to rise and speak today to Bill 7, which is the budget, because, well, I actually think the budget is probably one of the single most important things we do in this place.

It's interesting. I was reminded recently by social media that it was almost exactly seven years ago that I was nominated to run as a candidate for the NDP. That, of course, takes me back to the reasons that I wanted to run in the first place. Those are primarily issues which are extremely well represented in this budget. One of them is to combat the myth of trickle-down economics, that was pervasive under previous governments, under this current government. It's extremely problematic, and I think there's a lot of evidence against it, so I think it's very much worth discussing.

Another was early intervention. Early intervention saves money, and the way that Conservative parties generally balance budgets is by cutting things like early intervention.

Another, of course, was to combat bad arguments. You know, Mr. Speaker, this is an ideal moment to rise because that argument that went before me was among the worst I have ever heard: all rhetoric, zero argument, no facts, no evidence, bluster over substance. It was an argument that is, well, the perfect example of exactly what I got into government to fight against, people who say a lot of words with no substance behind them and no facts to support them.

I am thrilled to rise at this moment and be able to defend all of those values. Right now we're dealing with the Appropriation Act, 2022. That's the budget, this government's no-help budget, which represents no help for families. This government in this budget has received a massive windfall. Massive. The price of oil is up, up, up, and that's good for Alberta, Mr. Speaker – don't get me wrong – but let's not pretend that it has anything to do with the members opposite that this budget is balanced.

In addition, we stand here in a time when Alberta families are struggling probably more than they have in 30 years, and this government has nothing to offer them, nothing at all, nothing to combat the costs that they themselves have driven up. So let's talk about those costs.

Property taxes. Now, the members opposite love to say: we don't control property taxes. Except, here's the thing. Municipalities receive funding through the government. I'll speak to the example I know best, which is to say police funding. This government has downloaded police costs and cut police funding on every municipality, so those municipalities have a choice. They can reduce services or they can raise taxes, and that is the choice that this government has forced onto them. So it is this government raising those property taxes and particularly in the instance, Mr. Speaker, of rural municipalities, where they have downloaded literally hundreds of millions of dollars. This government loves to crow about how they funded more police. They didn't fund a thing. They handed that bill to the municipalities of this province.

This government has also raised taxes on families, to the tune of $1 billion, Mr. Speaker. [interjection] It's true: $1 billion. There you go. And this is through what they used to refer to as sneaky, pernicious, all sorts of nasty adjectives, which is, of course, their tendency, as we saw with the member who spoke before me. They used to refer to it that way, and now it's the thing that they're doing. They called it sneaky, they called it pernicious, they called it a backdoor tax grab, and now it's the very thing that they're doing. They are raising those taxes on families.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, one of the things they are definitely eroding through inflation is the child tax benefit. Under the NDP government child poverty was cut in half. We cut child poverty in half, and that was largely through the child tax benefit. These folks are working to take that away, and it will reverse the trend, and that is a problem. It is a problem that everyone in this province should be concerned about.

They've also raised tuition, making it harder for average people to go to school to get the education that they need. They've increased interest on tuition, and this, Mr. Speaker, is a particularly interesting one. One of the oddities of public finance is that by raising the interest on student loans, they essentially made money appear, because that's how the accounting works. When they raised the interest on student loans, because it's projected forward through time, it essentially makes sort of more money appear in the budget. Now, obviously, that's standard accounting practice, that's fine, but it's just one more way this budget misrepresents to Albertans.

Another way worth discussing is education. This government will tell you they haven't cut education, but tens of thousands of new students have entered the school system, and they will enter a school system with a thousand fewer teachers. So that's tens of thousands more students, a thousand fewer teachers. That sounds like a cut to me. I mean, if each student gets fewer . . . [interjection] No, thanks. If each student gets less, then I think we wind up with a cut, and that is, to me, extremely problematic.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, we're seeing fewer teachers and fewer actual physical classrooms. So as all these students are entering the system, in Calgary, where I live, over the entire term of this government we get one public school and one Catholic school. That is not nearly enough to accommodate the number of students who are coming into the system. It's incredibly problematic, and when we cut public education, it impacts those who may come from a background that is less wealthy but deserve just as much of a chance.

That's why cuts to public education, like the ones under this government, bother me so much, because public education is an equalizer. It means that regardless of where you came from or how much money your parents had, you are given an equal chance to succeed. When we cut public education, then those students don't have the same chance to succeed, and, worse still, it essentially hides costs that will occur in the future.

There is an enormous amount of evidence. You can actually predict based on elementary school literacy rates your prison populations. There is an enormous amount of evidence demonstrating that investment in early child care, in early learning, in elementary school, in supporting students to have their learning needs met so that they have the opportunity to access that education will save more money in the justice system than it costs. What this government is doing is appearing to save money by taking that money from future generations, forcing those costs onto people 20 years from now. That is incredibly problematic.

[Mr. Reid in the chair]

In addition, we see a budget that offers virtually nothing in the way of help for families. I would be remiss if I did not mention this Premier's promise to provide a natural gas rebate to Albertans. A promise to provide a natural gas rebate. They introduced the program; it's fake. There isn't even a line item in the budget. It doesn't apply now, it doesn't apply until next winter, and it only applies if those rates go up 30 per cent from where they are now. Now families are struggling. Families are struggling with the rates now, but this government doesn't think it's a problem unless they go up 30 per cent more. That's no help. It's unlikely that this will ever apply to anyone.

Also on the get lasts: health care. At the beginning of the pandemic we saw this government take off on a war with doctors, and then there was a war with nurses. Now they're attacking other specialties: respiratory therapists, social workers, people who have helped take care of their fellow Albertans through this pandemic. This is incredibly problematic. All of this, it appears, is under the guise of wanting privatization, again, something which – there's rhetoric to say that it saves money; it never actually does. There are enormous amounts of evidence. In fact, of all the studies that have been performed on this, you can't find a single high-quality, methodologically correct study that indicates that adding a private tier improves health care unless the total investment, so the total amount invested in health care, increases. And then it's not the fact that there's a private tier; it's the increase in investment that changes it, which is – I mean, we already know that's the case. You put more money into health care, you get better health care. So that's not really a surprise. This is another incredibly problematic part of this budget.

Essentially, my complaint about this budget is that it creates a less equal society. It gives more to those who have more. It takes more from those who have less. It cuts public education and makes it harder for those who start with less to get ahead. It cuts public health care, creating an Americanized two-tier system, that we know is, well, generally damaging to everyone but particularly to those who don't come from a wealthy background. It also continues this government's sort of general trend to privilege general tax cuts that help existing companies over targeted programs that help start-ups in newer industries. That's problematic as well.

It's also worth mentioning – I mean, there are many things, many things in this budget, but it's always worth mentioning the war room, which continues to be a nontransparent waste of money. We recently discovered it's not subject to FOIP, which, of course, will come as no surprise to the members opposite because it was always designed to hide money from the public. It was always designed to take the public's money and send it somewhere where there was no oversight, where the government can spend it without anybody watching what they spend it on or anybody knowing what they spent it on. So that's incredibly problematic.

Yeah. I guess, to sum up, my issue with this budget is that it continues to create less equality. It continues to push forward a situation in which income inequality becomes worse, and it continues to make it more difficult for those who were born to less privilege to achieve. Why? Because they have less access to public education. They have less access to early learning supports like PUF funding. They have less access to EAs in classrooms if they need it. If they choose to go to university, they have more tuition to pay. They have more interest to pay on the debt from their tuition. Their parents may find themselves in a position where they're paying exorbitantly for costs and unable to save for that education. This compounds the inequality problem, and honestly, Mr. Speaker, it's to the point where I almost feel like that is the object of the exercise. It almost feels like, at this point, it can't all . . .

Ms Hoffman: It's a feature, not a bug.

Ms Ganley: It's a feature, not a bug.

It's a feature for this government that inequality becomes worse, that people who are born with less are less able to better their situation than they would have been previously. At a certain point, Mr. Speaker, if it's every budget they've ever introduced, it kind of seems like maybe it's intentional and not accidental. So I think that's really the problem I have with this budget, that there's no help for families in it, their services are reduced, their taxes and fees and costs – I didn't even get into the Kananaskis park fee, which we recently learned goes who knows where. Who knows where. I think that all of this is incredibly problematic, and I hope Albertans can make a different choice soon.

The Speaker: I had previously mentioned – here we go. The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Why, thank you. I don't want to speak for too long on this because I think we've certainly heard a lot so far on this, but I do have a couple of things I would like to respond to the members opposite, specifically the members for Edmonton-Glenora, Calgary-Buffalo, and Calgary-Mountain View, on some of the false things that they've said, frankly. Let's start, for example, with insurance. Now, the members opposite have oversimplified this issue, which we already know is a very complex issue of insurance, suggesting . . . [interjections] And I know that they love to heckle, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: I don't need the hon. Deputy Government House Leader's help in determining my job. Having said that, I have already provided caution perhaps to members of the government about having conversations across the aisle from seated positions, and I've encouraged members on one side of the House to refrain from doing that. I'm now encouraging members from the opposite side of the House to do that.

The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would never in a million years presume to tell you how to do your job. Yours is a mantle I do not wish upon myself.

With that said, I do want to talk about insurance, because I believe the members opposite from the Liberal caucus – and I use Liberal caucus because of the recent matrimony between their federal party and themselves, so they're effectively a de facto Liberal party – have oversimplified this issue. Now, when they were in government, they had put in the insurance cap, as if this was a way to artificially manipulate the free market to make insurance more affordable.

But this is a party of unintended consequences. Now, members of this caucus know very well that this is a term that we use often when referring to the Liberal caucus opposite, because we could use that term with regard to Bill 6. Mind you, I think the actual consequences that were felt by the ag industry were exactly what they had wanted, to unionize farms. We don't need to go down that road.

But specifically what the insurance cap did to those in Alberta who wanted to get insurance – now, as many know, I come from a small town down in southern Alberta, Cardston, and Cardston is adjacent to the Blood Tribe, Mr. Speaker. I'm going to tell you what this insurance cap actually did, and this is what I talked to an insurance broker in Cardston about. He told me that because of the cap and the artificial manipulation, insurance companies were no longer in a position to insure drivers on a monthly basis unless they were able to bundle that insurance with something like home insurance or life insurance.

Now, for those of you who know much about First Nations, many of them do not own their homes, so if you go in – and I hope the members opposite are listening because this is important. You should know what your policies did, okay? Members of the Blood Tribe, for example, or others who didn't own a home were unable to get insurance because they either weren't willing or could not afford to pay for an entire year of insurance up front, or they didn't own a home with which to bundle their insurance packages.

While the members opposite, the Liberal caucus, are saying that the rate cap that they imposed and we removed has driven some consumers out of the market, their policies punted people out of the market entirely. They weren't even eligible for insurance. There were some workarounds that some insurance brokers tried to find, things like tenant insurance, but even then the insurance companies realized what was happening because they were not generating any revenue and they were under water.

Now, insurance companies are private businesses. Look, I want low insurance rates like anybody else, Mr. Speaker. I don't think anybody argues with that, but the reality is that no one is in that business to lose money, and artificially manipulating that market is inappropriate. What the members opposite did punished so many Albertans who didn't own their homes.

If you want to talk about unintended consequences, let's talk about the members opposite. Let's talk about their record. Let's talk about Budget 2018: A Recovery Built to Last, a budget that was supposed to project a $1.4 billion deficit for the fiscal year '22-23. That's laughable. Mr. Speaker, the members opposite suggest that our budget is just a windfall budget. I actually believe the Member for Lethbridge-West in a news article called it, if I'm not mistaken: a pylon budget; that a pylon could have balanced the budget. If the members opposite – if we were on their fiscal track, we'd be staring down the barrel of a $6 billion deficit. That's the party of debt, deficits, and dumb decisions, and everybody in this Chamber knows it. They refuse to realize it, and they refuse to admit it.

Mr. Speaker, let's go back to insurance for a moment because this is so important. It's so important to my constituents. I can tell you right now that the constituents of Cardston-Siksika don't have a bus to ride, and they certainly as hell can't walk. I retract that comment. They cannot walk to the grocery store. They can't walk to Lethbridge. [interjection] Oh, yeah. Sure.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you to the member, through you, Mr. Speaker. I love the passion that the Member for Cardston-Siksika is expressing. In fact, I would love for him to expand a little further on the insurance. I know of many individuals in my riding – a young man, who is now my son-in-law, was offered $7,000 for one year of car insurance because he was in that age where he didn't own a house, he didn't have a large record, and he's in the high-profile demographic, so just a high risk. That's the only insurance he could get. The value of one year of insurance was more than the value of his car.

I've also heard from insurance agencies in Lethbridge that under the previous government's policies up to 30 per cent of drivers on the road had no insurance whatsoever. They would purchase insurance, they would get the sticker, and then they'd cancel the insurance and drive for the next 11 months without insurance. Incredibly risky.

I appreciate the Member for Cardston-Siksika bringing up this incredibly important issue and expounding on it. I wonder if he would go a little further.

Mr. Schow: Yes. Well, I want to thank the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East. I'd like to say that at least there's some common sense in half that city right now represented in this Chamber.

Mr. Speaker, I'm appalled. I'm absolutely appalled by the audacity of the members opposite to stand in this Chamber and cast aspersions about us removing the rate cap when they know full well what their rate cap did. That is one member – the Member for Lethbridge-East clearly articulated just one of what I suspect are countless examples of people who were driven out of the market.

Going back to this issue of the rates, the market is now correcting itself. It is just now correcting itself, and insurance brokers are only recently able to begin to write monthly plans again for some of their clients. But imagine, for example – we want to talk about inflation. We want to talk about all the problems that people are facing in this province right now and across the country, for that matter, as a result of the Liberal poor decisions, both in the previous government here and the current government in Ottawa. The price of insurance is so high that some people just don't get it. The member just said that. Think about the kind of stress that you would have knowing that you can't afford insurance but you need to get to work. So you're now driving a vehicle illegally, without insurance, but you have – maybe they feel they have no choice. I'm not in the head of some of these individuals. I'm grateful that I can afford insurance, and I have that.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there are people who are not doing well in this province, and it's a result of the fiscal policies of the previous government and their desire to manipulate the free market to the point that it makes it unaffordable or, in fact, unattainable for so many.

Mrs. Frey: Give way?

Mr. Schow: Sure.

Mrs. Frey: Thank you very much to the hon. member for giving way. I was curious if the Member for Cardston-Siksika – I know that not only was he a staffer when the United Conservative Party was formed, but he was very involved in many of the campaigns. So he heard across the province just how much the affordability crisis, created by the NDP with their carbon tax, affected Albertans and their pocketbooks at home. I'm curious if the Member for Cardston-Siksika could elaborate on the unintended consequences of meddling in the market when it relates to the carbon tax and the electricity market, that the NDP themselves created.

Mr. Schow: Well, I want to thank the hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat for the intervention and for the very insightful and thoughtful question. Like her, I have a very rural constituency in some parts. That carbon tax, in particular, was something I heard about every time I knocked at a door, and I continue to hear about it. Cardston, like many of the towns – you know, if the members opposite have something they'd like to say, they're welcome to jump up and speak on this.

There are a lot of people on a fixed income, Mr. Speaker. Fixed incomes are very common down in Cardston because people retire in these towns. They're wonderful places to retire. But the carbon tax put such a burden on many of my constituents that while the price of everything is going up, they could barely afford it. It was just a new cost of living, something that wasn't built into their retirement plan when they were saving during the time when they were working. [interjection] You know what? I'm going to allow it.

Ms Hoffman: Yesterday I got Wordle in one; today I got an interjection from the Member for Cardston-Siksika. Like, I should probably go buy a lottery ticket after this. Thank you so much to the Member for Cardston-Siksika for the opportunity to return to debate. I'll keep it short.

Just about a minute or two ago he talked about the market correcting itself when he talked about insurance rates getting jacked up and the number of Albertans who were facing significant increases to their insurance right now. I would say that for most Albertans, who are facing extreme pressures in terms of cost of living, they wouldn't call that a correction. They'd call that extreme pressure, and they would say that the government should be doing more to support them in making life more affordable and finding ways to actually control some of their costs.

Then I just wanted to say that if we're going to refer to members of this Assembly being from parties that they're not, then people might refer to people being from ridings which they grew up in and not the ridings that they currently represent. I don't think that that would create a good tone in this House, so I respectfully request that we refer to each other as the ridings that we represent, like the Member for Cardston-Siksika, rather than saying other names of places that people might be associated with.

Mr. Schow: Sure. I'm happy to address this issue of rising insurance rates, as I have already in my remarks. Mr. Speaker, I can tell you I would rather have expensive insurance than no insurance.

Ms Hoffman: More expensive?

Mr. Schow: No. Insurance in general.

Mr. Speaker, the members opposite made insurance impossible to achieve for so many members of my constituency, and I'm disgusted by it. While they stand there on their high horse and pretend as though they're doing a favour to all Albertans by capping insurance, what they're really doing is driving some people out of the market because they didn't own a home. It's plain and simple. This is Liberal logic at its finest from the members across the way. In the last 12 months insurance rates have begun to decrease because the market is correcting itself. But I can tell you that as I knocked on doors in my constituency of Cardston-Siksika, I heard them countless times saying: "How long is it going to take? How long is it going to take for this province to fix itself after only four years of an NDP government? How long?" One part of it: it's already taken three years.

An Hon. Member: How long?

Mr. Schow: Three years to begin to correct the mistakes of the members opposite.

Now, if I can switch gears just for a moment, because I'm going to get riled up a little bit about insurance because of what it did to some of my constituents, to people that I represent – I take that personally. But I'll tell you that they're talking about taking money from future generations. Taking money from future generations: that is something our government is doing, in the words from the members opposite. It's so ridiculous, so absurd. Look at their budget projections, Mr. Speaker. If it was up to them, they'd be squandering anything they had. I mean, they did. They squandered an opportunity to continue governing because of their socialist policies. They squandered the trust of Albertans by forming an unholy alliance with the federal Liberals, and they've said nothing about it.

An Hon. Member: Not a word.

Mr. Schow: Not a word.

Unlike other political parties in this country, Mr. Speaker, that one opposite is directly attached to their federal party. You buy a membership in the provincial NDP, you've got one in the federal. Jagmeet is your guy. Bromance at its finest. Yet they talk about, you know, "Now we actually have some money to spend," because there is certainly a windfall in the price of oil – and we're doing that with this budget – but it's still not enough. It's never going to be enough. We were elected with a mandate to get Alberta's finances back in order, to bring prosperity back to this province: jobs, economy, and pipelines. Jobs, economy, and pipelines: I could go through all of it at the moment, but I'll spare you the details and say that Alberta is leading Canada, and the members opposite know it. If you listen to the questions in question period, they're flailing. There's no direction because things are on the right track in this province, and they can no longer go stand in this Chamber and talk about COVID.

Mr. Speaker, the province is on the right track, and this budget is a large piece of that. I applaud the Minister of Finance, the Premier, and all members of Executive Council for the tireless work that they have put in on behalf of Albertans to get us to this point, but the work isn't done. It's not done. My constituents keep asking me: "Are we getting back on track? Are we bringing back the Alberta advantage? Have we recovered yet from the disastrous NDP?" The short answer is no.

You look at what the NDP did in their budget projections. I believe, like I said, in 2018 they had projected $60 oil, with an $8.8 billion deficit. Compared to last year, those were boom times, Mr. Speaker. Now we're sitting with oil well above $100 a barrel. We're making significant strides to help Albertans who are struggling, like helping them cover their utility bills to the tune of $150, despite the NDP suggesting it's only $50, looking to potentially as a party mislead the public. But, of course, never let the facts get in the way of a good story or a good tweet.

I can only imagine what the NDP would do. They'd look at the budget we currently have and all the money coming in from oil and say: "Look at us. Let's go spend everything we want to." Zero fiscal restraint from members opposite.

I find that I'm going down a bit of a rabbit hole, Mr. Speaker, so I'll conclude with this. When the NDP get up in this Chamber and talk specifically about finances, you hear snickers, audible snickers, coming from members on this side of the House because we recognize that the members opposite don't have a clue when it comes to how to balance a budget. According to their new party leader, Justin Trudeau, the budget balances itself. You know, if that's the way that members opposite are going to approach the finances of this province, I am grateful every day that the United Conservative Party sits in government, because heaven forbid if the NDP were back on this side of the House.

Mr. Speaker, with that, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 8

Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate: Mr. Toews]

The Speaker: Hon. members, Bill 8, supplementary supply. The hon. Member for St. Albert has risen.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 8, Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022. I'm going to focus most of my comments on just a little piece of the budget. Some of my colleagues have gone into great detail in the other areas, but I'd like to look at Community and Social Services specifically, which is about almost $4 billion in spending. I would assume that the government would want to pay some attention to some of these concerns.

It is a lot of spending, and what's unique, I think, about this particular ministry and these programs and this spending is that they're really front-line supports. When there are changes to policy or changes to amounts and things like that, people feel it almost instantly, as we saw with something that I think the government thought was as random as realigning a payment date, let's say, for AISH or income support. I think they truly believed that there wouldn't be an impact, but of course we saw that there was because these programs do touch individual lives very, very quickly.

I'm going to talk a little about assured income for the severely handicapped and the income supports benefits. The previous speaker went on at length about, you know, the importance of accuracy, so I'd like to spend a little bit of time talking about accuracy and some inaccuracies that are in this budget. While we don't see it in the actual figures of the budget, we do see it in the text of the budget again and again and again. What we've seen are different members repeating these messages again and again and again, and I would hope that I'm going to, for I think the second time, try to explain that what you're saying is not accurate, and it's my sincere hope that the government pays attention and actually corrects their story.

What we have heard again and again is that the assured income for the severely handicapped benefits are the most generous in the country. That is not accurate. It is not correct. Now, I know it's hard to compare programs because they're not always the same, but still this is not accurate. I'd like to quote here. This was reported by Global on September 16, 2020. It was the Premier saying this. He said, "The truth is that we have, by far, the most generous benefits for social services" – he's referring to AISH – "of any province in Canada. I think in the case of AISH, about 40 per cent more generous than other provinces." That's incorrect. Quebec: disability supports core amount for a single is $1,685, which is 16 per cent less than Alberta. That doesn't even account for the supplementals that are regularly assigned to people. British Columbia: disability core supports for a single are $1,358, which is 19 per cent less than Alberta. That also doesn't account for the extras. So, obviously, 40 per cent: not accurate.

The other thing that isn't accurate, Mr. Speaker, is that the Northwest Territories and Yukon have more generous disability supports than we do here. It is my hope that the government will correct the language that they use. Now that they know better, hopefully they will do better.

The other part that's somewhat alarming: can you imagine someone being a diabetic and, you know, relying on someone else for diabetic supplies like, let's say, test strips and that if they got one test strip for the week and knew that they needed seven test strips for the week but were told: "It's generous. Just be thankful for it"? I mean, can you imagine telling someone that it's generous, that it's good enough, to just be thankful for something as life-saving as a test strip or a diabetic supply?

The reason I'm bringing this up is that we all know that for somebody in Alberta to be able to live on $1,685 a month is next to impossible. You know, the average one-bedroom rent in the capital region is just under $1,000. You add on transportation, which is more than likely a bus pass, because people can't often afford vehicles or gas or insurance. You're looking at food. You're looking at insurance for your apartment. You're looking at clothing, even medical supplies, because not everything is covered. So you can see that it is almost impossible to live on $1,685.

We know that the low-income measure in Canada is $24,642 for a single. In Edmonton, in the capital region, it's just over $21,000. AISH per year is just over $20,000. We know that people that are living on AISH are living below the poverty line. So for this government to repeatedly stand up and crow that AISH is generous, the most generous in the country, (a) that is incorrect, and (b) I would suggest that that's abusive. It is my sincere hope that the government rethinks their language around this. Can you imagine being someone with a severe disability trying to get by, knowing that you're sinking further every single month, and to have their government tell them that, basically, it's good enough?

Anyway, when I saw this budget, I was – I guess I'm always hopeful that this government will do the right thing. They never seem to quite get it right as it relates to Community and Social Services, but I was really hopeful that, given this windfall with commodity prices, they would look at reindexing these benefits. Mr. Speaker, I think that all of us know that people that live on AISH and income support are some of the most vulnerable people in this province. I'm sure we've all had casework that includes people that live on AISH. I was really hopeful that benefits would be reindexed.

In 2019 we heard the Premier talk about, you know, difficult economic conditions which really necessitated the need for him to deindex AISH and income support and that that would be re-evaluated when economic conditions changed. Well, economic conditions changed, and still these benefits are not reindexed even when we have surpassed 5 per cent inflation. You know what? That is alarming. I'm not going to go on at length about the cost of poverty. I think that we are all in this Chamber smart enough to understand that there is a cost to poverty. There is an additional pressure to acute care, to other safety nets, other social safety nets. We know that there is a cost to poverty, and year after year of not keeping pace with inflation is causing people to go farther and farther below the poverty line.

You know, one of the things in – I think it was in early 2019 when we did index these benefits. Obviously, one of the things I was really grateful for, actually, is that I felt for the first time that people with disabilities – and let's be clear; there are over 70,000 people on AISH – would not have to sort of make a case for themselves every single year about why they needed a raise, that for once it was just going to be a given. Although it's not a huge increase, every single year keeping pace with inflation makes a difference. It truly made a difference for people's lives. For this government to have cut that and then when there is a windfall that we see because of commodity prices – I didn't even hear a murmuring about what the criteria was to reinstate this indexation, which is incredibly, incredibly sad to me. It's incredibly sad, actually.

You know, the other thing that I wanted to mention – again, I mean, it's one thing to say it; it's quite another to create programs that allow for this to happen. We hear it again and again. This government will say that the best social program is a job. Sure, jobs are great. A good social program sometimes does include a job. But that is incredibly ableist – incredibly ableist – to think that you know that a job is going to make somebody's life better. You don't know what somebody's life is like. None of us knows what somebody's life is like living on AISH. If you happen to have a disability severe and permanent enough – and that's the reality about AISH recipients, that in the legislation it is required that their disability is so severe and the permanence is there that they cannot support themselves. To hear these comments coming from government doesn't even make sense. It's almost like government members don't even understand the AISH legislation or what the program is.

I would really hope that we all want to do better. I'm still learning about what ableism is. It's still fairly new to me. I'm not a disabled person, I don't live on AISH, so I don't understand all of the aspects of ableism, but I am trying. What I do know is that to assume that you know best for someone what the best social program is is incredibly ableist. I hope that all of us in this Chamber, now that we know better, can actually do better.

What else I would like to say about this budget – and, you know, this goes for other areas of spending. I call it a shell game, and that's exactly what it is. We've heard member after member stand up: we've got a balanced budget; we're keeping spending under control; we're doing this. The reality is that it is a big shell game.

I'll give you a couple of examples just in Community and Social Services. We hear again and again: we've got the most generous AISH payments; it's the highest it's ever been. It's less than a 1 per cent increase. Let's be honest. It's not going to keep pace with growth pressures. We know this. It's about 5 or 6 per cent growth every single year, and 1 per cent is not going to cut it. Of course, it's the highest; you have the highest number of people on AISH. It makes sense. Why spin it? Why not just be factual about it? You know, it's incredibly frustrating.

The other thing is that we see – with homeless supports we saw a slight decrease in homeless outreach supports and then a flat line in spending for the other line that relates to homeless supports, but we know that there's other spending in there because it's rural homelessness. Instead of adding that amount and showing an increase to that budget line, where it should have been, it's not there, so what the government is going to do is trot themselves out and say, "Oh, look at us; we're funding this many million dollars to these rural communities to address homelessness in their communities," just like we saw a few months ago, without putting it into the budget line to say, "Look, we are increasing spending because we made a mistake; we didn't budget for rural homelessness the way we should have." No; shell games. That's what that is, shell games.

Another example, women's shelters: flat spending. The government will crow: "Look at us. We kept spending flat. Aren't we excellent financial managers?" You are not.

Another example. We know that Jessie's House, the newest shelter in Alberta, just opened a little while ago, got one-time funding last year because this government failed to put their operating funding in their budget. They did it again this year. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it's a pretty safe bet to say that they're going to fund Jessie's House again, because we know that – the ED told us that, that they're going to fund it – but it's not in the budget. Why not? Why won't you show us that there's an increase in spending because you brought another shelter onboard? Why? Because this is a shell game. It's made to look like spending is flat when it is not.

The other thing, Mr. Speaker – well, there are so many things. I'd like to talk about FTEs. As you know, in the budget documents and in this budget it's always about FTEs. They are cutting FTEs. My example is Community and Social Services. Since the UCP formed government in 2019, they have cut 514 FTEs from Community and Social Services. Every single year I have asked successive ministers: "Where are these cuts coming from? Where are these FTEs coming from?" "Oh, trust us: attrition." Honestly, do you know what attrition means? It's not that good. Like, 514 employees: that's a 16 per cent reduction in the workforce. Now, for a ministry that delivers . . . [interjections] I don't know why you're making little gestures at me, but maybe you should sit down. Mr. Speaker, I don't know why this government thinks that they can deliver these ever-growing programs like AISH, like income support . . .

Mr. Schow: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: A point of order is called. The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Point of Order Imputing Motives

Mr. Schow: Yeah. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that. I rise under 23(h), (i), and (j), specifically imputing false motives, that I was making gestures at the member opposite when, in fact, I'd just put hand sanitizer on and was drying my hands. While I apologize if my actions had offended the Member for St. Albert, to impute false motives on me would be wildly inappropriate.

The Speaker: The Opposition House Leader.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not think that this is a point of order; obviously a matter of debate. Here we have the Member for St. Albert talking about Bill 8, Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022, and being distracted by what I also saw – it looked a little like jazz hands – at the time. I think it is a matter of debate and not a point of order.

The Speaker: Well, I agree. It isn't a point of order. I would provide some caution to the hon. Member for St. Albert that it's not very parliamentary to tell people to sit down inside the Assembly.

The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Debate Continued

Ms Renaud: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. Going back to my point, since 2019 514 FTEs have been cut from the Ministry of Community and Social Services. Now, I'd like to remind the House of the really important programs that are in this ministry, and, as I said earlier, these are really front-facing programs that deal with individual people on a daily basis. Their caseloads are massive. They're looking at AISH recipients: there are more than 70,000 people. Income support: there are tens of thousands of people on income support. Persons with developmental disabilities: there are probably around 15,000 people. FSCD: probably around 12,000 to 15,000 families. And it goes on and on. That includes the Appeals Secretariat, so hundreds and hundreds of appeals. There are just so many programs that have so many staff that are so essential.

Now, perhaps if the government was clear and transparent and said: "Well, you know what? We're removing these positions. We don't think they're essential because we've looked at all of the caseloads across the province, and we don't think there's a problem. We think we can safely cut here." But that's not the case, Mr. Speaker. That is not the case at all, and what we do know is that of, I think, the six delivery regions in the province for Community and Social Services, all but one are in this red zone, which means that the caseload pressures have become too much. So we're looking at between 300 and 400 people on caseloads.

Now, these are AISH generalists that have this kind of caseload. Now, I don't know if other members – I know I certainly, probably get them. If a day doesn't go by that I don't get casework related to AISH or income support or one of the programs in this ministry, it's an unusual day, and I'm quite sure that other members are getting casework similar to the casework that I get. And it's intense because people don't understand the systems, whether it's because of an intellectual disability, they don't have family support, they don't have an appropriate guardian. They just don't understand it. They're panicking because they're afraid they're going to get evicted. They don't have money to buy food. It's intense casework. It's absolutely intense casework. You can imagine an AISH generalist. Those are the ones that get the calls. Those are the ones that have to deal one on one with AISH recipients. Can you imagine a caseload of between 300 and 400 people and then thinking that it's a good idea to remove more FTEs? It doesn't even make sense.

Perhaps there is some grand plan and maybe there's some – I don't know. Maybe they've made some shifts or they have changed the role of AISH generalists or the way that cases are managed. I don't know because there is zero transparency. There is no plan other than attrition. It's just attrition. It's attrition. That's all we ever get. It's attrition. I would hope – if we've learned anything from the Auditor General, it's that you establish objectives so that you can go back and you can measure them. You can measure the success, you can see what you've done, but you do a risk assessment. I asked all of these questions during budget estimates and got zip, nothing. There is no plan. There was no risk assessment done.

This was about the bottom-line cutting. This was about removing more FTEs so that we're now over 500 jobs lost in Community and Social Services. That's a lot. That's 16 per cent of the workforce. If you think that that is not going to impact the quality of services that the government of Alberta delivers, you are sadly mistaken, and I think this government is smart enough to know that, to know that you cannot remove 500 staff and not have people negatively impacted. That's just a fact. That's a fact. And we know that the caseload growth has just – it's dangerous. When you have that many people on one staff's caseload, that is dangerous. It is no longer safe.

The other questions, Mr. Speaker, that – again, I wish there was some clarity. In the budget documents – we can see it right in their documents – income support was underspent by over $100 million last year. Government will spin that: oh, yes, spending is flat or it's a little bit lower because of COVID federal supports. That's all fine and good. We know that caseloads changed. We know that people went on different federal benefits. We know that there are lots of clawbacks going on right now or that have gone on. What we're trying to get at is: "Okay. If that is the case, that's fair. Tell us what the amount is. How much was clawed back? How many people were able to be transferred from AISH or income support to go on to a federal COVID program?" That's easy. Just tell us how much. How many people? How many people on AISH had a spouse that went on EI and that negatively impacted the amount an AISH recipient received? How many people lost income support because they went on a federal program? Crickets. We got nothing. Nothing.

For a government that likes to stand up and crow about their budget, “You know, we kept spending flat,” it is a shell game. If you want to prove otherwise, it would be very easy to do: just table the documents, answer the questions, show us the plan, show us the risk assessment. I’d be very happy to be wrong about this. If there actually was a plan to keep people safe and to keep caseloads manageable, I would be incredibly happy about that. [interjection] If you’d like to intervene, I’m happy to take it. Go ahead. Yeah.

Mr. Luan: I can’t stand listening to the opposition member, who, after three hours of the detailed budgeting estimate process, is still playing around with numbers which are not true. Let me correct a couple right now. First, when you talk about the AISH caseload, you talk about 10,000 people receiving AISH today. Let me tell you: 70,000. You’re materially wrong. Not even close, okay? We’re currently supporting 70,000 Albertans on the AISH caseload.

Let me tell you something else that you’re . . .

The Speaker: I’m sorry. I hesitate to interrupt because I know that the minister has a desire to intervene; however, the mover of the speech was the hon. the Minister of Finance, and the second to speak was the hon. Member for St. Albert, so there are actually no interventions during the response. My apologies, but I’m sure he’ll have an opportunity to rise a little bit later.

The member actually only has 35 seconds remaining in her remarks.

Ms Renaud: Yeah. That’s okay.

Actually, yes, we’re very well aware that there are 70,000 people on AISH. I don’t know which part of that wasn’t clear. Yes, we do understand that. It’s in the documents. It’s also available online.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, you know, it’s incredibly disappointing that given the economic circumstances that we find ourselves in, our first thought didn’t go to the people that had to give things up in 2019. They have consistently lost after that. We’ve got a lot of people living in poverty.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Community and Social Services has risen.

Mr. Luan: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. I really appreciate having a chance to rise in the House to contribute to the debate here. As I’m listening to the opposition member, the hon. Member for St. Albert, I can’t believe she’s throwing the numbers back and forth. Some are making no sense. Others have been answered in the three-hour detailed budget estimates. She keeps throwing her issues as if – for every social issue we have here in our province, just keeps throwing money as a solution.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that’s something that fundamentally we take a different approach to in trying to help vulnerable Albertans. I am so proud to stand on this side of the aisle as a government. We are not only taking care of the most vulnerable Albertans, but we also make our programs sustainable.

Let me give you an example. For Budget 2022 we added $12 million in addition to the already highest AISH budget in our province, with $1.4 billion as it stands today. Once again, this is the highest in Alberta’s history. I remind you also, Mr. Speaker, that three weeks ago the Premier and I announced additional prenatal benefits for pregnant women who are receiving AISH and income support. With an additional $600 per month added, they will receive $856 per month prenatal benefits. Once again that’s the highest in the country as we speak today.

Mr. Speaker, we are doing tangible changes to make life better for vulnerable Albertans, like the examples I’m taking about. At the same time we protected core funding, what we call the social safety net. Whether it’s income support, whether it’s supporting people with a disability, whether it’s helping families and women flee from domestic violence, we maintained that core funding.

I want to share with you one story that – it’s a real story – one of the members shared with me while visiting the province during the summer. That story stuck to my heart and made a significant impact on me in terms of my work with the ministry and the work that – how we established the direction we currently have. I was visiting the Edson bottle depot. I’ll use her real name. Anne is the executive director there as the employer. We were talking about how the conditions of the pandemic impacted people and employers’ impact to work and so on and so forth. During the conversation she shared something with me dearly. She said: “Minister, you know, my operation here is not a highly paid job. It’s repetitive in nature. I keep losing people. You get people working here. Their heart and mind isn’t here, and the next thing you know, they are gone. Plus, when they’re here, you have to keep a very close eye on the quality of the work.” She said: “It turned out to be quite an expensive undertaking until lately. I hired” – I’ll use a different name just to protect the privacy of the individual. I’ll use the name Frank.

Frank is a guy who’s been on AISH, who was on disability for many, many years. He has been through different programs that helped him along the way. He never competed for what they call a commercial rate of employment, to put it another way. Anne offered a competitive job offer to Frank. Frank competed the same way, no different than the rest of the others, and he got it. What Anne finds different is that every day before she opens the door, Frank is the first person who comes through, and every day Frank is the last one to leave. When she asked him why, Frank said: this is my very first job I competed for that I got the market-rate employment. For him, it’s a job that matches his full potential, and this is a totally different life he’s experiencing.

Anne said: “From an employer point of view, I never need to worry about losing Frank. I never need to worry about recruitment. He took this job like a new life. This is good for him but good for me as an employer. Why didn’t I know this before?” That conversation really inspired us. Not only do we want to provide a system, provide a social safety net, but we also want to empower people to reach their full potential, like Frank’s story.

Because of that reason, Mr. Speaker, in our Budget 2022 we added an additional $34 million as a new investment to help vulnerable Albertans who have the opportunity through employment to reach their full potential. Once again, I want to share to the hon. members in this House what a drastically different approach we’re taking. Not only is our government providing core funding to maintain a social safety net, but also we emphasize helping people to reach their full potential. To me, that’s a fundamental difference. Instead of simply a handout approach, which I think the opposition is all about, we do both. We provide safety. We added the enabling part.

I’ll give you another example. The hon. member mentioned about the homeless part of the work. You would recall that in the peak of winter Edmonton’s mayor was making an urgent request for homeless shelters in Edmonton, and, you know, within three weeks we responded. But we didn’t respond in the NDP way, just to pour the money as if that will solve the problem. Yes, we did give $21.5 million province-wide. We know that resource is important, but that’s not all, because money alone cannot solve the problem.

At the time that we announced the $21.5 million, we also established a provincial task force. The task force was a group of people coming from multiple sectors, from police – sit down; let me finish first – to shelter operators, from social service agencies to many other stakeholders who care about this issue and who really want to make a contribution to solve their problem. One thing that we agree on is that stand-alone, fragmented issues are not going to help Albertans. We're looking for a comprehensive, co-ordinated approach in responding to homelessness.

Mr. Speaker, I am so much looking forward to the findings of this task force. They're expected to deliver their study and recommendations in June of this year. By then I'm looking forward to see this new way of doing business. Not only will we have resources provided here; we're also looking with a fundamentally different approach to how we approach the complex issue in such a way. All we're doing is a balanced, sustainable solution to make life better for Albertans on the real term rather than just throwing a whole bunch of slogans with no concrete actions coming into place. That is what I want to convey to the House. That is a sharp contrast to the different approaches to how we approach social services, how we approach helping our most vulnerable Albertans but in the meantime providing them with assistance so we can empower them to reach their full potential.

Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of other things that I'm so excited about, the work that my ministry is doing, and so passionate about. I will leave the rest of the time to the House to continue debate on this very important cause here. At the end of the day we want to provide not only the social safety net to provide support to people when they have unfortunately fallen into difficult times, but – make no mistake – we'll never create a codependency as if government throwing money will solve the problem, because I know and lots of people in the sector also know that if you erode an individual's self-confidence, their self-purpose, their sense of pride in themselves, it doesn't matter how much money you dump to them, you're not helping them. You've actually eroded their self-confidence and their success.

Our hope is that we'll provide timely support to them, meaningful support to them, and make their life better, at the earliest time help them return to their journey of their success. Mr. Speaker, their success is ours.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the supplementary supply. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, I think, is rising.

Member Irwin: Yes. I just didn't want to interfere with you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you. It is, as always, an honour to rise in this House. I did speak briefly to supplementary estimates last night, but I did not get a chance to do as I typically do the first time that I rise in the House and give a shout-out to the front-line workers out there who are absolutely still doing so much for all of us in the midst of a pandemic. We are still in the midst of a pandemic, might I add, and those in health care, those in retail, those in education, any front-line workers: we owe them a lot, so thank you.

I have many things I want to say in relation to Bill 8, Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022, but I must – I must – pick up on a few points from the previous member as I was not able to successfully interject. Intervene? Intervene is the proper word. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, I found it quite troubling as he basically threw out a whole lot of accusations about us and the NDP, and he mentioned something along the lines of – sorry; to quote the Speaker, I don't have the benefit of the Blues – the NDP throwing money at things. He gave an example of supporting our unhoused neighbours through the investments over the winter. Hey, this minister has heard me speak many times in this House about how critical it is that we support houseless folks in our communities. It is a topic that I am incredibly passionate about.

Yes. Of course, we can all agree, and we agreed when that action was taken, to provide additional dollars to Hope Mission, which is based in my riding of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. But we also somewhat couched our response in the fact that mats on the floor are one thing – absolutely, they're a short-term, Band-Aid solution – but unhoused folks need more than mats on floors. They need roofs over heads. One of the most tangible ways that this government could support unhoused folks would be investing in permanent supportive housing. Permanent supportive housing not only saves lives; it saves money, too.

Let's talk about that a little bit. There's clear research that shows that permanent supportive housing saves lives. In fact, there's an example in my riding, Ambrose Place. It's in the McCauley neighbourhood. It's an incredible facility that has taken some of the hardest to house folks, folks with, oh, my goodness, multiple disabilities, folks who have been on the streets for extended lengths of time, and provides them with a harm reduction approach, incorporates Indigenous cultural practices, and it's had a really good success rate. Of course, it's not all success, and huge props to the workers there because it's a lot. They're dealing with a lot. But the research is clear from the city of Edmonton that that's a project that has saved lives, and it's a project that has saved money.

You can look at the impacts on the health care system. If those folks aren't housed, they're often going to emergency rooms. Go not too far from my riding to the Royal Alex any time, particularly during the winter. You will see many folks who are unhoused in the Royal Alex in the emergency room. So it saves money there. It also saves money for the judicial system, right? We know that incarcerating folks costs a whole heck of a lot of money.

Both of these arguments, the moral argument in that it's the right thing to do and it saves lives and the economic argument in that it saves money, were not enough to convince this minister and this UCP government to invest the measly, I believe, $9 million asked for by the city of Edmonton to support permanent supportive housing. A drop in the bucket when it comes to their budget, when it comes to, you know, the broader fiscal picture, yet they weren't willing to do that. So spare me, please, ministers across the aisle, your degrading comments about our record and about us when you're not willing to make the investments that in the long term are going to save humans and save money.

Okay. Now that I've talked about that a little bit, let's talk – obviously, for those folks who are listening closely, of which, I'm sure, there are many in this Chamber, I will tie this into supplementary estimates. [interjection] The House leader is paying attention, she tells me. Thank you. I will tie this into supplementary estimates, but I just haven't had a chance in this Chamber to speak to my own critic portfolio, and that's Status of Women. I can draw this to Bill 8 and the fact that, you know, this government had an opportunity to invest some additional dollars in, well, multiple ministries.

Actually, I'll give my colleague a shout-out. Sometimes he needs more shout-outs. That's my colleague from Calgary-Buffalo. He did a really good analysis in his debate on Bill 7, where he went through each ministry. He's not actually listening to my credit for him right now. I shouldn't be giving him credit because he did not bring me cookies as promised. But he gave a really good analysis about how in each ministry this government could be doing a lot better.

Look no further than Status of Women. I know it is a small ministry, of course, and historically when you compare it to other ministries, absolutely, I can accept that. But I can't accept that under this government's leadership one of the very first moves this government made was to, first of all, basically, you know, not have Status of Women as a stand-alone ministry, throw it in with culture, multiculturalism, absolutely decimate the budget for Status of Women in the first two years and fully cut back the number of FTEs. In our budget estimates I talked about the fact that I was having complete déjà vu from the previous years' estimates. Even though the folks at the table had changed, there was still no clear plan to support women in this budget or to support women at all from this government. They had an opportunity to address critical supports for women, and they refused to do so.

Actually, it was at that same time as we were doing Status of Women estimates that we had just learned that wage rollbacks, huge wage rollbacks, for front-line health care workers were being proposed, front-line health care workers like – I may need some help from my colleagues here – respiratory therapists . . .

Ms Renaud: Occupational therapists.

Member Irwin: Occupational therapists – thank you – speech language pathologists . . .

An Hon. Member: Social workers.

Member Irwin: Social workers. Yeah. The list goes on. I can't think of them all. It's been a long day. But, I mean, these are folks – like, respiratory therapists. We had an incredible woman named Holly Champney stand with us, actually, and share her story of how she's the person who inserts the breathing tube. She's the person who's kept people alive during this pandemic. And this is how this government is responding, with massive rollbacks. I think her rollback – and again I'm going off memory here – is about 8 per cent, right? I can't even remember exactly what sort of mental gymnastics this government used on that one to justify it, but I imagine it was quite intriguing.

You think about that. You think about the wage rollbacks that are being proposed for, you know, a large group of workers here in Alberta, which would be just awful in themselves, but this is along the backdrop of many Albertans already facing huge, huge affordability challenges.

We talked about this yesterday in the supplementary estimates debate – right? – the fact that this government had an opportunity. They could have addressed it here in Bill 8 other than just the energy piece around, you know, a $50 rebate. The associate minister came back and said, "Well, actually, it's $150." Well, actually, I came back to him and said, "You know, we were actually door-knocking in your neighbourhood, in your riding of Morinville-St. Albert, on the weekend." It was wonderful. Lots of support. Lots of orange signs are going to be up there heading up to the next election. It was very fantastic, and I got to meet a lot of great people at the doors.

Without prompting, the top issue that came up was affordability, and as I shared yesterday – you know, it's so intriguing. The area where we were door-knocking in St. Albert, I have to admit, is different than the area I live in in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, a higher socioeconomic background. You might think that they'll probably have different issues than my neighbours in the Alberta Avenue, Parkdale area. No. Similar issues, right? These affordability challenges transcend demographics. Albertans from all backgrounds are struggling with skyrocketing utility bills.

This government had an opportunity – I won't use it as a prop – in Bill 8, in their supplementary estimates, to make some adjustments and to really provide relief to Albertans. They chose not to, and I think Albertans are going to remember that. I really do think they are. Absolutely.

I shared this story yesterday – and she was happy for me to share it – of a younger person named Patti who told me that she is at risk of losing power and heat, and she said: listen, I'm trying here; I'm trying to make ends meet. She talked about using up all of her savings. She talked about how she was working a job, and then she actually contracted COVID during her job and had to take time off. Like, that's not just a one-off example. We've all heard, at least on our side of the House, from a lot of Albertans who are absolutely struggling with their utility bills.

I urge this government: they still have an opportunity. You know, we're only on Bill 8. I'm certain the Premier will be bragging about his robust legislative agenda this session. Well, you know what? Make it robust by making tangible, positive impacts on the lives of Albertans because so far it's a huge disappointment.

I want to pick up on some of what my colleague from St. Albert was sharing. She's always been a huge advocate for folks who are on AISH. You know, I'm thinking back to one the first things we heard from this Premier when he tried in this Chamber to justify the deindexing of AISH. I remember quite clearly his words because I was kind of – I think my jaw was dropped a little bit. Like, did he actually just say that? He said: "You know what? It's not onerous, right?" He said that it's not going to be onerous. I said at the time: well, that is awfully rich for a man who's worked . . .

An Hon. Member: For a rich guy.

Member Irwin: Yeah.

. . . six-figure jobs pretty much his entire working life, who's entitled to a six-figure, seven-figure pension fairly soon. To say that people who are living on $1,600 a month, to lose $30 a month: that's not onerous? I'm no mathematician, but that's a huge, huge impact for somebody who's barely making it. As my colleague from St. Albert talked about, she tried to live on that, and she acknowledged that she's got a heck of a lot of privilege and people and a network and community that she could rely on, and she hardly made it, right? So imagine – just imagine – how it is for folks right now.

Fast-forward. You think: oh, he couldn't get more crass than saying that it's not onerous. Oh, yes, he could because in the Chamber just on Monday that same Premier stood, and he proudly said that AISH recipients and seniors who are losing thousands of dollars as a result of his government's policy decisions – guess what he said. He said that they were making "modest sacrifices." Wow. Wow. When I talk to that senior in my riding who's struggling to make ends meet, I'll just let her know: "You know what? Thank you for making those modest sacrifices." No. Absolutely not.

And I joke, I smile, but I'm not smiling when I'm hearing from countless constituents who are struggling so hard right now as a result of this government's policy decisions. It's incredibly troubling that this Premier continues to minimize their experiences, their lived experiences as people who are living in poverty, living below the poverty line, even folks who have traditionally been able to make ends meet who are struggling right now because of high utility costs, high insurance costs, fees on parks – what am I missing? – higher tuition. The list goes on.

Ms Hoffman: Education property tax.

Member Irwin: Education property tax. Thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Glenora. Yeah. Right? The list goes on. I only have so much time here, folks.

Mr. Schow: It's all your fault, too.

Member Irwin: I mean, the Member for Cardston-Siksika is welcome to stand up. I'm not sure if I'll acknowledge him, actually, but he is welcome. I'll think about it.

You know, I would be remiss, actually, if I didn't talk about education. So thank you to Edmonton-Glenora for reminding me of that. You know what? I talk about my neighbourhood a lot: Alberta Avenue, Parkdale area. In the same area, just north of where I live, is a lovely community called Delton. [Member Irwin's speaking time expired] Dang it.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. members.

Any other hon. members wishing to join debate this evening? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you so much. I'm going to try to channel my colleague from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood and talk about Delton school for a minute because Delton school is fantastic in terms of building community and having great support and a sense of inclusion. What Delton school struggles with, though, is the actual building. The building was built at a time when most of the families in the neighbourhood, even though they lived in three-bedroom bungalows, had four or five kids – we were experiencing baby booms – and that school was built to accommodate the significant number of students who were living in the neighbourhood and attending a local school.

There still are a lot of families living in the neighbourhood, but most of the families in three-bedroom bungalows now have one or two children. Many still attend the neighbourhood school, but, as you can rightfully deduce from the number of children who were in the neighbourhood to the number of children who are there now, the school isn't full as it was when it was originally built. It also isn't in the beautiful, pristine shape that it was when it was originally built either.

One of the things that school divisions across the province have been encouraged to do is to find ways to right-size the capital that they have to meet the demand. We do this on the Legislature Grounds, and we did it in this current fiscal year because, of course, the Minister of Infrastructure was there the day they started picking apart to remove the legislative Annex because the Annex was beyond its useful life expectancy in terms of the building envelope. The Annex was no longer needed, and we were trying to right-size the office space on the legislative grounds, a responsible, prudent decision even though I have a special spot in my heart for the legislative Annex as my first office that had a door that closed, that I didn't have to share with anyone else, was in that building. It was a special place.

I have to say that on the legislative grounds the Infrastructure minister made the decision to remove space that was no longer needed, upgraded other space. You probably have all seen the Terrace Building, which I think is being renamed to Poundmaker's, have renovations done to it to improve that building envelope to make sure that the needs of government and legislative employees on this site have safe work environments to work in and the right-sized envelope for the number of people who are working here.

That's what the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood was almost certainly going to talk about when she spoke about Delton school because Delton school is not a building that is in a condition that is as conducive for positive student learning outcomes as we would hope for any of our own children, and it is also overbuilt.

When the government talks about, "Well, it's only at 65 per cent capacity," that's why the plan is to build a smaller school that is a quality building that's appropriately sized for the neighbourhood. Of course, it wasn't good economic sense for the Minister of Infrastructure to continue to heat and maintain a building that was not energy efficient, that was overbuilt for the parcel of land that it's on, and here we celebrate. There was a big photo op with that building coming down and new space being renovated to appropriately meet the needs of the legislative grounds, the staff, and the government public servants who work in those buildings. Kids in Delton deserve an opportunity to learn in just as positive a school environment as any other child in the province of Alberta. The government could have through Bill 8, supplementary supply appropriations, 2022, focused on the needs of kids living in Delton. The government could have focused on the other infrastructure that's desperately needed.

Let me just talk about a couple of pieces. We have in Edmonton alone a need for five schools that were identified in the year 1 capital plan needs assessment. Now, remember that Edmonton public was overlooked last year in the government's budget and again this year in the government's budget, so presumably the list will keep getting longer while they continue to be ignored.

The government has also asked for many years for people to submit both disaggregated and aggregated lists for capital. The government had three different lists. If they didn't like what was on the top of the aggregated list, they probably should fund all five projects because they've met a needs assessment, but if they wanted to fund a project that was on the disaggregated list, they could have at least done that, even though they tell everyone to focus on aggregated, focus on making sure you reduce the footprint and making sure that you have appropriately sized buildings for the communities you serve, and then, of course, the need for additional new space in the areas of growth to meet the significant demands of growing communities, including south Edmonton, in significant need of a high school, and northeast Edmonton, in need of a junior high.

These are all things that could have been included in Bill 8, the Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022, or in the budget, Bill 7, which we are debating as well, but the government has chosen to continue to ignore the needs of everyday families, including right here in the capital city. It almost feels like the government has written off Edmonton and Calgary as places that they choose to actually govern and lead on behalf of because Calgary for two years got no new schools for either public or Catholic students living in the city of Calgary – for two years, nothing – when we know that the numbers of kids have continued to increase, when we know that there were many important, worthy capital projects that could have been under construction so that we would have that necessary space, the space that the minister, when we asked to reduce class sizes and spread students, said wasn't possible because there was simply no way that the government could provide additional educational space.

When the government had opportunities to actually build some, which isn't the only way – you can absolutely get portables. You can rent other community spaces, especially during the period of time where groups weren't congregating significantly. Calgary waited for two years with no projects, and this year there's just one new school for public and one new school for Catholic students. For a government that continues to say that they support choice when they fail to provide the necessary capital to meet the educational needs for families who are choosing public and Catholic education as well as francophone education anywhere in the province: zero capital dollars in this year's budget or in this supplementary supply that we are considering here, again, Bill 8, Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022 – zero capital dollars – to support francophone schools and those choosing to exercise their right to a minority education in this province.

Instead, those families continue to have to go to court, and there have been court decisions that say that financial availability cannot be a factor, that children choosing a minority language education have a right to equal access to educational opportunities, which includes equal access to schools. The fact that we continue to have francophone schools throughout this province, including right in St. Albert, having to meet in a church basement to offer the educational opportunity is not equal access. The government certainly should be taking this opportunity to make good on decisions that the courts have already directed is what must be done in terms of people's Charter rights and their access to minority language educational opportunities. But there's nothing in this bill that will do anything to address those needs as clarified again by the courts.

Instead, there is a plan in this bill to make Albertans pay a billion dollars more in additional personal income taxes. A billion dollars. It is the exact same tax change that the current Premier is well documented fighting against both when he worked for the Canadian Taxpayers Federation as well as when he was in the House of Commons for about 20 years, I believe it was. Maybe it just felt like 20. I think it was 20, actually, 10 around the cabinet table, 10 in caucus. For the Premier to have such a well-documented articulate argument as to why bracket creep is so wrong headed and so hurtful for low-income families in particular, low- and middle-income families, is the height of hypocrisy but also disrespect to the voters, which we all work for.

To take this billion dollars by forcing a tax on inflation, taxing people more than what their earning power is, because, of course, inflation is a significant burden facing everyday families – the members opposite talk about it. What they fail to recognize is that they're the government, and they have a responsibility to do something about it.

Also in relation to inflation, the government has chosen to deindex, which I know is sort of not the most accessible term, to get rid of inflation-proofing people's income when they are on a very fixed income, of which they require the government to pay for their ability to be able to live with dignity in the province of Alberta.

This bill specifically is failing to index for those folks who are struggling so hard. I want to remind members that prior to being elected as the Premier, the current Premier at that time said that, of course, they weren't going to get rid of inflation-proofing income for folks on AISH, which in this bill – certainly, Bill 8, the appropriations act, could have brought back some form of indexation so that people on AISH, those who are struggling to make ends meet could have a little bit of a bump in their pay to make up for the fact that their power is going up, their personal insurance is going up, their cost of living generally is going up, and the government has done nothing to address those pressures being downloaded on them through government policy decisions that have resulted in tough times getting tougher for many people here in Alberta.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that it doesn't just end with AISH. We know that families who are seniors as well, requiring seniors' benefits and other programs, are seeing about $750 less for a couple because of the government's failure to inflation-proof the family budget and to match those benefits to inflation.

What's in this supplementary supply bill? We know that the 2022 budget is a no-help budget, and I hate to say that there isn't much in the supplementary supply bill either for that short-term relief. The big program the government wants to pat themselves on the back for is $50 a month just for three months – January, February, March – for families to off-set a fraction of the increased cost that families have seen to their power bills. This is probably one of the biggest issues that is being raised with me regularly by folks who live in my riding and in others, around affordability and their absolute frustration that the government fails to return the cap to electricity rates and to actually act in some sort of regulated fashion to provide some stability and certainty for everyday families.

I hate to say that this bill is no help, but it is a fraction of the help that everyday families deserve, and Alberta families should have a government that shares the benefits of the resource wealth that they have stumbled upon because that wealth belongs to all Albertans. It doesn't belong to the UCP or the current Premier, that's for sure.

With that, at this point, I move that we adjourn.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

[The Speaker in the chair]

Bill 3 Special Days Act

[Adjourned debate: Ms Issik]

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to the Special Days Act. I think it's worth beginning by talking about what this bill does and does not do. Essentially, what it does is that it gives the minister the ability to recognize by way of a declaration certain special days, weeks, or months. Now, it's actually quite typical for a government to recognize special days, weeks, or months. This sort of puts the declarations into a process although it's interesting because it can still be done by way of proclamation. It can still be done by way of ministerial order, so this doesn't sort of prevent all those other things from happening. One might actually kind of wonder as to the purpose of this act because it puts the declarations all together, but the proclamations and the ministerial orders still sort of hang in their own where-ever-they-ares. In that sense it doesn't do a lot.

But I guess my top-level, top-line message on this act is that this seems fine. It doesn't really create anything new. It doesn't particularly change anything. I did have, just because I'm a bit of a drafting nerd, a couple of questions about this act, and this being second reading, normally one can leave one's questions, and they sort of reappear with the minister, whether in their closing comments or when this is spoken to in Committee of the Whole. The questions I have with respect to this act are – I mean, what it is is an act about a declaration of a special day, week, or month, which again, like I've said, is fine, but it's not a law that's going to sort of go around overruling other laws or change very much the operation of sort of everyday people.

I'm a little bit curious about section 5, which is: the act prevails. Basically, what it's saying is that if there's an inconsistency or conflict between this act and another act, this act will prevail, which is – I don't know. I guess it seems weird. It seems like a weird thing to be in this particular act. Like, what it would be inconsistent with, and why would it need to prevail? Yeah. I mean, there are some times where provisions like this are necessary – I don't disagree with that – particularly when an act might be interacting with a whole bunch of other acts. I can't really see the circumstances under which this one would, and I'm not really sure this would be my top choice for prevailing acts. It seems like a weird decision, so I'm a bit curious why that's in there.

The other question I have is about section 6, which is the regulation-making power. Now, this is very normal. Acts almost always have regulation-making powers because you don't want to do everything in the legislation because then every time you need a teeny little tweak to something – like, for instance, fees for something tend to be in regulation because you don't want to have to come back to the Legislature every single time although some fees could properly be put in the legislation, I think. The Kananaskis fee would be a big one for me because then we would know where it was going. Anyway, the point is that in this particular act the Lieutenant Governor in Council can make regulations.

One of them is called a deficiency regulation-making power, remedying any confusion in the application or difficulty in applying the provisions of this act. The reason this is odd is that – this is an interesting regulation-making power in the sense that it allows the government to sort of write things that are outside the scope of what was defined in the act for regulations. It's a fix-all provision, so if someone comes along, and they're like, "Whoops. We made a huge oversight; we, like, missed something really obvious in the act, and we need a deficiency regulation," this allows them the power to do that.

I'm a bit curious why, in an act which is two and a half pages long, you would need a deficiency regulation. I feel like: well, what is there you might not have thought about? It literally grants the minister the ability to declare a special week, day, or month. Cabinet can still proclaim special weeks, days, months outside the act. Ministers can still proclaim special weeks, days, and months on their own. I don't know. I'm guess I'm just a little bit curious. Deficiency regulations are normally for acts that do incredibly important things for which a deficiency would be extremely problematic to the orderly operation of government, so it seems a little bit weird that in this instance you would need a deficiency regulation.

Yes. Those are my two questions. Why does the act need to prevail, and why would we need to be remedying confusion? Other than that, it seems on its face that this act is fine.

Honestly, I kind of like this sort of thing. It gives us a chance to sort of reflect on the significance of different cultural communities that we have in the province of Alberta. Pride Month, I think, is a very good example. It's an important time. It gives us all the chance to reflect on both how far we've come and how far we still have to go. You know, coming up shortly – I mean, yeah, there are a number of these different days. I think also of Transgender Day of Remembrance, a day that I think is incredibly important, that allows us to mourn those we have lost and consider the fact that transgender folks still experience a significantly higher level of death world-wide. That's problematic. That's something that we should think about and talk about and have a day to recognize.

I actually think that some of the things in this act can be very, very important. I think that, you know, days to remember the victims of the Holocaust: again, they remind us. They remind us of these things that have happened in the past and why they're so important going forward. I think, again, days on which we celebrate different cultures that form part of the fabric of the community – the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, I believe, was instrumental in the declaration of Philippine Heritage Month. Again, the Filipino community is huge in Alberta, and it's great to have that chance for everyone to come together and to celebrate, you know, the importance of that culture and the contributions of people to the province. And it's like that with every other community. Obviously, I'm not going to go through and list everything.

But, yes; this bill does seem to do an important thing. I have those two questions about it. Otherwise, I would say I am generally supportive.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika and the Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My constituency name is like music to my ears. I do rise, though, to ask for unanimous consent from this Chamber to move to one-minute bells for the remainder of this evening's sitting.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to address Bill 3, Special Days Act. You know, as far as this bill goes, the declaration of special days, weeks, and months in perpetuity: okay. This legislation does nothing to address the huge issues that Albertans are experiencing at this time.

It's hard to believe, you know, having had the privilege of sitting around the cabinet table, Mr. Speaker, that a bill like this would survive a cabinet table of the NDP government because it would be pushed back, and we would say: there are more important things to do for this province with our time than, regrettably, this bill before us. You know, there is only so much time that a government has to do the work that they need to do, and it's hard to believe that this bill rises to the top of the important work of a government. I'm flabbergasted. It's not like there aren't important issues in this province. Like, earlier tonight we were talking about child poverty, a scourge on any population as rich as this province is.

In addition to preparing somewhat to look at this bill, I've been spending my time tonight looking through a document that is called Lessons on Child Poverty during a Pandemic, put out by the Edmonton Social Planning Council. It talks about the importance of child poverty and addressing it for all the reasons we can imagine: in terms of health, in terms of education, in terms of opportunity. My colleague from Calgary-Mountain View was talking about low-income child poverty being a predictor of young people who don't have opportunity, how more of them wind up incarcerated or not fulfilling, you know, their capacity in life, but here we are talking about a Special Days Act.

Mr. Speaker, under our government we focused on things like the family and child benefit, which this government has cut in terms of their indexing of it, which means that there are more children in poverty today than there were in 2018 when we were government. What about an act to fully house all the homeless Albertans in this province? What about taking time to do that? What about this government putting their time and effort and their brain power behind that or an act to ensure that all youth graduate high school in this province?

An Hon. Member: That would be good.

Member Ceci: That's a good one, too. Yeah.

But, no, we're dealing with an act to declare special days in perpetuity for days and weeks and months. I think that's the big difference between this side, which tries to understand what the issues are and tries to come up with solutions, and that side, which seems to be coming up with acts that, like, you have to shake your head and say: why is this more important than child poverty or homelessness or high school completion or ensuring that all elderly people feel valued and vital in this province? I can almost hear the critics now saying: "Well, that's the responsibility of families. You know, they should make sure that every elderly person feels vital and valued." Well, not every person who is elderly has that family anymore. Not every person can count on neighbours and the kindness of strangers. So why isn't the government spending time making sure there are solutions for that?

Mr. Speaker, you know, a government that preferences the time in this Legislature to talk about special days as opposed to social issues and problems and other big concerns, whether that be health or education or social or on and on and on, is a government that, I think, is just sort of spinning its wheels and kind of feinting, you know: “We’re a government that’s doing things, but don’t look over here because we’re changing the education system to preference private education. We’re changing the health system to preference privatized health care. We’re changing the tax structure to give more money to corporations.”

Those are the things that are happening under the surface, and on the surface we see Bill 3, as if – as if – it’s an important consideration in this province. I guess it’s another tick in the box of platform commitments that the UCP has committed to their grassroots. It certainly wouldn’t make it in a group of people like this on this side or the members of the Alberta NDP.

I’m going to take my seat and listen to some other debate on this subject. Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It’s my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 3, Special Days Act. You know, I’d like to echo some of my colleagues’ comments. When I look at it, truly, there is a limited amount of time that we have to debate legislation, for the government to bring forward legislation for us to debate in this place and pass. And with such a finite amount of time, I guess, I thought there was some kind of matrix that this government would use to score or to determine what is most important to Albertans and what will have the largest impact on Albertans, where the greatest need is.

I mean, I look around at where we are right now. There’s so much going on. We’re still in a pandemic. There are crises all over the place, and what we’re debating is a Special Days Act. It’s a bit confusing because I was under the impression that Albertans could already request the declaration of a special day or week or month by the government through a website. If that is not the case – I know that one of my colleagues asked this very question – it would be really great if the Minister of Culture or somebody else that has some knowledge could stand up and provide some clarity.

Now, I think that there certainly is a place for declarations of special days. I think it raises awareness for lots of really great issues. However, if you just use something like this to tick a box, to say: “Look at us. Aren’t we great allies? We flew a pride flag for one day, or we flew the Franco-Albertan flag for, like, 24 hours” when it’s an entire month that it should be up. You know, it sort of begs the question: is this sort of giving more coverage just to say, “Well, it’s a special day; it’s a special week; we’re going to do this for you,” when in fact there’s not a lot of substance behind the support that government claimed to have for some specific special-interest groups or even groups of Albertans that believe certain things or even French Albertans?

One of the examples that I also would like to use – you know, it’s one thing to have a special day and for us to stand up and make a member’s statement and maybe wear a ribbon or a button and talk about how important issues are, but if there is nothing of substance that follows, if there is no true legislative work or subsequent policies that actually drive the agenda forward, then it’s just kind of an exercise in futility.

A good example is the International Day of Persons with Disabilities. Every December, at the beginning of December, we proclaim this. We talk about it. We do members’ statements. We have an event, which is so important. Then there are awards that are awarded to different individuals and to groups, and that is so important. But what is more important than that is the work that goes behind it so that every year on December 3, I think it is, when we stand up and proclaim IDPD, which is International Day of Persons with Disabilities, we can all proudly say that we understand this commitment to the United Nations. The declaration on the status of persons with disabilities involves action and it involves investment and it involves funding. It involves addressing poverty. It involves addressing inclusive education and on and on and on.

But that’s not what this government has done, not with this budget and certainly not with this piece of legislation.

Prayers

The Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen, to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interest and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have a number of guests joining us in the galleries today: guests of the hon. the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore, OP Gothaang and Dee Adekugbe; guests of the Member for Calgary-Klein, Jasneet Lakhyan, Ellen Rose Alog, and Jodi-Lyn McCaw.

Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Federal Equalization and Transfer Payments

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, Albertans well know that we make massive contributions to the rest of Canada. They know that through inequitable taxation we disproportionately fund the federal government in Ottawa. Through federal transfer payments and equalization we also disproportionately fund provincial governments. We help fund their health care, their education, their social services. We fund all these things through net federal taxation out of Alberta into Ottawa to the tune of nearly $20 billion a year. Our economy drives much of the national economy, yet we are forced to make oversized subsidies to the budgets of other governments.

Mr. Speaker, Albertans are more than generous. Albertans support everyone in Canada having similar access to public services, but we also believe in fairness. Fairness is what drives our desire for equalization reform. Unfortunately, this year yet again we see the opposite of fairness. As Albertans work hard to build our economy despite the challenges we face, Quebec has announced that they will be taking $3.2 billion, the money we send them, and writing $500 cheques to every Quebec adult with an income of less than $100,000.

This is outrageous. This is clearly not a matter of providing similar public services across the country; this is a case of direct transfers from the pockets of Albertans to the pockets of Quebecers. If Quebec has enough to start doling out money to everyone, then they have enough money to write a refund cheque payable to the taxpayers of Alberta. This is perhaps the most egregious abuse of transfer dollars that we have ever seen. This is not only unfairness; it is fiscal injustice.

Now more than ever Albertans must stand behind our government. Just as we did in the fall equalization referendum, we must continue our campaign to demand reform and demand that Ottawa fix equalization now.

Utility Costs

Member Irwin: We're going to lose both gas and electricity. I owe over $1,200 on both. We've been unable to pay rent, extreme utility ills, and buy food. This has never happened to me before. I'm ashamed and sad.

Those are the words of Patti, just one of thousands of Albertans who've written us to share their very real struggles. Yet this Premier truly believes that Albertans like Patti are simply making "modest sacrifices." Those are his exact words. If you've never had to choose between buying food, paying rent, your utility bills, then, yeah, you probably think Albertans are just making modest sacrifices, or maybe it's that you're completely out of touch with the lived experiences of working Albertans, or maybe it's that you're a Premier with a seven-figure pension coming who can't seem to empathize with anyone ever, the same Premier who justified his cruel cuts to AISH by saying that they wouldn't be onerous.

But it's not just this Premier. This kind of thinking is insidious in the UCP. I urged this government to take real action to address skyrocketing utility costs. Instead of offering tangible help, like through reintroducing a rate cap or a rebate program that would actually provide Albertans immediate relief, I was told that my constituents should just go look at fixed-rate contracts. Those words aren't helpful. They're not helpful to Patti. They're not helpful to a single mom navigating multiple jobs who doesn't have time to try to figure out the complicated system of fixed-rate contracts. Albertans are being told to go figure it out on their own. It's every person for themselves when it comes to paying their bills, that old "pull yourself up by your own bootstraps" mentality, an incredibly frustrating attitude that assumes that everybody has boots.

Listen, Albertans deserve real help. This government had an opportunity to make life more affordable, to make life easier for all of us, and they chose not to. It doesn't need to be this way. People like Patti shouldn't be forced to fight daily for their own survival. If you are someone struggling right now, I promise you that you're not alone. You are seen, and you've got a party on your side that will do all we can to help you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Coleman History and Roxy Theatre

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to share some exciting news with you today about my riding. I've frequently shared in this Chamber about the amazing people in my riding of Livingstone-Macleod and how it's full of rich culture, with a wide variety of provincial landmarks that many should visit. One of those is the town of Coleman, located in the Crowsnest Pass near the Frank Slide, which is another place I highly recommend that all Albertans visit. Coleman is a small community that was founded in 1904. It was one of the most important coal-producing centres in the Crowsnest Pass and the greatest coalfield in Alberta prior to 1913.

But it also played a part in a more interesting way in Alberta's history as it was the location of Alberta's only armed train robbery. In 1923 Russian men boarded a train in Lethbridge and waited until they were just outside of Coleman before robbing the passengers. After escaping, a few of them were involved in a deadly shootout with what were then officers from the Alberta Provincial Police force and the RCMP. Along with about $400 in cash, the robbers also stole the conductor's pocket watch. This watch led to the arrest of the final suspect and can now be found at the Crowsnest museum, also in Coleman.

In 2001 the community was designated as a national historic site of Canada. Among the many historic buildings in Coleman there is a theatre which just recently, thanks to the Minister of Culture, was also declared a national historic resource. I had the honour of receiving that message earlier this month, and I couldn't be happier for the people of Coleman. The theatre, now known as the Roxy, has so much rich history. It was originally built in 1908, when it was known as the Palm Cafe and Palace Theatre. Unfortunately, they burnt down in 1948 and were rebuilt and were renamed the Roxy. The theatre represents a key piece of Alberta's history when it comes to film and live performances.

I want to thank the Minister of Culture for designating it as a provincial historic resource. I once again encourage all Albertans and extend an invitation to my fellow members to visit Coleman and the pass when they have a moment as a community that is rich and a great place to learn about Alberta's history.

Thank you.

Eastern Slopes Protection Act

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, it takes a special act of cowardice to refuse to debate. In the seven years that I've been in this Chamber, I've taken part in many debates, some where I've agreed and some where I've disagreed, but I've never been afraid to stand up for my views and the people who have sent me to this Chamber to represent them. Sadly, though, this is not something we can say about members across the way.

Our leader put forward a bill that would have protected our eastern slopes from coal mining and enshrined this government's finding from their own coal report into law. This bill was also drafted after we consulted with thousands of Albertans and was supported by tens of thousands. The UCP even supported debating this bill last year, but rather than show some consistency and integrity to debate the exact same bill, only months later the UCP used their majority to kill the bill in committee.

Killing Bill 201 and preventing debate shows us two things: one, the UCP are hypocrites who Albertans can't trust to stand by their own words, and two, the UCP is still reserving the right to tear apart our beautiful Alberta mountains and risk poisoning our water supply with coal mining. The UCP claimed they acted when the minister signed a ministerial order to theoretically put protections in place, but we know those protections are not worth the paper they're written on. With one stroke of a pen the minister can undo all the protections and allow coal mining back into some of Alberta's most environmentally sensitive areas.

Albertans can't trust a government that didn't even want to at least debate the Eastern Slopes Protection Act. They all know full well that this government will undo those so-called protections when the opportunity strikes. Just like last year, I fear that when this UCP government feels that Albertans are no longer paying attention, they will sell off the rights again to strip-mine Alberta's beautiful landscape and risk critical waterways. Albertans just can't trust this Premier or the UCP to protect the eastern slopes.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

1:40 Dee Adekugbe and Ruth's House in Calgary

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There are people one meets in their lifetime that remind them of what is at the core of all of us, humanity. Compassion is a main component of our survival. No nation succeeds, no community succeeds, and no individual succeeds without the deep-rooted humanity that is in all of us. The trouble is that sometimes this compassion gets buried so deep behind the trials and tribulations of our lived experiences and earthly existence that we lose sight of our innermost core and compassion. This oversight not only causes pain and suffering to ourselves, the people closest to us in our communities, but it inhibits our ability to aid each other in our struggles.

Mr. Speaker, I stand today to recognize one of the beautiful human beings on this earth and in our province who has not only overcome struggle but has continued to be a pillar of support and a beacon of hope and light to others. Dee Adekugbe, referred to in her community as Mama Dee, is one of these exceptional human beings that you meet, and it reminds you of what it means to be human. A survivor of domestic violence, Dee has overcome exceptional circumstances of hardship and used her incredible strength and resilience as an opportunity to help others solve a problem in our society that has gone on for too long.

Dee has founded Ruth's House, a safe-haven organization that provides community homes, family support, and community outreach and advocacy for those who've experienced domestic violence. Mama Dee always says that those who have been affected by domestic violence is one too many. The route to being a victim or a perpetrator is a dreadful road of exposure and experience of ugly realities that leads to broken parts in people. Reconciliation and healing need to occur between everyone and in our society.

Mama Dee, I'm so grateful that I got to meet you, and I'm so looking forward to the many bright days ahead as we lean on you and your courage and those you serve to rid our world of corrosive control and support families through organizations like Ruth's House. Thank you so much for inspiring us all to be better.

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, COVID has taken the lives of over 4,000 Albertans. Countless more have been infected by this deadly disease. Thousands have been hospitalized. Thousands fought for their lives in intensive care. Thousands were forced to have surgeries or medical procedures postponed while our front-line heroes fought this pandemic. Students were forced to move from in-person to online learning time and again. People were forced to isolate, lose work, their jobs, their businesses. People had the rugs pulled out from under them by this government, who raced to open for summer and then vanished, nearly collapsing our health care system.

It's been a very difficult two years, and these years will live forever in the minds of the people who have witnessed it. From the first day this pandemic hit Alberta, we've seen friends and family members getting sick, and we stepped up as a community to wear masks, get vaccinated, distance, and stay home when sick. The impacts of this pandemic will live with this province for a long time, but people are still getting sick with COVID. People are still going to the hospital with COVID. People are still in the ICU with COVID, and tragically people are still dying of COVID, leaving devastated loved ones behind. My heart goes out to everyone who has lost a family member, friend, neighbour to this pandemic. It's a pain that too many Albertans have been forced to share.

Now, I completely understand the desire to put this pandemic behind us, but while this government tries to wash their hands of this pandemic, we must always remember that COVID is still here. That's why I urge all Albertans to wear a mask, limit your contacts, and demand clean air in our public buildings. We must be supportive and work to ensure that as we emerge from this pandemic, no one is left behind. So please continue to get vaccinated, continue to stay home when you're sick, continue to support your family, friends, and neighbours. We will get through this together. We just have to choose to do so.

Thank you.

Road Maintenance and Repair in Camrose Constituency

Ms Lovely: Mr. Speaker, this past winter and the seasonal change have been rough for the Camrose constituency. It was a cold and harsh winter, and now for the past month we have seen dramatic changes between warming and freezing. This weather has been doing an unimaginable amount of damage to the roads and highways, with many roads falling behind in maintenance and in some cases, according to some residents, just not being maintained at all.

Highways 14 and 630 have been a huge area of concern, especially with safety. We have experienced many hardships within the community due to the tragedies that continue to happen on these roads. All of us in the Camrose constituency and the surrounding communities need the issues around safety on these roads addressed and dealt with. We are all painfully tired of hearing about crashes that happen on these roads. As parents and loved ones keep getting calls about their child or loved one not coming home, the concerns for safety when one must drive on these highways grow.

Everyone has the right to safety on the roads as a driver. When we wake up in the morning to go to work, we shouldn't have to worry about being able to miss the big pothole just to avoid damaging our vehicle. In more rural areas, where individuals don't have the luxury of paved roads, they shouldn't have to worry about the roads being washed out or ending up in the ditch in the winter and perhaps not being found for hours, let alone days.

Mr. Speaker, not all roads have bad tales, but some occasionally slip through the cracks. We have a tremendous opportunity to make highways and rural roads a safer place for everyone and the best in Canada. I can't think of a better government that can do just that.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

National Indigenous Water Operator Day

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Oki. I rise today to tell the House about National Indigenous Water Operator Day. It is celebrated on March 21 annually, but as parliamentary secretary for water stewardship I believe it's an occasion that needs to be acknowledged. Many of us give very little thought about the quality of our drinking water, and when we do, it's often because something went wrong. National Indigenous Water Operator Day is in recognition of the vital work done and the dedication shown by those who work to provide safe drinking water for our Indigenous communities. These are not necessarily high-profile positions or even ones that are well known unless something goes wrong, and then we value these workers with our very lives.

So thank you to each and every one of the many Indigenous water operators for the incredibly important work that you do and because of your many successes. We may not know you personally, but we celebrate you now on the day dedicated to your service.

I had the pleasure of attending an event at Calgary city hall this past Saturday to recognize some of the front-line water operators. Many of them work and live in Alberta; however, many were able to come from across the country, including Saskatchewan, B.C., and Manitoba.

Mr. Speaker, our rivers, streams, and lakes cross many jurisdictional boundaries. We all appreciate the front-line workers, engineers, and students who keep our water clean and safe. It is a team effort, and please know that you are supported by your provincial government. Your ingenuity and initiative often lead to many creative and effective solutions to everyday problems, but more support is necessary.

Mr. Speaker, to you and to all my colleagues in this Chamber: the next time you pour a glass of water and take that first sip, take a moment to reflect on the many men and women who make sure that our glasses or bottles are full of clean water. We all know how essential water is; water is life.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Charter School Funding

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Providing education for children and youth in Alberta is a high priority for the United Conservative government. In 2019 our government was selected with the mandate to bring back parental choice and education, and that's exactly what we have done. Last week our government announced $25 million in operational funding and $47 million in capital investment over the next three years for charter schools in Alberta. This investment was made possible through Budget 2022 and will greatly improve and upgrade the facilities used for public charter schools.

Mr. Speaker, our government is working tirelessly to get Alberta's economy back on track after the damage caused by the NDP government. As proof of our success in this recovery, Alberta is in desperate need of skilled tradespeople to work as plumbers, electricians, pipefitters. The skills required to work in these industries can be developed through learning in public charter schools. Mr. Speaker, this investment is great news for Alberta. The funding will allow for schools to utilize different teaching styles and will offer students specialized learning in science, technology, mathematics, or engineering. This unique programming will continue the course of providing parental choice in education, which I am very excited and happy to see. I extend my gratitude to the hon. Premier as well as to the Minister of Education for working hard to deliver on the promises made.

My constituents in Calgary-Falconridge are grateful to see a government that is defending our students and parents from the intrusive educational changes made by the NDP. In addition, they're also happy to have a government that is giving their children an opportunity to pursue a specialized education early in life. Mr. Speaker, by investing in education for children and youth, we'll continue to build a strong workforce.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has question 1.

Budget 2022 Vote

Ms Pancholi: Tomorrow is the final vote on this Premier's bogus, no-help provincial budget. It is also a confidence vote on this Premier. I can tell you that our caucus will stand on behalf of our constituents, the people who elected us to serve them, and vote against this budget. We will do so because it fails so deeply to help Albertans as they face a cost-of-living crisis. It also does not properly fund public education. It levels massive cuts to postsecondary and actively attacks public health care. To the Premier: with everything I've just outlined, how can he expect Albertans to support . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Everyone is going to have their opportunity to ask questions today. As members know, I am not opposed to the occasional heckle. What I am opposed to is members having full on conversations with others all in sedentary positions.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: May I begin again, Mr. Speaker?

The Speaker: No.

Ms Pancholi: Okay.

To the Premier: with everything I've just outlined, how can we expect Albertans to support this budget and have confidence in his incompetent leadership?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the NDP once again characterized this budget as a “no-help budget” when, in fact, it increases the base Health budget by $2 billion, taking Alberta from being the second most expensive health care system in Canada per capita to being the second most expensive health care system per capita in Canada, with $600 million of additional investment in this budget on top of $900 million last year to double the number of surgeries that are performed in charter facilities, to provide surgeries more quickly, to increase by 50 the number of baseline ICU beds, to hire more doctors and nurses, taking real action for Alberta health.

Ms Pancholi: But there's no help in that budget for Alberta families. Inflation rates not seen in 30 years. The cost of everything is rising, from groceries to rent to clothing to gas. The UCP knows this, and they still pressed ahead with a $1 billion tax grab on families. They've spurred massive increases to car insurance, to tuition, to school fees, and more. So why would UCP MLAs wait until April 9 when we have a confidence . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

Ms Pancholi: . . . or a nonconfidence vote on this Premier tomorrow? My question is: will it be a free vote? Will the Premier allow MLAs to vote on their conscience?

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 1:52.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, there is a budget bill in front of the Assembly. There will be a bill to reduce the fuel tax by 13 cents, to eliminate the Alberta fuel tax as long as oil prices remain high. That is $1.4 billion in direct cash in the pockets of Albertans on an annualized basis on top of the $300 million in support for high electricity prices through the $150 rebate. Meanwhile the NDP is cheering on their coalition partner Justin Trudeau, who wants to quadruple the carbon tax starting April 1.

Ms Pancholi: It sounds like the Premier is afraid of a free vote.

My message to the MLAs on that side of the House is that they can take a stand, a stand against this Premier and a stand for Albertans. Eighteen members of the government caucus is all it takes to defeat this budget. I'm encouraging each UCP MLA to think long and hard today about why they were elected and to vote on their conscience tomorrow. We know that some members across the way won't be voting for him on April 9 anyway, so will someone in the government caucus or on the front bench stand right now, support your constituents, and vote no confidence in this Premier? Let's take a stand together, and let's build a budget that gives Albertans real hope.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm confident in saying that Conservative MLAs will be thrilled to vote for the first balanced budget in 14 years. [some applause] A balanced budget that we got by responsible spending restraint, dynamic growth across the entire economy, and a balanced budget that is allowing us to eliminate the fuel tax for Albertans starting April 1.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Budget 2022 and Utility Costs

Ms Ganley: This budget does nothing to support Alberta families, and the Premier knows it. Alberta families have been hammered with months of skyrocketing natural gas and electricity bills, and this government refuses to act. The Premier boasted about a natural gas rebate, and it was fake. He planned to do nothing for electricity rates and then offered them 50 bucks. Albertans have lost confidence. They feel abandoned by this entire UCP caucus. Will someone over there do the right thing, stand up, apologize, and actually do something to help Albertans?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, what the NDP and their ally Justin Trudeau want to do – you know, of course, they've actually formally created the coalition. By the way, in case anybody is misunderstanding this, the Alberta NDP is a branch plant of Jagmeet Singh's federal NDP, which is a branch plant of Justin Trudeau's Liberal Party, and they're all in cahoots to make life more expensive for Canadians. They're not satisfied with the punishing carbon tax like it is today. They want to more than quadruple it starting April 1. Will the member opposite stand in her place and vote against the Liberal-NDP hike in the carbon tax?

Ms Ganley: This is the government that dines out on the sky palace roof while Alberta families can't put food on their table. As MLAs we have to demand better. We've demanded a real rebate for natural gas and electricity. We've demanded a ban on utility shut-offs for the next six months at least. The associate minister of electricity has boasted about doing nothing. He's shrugged off concerns from Albertans about having their utilities shut off, and he offered them a fake rebate. Can the Premier tell families why he thinks it's okay to pass a budget that will drown them in debt?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, on inflation the NDP supported Justin Trudeau's ridiculous vax requirement for truckers that created further problems for our supply chains. They supported the teamsters, against Alberta farmers and commodity producers, in opposing a settlement to that work action, further driving up inflation. They brought in the carbon tax. They're cheering on Justin Trudeau's plan to more than quadruple it, and with their coalition with Justin Trudeau they want to keep printing money, driving up inflation even further. There is no party that is further away from Canadians than the NDP on the issue of inflation.

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, this Premier's ability to ignore the genuine struggles of Alberta families is absolutely astounding. The budget is due for a vote tomorrow. Albertans can't afford their utilities, their car insurance, their property taxes, all because of this government. They even want to tax the family camping trip. This budget fails to recognize the realities facing Albertans and is not worthy of this House. Will someone over there stand up, commit to do the right thing? Don't support that budget that does nothing for the people they were elected to represent.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are excited to see the first balanced budget in 14 years because of responsible spending, because of pro-growth policies, the recovery plan that created last year the best year ever in Alberta forestry, in high tech, in venture capital, in exports, in manufacturing, in film and television, even in ag revenues during a tough year. This economy is diversifying. It's growing. The big problem of cost of living is being made a whole lot worse by the Liberal-NDP plan to quadruple their carbon tax. We're going to fight that every step of the way.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert is next.

Budget 2022 and Persons with Disabilities

Ms Renaud: I remember this Premier claiming to be offended at the suggestion that he would take money away from Albertans with disabilities. He called it fearmongering, a scare tactic, and then immediately after being elected, he took thousands away from disabled Albertans. He left them to fend for themselves in a cost-of-living crisis unlike anything we've seen. This budget was the Premier's opportunity to make amends, but he chose to continue to make life harder for them. This budget should not be passed, period. Will the Premier commit to bringing forward more supports for vulnerable Albertans?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, Alberta's economy is growing. The problem we have right now is inflation being worsened by the NDP-Liberal carbon tax.

Mr. Speaker, it's interesting hearing the member opposite talk about ethics when she's sitting next to an NDP colleague who broke the law to violate my personal privacy and the personal privacy of another Alberta citizen. The question is: how long did the NDP know that was going on, and why did they create an environment where it was ethically acceptable in the NDP to violate personal privacy?

Ms Renaud: Our caucus presented Albertans with a plan to put more money in their pockets. The Premier's budget squeezes Albertans for every cent while wealthy CEOs get billions. This selfish, hurtful budget should not be endorsed by this House. I and my colleagues will proudly vote against this no-help budget. We're asking MLAs from all parties to have a conscience and think long and hard about this and vote against this Premier. Will someone on that side take a stand in this House against this cruel budget? Disabled Albertans are watching. They don't care about your spin.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, only the NDP could refer to a budget that has increased support for education, for health care, for Children's Services, for community services as cruel. You know what I think is cruel? Burdening future generations with an enormous debt that, basically, is an intergenerational transfer of wealth from kids who can't even vote for consumption by today's generation. We think that endless deficit spending is immoral, and the NDP is wrong to continue campaigning for even more debt on future Alberta generations.

Ms Renaud: Mr. Speaker, disabled Albertans are hurting. This budget is cruel, and it is harmful, and it will drive Albertans into debt. It will see some households lose power and heat. Imagine that in Alberta. That's unthinkable. It will push more vulnerable Albertans onto the street. If this Premier is so proud of this ridiculous budget, then put it to the test. Put it to a real vote in this House and drop the UCP pageantry. Will the Premier or someone in this House rise right now and commit to tomorrow's vote on the budget, commit that it'll be a free vote?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I'll tell you what. It's not cruel. It's compassionate to invest 600 million new dollars in job training for underemployed and unemployed Albertans. What is cruel is quadrupling the carbon tax to make it more expensive for Albertans to buy groceries, to fill up their gas tanks, to take their kids to school. Do you know we've had 18 per cent food inflation... [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The Premier has the call.

Mr. Kenney: We've had 18 per cent food inflation since the NDP started with their carbon tax in 2015, but they want to impose even greater cruelty on Albertans right now who are having to go to the food bank by making food even more expensive by quadrupling the carbon tax. Shame on them.

Technology Industry Development

Ms Sweet: Upon being elected, the UCP declared diversification a luxury and cancelled several tax credits that support start-ups, attract investment, and support economic diversification. Now Alberta is losing ground to other jurisdictions because we're just not competitive enough. Last year Ontario attracted $7.9 billion, a 295 per cent increase; British Columbia, $2.9 billion, a 224 per cent increase; Quebec, $2.8 billion, a 180 per cent increase. Meanwhile Alberta, a $561 million increase. Is the tech industry really a priority for this government, and why are we falling so far behind?

Mr. Kenney: Well, I'm delighted the member asked that question, Mr. Speaker, because when she was in office in 2018, there were 24 ven cap deals in Alberta, worth $96 million. Last year, because of our recovery plan, there were 87 ven cap deals, worth $561 million, a fivefold increase in the volume of venture capital, a doubling of the number of tech companies operating and global companies like Amazon Web Services, Infosys, Mphasis, and others that are setting up shop here in Alberta in a tech boom that we've never seen before.

Ms Sweet: Billions for other provinces, millions for this government. It's a failure, Premier.

The UCP likes to point to their $4.7 billion corporate tax giveaway as helping the economy, but there's actually no proof. The Alberta Chambers of Commerce says that the UCP corporate tax rate reduction only applies to large, profitable corporations and not to start-ups. They and the Calgary Chamber of commerce and tech leaders have all been calling for the reinstatement of the Alberta investor tax credit. Reinstating this tax credit would put Alberta entrepreneurs on equal footing with other jurisdictions. Why does the UCP continue to ignore our business community?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, the NDP claimed that the job-creation tax cut was going to reduce revenues by $4.6 billion. In fact, no, it didn't. The budget projected that revenues would grow by incentivizing new investment, new job creation, new taxpayers, a broader tax base, and that's exactly what happened. We are now generating $400 million more in revenue at an 8-point corporate tax rate than the NDP was at a 12-point rate. Today their leader told the chamber of commerce she wants to raise business taxes by 50 per cent to put more Albertans out of work.

Ms Sweet: Again, Mr. Speaker, by the end of 2018 the Alberta investor tax credit leveraged $94 million in investment, with 71 per cent of the credit going to Calgary companies. This was vital to the growth of the tech and innovation ecosystem we are seeing in Calgary and included investment in everything from energy to ag tech. The tax credit, if it had not been cancelled, was expected to create 4,400 jobs and attract an additional $500 million in private investment in Calgary. Just this morning our leader promised to reinstate the AITC, which will attract investment to Alberta and help diversify the economy. Why is this government refusing to do the same? It's hurting our competitiveness.

Mr. Kenney: Let's sum up the NDP in today's question period, Mr. Speaker. They stand with Justin Trudeau and his plan to quadruple the job-killing carbon tax. They want to increase taxes on job creators in Alberta by 50 per cent. They defend their 50 per cent increase in income taxes on Albertans. They defended Justin Trudeau's higher tax on jobs through the CPP premium. They support an unfair employment insurance system that hammers Alberta workers to transfer money elsewhere in the country. Why is it that the NDP did not learn the lessons of their disastrous economic record? Why do they want to raise taxes on everything in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein is next.

Auditor General Report on ARCHES Expenditures

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We just learned more about the depths of the incompetent fiscal management under the NDP. Yesterday the office of the Auditor General released their report on the management of the ARCHES grant program in Lethbridge. It revealed how under the NDP millions went missing due to the NDP's wilful blindness. As a reminder, under the NDP's watch this organization couldn't account for 1.6 million in taxpayer dollars of the total $18.3 million they received over three years. To the associate minister: how are you cleaning up the NDP's mess and bringing fiscal accountability to your grants . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. That's a great question by the member. That's what we get, quite frankly, when we get an NDP-Trudeau alliance to manage our finances. We get missing money, we get inappropriate spending, and we get lining of their friends' pockets in the name of helping those who are most vulnerable. It is shameful. We're committed on this side of the House to strong fiscal management. We're committed to improved access to services, strong partners. This organization is under new management, and I am very optimistic about working with them in the future.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for his efforts. Given that it just does not end, that under the NDP's watch this organization's staff attended conferences in Europe, luxury staff retreats in British Columbia, and bought thousands in gift cards from their own families' businesses, and given that the NDP turned a blind eye to this gross misuse of taxpayer dollars, dollars that should have been used to help people, to the associate minister: how can we make sure this never happens again in the future?

The Speaker: The associate minister.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The best thing we can do for the people of Alberta is to make sure the NDP do not get into government again and that they do not have an NDP-Trudeau alliance in this province ever again. Our government has resolved this issue. This government is hard at work ensuring that taxpayer dollars are being spent properly in this province, and that is why we've had the first balanced budget in over a decade in this province.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can't argue with that. Thank you to the minister. Given that the question on everyone's mind coming out of the Auditor General's report is on how this was allowed to happen, to the associate minister: how did this happen?

The Speaker: The associate minister.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a great question by the member behind me. I'm not sure how I can actually even answer that question without the assistance of the members opposite. Maybe the former Health minister, who oversaw the grants, could really help everyone out by publishing her own white paper, quite frankly titled How I Did It: Helping ARCHES Lose 1.6 Million Taxpayer Dollars. You know, that's a report that I'd be willing to read and, I'm sure, all Albertans would be willing to read.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Health Care Workforce Recruitment and Retention

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. New data from the Canadian Medical Association shows that over half the doctors in Canada have experienced burnout during the pandemic. But while every province has had to grapple with COVID, only Alberta's doctors have also had to deal with the incompetence and scare tactics of the UCP, who put politics first and pushed our health care system to its limits while driving doctors away. Doctors remain under enormous strain as hospitals remain over capacity while this government looks the other way and continues to fight with them. Why is the UCP continuing to create chaos and undermine our health care system at a time when our health care heroes need support?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the hon. member for the question, because it's important that we get the facts out on the table. We actually have more health care professionals in the province today than we've had at any other time. There has been an increase in the number of doctors, and we have been working very closely with the doctors and supporting them. We put in our budget this year that it continued the $90 million to be able to support doctors, to be able to ensure that we have doctors in rural Alberta. In addition to that, we have made changes to the formulary in terms of virtual care codes to enable family physicians to be able to continue billing through COVID. We made that change in the fifth wave. We are supporting our doctors, and we're supporting health care.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that doctors and health care workers do not feel supported by this government and given that this was shown in a post by Dr. Neeja Bakshi – she said: “We are still over capacity . . . The new steady state of healthcare. Where demand is high and resources are low. Where we are forced to squeeze every ounce of moral and ethical obligation out of an exhausted workforce” – and given that she says, “I am tired of speaking up and speaking out to a void that doesn't listen,” why are the UCP continuing to devalue health care heroes fighting to hold our system and themselves together by driving to cut their wages instead of giving them help?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, the resources are at the highest level ever. In Budget 2022 that increase is $600 million for this year, and that's in addition to the $900 million in the base operating budget last year, another $600 million the year after that, still an additional $600 million the year after that. That's a $1.8 billion increase over a three-year period. In addition, we are investing $3.5 billion into infrastructure projects across the province. Our government is focused on providing the resources to health care, we are focused on supporting health care professionals, and we are focused on supporting Albertans getting the health care that they need.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that anyone watching can see this minister is not listening, just like health care workers know that this minister and this government are not understanding the realities on the ground – indeed, health care professionals find the UCP want to cut their wages even though they’ve been on the front lines of this pandemic throughout this government’s mismanagement – and given that the UCP even wants to cut the wages of respiratory therapists, who helped Albertans who were sick with and dying with COVID breathe their last breaths, and that they want them to take an 8 per cent pay cut, why is this government repeating these same scare tactics and undermining our health care workers?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government is focused on supporting our health care system and our health care workers. I want to thank all the health care workers, who have done a phenomenal job over the last two years. You know, we are providing increases to health care workers. I’m pleased to point out again the agreement that we reached with UNA, which provided an increase. By the way, that increase was not provided by the previous government. No, we provided that increase. We also provided additional payments and the critical worker benefit to thank health care workers. That wasn’t done across the entire country, but we did it here in Alberta because it was important we say thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

School Construction Capital Plan and Calgary

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government’s disrespect of my constituents in northeast Calgary is well documented. The Premier and the local MLA did nothing to support residents after the devastating hailstorm. The Premier accused and blamed the people of northeast Calgary for the spread of COVID-19 in Calgary, and now this government’s budget again ignores the need of my constituents by failing to invest in the schools and other infrastructure that’s badly needed. Can the Minister of Education please explain what metrics she used to deny my constituents the new school they need in northeast Calgary?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We’re supporting schools right across this province. There are 66 current projects on the go, 15 new projects announced, and of course it goes through a very rigorous Auditor General approved process, 10 gates that they have to go through. We look at all of those projects, and they will rise to the top as they’re needed.

Mr. Sabir: Given that none of the schools the minister mentioned are in northeast Calgary and given that I raised these concerns with the Premier in budget debate last week but he was unable to give me a reason why northeast Calgary was not given a much-needed school and given that the northeast is one of the fastest growing regions in Calgary and is badly in need of new schools, what message does the minister have for my constituents who will spend a longer time travelling to school to learn in overcrowded classrooms because she wasn’t willing to make these investments in northeast Calgary?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The message I have for his constituents is that, unfortunately, the member opposite is incorrect. We have two schools currently being built in Calgary-North East: Skyview middle school and the north Calgary high school. Of course, that’s in northeast Calgary. We’re happy we announced another school in northwest Calgary. We will continue to announce and take care of Calgary.

Mr. Sabir: Given that the Premier has constantly refused to apologize for his harmful remarks blaming northeast Calgary for spreading COVID-19 . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. It’s very difficult to hear the hon. member’s question, which he has a right to ask.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

. . . and now given that this minister refuses to acknowledge the difficulty she is putting my constituents in by failing to invest in a new school for the area and given that my constituents want answers, will the minister agree to attending a town hall that I will organize in northeast Calgary so she can tell my residents in northeast Calgary . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I previously indicated, there are two schools currently being built in northeast Calgary, but the two public school divisions in Calgary, Calgary public board of education and Calgary Catholic, both got schools, their number one priorities. Their number one priorities were in . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. I’m not sure who was making unparliamentary remarks on the government side about perhaps encouraging people to not speak, but it’s certainly unparliamentary, and I hope not to hear it again.

The hon. minister.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The two schools that were announced in addition to those ones in northeast Calgary that are currently being built: one is in Evanston to address an issue in northwest Calgary of a school that has 103 per cent utilization; the other one is in Legacy in south Calgary.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Rural Health Care and Emergency Medical Services

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Rural Albertans have been blessed not only with blue skies and picturesque landscapes worthy of the silver screen but resources and industries that feed the nation and fuel the world. I’ve been told many times that money is made in rural Alberta, but it’s counted and spent in the big cities. When it comes to health care in rural Alberta, we have the buildings, but we need the people to run the systems, to provide the health care and services that rural communities deserve. To the Minister of Health: can you advise how Budget ’22 will address the gap in rural health care services and infrastructure and specifics, if possible, regarding ambulance services?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the important question. Alberta’s EMS system is under increased pressure. That's why Budget '22 adds $64 million to address needs of the EMS system and make EMS more responsive to community needs. We formed the Alberta EMS Provincial Advisory Committee to provide ongoing and timely recommendations to improve EMS service as well. In the meantime the initial steps of Alberta Health Services' 10-point action plan are already yielding results. One step they're taking is piloting a rural interfacility transfer project that will increase the availability of ambulances in rural areas.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister, for the answer. Given that $22 billion was proposed in Budget 2022 and promises to improve health and operating expenses and given these measurements will improve health standards for rural communities deserving better health care services from AHS, to the Minister of Health: can you provide more detail on the ministry's plan to implement the recommendations from the 2020 AHS performance review as it relates to rural communities?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks again to the hon. member. AHS submitted a comprehensive implementation plan in August 2020 for review. As a result, 19 of their savings initiatives are either complete or under way, and 50 were approved to move forward. Now, AHS moved forward to better virtual care options, consolidating regional EMS, dispatch operations, and contract laundry services. These savings initiatives reinvested $83 million into our health care system, and these funds directly benefit rural, remote, and northern Albertans, who deserve access to the same quality of care as those in urban areas. We are investing in the health care system, and we will deliver for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the worst of the COVID-19 pandemic is now behind us and the Alberta province has removed many of the previous restrictions and there was a large uptake in vaccines that were intended for the initial COVID strains and given that I'm hearing many have experienced adverse reactions or side effects from the vaccines – there are a lot of questions and concerns of how to report these incidents – to the Minister of Health: what is the process for reporting, compensating vaccine injuries in the province, and what is being done to make sure that that process is available to the general public?

Mr. Copping: Well, thanks to the hon. member for the question. As the hon. member pointed out, we are moving into the endemic phase, but I want to be clear that COVID-19 is not yet behind us. While we are transitioning to the endemic phase, restrictions are still in place in high-risk settings. As we've indicated in the House numerous times, vaccines are safe and significantly reduce the chance of severe outcomes from COVID-19. Of the 8.5 million vaccine doses administered in Alberta, only 2,636 adverse events were reported to Alberta Health. That's a safety rating of roughly 99.97 per cent. Now, Health Canada is responsible for certifying pharmaceuticals, and Canada is not offering compensation for . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

2:20 Canadian Energy Centre

Member Ceci: Thank you. The war room's blooper reel includes hiring a failed UCP candidate to run the organization, stealing logos, impersonating and attacking journalists, and attacking an animated kids movie about Bigfoot. Naturally, Albertans would like to see some transparency around the war room and answers about how that money is being spent. In a recent ruling the Information and Privacy Commissioner found that the war room was not subject to FOIP, but the government has the power to change that. Will the government open up the war room to FOIP? If not, what's being hidden there?

Mrs. Savage: The Canadian Energy Centre is needed now more than ever as we see the fallout of global energy supplies with the need to weed out Russian barrels of oil. We see the U.S. now looking to Venezuela [interjections] Oh, listen to the NDP cheering on Russian oil production again. Mr. Speaker, this is exactly why we need the Canadian Energy Centre. We need it to stand up for our oil and gas sector as the United States starts looking to Venezuela, Iran, Saudi Arabia for replacements. We're right next door; they can look to us, and that's what the Canadian Energy Centre is . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Given that the government continues to defend the war room despite repeated failures and given that just a few days ago the UCP voted against cutting funding for the war room despite the minister being unable to tell us what the war room actually does and given that the war room is nothing but an example of the UCP's failed energy policies – while we were successful in making the case for market access, the UCP have not been – zero pipelines, 130,000 fewer jobs than promised, and Calgary has the highest unemployment rate among major Canadian cities, can the minister actually provide the House with one tangible . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud to report and note that the energy industry is thriving. Drilling is up, the service sector is employed again, the land sales have gone up, price has gone up, people are back to work, and that's why we are standing up to the opponents of oil and gas. One of the reasons why the Canadian Energy Centre is not subject to FOIP is to not share its strategy. Why would we share the strategy of the centre to protect our oil and gas industry with those who want to cut it down? We're protecting it.

Member Ceci: Their strategy made oil go up. That's pretty good.

Given that the war room is intentionally designed by the UCP to evade public scrutiny and the Energy minister has been unable to provide even the most basic details about how Alberta's money is being spent and given that the war room is nothing but a money pit that provides no value for the people of Alberta – worse yet, it's a slush fund for the UCP to spend tax dollars for partisan gain – and given that the war room has not provided a single tangible thing for Albertans, will the UCP do what's right and shut it down?

Mrs. Savage: As the members opposite know very well, the Canadian Energy Centre is subject to the Auditor General, and every single penny that they spend is publicly disclosed. But, Mr. Speaker, we will not share the strategy of the Canadian Energy Centre with those who want to use that strategy to stop it. I don't know. The NDP seem to be really good at hacking information. I would assume that their hacker can get into the Canadian Energy Centre website and find out what the strategy is.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Postsecondary Education Funding

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta's NDP know that a well-funded and well-supported postsecondary sector is critical for helping Alberta's future leaders. We've seen two studies from the Canada West Foundation. Now they're showing more young people are leaving Alberta than moving to the province, for the first time since 1988. These are young people that would be starting a family, starting a business, buying houses, launching innovation, building strong communities in Alberta if they weren't leaving. The numbers are crystal clear. The UCP policies on postsecondary are causing significant harm. Why is the UCP gutting our colleges, universities, and polytechnics and driving young people out of Alberta?

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's very clear from that statement that the member just read the Coles Notes version of the report and didn't actually open it and read it in detail. If he would, he would know that there are many factors contributing to that. As well, he would know that there are a number of recommendations in the report that touch on postsecondary education. And you know what? We're already doing those things. It calls for the government to invest more in work-integrated learning. We're doing that. It calls for more focus on competency-based learning. We're already doing that.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that the UCP is ramming through senseless cuts to postsecondary, pushing the best and the brightest to leave our province, and given that, on top of that, they're stacking massive increases to tuition, forcing more students to take out student loans, and then actually hiking the interest on those same student loans, can the minister explain why he is balancing the budget or trying to balance the budget on the backs of our students here in Alberta?

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, Mr. Speaker, the budget is balanced because we stopped the reckless spending that those members had us on the trajectory to continue. We've reined in spending. We've balanced Alberta's finances and have presented a balanced budget for the first time in eight years. When it comes to tuition, tuition today is below the national average, but, in addition, we've added more to scholarships, bursaries, and other student awards to ensure that every Albertan has the opportunity to access postsecondary education. That's being maintained through Budget 2022 and being committed to.

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, given that this minister has and still stubbornly thinks that cuts and cost hikes are a good idea when so many postsecondary students and young people are voting with their feet and simply leaving this province, will someone on that side of the House rise and tell this minister that his cuts are putting our postsecondary institutions in jeopardy and his cost hikes are cruel and he's driving out the very future that we rely on, which is our young people? It takes generations to build the reputation of our schools, but it takes only months to let it wash away in a sea of cuts and disrespect to postsecondary education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Mr. Speaker, we've worked over the last few years to bring funding in line with other provinces. Across the U15 the universities of Alberta and Calgary, which are included in that category, remained at the top of the U15 when it comes to funding levels on a per student basis. The average funding level across the U15 was approximately $12,000 dollars. Many of our universities in Alberta were way above that at $15,000, $16,000 in funding. Again, coming back to the report, one of the other things the report – and I have it right in front of me – talks about is creating apprenticeships in other careers. Again, another example of . . .

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Klein.

Culturally Appropriate Foster and Kinship Care

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Mr. Speaker, as you know, prior to politics I managed youth homeless shelters. For many of the children we served, their guardian was the provincial government. During this time working with youth in care it became clear that removing a child from their family could be more traumatic than what they were dealing with at their home, more so when they were placed in an entirely different cultural setting. To the Minister of Children's Services: can you tell us what efforts are being made today to increase the availability of culturally appropriate foster care?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I do want to thank the member for the important question. Our goal, whenever safely possible, is to support families so that children can stay safely in their homes, but if we can't do that, we do want to keep kids connected with their families, with their community, and with their culture. We work with community organizations and families to identify culturally appropriate foster and kinship care placements, and we provide training for kinship and foster caregivers to meet a child's cultural needs. We're moving in the right direction as the growth of kinship care placements continues to surpass the number of foster care homes, and we'll continue to support this important work.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for her efforts. Given that culturally appropriate placement is critical for reconciliation and given that it has also been an issue that has been raised as a concern by many cultural groups in my community, including the Somalian, Ghanaian, South Sudanese, Eritrean, and Ethiopian communities and leadership at Ruth's House, to the same minister: can you tell us what efforts are being made to increase the availability of kinship care as well as supports and safety for kinship care homes?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I do first want to thank Dee and the volunteers and board members of Ruth's House for taking the time to meet with me this morning and for the important work that they do to support women and families in our communities. We know the importance of keeping kids connected to their families and their culture, and as kinship care placements increase, we're continuing to make sure that we have culturally responsive support services in place as well. We've improved kinship caregiver training and training for our staff to better understand and assist the unique situations kinship provides, and this also includes supporting the work of our . . .

2:30

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again to the minister for her response. Given that we know that if we truly want to meet the needs of young people, we need to support the families and we need to build strong communities and given that in my experience African Canadians have a strong sense of community and are ready and willing to help their brothers and sisters in need if they could only access the resources that are needed to help, to the same minister: can you share with this House what efforts are being made to partner with volunteer organizations, faith and otherwise, to aid in the efforts of building stronger communities?

The Speaker: The minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We do work with a number of amazing volunteer faith and community organizations right across Alberta to help support families to stay together and identify safe and culturally appropriate temporary homes when they're needed. We're also improving the supports that we have in place for kinship caregivers. As part of our review that we're doing in our ministry, we're creating more culturally relevant home assessment tools for caregivers who are caring for members of their own family or community. I know there is more work to be done on this front, but we're committed to making changes where and when they're needed.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Education Concerns

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Monday I met with the Red Deer Catholic school board, a board that the Minister of Education was very familiar with. They told me that they do not believe this curriculum should move forward this fall. They are grateful that the minister finally delayed some subject areas and some grades. But it's March 23, and there are no resources, no professional development. Clearly, this curriculum is destined to fail. Will the Education minister listen to her former colleagues and promise Albertans she won't force this failed curriculum on the students she once claimed to represent?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We embarked on the largest, most transparent engagement process on the curriculum, which is exactly what we said we would do. I am very proud to say that we will be introducing the three subjects of mathematics, English language arts and literature, and physical and wellness. You know what? I spoke with a Red Deer Catholic elementary school teacher that is excited about bringing in the English language arts program this September.

Ms Hoffman: Given that the Wolf Creek public board and the Red Deer Catholic board both desperately need schools in Blackfalds since the existing one is already over 100 per cent capacity, given that the UCP's no-help budget offers no hope for Blackfalds, can the minister explain to these families why she failed them in her no-help budget? Did the minister even bring a proposal to cabinet? Was she ignored, or is it that she didn't even bother to fight for the people of Blackfalds?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I've indicated over and over again to the member opposite – she was a former school board trustee. She should know exactly how it works; obviously, she doesn't. There is a gated process approved by the Auditor General in which case – and I'm happy to tell her that there is a new high school going to be built in Blackfalds. She must have forgotten that element. The member opposite should do her homework.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that it's not in this no-help budget and given that Fort McMurray public has a new superintendent in town and given that she's not very happy with this government's Dumpster fire of a curriculum and given that Fort McMurray has asked the government to pause – the superintendent knows that the current draft curriculum is developmentally inappropriate. Given that the feedback isn't new, Minister – the minister has been getting this feedback from school boards, from educators, from academics, from community leaders, from teachers, from people on the street – will she finally listen to Albertans and stop with her bungled curriculum?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education, through the chair.

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, I want to inform the member opposite that, yes, I'm listening to the people of Alberta. We have made refinements. We are bringing forward three subjects in September. We are going to bring other subjects forward. We've been listening to the implementation advisory council made up of teachers, curriculum experts, superintendents, all telling us that we can move forward with the curriculum.

Utility Costs

Ms Goehring: Mr. Speaker, I received an e-mail from Robert, a constituent who wrote to me because his latest utility bill has reached $750 – $750 – in a single month. He's worried because his income is barely covering his basic expenses, and he's having a hard time making ends meet. While Robert struggles, all this government is prepared to do is cut him a $50 cheque. How can this government think that reducing utility bills from $750 to $700 is an improvement? Are you even listening?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can appreciate that utility costs are going up. Electricity costs have gone up. I want to inform this House, though, of the reasons why they're going up. The previous government's policies are a big part of that reason. They overbuilt the system by close to $7 billion when they were in office. They prematurely went from coal to gas, costing Albertan consumers $1.4 billion. Then they teamed up with Justin Trudeau and brought in a carbon tax, costing every Albertan thousands of dollars.

Ms Goehring: Given that another resident of Edmonton-Castle Downs, Ceilia, wrote to me about their utility bills, which have climbed to over $600, and given that she is worried that bills like this will push some Albertans past their fiscal breaking point and into poverty and given that she's looking for support and a fake natural gas rebate and 50 bucks won't help them at all, how many Albertans like Ceilia is the associate minister willing to push past the fiscal breaking point before he steps up to help them?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I always appreciate the questions even when they aren't supported by the facts. You know, as we all are aware on this side of the House, the NDP brought in disastrous policies that drove up the cost of electricity for everyone. Now, my advice to the NDP is to simply advise these people that there are supports to help them. There is help at the Utilities Consumer Advocate. They don't have to do the work. Despite what they tell you, they don't have to do the work themselves. There are people standing by that will help walk them through all their choices, including supports for people that are suffering from a utility . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Goehring: Given that I could stand up here every single day and read more of these stories of my constituents struggling while this government ignores them and puts more effort into yelling in this House than helping Albertans and given that two of the constituents I spoke of today are worried about making ends meet because this government refused to step up when needed but given that this government simply doesn't care about the people who can't make ends meet because of their no-help budget, will the associate minister look into the camera right now and tell Robert and Ceilia why he refuses to help them at all? Better yet, will he stand and admit that he's done wrong by them and commit to voting against this budget?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We certainly do acknowledge that Albertans are facing some increased cost pressures, and we are responding. [interjections] We have brought in a natural gas consumer protection program of gas price . . .

The Speaker: I find the irony of the question referring to certain individuals in the House yelling only to be followed by yelling of that same member's side – it makes it very difficult for the Speaker to understand and, particularly, hear the Finance minister.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we have brought in a natural gas price protection measure that if gas prices go up, like they are in Europe or Asia, consumers will be protected. We brought in an electricity rebate program. It'll be $150 for every Alberta electricity consumer, and we are halting our fuel tax in this province, saving Albertans $1.3 billion.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock.

Athabasca University

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One key mandate of Advanced Education is ensuring postsecondary learning is available for all who desire it, regardless of location. Athabasca University provides distance learning education for students in Alberta and now around the world. The board of governors' move to a near-virtual strategy has many of my constituents concerned over a loss of jobs in their community. To the Minister of Advanced Education: is the government cognizant of the potential impact Athabasca University's near-virtual agenda may have on the local economy, and what is being done to mitigate it?

Ms Hoffman: Nothing.

The Speaker: Order. The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education is the one with the call.

Mr. Nicolaidis: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Firstly, just let me commend and thank the member for his incredible advocacy. I know the member has spoken with me on a variety of occasions, bringing these concerns to me directly, and I want to thank him for being such a strong advocate for his constituents. I will say that we are indeed aware of these challenges, and I'm speaking with Athabasca University to outline next steps. In fact, just this very morning I had a conversation with the board chair to help ensure that we continue to support jobs in the community.

Mr. van Dijken: Given that the decision some 40 years ago to base Athabasca University in Athabasca led to incredible growth and success of the university and given that this was propelled by great communication among university management, academics, professionals, and support staff in Athabasca community and given that the Keep Athabasca In Athabasca University support group fears that the near-virtual strategy may be putting the future success of the university at risk, to the same minister: how will Athabasca University's physical presence be managed, and what support exists for the university to ensure . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaidis: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. In fact, on this very point I have been speaking with Athabasca University, and I have mentioned to them the importance of maintaining their physical infrastructure in the town of Athabasca. I know that the institution has some administrative offices in other centres, but I believe it is critically important that we look at strengthening these physical offices in the town, in the community, to continue to support job creation and job development in the community.

The Speaker: The member.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that a key factor in ensuring the development and sustainability of rural Alberta is jobs and given that jobs in government-funded institutions provide steady employment and act as a shock absorber for the rural economy during downturns in our core industries and given that Athabasca University's near-virtual strategy threatens to quietly move jobs out of Athabasca and potentially out of Alberta altogether, to the same minister: what do you say to my constituents who are concerned that Athabasca University jobs may no longer be recruited from and attracted to the town of Athabasca?

Mr. Nicolaidis: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would encourage the member to inform his constituents that we are taking measures to ensure that Athabasca University remains in Athabasca. In my conversation just this morning I asked the board chair and the entire board of governors to develop a strategy that will not just maintain but also grow jobs in the community. I firmly believe that Athabasca University can excel as Canada's online university while at the same time building and supporting jobs for the local community.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will continue to the remainder of the daily Routine.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The hon. the Government of House Leader, the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Pursuant to Standing Order 15 I rise to give notice that at the appropriate time I intend to raise a point of privilege regarding the comments and actions of the MLA for Edmonton-South. I have the necessary number of copies of the letter I provided to your office this morning. In part my letter reads:

In accordance with Standing Order 15 of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta I am hereby providing you with written notice of my intention to raise a point of privilege today.

Yesterday the MLA for Edmonton-South published a document entitled “How I did it” and held a press conference to explain his actions to the media. Furthermore during yesterday’s proceedings the same MLA stood in this Chamber to ask questions while denying that he was guilty of using the personal information of the Premier to hack vaccine records. I intend to argue that these statements were intended to mislead the Assembly and therefore rise to a contempt of the Assembly.

I look forward to addressing this issue at the appropriate time.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of hon. Mr. Copping, Minister of Health, pursuant to the Public Health Act the Public Health Appeal Board annual report 2021.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order, and at 1:52 the Government House Leader called a point of order which he subsequently withdrew.

That leads us to points of privilege. At the appropriate time, under Notices of Motions, the hon. the Government House Leader provided the House his intention to raise a point of privilege, which I invite him to do now.

Privilege Misleading the House

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for giving me that opportunity. First, let me start with the formalities. Standing Order 15(2) reads:

[Members] wishing to raise a question of privilege shall give written notice containing a brief statement of the question to the Speaker and, if practicable, to any person whose conduct may be called into question, at least 2 hours before the opening of the afternoon sitting and, before the Orders of the Day are called, shall call attention to the alleged breach of privilege and give a brief statement of the nature of the matter addressed in the complaint.

This part of the standing order, Mr. Speaker, I would submit to you, was met when I provided a letter to the Speaker’s office that was time-stamped at 11:15 a.m. today and an e-mail from myself was sent to the MLA for Edmonton-South at 11:23 a.m. today.

Next, the matter, Mr. Speaker, as you know, must always be raised at the earliest convenience. While the MLA for Edmonton-South posted his confession, that he titles a white paper, online yesterday morning, his press conference did not conclude until 11:30 a.m. yesterday, and we still had not had the chance to see what remarks the member would choose to make yesterday inside the proceedings of the Chamber. Therefore, I would submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the earliest opportunity I had to raise this matter was by submitting a letter at 11:30 a.m. today.

Now to the issue itself and the context behind it, which is very important. I would submit, Mr. Speaker, to you that it would be important that we measure what is part of the public record against what the member alleged yesterday in this very Assembly. First, we know that the MLA for Edmonton-South has been frankly obsessed. That is the only word for it. I will table multiple documents from social media as well as transcripts from the member inside the Assembly over the period of the last several months that I believe would illustrate the obsession with the vaccination status of the government and private members of this Chamber.

We also know that the member, Mr. Speaker, raised a motion in Members’ Services on October 18, 2021, seeking to elicit confirmation of the vaccination status of MLAs. After that motion failed at Members’ Services, the MLA for Edmonton-South attempted to introduce an identical motion in the Assembly on October 27, 2021. I do note that in these motions he suggested the Speaker designate a Legislative Assembly Office employee to receive the proof of those vaccinations though it does look like in some of his first drafts he actually suggested that he himself should be the one to receive those vaccination statuses.

Now to the issue and the history of the issue at hand. Mr. Speaker, in December 2021 the RCMP announced – and there was a statement from the RCMP to this effect from the cybercrime investigation team – that they had initiated a criminal investigation after receiving information regarding suspicious activity related to unlawful access of private information related to the vaccination record portal of the Alberta government. The Alberta RCMP cybercrime unit in the course of their investigation developed reasonable grounds, they say, to apply for a warrant to search the residence of an Edmonton resident at that time.

Now, at the time the Member for Edmonton-South announced, with the NDP caucus, that he would be leaving the NDP caucus and indicated at that time that he may or may not have been associated with that investigation. If you fast-forward to yesterday, the member publishes a document and does interviews in advance of publishing that document. I do want to stress that the document is available online, and I will table it as well. It is authored by the Member for Edmonton-South, and it is titled How I Did It, in which he outlines how he used the personal information of a member of this Chamber, who happens to also be the Premier of Alberta, to be able to go and get vaccination records on the computer.

He also at that time does interviews with the Edmonton Journal in which he admits to hacking the Alberta government’s COVID vaccination record system last year and admits that said search warrant had been served on his place of business. He goes on to say that he used a hacking script to try to guess health care numbers of Albertans and then, ultimately, would go on to use personal information that he found online of a member of this Assembly, the Premier of Alberta, the MLA for Calgary-Lougheed, which is the very definition of identity theft, to be able to go into that computer system and be able to attempt to access that member’s information.

He goes on, inside his own document – this is a document that has been published by the hon. member – to say that after modifying that script to be able to try and get access, he also then ultimately would obtain the records not of the Premier but of another private citizen of the province of Alberta while he was attempting to do so. That record is, clearly, a matter now of the public record and will be tabled in the Assembly tomorrow.

I will also draw your attention to the following. The Health Information Act says:

- (2) No person shall knowingly . . .
 - (b) gain or attempt to gain access to health information in contravention of this Act.

Also, the Criminal Code says in section 342.1:

- (1) Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term of not more than 10 years, or is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction who, fraudulently and without colour of right,
 - (a) obtains, directly or indirectly, any computer service using false information or pretending to be somebody else.

Mr. Speaker, I’m almost there, and I will move on with the point of privilege, but I will table these documents as well.

When you access the COVID-19 vaccination portal, you have to go through both a record of terms of service and agree to the terms of service to use that computer system. You also have to go through and indicate that you understand those terms of service, indicate that you agree to those terms of service. You also have to go through a COVID record of privacy statement and agree to the statements that are associated with that.

I will draw your attention to a couple of specific things that I think are very relevant to this conversation. It says, Mr. Speaker:

By submitting information to this Service, you acknowledge and represent to Alberta Health:

1. You are either requesting Covid Records for yourself, or you are legally authorized to submit information, and request Covid Records, on behalf of the individual whose information you are requesting.
2. You [must indicate] you understand that
 - a. It is an offence under the [Health Information Act] to knowingly collect health information, or gain or attempt to gain access to health information, in contravention of the [Health Information Act].

On the COVID record terms of use you have to agree and indicate that you agree that your use of the Site shall not violate any applicable local, national or international law . . .

In addition, you agree that you will not use the Site for any purpose other than that for which it was intended and you agree you will not:

- (i) use the Site to impersonate another person, or otherwise attempt to gain unauthorized access to another individual's health information or to infringe the intellectual property or any other rights of [a] third party.

To gain access to the site, you have to indicate that you agree with that, that you understand that, and that if you did, Mr. Speaker, in fact, as the member did and has admitted in his documents, use information of another person, you would be in fact breaking multiple laws. That member had to indicate to do that.

I will turn your attention to Erskine May, Mr. Speaker, which says, as you know, that a point of privilege – this is about privilege, I should say.

Generally speaking, any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any Member or officer of such House in the discharge of their duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results, may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

House of Commons Procedure and Practice illustrates the following as a potential breach of privilege:

deliberately attempting to mislead the House or a committee (by way of statement, evidence, or petition).

There is also a three-part test, Mr. Speaker, to be found when allegations are made about a member misleading the Assembly. This test, of course, can be found on pages 653 and 654 of Parliamentary Practice in New Zealand. The three parts of this test are as follows. One, it must be proven that the statement was misleading. Two, “it must be established that the member making the statement knew at the time the statement . . . was incorrect,” and three, that “in making [the statement], the member . . . intended to mislead the House.”

I think it has been clearly established that during yesterday's proceedings the MLA for Edmonton-South said that it was a false allegation when I said yesterday, in response to a question, that he had broken the law. I guess I felt it was self-evident, Mr. Speaker, that by publishing a document publicly detailing the steps that you took to use another MLA's identity, which, as I pointed out earlier, is in contravention of the Health Information Act and in contravention of the conditions to access the COVID-19 proof of vaccination records, it was enough to form the conclusion that the MLA was admitting his guilt. I understand that he can maybe say that he hasn't broken the law because he hasn't been convicted of anything yet. However, I think the hon. member is trying to establish that he isn't guilty because he broke the law out of the goodness of his heart and that his motives mean that he can't be guilty of a crime. I hesitate to point out that that isn't how the law works.

On the second point, we know that the MLA knew the statement was misleading because he posted a document detailing how he used the Premier's private information to access vaccination records and then held, Mr. Speaker, a press conference in case anyone had missed his incriminating document. Then not more than three hours later he's trying to stand up in this very Assembly and claim that I was making allegations against him. He was now stating that he was innocent of wrongdoing after he had held a press conference announcing his wrongdoing. Either the member doesn't know what he believes, or he's attempting to gaslight this Chamber and Albertans.

Finally, we can all know that by calling the point of order, the MLA was intending to mislead this Assembly. Therefore, I think there's no option here except to find that a prima facie breach of privilege has occurred, and the government is prepared to refer this matter to the appropriate committee for review if you do decide so.

I want to close with one other thing, Mr. Speaker, and then I will be done. I will refer you to House of Commons Procedure and Practice, third edition, 2017, Privilege Versus Contempt, in chapter 3.

The House of Commons enjoys very wide latitude in maintaining its dignity and authority through the exercise of its contempt power. In other words, the House may consider any misconduct . . .

Any misconduct, Mr. Speaker.

. . . to be contempt and may deal with it accordingly. Instances of contempt in one Parliament may even be punished by another Parliament. This area of parliamentary law is therefore extremely fluid and most valuable for the Commons to be able to meet [the] novel situations that it finds itself in.

Mr. Speaker, I will table, am happy to provide to you, repeated social media posts, repeated questions in question period to ministers, including the Premier of Alberta, whose information was used to illegally hack into a website, by the Member for Edmonton-South for months. Not once did that member rise in his place and say to the members on this side of the House: I've been hacking your information. Instead, he continued inside this place over and over – and it does beg the question what the Official Opposition knew, when they knew it, but it's not relevant for today – repeatedly stood in this House asking questions of the member whose privacy he was violating and had violated. Certainly, if that is not contempt of the House, I don't know what is.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has also indicated that he went to the NDP caucus and his leadership on September 23, 2021, and asked them to go forward to the Department of Health to say that there was something wrong while he was doing what he calls ethical hacking. That is outrageous, to in any way try to say that it is ethical to use any member of this place's, let alone any other Albertan's, information to try to illegally access a website. But he says that at that point he wanted to draw attention to the government that there was a problem going on with the computer system, which in and of itself is ridiculous. He could have asked that at any moment in question period on September 23, 2021.

As a result of that, the NDP caucus wrote a letter to the Department of Health in which they indicate that they had heard through anonymous sources that there might have been potentially a problem with the website. At no time do they say that their member, their ethics critic, was the one who had been hacking that website. At no time do they say that. In fact, Mr. Speaker, they remain quiet about that for months. Not just the member but his entire caucus remains quiet about that inside this Chamber for months while asking questions of the Premier of Alberta, while asking questions of ministers about this very issue that they were hiding for months. The only time they finally admit that they've been involved in hacking and using a member of this place's private information was when it came to light from the RCMP that there was an investigation, because a search warrant had been served on the hon. member's house.

Mr. Speaker, it is outrageous that a member of this place would be treated this way by another member. It's completely and utterly unacceptable, and I think the member, first of all, should be honest with this Chamber and certainly is in contempt of the Legislature.

The Speaker: Hon. members, as is the convention with respect to points of privilege, those who are named in the point of privilege have the opportunity to respond. They also have the opportunity to delay their response to tomorrow, and I certainly will take time to consider my decision.

The other thing that I might just add for the member: the member may make decisions to respond to the point of privilege or may in fact choose not to respond, given that the matter at hand is under some form of investigation, and may not want to prejudice that in any way, shape, or form in this forum, being that it's being investigated in another. But, of course, that is up to the member to decide. The question for now is: would the member like to respond today, or would you like to provide me notice of not responding at another time as well?

The hon. member.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to reply at the next possible opportunity.

The Speaker: I'm sorry. Can you repeat?

Mr. Dang: I'll delay my response till tomorrow.

The Speaker: The hon. member has elected to provide additional comments tomorrow, and we will take him at his word for that.

That brings us to Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 4

Municipal Government (Face Mask and Proof of COVID-19 Vaccination Bylaws) Amendment Act, 2022

[Debate adjourned March 14]

The Speaker: Hon. members, before the Assembly is second reading of Bill 4. Are there others wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to rise and offer a couple of thoughts on Bill 4, the Municipal Government (Face Mask and Proof of COVID-19 Vaccination Bylaws) Amendment Act, 2022.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Now, I think, first of all, it's important to just recap for everyone here in the House the purpose of this bill. The bill is extremely confined in scope, and it's my understanding that if this bill were to be passed, it would prevent municipal governments in the province of Alberta from passing any bylaw which would require citizens living in that municipality or wandering around in that municipality to wear masks or to be asked to provide proof of vaccination when entering places of business or municipal buildings, that sort of thing.

I'd like to make a couple of points with regard to this particular piece of legislation. First of all, I want to make some points around the efficacy of the measures that the minister is intent on preventing municipalities from implementing. Then I also want to make some comments on the impropriety, I guess, of the Municipal Affairs minister overreaching in this case and imposing his will upon locally elected municipal governments.

Now, I think the first thing that I wanted to say was with regard to the efficacy of the COVID protection measures that the government is intent on preventing municipalities from making bylaws around. That's with respect to wearing masks in public places and requesting vaccination status when going into places of business, public places, those sorts of places that were subject to the vaccine passport that the provincial government implemented in September.

Now, the best that I can understand, Madam Speaker, as far as the reasoning for the government choosing to bring forward this bill is that they failed to implement protection measures sufficient to keep people safe from COVID, and instead of actually correcting that, they decided to overreact and prevent other local governments from also implementing COVID protection measures that were sufficient to protect people. It's incredibly frustrating to me.

Madam Speaker, when the government implemented the vaccine passport in late September, we saw an incredible uptake in vaccines in this province the day that the vaccine passport requirements were implemented, which was a good thing. We know from having delivered billions of doses world-wide of the COVID-19 vaccine that the COVID-19 vaccine is safe. It protects people from dying from COVID. It protects people from having severe nonfatal consequences of COVID. It was a good thing that the government did to implement the vaccine passport to create an incentive for those Albertans who were reluctant to get the vaccine to actually get the vaccine.

I think that the government deserves some credit for doing the right thing in September and encouraging uptake, but as soon as they implemented the program, they started to undermine it. They created a whole host of exemptions, most notably exempting children aged five to 11 from being subject to the vaccine passport, which, I can tell you, created some difficulties for a whole host of kids' groups. My own son was on a soccer team with kids aged 11 and 12. The kids who were 12 years old were subject to the vaccine passport when they showed up to their soccer games, but the kids who were 11 weren't. That didn't make any sense. It created a lot of confusion.

When the omicron variant of COVID reached Alberta, when it became clear that two doses of the vaccine were not sufficient to prevent the transmission of COVID-19 among the population, that we required three doses of the vaccine to have a hope of mitigating the transmission of COVID, what did the government do? They scrapped the program.

What they could have done instead, Madam Speaker, was update the program. They could have said: "Look, obviously, two doses of the vaccine are not enough. We need to encourage people to get three doses of the vaccine." Encourage uptake that way. They could have updated the vaccine passport program and said that, no, you're not considered to be fully vaccinated unless you've had three doses of the vaccine. I can't help but wonder how many people would have been prevented from getting sick and dying if the government had actually taken that approach to the vaccine passport instead of scrapping the program entirely.

We know from the statistics that the government puts out that Alberta lags the rest of the country when it comes to third doses of the vaccine. We are last in Canada with the number of our citizens who have three doses of the vaccine. When it comes to kids aged five to 11, less than half of the kids province-wide have even had one dose, much less two, and they're not even eligible for a third one. It's incredibly frustrating to me, Madam Speaker, that instead of improving the program to respond to the changes in the COVID-19 pandemic, to make the program more effective, they scrapped it entirely. And now we're paying the consequences.

This is also true of masks. When the province implemented their mask mandate requiring people to wear masks in public, they didn't specify what kind of mask was sufficient to protect people from contracting COVID-19 when in public. Public health experts were raising the alarm all along that surgical masks, the cloth masks that people were wearing at the beginning of the pandemic, weren't as effective at preventing transmission of COVID as N95s, the kind that I have on right now. We know that wearing N95 masks or an equivalent is much more effective at preventing the transmission of COVID than the blue surgical masks or the cloth masks that people have been wearing so frequently.

We also certainly know that the government didn't make any efforts whatsoever to enforce these measures. We had an admission as much from officials from the Ministry of Justice when they appeared before Public Accounts last year, that they wanted to take a light touch when it came to enforcement, which essentially meant doing no enforcement whatsoever. So we have a couple of half measures that didn't work, and they weren't adequately enforced.

Yesterday in debate around the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022, I talked about how we've upgraded vehicles to have better safety measures. You know, the government's approach to COVID is like saying: well, strap yourself into your car with baler twine, and hope that that prevents you from dying in a car accident, and if that doesn't work, well, might as well scrap the idea of a seat belt altogether and then make it illegal for people to even try to wear seat belts. That's the kind of approach that they're taking here.

My wish for the government is not only that they would retract this awful piece of legislation but that they would go back to the drawing board and look at COVID protection measures that are adequate to the challenge that the province faces right now, implement them where they need to be implemented, and ramp up enforcement so that they're widely adopted enough to prevent the transmission of COVID. We just got through the fifth wave. Cases, hospitalizations, ICU rates, daily deaths started to decline, then the government lifted all COVID protection measures, and now we see it again. COVID cases are going up all across the province, but you have to do a little bit of digging in order to see that happening because the government won't even report their statistics on a regular basis anymore.

But we know, thanks to the University of Calgary, who is tracking waste-water data from waste-water treatment plants all across the province, that COVID levels are spiking up. They're higher right now in Edmonton and in Calgary than they've ever been except for that period of the fifth wave in January. We have levels of COVID in our waste water right now in the city of Edmonton that exceed the level that we saw during the fourth wave, when the Premier was on holidays and left the hospitals to collapse under the complete lack of oversight from Alberta Health and the government. So we urgently need COVID protections that will keep people safe. I'm willing to entertain the fact that maybe vaccine passports and masks aren't enough. Maybe we need some other COVID protections as well.

My colleagues and I here in the Official Opposition have repeatedly pushed for measures to clean the air in public spaces, particularly in schools. But when the Education department came in front of Public Accounts a few months ago, we asked them how much they spent on improving ventilation and filtration in schools. The amount was zero. This government has completely given up on protecting people from COVID, and it's astounding to me that they are comfortable with the level of sickness and death that we continue to see all across this province. They don't want to do anything, and not only do they not want to do anything; they want to prevent local governments from doing anything to help stem the tide.

That brings me to my second point, this idea of local autonomy. Now, I'm a resident of the city of Edmonton. I've complained loudly about the management in the city of Edmonton on a couple of occasions here in the House. Just yesterday I aired some grievances about the lack of snowplows clearing the roads during the wintertime.

Mr. Eggen: Did they come after that?

Mr. Schmidt: No. The snow melted thanks to the 18-degree temperature. That was the city of Edmonton's plan all along, I guess, to let the snow be self-plowed by the sun at the end of March. I also continue to have issues with the way they manage waste in this city, but what I didn't have an issue with was the way they responded to the COVID-19 pandemic. The city of Edmonton should be given credit for doing the best that they could with the tools that they had in hand to stem the tide of transmission when they did. They acted before the provincial government did, and for that I'm grateful. I think we should all be grateful because the fewer Edmontonians that are getting sick, the fewer spaces that are taken up in our hospitals, the fewer cases.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to address this bill because it is a serious concern not only to myself, of course, but to citizens of the province of Alberta, who we are here to represent and to try to make rules that provide them with the best amount of support and protection to live good lives.

Unfortunately, this bill is clearly intended to do exactly the opposite. The intent of this bill is to prevent people from being able to make a declaration that as a community they wish to protect themselves with the use of masks, public health measures being taken by a local authority in order to be able to protect the people in their community. The fact that this government is actually actively seeking to prevent communities from acting in a co-operative way for the well-being of their own citizens is truly appalling.

We know from research over the last number of years that the use of masks is effective in reducing the number of cases of COVID that occur in a province and occur anywhere and that the use of masks helps to reduce the rate of spread and indeed has helped to prevent significant numbers of deaths in the COVID crisis that we now experience. The research is there, has been done in multiple places around the world, and is readily available to anybody who chooses to spend 10 minutes online to find that masks are indeed effective.

The question isn't one of: should we prevent the city of Edmonton or other places from imposing something on citizens? "Should we prevent them from preventing the deaths of others?" is essentially what we're saying in this bill. We know that if they implement this mask mandate, fewer people will die. The evidence is clearly there. This government has constantly taken the position of doing too little too late with regard to this pandemic, and, as a result, statistically Alberta is the worst place in the country to live in terms of the likelihood of acquiring COVID.

Just a quick look at some numbers from StatsCan from March 17, the latest day that's available. Some other provinces are available after that day, but Alberta has decided not even to report the number of COVID cases, so I had to go back a week to find the last time that Alberta did report. We can see that Alberta reported that they had 533,000 and change, the number of people with COVID, as compared to British Columbia, who had only 353,000 people with COVID.

Now, given that B.C. has a population of approximately 5.1 million and Alberta has a population of about 4.5 million, that means that Alberta's rate of COVID is almost twice what the rate in British Columbia is. You have to ask why two provinces right side by side would have such dramatically different rates of COVID. The answer is that one has a government, British Columbia, that has taken various serious measures and provided absolutely every support they could in the community to try to reduce the acquisition of COVID whereas in this province this government has done only what it has been forced into doing at the last possible second and behind the time when the strategies for reducing COVID would have been most effective.

These kinds of statistics are repeated when we look for incidence of death because, of course, the rate of death follows the rate of COVID. What we find is that Alberta has an excess number of deaths, or a disproportionate incidence of death, over other places such as British Columbia.

We're actually talking about government making a policy decision that is directly related statistically to the number of deaths that are occurring in the province. We have a provincial government now that is making the decision to prevent people from stopping that happening using the best medical research possible. To prevent that from happening.

You know, this is on the same lines as if the government said: "The city of Edmonton can no longer clean its water because that would be unfair. Not everybody has access to clean water, so now the city of Edmonton is not allowed to clean its water. Whatever comes through your tap is what you live with." Can you imagine, if we shut down the systems in the city of Edmonton for chlorinating and cleaning and fluoridating our water, what would happen to the health and well-being of the citizens of Edmonton? It is exactly the same kind of thing that we're doing here. We are actually preventing people from taking public action.

This is a complete turnaround of the last 500 years of science on public well-being. Since we discovered the whole issue of microbes and viruses and so on, our western society has moved toward taking public measures to actually prevent people from becoming sick. We know that having clean drinking water has actually been better for our population than most other medical inventions over the years. More people have been saved by clean drinking water than have been saved by the most advanced heart surgery that has ever been brought into this province or invented in the world.

Public health measures save lives. The statistics are there. They're reflected here in the same way they're reflected in issues such as clean drinking water. Why the government would actually make a decision to interfere with duly elected representatives of the citizens of Edmonton or any other jurisdiction in this province from actually taking action to protect those citizens is really ridiculous and appalling. It's certainly a return to the Dark Ages in terms of science, and it certainly cannot be supported by anyone who has any depth of understanding of the history of well-being of citizens and wishes for the citizens of the province of Alberta to be the beneficiaries of good science in terms of the policy decisions that are being made in this province.

It's particularly egregious that we have a Premier who at one time, just a little while ago, was suggesting that the cities do their own mandates because he was refusing to act on the science at the time, and now that they are doing their own mandates, he's wanting to take that power away from them. Why is he wanting to take that power away from them? Because there is a radical fringe group, that is no longer fringe within his party, that has taken over the party just as they took over our capital city, took over our border at Coutts. Now they've taken over this party, and he is making bad public health policy, that has the consequence of people dying, in order to preserve his electoral ability within his own party.

That's it. That's the only reason why this would happen. There's no logical reason for this thing to happen other than there are people who might vote against him if they perceive him to be taking policy actions for the benefit of Albertans. That's it. There's nothing, there's no explanation in here that explains why you would take this power away, why you would interfere with the good science. We're left with this circumstance of the radical fringe finding a way to push their extreme – and, we now know, morally dangerous and physically dangerous in terms of deaths in this province – into the policy of the party which the Premier represents.

I can't think of a worse reason to actually introduce a bill into this House than to actually want to preserve power in the face of death. You know, in the comparisons around the world if I mentioned the other countries that do that kind of thing, we would have people leaping up on the other side of the House objecting, as they always do. They're always wrong, but they always like to cut me off. We know that they clearly do not take into consideration the evidence before them with an eye for the well-being of the people of this province. We know that under Conservative rule life has become more expensive, more difficult, and now we also can see that it has become more deadly.

I think that we need to take this kind of thing extremely seriously. This isn't about internal party politics. It shouldn't be, but apparently it is on the government side of the House. It should not be about internal party politics. It should be about: how do you actually prevent people from dying? If we look at the number of people who died in this province, if we had the same rate of death as they had in British Columbia, we would be much closer to saving the lives of almost 2,000 people in this province. The statistics are there. People can read them themselves. They're available on Stats Canada when the province decides to update their section, and we can see that the number of people that have died here has been in excess of the number of people that have died in other provinces.

We know from the research that part of the actions that can be taken by governments, good policy decisions that can reduce the number of deaths, are masks. Masks save lives. It's that simple. It should be written on the outside of every mask, that they save lives. And because they do, we should be doing everything possible to get them in people's hands. We should be making sure that people have every support they can to wear those, and in those places where they have no choice but to go, because they are public places, where they need to conduct the circumstances of their lives – to pay their bills, to buy their groceries, and so on – they should be able to feel safe. They should be able to feel like they can leave their home and enter into a place where they will not acquire COVID and the potential of dying.

You know, that means that they should be able to live in a place where it's okay for the local government to say that people should be wearing masks in those kinds of public places. If you don't want to wear a mask and you want to stay at home, that's fine, but that's a personal choice. What government is doing is that they're trying to make a public-level decision, the same kind of decision that we make when we say that every child has to go to school because we want an educated citizenry, when we say things like, "We will provide a public health care system so that you don't have to pull out your wallet in order to go into a hospital," and the same thing we say when we're going to actually chlorinate the water so that we don't have viruses being spread.

That's the tradition and the lineage that this government is rejecting in their attempt to interfere with another level of government completely unnecessarily. They don't need to do this. They could have simply stood aside and let other governments make their own decisions. They would be appalled if the federal government started making decisions about the province of Alberta in this way and started saying: we're taking away your powers in order to make decisions. They'd be standing up and lighting their hair on fire, but they're not now because it's them that are doing it. The philosophical consistency is absolutely lacking in this decision-making here.

It's really appalling to see a government who is acting against the best interests of the citizens only because it aids or abets someone within their own political party for their own political advantage. That's the kind of thing that, you know, we do not want to see happening in our society, where a government seeks only to maintain its own power even at the expense of the lives of its citizens, something that we reject anywhere else around the world and that we should be rejecting here at home as well. I wish that it was a more complex or nuanced thing that we were talking about here and not just simply the lives of Albertans because then you might sort of go: well, they're just wrong, but I guess it's too bad. In this case the outcome, the severity of the consequence of this government decision is such that you cannot stand aside and watch this happen without absolutely condemning the government's decision-making here.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others wishing to join the debate on Bill 4? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's an honour to rise to speak to Bill 4. I say this all the time, that I'm going to keep my comments brief, and then I'll probably ramble on for way longer than I anticipate. I do think it's important to speak to the bill in the bigger context of the democratic process and how this is really signalling an intrusion into the levels of government. I mean, we hear often from the government side that there are concerns about the federal government and the jurisdiction that the federal government has and how it impacts the ability of the provincial government to do the work that they want to do or, you know, the relationship between the federal government and provincial governments.

Then we also see the relationship between provincial governments and municipal governments. I would say that this piece of legislation is challenging in the context of the relationship. I do believe and I am a strong believer in democracy, and I have had numerous concerns as we move forward through the years about the shift of relationships and the erosion around political parties and the discourse that I continuously keep seeing when it comes to how citizens view politics and then how others are treating each other within political settings and just this shift that continuously keeps coming up as we see different scenarios, different pressures happening.

It concerns me that the government felt the need to go here with Bill 4. It concerns me because I truly believe that there is a reason why we elect different levels of government. Local governments are elected by the citizens that they represent to make local decisions, whether it be, you know, like my colleague said, shoveling or clearing roads or not clearing roads, filling potholes, looking at rec centres, services, different things at that local level. Lots of those decisions happen in partnership with the province because there are funding agreements that have to happen.

There are lots of different things that occur between those relationships, but ultimately bylaws are the discretion of the municipalities. Municipalities get to set their own bylaws, and there's a reason for that, because they're responding to the community needs. When we see the province deciding that they want to start injecting themselves into the conversation around bylaws, I become concerned.

This is just one example. You know, I'm not going to get into the debate around the actual content of masks versus no masks, vaccines versus – I'm not going to entertain that conversation because it's actually not the issue of this bill. The issue of this bill is the fact that we have levels of government who have decided that they're going to override the local authority of another government because they disagree with a decision that's being made by the elected officials. That's a really slippery slope.

I think that there are members of the government side that would be very concerned if they made a policy decision and all of a sudden the federal government came in and made a different decision. In fact, we hear almost daily about decisions that the federal government has made that impact the provincial government that they don't like, that they disagree with. They constantly talk about how upset they are about the decisions the federal government is making that impact the provincial abilities to do the work and all the things. It's hypocritical, in a way, for that to occur and then to say: but it's okay that we're going to do it because if we do it, it's okay; if anybody else does it, it's really not. You know, a "Do as I say, not as I do" sort of mentality, right?

I think that, you know, that is a concern. I would like us to get to a place where we start really just respecting the levels of government and leaving the authorities that are given to those levels of government the ability to do the work that they want to do, and I would really, really enjoy it if we could do it in collaboration and if federal, provincial, and municipal governments could actually just come together at a table and discuss issues and get to a place of – they don't have to agree; I can appreciate that we have different views of how to get to places on lots of different topics – at least being able to have a respectful conversation where maybe there is an ability to discuss the issue and compromise on issues.

My concern that I continuously keep seeing – and it's at all levels – is that that willingness to have a respectful and open debate and to disagree is eroding, and it's becoming very much one side versus the other side. I think it does a disservice to Albertans. I think it does a disservice across the nation, to be honest, when it comes to other issues. I think that there is a real opportunity for us to evaluate how we work with each other and how we have these conversations and how we disagree. We can disagree. In fact, healthy debate is good debate, in my opinion. If it's done respectfully and in collaboration and we remember that we are all doing it for the purpose of the good, then it's fine to disagree, but when power is used to try to influence the outcome because there's just a fundamental disagreement, then I think we're on a slippery slope.

I think that that's what Bill 4 does. The province, obviously, we knew, disagreed with what the city of Edmonton was doing. This is very much targeting the city of Edmonton. Yet we also see that there are legitimate concerns that are being brought forward, transit being an example of a bylaw being put back on public transit, which aligns with what the province is also talking about doing because of the close connection, because of the fact that there are many people going on LRTs, going on the C-Train, you know, being on buses. There's a recognition that that needs to happen. Obviously, there's a way to have that conversation where there is a common agreement that that makes sense.

I will just say that I think that is where this bill goes sideways. I don't think it's necessary, for one. I think it was a serious overreach. I think it was used to posture to a municipality that the government didn't agree with and tends to disagree with on a frequent basis and that this was used as a signal. It's a very adversarial way to engage in conversation and to use the ability for legislation to try to influence a discussion.

I would really just appreciate if the government recognized that it wasn't necessary, that it doesn't need to happen, and withdraw it. I mean, that's a great solution to this piece of legislation. The issue is over, right? And if there's going to be a future issue, sit down at the table as adults and have a conversation about it and, like, figure it out.

There is a mechanism here within our legislative process where the government can just say: "You know what? We were a little heavy handed. We created this piece of legislation. We don't need it. Maybe we shouldn't keep fighting with our colleagues and the people we're supposed to be working with in local governance and withdraw it." Like, let's move on.

I think that that's the summary of what I have to say. I mean, again, I said that I would speak for not very long, and I went on longer than I anticipated. Let's just try to get to a place where we can all start working in more collaboration and actually have these conversations without using the power of our positions to try to influence other people.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to Bill 4? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 4 just briefly. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning: I'm glad that she did linger on this bill because towards the latter part of her comments I think she hit on exactly what needs to be done with this bill, which is simply to withdraw it.

We have lots of important things to deal with here in the province right now around affordability. This is the highest inflation rate that we've seen for more than 30 years. Affordability for so many essential services – food, energy, and everything else we might need in our lives – is becoming unaffordable for hundreds of thousands of Albertans right now, and those are the kinds of things that we need to deal with that are within our purview and indeed within our responsibility, Madam Speaker, in this Legislature.

You know, for us to be lingering on a bill that simply is out of step with events that took place in the matter of days after this bill was introduced or the threat was sent out by the Premier to force through legislation on any municipalities that chose to retain a masking bylaw on their books after the province had thought that they would end their masking law – so from the beginning, I mean, the part that we should probably linger on a little bit is a cautionary tale for governments to not abuse their position of responsibility and power.

You know, it wasn't lost on me that right after they did this, we went to the municipalities convention and people were hopping mad. They really were. Lots of people who otherwise – I know I've seen some of these guys for a long time, right? They're otherwise conservatives, maybe mayors or councillors, and they wanted nothing to do with this bill. They found it to be insulting. They found it to be the provincial government overreaching into municipal matters. It broke that sense of trust, that caveat between municipalities and the province to do the right thing on a practical level.

Even if you thought, "Well, we should have a unified mask mandate across the province and everything should always be the same" – I mean, you know, there is something to that – the way that this government chose to do it through Bill 4 and all the threats and bilious thundering and waving of hands and whatnot was not just not appreciated; a lot of people, mayors and councillors, found it insulting, Madam Speaker. I bet you that down in Airdrie would be amongst those people, right? Say, like: back off, provincial government; you just told us a few months ago that we should maybe have regional standards for COVID, which include municipalities choosing to have masking or not according to their COVID rights, right? That same thing came out of the same mouth of the same Premier who then suddenly comes out and waves this thing and says: you're all following the rule; we're going to make a law that you can no longer exercise your right as a municipality to create bylaws to protect your citizens. That's totally the wrong message for relationships between municipalities and provinces. You know, it takes a long time to build relationships, and you can torch them just in an instant by doing things like that.

Again, I've been going to municipality conventions and so forth for a long time, and I never felt the sense of animosity like I did in this last meeting that was just here a few weeks ago in Edmonton. People were mad, and when they're angry, there's not just the emotional reaction; it's being less able to provide the goods and services that municipalities and provinces are responsible for, you know? That's just kind of what happened with this bill. As it happens, the municipalities went through their normal council process and debated this in their own time frame, which is all very fine, and chose to rescind their masking mandate. Not because of this bill. In spite of this bill they chose to do that, right? If you think it's anything else besides that, this sort of macho thing to try to bully people into doing it, it was nothing to do with that at all. In fact, you probably got their backs up, and maybe they said: well, maybe we'll wait a few more days; maybe we'll wait for the weekend, and then maybe we'll think about the masking mandate. You know, like, you get quite the opposite reaction when you choose to do the wrong thing. I learn that all the time.

This is a good learning moment for all, for this government, definitely. This bill is irrelevant, this bill should be pulled, and the longer it lingers, I would suggest, the more damage it does. It's as simple as that. Madam Speaker, that's kind of my feeling on it. You know, I think that we've had long-standing municipal powers to ensure the health and safety of inhabitants of a town or a city, and I think that those laws have served us in good stead for as long as we've had a province, probably even before, when it was a territory. So for this idea that you can play with those things to suit your own political agenda, to try to send some kind of message or whatever it is, is just the wrong way to go about the business of creating legislation and good governance. So there we go; that's my two bits, right? Free advice. Pull the bill, and everybody will be happier. Maybe say, "Sorry" as well, just as a side note. It's not a bad idea.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to Bill 4? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's an honour and a privilege to get up and speak to this particular bill. One of the things that I have to say I found very surprising is that one of the members on the other side of the House talked about having to spank municipalities, and just that language in itself is – well, I don't even know what to call that. Now, what the members on the other side of the House like to do in the privacy of their own homes: that's completely up to them, you know, if they're into that kind of thing.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, this is probably a good time to interject. I'd just caution you to stay on topic, the matter of Bill 4, and not on members of this Assembly. We've had this discussion before in this House, and while you're not quite that far down the path, I feel like you're getting there. I'm just going to interject and provide some caution early on into this speech so that I can hear some other great debate that you have planned. Please continue.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I mean, I am staying on topic, the fact that in regard to this particular bill is where one of the members on that side of the House actually made the comment about spanking, and it just goes to show the type of attitude that members on the other side of this House have when it comes to others.

Now, I prefer to treat other people, especially adults in our society, as equals, equals in that, through dialogue, we can actually come to agreements on stuff, on issues and concerns and whatever the case may be. But this just demonstrates the kind of attitude that some of the members on that side of the House have, as if, you know, they're the authoritarian power that has to come in and lay down the law and tell others how it is and that they either listen – essentially, it's either their way or the highway. That's not the way that we reach productive, number one, relationships, especially when it comes to legislation.

In this case municipalities have the right to establish whatever bylaws they deem necessary for the areas that they represent. I don't think that that's unheard of. I think that's a part of our democracy. But you see, Madam Speaker, the reality is that members on that side of the House love to talk about freedom when it suits them. When it suits them. They're all about talking about freedom when it suits their ideological objectives. But when it doesn't serve their ideological objective, they're ready to run in, in a very authoritarian way, lay down the law, and spank whoever needs it. That's what this bill does.

Now, I've got up in this House a number of times and I've talked about how, you know, proposed bill after proposed bill after proposed bill that this government has brought into this House since they became government is actually taking power away from Albertans, specifically – I've talked about it before – agencies, boards, and commissions. Agencies, boards, and commissions are an avenue by which Albertans themselves can participate in the governing of this here province that we all love. So, to me, it's abhorrent. It's abhorrent that members on that side of the House, Madam Speaker, would actually take that privilege away from other Albertans. It's absolutely unnecessary.

In fact, we should be trying to democratize processes here in the province of Alberta even further, not take power out of the hands of people who are serving on these agencies, boards, and commissions and centralize that power in the hands of ministers of this cabinet or any future cabinet for that matter. I can only hope that when we see a change in government, that's something that – at least I can speak for myself – I would be happy that we would actually change and put that power back in the hands of Albertans so that these agencies, boards, and commissions are actually an avenue by which Albertans can participate democratically, provide input, help make decisions, and then will be implemented by the government.

Here again, Madam Speaker, we see a particular bill that is taking power away from other Albertans and, in this particular bill specifically, from other orders of government. If we saw this happening in any other jurisdiction around the world, I'm sure that members on the other side of the House would be screaming: "Well, that's a dictatorship. It's a centralization of power. How can they do this? This is an affront on freedom." But again, Madam Speaker, as I've said before, members on the other side of the House like to talk about freedom when it serves their ideological objective and only then. When it comes to rights, when it comes to our political rights, our individual rights, when it comes to our social and our cultural rights, yes, these are all things that have to be respected, but your rights end when they butt up against someone else's human right. You should not have the right to exploit another. You should not have the right to oppress another. This government time and time again has created proposed legislation where they come in here, run roughshod, and simply pass on Albertans that actually does that. Quite frankly, I believe that they should be ashamed of it.

This isn't the first time that we're seeing it here in this House. There have been a number of times when they've come into this House and they proposed just such matters. As many of the other members on the other side of the House, you know, we've been at conferences, at meetings of the RMA, AUMA, and people out there, people who have the responsibility of representing their constituents, their regions, are completely dumbfounded that this government would actually bring this piece of proposed legislation into this House.

It's just another example of why not only this Premier but this entire cabinet and, I would say, even this entire caucus cannot be trusted. Albertans should be very, very, very concerned when it comes to the type of legislation that they're proposing inside this House. This is just but one example. Can't be trusted. Municipal leaders all around the province are talking about this. As was stated by the Member for Edmonton-Manning, this sets a very dangerous precedent. This sets a very dangerous precedent. Today it's Bill 4. What's it going to be tomorrow, Madam Speaker? If the government doesn't like what municipalities have decided in terms of what services they provide their citizens, are they again going to bring in another bill that limits how that particular order of government then provides services to its citizens?

You know, they're already tying the hands of municipalities. This is what I find incredibly unfortunate, strange even, Madam Speaker, that they were able to convince a lot of the people from these municipalities, these municipal leaders, that they somehow were going to govern better for Alberta, and in budget after budget after budget that they've presented in this House, they have been underfunding municipalities, taking programs away from municipalities, leaving municipalities with no other avenue but than to tax their citizens more to provide the same level of service. Now those citizens either get a reduced amount of service or they have to pay more in taxes. Which is it? This coming from the party that says that they're going to lower taxes. They're going to lower taxes for Albertans, yet their economic, political decisions are actually making it so that municipalities all across Alberta are having to raise taxes on their citizens so that they can get the same level of service from their order of government. I believe that, Madam Speaker, the members on the other side should be ashamed of that.

It's like they're talking out of both sides of their mouth. They want to be popular, so they say: yeah, we're reducing taxes; we're reducing taxes. Yet the political decisions that they're making inside of this House actually lead to increased taxes on the average Albertan.

Not only that; they decide that they're going to take the cap off insurance. Insurance goes up by 30 per cent on Albertans. Here we are attempting to recover from COVID, and it's getting worse and worse and worse for Albertans because of inflation, because of the economic decisions that this government has made in terms of removing the cap on insurance, removing the cap on utilities, that are making it absolutely difficult for Albertans to actually make it to the end of the month. I can't tell you, Madam Speaker, how many people that I've heard from that tell me they're one paycheque away from not being able to pay their mortgage.

The Deputy Speaker: Member, I hesitate to interrupt, but I am finding a hard time tracking your relevancy to Bill 4. Just a gentle reminder to get back on track. If you need a copy of the bill, I can certainly have one sent to you. We are discussing Bill 4, and the arguments should be as such.

Member Loyola: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate your words of caution. But as you can tell, I'm simply making the association that decisions made by this particular government are actually making it economically unfeasible for a large amount of the population to actually make it to the end of the month. I'm drawing an association between the decisions that are being made by this government in association with this particular bill because of the centralizing of authority, centralizing of power, and, in this particular case, actually taking decision-making power and freedom away from municipalities.

So I ask the members on the other side of the House: which is it? Do you stand for freedom or not? That's the simple question here, Madam Speaker. You can't speak out of both sides of your mouth. You can't govern trying to be all things for everybody. You just simply can't. But you do have to try to do your best to meet as many of the needs of Albertans as possible. What do we hold in common? These are the things that we should be striving for when we govern.

Again, Madam Speaker, through you to the members on the other side of the House, I would say that there . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate this afternoon's debate on this bill and the conversation around freedom from Edmonton-Ellerslie and the points made, I believe, about the Constitution, if that even came up, and how the constitutional powers are divided in this country between federal powers and provincial powers. They seem to have a great deal of concern for Edmonton city council and not of Edmontonians, who overwhelmingly wanted the mask bylaws removed, just as a gentle reminder. I think Edmonton city council heard that, and I'm glad that they heard that and removed the mask bylaw.

With that, Madam Speaker, I will move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 7 Appropriation Act, 2022

The Chair: Are there members wishing to join the debate? First to catch my eye was the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, followed by Calgary-East.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill. You know, it is of deep concern to the people of the province of Alberta, and whenever we are in the House looking at how the money that they contribute to the well-being of us all is spent and if it is spent wisely and with an eye to the benefit of all the citizens of the province – we know that even just yesterday this government refused to allow debate on some aspects of how we spend our money in this province, and they certainly have been hiding from the public eye some aspects of their spending such as the war room, the Energy Centre, that really are quite appalling decisions by a government in a democracy, to not make available to the citizens an opportunity to examine how money is being spent. Here they are hiding great sums of the money, so I'm glad that we have an opportunity now in terms of this Bill 7, the appropriations bill, to have some kind of a conversation.

What I'm disappointed about, though, is that this bill is clearly one that we cannot support because it continues all of the negative things that we have been quite rightly pointing out to the citizens, both in the House and outside of the House, about this government's decisions over the last number of weeks and how those decisions are making life harder, more difficult, more financially expensive, and with fewer positive outcomes for the average citizen. We know, for example, that the government has deindexed the tax rates in this province so that even though citizens may not have received a raise at all in the last year, they'll certainly be paying more in taxes, because inflation is taking some of their money away but is not being reflected in the bracket that they have to pay, so your actual purchasing power has decreased significantly. We know that over the next number of years that's over a billion dollars of money taken out of the pockets of Albertans, without any good reason for doing so, at a time when they're already highly stressed.

We know that the government is also deindexing a variety of other programs, and those programs are reflected in this bill. We see that people on AISH are losing substantial amounts of money. In fact, under this plan AISH recipients will lose about $3,000 in real purchasing power. We're talking about some of the poorest people in our society moving in a downward direction. Now, sometimes you might stand aside and say: unfortunately, it's just the circumstances of the time; inflation is going up and so on.

But it takes no time at all to do a little bit of statistical research online to find that that is not true for everyone in society, that there are significant portions of our society that have actually done much better over the last little while. There are segments of our society whose income has gone up dramatically, and this government themselves has been contributing to that. When it came to making decisions about pay changes to members of the staff of AIMCo, this government made decisions to allow their raises to be considered up to a 39 per cent increase at a time when other people are being asked to take a 10 or 11 per cent decrease.

It's not just incidental or accidental or outside of the hands of the government. This is actually a decision on the part of the government to take money away from the most vulnerable and the poorest in our province and to dramatically increase the profits of shareholders and corporate executives across the province at a time that has already been extremely difficult for citizens in this province, and it's really just completely unacceptable. In looking at this particular bill, we see that there is a whole variety of ways in which citizens are losing that money. We see that the average person will lose about $500 from the deindexing of the income tax. We see that the AISH recipients will lose about $3,000. We see that the Alberta seniors' benefit recipients will lose about $750 at the same time that executive pay in this province has gone up.

There are incidents that are widely available in the public of seeing executive pay that has more than doubled over the last number of years, but we're not talking about doubling the pay of someone who's earning $16,000, where we would say: well, you know, maybe that'd be okay because $16,000 isn't very much. In fact, that's what people who live on AISH are living on, so doubling it would not be that dramatic. But doubling the pay of somebody who's already earning in the multiple millions of dollars and allowing that to happen by reducing taxes on that, by giving a break to large corporations – we know this government has already given a break of $4.7 billion, their own number in their own documents, to large corporations, already-profitable corporations, by the way. It wasn't to help young corporations or small corporations to grow. It was simply giving money to the wealthy.

We have a very strange circumstance in this government's budget where the clear intention is to help the rich become richer and to ensure that the poor become poorer. We hear the government rail against all kinds of measures that have been taken to help average citizens. They continually complain about the carbon levy as somehow an attack on people when it was clear that over 60 per cent of the population was actually benefiting from the amount of the rebate, something the government hates to mention. They don't mention the rebate because the rebate only went to poor people, and that really doesn't matter for them. If you actually look at something like the carbon levy, you will find that it actually enables and helps people, the vast majority of people. The only people that end up paying a bit more under a carbon levy are people that can afford it.

Here we are in this bill doing the same thing over and over again, stealing from the poor, giving to the rich. Monty Python had a little song about that, which I can't repeat because it's against the rules of the House.

Mr. Eggen: Monty Python?

Mr. Feehan: Monty Python, yeah. About stealing from the poor and giving to the rich.

I think we can quite seriously refer to this as the Monty Python government. The specific reference for anybody who is looking for it is the Dennis Moore sketch, by the way: Dennis Moore, stealing from the poor, giving to the rich. You know, this kind of thing is really just appalling.

We stand here saying that the government got lucky. The government got lucky because oil and gas revenues went up, obviously through no control of their own. This government does not set the price of oil. They have themselves said that on numerous occasions. As a result, they got a windfall bonus, but what they're doing is making sure that that windfall bonus is not shared appropriately across the province of Alberta. They're not saying: look, hey, we got all this extra money, billions of dollars, in fact, over what we actually predicted in our own budget.

We know that it was a surprise to this government, and it was, you know, legitimately a surprise. Nobody can predict the price of oil. We know that they didn't count on it, but they're sure celebrating it now and pretending that somehow they had something to do with it when it was actually the international price of oil which brought this government into the black. But they're not saying: "Okay. Look, we got this benefit. It's a benefit for all Albertans, so why don't we share that with all Albertans?" They're instead ensuring that only the wealthy are deriving that benefit, only the major corporations.

This government likes to talk about itself being a pro-business government, but it's not, really. It's only a corporate business government. It doesn't actually do anything for small businesses. I can tell you that the small businesses in Edmonton-Rutherford, the district that I represent, have had a very rough two years. Many of them have had to close shop for periods at a time, had to lay off workers for a significant period of time. They have made applications to the government to try to get something to help them to change that circumstance, to bring back their employees and so on, but they got denied the support because they happened to use an iPad, and the government failed to develop a system that would read the information off an iPad. Then when the government was told that this was a legitimate application that your system rejected because of the particular piece of technology I used to apply: "Oh, too bad, so sad. You didn't apply; you don't get the money." The government was informed of this, but they didn't do anything to change it at all.

What we're finding is a government that really is not focused on the lives of everyday, average Albertans, not focused on the lives of people who are experiencing dramatic increases in their utility bills, not focused on the lives of people who are experiencing dramatic increases in their insurance rates, people who are experiencing dramatic increases across the board. What we are seeing is a government who is happy to make sure that those who are already financially successful get more successful, that the millions of dollars that they reap every year for whatever their position is turns into millions plus but not caring about the people that are living on $1,600 a month, the most vulnerable people who simply have no other alternative. They're on AISH because they cannot actually derive an income on their own. As a society we should be concerned about those people. We should be concerned about their well-being. We should be concerned about them actually living a decent life, not just surviving barely moment to moment, month to month but actually living a vibrant, fulsome life, thriving in a community that's thriving.

But that's not what this government is focused on. It's not focused on the community thriving. It's focused only on individuals thriving. It's really just completely unacceptable that they would introduce a bill that repeats this same error, yet again taking advantage of their ability to determine the lives of poor people in order to be able to support their close personal friends and international business, who subsequently take the monies that they're given and use it to move money offshore, away from Alberta, to other parts of the world.

You know, the government complains about the fact that Alberta has had a really great resource-based economy for many years and, as a result, many people are able to pay taxes to the federal government because they actually earn a good income. They're actually complaining about that and saying: "That's not fair. If we earn a good income here, we shouldn't have to contribute to the federal government because other people don't have a chance to earn that other income, that same kind of income in another province." That's what they're complaining about.

But the same thing can be said throughout the province of Alberta. In some places people have greater incomes and in some places have lower incomes. But do they apply that standard there?

Do they say: oh, we're going to go through the province and look at the municipalities where people on average have a lower income and stop giving them money because why are we supporting them? They don't use that because they know it's absurd and because it would actually affect their electoral chances if they did that. They would actually be hurting the communities that they're representing.

They're willing to say that on a federal level because, as usual, they're completely inconsistent in terms of their economic policy. You know, they certainly have taken on the chance to brag and boast about having brought in what they refer to as a balanced budget, but they are not showing any responsibility as to how that actually was derived and not using that wonderful opportunity of that windfall to actually make lives better for all the people in this province. They could have done many different things. They could simply start by stopping attacking people, stopping deindexing things, and start looking at our seniors and saying: how can we support them more?

We know that, for example, when we increased the child tax credit, we helped to reduce the number of children living in poverty by 50 per cent. If they had simply made the decision to take this windfall profit, put it into more of the child tax credit, they may have been able to reduce poverty up to 100 per cent. They could have added the other 50 per cent, but they took a look at it, they said: "Hmm. Child poverty; executive salaries. Now, which one should we support?" Executive salaries every time.

They could have gone to reduce child poverty. They know, they have actual evidence, that the child tax credit does that because it happened during our term as government. They heard that mentioned many times in the House, that child poverty was reduced by half, and they could have said: "Hey, we found a successful program that actually helps citizens in the province of Alberta. If we reduce child poverty, then we might be able to reduce things like school dropout rates, adult health incident rates, addictions rates, incarceration rates. We could have done all that, because we know that the social determinants of health have indicated that all of those things go up when child poverty goes up, and if we reduce child poverty, we can reduce the demand on other government services over the next number of years."

If you're long-term thinking, that's the kind of thing that you can do. You can actually just take the available research on the social indicators of health and say: let's put extra money into all those things so that we will actually have a better province down the road. They could have chosen to do that. They could have actually had five- and six-year-olds not worried about whether or not they're going to have food to eat for dinner tonight, but instead they're worried about whether or not rich Texas millionaires have a swimming pool in their backyard. That was the choice they made.

They had some extra money that flowed in, through no work of their own, to government coffers, and they had a clear choice as to who would benefit from that, and look who they picked. It wasn't Albertans, it wasn't people who are most vulnerable, and it wasn't the future, a future in which we would have better health, reduced addictions, less incarceration, and greater high school and postsecondary graduation rates. All of that was available to them, and they didn't pick any of it.

This bill is just an example of a continuing desire to adhere to a widely discredited economic idea, that was brought in in another country some years back and has been simply copied by this government from a 1970s manual hidden somewhere in the Premier's office, in which they believe that somehow if you make rich people rich, other people will benefit. It's very clear that this government is unable to read the information on trickle-down economics and how it is being consistently decried by researchers around the world as being a transfer of wealth away from the average citizen to the top 1 per cent of society.

In fact, during these very difficult last two years, we've actually seen the wealth of a few individuals in society more than double and triple in that 1 per cent while the rest of us are either standing still or, in fact, under this bill are actually losing ground. The wealthiest people in America, for example, actually gained $1.7 trillion worth of net wealth over the last two years – $1.7 trillion – and that's who this government has decided to be on the side of, not on the side of the AISH person who is living on $1,600 a month; $1,600 a month.

They couldn't even allow them to maintain that $1,600 a month; they're going to allow inflation to eat that away for the year. All they had to do was just do nothing. If they had done nothing, they might have an argument, that, well, we have some good rates, so why don't we just leave it alone? They actively sought to take money away from people who are living on $1,600 a month. I suspect there's not a single person on that government side of the House that could live on $1,600 a month if they tried, yet they're expecting other people, typically people who have severe disabilities – that's the nature of why they're on the program – who do not have the options to pursue wealth in other ways that may be available to you and I, who absolutely must depend on that money, to do so. They've taken money away from them. They actively do so in this bill. It's just really, completely unacceptable.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-East, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Madam Chair, for this opportunity given to me to rise and express my support for Bill 7. First of all, I would like to applaud the Premier and all the ministers for coming up with a budget that will fulfill our promise to Albertans. It is aimed to have financial stability as the government maintained all the needed services with the assurance of creating jobs and more businesses in the province.

This government had planned to balance the budget from day one. It is a wise and thoughtful plan to eliminate the largest deficit in Alberta's history. In fact, during the start of this government's administration the deficit has decreased even faster than initially planned. However, a new challenge came when every jurisdiction's economy in the world faced the major impact brought by the pandemic, economic downturn, not to mention the decrease of oil prices, which at some point reached into the negative. Through the well-thought-out strategy of the government our economy is showing encouraging signs of recovery and growth, but there is a lot more to be done to further diversify, strengthen our workforce, grow our resources, and extend the needed help for all Albertans.

What is the importance of balancing the budget? The question, Madam Chair, never crossed the thoughts of the previous government. Balancing the budget would mean a lot to Albertans as it would give us the ability to reduce the debt-servicing charge and eventually pay the debt. It would remove the burden to future generations, a debt that they did not incur.

When the previous government assumed governance of the province, debt servicing was under $800 million a year. When they were ousted from office, it was about $2.3 billion a year. Balancing the budget will put an end to a spending spree path being asserted continuously by the NDP so that we can go to the path of redirecting the debt-servicing amount to more useful services that Albertans rely on, including health care, infrastructure, social programs, child care, and education.

Madam Chair, this budget is not only focused on balancing the budget and reversing the deficit; it also includes input from Albertans and stakeholders. The government received feedback and submissions from Albertans and various stakeholders through consultation conducted by way of online surveys, written submissions, and telephone town halls. Everyone's views were all considered by the government, and they were all received as great help in understanding the priorities of families, businesses, and communities. Having said that, let me express my appreciation to all who participated with the Budget 2022 consultation.

After many challenging years of economic and pandemic hardship Alberta is finally moving forward once again. The government's focus on responsible fiscal management and relentless pursuit of economic growth has put the province on a more sustainable fiscal trajectory, creating expanded financial capacity, resulting in additional government revenues.

The job-creating corporate tax cut introduced by this government, Madam Chair, is proving to be the more sensible approach than the increasing of taxes imposed by the previous government. Through this approach we will collect roughly $400 million more in annual corporate tax revenue at an 8 per cent rate than the previous government did at 12 per cent, demonstrating the huge investment framework established since the government took office.

As multibillion-dollar investments are expected to come into Alberta, the Conference Board of Canada, Desjardins, RBC, and TD forecast that Alberta will be leading the country in economic growth this year. Amazon Web Services announced its plan to establish a second cloud computing hub in Calgary, amounting to $4.3 billion, while Infosys and Mphasis are to create thousands of tech jobs in the province. RBC is also creating a tech hub in Calgary with about 300 jobs while EY will create a new finance hub with about 200 jobs in Calgary, impressed with the talented workforce. Northern Petrochemical also announced a $2.5 billion project in the municipal district of Greenvue, and Dow Chemical plans to work on a project that would be the world's first net zero carbon emissions petrochemical plant, which is predicted to cost about $10 billion.

Another huge investment that has landed in Alberta is Lynx Air, Madam Chair, Canada's newest low-cost airline. It joins Flair and WestJet as Alberta-based airlines. These are just some of the many investments creating jobs in Alberta and boosting our economy, Madam Chair.

As we saw, the unemployment rate hit prepandemic levels in December 2021 by gaining about 130,000 for the year, including 6,100 in the oil and gas industry. Moreover, in January this year we heard that Canada lost 200,000 jobs, but Alberta's economy gained over 7,000 jobs. Our unemployment rate continues to drop, and unemployment is at its lowest since September 2019. Eight thousand two hundred jobs were created in February, which means more Albertans are returning to work and receiving a regular paycheque.

Let me also add that Alberta continues to be the world leader in sustainable and responsible resource development among oil-producing jurisdictions. This shows that while we recognize that Canada's largest export is still the oil and gas industry, we are experiencing broad-based investment and economic diversification in our province. Nonetheless, this investment climate and composition does not mean that the government's approach of carefully handling the province's finances will twist. Alberta's government continues its disciplined spending to maintain balance. Budget 2022 is moving Alberta forward by strengthening our health care system, getting more Albertans working, and bringing our finances back into the black.

As we move forward, Albertans need a strong health care system with the capacity to manage extraordinary surges and provide an excellent standard of care to all. Madam Chair, Budget 2022 provides more than $22 billion in Health's operating budget, a $550 million, or 2.4 per cent, increase from the 2021-2022 forecast, excluding COVID-19 costs – it will grow by a total of $1.8 billion by 2024-2025 in order to scale up capacity – another year of record-high investment for health care in Alberta. Record investments in health care mean that Albertans will see expanded access through additional ICU beds, new facilities in their communities, and more mental health and addictions care around the province. This record investment will also ensure that Albertans across the province have access to the highest quality and most modern services our health care system can provide.

Over the next three years Alberta will invest $100 million per year to provide additional health care capacity on a permanent basis, including adding new intensive care unit beds. The budget also includes a $750 million COVID-19 contingency this year, which will help address the surgical backlog and ensure the province can cover evolving pandemic-related costs.

To expand continuing care programs and services for seniors and vulnerable Albertans, Budget 2022 provides nearly $3.8 billion in operational funding for professional health care and support services across the continuing care system, a 6.3 per cent increase over last year.

Through Budget 2022 Alberta's government continues strong support for the education system. It provides an increase of more than $700 million over the next three years to support teachers and to address cost pressures in transportation. This increased funding also recognizes enrolment growth. It includes a 1 per cent increase to both base funding and operations and maintenance funding. In 2022-2023 this increased funding will ensure school authorities can hire the required number of teachers and support staff, address increases in property and vehicle insurance premiums, support schools in maintaining enhanced cleaning protocols, and mitigate the impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic on student learning. Targeted funding of $110 million over three years, including $30 million in 2022-2023, will enable schools to support students experiencing academic challenges and create school environments supporting student well-being and positive mental health.

Recognizing the needed support for working parents and families, Budget 2022 also includes about $2.5 billion over three years in support of a child care agreement with the federal government. Since the program was announced, Alberta parents are already experiencing lower costs, with the price of child care targeted to average $10 per day by 2026. To ensure families can choose the child care that works best for them, 42,500 new licensed child care spaces will be added over the next five years.

To cope with rising inflation caused by global supply issues and the federal government's unrestrained spending, Budget 2022 provides funding for an energy rebate program to help Albertans manage higher natural gas prices.

Madam Chair, Budget 2022 is also investing $390 million over the next four years to bring high-speed Internet to rural, remote, and Indigenous communities across Alberta. This proves that the government is taking action to address Albertans' concerns about connectivity. The pandemic has made clear that access to a high-speed, reliable broadband Internet connection is not just important to Albertans but essential for Alberta's recovery and economic diversification. The government's broadband strategy will power education, workplaces, venues, and homes across the province and will deliver access to connectivity that provides livelihoods and makes life better for hard-working Albertans. From education to health care and from agriculture to small businesses, connectivity will help Albertans interact with the global marketplace, innovate for local solutions, and help diversify our economy.

Madam Chair, Budget 2022 increases the operating expense budget for Seniors and Housing by 4.2 per cent compared to last year. With this budget the government is maintaining the seniors' benefit for those most in need, ensuring that vulnerable seniors can count on a stable source of income. It also enables the 10-year stronger foundations affordable housing strategy, with $118 million in capital funding and $25.3 million in operating funding over three years. Capital plan 2022 allocates $281 million over three years and is a $42.4 million increase over capital plan 2021. It will provide 2,300 new and regenerated affordable housing units.

As the government fast-tracks Alberta's economic recovery, supports will be provided to all Albertans finding opportunities to build their skills, pursue their passions, and support themselves and their families. Budget 2022 devotes more than $600 million over three years to a new initiative called Alberta at work. This new component of Alberta's recovery plan will provide $47 million over three years in capital funding and $25 million over three years in operating funding to support collegiate programs and charter school expansions, creating pathways for students into higher learning and in-demand careers.

Alberta at work also provides $171 million over three years to expand student enrolment in areas with skill shortages. This initiative will create approximately 7,000 additional postsecondary seats in areas such as computer science, information technology, data modelling, finance and financial technology, fintech, engineering, health care, and aviation. A further $30 million will be provided for apprenticeship expansion programs, giving Albertans the training and education and opportunities they need to secure a rewarding career. Over three years $64 million will be allocated for skills development, training, and employment programs. Additionally, investments of about $30 million will be provided until 2024 to address barriers to employment, including training in literacy and numeracy as well as English as a second language courses for unemployed Albertans.

In addition to these investments, Budget 2022 includes $30 million over three years, mostly in commercial driver grants, to address a severe shortage of skilled drivers in Alberta.

There's so much more to mention about Budget 2022, Madam Chair, which brings more great news for Alberta's economic recovery, but I may not have enough time today. Budget 2022 increases supports for vulnerable Albertans, including increases to help them find jobs. Through the Alberta at work program the government has enhanced funding so there can be more practical training to more Albertans looking for work. The budget supports the goal to help individuals and families gain independence and stability by providing opportunities for them to enhance their skills and get connected to jobs.

Budget 2022 ensures community and social service programs remain fully funded, including AISH, income and unemployment support, disability services, and help for people experiencing homelessness or fleeing violence.

Having said that, let me conclude by applauding the Premier, the Minister of Finance, and all the ministers for sticking to our thoughtful fiscal plan and making Alberta move forward to a prosperous financial future. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: I know tradition in the House is to go back and forth between parties; however, I already stated that the hon. Member for Calgary-South East would go, but then followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to my colleague, through you, for highlighting many of the important aspects of Budget 2022. In response to the member opposite: we will make no apologies for standing up for our world-class energy sector. Given that the members opposite did everything they could when they were in government to stifle and harm that industry, it isn't surprising to see them frustrated and confused by our continued support for the most ethically and responsibly produced oil and gas.

The member did raise one real issue that Albertans and Canadians are facing. No, it's not the NDP. It's affordability, an issue that they contributed to with the introduction of the carbon tax, their unsustainable and irresponsible spending, by chasing away virtually all investment, by attacking our own businesses and industries, and through their continued support of Justin Trudeau and the Liberals. The best affordability initiative our government has done so far, in my opinion, was the removal of the NDP from office.

Alberta's current government, on the other hand, is providing real relief to Albertans who are struggling with the increased cost of living. We're stopping the collection of the provincial fuel tax beginning on April 1 to offer Albertans relief from high fuel prices. We're also providing $150 in electricity rebates to ratepayers across the province.

The member did highlight another reason why it's great to live in Alberta. He talked about the basic personal amount, which continues to be head and shoulders above other provinces, the highest in Canada. And he mentioned one other thing, that our supports in Alberta continue to be some of the highest and most generous to Albertans in need. AISH. AISH continues to be at the highest level in Canada. The reason we can do that, the reason we can maintain world-class benefits like that, is through continued financial discipline and responsible government.

Budget 2022 includes record funding for Health and Education, increases to Advanced Education, Children's Services, and Community and Social Services. We're doing this while running balanced budgets, projected surpluses for the next three years.

Thank you for your comments. I'm interested to hear what else you have to say about Budget 2022, which has returned this province to balance.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I expected that to go a little bit longer.

It's an honour to rise and speak to this bill. I do have some comments, though, that I think it's important that we highlight. Again, I mean, we're fundamentally going to disagree that this budget is actually doing anything for Albertans. The government will say that this is the best bill ever and the best budget ever, but the reality of it is that it's actually flat.

[Mrs. Allard in the chair]

Two point eight billion dollars less on expenses is the reality of what this budget actually says. It's flat. It's not actually investing and increasing what the government would like to say in looking at their expenses. In fact, even with this surplus the budget has completely flattened out. There are no big investments happening.

A lot of what we've been hearing from the government are re-announcements of past budgets, of things that they've committed to repeatedly, and we have yet to see any type of outcome.

The Kananaskis pass would be an example of that. The Kananaskis pass was put in the last budget, a fee on Albertans to enjoy their backyard, where there was a commitment that that fund was going to be used to actually do something for the Kananaskis area. The announcement that the government made in regard to that investment was a reannouncement from last budget. It wasn't a new announcement; it was a continuation of the same announcement. In fact, the revenue that this government has created with their fees on Albertans has just been put into, basically, a whole bunch of little savings accounts that aren't actually benefiting Albertans.

I want to highlight something that I think is really important that the government members hear. There is a report – and this comes out on a quarterly basis, so the members are more than welcome to read it every quarter if they would like – that MNP puts out. Now, MNP does, and has been doing this since 2017, a review on the confidence of different provinces on their ability for individuals to be able to leverage their own personal capital. In January, before this budget came out, we were already on shaky grounds. We'll see in April whether or not these numbers have changed, but what I can say is that the title of it was Alberta's Confidence in Personal Finances, Debt Repayment Abilities Plummet amid Pandemic Fatigue and Uncertainty.

In January, before the budget came out, before this government had an opportunity to look at the affordability that was happening in the province, how Albertans were feeling about being able to pay their day-to-day bills, before we saw this massive increase in gasoline prices, before we saw what was going on with natural gas and insurance premiums going up, and now we see farming premiums going up and all the things going up that we've seen in the last even couple of weeks, Albertans were saying:

Compared to the last quarter . . .

So before Christmas.

. . . the number of Albertans who are concerned about their current level of debt has jumped nine points to 50 percent, the highest level amongst the other provinces. Slightly fewer are confident [they're comfortable covering] their living expenses in the next year.

Fifty-seven per cent don't believe they can cover their expenses without going into debt.

Making matters worse, four in 10 . . . say they're finding it even harder to pay down [their] debt. Compared to other regions, Albertans are [more] likely . . . to say it's become much less affordable to set aside money for savings – up a significant six points since last quarter.

Now, in continuation of this report, the Consumer Debt Index . . .

If anybody would like to read the Consumer Debt Index and do some research when you speak to some of these pieces of legislation.

. . . which measures Canadians' attitudes toward their consumer debt and gauges their ability to pay their bills and endure unexpected expenses, has fallen seven points [in Alberta] since last quarter to 88 points – the lowest reading since . . . 2017.

"It's clear households in Alberta are becoming increasingly worried about the debt they are carrying . . . We often see financial optimism wane [around the] holiday bills.

Of course, people buy presents, and you've got all the expenses that come with those holidays.

But additional factors such as [COVID] pandemic fatigue, as well as rising inflation and the potential for interest rate increases are making Albertans feel [far] more financially insecure [than in past years] . . ."

Fewer than three in 10 . . . are confident in their ability to cope with life-changing events without increasing their debt burden. In comparison to the other provinces, Albertans are the most likely (35%) to say they are not confident in their ability to cover an unexpected car repair, jumping a significant 10 points since September. They are also the most likely (41%, +10pts) to say they are not confident they can cope financially with an illness that renders them unable to work for [more than] three months. Four in 10 . . . have concerns about coping with a loss of employment or change in wage or seasonal work, [which is] a jump of 14 points since [last] September – by far the largest increase compared to [any other province]. Albertans are also less confident in their ability to handle a change in their relationship status (27% . . .) or cope with the death of an immediate family member (13%) . . .

Four in 10 . . . Albertans report they're $200 away or less from not being able to meet all of their financial obligations at month-end . . . This proportion also includes nearly three in 10 . . . who say they already don't [have] enough to cover their bills and debt payments, remaining above the national average.

"The cost of living is on the rise, and we expect those households who were already overextended throughout the pandemic may feel they have to resort to [their] credit just to afford basic necessities and make [their] ends meet . . ."

In fact, Albertans are the most likely to admit to paying only the minimum balance on their credit card . . . compared to the other provinces – and [most] Albertans say they have borrowed money they can't afford to pay back . . . ([about] 16% . . .). More also say they were lured in by deals or special offers on . . . Black Friday . . . Additionally, six in 10 . . . Albertans point to low interest rates [as being part of the problem] . . .

With concerns over inflation and cost of living at the forefront of many Albertans' minds, two in 10 . . . believe their debt situation is worse than a year ago. [Fifty per cent] of Albertans say they regret the amount of debt they've taken on. When looking five years into the future, more Albertans appear to be apprehensive about the road ahead.

They believe the debt situation is going to get worse. Reality check for Albertans.

This government stands up and says, "Look at our balanced budget, look at how great we've done, look at all of these things," yet there is nothing in this budget that addresses all of the concerns that I just brought forward. The cost of living is going up in Alberta. Albertans feel it. Fifty per cent are concerned about the future of their finances. When a government stands up and continuously talks about, you know, "Look at all of these great things we've done; we've done all of these amazing things; Albertans want a balanced budget; they're not concerned with what the opposition is saying," that is factually incorrect.

I can't wait until the next quarterly comes out by MNP and I can see what their next report says in March now that they've seen the increase in their utility bills and the increase of trying to put fuel in their vehicles and their new insurance premiums and the bills that they've received in the mail recently, when they see their property taxes from municipalities have gone up because of the cuts that this government has done to municipal funding and the downloading that this budget is doing on the pocketbooks of Albertans. It has a serious impact. To ignore those comments and to say that that's not the case is disingenuous to every single one of our constituents. Fifty per cent, according to this report, of Albertans are worried about their financial security. Fifty per cent. It's factual. I will table this tomorrow if other people want to read it.

It's not just about individuals living on AISH. It's not just about individual seniors' benefits. Those are serious issues that should have also been addressed in this budget, absolutely, but it is the average Albertan who is sitting at home, 50 per cent of Albertans who are sitting at home going: "I don't know how I'm going to pay my bills. I'm worried about our economy. I'm worried about whether or not I'm going to have a stable job and whether or not I'm going to come out of COVID with some kind of financial security."

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

When the government talks about, "Look at all the job creation that we've done," those are part-time jobs. I would really enjoy the government to stand up and talk about how many full-time, long-term, mortgage-paying jobs this government has created versus the part-time jobs that this government continues to use in their job numbers. That's also disingenuous. That's not true to what is actually going on for the average Albertan.

It's not a celebration. This budget hasn't addressed the needs of Albertans, and when you see that the expenses have gone down, $2.8 billion less – $2.8 billion less – of what this government is spending on their overall budget, that isn't addressing any of those concerns, real concerns.

We have a financial instability problem with the amount of capital that people have access to right now. That drives our economy. When people spend, our economy does well. When people can't spend, our economy slows down. People don't have the capital. They don't have the personal financial liquidity to be able to spend, and if they do, they go into debt, which is also not a good thing for our economy. We don't want people going into debt, my members of the government.

Ideally, we want people to have financial security, where they feel like they can spend on those extras, they feel like they can go camping for a weekend and now spend an extra $5, according to the press release that just came out, to be able to reserve a camping spot. They should feel confident in being able to look at new vehicles or look at those luxury items, but clearly Albertans don't feel that way. It will slow down our economy because right now people are trying to figure out how they're going to buy their groceries and how they're going to pay their utilities and how they're going to pay their rent, which ultimately slows down the economy. If you don't have people spending, the economy can't keep going. It's a pretty basic economic idea. I see people shaking their heads, which I don't really understand. I'm a little concerned by that.

Mr. Getson: I'm nodding.

Ms Sweet: I know. I have one member who nods at a lot of things, which is also very concerning to me.

The reality of it is that this budget hasn't addressed how we're going to keep the economy driving forward. That is a concern.

5:00

Talking about the investment of big business, sure. And you know what? If we were getting capital coming in that was big capital, that was investing in big projects, that was actually creating good-paying jobs, that were full-time jobs, there would be a discussion, but the reality is – I mean, we just saw an announcement about Walmart coming into Alberta, but those aren't high-paying, long-term investment jobs. They're not paying people's basic necessities. It is a problem when we can't seem to attract companies to hire people for good, mortgage-paying jobs.

When we're talking about part-time employment and people are working two to three jobs, that's a problem. [interjections] It's a problem, Minister. It is an absolute problem. The fact that I'm getting heckled by the government, by a minister, when I'm talking about basic economics and how to encourage people to be able to have full-time, mortgage-paying jobs is actually very concerning to me. Very, very, very concerning.

Like, read the report. This is about investment and Albertans' personal finances. This is consumer debt indexing. It's real numbers. It's how Albertans feel, and to not have any understanding or respect from this government about the reality that this budget doesn't actually do anything to support that shouldn't be something where the government thinks they should heckle. In fact, they should be listening, re-evaluating, and going: maybe this budget isn't doing what we think it should be doing. What it could do is that it could help to support some of that consumer confidence again by helping bring down some of that cost of living.

The concern that I have is that, again, the government will talk about a 13-cent reduction in gasoline, but there is no guarantee that that 13 cents is going to get down to the consumer. There's nothing that locks that in and guarantees that. So the government can give 13 cents off the taxes, but how do you guarantee that it's going to be in the pocketbook of the person that's buying the gasoline? Where is it in this budget – well, it's not even in the budget. But where is the policy that protects the consumer to know that that 13 cents is coming back into their pocketbook? There's zero. Nothing. It is a false promise.

It is super frustrating to me that when there's an announcement made, there isn't a policy that actually shows Albertans that they're going to get that money back. The $150, which is $50 a month, is also not going to address the cost of living today, because we know it's not actually going to come into effect until maybe October. We also know that right now the cost of natural gas isn't even at the threshold the government set, so it's another false promise on how to address the cost of living going on in this province.

There are strategies that could have been implemented in this budget that would still have maximized being able to have a surplus budget and would still have supported Albertans to feel like somehow this budget supported them, and I don't see it. I don't see it stimulating the economy to ensure that Albertans are actually going to get the jobs that they need, that are good, high-paying, full-time – let's emphasize the full-time part. This inconsistency to the government to keep talking about job numbers that are part-time is absolutely ludicrous, in my opinion. It's not genuine to the reality of what Albertans are looking for, which is good-paying, full-time positions that are long term, not even contracts. Let's get people long-term employment, where they feel confident in staying in Alberta and want to live here long term and want to invest in the economy and want to spend money and want to keep our economy driving. I don't see it, and I don't see it happening in rural Alberta. I don't see it. I don't see that job creation happening in a way where we're encouraging people to stay in rural Alberta. I want them to stay in their local communities. I want people to learn, to live, and to play where they want in rural Alberta, outside of the Edmonton and Calgary areas.

I absolutely, fundamentally agree – I come from a small town. I love my community. I enjoy being able to go there. And you know what? If there was a job for me back in the day, I probably would have been there still. But the reality is that there were no employment opportunities for me, so I moved to the city. I went to school in the city. I got a job in the city. It's what happens. And many of my cousins, of whom I'm sure the chair is aware because she knows some of my cousins, also moved into bigger communities, away from smaller communities, because there wasn't the opportunity for them to do what they wanted to do. It is a fundamental problem.

I was hopeful that when we heard and we could see the writing on the wall that the budget was going to be balanced, there was going to be some ability to address what is happening in Alberta. We benefit from our resources. The price of oil going through the roof right now – I mean, it's gone quite high, and it continues, as my computer keeps telling me, to go up as we speak; well, the market is closed, but prior to the market closing – should be beneficial to all Albertans. It's our resource, yet this budget, which is significantly benefiting from the price of oil, is not reflective of how that's transferring back to the average Albertan.

You can do both. You can absolutely do both. With the royalties that we have and the ability to look at the future and what is going on, there was an ability to do both. I'm not saying: spend it all. Absolutely not. I believe that, you know, we should be financially prudent, and we should be able to have a budget that could have a surplus. There were things that could have happened in this budget . . . [interjection] You know, some of us can talk about the economy, Member. There's an ability to use a budget with a surplus that can still stimulate the economy and can still help relieve the stress for Albertans. It just wasn't done. It didn't address the concerns that have been brought up. It hasn't supported consumer confidence, to be honest.

You know, there are lots of fiscal conservatives that I speak to who like the idea of a surplus budget, but when they looked at this, they said: yeah, the surplus was great, but I was expecting something else. Like, there should have been something else, and there should have been a forward vision. There should have been something that was clearly going to create jobs and do all of the things, yet that's not here.

I'll be honest with you, government members. There are fiscal conservatives that aren't impressed with this budget. There just aren't. Like, they don't think that just because you have a surplus, it's a win. There has to be more in a budget than just a surplus. Where's the vision? Where is this government planning on going? How are they going to create the jobs? How are they going to take care of those people that can't pay their bills? What is going on? Why wasn't . . .

The Chair: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thanks, Madam Chair. I need to stretch my legs. I really appreciate the debate that's taking place in here. I have to admit that the last speaker I listened to intently. Some of the other members from the other side – I can't speak freaky-deaky socialist, so I don't catch most of it. I've got to step up and leave the room sometimes; I hate to say it. But with the member opposite, from Edmonton-Manning, I can listen to her. She does a ton of research. I have a ton of respect for the lady.

I made some notes here because there were a bunch of items. I wasn't originally planning on speaking to the budget even though it's a phenomenal budget, even though it's the best budget that we've had in – how many years? – eight years, a balanced budget. Now, it doesn't come with, you know, as some would think, the unholy coalition of socialism that we're seeing down in Ontario right now, with budgets balancing themselves. [interjection]

The member opposite is heckling. He prefers democracy in action by groups that he supports, like propping up an emergency act that was only used for times of war, unless you have protesters you don't agree with and are silencing speech and going after people's bank accounts, the same group that he's talking about, who are on AISH payments, who actually made contributions to some of those having their bank accounts frozen. He's okay with that type of democracy. I'll continue, Member. Thank you very much.

The Chair: Just a slight caution to direct your comments through the chair.

Mr. Getson: Oh, I'm sorry. My head was in the wrong direction. I have this one bad eye. Sorry, Madam Chair.

To the Member for Edmonton-Manning: again, I really appreciate that. The bad news out there – and I was agreeing with her. She's making comments about my head movement. I was actually nodding with a lot of the items that she had. There were impacts on people's cost of living that we have. There are driving inflationary costs. Consumer confidence is down, absolutely.

There is a ton of pressure on folks, both socially and economically, right now as we come out of COVID. Not to blame everything on COVID, because that would be a cop-out entirely, but there is that lack of confidence. She was talking about part-time jobs. She was talking about lesser paying jobs. She was painting, quite honestly, a very dark picture, but this is the same picture that we inherited in a lot of cases when we were elected. We saw a decline in jobs, of high-paying jobs. We saw a lot of people switching to part-time. We saw a lot of people not having the same consumer confidence, not spending the money.

Now, we compound that with what took place with COVID. Absolutely, people are a little concerned and cautious, and they still should be. They should still be cautious. Don't throw caution to the wind just because we've had a good year, just because we happened to balance the budget, just because we happened to push down the spending, just because we happened to save about $6 billion versus the trajectory of where we would have been if we didn't make those changes.

Now, the other thing the member opposite had mentioned was the windfall from oil prices. Yeah, we got a win. At one point last year we actually were in negative values. The deals that were made with some of the larger companies for curtailing production: the Minister of Energy had to go to those folks and put acts in place to curtail production while they allowed the smaller companies to still produce. We were in negative values. That is bad for everybody across the board, Madam Chair, through you to the other members. We were in pretty dire straits and circumstances. Now, the budget itself – and although some of the members will speak to the great $110 or $120, depending on the commodity prices in the market that are taking place at the time, it's actually pinned at $70-a-barrel oil, so we haven't accounted for all those other windfalls yet.

Ms Sweet: Oh, I know.

Mr. Getson: Well, yeah. We're in agreement, one hundred per cent agreement, on that.

So the question is: what do you do with these potential windfalls? It also has to do with that cash-flow projection and the duration that it takes. I would think – and I think most Albertans would agree – that if there is an opportunity, if there are any windfalls, we make sure we don't send them away in transfer payments, that we don't send them back to the east so they can get on it, or that we don't have that projection forward.

Part of the thing that we'd have to look at is: what can we do? What levers are at our disposal? Although some of the opposition scoffed – not the Member for Edmonton-Manning; she didn't scoff at it. She asked a good question, but some scoffed. They're saying about these 13 cents that you're taking off everyone's fuel prices at the pumps: well, that's no big deal. Well, yeah. It's kind of off-set by that flipping carbon tax coming back again and getting compounded for us April 1, April Fool's. I wish that the members opposite, the one that particularly likes that style of coalition democracy taking place with his fans down there, through you to that member so he can hear me, would actually step up and say: "Maybe we should ratchet back the carbon tax. Maybe it was really a failed experiment, and we don't really know where the dollars are going other than to a Ponzi scheme, in principle, moving shells around and taking it out of people's pockets." That would really give us more of an impact.

The fuel tax itself, the road tax: there are only 13 cents that we have. For some of these things, as the Member for Edmonton-Manning pointed out, we don't have anything in legislation to make that stick. You're right; there isn't a price protection. But with these same companies that curtailed it, the same companies that have been working with us, there's also an agreement. There's a leap of faith. There's trust in that, and there has to be something held to account on that. We're going to be monitoring those items to make sure that that doesn't take place, but we won't be so punitive to try to put other measures in place. It's temporary, too. It's also tied to the commodity prices themselves. What we had to do was make sure that the supply that was already in the tanks ran through the system so that we weren't inadvertently taking away from those other small businesses.

Now, inflation. Well, inflation is on a bit of a runaway. Imagine that, with the financial logic – some are talking about trickle-down economics. Well, I'm not sure when you've got Captain Fancy Socks running around driving up a higher deficit than we've ever had, over all other Prime Ministers combined. You've been having warnings nonstop from the financial community on how to stop that, and it hasn't. Now the chickens have come home to roost. When you put all these pressures on normal people, yeah, they've had enough.

The coal policy. When it came down to rapidly shutting down the electricity – in my area, again, folks, just come out a little bit to the west, and I'll give you a tour of where the mines used to be in production. Thousands of people were put out of work, the compound effect not only from the folks that worked in those mines – high-paying union jobs, I might add, full-time jobs, legacy jobs, and positions where families made their incomes. Legacy: from one generation to the next for years, Madam Chair. The Devon coal institute: they did a ton of research on that front, and Keephills 3 was, I would argue, the cleanest source of electricity in our province. That technology could have been packaged up and sent around the world.

We drastically changed that. Well, not we. When I got here, I jumped out to the project manager that I happened to work in a carbon capture and storage project with, who was from TransAlta, and asked him if we could turn this thing around, fire those plants up. We could extend the life still, keep those thousands of people working. It was too late, but they did get a $1.3 billion package payout because the other folks broke the contracts, and we did add an overbuilt transmission system. And you're absolutely right. To the members opposite, we're having to deal with that right now, and the folks at home, unfortunately, with the way the system works, the ratepayers: it gets pushed back to them. The chicken is coming home to roost again.

It may be paltry, but at least the members, the ministers on this side are putting in programs to try to take those reliefs. We've got to make sure that people know there's an advocate out there for them to call so they can try to get those rates reduced, and we need to figure out the electricity file because – you're right – we can't do it.

And I came to some of this as we're just starting to launch. We're coming off – we're in ground effect, using some aviation terminology; you have an extra buoyancy when you're coming off the ground – and if we come off too quick or we keep getting these other things pulling back on us, offering that additional drag, like that inflation, like the carbon tax, all those things, we do risk falling and stalling. Members, all of us from both sides of the aisle have to make sure that that isn't the message we're sending. We've got to make sure we're doing things that are prudent.

We have to make sure that folks don't overspend at this point as well, and we have to make sure that even if they're taking part-time jobs now, at least there are jobs for them to take. We weren't in that circumstance before. And once we have those part-time jobs filled and the new jobs become available with all the investment we're seeing, then they're moving up the ladder. Again, there was a point in time when, if you served at Starbucks or one of the Tim Hortons, you were getting 30 bucks an hour to serve coffee, not that we want to see that again. It was pretty disproportionate, but that was happening in different markets. When the market starts to roll again and things start to go in place, those wages will come back, and you will see that.

Right now we're seeing a scarcity of labour – believe it or not – a scarcity of skilled labour. Now, arguably, we could have or should have spooled up more people to jump off the couch, get training, and do that. There are a bunch of programs in this budget to help that. When I look at aerospace and aviation – I mentioned this a number of times, and hopefully it resonates with the folks on this side and the members opposite. We did a look over the glass, if you would, into the aerospace and aviation sector. We have 80 per cent transferable skill sets from the energy sector to get in that area. You need the same engineers. You see the cost-control people. You need the technicians that do similar work. We can do that, and that side is taking off.

In fact, I was approached by a company called Nexus Space, that was looking to try to set up here and build satellites and launch vehicles, crazy things that we never would have heard of until we had the Alberta International Airshow, where we started connecting the dots. We were literally doing things and going outside of our comfort zone. Again, they're looking at a stable environment to do that in. A lot of the reasons why these corporations come are the value of living, the cost of living, the quality, and the other amenities that we have. We have that, and we're attracting and garnering that attention globally.

Now, if you take in current circumstances, a lot of us were looking at, you know, short-line rail trying to fill some of these voids. We're talking about the rural Internet package because we need that. The members opposite had mentioned as well: what is rural getting out of this? You're absolutely right. The way we have to build out rural is that we have to make sure that they have some of the services, because they're living in the shadow of these bigger cities, which is commuting time. Also, if we do things like in aerospace, for example, you need to be out in the country, so to speak, utilizing these things on the shadow of the University of Alberta, University of Calgary, et cetera. So having high-paying skilled jobs: we're just on the cusp of that again. It might pain us sometimes to agree on things, but we have to make sure we agree on that. We're trying to get to the same outcomes with the same futures.

The tourism and travel industry. Well, holy crow, you wouldn't believe the amount of attention we got from these little air tours of taking pictures and showing that and with the First Nations, the Indigenous groups around the area. Heck, even Grand Chief Arcand now was helping us with, you know, the gentleman from Michel, Gerard. I'm messing his name up, Minister, offhand. He helped introduce the air show with me. They're full partners in the Villeneuve landing network. These are the types of things we're bringing there. So when the international stage sees First Nations people and fighter jets and the rest of us all together: holy crow.

From that interaction there, we talk about the education file. Grande Yellowhead took that leap of faith. I had the superintendent there, the board chair at the time. We got the schooling program from the Calgary board of education in place where we've got students now – four schools in that area are taking flight training, the basics of flight training, aerospace and aviation, the ground schooling, and getting high school credits for it. Recently at RMA the reeve from Westlock came to me and said that because she saw what we were doing there, she actually reached out to that same school division, so now they can start doing that in Westlock county. These are the things where we've got these skilled jobs, these high-paying jobs.

We have to give people hope again. We have to talk about the brighter future. We have to talk about providing our energy, literally our energy, getting it to markets because it's our place where we should do that. A lot of these jurisdictions have no choice but to go to the communist countries like Venezuela, Russia. Start naming the other ones that go down the lines, the Kazakhstans, the Syrians. They have to get that oil from there. They have to get the energy, and it's our duty, quite frankly, because regardless of how the rhetoric goes in here, we produce the cleanest, most ethically produced oil in the world. In 2018 on the hydrogen file, which is a massive thing, by the way – the hydrogen economy is going to be huge – Japan does an independent study on their own between blue hydrogen and green hydrogen. We were number two only to Russia for producing the most efficient blue hydrogen, so we can see how Russia operates versus us. On the green file, heck, we were in the lower quartile.

Members opposite, please tell some of those stories, too. We don't have to agree on everything, but stop saying that we're going to crash this thing before we've even taken off again. This is something to be celebrated, the fact that we do have some higher commodity prices, the fact that we're weathering the COVID storm and coming out of it. Let's talk about joining people together again, have a grand vision for all of us – for all of us – to gain in. We can be that light again in the country. A lot of people have lost hope, but they're looking towards Alberta because we are leaning that way and we're leading the charge. Please help us tell that vision.

Budget 2022 does that. It might not be the be-all and end-all of where we're going in the next four or five years, but, boy, it sure is one heck of a good start, Madam Chair. We've navigated through the worst of the storms, made it past the icebergs, and we're coming out the other side with a balanced budget that's looking good for the future, and people are paying attention to it. We have to tell that story because the only way you make a story stick is by singing off the same song sheet, being on the same stage, and presenting your best foot forward. The worst thing that we can do is keep shooting each other in the feet here while we do our own little political tap dances and paint the wrong picture.

This is business 101: fake it until you make it. The proof is in the pudding. The minister is down in New York, and the proof is in the pudding. Even the folks in Toronto had to begrudgingly agree: yeah, we're getting it. We're getting it. Grand vision and future building: let's look towards the Pacific NorthWest Economic Region, let's look towards our trading partners that are in agreement with us, that hold the same social values globally as well. Let's be that bastion of hope. Let's get them the energy they need to transition to the fuels of the future, but we're it; we're here right now. Alberta is back. Help me help you to make that dream come true.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

Mr. Jones: The previous NDP government measures success by the amount of money that they spent, not by outcomes or value for taxpayer dollars or with any regard for sustainability or future Albertans. It's not surprising, then, to see that during their time in government they raised spending an average of 4 per cent per year. At that rate of spending, even at the budget's projected commodity prices and assuming their policies hadn't harmed businesses or our energy sector further, Alberta would have a $6 billion deficit this year, a 7 and a half billion dollar deficit next year, and a $9 billion deficit in 2024. They also significantly increased taxes and regulatory burden.

This year Alberta will collect approximately $400 million more in annual corporate tax revenues at our 8 per cent rate than the previous NDP government did at 12 per cent. Our government has cut over 21 per cent of red tape, saving Albertans and businesses an estimated $1.2 billion while making Alberta a more desirable place to invest. Our government continues to work to ensure that Alberta remains the best place in Canada to live, work, and raise a family. Budget 2022 reflects our government's focus on investment attraction, economic growth, and diversification as we move forward to a time when all Albertans will have opportunities to build their skills, pursue their passions, and support themselves and their families.

That is why Budget 2022 includes more than $600 million in new strategic investments for Alberta at work. Over the course of the fiscal plan the government will expand the collegiate learning model, assisting high school students on their path to postsecondary education, trade designations, and in-demand jobs. We'll also add approximately 7,000 additional postsecondary seats in high-demand areas such as computer and data science, information systems technology, finance, agriculture sciences, health, and aviation. New capital investments will also help address critical labour shortages.

Unlike the members opposite, we're creating jobs, we're attracting investment, and we're diversifying Alberta's economy, and Albertans have every reason to be optimistic. With continued responsible government and financial discipline we can avoid burdening our children so they can share in that optimism.

Madam Chair, I'd like to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 3 Special Days Act

The Chair: Are there members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Madam Chair. First of all, I would like to express my appreciation to the minister for introducing this important bill, Bill 3, Special Days Act, which will establish a new process for Alberta's government to recognize special days. Since time immemorial, different societies have given high priority to the commemoration of special occasions. This theme is common in all kinds of civilizations. Cultures, nations, and traditions have their special honorific days for celebrating special occasions, and Alberta is no exception. Special days of celebration help to cultivate a sense of community by giving everyone the chance to connect with those we love and care about on a more profound level.

Every year the province of Alberta recognizes special days to celebrate and commemorate different milestones in our collective history. Indeed, the Alberta government recognizes these special days as days of particular significance for Albertans. These anniversaries, celebrations are significant for many reasons. First, they help us to acknowledge the contributions of past generations by helping current generations remember historic events that are significant.

Also, through the commemoration of these special days such as Hindu Heritage Month, Islamic Heritage Month, Philippine Heritage Month, Black History Month, or Francophonie Month the province can appreciate the diversity and shared heritage of our nation and acknowledge the contribution of different racial groups. This bill will be in recognition of the cultural awareness that is unique to Alberta.

Thirdly, the special days inspire Albertans to take actions that help them to be more involved in important issues within our communities, like Genocide Remembrance, Condemnation and Prevention Month; International Day of Zero Tolerance for Female Genital Mutilation; Sexual Violence Awareness Month; Post-traumatic Stress Disorder Awareness Day; or Human Trafficking Awareness Day. Special days instill a sense of significance and meaning in our lives. Special days also create a perfect opportunity for everyone to be joyful and give thanks for the year's accomplishments.

Currently the government of Alberta does not have a formal legal mechanism to recognize a special day, week, or month. In 2016 the government created a process to declare or proclaim special days, weeks, and months with specific criteria. That process involves the creation of order in council proclamations, but there is no specific statutory authority to make a proclamation.

Some special days have been recognized through the creation of arts while other special days are recognized through proclamations or declarations, which have no formal force or legal effect. The unique rituals that accompany special days appreciate the essence that connect us all to a common source. Also, through proclamations recognizing special days, the government is ensuring that there is a legal framework that supports these special days.

Madam Chair, this is exactly what Bill 3 seeks to achieve, to create a process that we legalize, recognize special dates, and promote greater cultural awareness in our communities. The Special Days Act will regularize how the Alberta government decides to recognize days, occasions, or events that are of great importance to Albertans. Part of what the Special Days Act will also achieve is to give a known legal protection to special days through an act, a one-time declaration, or ongoing proclamation of an order in council. This will equally fast-track the acknowledgement and recognition of special days each year.

If passed into law, Madam Chair, Bill 3 will empower ministers to issue ministerial declarations that recognize the special days for as long as necessary. The act will also continue to recognize days that have been previously announced and recognized through proclamations. More importantly, the bill makes it a requirement for recognized special days to be published on a web page where Albertans can keep track of it. This bill will also allow Albertans who are seeking recognition of special days to submit a request to the relevant government minister through the request declaration form. By simplifying the process of recognizing special days, Albertans will be able to participate in the democratic process, and the government will also be able to avoid duplication of efforts in determining special days.

The Special Days Act will make it easier for the Alberta government to celebrate Alberta's cultural history, diversity, and heritage and focus our attention on values that we hold in high esteem. Currently we have not done enough to recognize the special days because they are only limited to proclamations and declarations and because none of these methods are protected by any legal framework. By allowing this bill to be passed into law, ministers in Alberta government, through ministers' declarations, will have the authority to recognize special days in perpetuity. These days can be easily traced by members of the society. The Special Days Act proposes a simple solution for the government to increase awareness of important issues to our province.

There are so many wonderful things to celebrate throughout the year. Some of these are special dates that still need to be legally recognized by the government of Alberta. Some of these dates are a reminder of how far we have come. The ad hoc process by which special dates are recognized in Alberta needs to be reviewed, and I believe through this bill this process will be corrected. There are currently 11 dates that are recognized through proclamations and nine dates that are recognized through acts. Apart from what I have already mentioned, the other special days as of this moment, Madam Chair, include the Month of the Artist, Alberta Police and Peace Officers' Memorial Day, Day of Older Persons in Alberta, Disability Employment Awareness Month in Alberta, Ukrainian-Canadian Heritage Day, Holocaust Memorial Day, Ukrainian Famine and Genocide (Holodomor) Memorial Day, Family Day, Polish-Canadian Heritage Day.

Though a special day recognition through an act is an important procedure, as members of this Chamber can debate or cast their support for such recognition, Bill 3 will make it faster and easier for days to be acknowledged. Albertans will still be able to request recognition of special dates the same way they always have. They will be able to either write to the relevant cabinet minister or submit a request through the prescribed form.

Having said that, Madam Chair, let me end by applauding the minister and all the ministry's officers for making this initiative, a new way for Alberta's government to recognize special days, making it more efficient to acknowledge and track important occasions. I encourage all the members of this Chamber to support Bill 3, Special Days Act, as we promote greater cultural awareness and inspire Albertans to take action on important causes.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there members wishing to joining the debate on Bill 3? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the colleague from Calgary-East for his comments on this bill. I am pleased to rise and offer a few comments of my own on the Special Days Act. You know, it's interesting to me that this is one of these pieces of legislation that attempts to set out the job description for the Minister of Culture and kind of continues a tradition that we saw last session, where the Minister of Infrastructure needed to have his job description set out in legislation with the adoption of the infrastructure act. Here we have the Minister of Culture setting out his own job description, at least in part, with the adoption of the Special Days Act that we're considering here today.

You know, the minister knows full well that the powers that are being given to him in this piece of legislation are already available to him, that any organization can request a special day or week or month be declared at any time and that currently those declarations have to fulfill some specific criteria. They must recognize important events, milestones, cultural groups, or organizations that directly impact or connect with the province of Alberta. They have to be requested by organizations and not individuals, and they can only make the request once per calendar year. They have to be apolitical, can't be offensive, and adhere to the principles in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Alberta human rights code.

It's a little bit concerning to me, Madam Chair, that we don't see those same criteria set out in this piece of legislation. One can only wonder what the criteria for being declared a special day will be, and I certainly hope that the minister or any of his colleagues in Executive Council with knowledge of the matter will be able to enlighten us here in the Chamber and let us know what conditions must be met before a special day can be recognized under this act.

It should also be concerning to members of the government backbench in particular but all private members about whether or not this bill will have any impact on the ability of private members to bring forward legislation that would set out declarations of special days. I quite clearly recall the colleague from Peace River bringing forward and passing unanimously through I think all three stages of debate as well as Committee of the Whole in one afternoon a declaration celebrating a Polish heritage day here in the province of Alberta. I think this was something that was meaningful not only to the member himself but to constituents that he represented. I certainly hope that this piece of legislation doesn't take away the ability of private members to bring forward this kind of legislation and declare special days on behalf of significant cultural groups or organizations that have a special day in mind.

You know, I do have to say that I struggle with the concept of special days, and anyone who knows me knows that this is true. My children often have to remind me that their birthdays are coming up and, in fact, have to often remind me that that particular day is their birthday. More than once I've been in the position of having to buy my children happy-day-after-your-birthday cards just to make up for the fact that I've neglected their birthday.

The same is true for anniversaries, Madam Chair. I find that I'm now divorced and probably in no small part because I couldn't remember the day that I was married. Now, you know, that relationship ended so badly that I don't want to remember the day that I was married anymore, but I certainly wasn't able to do that when I was married. This is something that continues to irritate the people in my life, but it's still a struggle for me to remember and properly recognize those special days.

However, that's not to say that I don't appreciate the fact that special days do exist and that there is some benefit, I think, to recognizing some special days. You know, the minister, I'm sure, is listening intently to debate and is probably taking suggestions for some special days that I think Alberta would be wise to recognize. I have some suggestions here for him should he choose to consider them.

First of all, today is National Puppy Day. I think we all appreciate – well, my friend from Calgary-Bhullar-McCall has some reservations about dogs, but the majority of the members here appreciate our canine companions. I think it would be appropriate for the minister to formally recognize puppy day here in the province of Alberta just to celebrate the benefits of canine companionship. That's one suggestion.

There could be a national cat day. I don't know, off the top of my head, when an Alberta cat day would be. I know that that would be an incredible irritant to the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, to officially recognize an Alberta cat day. Perhaps even just out of spite the minister could recognize a provincial cat day here just to irritate the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona. I think there'd be no better way to honour cats than by acting out of spite, because that's how cats tend to act towards their owners.

You know, Madam Chair, another month that is important to me and a lot of people I know is the month of June, which is National Accordion Awareness Month. The accordion has made significant cultural contributions to the life of the people of the province of Alberta, and I think it would be only fitting for the minister to formally recognize June as accordion awareness month here in the province of Alberta.

Another potential day that the minister could recognize – in my past life, Madam Chair, before I was elected, I was a professional geologist. Now, geologists are, I would really say, the unsung heroes of the province of Alberta. We have the knowledge and skills and the work ethic that have kept this province going for a very long time, developing the natural resources, the water resources, the groundwater resources in particular, in the province of Alberta. I think it's only right and fair that Albertans recognize the contributions that geologists have made to this province by recognizing December 4, which is the feast of St. Barbara, who is the patron saint of geologists. I think it would be a worthwhile endeavour for the minister to recognize a geologist by declaring that as a special day.

Some other suggestions for special days, Madam Chair, also in the month of December. I had the privilege of living in Germany for a couple of years in my student days, and in wide sections of southern Germany as well as in Austria December 5 is what's called Krampusnacht. Krampus is the evil spirit the Germans believe comes around on December 5 and punishes all the bad boys and girls for their misdeeds in the year. Now, I understand why the minister wouldn't be too keen to recognize Krampusnacht here in the province of Alberta, because I certainly think that there are 61 boys and girls on that side of the House who would probably suffer greatly at the hands of Krampus should he visit the province of Alberta on December 5. But, regardless, I think that there is a significant swath of the population who would take great delight in watching that happen. You know, I think the minister could at least serve the people of Alberta in that way.

My final suggestion, Madam Chair, and I raised this with the Member for Peace River when he brought forward his legislation recognizing Polish heritage day. Just from the name alone, I think it's worthy that the province recognize this day, and that's Dyngus Day. Dyngus Day is widely celebrated in Poland. It happens to overlap with the day that we call Easter Monday here in Canada, but it's a day that Poles world-wide celebrate Polish heritage. I think that it would be an excellent complement to the Member for Peace River's legislation if the Minister of Culture also recognized Dyngus Day as an official day here in Alberta.

You know, Madam Chair, I think that, all things considered, even though this bill is not, in my view, the most productive use of the time of the legislative Chamber since it creates no new powers and only sets out a partial job description for the Minister of Culture, it's relatively inoffensive, and I think that it's worthy of support. So I'm pleased to offer my support to this legislation, and I sincerely hope that the minister takes into consideration the suggestions that I've made for declaring some additional special days here in the province of Alberta.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thanks, Madam Chair. I'm not sure whether I can follow the previous speaker and do better or worse, really, perhaps staying on the topic. Offering any special days, I think, probably will not be part of my remarks, but, you know, part of what my remarks do circle around, as I review this bill, is that it doesn't seem to change the way by which special days can be enacted here in Alberta right now.

You know, while I think it's important to have special days and I think it's important to be able to be flexible around proclaiming special days – I know, for example, the city of Edmonton will declare a special day and that it's only for that day, so it doesn't go on in perpetuity, right? Maybe that's part of what this bill is. I see the Culture minister thinking about that right now, and it seems to be. Yeah. Okay. All right. So it's a way by which we can have a declaration of a special day and for it to not live on necessarily for ever and ever. Of course, at some point, exactly at the number 365, you run out of days, so it's good to perhaps have that provision in there. Otherwise, of course, all the days become special, and then you have to maybe have an extra special day. I don't know. That, I guess, has some practical application for Bill 3.

You know, I guess I don't want to belabour the point, because that would actually go against what I'm going to say now, which is that I think we have other things that we need to do here in the Legislature right now besides this bill. I mean, we are okay with it, we're down with it, for sure, but I don't think we necessarily need to linger on this very minor change in regard to the proclamation of special days here in the province of Alberta.

Yeah, I mean, it's always great to do so. People take a great deal of pleasure and pride at being recognized for certain things, and some of those proclamations need to live on, too. I mean, we don't just want to have Black History Month once – that wouldn't work – or other days or weeks or months like that, right? I just want to make sure. Again, I'll ask the minister, just rhetorically right now but in committee, to ensure that this legislation would in no way endanger some foundational special days, weeks, and months that we already have enacted here in the province of Alberta which I think, you know, have a lot of history and have a lot of organization around them. We don't want to jeopardize the integrity of those special days, weeks, or months.

So, yeah, I mean, that would be my thing. You know, really, I think that it would undermine my argument here for me to belabour the point around Bill 3, because, in fact, my main issue with this is that we have other things that we should be doing that are more important. I know that sometimes bills can be big, medium, small, and in between and so forth, so I think that with this one, we can carry on, agree to agree, and get on with it.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I want to thank the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar for such an enlightening and insightful interjection in the House regarding this bill, because, of course, he brought up a really good point, and I'm hoping that the Minister of Culture can actually address this particular point: will all members of the House be able to participate in actually providing input, I'll say, into proclaiming special days?

As you may know, Madam Chair, I'm a big fan of these proclamations. I think they're important because through them we recognize the ongoing and historical contributions of communities that call Alberta home. Of course, as I've stated in the House several times, my community of Edmonton-Ellerslie, my district, is one where 50 per cent of the population is actually ethnically diverse.

I was very happy that during our mandate, when we were in government, the Alberta NDP took it very seriously to acknowledge the contribution of the Sikh-Punjabi community, for example. I was just at an event earlier today of that community. It was the founders day celebration of the Millwoods Cultural Society Of Retired and Semi Retired, and we know that, for example, Sikhs have been contributing to Alberta for more than a hundred years.

Another example of that is the Muslim community, Madam Chair. You know, the narrative that tends to be told about Canada is one that it is not necessarily ethnically diverse, and I would hope that the members on the other side of the House would work with us to actually make sure that the narrative of Alberta is one that is multicultural, one where people from diverse ethnic backgrounds have been contributing to Alberta for a very, very long time to make Alberta what it is today, and, of course, that these communities should be recognized for their contributions.

I remember meeting one of the families of the first Lebanese people that actually came to Alberta more than a hundred years ago. Of course, up in Lac La Biche is where many of them settled, and they continue to this day to call that community their home and participate in the economy by running businesses there. They have small businesses.

Many of the Muslim community have actually been elected to municipal office in communities all across Alberta and have been contributing insightfully and making sure that we have not only an equitable economy that encourages everybody to participate but are making sure that because of their cultural values, which, at the end of the day, Madam Chair, are really not that different from values that Albertans hold when it comes to making sure that we're there to take care of one another as a community, you know, that we provide assistance to one another when in times of need specifically – that's one of the things that I really love about Alberta, about all of these communities. Whether it be the fire that actually occurred or the floods that have occurred throughout Alberta on a number of bases, communities come out to actually help.

I'm reminded of some of my good friends in the Sikh Motorcycle Club, which I was able to help very early on during our mandate, when we were in government. The Sikh Motorcycle Club is one that works very hard to raise funds and donations when there's emergency relief that is required throughout the province, you know, really a contribution that they have made, actually, throughout all of Canada because there are Sikh motorcycle clubs in Ontario, in Saskatchewan, in B.C., of course, here in Alberta. They pride themselves based on the culture and religious values that they have, and so much of that, just like many other cultural communities, is the fact that they want to help people, especially in times of need, when they're being hit hardest.

I think that that's a lesson that all of us have in common, a lesson that we all can share with one another: to be there for one another when we most need it. I think, in my own particular and humble opinion, that Albertans want to see a government that actually acts that way, especially in times of crisis, whether it be through COVID or in an economic crisis like we're experiencing right now with inflation going up and life becoming less and less affordable for Albertans. I'm hearing it from multiple communities.

The Chair: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but the clock strikes 6. The committee will be recessed until 7:30 this evening.

[The committee adjourned at 6 p.m.]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: Hon. members, I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 3 Special Days Act

The Deputy Chair: Are there any members looking for questions, comments, or amendments at this time?

Seeing none, I am prepared to ask the question.

[The clauses of Bill 3 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Deputy Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chair: Any opposed? And that was for when the committee rises.

Bill 8 Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022

The Deputy Chair: Are there any hon. members looking to join debate with comments or questions? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has risen.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I am pleased to rise to speak to Bill 8, the Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022. This is the exercise which is normally performed at the end of the year to deal with sort of any overages in the budget. As opposed to Bill 7, which is before us, which applies to the year's budget going forward, this applies to the year that just passed. Fortunately, as it turns out, the things that apply to the budget that just passed and apply to the budget going forward are roughly similar things. You know, this presented yet another opportunity, along with the budget that we saw introduced, for the UCP to do something to help families, and they have chosen to do nothing. It provided another opportunity to provide a real electricity rebate, to provide a natural gas rebate that wasn't fake, to provide some sort of assistance with any sort of cost, and that isn't what we see.

In addition, we see a budget which has plenty of money left over to go to those who already have more than they will ever need and nothing for those who are struggling to make ends meet. We see last year and this year roughly the same thing. In addition, last year we were going through a pandemic, yet we see no additional spending in education, and in fact we see what I would describe as significantly inadequate spending. The budget going forward sees an increase, an increase which does not align with population growth or inflation, and going backwards we see no increases at all.

For instance, my daughter will enter the public school system this upcoming September. She will arrive in school with tens of thousands of additional students and a thousand fewer teachers, not to mention the thousands of fewer EAs that will be available to help her. So children like mine who have spent the last two years in a pandemic, who haven't had the same experience that most children have had, have probably had a lesser sort of social interaction than many children have had, will be entering the school system, and they will be entering a school system massively underfunded compared to students that went five years before them.

Now, let's begin by saying that this isn't fair. The year of your birth shouldn't be the determining factor in terms of how much funding you get for your education, in terms of whether or not there are more students in your class than were in predecessor classes. Unfortunately, that's not really the way it worked out. So we have a bunch of students who are already potentially behind, and we have fewer teachers, not to mention the students that have been in school, some of whom missed the end of the first pandemic year, and then they were in and out and in and out because, of course, this government didn't believe in investing and making schools safer.

They could have taken the time to make those investments to make life easier for students and for parents so that schools could stay in, so that there wasn't this constant back and forth and in and out, but they chose not to do that, not because they didn't have the money to do it but because they were choosing to spend it on other things.

So that is what we will see. We will see these students entering school. We will see them underfunded relative to their peers. Really, Mr. Chair, at the end of the day, I don't think that's fair to them, and I don't think that it's fair to the rest of Alberta either because this will change the trajectories of lives. This will result in students maybe not being able to learn as they would have learned, maybe not being able to contribute as they would have contributed.

Can you say exactly what the impact on each individual student will be? No, not necessarily, but you can say on a population level, because enormous numbers of studies have been done on the impact on a population level, and the impact on the population level is that it will cost us more money in the long run. This government's choice not to invest in students, not to invest in early learning, not to invest in ensuring that those students can achieve their full potential will cost us money in the long run. That is one of the things I find incredibly troubling about this.

We see also in this supplementary supply a very interesting addition. One of the additions is for physician compensation, $173 million. What is interesting about this is that essentially this is the government finally, finally, finally, two years on in a pandemic, reaching an agreement with doctors.

Mr. Shepherd: It's not an agreement yet.

Ms Ganley: Oh, it's not even an agreement yet. I'm sorry. My colleague has corrected me. At least some sort of attempt at an agreement.

We entered a pandemic in a situation that was incredibly difficult for physicians, in a situation where this UCP government was attacking them. Not only did they tear up their contract, but they chose to misrepresent them to the public, to claim that they were grifting and taking money that they weren't owed, which I think is incredibly unfair. So we went into this pandemic with physicians who were already under attack by this government, a government who was essentially trying to attack specifically primary care. That's a big problem because primary care makes a huge difference in the lives of Albertans. It also has a big equalizing effect. You know, folks from more affluent backgrounds, from more educated backgrounds are likely to seek out treatment for their medical condition, but for some people who are not in that position, who maybe don't feel as empowered to speak up for themselves for whatever historical reasons, primary care is incredibly important to make sure we're monitoring their conditions, and it ultimately saves money.

This is the thing with this government. They like to save money now by essentially taking money from the future. They do it in education. They do it with primary care. They just have absolutely no respect for upstream intervention, for how much it saves us to treat someone's diabetes as opposed to have to perform a surgery later, for how much it saves us to help a child learn to read at the appropriate age versus paying for incarceration later. That isn't to say that all students will go down that road, but there is really, really solid evidence linking literacy rates and incarceration rates; reverse linking, obviously. That is incredibly problematic. Those are a couple of the things in here.

I'd like to sort of touch on a little hobby horse of mine as well. One of the things we see in this past-year budget is the introduction of the Kananaskis park fee. Obviously, this is an area that belongs to Albertans, that is for Albertans, that has historically been for all Albertans, and this government has sort of come in and imposed a fee on it. So now it's only for some Albertans, which is obviously problematic, especially right now, especially in this moment when more and more families are barely able to cover their basic costs with what they earn, in large part due to decisions of this government. For some people $90 is a lot of money. For some people that's $90 that they don't have because their electricity bill went up $300, and they just don't have it. This government is sort of taking that opportunity from them.

Worse still, I had the opportunity to sit in estimates and watch the minister of environment try to tap dance around this issue. You know, Albertans paying that fee at least wanted to be assured that the fee was going back into the management of that park, but he couldn't tell us where the fee was going. In fact, a bunch of it – he read off a list of grants that this went to maintain. We asked – I don't know – some very basic questions that one might ask about grants, like: what are the criteria for the application? Did multiple groups apply? How did you pick between them? Nope.

We asked some very basic questions like: how do we evaluate the work that's done? Once you pick the group for whom this grant is awarded, how do you figure out what they're supposed to do, and how do you measure whether they've done the thing they're supposed to do and whether Albertans are getting value for their money? Do you know what the answer was? We pick based on "existing relationships" with the UCP. Yeah, that was the answer. Who gets the grants has nothing to do with who's best situated to do the job; it's based on existing relationships with the UCP minister. That I find incredibly problematic.

Even if these groups are doing great work – and maybe they are. I don't know. I'm not out there to assess it. In fact, no one knows. None of us will ever know because apparently we don't assess these things at all, which I think is a problematic use of money, to say the least. But even if they are doing a fantastic job, other groups may have wanted that work, other groups may have wanted the opportunity to compete, but this government decided to pick their friends. I think that that is incredibly problematic.

Another thing worth discussing, which I touched on somewhat, is the electricity program. Oh, boy. The things that have been said about this. You know, we began with the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity proudly announcing that his plan was to do nothing. Then we moved to a rushed-out $50 rebate, which I think most Albertans have received as sort of an insult. And then we have the minister standing up and talking about skyrocketing costs and referring to them as the market working. I think that's problematic. I don't think the market is working for most Alberta families, and I think that that is very, very difficult for them. Yeah. I would consider that extremely problematic.

Another thing included in here is money that's sort of coming back from the war room, so under the supplementary estimates. Sometimes there's more money needed, and sometimes the government didn't spend all their money. It's worth talking a little bit about the war room because, I mean, it's problematic. There's really no way to say it except that it's problematic. It was designed specifically to avoid freedom of information. It is a place that the government can essentially send money and disappear it. There are no outcomes measured. No one is paying attention to what's done with the money. There's no way to FOIP it. The minister refuses to answer any questions on what's being done with the money or what's achieved. And no one measures – usually when you spend money in budgets, there are performance measures for each ministry that sort of measure the impact of the money that you are spending in order to be able to tell taxpayers that you're getting value for them. Not with the war room. No measures at all. It's just out there.

We've seen it – let's see. It's headed by a failed UCP candidate. It has impersonated journalists, attacked journalists, rendered wildly popular a strange movie about Bigfoot; maybe the only measurable impact it's had, actually, at all is the sudden skyrocketing ratings of, honestly, a not very good movie on Netflix. So there you go. That's a bit of an odd choice.

Even more interesting, last year we had a conversation at estimates, and the war room budget was to be $10 million. We were speaking two weeks before the end of the year, so 95 per cent of the way through the fiscal year, and the minister said: "Oh, yes. Oh, yes. They're definitely going to spend their $10 million, and we're going to spend this $19 million on other advocacy." So $29 million in total between the war room and the other advocacy. She wouldn't tell us what it would be spent on. She wouldn't tell us whether anything would be measured. Nothing. Then we come to this year, and it turns out that when she was telling us that she had spent the money – again, we were talking two weeks from the end of the fiscal year – telling us that she had spent, past tense, $29 million, it turns out they didn't. So that money all went back. Who knows what happened to it?

This year again we see money going to the war room and again no idea – we're not measuring what it achieves. We have no idea what it's going to be used for. I don't know. Maybe this time they'll try to make something incredibly popular on Disney+ instead of on Netflix. Who knows? But this continues to be an incredibly problematic area. It continues to be an area without oversight. The spending of public money without the public being able to know what the money was spent on is, in my view, just exceptionally problematic. I find it baffling that the so-called fiscal conservatives on the other side of the House would just accept this, would think that it's perfectly fine for the government to spend money and not be able to indicate any value for that money.

I guess, at the end of the day, there are a lot of problematic areas in this budget. Some of the ones I would say are the biggest: definitely health care and education. Another, I think, particularly important one: supportive housing. We saw this government – and, you know, we had a long conversation in the last session with this government saying: "Oh, we're bringing in this bill. This bill is going to increase affordable housing, and by increase we mean that we're going to define affordable housing to be anything the minister points to and says that that's affordable housing. By increase affordable housing, what we actually mean we're going to do is that we're going to call a bunch of stuff affordable housing regardless of whether it's affordable or not. But don't worry. We'll put in lots of money." They did not. They did not.

I guess fast-forward to today: no money. This is super, super problematic. We have a federal government who's investing. We have municipal governments who are asking for funding. They're asking for this funding because municipal governments pay sort of the bulk, with some assistance from the provincial government, of the cost of policing. When you don't have supportive housing, you pay a lot more for policing. Now, this provincial government is actually paying it, too, because a lack of affordable housing is also correlated with sort of cost drivers, especially in emergency rooms.

Emergency medicine is some of the most expensive medicine there is, but that is, like, wildly driven up, not to mention the impact that it has on people's lives, you know. When we're driving up, unnecessarily, people having to go to the emergency room because they have an infection that has gotten worse because they're living on the street and they're not able to clean a wound and that's tying up emergency resources that could be used elsewhere, it's expensive. It's a really expensive solution to a problem that is otherwise inexpensive.

Correctional centres: also a very expensive – very expensive – place to house people. Permanent supportive housing: definitely, a better solution. But this government chooses not to invest. I think, really, when we look at this, what we see is a failure to invest, a failure to invest in pretty much every possible way that this government could fail to invest. I think that's incredibly problematic, and I will not be supporting it.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you very much.

Are there any – I see the hon. Member for Calgary-South East has risen.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Chair. I'm not sure I would characterize record investments in health care and education as a failure to invest, especially when it was achieved while projecting three surplus budgets. I think that's good, responsible fiscal management.

Bill 8 provides the authority for the government to pay from the general revenue fund for additional costs that are not already covered or otherwise provided for during the current fiscal year. The funding in Bill 8 will ensure that the government can cover health care costs from the pandemic while also sending aid and equipment to Ukraine, providing electricity rebates to Albertans struggling with affordability and rising costs, supporting child care workers and the parents of young children, and building municipal infrastructure. The supplementary estimates include $1.2 billion in expenses and $1 million in capital investment. The overall increase to the deficit is minor. It's projected to increase it by about $200 million.

This funding will go to the following five government departments: the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner, Children's Services, Culture and Status of Women, Energy, Health, and Municipal Affairs. For Health, the largest item, an additional $726 million will help cover the costs of the pandemic. This includes things like lab testing, contact tracing, rapid test kits, continuing care, acute care, vaccine deployment, and personal protective equipment. This is above and beyond what we committed in Budget 2022 to address backlogs due to the pandemic.

An additional $231.2 million is allocated to Municipal Affairs and will be distributed to municipalities under the Canada community-building fund to support infrastructure projects that create jobs and are necessary for economic development across the province.

The supplementary amount for Children's Services is related to funding provided by the federal government. It includes $134.7 million for child care subsidies and worker supports under the Canada-Alberta early learning and child care agreement. Bill 8 also includes a capital investment of $1 million to provide information technology for child care initiatives, which is, again, fully off-set by federal funds.

While Alberta is not immune to the rising cost of living, we are striving to ensure that this province is a more affordable place to live than virtually any other Canadian jurisdiction. This is in addition to the many other affordability advantages that Alberta has to offer. Bill 8 includes a supplementary amount of $96.3 million for the Department of Energy, which will go towards a total of $300 million for the utility consumer support electricity rebate program. With the help of this bill, we will provide $150 in electricity rebates to over 1 million homes, farms, and businesses.

Culture and Status of Women will receive $11.4 million in support of Ukraine, $10.4 million of which will come from this bill. This includes $5 million to the Ukrainian World Congress to equip 5,000 members of the Ukrainian territorial defence force with defensive equipment, $5 million to the Canada-Ukraine Foundation for humanitarian aid, and $350,000 to the Ukrainian Canadian Congress Alberta Provincial Council for co-ordinating the shipment of first aid and defensive equipment to Ukraine.

Lastly, in this bill there is a supplementary amount of $55,000 for the office of the Information and Privacy commissioner to cover increases in staff compensation due to changes in the salary restraint measures on nonbargaining staff.

Hopefully, that clarifies what's being invested, and I look forward to continued discussions on Bill 8.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members looking to join? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity to speak to this supplementary supply. To the previous speaker, I guess: my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View I think was trying to make the point that the investments overall, both in this sup supply and the Bill 7 appropriations for the '22 budget, don't prioritize the spending in directions that will help the greatest number of Albertans, hard-working Albertans that are being hit hard by inflation, that are being hit hard by the current experience we all are living through.

That's part of the difference, you know, and it's a pretty major one. This side believes that there is a role for government to help and ensure there are programs that help lift the most vulnerable up and above where they are so that they can enjoy full participation in this great province, and the other side believes that helping the richest and the trickle-down on the rest of us will get us further ahead. We don't believe that. We believe in good health care, solid public education, good postsecondary education, and the other side, Mr. Speaker, believes in looking at more privatization going into the future, which is built into Bill 7. It's also considered in the sup supply here.

We know that inflation is starting to eat away at the savings, at the weekly earnings of Albertans. They're not only finding that on a day-to-day basis, but when they do their taxes again this year, there's an insidious, pernicious increase in that income tax that this government has built in. I heard some of the discussion from the other side, basically wedging open the window a little bit and saying that we're going to get back to balance and that then Albertans will all enjoy the benefits because we'll change that pernicious, insidious bracket creep tax grab. It wasn't said fully like that, but it was implied. I think that that's the difference between this side and the other side. The other side holds, you know, a carrot out or way into the future and says: don't worry; things will get better. The windfall in oil and gas has really helped out this side a lot. I mean, without that, we wouldn't be talking about three balanced budgets and your fiscal plan into the future. We'd be talking about deficits into the next three years, I guess. The plan to make Albertans pay more is also part of this sup supply.

I certainly don't have any issue with the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner. I was at the meetings – I think it was Legislative Offices – where we met with all of the offices, and we heard that settlements in other areas could be rolled in if we reconsidered their budgets, and here it is. That's not an issue.

The Municipal Affairs one. Well, just generally, there are several of these increases in sup supply that have to do with federal dollars that sometimes come late in the fiscal year, understanding what those are going to be, not unlike Municipal Affairs, which is here at $231,208,000, I think. That's the former gas tax, the building Canada fund I think it's called now. That's a flow through. That's not a result of anything other than the federal government providing those funds. They do twice a year. It's here and being flowed through to municipalities and Métis settlements on a per capita basis. Except, if they're small hamlets or summer villages or small places, they get a set amount.

That has nothing to do with this government looking to the needs of municipalities. In fact, if we were to talk about municipalities for a second, one of the things that we learned in estimates about municipalities was that Bill 77 – the restoring tax accountability bill I think it was called – that was brought in under a previous Municipal Affairs minister, really hasn't had the effect that it was hoped to have in terms of municipalities being able to put special liens on equipment and property of oil and gas companies that aren't paying their bills, aren't paying their taxes. We heard from the minister, in response to questioning from members of the government side, that it hasn't worked. Municipalities have not been able to access funds through special liens. They're there now as opposed to not being there, but their taxes still are not being paid by those who choose not to pay them or go out of business. The RMA indicates that somewhere between I think it's $240 million to $280 million in taxes is owed to them.

Certainly, the Canada community-building fund helps municipalities, but it doesn't help municipalities with regard to the monies owed through taxes, as RMA has indicated, and the special liens that the Restoring Tax Accountability Act, Bill 77, provided municipalities is – I don't know if it's next to useless, but it's not working. So it's a good thing that there are federal grant monies flowing to municipalities so that they can address their capital infrastructure needs and provide the kind of capital infrastructure both to city properties – city, towns, other kinds of things – above ground and below ground that keep our quality of life throughout Alberta one of the highest in the country and one of the best in the world. So that's one area I wanted to focus on.

I would like to just compliment the government around the $10.4 million that is going to Ukraine for various supports for Ukraine people. That is laudable. It's important, not unlike other provinces and indeed the federal government. Canada is stepping up to help our friends in Ukraine, many of whom have made homes in Alberta over the years. That seems like an important thing to have in this sup supply, and I'm glad it's here.

The other thing I just wanted to point out again is another flow through – it's in the area of Children's Services – from the federal government. Just reading the narrative here, it talks about federal funding not only for programmatic support for child care, but it talks about capital investment, federally funded dollars, to provide better information technology to child care facilities. Really important, actually, because, as our leader was saying today at the Alberta Chambers of Commerce, the ability for families to have quality child care available to them at a rate that is affordable instead of at a rate that is like a second mortgage really allows more people to get into the workforce – I think she quoted the number of 40,000, primarily women – and help drive our economy forward.

We certainly need across Alberta more and more labour, people who are willing to work, because coming out of this pandemic many companies are looking for workers, and the support that's coming through from the federal government, primarily for child care subsidy and supports, is an important way of getting back to that future we all want, which is full employment, which is having children cared for in quality environments, regulated environments, where they have the best start possible because a good start there, as we all know, sets them up for an elementary school education where they can, of course, achieve better than sometimes some of their cohort. So that's a really great thing.

I do like this other part, too, which is supporting the child care workers. We know that many of them were out of work over the pandemic, and coming back to work, you know, is difficult. There were media reports just the other week where child care centres couldn't find enough workers, so ensuring that there is, again, some federal funding for child care workers to top up wages and other things, to provide support for education, accreditation so that we know that they're working with the best information about child and youth development is a good thing as well.

I want to just talk a little bit about the next one. Okay. Children's Services. Culture and Status of Women. We heard a lot about Energy, the $96 million which will kind of go towards the electricity support for Albertans. That's a good thing. I mean, that's an important thing to do. It's not adequate for vulnerable people, vulnerable families, who are paying exorbitant amounts for their electricity and their home heating. I'm just trying to see if it's a targeted thing. I did hear a million households and farms identified here. I'm thinking about how many million people there are in Alberta. It does sound like there's some targeting to that money, but I wonder if it shouldn't have been more targeted to those with the least in this province and those who will have the highest bills in this province relative to their incomes. That's where I would have gone with all of that. But there is some help for some, which is a good thing.

The failure to invest in places where it would do the most good is, I think, the challenge that I see with this government and bills not only 7 but 8. The fact that Albertans are struggling and some are coming out of this pandemic with exorbitant personal debt loads is something we should all be conscious of, that the government shouldn't make life more expensive for those Albertans, that they deserve better. They deserve a government that can help look out for them instead of hitting their family budget hard, as is the case with so many increases across the board as a result of government withdrawing support or jacking up fees.

Mr. Chair, the last thing I'll say is again about Municipal Affairs. What I heard when I was at the AM and RMA spring conferences that were just held here is that the government could do more to work in partnership with local authorities. It's going to be coming up later on our agenda; I think it's Bill 4. The fact that this government is not working in partnership with municipalities is a problem, and the fact that we see federal flow throughs as opposed to restoring the funding and the amount of funding that municipalities have historically enjoyed so that they can build on that and leverage it up in their communities is a failure of this government.

The federal funding that we see flow through for four out of five of these areas – or all five, actually, is a welcome relief for Albertans, who are enjoying a share of federal monies in long-term partnerships with the federal government and province of Alberta. Municipalities are the beneficiaries of those agreements. I wish we were at a point of being able to say that municipalities feel that the government has their backs, but what this government has is its hands in many of the pockets of municipalities. My colleague talked about some of those and policing, which is not before us right now, but as an example, GIPOT, other areas where, when we were government, we paid our provincial bills, government bills, and this current government gets away without paying bills. As I started off saying, into the future they talk about, you know, things will be better and you'll be better off into the future. Well, that's unfortunate. It's indicated in the priorities of this government, in sup supply as well as Bill 7.

I'll have more to say on those things later. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Calgary-South East has risen.

Mr. Jones: I'll be brief. The member opposite took issue with the prioritization of the government's Budget 2022, which is curious because it provides record funding to health care and education. I'm not sure where else the members opposite would like to see Alberta dedicate the majority of its funding, but we are certainly going to continue with our world-class provision of health care and education.

The member opposite also took issue with Alberta maximizing federal transfers as if there is more than one taxpayer. Our government bringing taxes back to Albertans from the federal government to benefit them here now, their families, is what they expect of us. That's prudent fiscal management.

The member opposite also took issue with the private delivery of health services and school choice, which, again, is curious because under their government they funded both.

I would invite the member opposite to join Albertans in celebrating Budget 2022 on the achievement of balance, the projected three surplus budgets, and to appreciate the difference responsible government and fiscal discipline make, especially in the lives of Albertans.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any – I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate those comments from the Member for Calgary-South East. If he wants to debate the budget, I'll be happy to debate the budget when we're talking about the budget. Right now we're talking about supplementary supply. Certainly, I'd be happy to talk about their budget for 2022-23 when we get to that point.

I'd like to reply to a few things that the member noted. He has talked several times, as indeed have many members, ministers of this government, about their record investments, Mr. Chair, record investment in health care, record investment in education. Well, let's talk about what the term "record" means. Record simply means that it's the highest amount that has been spent so far. Okay. Fair enough. So they spent more on health care last year than had previously been spent by any other government. Well, we also had record costs. See, population goes up. Inflation also rises. So in order for government spending to have the same impact each year, that spending has to rise. That means that every year, if a government is actually accounting for inflation and accounting for population growth, will be a record spend. Imagine that.

Here's the kicker, Mr. Chair. His government has fallen short of funding for inflation and population growth every single year it's been in power. Indeed, their record spend on health care in this coming year's budget – and I apologize; I guess I am going to talk about that briefly – falls $600 million short of where they would be if they had simply accounted for inflation and population growth over the last few years. So that is the record spend about which this government wants to pat itself on the back, Mr. Chair, not to mention the fact that, of course, we had record costs in the last year for the COVID-19 pandemic. Imagine that. The government spent more than ever before on health care in a year that we had a global pandemic – break out the balloons; pat the government on the back – not to mention, of course, that for the education system it was a more expensive year than we've ever had before because, again, we surprisingly had more students. Indeed, inflation drives up the costs in education as well, not to mention that schools faced greater costs because of a global pandemic.

Again, when we are talking about the fact that there is only one taxpayer, as the member just pointed out, we have to recognize that school boards had to take up additional costs because the government refused to step up to cover the costs that were necessary to help protect students in those spaces. Again, that in turn is a government that has driven up property tax and the education property tax. There is only one taxpayer, so this government devolved its responsibility onto another level of government and onto the backs of taxpayers in Alberta, and that is what the Member for Calgary-South East believes that we should praise his government for doing.

He talked about how they spent in the last year above and beyond what they committed in Budget 2022. Well, imagine that, Mr. Chair. In the midst of a global pandemic, health care costs were higher than anticipated, though admittedly I recognize that this government had pretty poor judgment when it came to that pandemic, as we saw in the third wave, as many members on that side were calling for the government to end all health restrictions even as case counts were climbing, as deaths were rising, as hospitals were overflowing, and their lack of action, acting last, acting least, indeed drove up the costs in health care. Repeat, wash your hands, rinse, and do it all again for the fourth wave in the fall except at an even higher level. Of course, they spent above and beyond in Budget 2022 because they used the health care system as a crash mat, because they put their politics ahead of taking prudent action in public health.

Let's go on to talk about what we actually have in this supplementary supply, Mr. Chair. Now, the Minister of Health was patting himself on the back today for the fact that, you know, they've increased spending on physician compensation. He specifically mentioned having brought in virtual codes, improved the virtual codes for physicians – it took place as of January 1 – and congratulated himself for that step. Now, let's be clear. That was two years – two – after doctors had begun asking the government to take that action.

Now let's talk about how this actually occurred. Here we are in February, just as we see COVID first appearing on the horizon. The pandemic wasn't here yet, but that was when this government tore up their contract with physicians. Tore up the agreement. Basically, that left physicians at the whim of the health care minister. He and his staff and others went on a social media crusade, as my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View noted, smearing doctors on social media, attacking them, putting up a government web page talking about how greedy and entitled they were.

Then we found ourselves going into a pandemic. Doctors rightfully recognized that as we were bringing in restrictions and isolation, that was going to have a massive impact on their ability to see their patients, so they reached out to the Minister of Health and said: we need support because right now we cannot bill to see a patient virtually. It was about two weeks as we were moving into the pandemic, as people were forced to stay at home, and doctors were waiting for this minister to take action. Finally he did. What did he do, Mr. Chair? He revived a code from the SARS pandemic that paid $20 for a 15-minute visit, actually for any visit, because you couldn't bill beyond 15. It was $20 for any virtual visit.

Now, doctors are normally paid about $34 for a visit. In fact – what do you know? – they had just signed a deal with Telus for their Babylon app, and what were they paying Telus per visit for virtual walk-in doctors who had no history with their patients? Thirty-four dollars a visit. Alberta's family doctors were getting $20. Doctors, of course, were reaching out and saying: "Hey, this is a problem. Can we fix this? Can we fix this? Can we fix this?" More weeks went by. Eventually the government took action. Now, this was, of course, weeks in, so doctors, of course, had been losing large amounts of income, making it more difficult for them to operate their clinics, losing money to continue to see their patients, which they did do, Mr. Chair, because they care about the health of Albertans.

Now, the trick is, Mr. Chair, that they were only able to get $34 no matter how long that visit was. Now, normally a doctor, when they see a patient, is able to bill $34 for the initial visit and then what's called the complex modifiers. If it is a visit that goes on longer than 15 minutes, they are allowed to add on additional amounts for the extra time that they are spending. The government did not apply that to virtual codes. That meant that doctors were spending 40 minutes talking with patients who were struggling with their health, who were dealing with mental health issues in the midst of a pandemic, and getting paid for 15.

That concern was raised repeatedly with this government throughout the course of the pandemic for two years, Mr. Chair – for two years – because this government was so intent initially on trying to grind doctors down in the midst of a pandemic as part of their war on physicians. For two years we had physicians, family physicians that were struggling incredibly. We had clinics close. We had doctors leave. We have Albertans, tens of thousands of Albertans now, that have no family doctor in part because this government took two years to take a simple step that they now want us to congratulate them for doing. That's what we have here, and when we're looking at this fee increase in physician compensation of $173,857,000, that is in part the government finally stepping up to the table and covering these costs.

Now, also here we do have some additional spending in health care, and I did have the chance to talk about this with the minister the other night when we had some back and forth here in the Chamber as we were debating the supplementary supply before this bill was introduced. I had a chance to chat with him a little bit about some of the other additional amounts that are here. Again, Mr. Chair, recognizing that this government has repeatedly made decisions of acting last and acting least, has been spending more time fighting amongst themselves behind closed doors, waiting to take action on rising case counts, that in turn has driven up costs, and part of that is represented here in this supplementary supply.

I had the chance to ask the minister about the $375,500,000 that is here in supplementary supply for lab testing, contact tracing, and rapid test distribution, and what I asked him about, Mr. Chair, is the fact that during the pandemic we had health care workers who were redeployed. Now, that, of course, is understandable. In the first wave in particular, when we did not know what we were dealing with, when we had serious issues – even in the second wave, I think, it's understandable. That was a far more serious wave. Yes, the government again acted last, acted least, but still we were learning. Indeed, I had the chance to speak with some of the folks that were redeployed, including some speech-language pathologists, and that's what they said to me. They said: "You know what? We get it. First, second wave, we were happy to do this. We were happy to be redeployed to serve. We recognize the impact that that had on the children we were helping, on others, but, hey, it was a pandemic. That needed to happen."

But as we moved into the third wave, Mr. Chair, they talked about how they were surprised that at that point the government had not begun to invest in bringing other workers in to handle these situations, particularly in the case of testing sites, where they were being called in. But they said: "You know what? After doing that third wave, we were very happy to see that the government actually worked with AHS." They were hiring staff to take over some of those key things at the testing centres, what they called being line leaders, which is standing and sort of just making sure that they've got people in chairs, the lines are flowing smoothly, people are getting to the nurses to get their testing done, important work to conduct that PCR testing and keep that available. But that was not something that you needed to pay a speech-language pathologist at their rate of pay, indeed, at overtime pay. They told me that at times that would mean working at a shift premium of up to $100 an hour to do that work, so they were very happy to see that AHS was moving to hire folks and had folks ready.

But then came the best summer ever. This government decided that it was going to declare COVID done, and even as we saw case counts rising in August, we heard nothing. The government went radio silent. We know they were fighting amongst themselves behind closed doors because members of the government have themselves spoken up and said so, but they did not take action.

What happened, Mr. Chair? Of course, we found ourselves in the midst of that fourth wave. We had to ramp up testing and everything again, and because this government had not moved quickly enough, all those folks that they had on contract and ready to go: the majority of them were gone. Contracts expired. They'd moved on. They'd found other work. So what happened? We had to call our speech-language pathologists back in to do that work – they have premiums of up to $100 an hour – once again creating massive backlogs for children and youth who are struggling and needed that support. What I asked the minister, Mr. Chair, is: well, how much of that $375,500,000 represents those workers who had to be redeployed, their overtime, their shift premiums, because this government chose to act last and least and let those other contacts lapse?

This is a challenge that we saw throughout the pandemic, Mr. Chair, decisions made by this government. They want to congratulate themselves now for their spending on health care and talk about how much they thank health care workers, but the fact is that every single one of those health care workers, I'll tell you, would have far preferred to have a government that would have actually listened to them when they warned about what was coming and what they were seeing on the ground. They would have far rather had their government actually take prudent action than step up now and brag about the fact that they're investing in more ICU beds. They would far rather prefer that the government hadn't filled those beds to begin with. Now, to be honest, they probably prefer both. Certainly, I think we can appreciate that we do need to make investments in our health care system.

Certainly, over the years of Conservative government we saw the roller coaster of spending that tracked with the price of oil, not unlike the current government, because – let’s be clear – this spending would not be here if this government had not stumbled into an oil revenue surplus. We’ve seen what this government does when the chips are down, and what they do is that they make cuts, and they put that on the backs of Albertans. They put in things like a sneaky tax on inflation. They can’t even be honest, Mr. Chair, when they are taxing Albertans. They try to sneak these things through the back door.

Of course, we saw much more about some of the backdoor shenanigans that have gone on within this party and indeed the last leadership race, which the Premier won, that was published today by the CBC. I imagine we’re going to see much more. A lot of drama happening on that side of the House. There has been for a while.

But the fact is that the spending that we are seeing here is indeed, in many respects, likely necessary. You know what? If we had been in government, probably some of this spending would have taken place. Now, certainly, I think some of this money would have been used a lot more efficiently, Mr. Chair, because I think we would not have made that repeated decision, that this government did, to act last and act least, drive up those costs in the health care system to respond to the pandemic.

I just want to be very clear that the biggest tragedy of this pandemic is not the dollars lost; it’s the lives lost, over 4,000 Albertans. Certainly, many thousands and thousands more – 20 per cent is the estimate from AHS – Albertans contracted COVID and now will likely have long COVID. Of course, we’re going to have those costs appearing in the system here.

Of course, also baked into some of this supplementary spending, I imagine, though I did not get the opportunity to question the minister about it, may have been the additional premiums and overtime that had to be paid to try to cover the critical staffing shortage that we’ve had in this province starting since about last May is when I first began to raise concerns about that in this House as we began to see rolling closures of ERs across the province of Alberta due to a lack of physicians, lack of nursing staff. I remember talking in this House about the Galahad continuing care centre. Twenty seniors there, Mr. Chair, I believe, in May of last year were displaced due to a lack of nursing staff, again in part due to this government’s pressure that it created on the health care system, pushing it to its limits.

I remember at that time, I seem to recall, the minister at the time talking about how that was going to be a short-term thing. Mr. Chair, those seniors still have not returned to Galahad. They’re still separated from friends and family. The costs of all that, I imagine, are also baked into this supplementary supply.

Coming back around, Mr. Chair, while this government wants to pat itself on the back for record spending on health care and education, I have spent nearly three years now watching this government on health care, and I can tell you that no government in the history of this province has done more damage to our public health care system than the UCP, none, bar none. So I’m not inclined to praise this government for its record spending as it splashes around a little bit of cash to try to backfill the deep, deep hole they have dug Alberta into in terms of recovering from the COVID-19 pandemic, from the loss of physicians, that, again, we just saw demonstrated by data from the CPSA.

However much the government wants to deny it, it’s concrete. There are 41 fewer doctors in Lethbridge and area than there were in 2019, when this government came into power, and 43,000 residents in that area who do not have a family doctor. That is on this government. It is their record, and no record health care spending now is fixing that, partly because they aren’t really putting record spending in on physicians. They’ve got $6 million that they’ve reannounced repeatedly, but the fact is, Mr. Chair, that just like a corporate tax cut is not simply enough on its own to bring companies into a jurisdiction, neither are some dollars thrown in belatedly after the fact enough to cover up for a government that has fundamentally broken trust with health care workers, has salted the earth and given our province a reputation under this government of one that is decidedly unfriendly to health care workers.

That’s going to be a challenge, Mr. Chair, because we are in competition globally for health care workers right now. There’s a CBC article that just came out talking about how many more youth are leaving our province. Let me tell you that young health care workers are leaving. Doctors are graduating, and they are not going to work in the rural areas whatever amount this government wants to put into its RESIDE program. As long as this government maintains legislation that says that any contract they have can be torn up on the whim of a Health minister, these are challenges that are going to continue.

I look forward to having more opportunity to debate this. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has risen.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. As you can imagine, I’ve got several thoughts this evening on Bill 8, the Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022, and it’s even hard to kind of decide where to start. You know, I think where I will start – and I’ve said this before in the House in terms of some of the legislation that we’ve seen presented by the government. Albertans find themselves in almost the same place as Oliver Twist did. They’re looking to the government, and they’re saying, “Please, sir, I want some more,” and that goes to show you the severe lack of support that we’re seeing towards Albertans.

Now, I’ve certainly heard this evening, you know, talking about all this record spending, everything that we’re doing to increase jobs and things like that. But the thing is that I’m hearing from not only my constituents but others across the province – because I know; I’m getting copied on the e-mails that are going to all of you as well, so I know it’s out there – that are very concerned about where things are going, like, for instance, the utility bills. And we can talk all we want about the rebate for gas, the fake rebate that only kicks in at a certain level, and we’re just slightly over halfway there. Let me put it to you this way: people are complaining that they can’t afford the bill now. What happens when it doubles? Because that’s what it’s going to take to hit that mark – right? – the six and a half dollars per gigajoule. They can’t afford it here. This is a problem here, right now, and you’re not going to help them until at least next winter.

You know, I have a constituent who’s on AISH, Mr. Chair. I was hoping maybe to see something out of this for them besides what very little they get. They were hoping, you know, maybe it’ll get reindexed. She’s come to me saying: well, one of my utility bills has just gone up by $300. Yet out of Budget 2022 this individual is going to lose up to $3,000 in purchasing power. Now, if they can’t even afford the bill, how are they going to be able to do anything else?

Again, you know, I’ve heard people jump up: oh, well, this is record spending on AISH. See, here’s the problem. Remember I’ve always said, Mr. Chair, that I'm listening to what people say about legislation that comes forward and whatnot, and when we think about Budget '22 and Bill 8, there's an attitude that we're fighting already. It happened just last Monday, and what was said was: "Mr. Speaker, what the opposition doesn't have a clue on is that you have to create wealth first before you have money to take care of people."

My friend from Calgary-Buffalo had kind of started to touch on this a little bit, and I think I'll expand a little further. Historically I've always seen this cycle that comes forward. You know, government comes in: "Ah, well, you know, the former government just spent recklessly and put us into debt and everything, so we've got to climb our way out of that." Then you get to the point where you're starting to make some success: "We can't help you just yet. We're close. We're almost there. Just hang on a little bit longer." Then you get to the next stage of: "You know what? We're just starting to get ahead. Things are really ramping up. We're really going to get going here. Can I just get you to hold tight a little bit longer?" People keep waiting, and then you get: "You know what? There are signs the future is not looking good. We've got to prepare for the future. You're just going to have to wait." Then when things are free-falling: "Well, things are in free fall. We can't help you now."

It's this cycle that keeps going along. It's the cycle of failing to help, and we're always leaving the most vulnerable behind based on what I was just talking about, a constituent on AISH who can't afford a utility. But what's up for offer? Oh, a whole $150 spread out over three months in $50 chunks. And I still haven't heard the plan as to when that's going to get paid out, how that's going to get paid out. In the meantime they're falling further and further behind, which then leads me to another constituent that's already in trouble, and now their power is getting limited. Can you imagine, Mr. Chair, not being able to have a pot on the stove and some toast in the toaster? But, hey, I've got 50 bucks for you. Come on. Really?

You all were able to bet $1.3 billion on Donald Trump's election. You've managed to find tens of millions of dollars to go chase Bigfoot and get logos wrong. Yet we can't help some of our most vulnerable in the province to make sure that they at least have a decent quality of life because, as I believe the Minister of Community and Social Services had said: we've got to create wealth first before you're able to take care of people.

Mr. Panda: Yes.

Mr. Nielsen: I even hear people agreeing with that. How very big of you. How very big of you. I'll make sure to tell that to constituents who are coming to me and e-mailing me saying: I need help from my government.

When we see that Albertans are going to start to lose about $500 alone in personal income tax exemptions – the famous bracket creep: I remember I actually brought up a member's statement specifically on that because, Mr. Chair, the Premier, with his hair on fire when he was an MP in Ottawa, railed against how bad that was. I believe actually it was earlier today I had a member's statement talking about being consistent, acting with integrity, standing up for your views. So either the Premier never actually ever believed that when he was in Ottawa, that bracket creep was bad, or somehow, somehow, somewhere he's decided: oh, well, that's different now.

It's very, very interesting, like I said, as we see legislation presented before us. What does it say? What doesn't it say? What's being said about it? Persistently and consistently – at least there's consistency there – those things are butting up against each other.

I've seen concerns from seniors about the Alberta seniors' benefit, potentially losing up to $750 on that. For a senior on a fixed income that's a lot of money. Hey, I guess the attitude is already prevalent over there. Got to be rich first before you get any. The people that built our province, that have allowed us right here, right now to enjoy that, built on their backs, and we're going to say: sorry; till we're profitable, we can't do anything. Wow. I have a lot of seniors in my riding. You know, I have the North Edmonton Seniors Association. I get seniors from my friend over in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. My friends over in Edmonton-Castle Downs and Edmonton-Manning all come to that centre. I get the opportunity to chat with them all the time, and I'll tell you that some of them were Conservative voters; they're not now. And I have a feeling that after they see this budget pass, there are probably going to be a few less after that.

You know, my friend from Edmonton-City Centre was talking about some of the things that have happened in health care and, again, the whole line of record spending and being fiscally prudent and everything like that: fiscally prudent to bet on an election, fiscally prudent to go after a cartoon character, fiscally prudent to take away diagnostic imaging privileges from chiropractors and physiotherapists, claiming it's going to save the system money. Yet now we found out that it's turning out that it's costing about $4 million more. Not my numbers, by the way; this was the chiropractors that figured this stuff out.

I believe, actually, Mr. Chair, that's called red tape because now instead of somebody being able to go to their practitioner, quickly get an X-ray, and start to get treatment, they've got to go through the extra step of booking through their general practitioner, then getting that X-ray, then going back to that general practitioner to look at that X-ray, and then hopefully they'll pass that on to the chiropractor or the physiotherapist so then they can get their treatment.

Oh, I know you can say: well, people have the ability to just go and pay for it. How can they pay for it? You've taken away $500 from their personal income tax, their insurance is going up, their property taxes are going up, their school fees are going up. Where are they supposed to come up with that money? You could have maybe helped them out a little bit here in Bill 8, alleviated some of those costs.

That's certainly a barrier for somebody who's on AISH. They need to get treatment. They have to go the long way, and I'm hearing about this. People are waiting weeks. I even heard one report of somebody waiting up to a year to be able to get treatment. That's ridiculous, all because, well, we thought it would be fiscally prudent, and it wasn't. I'm surprised that there hasn't been a move to reverse that by now. When the actual stakeholders come to you with a report – I know the government has it. They gave me a copy of it. I've seen it. Maybe you could invest that $4 million into AISH.

As you can imagine, Mr. Chair, I've got some considerable problems here with Bill 8. I don't see myself in a position to be able to support this. I mean, if there were certainly some changes that were going to be coming out of this debate and this discussion that would help constituents with their rising insurance costs or rising property taxes, paying more for just simply working – and that reminds me. I've got a couple of friends who work in oil and gas. One was a j-man electrician, used to make some good dollars. Used to. It's funny; he goes to work now, doesn't get paid double time. You took that away. How does that help Albertans? Now he's on an agreement where he gets one day off a week. He's almost not even able to come home just because of the distance from Fort McMurray to Edmonton; you know, that whole change between averaging arrangements and averaging agreements. It's funny because he said quite directly: "I thought you supported me. I thought you said that my industry was number one. But you've taken this away from me." So now he's making less, but now he's also paying more for all the things that I've been mentioning through this whole time I've been talking.

I don't really believe that the government actually believes that they're making life better for Albertans. I think it's just a line, just like the Premier used to say, when he was in Ottawa, about bracket creep. Clearly, he doesn't believe it now. I remember members that served in the 29th Legislature on the government bench and in the government caucus that used to get up and go on at length about omnibus legislation. I know that every single red tape bill I've seen so far is omnibus. Did you all actually believe it when you said it? What changed? There are a lot of things that seem to have changed, including the attitude towards helping Albertans trying to make ends meet. Instead, we're doing things like helping multibillionaires make more billions.

I'm not afraid to say it: the Walton family doesn't need your help. I think they're making enough. They're paying their utility bills. They're paying their gas bills. They're paying their insurance. They're paying their property taxes on probably multiple properties when people are having a hard enough time keeping one property.

We need to do better. Bill 8 isn't it. Mr. Chair, I would certainly urge every member of this House to oppose this piece of legislation. We need to do better. We need to look after everyone so that no one gets left behind. No one. And if I can make a suggestion, let's drop this attitude about: we have to be rich and wealthy before we help the ones that need it and that built this province that we're currently enjoying.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I believe I see the hon. Member for Calgary-South East has risen to respond.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Chair. Again, the funding in Bill 8 will ensure the government can cover the health care costs of the pandemic while also sending aid and equipment to Ukraine, providing electricity rebates to Albertans struggling with rising costs, and supporting child care workers and parents of young children. It's unfortunate that the members opposite continue to be offside with the financial expectations of Albertans, that elected us with a mandate to repair the fiscal and economic damage caused by the previous government.

We inherited a government with spending increases in many areas that exceeded population growth and inflation. Now, to be fair, some of these issues preceded the NDP government, but they saw the trajectory, and they chose to ignore it or to make it worse, to place that burden, with interest, on future Albertans. Programs were growing at 6 per cent, 8 per cent, or even more per year, putting into question if we could provide these services at the same level for our children and grandchildren without large future tax increases. Broadly, the NDP raised spending an average of 4 per cent per year. At that rate of spending, even at the budget's projected commodity prices and, again, making the assumption that they hadn't harmed businesses or our energy sector further, Alberta would have a $6 billion deficit this year, a $7.5 billion deficit next year, and a $9 billion deficit in 2024.

How did they plan to pay for this? By increasing taxes, increasing regulatory burden, shutting down the energy industry. Sadly, for the Albertans that lost their jobs and saw their businesses go under, this was the NDP plan. They now claim that the balanced budget presented is solely the result of a thriving energy sector. I would invite the members opposite to explain: if on the one hand the NDP believes our energy sector is making a significant contribution to the public services Albertans and indeed Canadians require, why did they do everything in their power to harm the industry, to chase investment away, to shut it down?

Our government took the opposite approach, an approach that has resulted in a balanced budget, an approach we can't take credit for because it was mandated to us by Albertans. We cut taxes, we eliminated red tape and unnecessary regulatory burden, and we championed our world-class energy sector, our industries, and our businesses. They criticize our approach, particularly the job-creation tax cut, but you know what happened, Mr. Chair? This year Alberta will collect approximately $400 million more in annual corporate tax revenue at our 8 per cent rate than the previous NDP government did at 12 per cent. Our government has also cut over 21 per cent of red tape, saving Albertans and their businesses an estimated $1.2 billion while making Alberta a desirable place to invest.

Listening to the debate tonight, it's clear to me that the members opposite aren't upset with the budget or the supplementary estimates we're debating tonight. They're upset that Alberta is doing so much better now that they aren't in government, that their job-killing policies have been removed, forgetting that Albertans put us here to do just that. Despite their narrative of fear and cuts, the province is providing world-class public services more efficiently and more sustainably, and the province is projecting surpluses instead of deficits. Albertans are getting back to work and, maybe worse for the NDP, back to normal.

I invite the members opposite to join Albertans in moving forward and to celebrate the remarkable turnaround of our province. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you.

Are there any members? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has risen.

Member Irwin: Oh, gosh, I don't know if I can follow that. I sure wish – what's his riding, the environment minister? I sure wish he were here because he repeatedly rails – sorry. I sure wish he was listening. He might be listening. I'm not going to refer to his presence or absence. He's always railing against us for using notes, and I haven't seen such an incredible use of notes as I did tonight, multiple times, in fact.

Anyways, I do feel sorry for Calgary-South East because, clearly, he's the appointed one to speak tonight. I would hope that some of the other MLAs, if they are so passionate about their budget and about Bill 7 and Bill 8, which we're talking about tonight, supplementary estimates, that they, too, would join this debate and share their passion with the House and, in fact, share their passion with their constituents, because, as my colleagues have shared tonight, we are hearing very much directly from our constituents, who are struggling.

Mr. Shepherd: Apparently his, too.

Member Irwin: Yeah. Apparently his, too, and in fact I do hear from a lot of folks from all over this province, many of whom do not find that they get a response from their UCP MLAs.

Mr. Panda: The thing is, unlike them, we did it drama free.

Member Irwin: Again, I hope that perhaps the Minister of Infrastructure will join in the debate as well, because I'm sure he's quite passionate about the supplementary estimates as well. I will await his entering the debate.

Member Ceci: With bated breath.

Member Irwin: Yes, very much with bated breath.

You know, I did have a chance to speak to this bill last evening as well, and I actually was in the midst of talking about education when my time ran out, and my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora actually continued my train of thought. She had just mentioned the fact that I'm home in my riding to a lot of incredible community schools. I represent mature neighbourhoods in the core of Edmonton with, you know, a lot of old schools. Delton school is one of those schools. It's a fantastic school. It's in the community just north of where I live, with just amazing staff and students there. It was actually the number one capital ask on Edmonton public's list, Delton school, yet it didn't make this government's cut for funding.

We asked the minister multiple times, actually, the Education minister, if she would be willing to come with myself and the Education critic and tour Delton school and just see how much need there is in that community, and unfortunately she has not accepted our request. You know – always the optimist – hopefully she still will because it's not too late to do the right thing for my constituents.

You know, I don't have a lot of time here, so I won't get into as much detail as I did yesterday, but education is a big one for us. My colleague from Edmonton-City Centre gave a great summary yesterday of health care. I wanted to get on the record, because I didn't get a chance yesterday, just a couple of comments from my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud. She didn't get a chance to hammer this one home on Children's Services in sup supply. Just two days ago the Minister of Children's Services admitted, thanks to the incessant prodding of my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud, that she has not spent $55 million of her provincial budget on child care out of $350 million in 2021, and she won't say what she's doing with that money. That's quite concerning to my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud, who, as we know, as our Children's Services critic, has been in touch with countless stakeholders and talks to both parents and families accessing child care and also to child care providers and is kind of wondering: what the heck is happening with that funding?

My colleague has pointed out that it's likely a breach of their agreement with the feds, which states quite explicitly that they can't replace provincial funding with federal funding. I would love to get some clarity on that. It seems like there are a lot of questions that remain when it comes to these supplementary estimates, so if anyone in the Chamber has some light to shed on that, we would love to hear it.

You know, I noticed the Associate Minister of Status of Women in – I just noticed her. I try not to refer to presence or absence, but I had the opportunity in budget estimates to ask that associate minister questions about Status of Women, and while Status of Women might not be explicitly tied to supplementary estimates, there is a little bit in there about culture and the funding given to Ukraine.

I do need to get on the record again just the fact that this government had an opportunity – I just had to talk about women, you know – to invest in women and to really bolster that associate ministry, but instead they chose to continue to minimize the importance of that ministry. And it started before this associate minister took over, so I'm not blaming her. Immediately one of the first moves we saw from this government was, obviously, throwing Status of Women in with culture and multiculturalism, making a large ministry and not having a stand-alone ministry for Status of Women.

You know, I raise for this minister, too, just some of the big concerns that we have, actually concerns that don't necessarily require large numbers on a budget line but do require support from this government, and those are things like gender-based analysis plus, GBA plus, which is a proven policy approach to ensure that programs, proposed legislation, any policies that a government is putting forward are viewed from an intersectional lens and that the impacts of said document pieces are very much thoroughly assessed. That makes for better decision-making. That makes for evidence-based decision-making, and we weren't able to get from this minister any answers on why something like that would be fully thrown out in this government's business plans.

I needed to get that on the record. Again, I've said it many times in this House already in this short time that it feels like we've been – well, maybe it doesn't feel like a short time we've been in session; sometimes it feels like a very long time. But, you know, I've said it many times that this government had a true opportunity, as was noted by one of the members over there on that side, with windfall revenues, oil prices higher than they've been in a long time. What an opportunity this government had to make a visionary budget – right? – to tangibly improve the lives of our constituents, and they chose not to. [interjection] Well, hopefully, we'll hear more from Calgary-South East, because clearly he's got a lot to say today.

They chose not to. You know, it's not shocking from this government, but it certainly is disappointing, especially at a time when they can't point to not having the funds to do so. I just don't think – and I've said it multiple times in this Chamber – that bragging about a balanced budget is something that you should be doing when people are still struggling.

That leads me to my last point tonight – I talked about it at length last night, but I'll talk about it again – and that's utility bills. It's about affordability, about the fact that our constituents are telling us every single day that they're struggling. And as I shared the other night – well, I believe it was last night, maybe the night before; all the nights blend together – it's not just my constituents in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. It's constituents in Morinville-St. Albert, where we were door-knocking. It's constituents in Strathcona-Sherwood Park, where we were door-knocking, right? It's constituents all over this province, many of whom are in UCP ridings. I just can't understand how it is, when I'm trying to help folks, when my staff are trying to help folks that we're hearing from – you know, it's hard. Especially, it's hard when you can say: "Well, the government has got a $50 rebate they can give you. I mean, you're not going to get it right away, and I know it's only going to make a very tiny dent in your bills." It's hard when we don't have concrete help for them.

I mentioned earlier today in the Chamber that the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity's offer was, you know, that your constituents can call the Utilities Commission and that they can also just figure out a fixed-rate contract, right? And my point earlier today was: why is this government telling Albertans to just go figure it out on their own? Why not take those steps as a government? Why not? I mean, we know that affordability is an issue that's impacting folks from all socioeconomic backgrounds. Why not address that, right? Why not? Especially if you think you're heading into an election here shortly, why not make some moves that are truly going to improve the lives of the folks that you represent?

You know, with that, I could speak a whole lot longer. Oh, gosh, I could talk about AISH. I could talk about housing some more. Hey, I could even talk about Walmart, like my colleague did there. Don't get me started on praising Walmart. But I will avoid doing that, and instead I will end my remarks.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Associate Minister of Status of Women has risen.

Ms Issik: Mr. Chair, I move to adjourn debate on Bill 8.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Deputy Chair: I see the hon. associate minister has risen again.

Ms Issik: Thank you. I move that the committee rise and report Bill 3 and report progress on bills 7 and 8.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Calgary-East has risen.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 3. The committee reports progress on the following bills: Bill 7 and Bill 8.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Acting Speaker: Any opposed, please say nay. That is carried and so ordered.

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Bill 3 Special Days Act

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Minister of Culture has risen.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise and move third reading of Bill 3, Special Days Act.

Alberta is a province rich in diversity, culture, and heritage. Throughout the year Albertans across the province come together to recognize special days and months. In some events it is a day of great celebration and dance and music, and for others it is a much more somber day of reflection and remembrance.

We have seen an increasing number of requests for special day recognition, which is a good thing because it means that our province is growing, that people are coming together and in many cases looking for a chance to celebrate. Mr. Speaker, the Special Days Act is internal housekeeping, really, not quite as exciting as actually celebrating, say, Alberta Francophonie Month or Black History Month or as fun as heading to the mountains on Family Day, but it is legislation that is important as it will standardize the process for how Alberta's government recognizes special days. So it's really an act of order and good government. The current process is quite ad hoc and lacks clarity for many people, so this act will give guidance and allow ministers to make ministerial declarations and to make it faster and easier for the date to be acknowledged.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Yes, Mr. Speaker, private members will still be completely free to make private members' bills. This has nothing to do with those regulations in the standing orders. As well, should this act be passed, the web page that will be created for it will be used to track these events for all Albertans so that they will be able to see and understand and easily find out which days and months have been officially recognized in and by the province of Alberta. Sometimes we see duplicate requests, and sometimes we get questions not quite knowing what's happening or what might be happening for a day or a month that has official recognition. Having this information online, consolidated in one place, will help Albertans save time and find the information they need, including guidelines and regulations that will be developed with it.

For those wondering, the process remains the same for those making requests for special days recognition. You can either write the relevant cabinet minister or submit a request using the request-a-declaration form that will be on alberta.ca. Mr. Speaker, it's important to acknowledge these dates, and we just want to make it easier.

Before I finish, you know that Alberta was the first province in Canada to recognize Family Day, under Premier Don Getty, which is a day recognized under the Special Days Act. Quite frankly, without federal support often, Alberta has been a leader in cultural support, one of the first provinces in the country to establish a Minister of Culture, a department of culture, and we continue that tradition now. Just a short while ago Alberta's Glenbow became the first museum in Canada to soon have perpetual free admission thanks to a gift to the museum. Alberta continues to lead in the whole cultural field. Processes may change over time, but coming together, promoting cultural awareness, and remembering our shared heritage is the one thing that remains the same.

Mr. Speaker, I'm asking again that all members of this House support Bill 3, the Special Days Act. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the hon. the Minister of Culture has moved third reading of Bill 3, the Special Days Act. Is there anyone that would like to speak to third reading? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Happy to rise this evening to add some comments, I guess, on Bill 3, Special Days Act. You know, at the end of the debate we'll be happy to support it. I guess I have I don't know if it's questions but just maybe some comments that, hopefully, going forward, will be taken in good faith, as they're given. As we know, the bill will allow the declaration of special days, weeks, and months in perpetuity. Of course, we know that right now Albertans can actually already do that. I kind of wonder a little bit about: is this really sort of like a red tape thing? I've heard maybe some comparisons there.

I guess what I'm concerned about, Mr. Speaker, is that, you know, if we are actually looking at Bill 3 as a form of red tape reduction, I fear that may start to trigger a snowball rolling down a hill, as we have heard over and over again, sometimes ad nauseam, about the government wanting to reduce its red tape by one-third and whatnot and get to that one in, one out. So if we're kind of putting in some red tape here, is there going to be a rush now to try to find something else to get rid of here? I know that we tried to make a bit of a big deal around Albertans being able to cut their Christmas trees and not having to pay the $10, but they still had to fill out the form. Yet we called that red tape reduction. Hopefully, that's not how Bill 3 is being used.

I guess – maybe it's a little harsh to say – I have a concern around Bill 3, and I think it would be prudent of me to bring it up. In terms of priorities, Mr. Speaker, right now Albertans are trying to figure out ways to pay their rising insurance costs. They're trying to figure out ways to pay their rising property taxes, their rising tuition and student loans, you know, and to figure out how to get their money to go further as they have to pay more income tax. We're focused on this as an actual piece of legislation. The Minister of Culture had mentioned that this is about cleaning up the process a little bit, making it easier, making it smoother. I'm totally onboard with that. Is this really a focus piece that we should be looking at versus some of the other things that, really, I think Albertans are hoping to get help with?

I know we had spoken a little bit earlier this evening, on Bill 8, about some of those things and, obviously, the concerns that we've heard from constituents about this. Again, not that I'm against a smoother process or whatnot, but honestly I really don't remember getting phone calls from constituents saying: "We need a bill to address special days. We need the government to prioritize this over making sure our health care workers have the proper staffing that they need." I mean, it's all great fun, you know, dandy that we get the opportunity to recognize these special moments or to remember things that have happened in history in order to make sure they never happen again, but if there's no relief for you to be able to leave work to be able to go to these special days or special remembrance periods because you're busy working your 16th hour of what was supposed to be a 10-hour shift – again, I don't want to sound like I'm not supportive of Bill 3 because I am, and I'm fully prepared to vote in favour of it. I appreciate the minister bringing it forward and allowing us to discuss this. I just really wish there'd be more of a focus on things that are top of mind right now for Albertans.

As I had mentioned earlier this evening in debate, I bet if I went to my one friend who doesn't get double time anymore, only gets one day home per week, working six and one, the gas price right now – it's just unaffordable for him to actually go home to be with his wife and then go back up to work. You know, would he rather see that addressed, or would he have rather seen Bill 3? I'm pretty sure I would know his answer, Mr. Speaker. I probably wouldn't repeat it, to be honest with you, just knowing my friend. Again, one tiny example around priorities.

I guess the other concern that I may have, and I've kind of voiced this: I guess the example would be the private member's bill bringing in an aviation council. Great idea. I was fully supportive of it, but I had a concern of that bill being used as a bit of a political tool for appointments to it. You know, my hope is certainly that that is not taking place. Speaking with the member, I haven't heard of anything like that yet, which is good. It's there doing its job promoting the aviation industry, but are we potentially going to see, maybe, some abuse of this with the government leading up to an election? I would hope not. To sit here and spend the time to debate this bill and have individuals be promised: well, we'll bring forward the special day if you vote for us. I hope that that would not be the case, Mr. Speaker.

I guess the one shortcoming: when we do declare these days, there is a bit of a short time limit on that. I know the minister did mention that private members are still able to bring forward legislation for that, which could result in kind of a more permanent declaration. I'm kind of hoping that maybe there could have been a clause for something a little more permanent. Obviously, there would probably need to be criteria for that, and I'm not opposed to that sort of thing either. Just, you know, maybe a small shortcoming. Maybe we can look at another time to add that in and just make the bill a little bit better and a very useful tool for Albertans.

I'm not going to belabour it. I know one of my colleagues also has some things to say on this. I do appreciate the time to be able to add some comments, and I hope that some of things I say, you know, are taken in good spirit. Again, I'm happy to support Bill 3 when we get a chance to vote on it here in third reading.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to Bill 3, Special Days Act, on behalf of my constituents. Bill 3 proposes changes around how to, you know, declare special days. If this bill passes, it will make slight changes, and there are a lot of questions around even what we will achieve after that. The declarations of days, weeks, and months in perpetuity: Albertans do have this mechanism or provisions already, to request these declarations of special days, weeks, or months by the government. They can do it through the website.

The biggest concern to me is that in this spring session of the House we're seeing what we're debating not only with this bill, with the other pieces of legislation: it seems the government still has not learned their lesson and still seems pretty out of touch with Albertans, with what is happening. I was listening to a radio talk show yesterday. The Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction was speaking and providing quite a bit of information. When it came to the question that – the host, I think, asked questions around if the minister can deliver the information that tied the achievements and numbers so that it would help Albertans understand how they are benefiting from what is happening in the House. There was not really a meaningful answer to that.

More than that, I've been, myself, on the radio talk shows, and I did actually pose questions in this House based on the callers' requests and demands, what they were asking, a number of constituents and people from my neighbour ridings – like, they're close to my office, a few blocks away from my office – walking into my office, sending e-mails. Their concern was affordability, particularly the rising cost of gas prices at the gas stations, the rising cost of natural gas, and skyrocketing prices of electricity. That is where I heard from an angry young man: "My credit card is full. I don't know. What should I do? I'm calling the service providers, but they are telling me that if you can't pay the bill, shut off your heat and put on a hoodie."

Those are the kinds of concerns I'm hearing, and I was expecting, you know – we are all members from different ridings, even members from different parts of the province, and we get the chance to go back weekly if not daily during session. I'm very sure the messages in their communities are not going to be very different. What I'm hearing in my area is people calling me and seeking my intervention. Unfortunately, I cannot. My position is limiting that. Families living across from schools are not being able to have their kids accepted because of the capacity issue. They're on a wait-list, and they're in fear that they will end up going to a faraway school and that will change their whole lifestyle and nature of work or their ability to work. Where bus service is not an option also: a number of those issues. The class sizes.

I attended the grade class, grade 6 students, the past week. Their desks are cramped, and their classes are crowded. These students share these concerns. I'm amazed at the way these 6th grade students, I think, at the age of 10-12, talk about their experience, how it has changed within three years, marching the classes together from one room to another room, due to lack of teachers in their school, due to lack of education staff in their school.

I received a letter from a constituent that she has graduated from the University of Alberta and she's not able to find a job in the tech sector in Alberta. I can agree to that concern as I do have my own son, my own nephew, graduated in digital media and IT. They're struggling to find a job in Alberta for the past two years and going through a lot of interviews right now. All of those proposals and all of those options are from either Ontario, Vancouver, or from different parts of the country.

That letter also said that she's so glad and thankful to the previous government that she was able to achieve and able to afford higher education, benefited from the tuition caps. Now her sister is also – her younger sister, her sibling, is struggling to manage between her fees and studies and finding jobs. Her fees have jumped almost to double. That is a long letter, two pages of letter, that I received in my office.

I was wishing after this issue – and that issue was not normal inflation. It was not something that cannot be felt when you see the utility prices, the gas prices raised to 300 per cent. The people who paid $900, their bills jumped to $1,900. Insurance is the area I just tried to refrain from discussing, but, you know, I think I have a duty to speak of my constituents' concerns. The rising cost of insurance as well is, like, 40 per cent. It's just a joke.

So those are kind of the concerns. I was at two events today, and I'm in my office, and that's what was being discussed. That's what we hear from our constituents, and that's what we wanted to discuss, and that's why I wanted to have this information on the record, that I do listen to my constituents and we do represent their concerns and their issues in the Assembly, that all members of the Assembly can come together and be serious about addressing their issues.

This bill is not one of those that I can go back to my constituents and claim that, you know, the government is serious about your concerns. The government is serious, and they are willing to address, and they're listening: that is not the message that this bill sends back.

We are spending – I think we are halfway through this spring session, and not even a single debate I could participate in that is focusing on what Albertans are going through. Alberta has seen unprecedented, you know, revenue in the last at least six, seven years, but Albertans are not feeling it. Albertans are not feeling that. They're happy about a balanced budget, but that balance is not really visible on their tables, in their daily lives.

The bill we discuss: as I said, there are a number of questions around it. I will be happy to hear from the minister or anybody from the government House members exactly why we are discussing this bill, what kind of changes Albertans will benefit from when we already have legislation where Albertans can request for a special day, month, and week. I definitely have a lot of questions on this bill, and I will be sharing and putting these questions in the House and will be happy to hear from the ministry.

With that, I conclude my remarks on this bill, and I'll be happy to seek the opportunity in the future to discuss and raise my questions around this bill.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call the question.

The Minister of Culture to close debate.

Mr. Orr: I'll waive.

[Motion carried; Bill 3 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 2

Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate March 22: Mr. Rutherford]

Ms Issik: I rise to ask for unanimous consent for one-minute bells for all of Committee of the Whole.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Speaker: Bill 2, Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, is before the Assembly. Are there others wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to have the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 2, which is the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. This is the act which implements the budget. We are, of course, in estimates and in budget debate, so we've had many opportunities to speak about the budget, but I am excited to speak about it again. I think the thing that I want to focus my comments on in this instance, because it deals specifically with it in this particular bill, which deals with taxation, is what the Premier used to refer to as the sneaky, pernicious, backdoor tax grab, which is to say failing to index to inflation. What that means is that as Albertans are seeing costs rise with inflation and significant costs rising, some faster than the cost of inflation – I think perhaps specifically of, you know, the costs of utilities, natural gas, electricity, that sort of thing, also insurance. Massive increases.

We're seeing costs rise. We have been for a while seeing wages sort of struggle to keep up. This was actually one of the issues that drove me originally into politics, having to deal with this sort of increased income inequality and how it hollows out the middle class and ultimately the impact on civil society and, actually, on democracy in the end because I think that creation of greater inequality is actually very bad for democracy. A number of other factors there, the hollowing out of the media, but this is definitely one of them. Yes, we're seeing this government sort of slowly bracket creep to increase taxes.

This isn't a small amount. Over the course of this government's fiscal plan they have admitted that this is $1 billion – $1 billion – coming out of the pockets of Albertans. These are everyday, middle-class Albertans that are giving up this $1 billion to this UCP government. Meanwhile they have billions of dollars to give away to corporations. Now, they claim this will create jobs. There are not only a lot of good studies on how this, which is really just trickle-down economics, doesn't work, but there's also proof right here in Alberta. They implemented it, and you know what happened? It didn't create jobs, which is what everybody said was going to happen, yet they proceeded anyway.

In the first year when they dropped the corporate tax rate and it didn't create jobs, they thought: "Wow. That sure didn't work. You know what we should do? We should definitely triple down and accelerate it and give it away faster and create no jobs." I don't know. I feel like, personally, if I started a program and the program didn't work at all, I wouldn't think that I should do it more. But there you have it. That's the UCP for you.

So while they're giving these billions away to corporations, who send it out in dividends to overseas shareholders, to people who are very wealthy, they are taking that money and backfilling that hole that they have created in the budget from everyday Albertans, from middle-class Albertans struggling to get by. They are struggling, Mr. Speaker. We hear from them every day. They write in to our offices from across the province to tell us that they are struggling, that families with two kids and two jobs are struggling to meet ends meet. They're struggling to pay the rent and the mortgage, to buy food, and to pay their utilities. What that means when they have less and less money in their pockets, in the pockets of those middle-class

Albertans, is that that's money they are not spending in the local economy.

We know that low- and middle-income Albertans are way more likely to spend their money in the local economy, so this government, by taking money away from those low- and middle-class Albertans and transferring that wealth to very wealthy people, many of whom don't even live in this province, is actually sort of hurting our local economies. They're hurting small businesses that could be getting that. That's a big, big problem.

These Albertans aren't just struggling under income taxes that this government is raising, because this government has also raised their property taxes. You may ask: how is that possible? Well, they cut MSI funding. They cut police funding. This is fundings that goes to municipalities. Municipalities can't carry deficits the way a province can, so they don't really have a lot of options. They can either cut services or they can raise taxes.

It gets even worse for rural municipalities because this government downloaded onto them massive costs for what they claim is their rural crime strategy. Really, it's not theirs at all. They're not paying for a dime of it. They sort of forced that upon municipalities, municipalities who, incidentally, always had the option. They always had the option to buy into a contract for additional RCMP officers. They chose not to, so this government did it for them. That will raise property tax bills for those residents, some of them up to $400 for a family. That's very problematic.

Then there's the cost of insurance. Ah, the cost of insurance. We hear about this all the time. Folks are struggling. Now, this government loves to talk about how it was the fact that we put in a cap that caused them. First off, the cap was 5 per cent, and that wasn't this year, when inflation is large. That was in past years when inflation wasn't nearly that large. Now, these folks love to rail about the fact that we accounted for population and inflation in our budget, that some budgets' population and inflation increases added up to 4 per cent. "That's ridiculous," they say. "How could anything possibly cost 4 per cent more? That's insane." Meanwhile, with insurance, we capped it at 5 per cent, five being larger than four, and these folks say: "Oh, that's ridiculous. How could you hold insurance companies to only 5 per cent a year? How could they possibly live within 5 per cent a year?"

Mr. Speaker, that's absurd. That's absurd. Five per cent a year is totally reasonable. In fact, our Finance minister at the time – the best Finance minister in history – went out and had conversations with those insurance companies and said: "You know what? We're going to give you a chance to prove yourselves. Demonstrate to us why your costs are going up more than 5 per cent a year, and we are happy to listen." But this UCP government pulled the cap, and they didn't require that demonstration. That's why it is so absurd that they stand in this place every time and say: "Oh, it's because the NDP held it to 5 per cent. That's why they went up." That's ridiculous. If it was true that 5 per cent was insufficient, all the UCP had to do was ask them to generate the report that they were already generating for the NDP government, the report that they were already working on. They let them get away without putting in that report, and it's because they knew. It's because they knew that they didn't need more than 5 per cent, so they didn't make them prove it. They just gave them whatever they wanted at the cost of Albertans.

Tuition – tuition – is also a thing that goes up in this budget. Not just tuition but the interest on student loans. People out there wanting to go to university, wanting to better themselves are having to pay that increased tuition, and they're having to pay increased costs on that debt. That makes a big difference, Mr. Speaker, in people's lives, and it makes a big difference, too, in terms of people's ability to better their situation.

You know, I'm very lucky. I had parents that were in a position to finance my first degree because they both had degrees. My mom, for instance: her parents worked hard, and they saved a lot of money to pay for that first degree. My mom was born in Scotland, and her parents came here when she was four years old because there was no work over there. I believe that her dad, my grandfather, had, I would say, roughly an 8th grade education. They came here and they worked hard. They put her in university, and she did the same for me, and I hope to do the same for my daughter.

The point is that that trajectory that we were able to achieve because of affordable tuition is a trajectory that this government is closing off to people in a similar situation, to people coming here from other countries to better their situation. I think that that's really sad, because I very much believe that your ability to go to university should be based on – well, I mean, ideally, everyone would go – how hard you work and your achievement and that sort of thing, not on whether or not your parents have enough money. So that's another big one.

One that I think is incredibly problematic in this is the Alberta child tax benefit. Because this hasn't been indexed, families are losing on average $450 a year, and that money is a big deal, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta child tax benefit I feel like we don't talk about enough. That was something that was brought in under the NDP government. It cut child poverty in half. It cut child poverty in half. Again, that was our Finance minister who did that, and that's an incredible achievement. It's something we should be very, very proud of. It's certainly not something that we should be seeking, like this UCP government is, to erode. When we make progress, when we move forward, when we lift children out of poverty, we should stick with that. We should do more of it, not what this UCP government is doing, which is eroding it.

Mr. Speaker, I'm sure I have told this story before in the House because it was very, very meaningful to me. Before the 2019 election I was out door-knocking. I knocked on the door of one particular woman who came to the door, and I said, you know, "What are your views on politics?" She said, "I don't follow it much." I said: "Okay. Well, has anything the government done impacted your life?" And at this time it was NDP government. She said: "Oh, well, I'm actually trying to go back to work right now after the birth of my third child, and I had tried to go back previously after previous children. It was really hard because I couldn't afford to have someone look after my kids while I was going on interviews." And she said, "Now I get the child tax benefit, and it meant that I was able to afford to pay someone to watch my kids while I went on a job interview, and it was just such a relief."

The story stays with me, Mr. Speaker, because it reminded me why I do what I do. It reminded me why I come to this place, why I run in elections. For that woman that action on behalf of the government made all the difference. Maybe it was only a small difference, you know, not having to, like, try to figure out what to do with her kids while she went on interviews for jobs, but for a lot of people that's life changing. You know, being able to go into an interview calm and composed and put together and knowing that you're able to pay someone to provide high-quality care for your kids while you're going back to work is a big deal. It made a big difference in her life, and I'm sad to see this government try and erode it. I wonder if she were in the same situation today, what the impact would be.

This also is a budget that doesn't account for inflation, which, again, is extremely high, the highest it's been in 30 years, for any sort of benefits. That's AISH or the seniors' benefit or Alberta Works. I believe that is the program. It means that a senior couple will have $750 less in their pocket. That may not seem like an enormous amount of money, but for people living on the edge – and there are a lot of them, Mr. Speaker; we hear from them every day in our offices – it is a lot of money, and it does make a big difference.

So I don't support this bill, and honestly I don't think the UCP members should support this bill either. I think that if they're really listening to their constituents, they know that they shouldn't support this bill. They must have . . .

The Speaker: Hon. members, the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, and follow the very able and capable debate of my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View, who I think very succinctly summed up what this bill means for Albertans, for Alberta families. It means higher costs. It means less money in their pockets at a time when this government is choosing to give more dollars away to those who already have a lot. Profitable corporations: they're getting more dollars from this government. Insurance companies: absolutely, they are making more money under this government. Average Albertans: they are taking home less. At a time when Albertans are facing record costs with inflation, from their utility bills, from their insurance costs, this government is charging them more and giving them less.

Now, that flies in the face of what this government purports to be, Mr. Speaker, certainly the very populist appeal that it rode into office on. Certainly, it's absolutely contrary to the Premier's own past history and the promises that he made, but sadly it is the reality of what Albertans are facing under this government.

This budget, Mr. Speaker, as enabled by Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, the budget implementation act, marks a grand achievement on the part of the government, that achievement being that it is now collecting more tax, more revenue from individual personal income tax than it is from corporations. This government came into office with their promises of their $4.5 billion corporate giveaway, immediately moved forward on that, gave hundreds of millions of dollars away to companies that immediately pocketed those proceeds and took them out of the province, did not create a single job, did not invest in a single thing. In fact, they turned and laid Albertans off.

And, in thanks for that, the government turns and gives them more dollars and, in turn, now puts the burden of the tax system on the individual Albertan. Those same folks that lost their jobs with those companies who pocketed the corporate giveaway from this government are now paying more tax to this government, higher utility bills, more property taxes, paying more for insurance. This government has shifted the burden from those who have to those who have less.

Under this government something they were doing through the back door, something that they swore they would never do, and that is raising income taxes on Albertans. Now, of course, the tax rate, Mr. Speaker, has not in fact changed, and the Minister of Finance will pat himself on the back for that, and he will stand and he will speak very proudly of that. But the fact is that he is taking more income tax from a vast number of Albertans because he deindexed the income tax brackets, something the Premier, as we have talked about quite a bit – and it's been quoted, and the videos are available on social media – railed against, that practice, when it was a Liberal government in Ottawa, but it is the practice of this United Conservative government in Alberta. As I said earlier, they do not have the guts to tax Albertans honestly. They do it under cover.

The basic personal exemption for Alberta income tax in 2019, Mr. Speaker, was $19,369. Under the UCP in 2025 the personal exemption will remain $19,369. Now, if they had left it indexed, if they had not used this underhanded way of taking more tax dollars out of the pockets of Albertans, that personal exemption would be $22,219. So every year this government is taking more dollars away from Albertans at a time when this government is costing them more. If the income tax system had remained indexed through 2025, all Albertans would have seen an increase in the basic personal exemption of $2,850.

So, simply put, on that measure alone, the statistically average family in Alberta is paying more than $500 extra because the UCP government is taxing inflation. At a time when they are giving dollars away to corporations, when they are giving record profits to insurance companies, they are costing average Alberta families $500 more. Now, of course, they will pat themselves on the back because they're giving them back $50 a month on their $700, $800, $900 utility bill, but at the same time they are taking $500 away, Mr. Speaker.

Now, as my colleague for Calgary-Mountain View noted, it wasn't enough for the government simply to charge every Albertan more income tax, they also decided that they would take away dollars from those who need them most through things like the Alberta child and family benefit as they degrade and erode the value of those benefits every single year. Indeed, a family with two children will lose about $485 in income because the government is not increasing the ACFB with inflation. As my colleague noted, that is a benefit that helped cut child poverty in this province by 50 per cent, in half, one of the biggest impacts we have seen in terms of a government policy in ending child poverty in this province, and this government decided, at a time when it was handing more dollars away to profitable corporations, taking away the cap to let insurance companies, with no accountability, raise their rates to whichever level they should choose, that families being lifted out of poverty should pay $485 more. That's quite the Alberta advantage under the United Conservative government, Mr. Speaker.

We know that overall, under this government, Albertans are paying more than $1 billion in additional income tax – $1 billion, Mr. Speaker – out of the pockets of everyday Albertans in a way that this government cannot even be honest about. They will not admit it, but they're happy to take it. The most vulnerable Albertans, the folks who are struggling the most, are losing every single year. Again, while this government gives away dollars to profitable corporations, while it gives away those dollars to insurance companies, while it raises property taxes, while it defunds municipalities and increases the burden on people, they are also taking dollars away from seniors and people that are living with disabilities.

The annual AISH amount in 2019 under our government, Mr. Speaker, was $20,220. The annual AISH amount under this government in 2025 will be $20,220, not one dollar more under record inflation, rising costs in every aspect of these individuals' lives, not one dollar more because those dollars are going to profitable corporations. They are going to insurance companies. They are going to utility companies. They are going to this government's friends.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The annual AISH amount, if this government had not made the unconscionable decision to deindex these benefits, would have been $23,195, Mr. Speaker. That is $3,000. That is a huge amount for an individual who is making such a small amount per year. But this government decided to balance its books, to show its fiscal prudence. It would take that $3,000 away from individuals who are living with a disability, who are already struggling to pay rent and buy food, because that's politically convenient for them.

The Alberta seniors' benefit in 2019 under our government: $5,145. Under this government in 2025 it will still be $5,145. If it had stayed indexed, it would have been $5,902. Seniors, Mr. Speaker, indeed are struggling right now with rising utility costs, with rising insurance costs because this government, again, wants to prioritize its political friends, wants to prioritize profitable corporations, wants to prioritize covering its own bottom line and looking good even at a time of record oil revenues, which they did nothing to earn.

They'd rather splash those dollars on their energy war room. They would rather burn those dollars on their 1 and a half billion dollar gamble on the re-election of Donald Trump and take those dollars away from seniors and people living with a disability. It's shameful, Mr. Speaker. But that is the decision of this government, however much they try to obfuscate, however much they try to deny, however much they try to shake their fist at Ottawa to distract from this unconscionable action on their part.

It's also interesting in this bill, Mr. Speaker, that the act is modified. They make a modification to the Alberta Health Care Insurance Act to make it explicit or to clarify – that's a favourite word of this government to do things that they want to do and want to claim were already there even though they're making the change. They like to talk about how they are clarifying legislation. This was quite clear before, actually. This was something that we put in place under our government, but of course then this government clarified legislation to say that they had the right to tear up the contract with doctors whenever they wished. They are, at least, in this act, apparently, modifying to make it explicit or clarify that only the AMA, the Alberta Medical Association, can negotiate on behalf of doctors for compensation.

Again, Mr. Speaker, what we have here is the government trying to cover up for things it has previously done and its decision in 2020 to use the powers they awarded themselves in Bill 21 to tear up the contract with Alberta doctors whenever they wish, simply at the whim of the minister, a one-sided agreement. Of that legislation, of course, the minister at the time said that he was clarifying a power that he believed he already had.

Now in this act we see them backtracking once they realized the damage they have done, as indeed we see that they have continued to drive doctors out of our province, that we have fewer doctors in many areas now than we did when this government came into power, that we have far more Albertans without a family doctor than when this government came into power, that we have severe problems in many areas of the province having doctors like anaesthesiologists and others that are badly needed to dig us out the hole that this government has put us in coming out of this pandemic, with the tens of thousands of cancelled surgeries.

We have rolling closures of ERs across the province of Alberta because we do not have enough physicians to cover, hospitals that are struggling right now at 130 per cent capacity and do not have enough coverage to look after patients overnight, so I suppose I at least support this part of the bill as the government again attempts to backfill a small amount of the damage they've done.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. It's actually a bit of a tough act to follow my colleagues the Member for Calgary-Mountain View and the Member for Edmonton-City Centre. They've raised so many of the issues and concerns that I, too, share with respect to what's in this bill but, most importantly, what's not in this bill and what it does not address. They've gone through in great detail, outlining precisely the impact, for example, of bracket creep, which is, I know, an obscure term. Frankly, until I was elected as an MLA, I wasn't familiar with what that term meant, but I became familiar with it quite quickly in 2019, when the Premier did deindex personal income tax.

At the time I was quite – you know, I spoke out, actually, and spoke to media a little bit about it because it was quite shocking to me when I heard, of course, that the Premier had spoken out against this very kind of change, which basically means that as inflation affects your personal income, actually your tax bracket, you get bumped into the next tax bracket. That's pretty much what it means. The personal exemption continues to be small, and it doesn't apply to you, and you get bumped out of that personal exemption phase in your income sooner because, basically, personal income tax is frozen. The Premier spoke out against that many times. In fact, he's got a long and lengthy history on record in the Houses of Parliament speaking out against it and calling it an insidious and pernicious tax creep and referring to other Members of Parliament at that time as “bracket creeps.”

I think at this point, though, three years into this government, it's not so much the hypocrisy that shocks me anymore about the Premier and the UCP government in terms of the actions they take but, I think, an overall concern and question that continues to come up, which is: what are the principles of this government anymore? What do they really stand for? They seem to very quickly shed the things that they claim are most important to their core beliefs at the drop of a hat, and they do it for insidious reasons. They were easily – like, look how quickly the Premier was able to give up something he had railed against for years, this idea of bracket creep, and how quietly and quickly he did it willingly when he became Premier of this province. It wasn't simply that he failed to index personal income tax; he actually ended that practice. It was something that was in place, and he actively took a measure to end that practice, to go against something that he claimed as part of his principles for so long.

That really, I think, speaks volumes about this Premier but also this government, because I have yet to hear any member of the government caucus stand up and explain that complete abandonment of their principles. What they're doing, of course, is raising revenue, raising taxes on Albertans but not having the courage of their convictions to say that's what they're doing, and that's perhaps because nobody knows anymore what their convictions are. I think my colleagues outlined exactly what that means in terms of what it's going to cost Albertans, what it continues to cost Albertans, so I want to speak a little bit about some of the things that my colleagues also spoke to, which were about the deindexing of many benefits that Albertans receive, particularly low-income Albertans.

I want to talk a little bit about the Alberta child and family benefit. Now, in 2019 this government made a decision to combine two previous benefits, of which one was the Alberta child benefit, which, you know, we brought in as the Alberta NDP, which was critical, as my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View spoke to, in actually reducing child poverty in this province. We know that benefit programs like that are critical. They are perhaps the most critical tool in alleviating child poverty. The UCP government in 2019 combined that with the Alberta family employment tax credit and put it all together into the Alberta child and family benefit. Now, in 2019, when that happened, of course, what the government didn't address was, first of all, that $50 million less was actually being provided in benefits to vulnerable families. And let's be clear. These benefits go to lower income families primarily, and they are meant to help them with the costs of raising a child and raising a family.

So not only did they mention that they are actually investing fewer dollars, $50 million less at that time, into this benefit, but they also failed to speak to the reality of the changes they made, which were that, yes, they did provide slightly higher benefits to the lowest income families. We're talking about $10,000 in annual income. Those are the families who are getting a slightly higher benefit. They dramatically not only reduced the eligibility, made many low-income families ineligible for this benefit, but it actually meant that they received a lot less even if they were still receiving the benefit. For example, Mr. Speaker – and I think it's important to get a sense of what we're talking about here – we're talking about how families earning $25,000 or more a year saw a drop in their benefit. Twenty-five thousand dollars a year: that is very low income, yet they're actually receiving less in benefits under this government.

The same is true for a family of two parents and two children living at the poverty line, which is under $40,000 per year in this province, who now receives – well, actually, sorry. In 2019 they received $500 less per year than they were before. So they actually cut a number of families off it. Now we find out, of course, that they're also not indexing this. And that is becoming more and more relevant at a time when we're seeing the cost of living and inflation – rents are going up because utilities are going up. Everything is going up for these low-income families, and they're actually not going as far with less money, with less purchasing power.

Just earlier this week, Mr. Speaker, we asked the officials from the Ministry of Treasury Board and Finance what analysis they did to actually assess in this past fiscal year what the impact would be on those receiving the Alberta child and family benefit, on those receiving AISH, on those receiving the seniors' benefit. What would be the impact on their purchasing power of failing to index their benefits to the rise in inflation? We asked this question multiple times because we got very interesting answers, and the response that became very clear from Treasury Board and Finance was that they did not assess that because that was not their goal. Their objective last year was to bring down those benefits to be in line with other provinces.

That was their policy objective, actually to lower those benefits and the purchasing power that goes along with them. That was actually their stated outcome: reduce those benefits to make it more in line with whoever the UCP government is comparing themselves against to serve their purposes on this day. When asked about what the impact would be on families, they could not give an answer. I think that's exactly what we're seeing with this government. They crow about a balanced budget, with a surplus, actually, and do not seem to understand at all that that budget is doing nothing for families. They're not seeing that benefit. They're very proud of it. Conservatives will all vote for a surplus budget – right? – a balanced budget. They're super proud of it. But they don't answer for the fact that their constituents are struggling with higher costs than ever, and there is nothing in this budget to actually make their lives more affordable. They're not seeing what this government is crowing about. They're not feeling it.

I know that that's true for all of the constituents of the UCP caucus members as well. I was door-knocking, as I usually do, in my riding this past week, and it was the number one issue that came up at the doors. I am certain it is coming up at the doors. If they are door-knocking – I don't know if they're spending most of their time actually on a leadership review – they should be listening to their constituents, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. That was great timing. As you know, it is 10:15, and I do hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. However, pursuant to Standing Order 64(4) we must now proceed to Committee of the Whole to vote on the appropriation bills.

Government Bills and Orders
Committee of the Whole

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, March 24, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interest and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Hon. members, we will now be led in the singing of God Save the Queen by Ms Brooklyn Elhard. I would invite you to join in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

God save our gracious Queen,
Long live our noble Queen,
God save the Queen!
Send her victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us,
God save the Queen!

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, this morning I had the privilege to meet with a very special guest who's now joining us in the Speaker's gallery. Please welcome the ambassador of the Kingdom of Denmark, Her Excellency Hanne Fugl Eskjaer. [Standing ovation] Her Excellency is joined by Minister-Counsellor Louise de Brass; honorary consul general of Denmark, Rob Seidel; and his assistant Alexandra Hryciw. Thank you so much for joining us.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Members, joining us in the galleries today we have a number of guests. A guest of the Member for Calgary-Peigan, Jackie Flegel. Also joining us in the gallery there are a number of United Conservative Party constituency association presidents. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Premier's Leadership

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, the UCP is the most unethical, undemocratic, untrustworthy government Alberta has ever seen, and the legacy starts at the top. Alberta has a Premier who claims to support the rule of law, but his actions show that he does not consider that the rule of law applies to himself. The Premier tried to brush off allegations that his campaign ran a false, sham campaign designed solely to attack his opponents in the leadership race – a sham campaign designed to attack the Premier's opponents, Albertans know exactly – funded by an illegal, secret $60,000 corporate donation. Despite his protests and claims that these allegations were merely gossip, it's now a hundred per cent clear that they were true. His staff wrote speeches, designed graphics, planned when the campaign would end, and even wrote the concession speech for a campaign that was a sham from top to bottom, and it reached all the way to the top. The Premier even provided the whisky for the planning meeting.

Hundreds of thousands of dollars in fines were issued by the Election Commissioner, who then was subsequently fired by this government, with every member of the UCP applauding this action. The Premier dismissed allegations that voter fraud occurred in the leadership that elected him, but only yesterday the RCMP confirmed that an open, active investigation into voter irregularities is still ongoing.

And just like the Election Commissioner, the Premier now tries to find reasons to fire the RCMP because, apparently, in UCP land the only firing offence is for trying to hold Premier to account, this Premier who changes the rules to suit him, doesn't follow the rules he tells others to follow, shuts down debate when he doesn't like the topic, and then hides when things get tough and much, much more. There is nothing this Premier will not do to stay in power. But Albertans see him and his actions for what they are, and in 2023 he will face the legacy of his legacy of corruption.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Traffic Offence Administration

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now that Alberta is getting back to normal after the COVID-19 pandemic – and on average we have approximately 2 million traffic safety ticket challenges each year that are filed within the court system. This amounts to approximately 400,000 people entering Alberta's courthouses each year to deal with traffic offences. Now they can begin doing that.

This large volume of ticket challenges prompted Alberta's government to develop an administrative system for handling the resolution of traffic offences. Phase 1 implemented an adjudication process for impaired driving offences and became operational in the fall of 2020. Phase 1 has proven to be highly successful and has reduced court pressures over the past year; 89 per cent of all impaired driving matters have been diverted from the courts to SafeRoads Alberta, and enforcement has increased by over 46 per cent. Mr. Speaker, over 1,700 matters of impaired driving were resolved in just 30 days. Phase 1, or administrative judgment of impaired driving charges, will remain in place.

Mr. Speaker, phase 2 of the justice transformation initiative was designed to address violations of the Traffic Safety Act other than impaired driving. In late January we paused the implementation of phase 2 so that we could take a closer look at the program and engage with Albertans all across the province. After careful consideration and consultation with Albertans this government has decided not to proceed with phase 2. Albertans will continue to enjoy their right to due process, procedural fairness, and the presumption of innocence until proven guilty, as they've always known it to be.

We will continue to consult with Albertans to find new and innovative ways to decrease backlogs within the Alberta justice system. By doing so, we can save tax dollars and time when interacting with the justice system. Mr. Speaker, when Albertans speak, this government listens.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River is next.

Member for Edmonton-South

Mr. Williams: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The poor Member for Edmonton-South has been abandoned by his party and taken a hit for the NDP caucus. After using backdoor hacking techniques to seek out the vaccine status of a government MLA and expose the status of a private Alberta citizen, he's tried to convince the province that he did it with justification. But let me tell you that there is no justification. There is no heroism in using shady tactics for political gain. In fact, Albertans have said the opposite. Unfortunately, the remainder of his political career will be spent at home, alone as an independent, left out to dry by his own leader. The members opposite have watched one of their own members contort himself in an attempt to explain how hacking private health care information was not only legal but an obligation. He has tried to save what's left of his time in Alberta politics, and his fellow NDP members are happy to show him the door so long as none of them go with him.

The member's vaccine obsession now makes sense, and Albertans have woken up. They see right through his explanation after he spent his Tuesday morning frantically trying to defend his position in exposing the same security flaws that he used to obtain vaccine records of private individuals. Mr. Speaker, those that elected him to this position scratch their heads, wondering: is this what they asked out of their elected representative? Is this the kind of representation they want for their family? Is this how they expect to see the cost of living go down in the province of Alberta? Not at all. They understand.

And his claims that it was ethical hacking fit about as well as the glove on O.J. Simpson's hand. Impersonating individuals and hacking to obtain personal health data is illegal. Full stop. The Member for Edmonton-South released a paper entitled How I Did It – not If I Did It, not How I Would Have Done It – where he admits to hacking and impersonating the individuals to obtain private personal health data. Sadly, in this province, Mr. Speaker, a lot of people seem to ignore this fact because they like his politics and the colour of his jersey. That is sad.

We need to understand why the Leader of the Opposition is doing the same. We have to know what she knew and when she knew it.

Budget 2022 Vote

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, I'm honoured to be an MLA. We have responsibilities and privileges as members that only 87 people in this province get to have. We have a duty to support our constituents and bring their concerns to this House. We have the ability to vote on issues that matter to them in this Legislature, the ability to vote in ways they understand and can support.

A perfect example: today there will be a vote on the budget, a budget that doesn't do much to help actual Albertans, a budget that does not support families, which does not secure our economic future, which makes life harder for our most vulnerable and makes life less affordable every single day. You know, a budget is a very interesting thing when it comes to the actual meaning of the vote because every single budget is actually a confidence vote in this House. It is asking each and every one of us: do we support this Premier? Do we feel he deserves to lead this province? I know there are a lot of us in here that don't, and they aren't just on this side of the House.

Don't ever forget that we are all here to represent the voices of all of our constituents. Do your constituents support this Premier? Do the people you talk to back home – your neighbours, your friends, volunteers, and community organizers – feel that this Premier should be allowed to lead this province? By standing and putting your name forward in favour of this vote, you are telling all of those people that you support the leadership as it currently stands.

I'm asking each and every single UCP MLA to think long and hard about why they were elected, about who elected them, and I'm asking them to vote with their conscience. If you support this confidence vote today, you are supporting the continued leadership of this Premier, so in the future you might as well not even vote in any type of review. Your supporters will know where you stand and how you will vote because you will have just showed them today.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Member for Edmonton South

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The NDP vax hack scandal has gone from bad to worse. On Tuesday we learned that the disgraced Member for Edmonton-South hacked Alberta's vaccine records system using the identity of a member of this Chamber. That's bad, but what's worse is that he illegally obtained access to the personal health records of at least one private citizen in the process.

We all need to know more about what happened here, like why did he use the birthdate of a member of the government to hack the vaccine system instead of the birthdate of someone in his family or even his own caucus? Has he hacked sensitive government information before? If he thought it were necessary, would he do it again? Why did he think it was his job as a member of the Legislature to hack the private health records of Albertans?

But the biggest question here centres around the NDP leader and her role in this vaccine hacking scandal. Here's something we learned yesterday. In December, when the Edmonton-South MLA's private residence was raided by the RCMP, the NDP leader claimed to have no prior knowledge about this hacking, but this past week our government released an e-mail showing that her senior staff knew about the vax hack back in September. When asked, the NDP leader admitted that she knew the MLA had, quote, found a flaw in September.

This is shocking, Mr. Speaker. For months we listened to the NDP obsessively question government members about their vaccine status. This was all after the Member for Edmonton-South hacked the vaccine record system. Let me be clear. Any NDP member who used the private health records of Albertans to their political advantage in this Chamber must do the right thing and resign. This includes the NDP leader. This scandal has unearthed a shocking disregard for ethics in the opposition benches, and we need to get to the bottom of this scandal. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Budget 2022 and Personal Debt

Ms Sweet: Mr. Speaker, today the Legislature will vote on the UCP government's failed budget, which lacks a clear vision for the future of Alberta. Yesterday I spoke in this Chamber about the most recent MNP report on consumer debt in Alberta. The report was published before this budget, yet the government did nothing to address the real concerns that Albertans are facing. According to the report 50 per cent of Albertans are concerned about their current level of debt, with many only $200 away from having to use their credit to pay their bills. That was in January.

Since January we have seen this no-help budget introduced, a budget that does nothing to support Albertans struggling with their personal finances. In fact, what this budget does is that it makes it harder for Albertans to pay their bills and put money into their savings – increases in property taxes, increases in insurance, increases in school fees, increases in all fees that make life more expensive – at a time when everything is becoming more expensive. The government could have done more to support the people of this province. They will talk about their 13-cent rebate on gas, but I clearly heard yesterday that the government . . . [interjections]

Speaker's Ruling Interrupting Members' Statements

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order. The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays knows very well and truly that interrupting a member's statement is wildly unparliamentary, and I would expect better from him.

From the top.

Ms Sweet: Mr. Speaker, today the Legislature will vote on the UCP government's failed budget, which lacks a clear vision for the future of Alberta. Yesterday I spoke in this Chamber about the most recent MNP report on consumer debt in Alberta. The report was published before this budget, yet the government did nothing to address the real concerns that Albertans are facing. According to the report 50 per cent of Albertans are concerned about their current level of debt, with many living only $200 dollars away from having to use credit to pay their bills. That was in January.

Since January we've seen this no-help budget introduced, a budget that does nothing to support Albertans struggling with their personal finances. In fact, what this budget does is make it harder for Albertans to pay their bills and put money into their savings – increases in property taxes, increases in insurance, increases in school fees and all other fees to make life more expensive – at a time when everything is more expensive.

The government could have done more to support the people of this province. They'll talk about their 13-cent rebate on gas, but I clearly heard yesterday that this government does not have a guarantee that it's even true. It was just a handshake with gas companies; it's a just-trust-us deal. Well, Albertans don't trust this government, Mr. Speaker, and this is just another false promise to an already financially stressed Alberta. The government says that this budget will create jobs, yet all we've seen are part-time jobs, not long-term, not full-time, not paying-the-bills jobs.

Mr. Speaker, I had hopes, when I saw that oil was going to balance this budget, that the government would set a vision for the Alberta economy and our future, a vision that would help address the economic stressors that many Albertans are facing. I was disappointed. This government did not invest in the people of Alberta. They balanced the budget on high oil, cutting $2.8 billion in expenses, and increased the cost to Albertans. Even fiscal conservatives agree that a balanced budget isn't enough if the citizens of the province don't have the buying power to get the economy going. It's time this government listens to the people of Alberta.

Federal Liberal-NDP Agreement

Mrs. Allard: Well, there's no sugar-coating it, Mr. Speaker. The NDP-Trudeau alliance that will keep Justin Trudeau in power until 2025 is bad for our economy and bad for our oil and gas sector. Justin Trudeau's hostility towards our energy industry is well known. He's worked to kill pipelines, ban tankers, and impose lofty carbon taxes. Despite these provocations, however, our industry has managed to continue working and providing ethical energy to the free world. But this new unholy alliance between Justin Trudeau and the radical NDP poses a truly existential threat to our largest industry and the hundreds of thousands of men and women who work in it.

Canadians did not vote for the NDP to have any decision-making powers in their federal government, and had they known, they may have voted entirely differently. The NDP is, after all, the party that passed the Leap Manifesto, a radical doctrine that opposes any new pipelines and includes a demand to, and I quote, leave the oil in the ground. Our industry needs certainty, Mr. Speaker, but the NDP-Trudeau coalition agreement only contains vague promises to, and I quote again, proceed with policies and programs meant to target climate change. Unquote.

Undoubtedly, the NDP has found one of their own in Liberal environment minister Steven Guilbeault, who was an activist for Greenpeace before he was appointed by Justin Trudeau. Guilbeault was once arrested for scaling the CN Tower in Toronto and unfurling a banner calling Canadians – wait for it – climate killers. Undoubtedly, the NDP will work with Guilbeault to shut down pipelines, keep Canadian oil in the ground, and pursue other anti-Alberta policies meant to harm our industry, our working families, and our country, Mr. Speaker.

Now more than ever Alberta needs a strong Conservative government to stand up for our energy and its workers. Our government supports the oil and gas industry, and we are more committed than ever to protecting it from this unholy alliance between the radical NDP and Justin Trudeau, who are bent on killing it. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because on this side of the House we stand up for Alberta.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has question 1.

Budget 2022

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, today the House will vote on this Premier's no-help budget, but it hasn't happened yet, so there's still some time. He could stop his billion-dollar tax on inflation, taking more and more money out of Albertans' pockets. He could stop his hike on tuition and school fees. He could put a real cap in on electricity rates and offer a real rebate for natural gas. He could do more than 50 bucks on a $700 electricity bill. He could actually make a difference. Why doesn't the Premier stop raising costs and put some real relief in this budget for Albertans today?

1:50

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. There is real relief in this budget. We call it a job for every Albertan who needs an opportunity. We call it fiscal responsibility so we're not downloading irresponsible decisions on the next generation. There is lots in this budget for Albertans, not only for this generation but for the next as well.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, unlike this Premier, Albertans don't cheat or change the rules to get ahead. They work hard, and when times are tough, they expect their government to be there to help them.

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

Ms Hoffman: Families can't make ends meet, people are waiting for their surgeries, parents are fighting this horrible curriculum, yet the Premier is shutting down shop to go campaign for his own job.

To the Premier: you actually have a job to do right now; why won't you do it? Why won't you do anything to make life better for Albertans?

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 1:51.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we're right back to where we were three years ago, with the NDP focused on the politics of fear and smear. Dare I say that it might be just because their polling numbers keep dropping like a rock? This side of the House is not going to focus on the politics of fear and smear and the high school politics like you see coming from the NDP. We're laser focused on the economy, getting Alberta back to work. Great news: it's working. You know what the NDP is trying to hide? Just shortly, we're about to vote on the first balanced budget in 14 years inside this Chamber.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, the Premier's Divided Conservative Party is crumbling all around him. Today at least two MLAs have called for his resignation. At least two. It could be more. I can barely keep track. Let me tell members on that side of the House that they can make a change today. They can vote nonconfidence on this horrible budget and eject the Premier. To the government: will any of them over there show the courage of their Facebook convictions and actually stand up to the current Premier? Now is your chance.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I can guarantee you that any true Conservative MLA in about an hour and a bit is going to stand up and vote for a balanced budget. This side of the House is proud of returning all of the jobs that have been lost under the NDP, getting our economy back on track, getting pipelines built, and moving this province forward. The NDP, though, focuses on the politics of fear and smear. That's exactly what they do every time that they get in trouble in the polls. But don't worry. Through you to Albertans, Mr. Speaker, we're going to make sure they can never get back into power.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora and the second set of questions.

Premier's Leadership

Ms Hoffman: The government is falling apart, Mr. Speaker. No one trusts this Premier or anyone on that front bench at this point. Today the MLA for Red Deer-South wrote to the Premier saying, "Confidence is lost, and for the good of the party, for the province, the Premier should be gracious [and] resign." Can the Premier inform this House how he can still expect Albertans to trust him when it's clear that his own members, his closest allies, are telling him that they've lost confidence in him?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, there is a confidence motion that will be before this House today, and I suspect – I don't know for sure what will take place – you're going to see that motion pass and the government stand with our Premier, who's bringing forward balanced budgets, returning jobs inside this province, and taking Alberta on track to lead the country in economic recovery and, most importantly, fixing all of the damage that the NDP did to this province. Again, to Albertans: we promise we're never going to let these guys get back into power.

Ms Hoffman: The Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul is disgusted with the corruption and the disrespect. The Member for Airdrie-East is shocked that the UCP would be in the middle of an RCMP investigation and change the voting system. I could go on, Mr. Speaker. There is a nonconfidence vote in this Legislature today. I know that there are members over there who want to vote against this Premier. Will the Government House Leader pledge here and now to let all of his MLAs actually vote with their conscience, or is this another example of a rigged vote by the UCP?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, that member, who is a member of a party who has covered up sexual harassment allegations about their own caucus, who had their ethics critic hacking members of this place's personal health care information, that they then covered up for months and hid from Albertans, and who, when they were in power, did not give the documents about the murder of a toddler to homicide detectives, has no business lecturing anybody in this Chamber, and that member should resign if that's how it's going to go.

Mr. Sabir: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 1:55.

Ms Hoffman: So anyone who was hoping for a free vote, your House leader just said no.

The Member for Airdrie-Cochrane also said today that trust in the Premier has been shattered and that he wants a new leader. The UCP presidents just stood outside of this Legislature and said that they don't trust this Premier to hold a free and fair vote. That's right, Mr. Speaker. Party members, MLAs, volunteers don't trust this Premier to play by the rules. If the Premier will rig a vote among his own members to stay in power, imagine what he'll do to the rest of us.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, again you're seeing it happen at the beginning of this Legislature. The NDP, every time that they get themselves into political trouble, go back to the politics of personal fear and smear, the politics of egos, those types of situations. It's because their poll numbers are an absolute disaster. Here is where we are at, though. This government and the members of this government will continue to be focused each and every day on Albertans, and we promise we won't act like the Official Opposition and some members of this Chamber who are focused on their own ego. Instead, we're going to focus on continuing to make sure Alberta is a great success.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

2017 UCP Leadership Contest and 2022 Review

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Two years ago this government fired the Election Commissioner investigating the kamikaze scandal, but despite their best efforts the investigation into UCP corruption continues. That commissioner, that this government fired in a brazenly unethical act, laid over $200,000 in fines with that scandal. Does the Premier regret his attack on the rule of law by firing the commissioner investigating the UCP? Will he reinstate this position now, ahead of the UCP leadership review vote, which seems to be filled by the same scandals?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, exactly what I said was going to take place: you're going to continue to see it from the Official Opposition as they become more and more desperate. That is completely and utterly ridiculous what that member just asked inside this Chamber, but through you to him, let's get down to the meat and potatoes of this week. When did he know that the Member for Edmonton-South was hacking members of this Legislature's private information? Did he participate in the cover-up of the NDP over the last several months to hide that from Albertans? Is he one of the ones that was found to have done sexual harassment in his caucus, that his leader has confirmed they've been covering up?

Mr. Sabir: Point of order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: And, Mr. Speaker, that member hid Serenity's documents from the RCMP. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. A point of order is noted at 1:58.

Mr. Sabir: Yesterday the RCMP confirmed that there is still an active investigation into voter fraud in the UCP leadership race, an investigation that has one-third of the UCP cabinet members and former top advisers questioned by the RCMP. This Premier's leadership race is being investigated by the RCMP for voter fraud, and he forced through a bill that makes it possible for people to buy memberships for people without their knowledge and consent. Can the Minister of Justice assure Albertans their identities will not be stolen to make votes for the Premier's leadership review?

Mr. Jason Nixon: There's the NDP putting forward false accusations that come from their rag the Broadbent Institute, Mr. Speaker. Here's the real question. What we do know – you want to talk about RCMP investigations? Get this. The NDP ethics critic has confirmed himself, in the document titled How I Did It, that he is under RCMP investigation, and in fact search warrants have been served on his home. To the hon. member, through you to that hon. member, have search warrants been served on his home, and is he part of the hacking of individual medical records?

Mr. Sabir: Transcripts from the office of the Chief Electoral Officer indicate that the Premier was present at a meeting where the kamikaze scandal, financed by a single $60,000 donation, was planned. The commissioner uncovered a scheme to funnel corporate money into a fake campaign to attack this Premier's opponents. This type of behaviour should not be tolerated in Alberta politics, but this government defends it on a daily basis. Since they are incapable of doing the right thing, will they join me in calling on Elections Alberta to supervise this Premier's leadership review?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, continuing to make up fake allegations inside this Chamber is ridiculous.

Mr. Sabir: Point of order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: I challenge that member to go make those allegations outside this Chamber so that legal action could be taken against them. But here's the real question again, Mr. Speaker. When did the NDP leader know that the Member for Edmonton-South, her ethics critic, was hacking the government, and why did she allow her staff to cover that up? And is that why the Member for Calgary-Buffalo is now running around running for leader . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: And, Mr. Speaker, are the concerns from the Official Opposition leader's cover-up of that hacking scandal why the Member for Calgary-Buffalo is now running for leader across Calgary?

The Speaker: The hon. member . . . [interjections] Order.

Electric Utility Rebate and Provincial Fuel Tax Suspension

Ms Sweet: Well, Mr. Speaker, I don't believe I'm actually going to say this. Perhaps for the first time ever in this House, yesterday I actually agreed with the UCP Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland when he admitted that this government's $50 electricity rebate is "paltry." It's a good word, actually. I could use other words – it's meagre, ridiculous, maybe disingenuous, a bit insulting – but let's stick with this. Why did the associate minister of electricity give Albertans such a bogus electricity rebate when even his own caucus members are calling it paltry?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. After four years of NDP government and a series of poor policy choices Albertans are seeing higher electricity prices, but as we pursue longer term solutions to the high price of electricity, we're coming out with short-term relief, things like the $150 . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. You know what the government did? They provided the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning some courtesy to allow her to ask the question. I think the opposition is capable of the same; some people may not.

The hon. associate minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As we pursue longer term solutions to the higher prices that we see in electricity, we are offering short-term solutions such as the $150 rebate that every ratepayer will see on their electricity bill. In addition to that, we're cancelling 13 cents a litre on the gas tax.

Ms Sweet: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's $50 per household when my constituents' bills in Edmonton-Manning have gone up $500 in a single month. The natural gas rebate from this government is completely disingenuous. Honestly, it's never going to happen. The budget featuring this fake rebate is being voted on today. Will the minister at least rise and concede that his natural gas rebate isn't real and that it's never going to happen? If he won't, I have to ask: has he even read the budget?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to thank the hon. member for the question. I can tell you that the only support they provided Albertans was an electricity cap which did not apply to 60 per cent of Albertans. Not only did it not apply to 60 per cent of Albertans; it also only related to a small portion of people's electricity bill. Over two years their program was worth $108 million. Over three months our program is worth over $280 million, far more generous than anything they ever did.

Ms Sweet: Well, Mr. Speaker, the UCP Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland also admitted yesterday that the government's removal of the tax on gas at the pumps may not actually lead to lower prices. He admitted that there is nothing, not a thing, being done to prevent companies from simply raising prices and collecting the profits for themselves. Will the minister admit that his so-called gas tax relief program is also fake? It's so fake that even his own colleagues know it. Why doesn't the minister?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we're very proud to actually reduce and in this case eliminate the fuel tax in Alberta effective April 1. This is a real elimination annualized. It will provide $1.3 billion in tax savings to Alberta households, Alberta businesses, and Alberta seniors. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Calgary-South East is the only one with the call.

Corporate Taxation and Investment Attraction

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, the United Conservative government recently tabled a balanced budget, only the second balanced budget in over a decade. Balancing the budget was partly the result of higher corporate tax revenues. Despite the extreme challenges brought on by the pandemic, Alberta continued to see investment flood into the province, and Albertans are now enjoying the jobs and revenues that came with it. To the Minister of Finance: can you tell the House how reducing the corporate income tax rate has impacted revenues for the province?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. A competitive tax rate is a very important ingredient in an attractive business environment, and we have one of the most attractive business environments in North America. That's resulting in the attraction of billions and billions of dollars of investment into this province, leading to economic growth and expanded fiscal capacity. This is reflected in our corporate income tax revenue line in this budget. We will collect $400 million more in corporate income tax revenues at 8 per cent than the NDP did at 12.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the members opposite said that they would increase the tax on job creators by 50 per cent, back up to 12 per cent. Given that when the NDP were in government, they increased the tax on job creators to 12 per cent, leading to a decrease in revenues, and given that the current government's budget estimates show that corporate tax revenue is estimated to grow by 31 per cent in 2022 under an 8 per cent corporate tax rate, to the same minister: what would a significant tax increase do to the investment climate here in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can't imagine a more disastrous policy. At a time when we're attracting investment by the billions, at a time when the capital markets, the business communities see Alberta as a predictable, certain, competitive tax jurisdiction, to jack up the tax rate by 50 per cent would drive investment out. Jobs gained over the last year would be lost, and I project that our actual corporate revenue lines would decrease.

Mr. Jones: Given that the NDP decimated the investment climate in this province and given that the government has, thankfully, implemented measures such as lowering the tax on job creators down to 8 per cent and given that the NDP continue to announce programs that cost millions of dollars with no real plan to pay for those measures, to the same minister: can you explain what responsible fiscal management means for Albertans?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We inherited a government that was spending $10 billion more per capita than similar provinces, and the trajectory was going up by 4 per cent per year. Over the last three years we've flattened that curve and we've effectively brought this government from what would have been a $6 billion deficit to a $500 million surplus. What that means is a certain fiscal environment that will, again, attract more investment, create jobs and opportunities for Albertans, and ultimately result in expanded fiscal capacity and expanded revenues for the government of Alberta.

Anti-Racism Act

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, if we ask Indigenous or racialized Albertans, they will tell us that systemic racism is real, embedded, felt, and experienced throughout the very systems that we all depend on, from health care to education to justice to social supports to the job market. Unchecked biases in these systems have real impacts on Indigenous and racialized Albertans, and in order to remedy this, we need to collect the data to track its impacts. I'm tabling the bill today to support that. Now, the minister of labour has spoken in this House that he believes systemic racism is real, in his own experiences. Will he support this bill to have fair and open debate on the floor of this Legislature?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for raising a real issue that we need to address here in Alberta in our health care system. Our government is committed to providing the necessary care and equitable health care access to Indigenous people living on- and off-reserve. Racism has no place in our health care system, and all patients must receive the care they need with respect and compassion. Alberta Health is working closely with First Nations and Métis partners to address racism. I'm working right now – and I actually just had a conversation earlier today – with my colleague the Minister of Indigenous Relations to be able to put forward a plan to work with Indigenous partners to be able to address racism.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, given that the government released a report from the Alberta Anti-Racism Advisory Council about a year ago and given that their recommendations called for a government-wide approach to addressing racism and for that to include the collection of race-based data to identify the rate and impacts of systemic racism throughout public services and given that the legislation that I will introduce today would enact that recommendation, will the Minister of Justice or the minister of labour support Bill 204 to receive fair debate in this Assembly?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of labour.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, for four years, between 2015 and 2019, the NDP lifted no finger in addressing issues of racism and discrimination in all of this province. All of a sudden this has become an issue for them. We are the party and government that banned carding for the first time in the history of our province. We are the party that amended the Police Act through Bill 38 to include the first Indigenous policing in our Police Act. We walk the talk.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, given that this is not a partisan bill – this is something that comes from our caucus undertaking a series of conversations with Indigenous and racialized Albertans and community leaders on solutions to combat racism in Alberta – and given that during those conversations about health, education, public safety, community support, economic and democratic participation we repeatedly heard the importance of collecting race-based data and given that many of those Albertans are watching today, will the Associate Minister of Immigration and Multiculturalism state his support for this bill having the opportunity for fair debate in this Assembly?

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, on this side of the aisle we are not interested in party and foolish politics. We are interested in actually solving the problem. Racism and discrimination are real, but the last thing we want to do is to allow the NDP to play politics with this serious matter. We have done so much to deal with racism and discrimination. We are the political party, once again – despite the protests between 2016 and 2018 on the steps of this Legislature, the NDP couldn't do anything about it. We took action, and we have so much work to do on that particular front.

Racism Prevention and Premier's Leadership

Mr. Deol: Mr. Speaker, at one of his rallies to save his leadership, this Premier declared that as long as he is Premier, voices of racism, hatred, and intolerance will find no home in the UCP. I applaud this. Racism has no business in our government, Legislature, or society, and I welcome the Premier's words agreeing on this. So will the Premier embrace this new spirit and finally apologize for allowing Chris Champion to try and put racist views in the draft social studies curriculum?

Mr. Madu: You know, Mr. Speaker, the funny thing is, again, that for four years the NDP did nothing with respect to the curriculum, to deal with racism and discrimination, or to include minority people in the curriculum. We have a draft curriculum that I am proud to have nominated two eminently qualified Black professors to work on, the social studies curriculum. That work is being done. I want us to make progress. I don't want us to embark on petty politics. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I ask that particular member: where was their leader between 2015 and 2019?

Mr. Deol: Given that this Premier employed and defended a speech writer who wrote horrifically racist statements about Indigenous and racialized people, including calling the tragic history of residential schools a "bogus genocide story," a statement condemned by Indigenous community leaders and survivors of residential schools, but given that the Premier now says that racist views are not being tolerated in the UCP, will he apologize for the extremely energetic defence he gave for his racist speech writer?

Mr. Madu: You know, Mr. Speaker, all that the members opposite need to do is to look at the membership of the folks on this side of the aisle. On this side of the aisle we speak more than 10 languages right here, we cut across all of our provinces, and I look forward to working with my colleagues to do the heavy lifting that is required to build a province in which all of us can be respected and live our full potential. No petty politics, no going to our communities for dances and for shows.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that I'm glad to hear this government is ready to tackle racism in the UCP and given that communities, individuals, and victims of racism have been waiting for this Premier to commit to taking real action, that has not happened for the three years he has been in office – while the party has been consulting and proposing deals, our party has been consulting and proposing real solutions – can the Premier commit that he will stand up against racism in his party, in his caucus, and in his office even once his job is no longer on the line and he needs votes of racialized Albertans?

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, in short order, I am proud of the achievement that we have made on this particular issue. I as Minister of Justice established a hate crime co-ordination unit within the Justice department. As Justice minister I appointed a community liaison on hate crime. As Justice minister we established the Alberta security infrastructure grant to help vulnerable communities. As Justice minister we banned carding, we reformed street checks. There is so much more to be done, and we will get the job done. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Federal-provincial Relations

Mr. Barnes: It has now been nearly two years since the Fair Deal Panel. As a proud member of this panel I provided the government with additional measures it should undertake to negotiate an equitable deal, yet there has been no meaningful action. The federal carbon tax has increased, Bill C-69 has not been fixed, Bill C-48 remains in place, the fiscal stabilization program is still capped, and the equalization program continues to transfer enormous wealth out of our province. My question to the Premier: after two years of inaction, are you ever going to get serious about fighting for a fair deal for Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member certainly identifies an issue, and that is the fact that Alberta makes a disproportionate contribution fiscally to the rest of the nation. We are taking action. We have in fact received the support of every province and territory on correcting the fiscal stabilization program. We made that a number one priority. Our position was that caps need to be taken off. Unfortunately, this federal government did not respond to every Premier and every provincial and territorial leader, but they did raise the caps from $60 to $170. That meant $500 million a year for Albertans.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, this week the Prime Minister announced a deal with the NDP. Given that part of the deal ensures Quebec never loses any seats in the House of Commons regardless of population changes, given that, in short, when it comes to fighting for a fair deal within Confederation, the Prime Minister just called Alberta's bluff, given that Quebec has 78 MPs compared to Alberta and B.C.'s combined 76 and given that Alberta and B.C. have a million more citizens than Quebec, my question again to the Premier: why is your fight for basic fairness limited to empty platitudes and strongly worded letters while Albertans suffer?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we fight every day for fairness in this Confederation. We fight every day for the interests of Albertans, unlike the member opposite. We've worked every day to create an investment climate in this province that would attract billions of dollars of investment, create tens of thousands of jobs, and provide Alberta small businesses with additional opportunity. This is resulting in expanded fiscal capacity. This is resulting in a balanced budget. This is resulting in a future for future generations.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, given that it seems to me the rules of Confederation are rigged worse than a UCP leadership review – and the Premier is fine with both – and given that this Premier appointed himself as Minister of Intergovernmental Relations almost three years ago and given that Alberta has achieved absolutely nothing when it comes to winning a fair deal and given that this Premier has fired ministers for far smaller failures, my question again to the Premier: when are you going to fire your do-nothing intergovernmental affairs minister?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The one thing I know about getting things done in intergovernmental affairs is that you have to get along with people. You don't get yourself kicked out of the party. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has the floor.

Mr. McIver: You don't call yourself a conservative and then vote against a balanced budget. Actually, the Premier has gotten the other Premiers in this country to vote with him, to face the federal government with him, on a whole range of issues. He's not hiding in the corner by himself having to have his own way on everything, like some people in this place. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Health Care System and Women

Member Irwin: The Associate Minister of Status of Women is introducing legislation today related to health care. I'm interested in how this will impact both women who work in health care and women's access to health care, and I hope that any changes are substantive and not merely symbolic. Many health care professions are women dominated. They've been heroes throughout this pandemic, but many are facing burnout and mental health concerns. The UCP are proposing wage cuts to many health professionals, including respiratory therapists, speech pathologists, social workers, to name just a few. Will the Associate Minister of Status of Women rise today and commit that she will not allow one of these professions to take a pay cut?

Mr. Copping: Thank you to the hon. member for the question. Mr. Speaker, our budget is expanding health care capacity. We are adding an additional $600 million this year, $600 million next year, and $600 million the year after that. We are expanding jobs, and as the hon. member pointed out, many of those jobs are filled by women, so we are providing more opportunities for women in terms of our health care system. That includes doctors. That includes nurses. We have hired more nurses in the system now than we've ever had, and we actually have more doctors as well.

Member Irwin: Given that we will not forget Bill 207, a bill that posed a real threat to the health care of many Albertans, especially women, and particularly targeted reproductive health and access to health for members of the LGBTQ2S+ community – while this bill was defeated thanks to the push-back from countless Albertans, we are vigilant, and we are quite worried that reproductive rights are still not safe under this UCP government – and given the Premier's long-standing opposition to access to abortion, will the Premier confirm today that reproductive rights are fully safe under his watch and that he will block any attempts from his MLAs to limit access to abortion?

The Speaker: The hon. the chief government whip and Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the Associate Minister of Status of Women I must say that my job is to make sure to support women to be successful, to protect their rights, to protect them, and keep them safe. I can tell you that I will continue to do that work. I have been doing that work. We are working on many women's health initiatives, and we are going to continue to do that work.

Member Irwin: Given that many women across this province have shared their concerns with me, including concerns about reproductive health – in fact, I should mention that it is Endometriosis Awareness Month and that many women are suffering from this condition and that they're not getting any support – and that the loss of family doctors and specialists is particularly damaging to women's health right now, since I didn't get an answer from that minister earlier, will she, again, repeat her support for reproductive rights, and will she commit to ensuring that no specialists and no more doctors leave this province?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I said earlier, I am committed to protecting the rights of women, to protecting women's health. We're working on health initiatives, and actually this very afternoon we will be introducing legislation that speaks right to that. I think the members opposite will be very interested, and I hope that they will support that bill.

Homeless Supports and Affordable Housing

Member Loyola: So many Edmontonians rely on public transit. Throughout the pandemic transit stations have also become a place of shelter and refuge for many who don't have a home and are struggling with mental health. It's not their fault. They have nowhere else to go, which is the fault of the UCP. The city of Edmonton has requested during every UCP budget more social support and to fund permanent supportive housing so that people who are forced to stay in transit stations could have a home as well as mental health support. The UCP already has done one rewrite of their budget, why were the most vulnerable left out of it?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I actually reject the premise of that question. We have committed $140 million over four years; we have $20 million in this particular budget. Vulnerable people are very important to this government. I can tell you that numerous ministries are spending time to help those who are most vulnerable, and we are proud of the work we have done here in Edmonton with the VODP, with the HELP teams, with the Edmonton Police Service, along with building relationships with the fire department to continue to help vulnerable people.

Member Loyola: Given that the Minister of Transportation used to be the Minister of Community and Social Services and that she's fully aware of these concerns from the lens of transit safety and much-needed social support and given that the current Minister of Community and Social Services can't even provide an approximate estimate in this Chamber of how many Albertans live in poverty – it is no wonder he is blatantly unaware of the desperation that so many Edmontonians are facing – will the Minister of Transportation rise and commit to working with the city of Edmonton so that all people in Edmonton have a safe, dignified place to call home?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government stands strongly, supporting vulnerable Albertans. I have mentioned several times in this House that Budget 2022 maintained core funding for all the support services: income support, AISH, and services to people with disabilities. I'll just give you one more example: the AISH budget. We increased it $12 million in Budget 2022. Facts speak louder than political rhetoric.

Member Loyola: Given that there are hundreds of millions of dollars available for affordable housing through the national housing strategy but the UCP are not doing the work to get it and leaving municipalities and housing providers high and dry and given that business leaders are calling for supportive housing to be a part of the economic recovery and that there have been so many tragic deaths of people experiencing homelessness in places such as Dumpsters and that there are about five preventable drug poisoning deaths happening every day, how many people have to die before the UCP start doing their job and working with municipalities to provide homes with mental health supports to those in need?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I know the NDP want to continue with their woke plans to deal with the addictions crisis, but we are committed to a recovery-oriented system of care. It's a continuum of care that starts from when a vulnerable person enters the system to a point where they exit the system, actually into housing. It's part of the recovery-oriented system of care. We're proud of the work that we've done. We're proud of the relationships we're building. We're continuing to help Albertans. My question is: why do the members opposite not want to help people into a position where they do not have to rely on drugs as the only method of support?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Culture-related School Bullying and Discrimination

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week I received a heart-wrenching e-mail from a constituent who shared concerns about her son, who is regularly bullied at school. It is a sad reality, but there are instances in which new Albertans are on the receiving end of hurtful comments and actions from their peers specifically related to race, culture, and religion. Could the Minister of Education tell the House what actions are being taken to educate teachers and school staff on how to deal with culture-related bullying and discrimination?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education has risen.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. School authorities are required to provide a welcoming, caring, respectful, and safe learning environment. This includes a code of conduct that must be publicly available and prohibit discrimination as per the Alberta Human Rights Act. Additionally, Alberta is renewing the draft K to 6 curriculum, and, once finalized, Alberta will have the most equitable and diverse kindergarten to grade 6 curriculum this province has ever seen. This includes specific foundational knowledge about treaties, residential schools, and reconciliation as well as emphasis on Black history. Students will also learn about the legacy of racism and anti-Black racism.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that the Calgary-Falconridge constituency is made up of a diverse community of different cultures and backgrounds and given that this diversity can cause division and in some cases has resulted in bullying and harassment towards students, can the same minister tell Albertans about the work that the United Conservative government has done to welcome first- and second-generation Canadians into our province and how their children are being supported in our schools?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the daughter of immigrants myself, I know how very important this is. School authorities are required to provide a continuum of supports and services that are consistent with the principles of inclusive education and that can be accessed by every student, including newcomers to Canada. A specialized learning support grant now supports school boards in providing a variety of supports and services to meet the learning needs of students within an inclusive learning environment. These grants support our most vulnerable students and children, including those for whom English is a second language as well as refugee students.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that youth whose families have immigrated to Alberta from other countries can be subject to discrimination based on their race, religion, or culture and given that this can have severe impacts on the mental well-being of an individual and given that our government is committed to providing a safe and inclusive learning environment for all students, can the same minister tell the House how the United Conservative government has supported mental health for students in our education system?

The Speaker: The minister.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for this important question. It's very top of mind right now. Mental health and well-being are very important to us and to our schools. There is definitely a heightened level of effort in this area due to the pandemic. In Budget 2022 targeted funding of $110 million over three years, including $30 million in the '22-23 school year, will enable schools to support students experiencing academic challenges and create school environments supporting student well-being and positive mental health. During the pandemic Alberta's government provided more than $53 million to make it easier for students, families, and Albertans to access mental health.

Climate Adaptation Funding

Mr. Schmidt: If there's one thing that we learned from the tragedies of the wildfires in Wood Buffalo, Slave Lake, Paddle Prairie, the floods of Calgary, Fort Mac, and British Columbia, it's that we as a province must always invest in protecting communities and people from natural disasters. That's why it's so concerning that in the 2022 provincial budget the UCP is planning to gut the funding for climate-resilience projects. This is money that would go towards projects designed to protect communities from disasters before they happen: flood mitigation, fire stops, and more. I know that this government is reluctant to spend anything on Alberta communities, but does the minister even see the value in investing in climate adaptation?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. In fact, this government has invested significantly, in partnership with our industry, in climate-resilience projects. Again, unlike what he wanted to do and did when he was in government, we don't have a consumer carbon tax in Alberta. The federal government, unfortunately, is still imposing that on Albertans. We continue to work with our large emitters to make sure that our world-class industry can remain competitive. That's our focus on investment when it comes to climate. If I was him, I'd have a conversation with the federal government on the fact that they continue to take Albertans' money for the carbon tax and not invest it properly back into this province. Better yet, how about we just get rid of the federal carbon tax.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that a recent report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change warns of the potential for more extreme weather and natural disasters and given that investments in climate adaptations seek to mitigate and protect communities and people from these disasters but given that on page 143 of their fiscal plan the UCP makes it clear that taking action to protect communities isn't their top priority, will the minister explain who he expects to address this critical issue since he's actively taking Alberta backwards on this? Municipalities? Homeowners? Or does he think it will just go away?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this government is investing billions of dollars when it comes to flood adaptation – in particular the Springbank dry dam; my department continues to work on the new Bow River dam, as examples – billions of dollars in irrigation projects across the province that do help with flood mitigation, has released more flood maps to municipalities than any government in the last 30 years. The list goes on and on, hundreds of millions of dollars invested in being able to protect our community from climate-level events. But, again, back to this issue of the carbon tax, that member continues to support the federal carbon tax. Will he finally stand up in this place and vote with this government to call on the federal government to get rid of the carbon tax once and for all?

Mr. Schmidt: Given the shameful response of this government to the 2020 hailstorm, the fourth-largest natural disaster in Canadian history, which devastated northeast Calgary, and given this budget cut, which means that the government is seeking to get out of the business of protecting families and communities from the increasing risk posed by climate change, will the minister reconsider his senseless cut to protect Alberta communities and families? Or is it the policy of the government to ignore the climate crisis until it's too late?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, again, the member never lets the facts get in the way in his ridiculous questions.

Mr. Sabir: Point of order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Again, this government continues to invest in protecting communities when it comes to flood events, fire, and will continue to in the years to come. But the reality is that the federal government continues to have a consumer carbon tax on the citizens of this province. They should get rid of it once and for all because the hon. member is right about one thing, that the federal government is not investing the carbon tax revenue back into this province as they promised. Again, will he stand up, finally, and call on the federal government to get rid of their ridiculous carbon tax?

Victims of Crime Program

Mr. Sabir: This government is failing victims of crime. In budget estimates the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General confirmed that since the government passed legislation to take money out of the fund, 60 per cent of it has been diverted towards other initiatives. This means less support going to those who need support recovering from violent crime and more people being denied support. Will the Minister of Justice acknowledge that these changes have been hurting Albertans and really commit to reversing them before more people impacted by crime lose their supports?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister of . . .

Mr. Shandro: Justice and Solicitor General.

The Speaker: Justice.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's all right. It's Thursday. It's the end of the day on Thursday. And thank you, through you, too, to the member for the question. As I answered his question at estimates, previously the government had taken the victims of crime fund, and it continued to support victims through the victims of crime fund – it's also now the victims of crime and public safety initiative fund – of course, continued to make sure that the money and the supports for victims continue to get to those victims through various supports in the community. That's going to continue to be included in the victims of crime and public safety initiative fund.

Mr. Sabir: Given that in December our caucus raised the concerns of Emma Wilson, who was a victim of crime, whose claim for financial assistance was denied because of this government's change to the victims of crime fund, and given that this government, rather than listening to the victims and reversing these harmful changes, created a working group to consult with key stakeholders in creating a new model, when will the government release the findings of this working group? Until they do, will the minister reverse the changes to the program that are causing harm to the victims of crime?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, through you, to the members who are involved in the review of the victims' services units that we have throughout the province and made sure that we had recommendations on how we could improve the VSUs and the way that money gets to the communities and gets to victims in the most efficient way, maximize the way that we get money and supports to those victims. We have almost completed a review of that and hope to be able to implement the changes in the near future. Thank you again to those MLAs for those valuable recommendations.

Mr. Sabir: Given that the victims of crime are waiting for far too long for this government to announce its so-called new model, will the minister tell us and the victims or survivors of crime, who will be watching this response, when this government will announce the new model and how much funding will go to support that new model? Or is he going to continue in this House proudly while cutting away supports from Albertans who desperately need these supports now?

Mr. Shandro: Well, I answered that question. That was his second question, and he's repeating it, Mr. Speaker, but I'll answer for him again. We have now almost completed our review of the report and the recommendations that were provided to us by the MLAs who had been involved in the review committee. We are now very close to the point where we'll be able to present to Albertans the new model on how we'll be able to make sure that the maximum amount of funding can get to victims in the community, because that's got to be our focus as all MLAs and as government, making sure that the most amount of supports can continue to get to those victims.

Provincial Fiscal Policies

Mr. Rowswell: Mr. Speaker, living within our means is very important to me. Therefore, I was happy about Alberta's recovery plan, which aims to invest more money in profitable petrochemical, technology, and film sectors. Achieving a balanced budget for 2022-23, with record spending on health care, despite hardships levied by the pandemic and a history of accumulated deficit is a feat we should be proud of. To the Minister of Finance: can you elaborate on work done to ensure Budget 2022 is balanced and plans to maintain responsible fiscal management in the future?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. We would not have a balanced budget in Budget 2022 without responsible, sustainable fiscal management informed by three fiscal anchors: keeping our net debt to GDP ratio below 30 per cent, aligning our per capita spend with that of similar provinces, and getting to a balanced budget as soon as possible. We have allowed those anchors to inform our decisions. And in spite of the fact that we inherited a government spend that was $10 billion higher than similar provinces, we turned that spending down. It will take sustained responsible management to keep . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright.

Mr. Rowswell: Given that under the NDP platform Alberta's per capita spending was more than British Columbia, Quebec, and Ontario yet comparatively Alberta did not witness better outcomes and given that one of the key commitments was to bring ourselves in line to be at least as efficient as other large provinces in the delivery of government-based services, to the same minister: can you update the House on the progress made towards this goal?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to update the House on our fiscal progress because, again, we inherited a high-spending government, the highest spending government of any in the nation. We have thoughtfully and carefully turned that spending down, at the same time increased health care by $1.8 billion in this budget alone, at the same time added $600 million to our labour, jobs, and talent strategy. But we will not take our eye off the ball. We will continue to deliver responsible fiscal management for Albertans.

Mr. Rowswell: Given that Albertans have faced one of the worst economic crises in the past two years, compounded with high inflation, and given that in response we implemented measures such as lowering the corporate tax rate to 8 per cent – this has resulted in projected collections of $400 million more in corporate tax revenue; Mr. Speaker, our projections for balanced budgets in the coming years have also sparked questions on what will happen with surplus funds – can the minister elaborate on whether growth will be retained in the heritage savings trust fund or continue to be put into general revenue?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, one of the real positive outcomes of a balanced budget is that it gives the government options for reinvestment. I was explicit in the fiscal plan. Any surplus up to the earnings level of the heritage savings trust fund will be reinvested in that trust fund. That's good news for Albertans. Unlike the members opposite, who robbed that trust fund year after year after year, we will reinvest.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will return to the remainder of the daily Routine.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein has a statement to make.

Government Policies and Economic Recovery

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm going to need more than two minutes to explain all the good things that are happening in our province, but let me try anyway. For the first time in almost a decade our United Conservative government has balanced the budget. Job numbers have been rising for four straight months, and unemployment is back down below prepandemic levels. Almost all pandemic restrictions are gone, and we have the fastest growing economy in the country. In every corner of this province major private-sector companies are investing serious capital in Alberta's economic future. It hasn't been easy, but our government has managed to create this economic prosperity. We did this by maintaining the lowest taxes in Canada.

Alberta is once again a lighthouse, a beacon of economic opportunity for those seeking a better life, as evidenced by the fact that net migration to our province is now higher than at any point under the disastrous NDP government. If you listen to the NDP leader, however, none of this is true. She said that our harmful policies our keeping many people from moving to Alberta. The reality is that far more people are coming to this province than leaving it. She said that we are hiking taxes because personal income tax revenue is up when the reality is that we are taking in more income tax revenue because more people are working and have better paying jobs.

She continues to fearmonger about this fictitious $4.7 billion business tax cut when the reality is that we collect $400 million more with our 8 per cent than they ever did with their 12 per cent. This all speaks to the incredible investment climate and low-tax advantage that we have restored over the last three years. After years of disastrous NDP policies that saw 200,000 jobs and billions – billions – of dollars disappear in this province, Alberta is back and we are booming.

I understand why the NDP leader is mad. Her policies failed, and her government is fading into a bad memory for everyday Albertans. Albertans, meanwhile, are looking forward to the next great chapter in Alberta history.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, I will raise a point of order at the appropriate time. I will seek your, I guess, guidance on the matter.

The Speaker: A point of order is raised at 2:44. [interjections]

Order. I would like to provide a friendly reminder to the Assembly that members' statements are to go uninterrupted.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Government Data Security

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are well into the 21st century. The vast majority of government services now rely on digital infrastructure. Everything from health records to banking information is regularly transmitted online with our personal identification. The pandemic has greatly accelerated our transition to digital government.

Last year I uncovered a vulnerability on a government of Alberta website that provided access to Albertans' personal health information. As a result, I am facing an RCMP investigation, and I've stepped aside from my role in the Official Opposition while I await the outcome of that investigation. Whether or not you agree with how I approached this issue, what we cannot lose sight of is how important these issues are. It is incumbent upon this House to act in the public interest and to protect Albertans. The government is not doing enough to make sure the delivery of government services is secure and defended from cyberwarfare.

Today I'm extending an offer to work with the government to take immediate action to defend Albertans from cyberthreats. There are three actions the government can take immediately to help improve our cyberdefenses and protect Albertans. The first is to establish an independent office of information security and cyberdefense. We need a co-ordinated and specific office that is focused on ensuring the security and integrity of our digital infrastructure.

The second is establishing a vulnerability disclosure program like the ones that are offered already by major software and hardware companies around the world. The government of Alberta must immediately establish a set of guidelines for responsible testing and disclosure for developers and security professionals. This will ensure that vulnerabilities will not go unreported due to fear of repercussions. Vulnerability disclosure should be encouraged, and we should be rewarding Albertans who are protecting public information.

Third, we must provide a state of the information infrastructure report. The government of Alberta must regularly provide a report into its IT infrastructure. Security through obscurity is not security at all. Instead, we need thorough and proper assessment of our public IT infrastructure. Outside analysts and professionals can critique and offer the best chance at success in modern cyber-defense.

The government must act now. Thank you.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to give oral notice of Government Motion 17: "Be it resolved that the period referred to in Standing Order 74.11(2) be extended from eight sitting days to 11 sitting days in respect to Bill 203, Technology Innovation and Alberta Venture Fund Act."

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

Bill 10 Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to request leave to introduce Bill 10, Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022.

Our well-being as a society is only as good as our humanity. It is critical that the safety and security of women and girls is a priority. The fear of physical or psychological violence because of sex and gender must be removed. The premise of coercive control and the accompanying practices must be eradicated. We are not rejecting cultural rationalities but rejecting violence perpetuated against women in the name of cultural practices. Every woman and girl deserves to live free from fear and violence.

Approval of the proposed amendments will strengthen the existing laws that ban female genital mutilation in Alberta. No other jurisdiction has professional legislation that speaks directly to the issues of FGM.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I move the first reading of Bill 10. Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 10 read a first time]

The Speaker: The Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First, I wish to advise the Assembly that pursuant to Standing Order 7(8) the daily Routine may continue beyond 3 p.m. if needed.

I also move that pursuant to Standing Order 75 Bill 10, the Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022, be moved onto the Order Paper under Government Bills and Orders.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me great pleasure to rise and request leave . . .

The Speaker: My apologies to the hon. member. I'll let you begin again from the top on that.

Hon. members, the motion that was moved by the hon. Government House Leader is a nondebatable motion, but it does require a vote of the Assembly.

[Motion carried]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Bill 204 Anti-Racism Act

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me great pleasure to rise and request leave to introduce Bill 204, the Anti-Racism Act, 2022.

This bill flows from input received from the very individuals and communities who experience racism, overt and systemic, daily and addresses recommendations that were made by the Alberta Anti-Racism Advisory Council. Those recommendations called for the collection of race-based data in all departments as well as the analysis of this data to track and evaluate the progress being made and identify existing gaps between racialized and nonracialized communities in order to promote equitable access to public services and partnerships with government.

Bill 204 would do just that through the establishment of an antiracism office that will, in addition to consulting with communities and others on the establishment of data standards and other regulations, track and monitor impacts of racism throughout public services and provide recommendations on how to address them. I hope that all members of this Assembly will support this bill and give it the opportunity for fair debate in this Legislature.

[Motion carried; Bill 204 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning, followed by the Government House Leader.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday I referenced the MNP report on consumer debt indexing, Albertans' Confidence in Personal Finances, Debt Repayment Abilities Plummets amid Pandemic Fatigue and Uncertainty. I am now tabling the requisite copies.

The Speaker: The Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well thank you, Mr. Speaker. First, I rise on behalf of the hon. the Premier to table written responses to questions during Executive Council's main estimates.

I also have all the necessary copies of documents that I referred to yesterday during the point of privilege regarding the MLA for Edmonton-South and his hacking record for the record.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. At 1:51 the hon. Deputy Government House Leader rose on a point of order.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order under 23(h), (i), and (j). At the time the Member for Edmonton-Glenora was speaking and referring to the Premier. I don't have the benefit of the Blues, but she did say something to the effect of: unlike the Premier, we don't cheat. This is actually uncharacteristic of that member as she usually maintains a reasonable level of decorum in this Chamber, but this language is certainly unparliamentary, and I do believe that it should be apologized for and should be withdrawn.

The Speaker: The hon. the Deputy Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I don't have the benefit of the Blues, but I do remember that the Member for Edmonton-Glenora referenced those words in relation to the Premier's leadership race, which is under investigation for voter fraud, and some recent changes in the upcoming leadership review. I think that that's a matter of fact and debate, not a point of order.

The Speaker: Thank you. I am prepared to rule if there's no additional submissions. I do have the benefit of the Blues. It says, "Mr. Speaker, unlike [the] Premier, Albertans don't [get to] cheat." It sounds a lot like an accusation or remarks which question the member's integrity or character, which are not in order as pursuant to page 619 of House of Commons Procedures and Practice. I'm sure that all members are aware of the reference. So is the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, so I'm sure she'll be happy to apologize and withdraw.

Ms Hoffman: I am happy to apologize and withdraw, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: I consider this matter dealt with and concluded.

At 1:55 the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall rose on a number of occasions, including 1:55 and 1:57. I believe that perhaps we can co-ordinate these into one point of order, but I'll leave that to your discretion.

Point of Order Allegations against a Member

Mr. Sabir: Thank you. We can certainly do that. There were a number of things. Again, I don't have the benefit of the Blues, but it was a matter in relation to sexual harassment allegations levelled by the Government House Leader, and on previous occasions other government ministers have done the same. There are, Mr. Speaker, extensive rulings on that issue, extensive caution provided by you on that issue. I think the Government House Leader and the government side continues to ignore those cautions, and I urge you to rule this out of order once and for all.

Mr. Schow: Well, I certainly, Mr. Speaker, don't have the benefit of the Blues, and I don't know what was said in specific. If something was said to the Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall that was unparliamentary, I'd be happy to hear if you may have that. If it is unparliamentary, then I will withdraw and apologize. But I would like to know where you're at.

The Speaker: I do have the benefit of the Blues, and in the interest of time as well as repeating perhaps unparliamentary language, I will defer from reading them all. But I do want to say this. The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall is correct that there have been extensive cautions, ongoing reminders that this type of allegation is unacceptable. On April 21, 2021, I said:

But in the strongest possible ways I will provide a caution on this very, very sensitive issue. In particular, these situations often end in a tit-for-tat, where members of the opposition will raise similar allegations and vice versa, and we end at the bottom of a [very] negative spiral making . . . allegations [against one another]. While I will provide the strongest caution to the minister, I hope that both sides will avoid these sorts of allegations in the future.

They certainly do rise to the level of a point of order and certainly do not assist in the decorum inside the Assembly.

This is a point of order. I insist it not happen in the future, and I'm happy to take an apology and withdrawal.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With your direction and out of respect for this Chamber and the Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall, I do withdraw and apologize on behalf of the Government House Leader.

The Speaker: I consider this matter dealt with and concluded.

At 2:53 the hon. the Deputy Opposition House Leader rose on a point of order.

Point of Order Allegations against a Member

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, I think I have another point of order at 2 p.m. Again that was the Government House Leader in response to my question where I asked about the investigation into the Premier's leadership race fraud. The Government House Leader said: he makes up false allegations. Again, that was directly pointed at me as an individual. That's clearly offside these rules, and I urge you to rule that as such.

The Speaker: My apologies to the Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall. That is correct. You did call a point of order at 2 p.m. when the Government House Leader was speaking. I'm happy to have you provide additional comments should you feel like it's necessary, or I'm happy to have the Government House Leader respond.

Mr. Sabir: I think that I don't have the benefit of the Blues, but I'll look for your guidance.

Mr. Schow: I would suspect that if the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, the hon. Government House Leader, said something to the effect that the member is making stuff up, that would be unparliamentary. I don't have the benefit of the Blues. I'll defer to you, Mr. Speaker. If that is, in fact, the case, again, happy to withdraw and apologize.

The Speaker: I do have the benefit of the Blues for the point of order at 2 p.m. The hon. the Government House Leader said the following: "Mr. Speaker, continuing to make up [false] allegations inside this Chamber is ridiculous. I challenge that member to go make those allegations outside this Chamber so that legal action could be taken against them.” And a point of order was called, and the member proceeded to ask his question.

Like, I think further to the previous ruling – and I think it’s prudent to provide a reminder to members of the Assembly from Erskine May, 497, I believe. To be clear, this is not a point of order. But what I do want to do – and I often do this on a Thursday afternoon so that members can go home and consider themselves accordingly about how we’ll function next week. It’s imperative that we recall Erskine May Parliamentary Practice, page 497, where it says, talking about making allegations about other members, that the chair is often required on the Member to withdraw the words, including words imputing false motives or unavowed motives; the misrepresentation of the language of another and the accusation of misrepresentation; and charges of uttering a deliberate falsehood.

3:00

I just want to provide that caution. This isn’t a point of order. I don’t think that he was making a particular accusation against the member but more statements that he was referring to. Not a point of order. I consider the matter dealt with and concluded.

I hope that the level of decorum can increase next week as we move further into the week.

That now brings us to the point of order of 2:33, where the hon. the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar had asked a question and a point of order was raised by the Opposition Deputy House Leader.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On the previous ruling I certainly missed the part where the member said that I should say it outside; a lawsuit will follow. I can certainly do that.

Point of Order

Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Sabir: Moving to the point of order at 2:33, 2:34, again, the Government House Leader said, specifically referring to the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, that the member never lets facts come in the way, something to that effect. It’s a roundabout way of saying to somebody that he is not telling the truth, that he’s lying, those kinds of things that have been ruled unparliamentary. Again, I think it’s offside the rules of this House.

Mr. Schow: I don’t have the benefit of the Blues, but in the earlier points of order the language from the Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall was far more specific. I believe we are now starting to grasp at straws. This is not a point of order but a matter of debate. Until I hear something from the Blues that suggests otherwise, I would say that this is not a point of order. Let’s move on.

The Speaker: Thank you. I do have a very rough copy of the Blues. The member says something to the effect of: the member never lets the facts get away in his ridiculous questions. I think the member meant to say that he never lets the facts get in the way of his ridiculous questions. You know, members day in and day out try to find creative ways to make such statements. It happens on both sides of the Assembly. I don’t believe that this rises to the level of a point of order. I consider the matter dealt with and concluded.

Immediately following the member’s statement for the Member for Calgary-Klein, the Opposition Deputy House Leader rose and asked a question about raising a point of order. I’m happy to take that question now, and we’ll govern ourselves accordingly following.

Point of Order

Allegations against a Member

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do recognize that on a number of occasions you have talked about decorum in the House when member statements are made. You have talked about that members should be allowed to make them uninterrupted. But at the same time, when that much latitude is afforded to a member to make that member’s statement, I suspect that members won’t be allowed to say things that they’re otherwise not able to say. The Member for Calgary-Klein, who was referring specifically to the Leader of the Official Opposition, said that she continues to fearmonger about some $4.7 billion. I think referring to the member and making that accusation directly at a member should be offside the rules of this House. The $4.7 billion number is at page 144 of their first budget in 2019.

The Speaker: This sounds a lot to me like we’re continuing a matter of debate. If that same logic was applied to every member’s statement that members of the Official Opposition or the government made, we would have a lot more congratulatory member statements to our constituents, which may be a very good thing for all of the decorum in the Assembly. But that is a decision for each and every member to make when they rise to their feet. This is not a point of order. I consider the matter dealt with and concluded.

I wish that this period of time in our day had concluded. However, yesterday the hon. Government House Leader rose on a point of privilege, and the hon. Member for Edmonton-South, who was the subject of the point of privilege, deferred his opportunity to respond until today. I will hear the response now.

Privilege

Misleading the House

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will attempt to keep my comments brief in responding to the point of privilege raised yesterday.

Yesterday the Government House Leader argued a prima facie breach of privilege has occurred by means of a member misleading the House. As outlined in the fourth edition of Parliamentary Practice in New Zealand, the test for this is three parts and as follows: one, “the statement must . . . be misleading;” two, “the member must have known that the statement was inaccurate at the time the statement was made;” and, three, “the member must have intended to mislead” the Assembly.

Mr. Speaker, with respect to the first part of that test, that a statement must be misleading, I have not admitted to committing any crimes, have not been charged or arrested with any crimes, and continue to co-operate with the RCMP in respect to the matter which they are investigating. I believe, clearly, any statements I have made in the House are not misleading to this effect.

Second, the member must have known that the statement was inaccurate at the time the statement was made. Clearly, I did not believe then and do not believe now that any statement I made in the House is misleading.

Finally, the member must have intended to mislead the Assembly. Mr. Speaker, I did not and do not intend to mislead the Assembly with respect to my white paper and the ongoing investigation; hence, my openness and publication of the document describing the entirety of my test and situation. If the member opposite believes differently or has a different interpretation of those facts, they may be matters of debate.

I will refer to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on March 22, 2022, where you cited Beauchesne’s paragraph 494: “It has been formally ruled by Speakers that statements by Members respecting themselves and particularly within their own knowledge must be accepted.” As I have stated already, my arguments today are with regard to matters respecting myself, and I would ask that you and the House accept my knowledge on those matters.

Further, I will also refer to a point of privilege that was raised on October 25, 2021, on Hansard page 5649, by the hon. Deputy Opposition House Leader. The Deputy Opposition House Leader argued that the Premier had misled the House with respect to his knowledge of the COVID-19 modelling data. The following day, on October 26, the current Government House Leader then made arguments that the word of a member, in this case the Premier, must be accepted as per Beauchesne’s 494. This was then ruled by you, Mr. Speaker, on page 5750 of Alberta Hansard, that you accepted members at their word and no prima facie breach of privilege had occurred.

As I have shared the facts of the matter as I understand them, Mr. Speaker, accordingly I ask that you rule in the same manner and find that no prima facie breach of privilege has occurred in this case.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, points of privilege are serious matters, and any member of the Assembly does have the opportunity to provide their remarks even if they aren’t subject to the point of privilege. However, that would possibly be unique in this situation. I want to provide that opportunity to other members of the Assembly should they wish to do so.

Seeing none, I will take both the argument made by the Government House Leader as well as the Member for Edmonton-South under advisement, and I will report back to the Assembly at my earliest opportunity, which I would anticipate to be in the first days of next week.

Hon. members, Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Bill 7 Appropriation Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’m really pleased to rise and move third reading of Bill 7, the Appropriation Act, 2022.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

Budget 2022 is about responsible fiscal management. Mr. Speaker, It’s no secret that we inherited the highest spending government of any across the nation. Over the last three years we have worked hard, worked collectively across ministries, across government, to make responsible, surgical, thoughtful decisions to deliver more value for Alberta taxpayers. I’m very pleased to say that Budget 2022 reports on our progress, and in fact we have turned that spending down. In the upcoming year we will have aligned our per capita spend with that of other provinces’ governments, and that puts this province on a sustainable fiscal trajectory.

Mr. Speaker, there’s more. Budget 2022 really reports on the progress of revenue creation, reports on the progress of wealth creation by our private citizens and businesses, all of that leading to expanded fiscal capacity and increased government revenues. There’s not a data point in this budget that represents that fact in a more clear way than the fact that we will be collecting $400 million more per year in corporate income tax revenues over the course of this fiscal plan at an 8 per cent rate than the previous government collected at a 12 per cent rate.

The great advantage with responsible fiscal management is that now this government and the people of Alberta have additional options. Mr. Speaker, that’s why Budget 2022 includes a $1.8 billion investment in health care over the course of the fiscal plan. This investment will in part be allocated to increased health care capacity, health care capacity that has shown itself deficient as we’ve worked to deal with the pandemic.

There’s more. As I’ve travelled across the province over the last number of months, I’ve encountered a labour shortage across sectors and across regions, that at a time when we’ve had an unemployment rate north of 7 per cent. Mr. Speaker, as we’ve worked to understand the fundamentals driving this inconsistency, we’ve recognized that many Albertans that have perhaps lost their jobs in 2016 or 2017, during the last downturn, in part brought on by the economic and fiscal policies of the members opposite, many of those Albertans don’t have the skills, the confidence today to re-enter the workplace. That’s why we’re investing $600 million in Budget 2022 to ensure that every Albertan has the opportunity to reskill, to enter a postsecondary program, to pursue an occupation or profession, perhaps one that didn’t even exist in this province 10 years ago.

We’re seeing an ever-increasingly diversified economy in the province of Alberta. Mr. Speaker. This $600 million investment will go towards providing an additional 7,000 seats in our great, world-class postsecondary institutions. Again, this will create opportunities for Albertans to reskill and ultimately graduate in a profession, an occupation where they can provide well for themselves and their families, where they can make a great contribution to their communities, where they can again support the nonprofit organizations and charities that are an important part of the fabric of this province.

Mr. Speaker, I’m presenting a balanced budget today. In fact, we presented it in late February. We’re going to be passing it, I trust, with the support of members of this House later today. This budget is balanced while maintaining the highest levels of support for seniors, while maintaining the highest levels of support for the most vulnerable, because these are the values that are held by Albertans and these are the values that are held by this government.

But, most importantly, Budget 2022 is an inflection point. Budget 2022 marks a time when and where we will no longer place the burden of irresponsible fiscal decisions on the next generation, robbing our children and grandchildren of opportunity and prosperity – opportunity and prosperity – Mr. Speaker, that I was privileged to have. So I urge all members of this Assembly to support Bill 7, the Appropriation Act, 2022.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton West Yellowhead has risen to join debate.

Mr. Carson: Almost, Mr. Speaker. Edmonton-West Henday.

The Acting Speaker: Oh, Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you for the opportunity to rise this afternoon to speak to Bill 7. As you might imagine, Mr. Speaker, I am not quite as excited as this Finance minister might be other than the fact that we do here in the Assembly today have the opportunity, both on this side of the House and on the other side of the House, to truly show this Premier and this Finance minister that they are indeed on the wrong path and that they have made decisions that aren’t to the benefit of all Albertans through this budget. That is indeed what I have been hearing in my community from the correspondence that I get through my office and through the phones on a daily basis on a number of fronts, first off being, which this government continues to ignore, the fact that there are many Albertans that are accessing AISH benefits, many Albertans that are accessing Alberta Works benefits and other benefits that are provided to Albertans to ensure that they can continue to survive in our province. Unfortunately, while this government believes they are balancing the budget for future generations, they aren't even balancing the budget for the current generations in terms of the fact that they are making so many decisions and, at the end of the day, cuts to these important programs. Again, we hear it every day in my office and, I imagine, in every single office of our MLAs across the province, the damage that the decisions that this government is making are having on Alberta families and some of the most vulnerable people in our society.

Unfortunately, we can continue to look back to the initial decision of this government to deindex AISH benefits, to deindex seniors' benefits. We look at what that means in real numbers. For example, a senior couple receiving the Alberta seniors' benefit is set to lose $750, and that is truly remarkable, Mr. Speaker, considering the state that we find ourselves in, with inflationary pressures continuing to hammer on the budgets of our families and, again, in many respects even more so on those that are relying on assistance from the government to simply survive.

For this Finance minister to say that these are the values held by Albertans, that we are making the decision to, quote, unquote, balance this budget by cutting important services like the indexing of AISH, like the indexing of seniors' benefits: I don't buy it, not for one second. Mr. Speaker, I don't think that those are the values that Albertans hold, to leave these people behind, these vulnerable people, to, again, essentially find ourselves in a position where this government can call it a balanced budget, but it truly is anything but that.

Of course, we have spent a lot of time talking about the fact that Albertans cannot trust this government. The same can be said about this line around a balanced budget, because we are truly balancing, quote, unquote, again, Mr. Speaker, on the backs of the most vulnerable. At the end of the day, it continues to be truly dependent on the price of oil for that day, and we might not see ourselves in the same situation a week from now, a month from now. Unfortunately, we can see ourselves with again a balanced budget, but at the same time these vulnerable Albertans will continue to be left behind.

I believe that this budget is anything but aligned with the values of Albertans. We can look at other increases that this government has had direct opportunities to take care of. When it comes to insurance costs, we've been dealing with this for several years now, at a time when insurance companies continue to see some of the best returns that they've seen in quite some time, Mr. Speaker. We are hearing accounts from everyday Albertans where they're seeing their insurance increase upwards of 30 per cent per year, this at the same time when they are driving less, this at the same time they have maybe never seen themselves receive a ticket or been in a collision. It is truly based on the decisions of this Finance minister and this government to remove the cap, to make backroom deals with insurance lobbyists.

At the same time that Albertans are actually seeing their benefits reduced in terms of caps on minor injuries, at the same time that this government is telling Albertans that they are going to receive less in compensation if they are in a collision that causes them long-term disabilities, potentially life-altering disabilities, they are actually going to be compensated less but, at the same time, very possibly will be seeing year to year their insurance increasing upwards of 30 per cent.

Again, Mr. Speaker, this is on top of the many other costs that are being piled on Albertans. We've heard a lot of talk about utility bills increasing. It's hard to explain, truly, how much of an effect this is having on Albertans. Some are seeing their utility bills essentially double. We've seen that in cases that have come to my office. And what has this government offered them? A $50 rebate a year from now, potentially. A year is a long time for those Albertans to wait, and they truly see through what this government is trying to put forward to them as a solution, because it truly is not that.

Again, we can look at the budget of Advanced Education as we continue to look at Bill 7, the Appropriation Act, Mr. Speaker. This, again, is a ministry and a part of our economy that is so important, yet we see this government jeopardizing the long-term competitiveness of the postsecondary institutions and industry across this province. We see through Budget 2022 a cut of $600 million in real terms for the Advanced Education ministry, and on top of that, this government is actually asking Alberta students to pay more on the debt that they are being forced to accumulate because of the decisions of this government. They're actually continuing to pay higher interest rates because this government has really shown that they are leaving the students in this province to fend for themselves and, even worse, is actually taking counterproductive actions against those students, who are the future of our economy.

We should be doing everything we can to ensure that they believe Alberta is the best place for them to stay or to come to in the first place, potentially. We have heard discussions around brain drain and the concerns that we've seen around that. If we aren't ensuring that there are competitive programs and processes in place, whether we're talking about tax credits, whether we're talking about any other rebate, Mr. Speaker, we should be doing everything we can to ensure that our advanced education system, our postsecondary education system, is as competitive as possible in terms of the programs that we're offering, in terms of the cost to take a four-year degree or longer and, of course, not just a four-year but any type of postsecondary education. Unfortunately, again, what we're seeing through this budget is a downloading of costs to our postsecondary institutions, which, in turn, is to some extent forcing those institutions to download those costs onto students.

It's truly unfortunate that this is where we find ourselves, Mr. Speaker. I think that our decision, under the NDP government from 2015 to 2019, to freeze postsecondary tuitions for the most part was the right decision and, at the same time, continuing to fund them at a level where they were able to succeed. Unfortunately, we're seeing a complete reversal of not only the cost of tuition but the amount of funding that this government is providing to postsecondary institutions. It's going to have a devastating effect on our future economy and even on the economy that we have today.

Again, when we look at other decisions that this government has made in regard to relationships with our municipal partners and the continued downloading of costs, whether we're looking at the gutting of MSI, municipal sustainability initiatives, and the funding that our municipal partners are receiving to support the important infrastructure in each of those communities, we've seen a complete reversal, of course, from what this government initially campaigned on. Of course, I've raised the point before that they supported the big-city charters when we were in government and campaigned on upholding that. Yet, again, just like we saw on supports for AISH, supports for seniors' benefits, the government has done a complete reversal on supporting our municipalities.

Of course, it goes further than just supporting infrastructure. Whether we're talking about the need for mental health supports in our municipalities, whether we're talking about the need for affordable housing, we have heard from municipalities across the province that on those important issues this government is failing as well.

It becomes even more unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, when we reflect on the Appropriation Act that we have before us and the need, specifically in this instance, for affordable housing. We see federal dollars on the table. We see municipal partners ready to access that funding and ready to move forward with agreements, but instead of the provincial government coming to the table and understanding that we need to do everything we can to access those dollars, they are not providing those dollars. So we will see federal funding left on the table, and it's truly unfortunate because we should be doing everything we can to access those dollars. There's no doubt that those relationships are important. There's no doubt that there continues to be strain on our affordable housing system, even more so because of decisions that this government is making when it comes to AISH supports and Alberta Works supports.

Again, when we look at the supports that are being offered by this government, when we look at the Alberta child and family benefit not being indexed, Mr. Speaker – I mean, the list is long about the decisions that this government is making that are going to have a long-lasting effect on Albertans and a long-lasting effect on the children that are counting on this government to take meaningful action to support them. Coupled with the decision to not index the Alberta child benefit, we see a minister responsible for the rollout of the federal child care program also not willing to put the dollars forward to ensure that we see $10-a-day child care rolling out across this province in a timely manner, bringing into question whether we will see that program successfully fulfilled.

There are so many problems that we see within this. I do not believe, to any extent, that it reflects the values of Albertans to place the burden on the most vulnerable in our society, to place the burden on children and seniors and those trying to access postsecondary education and, further, onto our municipalities, who in turn will be forced to download those costs onto taxpayers in those respective municipalities. At the end of the day, if the province is funding less to municipalities – we know that there are agreements in place across the province, in our cities, that they have to have a balanced budget at the end of the year. So if the government is telling them that there is less funding for them, there is only one way for them to get that back, and that is to increase taxes on the people in those communities, which is truly unfortunate, again, with respect to all the other things that are being put on Alberta families.

Again I would encourage members to truly consider whether this is the right direction for our province, whether they truly believe that these are the values that Albertans hold when we look at the billion-dollar tax grab that this government is moving forward with in terms of bracket creep, something that the Premier himself used to rail against for many years when he was part of the Canadian Taxpayers Federation, when he was an MP in the federal Parliament. But, my, how things have changed, Mr. Speaker.

There is a lot to be desired in this bill. I think that this is truly an opportunity for both sides of the House to show clearly that we are headed in the wrong direction. I think that to some extent I understand – well, not really. I was going to say that I understand where the government is coming from, but I truly don't because there is just so much wrong in what we're seeing before us. I continue to hear from Albertans, above and beyond what I've discussed already, when I go to school council meetings and the concerns that they have for our education system, with this government's continued reluctance to fund for enrolment – that continues to be an issue that is having terrible effects on our K to 12 system – the completely flawed rollout of the draft curriculum that this government will do everything but roll back, will continue to push off, continue to try and find somebody, anybody, any school board that would pilot this but has been rejected so many times.

There are just too many things in this budget, Mr. Speaker, that are completely wrong for me to be able to even consider supporting it. With that, I hope that we may see other members of the Assembly join in this discussion and share why they are so concerned with what we see here. I think that, again, there are likely members within the government's own caucus that have concerns one way or another, and I would appreciate hearing from them as well.

With that, I will take my seat. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and share my concerns with this bill.

Thank you.

3:30

The Acting Speaker: Thank you very much to the hon. member for the great constituency of Edmonton-West Henday.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs has now risen.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise in the House today to speak to Bill 7, the Appropriation Act, 2022. I have to say that I would like to echo a lot of what the hon. member has shared about concerns with this budget. I think that this is simply a budget that we cannot support. We look at what has been proposed by this government, and it's ridiculous that this budget comes at a time when the cost of absolutely everything is going up: utility bills, insurance rates, tuition fees, property taxes, park fees, and there's a way that this government has found an opportunity to tax inflation. And, you know, I think when we're looking at the real struggles of what families are facing, this budget does nothing to support them.

Yesterday in this House I rose and asked a question about aid that is being provided to some of my constituents, who I hear from, hundreds talking about their inability to make ends meet. With the cost of everything going up, they are hurting, and this government won't address it. They yell at us and, you know, make all of these ridiculous claims, but when you look at a $50 rebate when my constituent wrote to me about a $750 utility bill, a $50 rebate does nothing. People are struggling. They can't afford their bills. They can't afford food, Mr. Speaker. I hear just devastating stories every day, and I know that members of the government are hearing the same. It baffles me that they're so tone deaf about what is happening to Albertans right now.

When I was in estimates for Culture, I had the opportunity to ask questions. Unfortunately, it wasn't shared time; it was block time. You know, part of my job as the critic is to listen to those that are impacted by this government's decisions, and it's something that I've heard for the three years when it comes especially to nonprofits and community organizations, that they're not feeling heard.

In last year's budget I had asked the previous minister on behalf of two organizations if she would meet with them. It was the Edmonton Federation of Community Leagues and the Federation of Calgary Communities. They indicated for this budget that, again, they still hadn't heard from the previous minister or from the current minister, and when I asked the minister in estimates why he hadn't been meeting with these organizations, he said that there are simply too many. Well, I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the Edmonton Federation of Community Leagues represents 161 community leagues. That's one organization that represents 161 community leagues. The Federation of Calgary Communities represents 230 nonprofits and 151 community associations. This has been a plea from these individuals that represent so many, that also represent thousands of Albertans that don't have voice. That's concerning to me, when I hear that they've made decisions on a budget without talking to some major, major community leaguers.

We all know that the communities are the heart and soul of each and every one of our constituencies. They know first what's going on. They know when needs are required, and they step up and provide support to Albertans when this government has failed them. They failed them in their first budget. They cut things like CFEP, which communities rely on for support. Not even to mention what happened with the pandemic and the mishandling of that. So many communities leagues were struggling to find ways to support their communities because this government's failed leadership in how to handle the pandemic impacted communities, impacted families, impacted Albertans. And who stood up and answered the call to support? Our community leagues, our agriculture societies, our charities, with no help from the government.

These wonderful communities have come together, and they continue to reach out to the many organizations and individuals that they serve on behalf of Albertans. Vibrant Communities Calgary created a report called Alberta Budget 2022's Business as Usual Approach Falls Short. They say simply that it falls short. They say that the "new spending priorities don't address issues that matter to struggling Albertans."

I would like to just read to you the first two paragraphs of this article, Mr. Speaker, that I think is very impactful in their summary of what Budget 2022 is saying. It says:

Holding the government to account on budget issues is a complex and difficult task. However, a small number of nonprofit organizations regularly provide this type of analysis. The Edmonton Social Planning Council, the Alberta Seniors Community Housing Association, and the Calgary Chamber of Voluntary Commerce have all called attention to the government's inadequate support of important public services, the nonprofit sector, and affordable housing in Budget 2022.

In 2021, VCC's response to the budget stressed the importance of investments to tackle inequities that were exposed by the pandemic, including systemic racism, income security, and precarious work. In Budget 2022, our concerns remain unaddressed. Spending was maintained in most areas, although when inflation and growth are taken into account, most budgets were decreased. And, where we do see funding increases, as is the case with child care and affordable housing, this is primarily attributed to federal government transfers.

This was a huge missed opportunity. These are organizations that have been pleading to have a voice at the table of government. To me, Mr. Speaker, this is an absolute no-brainer. When you want to know how best to serve Albertans, you talk to Albertans. If you're not talking to Albertans, maybe even talk to those that represent Albertans in our communities. They are the pulse of what is happening in each and every one of our communities. They know what's going on. They know which families are struggling. They know where the gaps in services are. They are also incredibly skilled at being resourceful and coming up with strategies and ideas and ways of how to support. Had the government simply met with some of these individuals, perhaps we wouldn't see this budget in such disarray. Perhaps we could stand proudly in this House and vote for a budget based on what Albertans are asking for.

However, Mr. Speaker, that is not the case. We're standing in this Chamber debating a budget that doesn't actually support Albertans in ways that they actually need. I don't understand why there are all of these wonderful opportunities to connect with so many individuals that represent Albertans, and this government just turns a blind eye.

On this side of the House we stand and we ask questions on behalf of those we represent. We share stories of those that are being impacted by the reckless decisions that this government has made, and it falls on deaf ears. People are pleading to have a voice at the table.

When the pandemic first started, Mr. Speaker, one of the things that the NDP called on, alongside artists, was for artists to have a voice at the table when it comes to the economic recovery plan. They wanted to be able to have an impact on how services and resources and supports were given to Albertans. These are creative thinkers. It was ignored. We've seen so many reports coming from these industries on ways that would make a significant impact on the day-to-day lives of Albertans, and they're being ignored.

We saw the culture industry being one of the very first industries that was impacted by the pandemic and will be one of the last industries to recover. This budget doesn't do anything to support that recovery.

In the budget from 2019 this government slashed supports and services for the arts community, for culture prepandemic. During the pandemic there was no one around to listen. We held news conferences. We requested meetings. We stood in this Chamber and pleaded for supports to be provided, and nothing. What happened was that there was a considerable amount of inconsistency in the mandate regulations, so we had organizations that were just left on their own, and right now Albertans are left on their own. This is a budget that we simply cannot support.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to cede my time and listen to the debate. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Government House Leader has risen.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move that we adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Acting Speaker: I see the Government House Leader has risen.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to ask for unanimous consent to go to one-minute bells for the duration of the sitting day.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Bill 8

Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board has risen.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and move third reading of Bill 8, the Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2022.

Bill 8 provides the authority for government to pay from the general revenue fund for additional costs that are not already covered or otherwise provided for during the current fiscal year. The supplementary estimates include $1.2 billion in spending and $1 million in capital investment. Mr. Speaker, the funding in Bill 8 will ensure the government can cover health care costs required to deal with the pandemic, it will send aid and equipment to the people of Ukraine, and it will provide electricity rebates to Albertans struggling with rising costs. It will also support child care workers and parents of young children and build municipal infrastructure.

Mr. Speaker, I need to point out that while we're presenting this supplementary supply bill, we've not lost sight of the importance of fiscal management. We can never lose sight of the importance of fiscal management, and within the expenditures represented in this bill, the expenditures of $1.2 billion, there's an offset in revenue side of close to $1 billion. In fact, the net effect on Alberta's fiscal situation for our current fiscal year, the year that ends in only a few days, will be just over $200 million. Yes, there was required and necessary spending beyond the fiscal plan. We were in a time of pandemic. The tragic geopolitical events in Ukraine have also required a response from this government, and we know that Albertans are supportive of that initiative.

Mr. Speaker, with that, I urge all members of this House to support passage of Bill 8.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud, with 20 minutes should she choose it.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak to this supplementary supply bill, Bill 8. I'd like to take this opportunity to comment on what I heard when I was in debate in this House on this supply bill, which I think is very concerning. I know it's taken this government a very long time to even superficially acknowledge the importance of affordable, accessible, quality child care for both our children's education but also for our economic recovery in terms of expanding access for more families so women can participate in the workforce more often and we can increase our GDP. Very reluctantly, and only because there were federal dollars on the table, did this UCP government finally acknowledge that, after, of course, ending the former NDP government's $25-per-day program. What we saw in supplementary supply debate is that that commitment by this government to child care is actually paper-thin. It's not only paper-thin, but it falls far too short.

What we learned in supplementary supply and in this bill is that not only is there no actual commitment to getting to $10-per-day child care by this government, but they continue to underfund and underspend on child care. During this discussion and the debate, despite saying that in the fiscal year 2021 there would be $315 million spent by this provincial government on child care, the Minister of Children's Services acknowledged that it was actually only $295 million and that, in fact, $55 million of provincial funds that were dedicated for child care have not been spent, and she could not account for where those dollars would be spent.

Why is this important, Mr. Speaker? In light of, of course, the significant investment by the federal government into child care, it seems as though this government is content to let the federal government be the primary funder of what is their provincial responsibility, which is the delivery of child care and early childhood education. But it also means that this government is actually failing to live up to its commitments in agreements with the federal government that provincial funding for child care would not be replaced by federal funding. As we've heard clearly, it is being replaced. Through this bill the UCP government is asking for, you know, hundreds of millions of dollars of federal funding to go to the child care sector while acknowledging that they underspent $55 million on child care.

Why that's also relevant, apart from the fact that the government is not living up to its commitments, is also that there was so much that could have been done this past fiscal year with $55 million to strengthen our child care system. Importantly, movement could have been made to actually create more child care spaces. But most importantly, Mr. Speaker, child care spaces are only relevant if there are staff there to fill them. We have a staffing shortage, and we'll continue to have a sizable staffing shortage in the early childhood education sector for some time, which will mean that this government will not fulfill its commitment to create 42,500 nonprofit spaces in Alberta over the next few years if we don't have staff. Those dollars would have been critical to keep staff in the sector, to keep educators, to retain them, and to attract new educators. Key to that would have been investing in an increased wage top-up or implementing a wage grid to make sure that early childhood educators get paid a decent wage for the professional work that they do, yet this government didn't do that. They just didn't spend $55 million which they allocated for child care. They chose not to spend it. That, I mean, raises the question of: where did those dollars go? We don't know. The minister could not account for those dollars.

This is the second year in a row that this government has significantly underspent in child care. The previous year, Mr. Speaker: $108 million because, yes, there was lower enrolment during the pandemic. Again, child care programs were crying out for greater PPE support, greater paid leave support for their staff so they could stay home. Maybe child care programs could have stayed open, even with lower enrolment, had they actually invested those dollars, that $108 million that year before. But, no, the government not only did not invest it in child care; they handed it out in a quick cheque. At the end of the fiscal year they had $108 million, and they thought: ooh, let's try to buy some support by sending out a one-time cheque to some parents, not even all parents – some parents – for child care purposes. Guess what? That didn't do anything to lower their fees the following month, didn't do anything to create more spaces. It didn't do anything to attract and retain new child care educators.

So two years in a row, Mr. Speaker, this government has significantly underspent on child care. That's $163 million that they have not invested in child care, dollars that were set aside in their budget for that purpose that they have not used. I mean, honestly, at this point I think it's already established that this government cannot be taken seriously when it comes to investing in child care. That's important, of course, for all the families who had to wait an additional four months, five months while this government played politics to even sign that deal for the federal government, to actually see any benefits.

Even now, while some families and, hopefully, most families are seeing a significant reduction in their fees, we know that the lowest income families are not seeing the same kind of reduction. We even know that some low-income families who are eligible for full subsidy support are actually now – some of them are actually paying more under the way this government has rolled out this program. This is at a time, Mr. Speaker, when families all across this province are struggling with their bills, so any benefits that they're seeing – perhaps reduced child care fees are being eaten up now by skyrocketing utility bills, by property tax bills, by their car insurance, by school fees.

Any benefit that this government or that Albertans might have seen in reduced fees is now being eaten up by a budget that does not address the needs of Alberta families, that boasts a surplus but doesn't actually make life more affordable for Albertans. It's not creating jobs. It's not doing any of the things that this government is saying other than they get to cheer and pat themselves on the back. That's great. That's great that we have higher oil prices. No, that's not because of anything this government did. It does help their bottom line, but it is not helping Alberta families.

When we see how fiscally irresponsible they are by not even being able to invest their own child care budget into child care – $163 million in two years, Mr. Speaker. That's how much this government has not spent on child care even though it was allocated for child care. So for all those families who over the past two years have been struggling to pay their fees, to find a child care space, to the 96 per cent of the workforce that are women, who are earning just above minimum wage as early childhood educators, who are working two jobs, who are wondering why they would stay in the child care field when they can earn more working at Tim Hortons – when all of those Albertans could have used the support from this government to actually create child care spaces, make it more affordable, attract more workers, this government did nothing. They actually pocketed that money and handed it out, $55 million.

We don't even know – at this point this is where we're at with this government. They don't even blink about hiding $55 million, about not accounting for it. It's just that that's the level of fiscal responsibility that this government expects Albertans to expect from them. But we know that Albertans expect higher, especially at a time when all Albertans are pinching their pennies. When they're very concerned about every dollar, this government seems incredibly irresponsible and unconcerned about how they spend Albertans' dollars.

Mr. Speaker, I have a very difficult time supporting a bill that, clearly, just demonstrates the fiscal irresponsibility of this government and their lack of commitment to investing in child care, the lip service that they continue to pay to something that is critically important not only to Alberta families but to our economy.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I'll cede my time to one of my colleagues.

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Minister of Children's Services has risen.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I do want to take a quick few minutes to respond and correct the record in terms of a few of the things the member opposite just said. Now, I know this is going to be a difficult concept for the members opposite, but fighting for Albertans is what we were asked to do. It's what we were sent here by our constituents to do, fight for a fair deal for Albertans, okay?

Now, I know, Mr. Speaker, the member opposite just said that we should have signed a little faster. I heard her colleague the Member for Calgary-Buffalo say that the other night when we were in fact talking about this as well. I know that that is very difficult for them to understand. We know what they would have done because I think their past performance would have been a really good indicator.

Ms Pancholi: Where's the $55 million, Minister?

The Acting Speaker: I think that the last hon. member who had an opportunity to speak was able to be heard. Now I'm having trouble hearing the hon. minister as I believe there is a bit of a response happening. The only person with the floor is the hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Please continue.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I know that this is very difficult sometimes for the members opposite to understand. We know that past performance is a really great indicator of future activity, and what did we see the members opposite do? Sell out Albertans to our Prime Minister, Justin Trudeau. That is always what they were happy to do. Sign on the dotted line, they say. Sign on the dotted line. If we had signed on the dotted line, here's what we would have had, something very similar to the program under the NDP, the pilot program that left out thousands and thousands of families right across Alberta. You selected certain centres and certain operators who could choose. Signing on the dotted line would mean that we would have gotten agreements like other provinces, like B.C. or Nova Scotia, who have been in fact signing agreements that would leave out – leave out – private operators. I know that is what the members opposite would have done.

Every single province is making choices when it comes to how they invest these dollars, and what did we do, Mr. Speaker? Instead of using ideology to lead our plan, we listened to Albertans. We know that between 60 and 70 per cent of child care operators are entrepreneurs. They are private operators. They are often female entrepreneurs who stepped up and said: hey, when the economy was good, we needed child care. What did they do? They stepped up to help their neighbours and grow our economy and opened up these child care centres. They are not the enemy. They are not the enemy.

When they say, Mr. Speaker, that we should have just signed on the dotted line, sell out Albertans to Justin Trudeau, that is what we would have gotten, a system that would have really just focused on nonprofit, public spaces. That was not good enough for Albertans – we heard it loud and clear – because they saw it under them.

What we did was we took the time. We took the time to listen. We took the time to gather feedback. We presented a plan, a plan that worked, a plan that worked for Albertans, nonprofit and private operators alike, Mr. Speaker. That is what we did. [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, one more time I'm just going to remind that the only person with the floor right now – and I know that sometimes comments made by both sides may not be agreed upon from both sides, but previously the member did have the opportunity to make her points, and now I think that there's a response happening. If the other members from the opposition are having issues with this, there will be ample opportunity to stand and take opportunities to speak as well.

The hon. Minister of Children's Services has the call.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We did. We took the time. We took the time to get it right, to listen to Alberta parents, to listen to Alberta child care operators. Not only did we include private operators; we also respect parent choice. What does that mean? I know that's, again, an interesting concept for the members opposite to understand. That means taking a look at the types of choices parents are making and making sure that there is flexibility in our system to meet their needs, things like preschool.

You know, that's a type of care that is very important for part-time working parents, parents who are staying at home, parents who are working from home, parents who want their children to have access to early learning and development opportunities. We included them in our plan. They weren't included under the members opposite. Not at all. We took the time to get this right. We did. We took the time to get it right. Yes, we . . .

Mr. Williams: Will the member give way?

Ms Schulz: Oh, absolutely, I will.

Mr. Williams: Well, thank you very much, Minister, for that speech. It seems members opposite are paralyzed in the sedentary position when they could rise and intervene. I'm taking the opportunity to ask the minister: approximately how many Albertans are better served now in terms of numbers where they would not have been served under the NDP pilot program? If we had continued with that, how many Albertans would not have had day care because of their ideological drive to only have one solution rather than being flexible in an Alberta-based decision?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to speak to that. When we look at private operators, 60 to 70 per cent of our operators would have been left out. They were left out under the NDP pilot program. They actually believed that they were fundamentally going to have to shift their entire business if the members opposite would have been able to expand their plan. Why? Because they were not open for business. They did not respect parent choice. They created spaces in areas that were politically expedient. They closed child care centres because of oversaturation and not using data to drive space creation. [interjections]

Now, the member opposite, Mr. Speaker, has said – and I hope she's listening. I know she's heckling quite a bit here, but I do want her to hear this answer. She has said that we have lost child care spaces. I can tell you that we have actually grown 10,000 spaces since March of 2020. Ten thousand spaces. Throughout a pandemic, a time that has been very difficult, we invested $165 million in child care operators right across this province because we knew that they needed those supports. We saw 10,000 additional spaces created even during a pandemic.

Let's talk about their record for a second. I mean, look at us. We want to talk about jobs, okay? Let's compare jobs for a second. I would like to talk about the record of 180,000 jobs lost under the NDP. We created 130,000 jobs last year during a pandemic. We added 10,000 child care spaces right across this province. The members opposite also want to say that we have lost early childhood educators. Mr. Speaker, not true. It's just not true. The numbers do not show that the arguments made by the members opposite have any semblance of fact.

We, in fact, were around 18,000 educators. That number did drop during the pandemic, Mr. Speaker . . .

4:00

Mr. Schow: Will the member give way?

Ms Schulz: Absolutely.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, hon. member and Minister of Children's Services. I do have a question specifically regarding something that the hon. minister had just said about misrepresenting certain facts and not having the facts correct. I'm wondering if the minister could maybe elaborate on some more inaccurate facts that the NDP has tried to peddle in this Chamber, specifically the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud, as that member chooses not to listen but . . .

Mr. Sabir: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker: I hear that a point of order has been made. The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall has risen.

Point of Order

Allegations against a Member

Mr. Sabir: Under Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j). I think that insofar as the member is talking about the NDP as a whole, that's fine, but when you specifically pick on an individual member, that's offside these rules. It's a point of order, and I urge you to rule that as such.

The Acting Speaker: I see the Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Well, two things, Mr. Speaker. One, there was no point of order cited, no standing order . . . [interjection] You can sit down. You've had your chance to speak.

Second, Mr. Speaker, I was specifically referring to statements made by the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud, the critic for Children's Services, and that member, in my opinion, has made a number of accusations and misrepresented or used inaccurate facts in this Chamber. I am simply asking the minister if that minister could cite some of the inaccurate facts that the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has used. It's not a personal attack, and I know it gets the members opposite very riled up when they hear this . . .

Mr. Eggen: Because we're trying to debate the budget.

Mr. Schow: Again, it's my opportunity to speak, Mr. Speaker. Should the member from Edmonton – I forget the constituency – choose to speak, he has an opportunity.

Not a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. [interjections] Order.

I have taken into account both sides. I do think that we are getting frightfully close to the line with regard to language that could create disorder in here. There is always an opportunity within debates to disagree among facts. At this point, though, I do not believe that this is a point of order. However, as I've kind of intimated at the start, I would caution members with regard to the language that they are using.

I think that, in noting the time, I'm going to take up less of it given that 4:15 is coming imminently, and the hon. Minister of Children's Services, I hope everybody here understands, is the only one with the call.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have a feeling it's going to get a little quieter in here now for this round of my comments.

Just to clarify, we have made significant investments in this year's budget, and I do want to tie this to the budget and also respond to the question that the Member for Cardston-Siksika had raised, which is, you know: what is some of the misinformation that we've heard today so that we can get it on the record and clarify the record?

You know, the members opposite said that there's no support for educators, that there's no plan to create spaces, that there's no plan to move forward with reducing child care costs further. That couldn't be further from the truth. We signed an agreement with the federal government, unlike the members opposite, fought for a made-in-Alberta plan. We did not take the first offer that was slid across the desk, because that is not what Albertans sent us here to do.

So let's talk about this budget. This budget has over a billion dollars to invest in early learning and child care. [interjection] Absolutely.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and, through you, to the minister. Because you're speaking about how you're connecting to the budget, could you also speak about the incredible amount of consultation that you did? I know that much of that consultation came through my riding and many other ridings. It's really important to understand how those dollars were leveraged, especially because of the immense amount of consultation that you did.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: The minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, and thank you for that question. We took part in the first consultation in over a decade with child care operators. The MLA for Grande Prairie led a lot of that when it came to our legislation, but we also heard a lot about what people wanted to see in this plan, Mr. Speaker. We did in fact travel the province, again, and met with nonprofit and private operators alike so that we could make sure that we got this plan right.

This million dollars and this plan that we signed with the federal government, Mr. Speaker, despite what the member opposite said, absolutely do seek to create 42,500 spaces in the nonprofit and home-based sector alone, with additional growth being required. We need the growth in the private sector as well, because we know the innovation and high quality that many of those programs provide. We need that if we want to meet the terms of the agreement with the federal government, and that is right in the plan. We are committed to looking at the wage grid and: how can we do a better job of recruiting and retaining in a time when we're going to see huge economic growth?

We're already seeing the job growth, Mr. Speaker. We know that there's going to be a labour market shortage, so how can we do things better to bring more early child educators into the field and keep them there? We are consulting on that because the answer isn't simple. It's not a one-size-fits-all. We want to be flexible, and the feedback we heard was diverse, so instead of moving ahead based on our own thoughts or ideology, unlike what we saw from the members opposite, we're continuing to listen. We do have $1 billion to invest, and I just do want to clarify one thing. One thing I just want to end on is that, unlike the members opposite – borrow, tax, spend; borrow, tax, spend; borrow, tax, spend – this budget is a good budget.

I was sent here on behalf of my constituents to deliver a balanced budget, investing in things that matter to Albertans like child care, health care, education, and a balanced budget. We didn't sign on the dotted line, but, Mr. Speaker, there is one taxpayer here. One taxpayer. These are good investments on behalf of the people of Alberta.

Thank you for the opportunity to correct the record.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, Minister.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has the call.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As you can see, the United Conservatives like to pat themselves on the back and claim that this budget actually serves Albertans. But I can tell you something: there are a number of Albertans out there that aren't patting this government on the back. That's for sure. That's for sure. Now, I know that the members opposite like to claim that they're listening to all Albertans, but you know what I would say? They only like to listen to the Albertans that actually support their own ideological perspective.

Mr. McIver: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. minister has called a point of order.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. McIver: Clearly, under Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j), the member opposite said that our party, our side, only likes to listen to people that agree with us, Mr. Speaker. That's entirely not true. Under (h) and (i) it's a false and unavowed motive applied to another member. It's "abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder."

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister. I appreciate the comments.

I think I'm prepared. However, if somebody does want to . . .

Mr. Sabir: It's not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker: That is what I'm going to say as well.

The hon. member can please continue with the call.

Debate Continued

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. But that's what we can expect from this government, because when they don't like the truth being stated inside of this House, they simply like to heckle. They like chirping over there, just like you can hear them right now, right? The reality is that they're not listening to all Albertans, because if they were actually listening to all Albertans . . . [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, as you know, I always try to be as unbiased as possible in here, but during the previous speaker there were some comments being made that made it difficult for me to hear the debate. The only member with the call right now is the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Please continue.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You see, that's the problem. They like to overshoot, and they just think that if it doesn't fit with their ideological perspective, then it doesn't deserve any time of day. [interjections] You know, the members on the other side: there they are heckling again. Heckling again, just like they always do in this House, right?

So this is the truth: we have been elected to be inside this House and represent all Albertans. When I come into this House and I express opinions – you know what? I'll qualify this even further, Mr. Speaker. I know that the members on the other side of the House are getting the same e-mails I'm getting because they're copied on them. They're copied on them. So how can they claim to be listening to all Albertans when Albertans are saying that their insurance is going up? Insurance is going up, utilities are going up, and life is becoming more unaffordable for Albertans with this particular budget.

You know, they got this windfall – they got this windfall – and they could have applied it and actually made some decisions that were actually better for Albertans. But they chose, "No; we're going to stick to our own plan; we're going to do what we want to do, our ideological perspective," which, as I've said in this House a number of times, Mr. Speaker, is completely outdated, this trickle-down theory that giving money and perks to the most wealthy in our society is somehow going to create more and more jobs for Albertans. What we're seeing: we're seeing part-time jobs. We're seeing part-time jobs at Walmart. You know, I have nothing against Walmart. I personally don't like going there myself, but I'll tell you this. The people who are working at Walmart, in jurisdictions even outside of Alberta, don't have enough money. They actually have to go to the food bank because they don't make enough money.

Now, you apply the fact that this Conservative government is actually giving perks and money away to big corporations, and then on top of that, Mr. Speaker, as if bad didn't come to worse, they have the perspective that they're going to take benefits away from workers, good-paying union jobs where people get additional benefits, which is a part of the way that they're remunerated. They're going to take those away. You have one policy with another policy, so when holistically you start looking at the policies of Conservative governments, you see that they're actually disadvantaging, creating disadvantage for Albertans. They like to call themselves the party that's bringing back the Alberta advantage. [some applause]

The Acting Speaker: Order. Order.

With limited time available, the hon. member.

Member Loyola: This is the kind of clowning around that these members like to do inside of this House, Mr. Speaker. This is the kind of clowning around that they like to do, because anybody who gets up and actually debates against their perspective . . .

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, I was listening, and I'm going to say right now that there is not a point of order from what I heard. I was listening very carefully.

Mr. Schow: I called a point of order on that member.

The Acting Speaker: I will listen to this one, then, because I was listening to the member. I don't have the benefit of the Blues, and I think that, actually, from what I just stated, I can't call a point of order on something that I didn't hear. I know that we are short on time with regard to this because 4:15 is coming up quick. Please do not use a point of order for the purposes of potentially joining debate. However, I recognize that that wasn't your intention. It still does not discount the ruling that I have.

The hon. member.

Member Loyola: Mr. Speaker, this government, this UCP government, is creating more and more disadvantage for Albertans. They're making life less and less and less affordable with the decisions that they've made. They've made insurance go up. They've made utilities go up. And what they're replacing it with is part-time jobs for Albertans. What Albertans truly need is full-time, mortgage-paying jobs, ones that they know they can rely on. They need jobs that are going to be able to provide benefits for them and their families, for their children. That is real advantage. You can bet that in 2023, when this next election happens, we're going to be on that side of the House to actually come through with a plan that will provide advantage for all Albertans in this province.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member because I was enjoying the debate today. I could have sat here for hours, actually, with the way things were going. However, unfortunately, the time is 4:15. I hesitate, of course, to interrupt the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, but in accordance with Standing Order 64(5) the chair is required to put the question to the House on every appropriation bill standing on the Order Paper for third reading.

Bill Status Report for the 30th Legislature - 3rd Session (2022)

Activity to Thursday, March 24, 2022

The Bill sponsor's name is in brackets following the Bill title. If it is a money Bill, ($) will appear between the title and the sponsor's name. Numbers following each Reading refer to Hansard pages where the text of debates is found; dates for each Reading are in brackets following the page numbers. Bills numbered 1 to 200 are Government Bills. Bills numbered 201 or higher are Private Members' Public Bills. Bills numbered with a "Pr" prefix are Private Bills.

* An asterisk beside a Bill number indicates an amendment was passed to that Bill; the Committee line shows the precise date of the amendment.

The date a Bill comes into force is indicated in square brackets after the date of Royal Assent. If a Bill comes into force "on proclamation," "with exceptions," or "on various dates," please contact Legislative Counsel, Alberta Justice, for details at 780.427.2217. The chapter number assigned to the Bill is entered immediately following the date the Bill comes into force. SA indicates Statutes of Alberta; this is followed by the year in which it is included in the statutes, and its chapter number. Please note, Private Bills are not assigned chapter number until the conclusion of the Fall Sittings.

1:30 p.m.

Monday, March 28, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interest and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Hon. members, we will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by Ms Brooklyn Elhard. I invite you to join in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all of us command.
With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
The True North strong and free!
From far and wide, O Canada,
We stand on guard for thee.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Members, seated in the members' gallery are special guests of the Minister of Education. A very warm welcome to Gabe Williams and Amelie Williams, who are seated in the members' gallery with their mom, Nicole Williams, chief of staff to the minister.

Also seated in the galleries are Mary Velthuisen, Kayla Quiring, and Haley Quiring. I'd like you all to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Human Trafficking Task Force Report

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday Alberta's government officially accepted the final report, The Reading Stone: The Survivor's Lens to Human Trafficking, from the Human Trafficking Task Force.

First, I would like to praise and acknowledge the Human Trafficking Task Force for the work they've done over the last several months. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank Paul Brandt. His profile, his experience, and his commitment to the cause made him an ideal candidate to serve as chair. Joining Mr. Brandt on the task force was a group of individuals with decades of experience in law enforcement and social work: Heather Forsyth, the former Alberta Solicitor General and former Minister of Children's Services; Jan Fox, the executive director of REACH Edmonton; Dale McFee, the Edmonton Police Service's chief of police; Douglas Reti, the former senior executive director general of RCMP Indigenous relations services; Patricia Vargas, the director of Catholic Social Services; and Tyler White, the CEO of Siksika Health Services.

Their final report is the result of months and months of often difficult but ultimately productive and extremely valuable work. Mr. Speaker, the task force liaised with experts and thought leaders from around the world and listened to presentations from nearly 100 individuals and organizations who shared upsetting, often first-hand details of one of the fastest growing crimes in Canada.

Alberta's Human Trafficking Task Force has compiled several calls to action that will make it more difficult for this horrific crime to continue and, just as importantly, will empower the survivors of human trafficking to recover from their own experiences and see justice done. One of their main recommendations, for instance, is to create an Alberta office to combat trafficking in persons. This office would be established as a partnership between government and community. It would provide support and access to services to victims and survivors of human trafficking.

All told, Mr. Speaker, the report contains 19 calls to action, 18 of which our government has already accepted or has accepted in principle. It will be a challenge, but it's vital that we all rise to meet it. Once again I want to reiterate my gratitude to the task force and each member for their work on this important issue.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

2017 UCP Leadership Contest and 2022 Review

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, no one is surprised that someone currently caught up in an investigation by the RCMP for their leadership race is again raising countless corruption red flags around their leadership review. For those who don't recall, the Premier won the leadership race for the UCP over the newly elected MLA for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche, but he couldn't win without becoming wrapped up in an RCMP investigation around allegations of fraud, forgery, bribery, and propping up a kamikaze candidate to help him defeat that opponent. Shortly after becoming the Premier, he fired the Election Commissioner, who was also looking into his leadership campaign. The commissioner was fired after placing over $200,000 in fines around that highly suspect UCP leadership race.

This Premier also changed election laws by allowing wealthy friends to buy over 400 party memberships a year for their closest friends, co-workers, employees, or whoever's information they have on hand without getting that individual's consent. The Premier legalized the exact corrupt practice he was already being investigated for.

Albertans cannot trust this Premier to run a fair leadership review, and he's made a mess of Alberta's election finance laws. Now, each and every one of us has heard the anger UCP members have with this Premier's shenanigans, rule change after rule change to help the Premier prevent an almost inevitable defeat at his leadership review – well, inevitable if it was run fairly. Just yesterday we learned that the increase in memberships is from the Premier's organizers securing thousands of memberships in bulk, again likely without the knowledge and consent of individuals who are now members.

We cannot trust this Premier anymore, and that's why my colleague is calling for the RCMP to look into these allegations with the upcoming leadership review. UCP members deserve to determine their own leader. This Premier is up to old Tory tricks. A decade ago we had ghosts on government planes; now we have phantom party members, and it's not lost on me that both haunted Premiers like to hang out in the sky palace. Here's hoping the UCP caucus can finally make the change Albertans deserve.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

School Construction in Sherwood Park

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There are exciting times ahead for the children and parents within my constituency of Sherwood Park. The balanced budget presented last month has introduced funding to begin the design process for a new school in Sherwood Park. This new school would replace Sherwood Heights and l'école Campbelltown and provide children in Sherwood Park with a new school facility in which they can grow and thrive.

Mr. Speaker, there are a few groups and individuals I would like to thank for advocating strongly for this funding, that will ensure the best for the students of Sherwood Park. I would like to thank Pine Steet, Brentwood, and Westboro elementary schools as well as Sherwood Heights junior high school and l'école Campbelltown parents for their advocacy for a new school, which has made this investment a reality. The dedication of these parents to the children's success is inspiring and admirable.

Next I would like to thank the Elk Island public school board trustees and their chair, Trina Boymook. This group of parents and community leaders has been working tirelessly to ensure that the best educational experience is provided to the children of Sherwood Park.

Last but certainly not least I would like to thank the principals of Sherwood Heights and l'école Campbelltown schools. Mr. Amit Mali, principal of Sherwood Heights, and Mr. Greg Probert, principal of l'école Campbelltown, are two individuals who are invaluable members of the Sherwood Park community. Their dedication along with the dedication of the school's administration and teaching staff ensures that the children of Sherwood Park receive the quality education that will set them up for success in the years to come.

Mr. Speaker, we love and support public education. Thank you very much.

2017 UCP Leadership Contest and 2022 Review

Mr. Deol: The allegations made concerning UCP election practices are deeply concerning. The idea that anyone in the UCP would think it's okay to use someone's ID without their knowledge to acquire their vote is horrible. It's corrupt, and it cuts directly against the democratic values that come with being in Canada. The idea that anyone in the UCP would think it's okay to take advantage of those with a language barrier to win a political contest is simply disgusting, but sadly this is where we are with this Premier and those around him.

The RCMP has been investigating the leadership race that elected the Premier for over three years now: allegations of fake e-mails, stolen personal identification numbers, the use of software to hide where votes were being cast, and stolen votes. People have found out from the media and the RCMP that votes were cast in their names using e-mails that weren't theirs. The Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation, the Minister of Infrastructure, the Minister of Seniors and Housing, the Minister of Community and Social Services, the former Minister of Culture, the deputy House leader, and the Member for Sherwood Park were also questioned by the RCMP in this investigation.

But it hasn't stopped there. Only last week we heard a disturbing allegation that people supporting a candidate in the UCP leadership review were approaching certain companies to get copies of identification to attach to membership forms, likely to get ballots. I deeply hope that this allegation is false.

This Premier likes to pride himself as an ally of ethnic communities. He calls himself the Minister of Curry in a Hurry. Not fear, not smear: serious allegations have been investigated by Canadian police since this Premier has been in office. If this Premier has any real respect for these communities and their families, who make their home there, he will stand today and condemn anyone who attempts to campaign like this. He will welcome transparency into his party to ensure that this isn't happening, and he will do it now. I hope the Premier does the right thing.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week your United Conservative government voted for Budget 2022, and for the first time since 2014 I can say this: the budget is balanced. Now – and this is very important – the budget is balanced on the projection of $70 oil. For context, right now western Canadian select is about 100 bucks; WTI is about $114. This is important because it shows that our government is not gambling with any high oil price lottery windfall to balance the budget. At $70 oil a balanced budget is no fluke.

In fact, if we kept spending on the trajectory of the NDP budgets, today we would have a $6.5 billion deficit, meaning even more debt that would have to be paid off unfairly by future generations like my son and daughter. Don't ever forget that the NDP added over $70 billion in new debt, which still has to be paid off, still has to be financed. All they did was make a bunch of bankers rich and effectively bankrupted our province. The NDP drove away hundreds of billions of dollars of investment. All those jobs and people forced to leave the province: I met many of these families and their hard-knock stories while door-knocking in Calgary-Currie. Possibly worst of all, under the NDP the GDP shrank, which ironically made us more reliant on oil and gas royalties to pay for social programs, AISH, schools, and health care.

Mr. Speaker, there is good news in our balanced budget. Revenue increased across all sectors of the economy: manufacturing, fintech, venture capital, film and television, energy, hydrogen, agriculture. All this means real economic diversification. We are also spending the most ever in history on our children's education, and to support our world-class health care system, we did something the NDP never did and – let's be honest – they never would: we brought fiscal responsibility back to the province. We did what Albertans asked. We balanced the budget.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Official Opposition Policies

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. While the UCP is making memes celebrating interpersonal violence and ruining Alberta's international reputation in environmental, social, and corporate governance, the NDP has been working with Albertans to build excellent policies focused on Alberta's future. Over the last year albertasfuture.ca has had over 75,000 Albertans participate in consultations focused on where the Alberta economy needs to go and building a path to get us there.

Many of the policies have been announced before the government has been able to even cobble together anything, and policies such as our hydrogen policy are described by industry as more detailed, thoughtful, and realistic than UCP policies. The tech industry has celebrated our Alberta investor tax credit policy, that was created after extensive consultation on albertasfuture.ca. Most recently our significant consultation process has led to a private member's bill calling for race-based data collection.

Occasionally we have seen the government borrow from our policy website, but we encourage Albertans to go directly to the source. At albertasfuture.ca you will find policies on economic expansion, agricultural innovation, infrastructure development, affordable child care, protection of the eastern slopes, renewable energy, postsecondary education, tourism, hydrogen, lithium, making life more affordable, and many others.

Albertans want a government that is focused on building our province, not a government that wastes its time on internal fighting day after day. While this government is wasting $82,000 a day on a useless war room that hasn't produced anything of value in over three years, albertasfuture.ca has produced dozens of policies that will make life better for all of us. We will help you fight inflation by reindexing personal income tax and seniors' benefits, we will create new jobs in the fast-growing tech, agriculture, and renewable energy sectors, and we protect the history and the environment, on which we all depend.

Albertans, join us at albertasfuture.ca.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

COVID-19 Vaccination

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Over the last year there was a disproportionate amount of interest in my health by the mainstream media and the NDP. Heck, even one of the members hacked into the public health care system. Given his position with the NDP it begs the question if the leader actually put him up to it.

In contrast, I maintained that people's choices for vaccination were their own and that they would do what's right for their families, their communities, and themselves with the information that was made available. When it comes to personal health information, in my opinion, the only thing a waitress or a server should be asking you when they're taking your order for a burger is, "Do you want fries with that?" not what your health history is.

I never asked for a QR code. I paid for my own testing results, that were showing negative. My family and I, back in January 2020, had COVID, so I had much interest in the serology test results as they became available. As a private pilot I have to complete a medical performed every two years. The medical includes an ECG, all relevant blood work, vision, et cetera. It served as a baseline for my health postvaccination as I passed my flight medical with no issues at all.

The same day as my medical I had my first shot of Pfizer. Though I didn't believe I needed it because my immune system is working fine, I did it anyway for a couple of reasons. One was to be able to document my own health information, serology, and potential side effects first-hand. The second was so that I didn't lose my voice in this place. The rhetoric and the mainstream media pressure of last fall was in hyperdrive, pitting Albertans against one another, and I didn't want to lose the ability to speak for those people that made their own choices.

Postinjection I was sick in bed for two days. Over the next three months I had progressive health issues, losing function in my right shoulder, pains in my left jaw, pain in my left side, chest pains, severe aches and pains in my legs. Postinjection serology showed that I'd posted 197 out of a possible 250. I saw my doc on the 22nd, seeking help. In the examinations he saw my health declining and ordered immediate workups. He found that I had a partially collapsed lung, which was causing the chest pains, but no heart damage because of the blood work.

To put it in short, Mr. Speaker, there are way more than 2,000 people out there suffering. If you're having issues with people listening to you, send it to me. I'll see what I can do.

Ukraine Donations

Mr. Bilous: A lot of times in this Chamber people stand up and talk about the things they don't like, the people they disagree with, and the topics we can't align on. But sometimes we get to come together to work on a common cause. Today is one of those days.

A little while ago something really meaningful started to take shape. Two former members of this House dedicated to stand up for what they believe in asked us all for some help. Former Premier Ed Stelmach and former Deputy Premier Thomas Lukaszuk put out a call to action to help Ukraine, and Albertans answered.

More than a thousand Ukrainians fleeing their ravaged homeland are set to arrive here in Edmonton today on a flight supported by donations from LOT Polish Airlines and Shell Canada, with hosts awaiting them in Alberta and Saskatchewan. Proving that politicians of all stripes can work together on important things, Lukaszuk and Stelmach worked with Deputy Prime Minister Chrystia Freeland to identify those who could come to Canada on that plane, entirely free of charge. Once they land, after the passengers depart, the plane will be stocked with donations organized with help from the Ukrainian Canadian Congress and the Canadian Polish Historical Society as well as people from all over Alberta. Donations heading back to the war-torn region will include essential supplies such as emergency medical equipment, items for seniors, and items such as sleeping bags and other outdoor survival equipment.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, Ed Stelmach is of Ukrainian heritage. Thomas Lukaszuk lived under martial law in Poland. This is a personal effort for both the organizers and those who have donated. I want to thank all members of this Chamber who collected or made donations to help the people of Ukraine. Albertans' hearts are with Ukraine and with those going through unimaginable trauma fleeing a war zone while missing their families, their homes, and their country.

This is an important initiative, and I want to thank these two former members for this important work, helping a thousand Ukrainians, and the many Albertans opening up their homes and hearts. But there is more to be done, and I'm calling on the provincial and federal governments to step up and do more for people who need their help. [Remarks in Ukrainian]

1:50

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Ukrainian Refugees

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Thanks to the generosity and support of donors, corporate partners, organizations like the Ed Stelmach Community Foundation, and volunteers like former Premier Stelmach and former Deputy Premier Lukaszuk, tonight about 400 Ukrainians will arrive in this province after fleeing war with Russia. Albertans are united behind the people of Ukraine, and they are fighting this conflict with compassion. This may be the first plane, but we all know it likely will not be the last. My question to the Premier is: has he been advised on how many more Ukrainian refugees are expected to arrive in Alberta? Is there a number he's preparing for?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. Leader of the Opposition for the very relevant and thoughtful question as well as for the statement from her colleague. No, I have not received information from the government of Canada on an estimate although I have heard that approximately 30,000 temporary resident visas have been issued under the special federal program by the Minister of Immigration, Refugees and Citizenship Canada. We can certainly expect more, and we have certainly indicated that Alberta would be delighted to receive and help settle a disproportionate number of those individuals. They will overwhelmingly be women and children as men under the age of 65 are not permitted to leave the country, and we will be there to do everything we can to support them.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much for that answer, and I want to acknowledge that Alberta has been providing both humanitarian and nonlethal aid on an overseas basis. Beyond that, though, as folks arrive, we must do work to prepare with our immigrant settlement agencies. I know that when we engaged with settling 4,000 Syrian refugees, that work was complex as we had challenges related to trauma and integration. As such, at the time we increased funding for settlement by about 30 per cent. Has the Premier considered targeting more funding to settlement agencies to help meet these challenges?

Mr. Kenney: I thank the Leader of the Opposition for another good question on this, Mr. Speaker. The answer is yes. When refugees are resettled, as government-assisted refugees they are typically supported by the government of Canada, including through the refugee assistance program and their funding to immigrant settlement organizations. However, these folks coming from Ukraine are not classically de jure refugees. They are, rather, temporary residents, and therefore there is no automatic federal support for them either through RAP or the settlement organizations. We are prepared to provide that support should it be necessary. We're working with the settlement organizations on . . .

The Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you again for that answer. We know this is the largest displacement of people since World War II, almost 4 million people. Imagine the population of our entire province fleeing war and violence, folks curled up in train stations and humanitarian aid tents and evacuation convoys, hoping for the chance to come to places like Canada. This pressure means we're going to have to look at support services in other areas like mental health counselling and schooling and health care. To the Premier: what type of work is being done now to prepare our children's supports, social services, education system for the arrival that we are anticipating?

The Speaker: The Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I can inform the House that the government, through the Department of Culture, has already provided $350,000 to the Canadian Ukrainian Congress, Alberta chapter, partly to help with their efforts to begin welcoming those individuals. I think many of them could be provided special support through the community that speaks their language and is familiar with their culture and context. But we certainly are working across departments and ministries to prepare for the additional kinds of social services that will be required by this population, that has been traumatized.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition for her second set of questions.

Ms Notley: Well, change of pace, Mr. Speaker. Last week our party put forward ideas to protect Albertans facing utility shut-off because they can't pay their bills, to prevent coal mining in the eastern slopes, and to create more jobs in the tech sector. Meanwhile this UCP government is collapsing: shocking court documents, leaked recordings, more allegations of wrong-doing and corruption, a Premier who, in his own words, calls his party an asylum and his members, quote, lunatics. My question is simple: when does this end? How much longer do Albertans have to put up with this callous, corrupt, and chaotic government?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, that's all ridiculous, and that word I was applying to people we have not permitted to run for us because of extreme views outside of the mainstream of Alberta politics. This government is leading Canada in economic growth, in job creation, almost historic diversification across our economy, which is why last week we passed through this place the first balanced budget in 14 years, a government that has kept 88 per cent of our campaign commitments. I understand why the NDP is concerned, because they're now falling behind in the polls, because Albertans want a government focused, like they are, on economic growth, jobs, and pipelines.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, the allegations of corruption are actually coming from inside the Premier's own party. This weekend we learned more details about the alleged fraudulent actions undertaken by the Premier's 2017 leadership campaign; you know, the one under RCMP investigation, where the Premier was apparently interviewed. These details included the wholesale acquisition of ideas to create fake members and log fake votes. Today we wrote to the RCMP and asked them to keep an eye on the April 9 leadership vote. Does the Premier support this call, and if not, can he explain why he feels he's above the law?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, the NDP tried all the same fear and smear in the last election, and you know what it got them? The first majority government to be defeated after just one term, and this government secured a million votes for the first time ever in Alberta electoral history. While the NDP talks about internal party democracy, maybe she can explain to us why it is that 25 per cent of the votes in the NDP leadership elections is reserved for Gil McGowan and his union boss friends as opposed to regular NDP members. Is that why they call it the New Democratic Party?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, the Premier keeps claiming he has nothing to do with this stuff – deny, deny, deny, deflect – except we also now have sworn statements from his former associates made to a public investigator, you know, the one they fired, saying that when it comes to the kamikaze campaign, he was in the room. He gave the orders, he talked about the money, he poured the Dark Horse. These allegations of illegality keep coming one after the other after the other. My question is this: is the least trusted Premier in Canada really saying that it's everybody else being dishonest, not him?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the NDP is becoming so politically desperate that they're now resorting to citing somebody who was prohibited from running for the UCP because his campaign team physically assaulted a journalist to the point of unconsciousness. Now, that's just about what you would expect from the NDP, who had one of their members break the law to seek to violate my personal privacy and who did violate the privacy of another Alberta citizen. That was acceptable in the NDP because of the campaign of personal destruction led by their leader.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I stand here today on behalf of our democracy. Albertans should be able to vote their conscience and do so free from intimidation and coercion. This Premier has thrown all of that into question. The allegations of what happened in the 2017 UCP leadership race and what is happening now during the current UCP leadership review undermine trust and confidence in our elections. Can the Premier assure this House here and now that no vote will be cast in the UCP leadership review without an Albertan's consent?

The Speaker: You know, I take a fairly wide swath of questions about government policy. I find it very difficult to find that that particular question had anything to do with government policy, more an internal party matter that is to take place. If the Premier would like to respond, he's welcome to; if not, we'll move on.

Mr. Kenney: Yeah. Mr. Speaker, every member in the United Conservative Party will get a secure mail ballot, handled by an internationally recognized auditing firm, with scrutineers overseeing the whole process, unlike the NDP. When they have a leadership election, according to their constitution 25 per cent of the votes are reserved for big union bosses, for Gil McGowan. Maybe the leader of the NDP could tell us: what deals did she make with Gil McGowan to secure his 25 per cent of supervotes, which they have in their twisted, nondemocratic NDP system?

Mr. Sabir: The problem, Mr. Speaker, is that no one trusts this Premier. So many in his own party believe that he won the leadership of the party using corrupt practices. We know that the investigation into that corruption is still ongoing, and today we learned that the Premier was interviewed by the RCMP in regard to this matter. Can the Premier tell this House here and now when he was questioned by the RCMP and why he waited until today to make this public, and can he also update this House on which ministers and staff have also been questioned as part of this investigation?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, you know, the Election Commissioner and the office of the electoral officer investigated these allegations, and you know who were fined? You know who were fined? The two people that they are citing as sources; one of whose campaign team physically assaulted a journalist to the point of unconsciousness. This is classic politics of personal destruction from the same NDP whose ethics critic violated the law by seeking to violate my personal privacy. Why do they do this?

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, the Premier plays games instead of giving real answers. He treats these questions as if they are not legitimate when our democracy and free and fair elections are being called into question.

Today I have written to the RCMP to urgently request that they immediately expand the scope of their investigation into the 2017 UCP leadership contest to include the current 2022 UCP leadership review. Will the Premier commit to supporting the request by also writing a letter to the RCMP and urging them to expand the scope of their investigation?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, this is exactly the pattern of the politics of personal destruction that leads the NDP ethics critic to believe that it is right and justified to clearly violate the law in order to violate my personal privacy. They are reckless about this.

But here's the good news. Albertans observed their politics of fear, smear, and personal destruction in the spring of 2019, and they sent the job-killing, high-tax NDP packing. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order.

Premier's Office Staff Political Activity

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, during my time as minister I was proud to work with dedicated public servants who devoted their time working for Albertans. This government's approach seems different. During a time when Albertans have been hammered with a cost-of-living crisis by this government, the Premier is telling his staff that it's more important to help him keep his job as party leader than it is to help struggling families and businesses. He's been dispatching more and more of his staff to campaign for him even if it means the normal work of the Premier's office is sitting undone. Can the Premier confirm how many staff have stopped working for Albertans and are instead working to save his career?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'll tell you what. If the NDP wants a new rule where no political staff ever work on political campaigns, they should tell us.

But, Mr. Speaker, I'll tell you this. On the cost of living – on the cost of living – we are going through 30-year-high inflation. Food prices are up 18 per cent since the NDP brought in its carbon tax, and right now they are cheering on their ally Justin Trudeau to raise the carbon tax by another 25 per cent on April Fool's Day and by 400 per cent over the next eight years. That would cost the average family $2,000 a year. Will the NDP vote with us to stop the April 1 carbon tax hike?

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, I asked a straightforward question.

Now, when this government promised to be laser focused on jobs in the last campaign, we didn't know the Premier meant laser focused on his own job. I'm hearing daily from Albertans scared about making ends meet, who are seeing utility bills skyrocket month after month, with no support. Weirdly, not a single constituent has stopped me worried about this leader's campaign and his political fortunes. Can the Premier explain why keeping his leadership is more important to him than supporting Alberta families? How much of the job of Premier is going undone as he spends his time campaigning?

Mr. Kenney: You know, Mr. Speaker, this government is spending its time balancing the budget, growing the economy, creating jobs, and, yes, reducing the cost of living for Albertans, which is why on April 1 we will suspend the Alberta fuel tax, saving $1.4 billion for Albertans on an annual basis, in addition to the $150 electricity rebate – together, $1.7 billion of consumer relief – while the NDP is cheering on their ally Justin Trudeau to raise the carbon tax by 25 per cent later this week.

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, the Premier keeps saying that it's very normal for his staff to be staffing call centres for his leadership campaign. It is not normal. The government is not the Premier's reserve campaign team. It is not a taxpayer-funded call centre to bail him out of the situation he created. Phone calls are not being answered, e-mails are not being responded to, and concerned Albertans are feeling abandoned during this cost-of-living crisis that the UCP government has created. What do Albertans desperate for help who want to raise concerns have to do to be heard? Buy a UCP membership? Oh, wait; someone already did that for them.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I distinctly recall at my by-election, in December 2017, seeing so many cars with Legislature parking passes as NDP staffers drove down to Calgary-Lougheed. They'd never been there. They don't spend a lot of time in the Calgary suburbs, but they did that day, and they were probably still on the public payroll, unlike a handful of staff who have taken a leave of absence, an unpaid leave of absence.

The NDP is standing here telling us that they are cheering on the 25 per cent increase in the carbon tax on April 1. Will they stand and vote with us to tell Trudeau to scrap it?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Utility and Fuel Costs

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The rising cost of everything from food to fuel and electricity has put pressure on individuals and families across the province. People in Brooks-Medicine Hat are suffering from price hikes to essential and everyday items, and households are not able to budget like they used to. The cost of living is becoming overwhelmingly unbearable. Albertans are wondering how they can continue to make ends meet, especially with rising fuel prices. To the Premier: what measures are being implemented to reduce the price Albertans are paying at the pump?

Mr. Kenney: I thank the Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat for her good question, Mr. Speaker. With inflation at a 30-year high and fuel costs going up because of the carbon tax, we need to take real action, which is why this government is stepping up with by far the boldest cost relief of any government in Canada effective April 1, reducing the provincial fuel tax by 100 per cent, 13 cents a litre. That will save Albertans on an annualized basis, if prices stay high, $1.4 billion. Unfortunately, some of that will be lost to the Trudeau carbon tax unless he . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Premier. Given that the cost of electricity has also continued to rise in recent months, partly due to the failed policies of the previous NDP government, in which electricity hit its highest prices ever, and given that our government is taking action to provide relief for families from fuel prices, to the Premier: what measures are being implemented to help Albertans who have faced and continue to face high utility bills this year?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately, Albertans are paying for the NDP's huge energy policy mistakes. That's why we've seen electricity inflation. They spent 7 and a half billion dollars on additional transmission. They wasted $1.3 billion on their power purchasing agreement fiasco. They stopped the cheapest and most reliable baseload power in our thermal coal plants and then conspired with Justin Trudeau on their carbon tax. We're taking real action to protect Albertans from the costs of all of those bad policies with a $150 rebate that will be on their electricity bills as soon as possible. That's worth $300 million to $400 million of relief . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Premier. Given that these relief measures are helping Albertans through a volatile period but there's still federal legislation that affects us all and given that the federal government has a plan to continue to increase the carbon tax on fuel on April 1 in perpetuity and further given that this will only create more financial pain for Albertans, to the Premier: what will the government of Alberta do to try to stop the increase to the federal carbon tax and stand up for Alberta families?

The Speaker: The Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. The member is right. The Bank of Canada itself has said that the April 1 25 per cent increase in the Liberal-NDP carbon tax will raise inflation by another half a percentage point when inflation is already at a 30-year high. That is why we today have tabled a motion calling on the federal Liberal-NDP coalition to stop this scheduled increase. I've also signed a letter with the Premiers of Saskatchewan and Manitoba with the same call. Please, to Justin Trudeau, just show a bit of common sense and a little regard for people who can barely pay the bills today.

Premier's Leadership

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, on Thursday UCP MLAs heard what the Premier really thinks about them. In a recording the Premier describes his leadership review as, quote, the lunatics taking over the asylum, and described his opponents as: bugs attracted to the Premier's bright light. Earlier that day five UCP MLAs stood in front of the Legislature in protest to the Premier changing the rules. For the sake of those watching at home, can the Premier clarify which of his MLAs are lunatics, in his opinion? The MLA for Red Deer-South, Airdrie-Cochrane, Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul, Calgary-Fish Creek? Which is it, Premier?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, as the Premier already said today, some of the people that he was referring to are not members of our party and have not been allowed to run for our party, including a member, who the NDP are using as their source, whose campaign beat a member of the press to unconsciousness. Shame on the NDP. Let me tell you, this side of this House is never going to be lectured by that member, who referred to Albertans as sewer rats. Shame on her. She should never stand up in this place and try to lecture people on how to speak about Albertans after her despicable actions when she sat on this side of the House.

Ms Gray: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted is at 2:10.

Ms Hoffman: Given that Albertans are beyond exhausted with the unending drama and disrespect coming from the current government and given that the current Premier of the Divided Conservative Party is forcing government staff to campaign for him and given that 58 per cent of Albertans think it's time for this Premier to resign, can the Premier clarify for all Albertans who don't trust him or his leadership why he thinks we're the lunatics or bugs?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the desperation from the NDP is quite humorous. The more their polls go down, the more you're going to see this. This is the only playbook that the NDP has, complete fear and smear, trying to hide from the great things that are taking place inside this province. But don't worry; we're not going to fall for it, and Albertans can rest assured that this side of the House is going to stay united and make sure people like that never get power again inside this province.

Ms Gray: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 2:11.

Ms Hoffman: Given that the current Premier fired the Culture minister after she criticized him for his sky palace patio party but given that the Premier stands behind his liquor cabinet and will defend them to the bitter end – like the Health minister, who shouted at doctors in his driveway in front of his family, like the Justice minister, who tried to interfere with the administration of justice, and then there’s the Minister of Environment and Parks – since the current Premier cares more about loyalty than the ministers being competent at their jobs, will the Premier admit that he believes his own UCP MLAs are the lunatics and bugs? Or why won’t he kick those guys out of cabinet and put in . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the deputy leader of a party who hid the Member for Edmonton-South hacking members of this party’s personal records, their health records, who has had, on top of RCMP investigations – there’s only one party in this House who has had their doors kicked in by the RCMP with search warrants. You will continue to see this behaviour from the NDP because – you know why? – they’re losing and they’re desperately panicking as their poll numbers go down. This side of the House, though, is not going to focus on junior high politics because we came here to make life better for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton–City Centre.

Cancer Care and Medical Physicists in Calgary

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The UCP’s war on health care continues to harm Albertans and their families. At the Tom Baker cancer centre in Calgary a quarter of the facility’s medical physicists have resigned, including the program director. Two more are expected to leave soon. These highly trained specialists are a critical part of the care team for cancer patients in Alberta. Why is the Minister of Health putting Albertans with cancer at risk by driving these essential health care professionals away?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’d like to thank the hon. member for the question. These medical physicists play an important part in providing cancer care to Albertans, but I’d like to set the facts straight. There is an issue in regard to personnel. There are currently four vacancies out of 22 positions in Calgary. I’ve been speaking with AHS. They have a plan to be able to fill those vacancies and work with the University of Calgary to be able to hire more. But let me be clear. This will not impact treatment for cancer patients now, nor in the future. We will get this solved.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that if there was not a problem, 24 physicians would not have tried to speak out and given that if there was not a problem, this government would not have tried to muzzle those doctors at the cancer centre by telling them not to speak with reporters and given that a letter signed by those doctors says, “We are concerned that we will be unable to provide our current standard of care or indeed any treatment; the safety of our routine daily cancer treatments are put at risk by a medical physics department that’s understaffed, overworked, and inexperienced,” does the minister understand that his failure to act highlights exactly why Albertans cannot trust the UCP on health care?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member may not know this, but AHS has already acted. So just to put this into context, we have 50 of these types of positions across the province. There is an issue in Calgary, which has been identified. AHS has already made an adjustment in pay to be able to better attract and retain, and they are working to be able to fill the four vacant positions. We understand how important these positions are. We’re working to fill them, and we’re also working with the University of Calgary to be able to create a pipeline for the future.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that if this government understood, we would not be repeatedly coming down to the wire with physicians in this province – the work done by these medical physicists is crucial to world-class care in Alberta, and they’re expecting that the Calgary cancer centre will deliver that – and given that the UCP hasn’t set aside a single dollar to staff that facility and given that now it seems this government can’t even hold on to the staff they have, will this minister admit responsibility for his failures, or will he simply admit that the Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock was right and their plan for the Calgary cancer centre was simply to have a fancy box?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as I already indicated, I’m very pleased with the work that’s going on in building the Calgary cancer centre. This will be one of the largest cancer centres in North America, and we have committed to be able to provide funding for the cancer centre. In fact, we have committed to increase the capacity of our entire health care: $600 million this year, $600 million next year and the year after that, an increase of $1.8 billion. We are making significant investment in terms of capital, and we have more health care professionals than ever in this province, 28,735 nurses, up to . . .

Mr. Loewen: In recently leaked remarks the Premier took a page out of his buddy Trudeau’s name-calling playbook and compared his opponents to, quote, bugs and lunatics, yet there’s been no apology for these disgraceful, dehumanizing remarks. The Premier’s complete focus on mudslinging means he’s failed to deliver on many items, including the Recall Act, which is still not in force. The result is a recent poll showing that a majority of Albertans from every region of the province want this Premier to resign. To the Premier: is it current government policy or just current practice to refer to 57 per cent of Calgarians and 62 per cent of Edmontonians wanting you to resign for failing to deliver on key promises as, quote, lunatics?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, that’s not what the government said at all. But I can tell you that what I heard from a lot of constituents about that member is his close friendship with Brian Jean, who’s called for a coalition with the NDP, similar to what we’ve seen in Ottawa. In fact, that member and his friend Brian Jean have called for putting the Leader of the Official Opposition, the NDP leader, into cabinet. So I guess my question to him: does he support her as well with mandatory vaccinations? And what’s next? He's going to stand in this place and call for door-to-door vaccinations like the Leader of the Official Opposition?

Mr. Loewen: Given that that's more fear and smear, just like the NDP, from that member and given that in the Premier's slanderous leak the Premier stated, I quote, the lunatics are trying to take over the asylum and given that the, quote, lunatics the Premier is referring to include duly elected members of the UCP caucus and cabinet and given that managing the asylum now takes up so much of the Premier's time that he has failed to deliver on a number of platform commitments, including the citizen's initiative bill which is still not in force, can the asylum operator please rise and tell us exactly how many lunatics are currently within the UCP caucus opposing this Premier and his practice of failing to deliver on key promises?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, again, the Premier was referring very clearly to people who are doing racist things and bringing forward hate, who have no space inside our party, not to our members or any members of the Legislative Assembly. But, again, I can't help but notice that the hon. member avoided the question. Does he support the Jean-NDP alliance? Yes or no? Is it part of his policy to bring the NDP into cabinet and force their disastrous policies on this Legislature and on the people of Alberta? Is he even going to stand up today and vote with them as they – I suspect the NDP will continue to support the Justin Trudeau carbon tax.

Mr. Loewen: Given that the minister continues to give misinformation and given that with the way things are going, the Leader of the Opposition won't need a kamikaze candidate in the next provincial election because she has this Premier and given how the Premier's failed leadership was felt in the most recent federal and municipal elections and given that this Premier is so wrapped up in his own drama and scorched earth politics that he can't get any work done for the people of Alberta, including failing to deliver on this government's fair deal agenda, to the Premier: were you really Alberta's kamikaze candidate all along, or is it just your government's policy to fail to deliver on key promises?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, while this hon. member focuses on playing junior high politics, this Premier and this government have been hard at work doing things like balancing the budget, restoring 130,000 jobs or so just recently, recovering all of the jobs lost by the NDP, on and on and on. While that member plays junior high politics and works on trying to develop his coalition with the NDP, like you see in Ottawa, and playing games inside this Legislature, this government is going to continue to go work every day for the people of Alberta.

Postsecondary Education Funding

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, if you looked out your windows at the Legislature today, you would have seen students coming forward on a day of action to fight for their own well-being. Investing in the postsecondary sector is a surefire way to grow our economy, to attract and retain brilliant people, and to build resilient and thoughtful communities. We need to equip future leaders with the tools necessary to thrive, not push them away. Students came here to demand an end to the cuts in postsecondary and to call on this government to reverse their disastrous decisions. What does this government have against students? Will the minister listen to them and restore funding to our postsecondaries, and if not, why not?

Mr. Nicolaidis: Well, Mr. Speaker, we have nothing against students. In fact, we're doing the opposite to implement many of the objectives and goals that students have asked us to implement. The students have asked us to provide more funding for low-income students; we've done that. The students have asked us to put more into work-integrated learning opportunities; we've done that. As well, we're providing over $171 million in new funding to create 7,000 additional spaces in our postsecondary institutions to ensure that every student has the opportunity to pursue . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Given that last year almost half of the provincial cuts to postsecondary were absorbed by the U of A to avoid harming students but there's only so much these universities can take and given that this year millions more were cut and given that this government has allowed tuition to increase anywhere from 17 to 105 per cent and given that these massive increases will deter students from coming here, therefore shrinking our talent pipeline, to the minister: will he recognize his actions are hurting students, businesses, and our economy and reverse these cuts already?

Mr. Nicolaidis: Mr. Speaker, as I've done, you know, numerous times in the House – I guess the member opposite hasn't heard that tuition in Alberta today is below the national average. I have to repeat it many times, but I just can't get through to the members opposite. You know, I have some fancy charts in my office as well I'd be happy to share with them to help highlight that information. As well, as I mentioned, we're providing $12 million over three years to support our existing scholarships as well as $15 million over three years to create new bursaries to assist low-income students.

Speaker's Ruling Gestures

The Speaker: I'm not entirely sure what sort of hand gestures the government deputy whip is making or the Opposition House Leader – you know who I'm talking to – but whatever this is, it's not appropriate inside the Assembly.

Mr. Bilous: Only the UCP would celebrate being average.

Given that Alberta already falls short of other provinces in offering financial aid and given that this government isn't even getting the student aid out the door to students and given that more young people are leaving Alberta, wanting to leave Alberta, or wanting to stay away from Alberta than in a generation, to the minister: is this government really going to stand there and claim their policies are working when it's so clear that they're driving future leaders out of the province?

Mr. Nicolaidis: Well, Mr. Speaker, that's not true, what the member opposite is suggesting there. You know, there have been some recent reports that I think the member is referring to from Can West and other organizations. I encourage the member to take a close look. There are a number of recommendations in there as to what the government can do to support postsecondary education, and in fact the government is already moving forward on many of those. It calls for greater investment into work-integrated learning; we're doing that. It calls for actually expanding apprenticeship education; we're doing that. We're taking these steps and more to ensure that our students here in Alberta are able to find the programming that they need right here at home.

Utility Costs

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, recently I received a message from Margaret. She has a child with a disability and cannot afford this month's gas bill. She's looking for assistance from this government, but all this government chose to do is create a fake gas rebate plan that won't impact her and doesn't come into effect until next year. I know that the associate minister is proud of his plan to do nothing for Albertans, but how can he hear this story of Margaret and refuse to do anything? Why do big-time CEOs get billions and Margaret gets nothing? She's drowning in debt, and this government won't lift a finger.

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you for the question, Mr. Speaker. First of all, we are empathetic with any Albertan that is struggling with the high cost of utilities. What I would encourage the member to do is to speak to that individual and let them know that there are options and there are supports. The place that they should start, because they don't have to do the work themselves: they can actually contact the Utilities Consumer Advocate. They can actually speak to people online, and they will give them advice not just on different contracts but also on the supports that are available for Albertans that are struggling. Again, that's the Utilities Consumer Advocate, and I advise the member to share that information.

Mr. Nielsen: How about a real gas rebate?

Given that another constituent of mine, Amerire, recently received a $500 electricity bill and given that rather than stepping up and helping these Albertans, the associate minister is high-fiving himself and boasting over a $50-a-month rebate – $50 – as in they're covering a measly 10 per cent, can the minister explain to my constituents: what are they supposed to do to cover the other 90 per cent? Take out a loan, another credit card, or sit in the dark freezing?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The fear on the other side of the House is just palpable. I guess they have access to the same polling data that we do.

Anyway, Mr. Speaker, I can only impress upon the member that we have brought in meaningful supports that will help Albertans, things like the $150 electricity rebate, cancelling the 13-cents-a-litre gas tax on April 1. But the number one thing that we can do to keep utility prices low is keep the NDP away from the natural gas and electricity grid. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, given that I have more stories for the minister, like my constituent Marilyn who got a $402 electricity bill, Charlene's bill has doubled, Danielle got a $246 bill for natural gas alone, and Lorrie a $300 electricity bill – these are real people with real struggles who can't make ends meet – what message does the associate minister have for all of these people? Will he finally take responsibility and commit to a real support program or pass the buck and ignore the concerns since he's done that since day one?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We certainly acknowledge and understand that electricity prices have been going up. We are in a time of real inflation driven in part by high energy prices. We're doing all we can to position Albertans well to deal with these higher costs, but what Albertans need to understand around electricity is the fact that as consumers we're all paying exponentially more today because of the failed policies of the members across the aisle. They added 7 and a half billion dollars of unnecessary transmission costs, prematurely paid out power purchase agreements, costing Albertans $1.3 billion, plus they brought in a carbon tax.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Postsecondary Education Funding and Programs

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta 2030: building skills for jobs strategy aims to improve student access, and the UCP government has shown a commitment to doing so by prioritizing targeted enrolment growth at postsecondary institutions with a strategic investment of $171 million in Budget 2022 to ensure students can meet labour market needs. To the Minister of Advanced Education: can you quantify the seat expansion the $171 million will create for Alberta students? In what programs will these seats become available and when?

Mr. Nicolaidis: Well, Mr. Speaker, great question, and, yes, happy to provide more details. The $171 million, the historic investment, in fact, that we're making over three years in Budget 2022, will create over 7,000 additional spaces in our postsecondary institutions and, just to be clear, more spaces than the NDP ever created when they were in government. We will create these seats in programs where there is additional demand, high-demand programs, including aviation, tech, health care, finance, engineering, and other areas, so that we can ensure that students are able to access in-demand programs.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that Budget 2022 provides over $600 million in additional funding over the next three years for Alberta at work to ensure access to postsecondary education opportunities and the fact that expanding work-integrated learning opportunities is a key component of the Alberta 2030 strategy, to the same minister: how will students have guaranteed access to work opportunities within the province both during and after their programs of study so they can remain right here in Alberta?

Mr. Nicolaidis: Another great question, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, you know, there are many recommendations from Can West and the Alberta Colleges Economic Recovery Task Force and many other organizations that have outlined the importance of strengthening work-integrated learning. We're listening to them, and we're doing precisely that. In fact, in this recent budget there's $6 million over three years to increase work-integrated learning opportunities. As well, we provided in previous years $15 million to create new internships with Mitacs. These internships and co-ops will help ensure students . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that a core part of Budget 2022, Alberta 2030, and Alberta's recovery plan is ensuring that individuals develop the skills needed to thrive in the workforce of today and given that the changing nature of work demands that people remain agile in learning and skills development, to the same minister: what pathways exist for students and workers who want to reskill, upskill in how to do microcredentials? How do these feature in Alberta's postsecondary degree landscape?

2:30

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Nicolaidis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member is bang on. You know, there are a number of reports, again, the Conference Board of Canada and other organizations, that point to the changing nature of work and point to the importance of fostering and developing reskilling opportunities within the province, so we're doing precisely that. Within this budget there's $8 million over three years to create additional microcredential programs. These will help all Albertans reskill and upskill for the new economy. As well, this past summer we announced new funding for additional microcredential programs.

Utility Costs (continued)

Member Loyola: Mr. Speaker, I'm honoured to represent the people of Edmonton-Ellerslie and bring concerns of my constituents into this Legislature. My constituents are struggling because of the decisions of this government which cause utilities to skyrocket. I hear from them every single day. Families cannot afford to wait. They should not have to choose between paying utilities and putting food on their table. My constituent Wanda e-mailed me and said, quote: something needs to be done to stop these fees; please explain to me how this is fair. End quote. To the minister: how is removing price caps and allowing prices to skyrocket fair to Wanda?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, thank you for the question. The member is absolutely right. On the fee side, costs have continued to go up. You know, during their time in government they spent $7.5 billion on transmission infrastructure, and now they want to gaslight all of us and ask: why are fees going up? Not only do Albertans have to pay off that $7.5 billion, but they also have to pay the carbon tax as well, that their friend Justin Trudeau will be increasing on April 1.

Member Loyola: Joy, a constituent, e-mailed my office and said, quote: the increase in costs right now is ridiculous; I want to know how these increases can be justified. End quote. Given that this UCP government does not recognize that skyrocketing electricity bills hurt Albertans and their families, especially those on fixed incomes, and given that they are delaying taking action and given that any of the programs they claim to have put in place are completely fake, can the minister justify these cost increases to Albertans like Joy?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, the member is correct, and their constituent is correct. Costs are rising. At the end of the day, there's one reason and one reason alone. That's because the NDP broke it. We are going to fix the issue that we have with transmission and distribution costs in this province, but it is going to be a longer term fix. While we're doing that, we have given all Albertans the $150 rebate to give them some short-term relief. Again, the best thing that we can do is to make sure that the NDP never gets near the natural gas or the electricity grid again.

Member Loyola: Not taking action is almost as bad as taking terrible action, and with this government it's always one or the other. Given that less money in the pockets of Albertans is less money that goes back into the local economy and given that in the fall the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity boasted in the Legislature that he would do nothing to help Albertans from massive price increases, will the associate minister acknowledge that the UCP government is responsible for this mess? Do the job of government, step up, lead now, stop living in the past, and help ...

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, the historical revisionist on that side of the House wants to quote me and tell me what I said, so let me say it clearly so the hon. member can write it down this time. We were asked if we were bringing rate caps like the NDP. Of course, we know that rate caps don't work. We're bringing in real, meaningful solutions that will address the fact that the NDP raised the cost of utilities for every Albertan. They broke the system; we're going to fix it.

Homeless Supports and Affordable Housing

Ms Sigurdson: Homelessness is increasing across the province, shelters are overwhelmed, and the UCP is inconsistent with funding shelters such as the Hope Mission. The Mustard Seed expressed in an Edmonton Journal article today that they want to be a temporary place where they can redirect people experiencing homelessness to permanent housing. Shelter staff are burning out, and the UCP is ignoring requests from the city of Edmonton to fund permanent supportive housing. While poverty and homelessness increase, why is the Minister of Seniors and Housing ignoring calls for permanent supportive housing with mental health support?

Mr. Luan: Mr. Speaker, providing support for people who have no home through shelters and the co-ordinated support for housing is important for our government. That's why in this budget we committed $49 million for shelter support services. In addition to that, at the time when we provided more funding to the shelter services, $21.5 million, we also established a provincial task force. We're looking at a structure, a new way, how we can provide comprehensive, co-ordinated support services for this.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that there's a clear solution to this ongoing crisis of poverty, one that has been researched and supported around the globe – that is, housing, particularly an investment in permanent supportive housing – and given that the province ignores calls from the cities and from organizations to fund permanent supportive housing and given that these support systems rely on the government funding for their operations, why is the UCP ignoring experts, ignoring municipal partners, and ignoring people in this province with lived experience and leaving the most vulnerable Albertans on the streets?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The capital plan for 2022 increased overall funding over three years by $42.4 million compared to capital plan 2021. This budget is, in fact, the first year of stronger foundations as we conduct the needs assessment in communities, develop innovative models, and expand our partnerships. The budget in the coming year will ramp up as the community needs and assessments and partnerships are developed.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that it's not just front-line workers who are calling on the government to act – chambers of commerce and downtown business associations all know the solution to social disorder and concerns brought forward by their customers is to provide a home with wraparound support – and given that there is a human rights argument in favour of supportive housing as well as an economic one, what will it take for this government to realize the crisis is their responsibility and to commit long-term, stable funding to support those impacted by the rising levels of homelessness?

Mr. Luan: Mr. Speaker, thank you for the hon. member raising a very complex issue. Homelessness is a complex and difficult social issue to tackle. That's why we appointed a provincial task force with experts from various sectors, from shelter to supporting housing, from social services, health, the recovery-oriented continuum of care. We're taking a drastic new approach, looking at the issue from a comprehensive, co-ordinated approach for this.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Ukraine-Russia Conflict

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At the end of World War II, in 1946, many in Europe were on the verge of starvation. Their cities were bombed-out ruins. People were homeless and living as displaced persons all over Europe. With the defeat of fascism in 1945, the first issue was to help feed and house the millions of displaced Europeans. To the Minister of Labour and Immigration: what can the people of Alberta and this government, who have a long and close relationship with the people of Ukraine, do to help meet the needs of those Ukrainians who find themselves displaced in Europe?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for that very important question. You know, the people of Ukraine, who helped settle our province: they helped build our province. I have been inspired by the phone calls, the e-mails, the contact, and the meetings that we have had from ordinary Albertans across all regions of our province asking how they can help. I can assure that particular member that Alberta and Albertans have a strong bond with the people of Ukraine, and we will be there for them.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Ukraine is one of the key nations in the world for food exportation and given that it is likely that the war in Ukraine is going to affect world food supplies and given that Alberta is going to be looked to by the world to help replace the food losses from the war in Ukraine and given that fertilizer costs for farmers in Alberta have skyrocketed over the last several years, to the minister of agriculture: what can the Alberta government do to address the shortage of fertilizer production in this province and help farmers to grow the food that is going to be so badly needed around the world in the next few years?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A great question. I know that the whole agricultural community globally is watching what's happening as Russia has invaded the literal breadbasket of the world. Fertilizer prices: historic highs globally. We're fortunate here in Alberta. In talking to our fertilizer companies, we know that there is enough supply in Alberta for spring plant 2022, very fortunate in that regard. But the biggest thing: we need to continue our fight against things like the carbon tax. When I talk to these companies, they want to build more production in this province, and they won't. They'll do it south of the border and rail it up.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that in post World War II Europe the Marshall Plan helped to rebuild European prosperity by targeting the goods and services that Europe needed to rebuild and given that one of the major issues that Europe is going to face as a result of the war in Ukraine is energy sufficiency and given that Alberta has the third-largest reserves of natural gas and that this gas is needed by Europe to replace Russian energy, to the Minister of Energy: what actions are being taken to supply Europe with the energy it needs and the resources that we have to provide?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, thank you to the member for the question. As he said, we do sit on the third-largest oil reserves in the world, yet we see the United States first banning imports from Russia, and now they're looking to other dictatorial regimes like Venezuela, Iran, and Saudi Arabia to fill their supply gaps. Importing from these regimes when there's an ethically sourced, environmentally friendly oil and gas supply available right here in Alberta, ready to ship to Europe and to the U.S. if we can get the necessary infrastructure built, is senseless. There is an answer to this problem, and it's called Alberta.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will return to the remainder of Members' Statements.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Budget 2022

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans can be proud to know that their elected government has balanced the books for the first time in nearly a decade. Despite the constant fear and smear from the NDP, this is good news for Alberta. Inheriting a damaged economy from the NDP wasn't easy, but Albertans knew that if anyone was going to fix it, it was our government.

The NDP showed up in pathetic numbers last week to vote down this budget. They claim that it was damaging to Albertans and decreases spending across the board, but it's just not true. Leading up to the days of the vote, they told Albertans that it would be the day that the government would fall; it was going to be the Armageddon. However, nine out of 23 caucus members showed up to vote, and I think that that sends a loud message to their Twitter followers, more than anything they could have actually tweeted. It's unfortunate to see an opposition party so deep into political theatre that they would try to lead Albertans to think that this balanced budget is bad news.

The UCP is proud to provide Albertans with quality health care, education, and other supports while still maintaining fiscal responsibility. Rather than heading in the direction of the $6 billion deficit of the NDP, our government has brought Alberta back on track with a $500 million surplus for this fiscal year. Mr. Speaker, it's understandable that the members opposite are upset. They were a part of a caucus and a government that tried to fiscally and morally bankrupt Alberta. The NDP hates to see a government that spends money with sustainability and responsibility in mind. The UCP did what the NDP could not: we balanced the books and worked hard to deliver on promises despite the challenges presented by the COVID-19 pandemic. I know that Albertans are happy to see those promises being kept, and that is what they'll remember when they vote in 2023.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills I am pleased to present the committee's final report on Bill 201, the Eastern Slopes Protection Act, sponsored by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona. This bill was referred to the committee on March 14, 2022. The report recommends that Bill 201 not proceed. I request concurrence of the Assembly in the final report on Bill 201.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the motion for concurrence in the report on Bill 201, Eastern Slopes Protection Act, is debatable pursuant to Standing Order 18(1)(b). Are there any members wishing to speak? There are.

Hon. members, given that members wish to speak to the motion for concurrence in the report, that debate will take place on the next available Monday under the item of business motions for concurrence in reports on public bills other than government bills. This procedure is in accordance with the ruling that I made on Monday, June 7, 2021, with respect to then Bill 218, Provincial Parks (Protecting Park Boundaries) Amendment Act, 2021, which will afford some time for members to prepare for concurrence debate. The next available Monday is anticipated to be April 25.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to give oral notice of Government Motion 18, sponsored by the Minister of Environment and Parks. It reads:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly call on the government of Canada to stop its planned April 1, 2022, increase of the carbon tax to $50 per tonne and its further plan to increase the carbon tax to $170 per tonne given that Canadian families are struggling with the highest inflation in 30 years.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Bill 11 Continuing Care Act

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to rise and request leave to introduce Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act.

Mr. Speaker, this bill establishes clear and consistent authority and oversight for the licensing, accommodations, and delivery of publicly funded care in the continuing care system. Alberta's current legislation falls under multiple acts and regulations, some dating back to 1985. The delivery of continuing care has evolved, and existing legislative requirements do not reflect present-day practices, services, or settings, and the COVID-19 pandemic revealed further gaps and inconsistencies. As a result, the government is introducing new, streamlined legislation under one act. It will strengthen government accountability and transparency and enable better co-ordination and alignment of care. Therefore, I move first reading of the Continuing Care Act.

Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 11 read a first time]

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of hon. Mr. Luan, Minister of Community and Social Services, responses to questions raised by Ms Renaud, hon. Member for St. Albert, and Mr. Hunter, hon. Member for Taber-Warner, on March 10, 2022, Ministry of Community and Social Services 2022-23 main estimates debate.

The Speaker: Hon. members, points of order. At 2:10 and again at 2:11 the Opposition House Leader rose on a point of order.

Point of Order Insulting Language

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I believe that these are two points of order; however, my arguments for the two are the same, so with your indulgence I will make the argument a single time. I look forward to your ruling.

My point of order, under 23(h), (i), and (j), is specifically because in this place, in this Assembly, the language that we use in relation to other members is very important, Mr. Speaker. As outlined in Erskine May as well as the House of Commons Procedure and Practice, one of the basic principles of this House "is that the proceedings be conducted in a respectful manner," page 610.

At 2:10 and then again at 2:11 the Government House Leader, in response to questions from the deputy Leader of the Official Opposition, was using language that I believe could cause disorder in this House and very specifically showed a lack of respect for another member in this place. I do not have the benefit of the Blues, but, Mr. Speaker, what caught my ear at 2:10 was the Government House Leader telling the member that she should never stand up in this House, which I think is particularly problematic, unparliamentary, and likely a point of order; as well, at 2:11 referring to a colleague in this Chamber as "people like that," a very disrespectful and insulting disparagement that, I believe, is unparliamentary and should be considered a point of order.

Certainly, this government has spoken about raising the bar in this Chamber a number of times, yet we continue to see patterns of behaviour like this and talking down to other members in this Chamber. I believe that these are a point of order and did not live up to the standard of this Assembly that we should all be trying to reach. I look forward to the arguments and your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Schow: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think context is everything, and I think that would apply to this as well. I don't have the benefit of the Blues, so I wouldn't be able to speak to what the hon. House leader had said. In respect to the comment that that member should not stand in this Chamber, certainly, that comment on its own would be unparliamentary, but if it was with regard to not standing in this Chamber to spout off something that was not factually accurate, that would certainly lend itself well to context and I'd say is not a point of order.

In terms of the comment of "people like that," again, I was not aware of the context. I don't recall it, so I leave that to your ruling. If it is in fact a point of order, I'm happy to withdraw and apologize. I just don't have the benefit of the Blues to suggest if it was or wasn't.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Hon. members, I do have the benefit of the Blues. "She should never stand up in this place and try to lecture people [about how to talk to] Albertans after her despicable actions when she sat on this side of the House." House of Commons Procedure and Practice, page 623: personal attacks and insults are not in order. I would suggest, between a combination of suggesting that a member shouldn't stand up and referring specifically not through the chair but to "her despicable actions," that this has raised to the level of a point of order.

The Deputy Government House Leader to apologize and withdraw.

Mr. Schow: Most certainly, Mr. Speaker, I apologize and withdraw.

The Speaker: I consider this matter dealt with and concluded.

Privilege Misleading the House

The Speaker: Hon. members, I am prepared to rule on the point of privilege that the Government House Leader raised on March 23, 2022. The question has to do with statements made by the hon. Member for Edmonton-South in the Assembly on Tuesday, March 22, 2022. The Government House Leader provided notice of the question of privilege to my office at 11:15 on March 23, with a copy to the Member for Edmonton-South, therefore fulfilling the notice requirement under Standing Order 15(2). This matter was raised at the earliest opportunity, as required under the standing order.

In his notice, the purported question of privilege, the Government House Leader indicated that on March 22 the Member for Edmonton-South stood in this Chamber and asked questions while denying that he was guilty of using personal information of the Premier to hack vaccine records. The Government House Leader argued in his submissions to the Assembly on March 23 that publishing a document publicly detailing the steps that the Member for Edmonton-South took to use another MLA's identity was enough to form the conclusion that the MLA was admitting his guilt.

The Government House Leader contends that the Member for Edmonton-South made statements in the Assembly denying that he was guilty of using personal information of the Premier to gain access to the Premier's COVID-19 vaccination records and, more broadly, denied that he broke the law. The Government House Leader claims that in making such statements, the Member for Edmonton-South was deliberately misleading the Assembly and, therefore, committed a contempt.

Members can find these submissions on pages 358 to 360 of the March 23, 2022, Hansard.

On March 24 the Member for Edmonton-South presented arguments on the purported question of privilege. In his submission the member indicated that with respect to making misleading statements, he has "not admitted to committing any crimes" and that he believes that, "clearly, any statements [he has] made in the House are not misleading to this effect." These submissions can be found on pages 410 and 411 of the Hansard for March 24.

Hon. members, the Assembly has had this type of question of privilege, deliberately misleading the Assembly, before on a number of occasions during the 30th Legislature. As noted in past rulings, this type of question of privilege is treated as purported contempt of the Assembly. The reference is found in Erskine May, privileges and practices and usage of parliament, 25th edition, on page 307.

As noted in previous rulings, the test for deliberately misleading the Assembly is a very difficult test to meet. As set out in the fourth edition of Parliamentary Practice in New Zealand at pages 775 to 776, the test has three elements. "The statement must . . . have been misleading; the member must have known that the statement was inaccurate at the time the statement was made; and the member must have intended to mislead the [Assembly]."

Hon. members, I have reviewed the Hansard of March 22 and specifically the statements made by the Member for Edmonton-South that day. I can find no reference by the member denying that he was guilty of using the Premier's personal information to access vaccine records. In addition, I find that he made no statements confirming or denying that he was culpable of an offence in connection with the matter at hand. As such, there is no evidence that these statements were made. As the Member for Edmonton-South himself has indicated, there was no possibility to mislead the Assembly. Therefore, the first part of the three-part test has not been met. Accordingly, I find no question of privilege. I consider this matter dealt with and concluded.

Orders of the Day

Motions for Concurrence in Committee Reports on Public Bills Other than Government Bills

Bill 202

Public Health (Transparency and Accountability) Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: Hon. members, on March 22, 2022, the chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills reported the report of the committee of Bill 202, Public Health (Transparency and Accountability) Amendment Act, 2022, and requested concurrence of the Assembly in the report, which has recommended that the bill proceed. As a member other than the mover rose to speak on March 22, debate on the motion will proceed today.

The motion to concur in the committee's report on Bill 202 has already been moved. Therefore, I will now recognize any additional speakers that would like to speak. Are there members who wish to speak to the motion for concurrence? The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley has risen.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour and a privilege for me to rise today and speak to concurrence of private member's Bill 202. It's my proposed legislation to amend the Public Health Act. Now, before I get into the details, I just want to offer my sincere thanks to the folks who helped me determine the substance of this bill. The select special Public Health Act committee put forward a list of recommendations, and this bill aligns with those recommendations. These recommendations have not been implemented yet. These recommendations encourage checks and balances and transparency, which is what Bill 202 does.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

I listened to people from across Alberta, and I came up with Bill 202 because it was of great concern, the Public Health Act and how it was used during the pandemic. It takes a firm commitment to listen to all constituents regardless of political affiliation; however, in my experience it is well worth the effort because no single person, party, expert, or interest group has a monopoly on good ideas. The recent pandemic has impacted the lives of every single Albertan over the past two years, so I wasn't entirely surprised that pandemic management was the top concern of the majority of those people who provided input.

Bill 202 aims to address three main concerns: transparency, accountability, and democratic oversight. The importance of addressing these issues cannot be overstated. I am certain that every single member of the Assembly has heard from Albertans, directly and through correspondence, about these matters. We also know that these concerns were raised as part of the legislative review of Alberta's Public Health Act conducted more than a year ago. The report issued following the review specifically recommends that the Public Health Act be amended to enhance transparency and democratic accountability. Speaking to the Select Special Public Health Act Review Committee on August 27, 2020, the chief medical officer of health, Dr. Deena Hinshaw, stated that there need to be checks and balances, there need to be assurances that there's not going to be use of this act in an inappropriate way, I would advocate that tools not be taken out but, rather, if additional checks and balances are needed, that those be put in.

Recommendations included in the committee's report included three key measures. First, the committee recommends that the Public Health Act be amended to ensure that an order declaring a state of public health emergency under section 52.1 cannot lapse and subsequently be reinstated without the approval of the Legislative Assembly.

Secondly, the committee recommends that ministerial orders issued under section 52.1 cannot be renewed without the approval of the Legislative Assembly.

Thirdly, the committee recommends that sunset clauses be included under section 52.1 to ensure health orders are reviewed in a timely manner to ensure they are removed when no longer necessary.

While these recommendations have gone ignored for more than a year, it is perfectly clear that the public wants action when it comes to transparency, accountability, and democratic oversight. MLAs and all Albertans need access to timely, accurate information concerning public health orders during declared emergencies.

Furthermore, MLAs need to be seen taking an active and public role in pandemic management. It is important to me to ensure that Bill 202 ensures MLAs can carry out our duties while ensuring cabinet and medical officers of health can take swift action to protect the public when necessary. While there is room for improvement in many other areas of the Public Health Act, Bill 202 is limited in scope to sections of the Public Health Act concerning states of emergency, particularly pandemics.

I just want to take a quick dive into the details of Bill 202. Every MLA here today has a duty to represent the families and communities they're elected to serve. Bill 202 provides MLAs with additional oversight powers during a public health state of emergency. The Public Health Act currently requires that a public health state of emergency may not be extended without the approval of the Legislative Assembly. However, during the recent COVID-19 pandemic no such vote was ever held. Under Bill 202 the Assembly's essential role in debating and voting on the extension of public health states of emergency will be strengthened. Future ministers of Health will be prevented from circumventing the Assembly by allowing a state of emergency to elapse, only to declare a new state of emergency without seeking the Assembly's approval.

Albertans have told me repeatedly that it is not acceptable for cabinet or bureaucrats to operate for months on end without a democratically expressed mandate. Democracy matters more during an emergency, not less. If Justin Trudeau and the federal government must seek House of Commons and Senate ratification for the federal Emergencies Act, there is no good reason why Alberta's government can't seek similar ratification before extending a public health state of emergency.

In addition, Bill 202 proposes a new section to be added into the Public Health Act. This new section provides a framework by which the Assembly may opt to review, revoke, or amend some public health measures during a public health state of emergency. Under Bill 202 any two members of the Assembly may file a written request with the minister to initiate the Assembly's oversight process. This process must be carried out within two sitting days, it must include a debate of at least two hours, and a vote must follow the debate.

Bill 202 also includes some simple and straightforward transparency measures. During the recent COVID-19 pandemic some elected officials and many public members grew frustrated and concerned regarding the emergency powers being exercised by the government and public health officials. Bill 202's transparency measures are designed to ensure Albertans have timely access to specific and accurate information regarding public health orders.

Bill 202's transparency requirements are limited to three specific sections of the Public Health Act. One, under Bill 202 medical officers of health will continue to be able to issue isolation and quarantine orders as well as exemptions to these orders. Bill 202 requires that such orders be tabled in the Legislature in a timely fashion to ensure legislators and the public understand the nature of the orders, including which specific section of the Public Health Act is being invoked. Bill 202 applies to general orders only and not to orders that may allow private citizens to be identified.

Two, under Bill 202 the cabinet will continue to be able to issue orders that may be necessary to protect public health, including the emergency closure of specific facilities. In addition, for example, the government may request that the Lieutenant Governor delay an election. Bill 202 requires that such orders be tabled in the Legislature on a timely basis to ensure legislators and the public understand the nature of the orders.

Three, under Bill 202 the Minister of Health may declare a public health state of emergency in consultation with the chief medical officer of health. Bill 202 requires that such declarations be tabled in the Legislature on a timely basis to ensure legislators and the public understand the nature of such declarations, including which specific section of the Public Health Act is being invoked.

These three measures are necessary to provide clarity to legislators and the public alike. In addition, I think we all recognize the impact that misinformation spread on social media has had on public morale over the past two years. There are those who believe the answer to this is to restrict speech. I am not one of those people. Restricting speech will only make things worse. The answer is to provide clear and accurate information in a timely manner. The more we can do to promptly address Albertans' concerns and reduce unnecessary public frustration, the better.

In conclusion, let me say again that I fully understand the complexity of the current legislation, and recognizing this, I have intentionally limited Bill 202 to these changes. If any of you have questions, I'm more than willing to provide answers. At the end of the day, this bill is quite different than many of the others presently introduced during this session of the Assembly. This bill isn't about politics. Rather, it's about democracy and good government. It's about providing checks and balances. It's about ensuring the supremacy of the Assembly.

It has been more than two years since the world first learned of COVID-19. Since that time we have seen governments go from preaching, "We're all in this together" to implementing some of the most divisive policies the free world has seen in generations, without holding a single vote.

Now, with the pandemic finally shifting to endemic, health restrictions and emergency mandates are slowly being lifted. I think it is safe to say that we all hope to never face another public health emergency like the recent pandemic, but if and when we do, it is important to learn from our mistakes and address the systemic issues that left so many Albertans feeling confused, frustrated, and ignored.

The best place to start is by ensuring greater transparency, accountability, and democratic oversight. Until we address these issues, there is no reason for any Albertan to truly believe that we are all in this together.

Thank you very much, and I would hope that we can all vote in favour of concurrence.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the motion for concurrence? The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat, followed by Edmonton-Glenora.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I first of all want to thank my colleague for bringing such an important bill forward. I, too, am absolutely in favour of this bill going forward and being passed. I, too, am in favour of democratizing the Public Health Act.

Madam Speaker, how often during the last two-plus years did our constituents reach out to us looking for answers, looking for help with their families, looking for our ability to get their needs, their ideas, their questions on the floor? This bill goes so far as to still allow the important checks and balances that the government may have to put in but allows the 87 of us in here to represent, through the democratic process, our constituents. Easily in the last two-plus years there have been an overwhelming number of calls to my office, people questioning the rationale, people wanting to understand, wanting to help, wanting to do different things but not being able to have their voice heard, and this bill goes a long way to do it.

Of course, a lot of the people across the floor are, like me, from the legacy Wildrose side of the UCP merger. In 2011-2012, when I was first elected, when I was first talking to Albertans, the concept of free votes and democratic reform was probably the biggest reason that Cypress-Medicine Hatters were looking for change. What an opportunity that my colleague from Central Peace-Notley has put forward for Albertans that want to protect each other but want to have an opportunity to be heard.

Not only, Madam Speaker, in 2011-2012 were Albertans crying for democratic reform and free votes; they still are today. The number of times that I've heard recently, you know, "How come we couldn't get votes on this in the Legislature, and how come we couldn't get this talked about on the floor of the Legislature as the Public Health Act was in place?" – I hear it every day when Albertans say to me: how come citizen-initiated referendums and recall haven't been passed and put fully into law with proclamation and put in a more realistic form?

Every day, Madam Speaker, Albertans are looking for the opportunity to be involved in their government, for the opportunity to reach out to one of the 87 of us and have a say. Again, my hon.

colleague from Central Peace-Notley has come up with a step that will allow this to be enhanced. As he pointed out, the chief medical officer of health suggested that it was necessary.

Bill 202, of course, is a direct response to a legislative review of the Public Health Act completed more than a year ago. Speaking before the Public Health Act Review Committee in 2020, the chief medical officer of health stated that checks and balances may need to be added to the Public Health Act to provide "assurances that there's not going to be use of this act in an inappropriate way."

Well, again, Madam Speaker, my colleague has presented an idea where two MLAs can get an idea on the floor, where all relevant documentation relating to changes and orders of the Public Health Act have to be brought here. What a better way. We can make it so that 4.4 million Albertans can have their voices heard. Again, clearly, it's something that the people that had to deal with this daily highlighted as important.

I'll also say that we're not through this yet. Hopefully, we are at the endemic stage, but there's a lot of healing that Alberta needs in our business community, in our families going forward. To me, the sooner the better, the sooner that we have the opportunity, so that Albertans know when they phone my office or e-mail another MLA's office, their ideas have a realistic chance of being heard, debated, and their individual rights protected.

Of course, as my hon. colleague pointed out, even the federal Emergencies Act was subject to parliamentary approval and Senate reform. We all know that the Senate never got to the point where they approved it or turned it down because it was revoked.

Madam Speaker, I want to end with an example. Do you remember when the Premier apologized at about the six-month mark for getting it wrong when it came to small businesses? Do you remember how at the start the guideline was that essential could be open, that nonessential couldn't? Do you remember how many of us said: "No, no. This is wrong. It should be safe versus nonsafe. If you're a business with safe practices, you should be allowed to be open, just the same as the big box store with its social distancing and safe practices." It was approximately six months of not having the opportunity to debate that in this House, of not having the opportunity to fully expand upon why the decision was different that that decision stayed in place.

Madam Speaker, here's what happened. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business put out that after six months the average small business was $170,000 in debt and that if you were a hospitality business, you had probably incurred over $200,000 of additional debt because of the COVID mandates.

When the Premier came forward and apologized for getting it wrong, for not listening to the fact that some of us were saying that it should be safe versus nonsafe instead of essential versus nonessential, although I think that the apology was welcomed, it still didn't change the fact that Albertan businesspeople had individually lost hundreds of thousands and collectively lost tens and tens of millions.

Madam Speaker, this is our opportunity to further democratize Alberta, to further democratize the Alberta Legislature, to add accountability and transparency and democracy to the Public Health Act. For that reason, I will fully support it every step of the way, and I thank my colleague from Central Peace-Notley for bringing it forward.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker and to the mover and the last speaker for their comments as we consider Bill 202, Public Health (Transparency and Accountability) Amendment Act, 2022. I know it's not every day that private members have the opportunity to bring forward bills to this place, so I want to recognize the Member for Central Peace-Notley for the work that's gone into crafting a bill and the staff, of course, who supported him along that journey. While I do appreciate the work that went into this bill, at this point I am not comfortable supporting it as a member of the Assembly. I have to say that I appreciate that the last two speakers spoke about this bill in relation to the current pandemic, the global public health emergency that we've all been living through for what feels like way, way, way too long. Legislation doesn't just apply to one point in time or one public health crisis; it's in place until the law changes yet again.

With that in mind, I'm going to share a few examples of public health emergencies that have taken place in the last few years. The one I'm most closely aware of, the one when I was the Minister of Health, was, of course, the wildfires in Fort McMurray. When I think about the importance of being nimble and being able to adapt in a time of crisis, I have concerns that the procedures that are laid out through the proposed bill today would impede our ability to act in the public interest and to save lives. One of the concerns I have is noted, that it's just two MLAs to basically stop the business of the House and change direction completely to consider the ideas that those two MLAs have as it relates to an ongoing public health crisis. I can tell you that when I was getting regular updates – and we had essentially daily cabinet meetings, sometimes more than once a day, because, of course, the wind changes, the trajectory of the fire changes, and of course the response needs to change as well.

To think that at any point everyone who's working on evacuating – I'm thinking specifically about the hospital and the long-term care that was in the hospital, the upper floors of the hospital at the time, because, of course, the PCs had promised many times to build a stand-alone long-term care facility for Fort McMurray, but it hadn't happened. So we had seniors and people primarily with mobility issues living on the top two floors of the hospital in need of evacuation immediately, in need of accommodation and a safe harbour in another health care facility somewhere else in the province, and we needed to make sure that we evacuated that hospital incredibly quickly and found ways to get people to a safe place to be. At the same time, the entire municipality was fleeing.

I do pause to reflect on the fact that some MLAs chose to go towards the fire instead of welcoming people when they were fleeing. That's their choice. But it could have also been their choice to bring forward potentially a motion in this place to stop the important public health orders and to consider whether it was appropriate or not as opposed to politicians making sure that they assess the information that's being provided by front-line firefighters, by health and welfare officers, by local emergency disaster response preparedness folks and making sure that we put the right tools in place and the proper orders in place to make sure that people could evacuate in an expeditious fashion and get to a safe place to be while the worst of the fires were upon us.

But the emergency didn't end the day the fire was extinguished. The emergency lasted because, of course, the chemicals that are used to dampen a fire and to stop its spread and to prevent it from spreading have often very serious health effects themselves. They're very effective in putting out fires, but you don't want to rush back in after everything has been dampened with these chemicals because that could have health consequences as well. Again, it's important that you go through the checks and measures.

Where I do absolutely agree with the remarks of the prior two speakers is that there has been a significant lack of transparency, a deep lack of trust with the citizens of this province. The actions that we have experienced felt like they were covert, like they were in the darkness of chambers that nobody would be able to access.

For those reasons, we've put forward a number of proposals on how to address issues as it relates to this pandemic specifically and other pressing public health issues. One is that we've called for the creation of an independent COVID-19 advisory panel. We've called for that for about a year, and it's following what's happened in some other provinces where there have been others who have actually brought forward science-based advisory panels that report back to the government in a public way so that all Albertans – it would be Albertans in this case, but I'll insert the names of other provinces here – would have an opportunity to receive that unbiased, unfettered, open, and honest information.

We've also asked questions about the appropriateness of the current reporting structure between the chief medical officer of health as a member of – oh, I'm trying to remember the term. There are four different models that you can have in which public health officers report, but what's in place here in Alberta is that the chief medical officer of health reports through the department to the Minister of Health, to the Premier. That is very removed from having what the government would like to pretend is a relationship directly with the public. Just because you tell somebody to talk to the media doesn't mean that they are indeed able to be open and transparent and speak publicly to Albertans.

We have asked many times if this is the proper reporting structure and proposed again, about a year, year and a half ago, that it might be time to consider independence, making the officer an independent officer of the Legislature, which would enable greater opportunities to receive public reporting in this place, to be able to hold the recommendations made to government to account, and to allow for greater transparency.

But, again, what's being proposed in this structure is that two MLAs can get together, and they can say: we need to put a stop to this; we need to make sure that we change course. They can't necessarily change course, but they can sure put a stop to it, because what they would require is – I believe it's within two sitting days of the Assembly for that business to take priority over everything else. Really, what it would do, when you have folks at the POC, the Provincial Operations Centre, seeing this type of – the greatest analogy I can think of is that when you are in the middle of a crisis and you're driving a speedboat and you're trying to get away from a disaster and you hear that you might be put on a different route and be sent in a different direction, that certainly isn't the most respectful way of engaging with the folks who spend their careers focused on responding to disasters.

Again I want to say that I'm trying to think about this in the context of other public health disasters and other major crises that we faced in our province. I wish that there was only the current one to think of, but there isn't. There are always the ones that have come before, and I hate to say that there will probably be more again in the future, Madam Speaker. To pass legislation just thinking about one specific point in time and the frustration that I think all members of this Assembly – or at least those of us who are able to speak freely, without being given direction from the Government House Leader, I think, have felt a very strong sense of undermining the public's right to information, the right to fair, transparent government, the right of all of us to have an opportunity to have the government present in a fair and open way so that we can have trust that the government is acting in our best interest.

Of course, when there was a report done by an auditing firm after the first wave and it took well into the third wave, after immense public pressure, for that to be made public, I think that probably helped contribute to the lack of trust and the lack of confidence that Albertans have in this government when it comes to their management of our collective public health.

I guess one of the questions I would have to the mover is how he landed on only two members being the trigger to initiate a debate. It seems like an incredibly low threshold and, I think, would be an outlier certainly in this place and an outlier for probably any other Assembly. So if the member has done any other interjurisdictional comparisons within parliamentary democracies or specifically within Canada, are there any other times where just two members can trigger this type of debate on any issues, let alone a public health disaster that is an emergency? I would find that information helpful because it does seem like an incredibly low threshold.

Yeah. I will just say again that I know how difficult this has been for all of us.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the motion for concurrence? The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to this bill. As my colleague noted, you know, we don't often see opposition bills get any opportunity to come and be debated in this House. That's been an unfortunate circumstance of changes that this government has made to the process by which private members' business takes place. Certainly, I appreciate that we have the opportunity to consider this member's bill. Certainly, I hope that my own bill, that I've brought forward, will get the same opportunity.

Unfortunately, though, I think I have to join my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora in saying that I will not be supporting this bill. Now, certainly I can appreciate the concerns that the member has brought forward and the concerns that have motivated him in bringing forward this bill and proposing these changes. He has spoken about the need to seek further transparency, and indeed a distinct lack of transparency from this government throughout the COVID-19 pandemic – and on that point I certainly do agree with the member. They have noted that Dr. Deena Hinshaw, our chief medical officer of health, indeed commented that there need to be checks and balances built into the system, and I would also agree with that, Madam Speaker.

Indeed, as my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora outlined, we have made repeated calls throughout this pandemic, first of all, for the government to release the data on which it was making decisions. We called for the release of all modelling data, we asked for them to be transparent with all recommendations that they had received from the chief medical officer of health, and indeed we called repeatedly for a full public review or inquiry of the government's handling of the pandemic. Unfortunately, on every one of those points, at every turn this government has rejected those calls for additional transparency. They have continued to undermine the trust of Albertans in the decisions that they were making and seemed to repeatedly demonstrate that in many instances they were indeed making decisions that were far more motivated politically than they were by protecting the public health.

We just have to look back at how things went throughout this pandemic, how during the second wave the government indeed sat on its hands and refused to take action until case counts were soaring, Madam Speaker. It was well into December before we saw any significant action from the government. Indeed, before they took the actual significant action that we knew had been recommended and that we'd seen other jurisdictions taking, the government made a number of small measures that did nothing but actually create more confusion amongst the public, because they seemed like seemingly arbitrary measures. Again, that is why we called for the government to provide all the information it was actually looking at, to help restore that faith from Albertans. We saw that again in the midst of the third wave.

Now, that speaks exactly to the substance of this bill, where this member is suggesting, which my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora noted is concerning, that two MLAs – only two out of 87 – would be able to stop the business of this House and force a debate on any public health measure. What we saw during that third wave is 16 MLAs in this House who wrote a letter demanding that all public health restrictions be removed. All, Madam Speaker. That was as the third wave was just beginning to rise, and we saw the devastation that wave brought on Albertans. Imagine how many more lives would have been lost, how much more damage might have been done to our economy, how many more Albertans would have been left suffering with long COVID if those MLAs would have had the ability to come into this House and try to force the removal of all public health measures against the advice of the actual medical experts and the science. That is one reason why I feel I could not support this bill.

Again, what we saw clearly during that wave of the pandemic, Madam Speaker, is that this government was delaying taking actions because it was concerned about its own political fortunes, more so than the public health, which is a reason why indeed we do need to have more transparency. That, of course, led into the best summer ever – and we're all well aware of how that played out – where we found ourselves again going into a much higher, rising case count with the Premier on vacation, not a word from this government, dead silence, while Albertans and public health experts and our doctors and our health care workers were crying for this government to take action and step up.

By the time we finally got there, where they began to consider taking action, these guys were arguing behind closed doors amongst themselves about taking the step that proved to be the most effective public health measure in raising vaccination rates and helping lower case counts, lower hospitalizations, and indeed prevent deaths, that being a vaccine passport system.

Because of this government being delayed, arguing amongst themselves, caught up in their own political turmoil, we saw that wave grow far worse. We saw thousands more surgeries cancelled, thousands more Albertans that were infected with COVID and indeed having health effects as a result. Indeed, when they finally even brought in that policy, the democratization of that vote within their caucus watered down that policy from what had been recommended, as was revealed by one of the members from Grande Prairie.

One of my concerns is that what we saw within this government alone, simply their democratization within their caucus, led repeatedly to steps being taken that undermined the public health, that caused more damage to our health care system, that made a public health emergency worse. Not only that, Madam Speaker, but I would say that from the first wave through the fifth what we repeatedly saw was that this government's lack of transparency led to them releasing not enough information about the actual public health measures they brought into place.

Indeed, the health measures were confusing. They constantly shifted and changed. They made no sense initially, before they finally got to the measures that were actually effective. And when they brought those measures in, even when they went to lift measures, Madam Speaker, this government's communication was so incredibly poor that my office continued to field hundreds of phone calls and e-mails from individuals, organizations, businesses trying to make hide or hair of what this government was in fact asking them to do, indeed repeatedly bringing out public health measures, putting them into effect before they were even publicly available and published online through multiple waves of the pandemic.

I can understand why the member is bringing this forward. Certainly, I share his frustration with the incompetence with which this government handled so many aspects of the pandemic and made this so much worse and indeed undermined the public trust. But therein lies the problem, Madam Speaker. This government undermining the public trust did not mean that the scientific and the medical experts were, in fact, wrong.

It's unfortunate that perhaps our chief medical officer of health was undermined repeatedly at so many turns by this government's own political decisions, to the point where her own reputation began to be undermined. [interjections] As others have noted, Madam Speaker, we have had a serious epidemic of misinformation during this pandemic, indeed spread at times by some of these government members who sit and heckle now. Perhaps they'd like to get up and speak for themselves at some point.

The fact is, Madam Speaker, that the member said that no single expert, no politician or interest group has a monopoly on good ideas. The medical consensus was clear. The vast majority of medical experts said that drugs such as hydroxychloroquine and ivermectin were not effective in treating COVID. That is what the vast majority of peer-reviewed studies said, yet that information continued to be spread. The vast majority of public health experts said that, yes, in fact, masking is an effective way to help reduce the spread of COVID-19 as an aerosol virus, yet misinformation about that spread and indeed has been actively undermined by or spread by members of this government.

That is why I do not support this bill in terms of trying to give MLAs the power to override the actual public health experts. We have seen it repeatedly demonstrated, whether because they personally believe the misinformation or whether because they are seeking some other form of political power or opportunity or advantage, by members of multiple governments across Canada, including the MPP Randy Hillier, who is indeed up on charges today for his support of the convoy protesters and blockaders in Ottawa and indeed was himself responsible for spreading an enormous amount of misinformation throughout this pandemic. I cannot support the idea that those sorts of individuals should have the opportunity to override actual medical experts, the actual public health advice.

Now, I do appreciate some of the points that the member did bring forward. For example, one of the changes in this bill is to make it so that medical officers or the cabinet must provide a copy to the Health minister when they make an order. Now, certainly, again . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the motion for concurrence? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View, followed by the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon, who I saw afterwards.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and speak to this bill. While I appreciate the intent of the bill, which is, obviously, a throw to transparency, I think my concern here is that it works in the opposite direction of what, I would say, was most needed during this pandemic. The challenge during this pandemic was the fact that this government was leading based on politics instead of based on science and data and public health advice. That was probably the single biggest challenge we faced.

Now, certainly, we saw a wild overreach with this government's Bill 10, a wild overreach which was rapidly followed by a number of government members standing up and yelling, "Fear and smear; it's nothing like that," and then, of course, members of their own party stood up and rallied against it because that was incorrect, Madam Speaker. It's not a word that I can say in this place, but certainly it came rather strongly to light that the government's defence of Bill 10 was not factually accurate, so ultimately they chose to reverse their position on that.

But I would say that our largest problem as we trucked through this pandemic, so to speak, I suppose, was the spread of misinformation, the wild spread of misinformation, and the spread of misinformation which went unchecked. It went unchecked by this government because it was in their political interest to leave it unchecked. That, Madam Speaker, I think, was the biggest concern we faced.

Public health decisions ought to have been based on what was good for the people of this province, on the opinions of the people of this province, on advice from medical health experts, but that's not what we saw. Instead, we saw a flailing government, desperate to bolster its own support, being blown around by wherever the political winds happened to be blowing, a government so desperate to hang on to the support of people their own Premier has now called all sorts of names, has referred to as the inmates running the asylum – that's their own Premier that said that. They were so desperate to appease those people over the course of the pandemic that they allowed their own members to join illegal blockades, that they allowed their own members to spread misinformation about vaccines and masks and science. Madam Speaker, it's incredibly problematic.

I actually think that as we move forward as a society, with the sort of increase in access to the Internet, which is in many ways an incredibly good thing, the access to information that we have at this moment in time is unprecedented throughout history. The problem, Madam Speaker, is that it cuts both ways. It leaves us with access to unprecedented misinformation at the same time, and most people, unfortunately – or many, anyway – lack the ability to determine what's a credible source. We all sort of suffer from natural and inherent cognitive biases, but many people are not informed about these cognitive biases and therefore are not able to counter them in themselves.

You know, we see these stories online, these sorts of trumped-up stories where someone happens to have gotten sick and there is some sort of linkage in time to the point at which they were vaccinated. Now, many of these things have been undercut, very clearly, by science.

I think back to, for instance, the well and truly debunked myth about the MMR vaccine and autism, which was sort of started by a media celebrity figure whose child turned out not to have autism at all, and it certainly wasn't caused by a vaccine. That sort of problematic misinformation is often started by bad actors but often supported by those who simply lack an understanding of their own cognitive biases, lack an understanding of the difference between correlation and causation. In fact, many of the people who start those stories don't necessarily do it through ill intent. They're simply so badly misinformed that, you know, their own brains may tell them that this is the truth when it transparently is not.

That's incredibly – incredibly – problematic, and I think that in particular, Madam Speaker, it's worth noting that when members of this House engage in that sort of disinformation, it actually doesn't matter whether they are intentionally misinforming or are themselves misinformed. It ought to be beneath every member in this place, and the public ought to hold us to a higher standard than that.

My concern with this bill is that it would take us in a direction where we're seeing more politicians who are sort of being blown around in the winds of strange misinformation on the Internet, interfering in decisions that should be based on reason and science. One of the things that drove me, Madam Speaker, to this House is evidence-based decisions, ensuring that we make our decisions based on the best facts and evidence that are presented to us.

I think this would take us backwards in terms of that. This would encourage members to sort of come forward with unfortunate and ill-informed views that are unhelpful going forward. I think that as a society we're going to have to struggle with this, and I don't know that it's necessarily – certainly, the government has a hand, but I don't think the government alone can do it. Certainly, the UCP's backwards curriculum, their attempt to remove critical thinking skills from the curriculum, is absolutely a step in the wrong direction, is absolutely a step that will make this problem worse, that will ensure that our children do not have the capacity to evaluate the source and the reasonableness of information in the right sort of way. On the Internet information and disinformation can look very, very similar. If you don't have the appropriate skills to figure out what's what, a person can get very quickly into trouble, and in a democracy when enough people get into trouble, we're all in trouble in that way.

I certainly think that this government ought to have done a better job throughout this pandemic at circulating information, at attempting to combat misinformation, at making decisions based on public health. We can look back historically, Madam Speaker. We can look at the data and we can see that this government's strategy of acting last and least, of trying to ignore the science, like, this sort of faked-out, "Oh, we wouldn't have done it except we were forced by your lack of personal responsibility" resulted in some really bad results and really bad results in a population in this province who are younger than the average population in this country, a population who ought to have fared better because of our relative youth, and a population in a province that has one of the best health care systems in the country.

I think it has been incredibly problematic. This government's handling of this pandemic has been incredibly – incredibly – problematic but not in a way that is fixed by this bill. That is why I won't be supporting this bill. I think it takes us in absolutely the wrong direction. I think it takes us in a direction of rhetoric and misinformation and the opposite of the direction we should go in, which is the direction of science and information and rational debate and rational argumentation and conclusions which flow logically from their premises. I think there are a lot of ways that that can be achieved. Unfortunately, I don't feel that this is one of them, and I hope that this government takes this as a lesson.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a privilege, always, to be able to get up in this House and to be able to speak to a bill, especially a private member's bill. For those that maybe aren't aware of what we're doing this afternoon, we're being presented with a motion for concurrence. That's a motion that asks us whether or not we want to pursue a particular bill, a private member's bill, and whether we want to actually have debate on that bill and move forward in the House with discussion on that bill, in this case Bill 202, the Public Health (Transparency and Accountability) Amendment Act, 2022.

Madam Speaker, it's a privilege, any time we get into this House, to be able to speak to a bill, and for those out in the real world that are trying to make a living, when we get into the Legislature, most of the bills that we discuss and that we deal with are government bills. They're brought forward by the executive, by the government, and they're important often. We debate them and we discuss them, and we make our arguments pro or con in this House. We try to represent our constituents. We try to make sure that, if possible, we can bring forward amendments and make any kind of bill, a government bill or a private member's bill for that matter, better and that through the process of that debate and through that process of exchanging of ideas, at the end of the day we have a bill that's either appropriate to move forward and to work in the interests of the citizens of Alberta or whether we believe, at the end of the day, that that's a bill that should be turned down and should be voted against and, in the process, not be brought forward in a way that's going to affect Albertans.

Now, we have today the opportunity to bring forward Bill 202 to this Legislature. Private members' bills are actually really important, I believe, when you take a look at the fact that, you know, not every good idea is brought forward by the government. There are many good ideas that are brought forward to us as MLAs on a daily basis. We have constituents. All the time we're all meeting, on both sides of the House, with constituents that bring forward ideas and suggestions for how we could better run this province in the interests of the people of Alberta. As MLAs it's important for us to have a private members' process that allows us to bring forward bills that will make this province better, make it work better for the constituents that we all face, whether it's an MLA's idea for moving forward or whether it's something that's come from our constituents through the MLA.

You know, I can remember bringing forward and standing up in this House to speak to what I call the silver alert, which would help seniors that get lost, and it was brought forward and passed in this Legislature. That came from stakeholders within the seniors across this province. It was an idea that was brought forward to us. I liked the idea, and we worked on that, and it was brought forward and passed in this Legislature. Now, this is a way, through these bills, for people in Alberta to be able to use their elected representatives to bring forward good ideas that can represent them. I believe that it's an important part of the process.

I think that when we talk about a motion for concurrence, we should be very careful that when we actually speak to a motion for concurrence, we're actually speaking to the bill and that it's not about, for instance, past rights or wrongs that we may have thought in this House that have come forward with government policy. It's not about, for instance, whether or not it was a wise thing for the NDP to spend $7.5 billion on electricity infrastructure that's jacked up the electricity prices and bills for all Albertans. That's not what Bill 202 is about. It's not about – you know, it's a motion for concurrence as to whether or not we in this House believe that we should move forward and debate this bill and the merits of this bill. It's not about the NDP's support for a carbon tax, which has jacked up all the costs for all Albertans.

I'm not sure that we get very far on private members' business when we don't speak to the actual bill, so I want to just focus for a couple of minutes on this bill. It's been brought before the House already that, you know, this bill is going to allow us what's in the title. It's Bill 202, the Public Health (Transparency and Accountability) Amendment Act, 2022. You know, if we take a look at this bill, in a state of a public health emergency

if an order under subsection (1) is made in respect of a public health emergency that exists or may exist, the Lieutenant Governor in Council may not make a subsequent order under that subsection in respect of that public health emergency unless the Legislative Assembly passes a resolution approving the making of that subsequent order.

Maybe the Legislature should get involved in these kinds of situations.

3:50

Under section 52.2 amending as follows:

(a) by repealing subsection (1) and substituting the following.

In part (b)(3):

If an order under subsection (1) is made in respect of a public health emergency that exists or may exist, the regional health authority may not make a subsequent order under that subsection in respect of that public health emergency unless the Legislative Assembly passes a resolution approving the making of that subsequent order.

Again, it's an opportunity for the Legislature to become involved in a public health emergency and in the order that is coming out of a public health emergency, that a member of the Legislative Assembly may, in accordance with this section, bring before the Assembly a request to revoke, or amend any term or condition of, an order or exemption, a copy of which has been tabled under section 29(7), 38(2.1) or 52.4 [and that] on receiving a request under subsection (2), the member of the Executive Council must, within 2 sitting days of receiving it, bring the request before the Assembly for its consideration [and] consider the request for at least 2 hours [and] dispose of the request by resolution.

Madam Speaker, this Bill 202 is speaking to the fact that the author of this, the MLA for Central Peace-Notley, would like to see the Legislature become more involved in that process of public health emergencies. We can debate the issues, should this come before the House, as to whether this is the piece of legislation that should actually move forward or whether it should be amended or whether maybe we, at the end of the day, decide that it shouldn't go forward, that it should be voted down. But I believe that this is a worthy piece of legislation for the consideration of this House, so the motion for concurrence will have my support.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: That was beautiful timing, my hon. member.

Would the hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont like to close the debate?

[Motion for concurrence carried]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, the Assembly has concurred in the report, and the bill will be placed on the Order Paper for second reading.

Motions Other than Government Motions

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, the hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you so much, Madam Speaker. It is a great honour to rise and speak to this motion before this House. First off, I wish to thank the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul for his great work on this motion. It is often paramount to invest in postsecondary . . .

The Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt. The mover of the motion would be very pleased to move the motion.

The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Rural Health Care

504. Mr. Hanson moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to continue working to improve access to health care for residents of northern Alberta by increasing opportunities for postsecondary training in health care fields for rural students who agree to work in areas of rural Alberta that require medical professionals, once they have completed their training.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. My apologies to the House. I was on a Zoom meeting with the local municipality and one of the ministers. The one error, if I might say, in Motion 504 is that it says, "for residents of northern Alberta," and actually it's for residents of the entire rural area of the province. Thank you for that.

Northern Alberta has been struggling to have adequate access to health care for several years. It's not the first time I've gotten up and spoken about that in this House. I think that pretty much all of my members' statements and most of my questions for the last couple of years have been on this issue, that doesn't seem to be getting any better with what we've gone through with COVID, advocating to AHS for better recruitment of medical professionals for over six years that I've been in the House here. Recruiting medical students originally from rural communities is successful because they're more likely to commit to staying in rural communities for the long term.

This is something that I've been talking about for quite a long time. You know, rather than trying to attract foreign doctors – with all due respect to the foreign doctors, we've relied on them for many, many years, but they tend to not stay for very long periods of time once they get into rural Alberta. You can't really blame somebody that's grown up in a country with the average temperature of 28 to 30 degrees Celsius, and they come up to northern Alberta and discover what minus 30 feels like, right? It's not a surprise to me that not a lot of these folks stay.

I guess my priority is to work with the government. I know we've had some success working with the Minister of Advanced Education and the Minister of Health to create some more spots in the U of A and the U of C, which I think is where we need to concentrate to get some more seats and get our rural students accepted. I know that the program that we came out with on March 29 – the Minister of Health announced the $6 million program to help pay for students' medical school costs. In exchange for financial support, students have to complete their residency training in rural Alberta and agree to practise in a rural Alberta community when their schooling is complete.

What I'd really like to see, since we've got that and it's going to be a very successful program, I believe, is that I'd like to see it expanded not just for doctors and surgeons but also RNs and LPNs, lab technicians, nurse practitioners as well as midwives. I'd really like to see the RESIDE program, as good as it is – I think it's a step in the right direction. I've had really good feedback from my local communities and municipalities on it. But one of the things that we did hear about is increasing that to RNs, LPNs, and lab technicians, et cetera.

I do understand that the University of Calgary has got a program, where they're working with some of the local colleges, for allowing LPNs and RNs to go to school within their own communities. I know they're talking about a program with Portage College, which I'm pretty excited to hear about as well, so that local LPNs can get their upgrading right in their own local communities and get their training there as well as at least starting RN programs in rural Alberta and possibly finishing them up in the city. You know, the same shortage that we see for doctors is present for nurses, lab technicians, and midwives. That's why I'd like to see them added on to that.

Just as an example, I think last week I talked about it in the House here when I asked a question to the Health minister. For 44 eight-hour shifts at the Cold Lake hospital ER department, the ER was closed for all of those 44 shifts in one month, the month of – that's coming up in the month of April. Sorry. It was 35 in this month of March. I've also met with St. Paul nurses on a couple of occasions, with the local mayor, as well as with the northern director for AHS to address some of their issues. It just seems to be a spiral that the more stress we put on the system, the more nurses we lose. It just keeps getting worse and worse.

A big part of the complaints that the nurses had was that because of the medical emergency that was called, it gives AHS kind of special powers to redeploy. A lot of the nurses are concerned that they may have been working in home care for 10, 15 years and haven't actually worked in the hospital in their entire career, and suddenly AHS can have the power to redeploy them to an ER situation or an obstetrics situation that they haven't been trained or orientated to. So there are a number of things that we could work at to improve, but, like I say, it isn't just the doctor situation; it's the entire medical situation out in rural Alberta.

Attracting doctors during their medical degree does work. We have some stats here that 72 per cent of rural family medicine program graduates from the U of A and 66 per cent from the University of Calgary are practising in rural and regional communities; 57 per cent of rural integrated community clerkship program graduates from the U of A and 66 per cent from the University of Calgary are practising in rural and remote regional communities. We do have some practices that are working, but we need to, I think, increase those numbers of students in those rural programs. You know, if we can maintain that percentage of those students coming back into communities, the more seats, the better. I've actually been pushing for dedicated seats at the U of A and the U of C in the doctorate program, but we should also be doing that with all of our health care professionals.

Madam Speaker, according to enrolment data at the U of A – this is from 2020 – 138 rural applicants for their medical school in 2020: of those 138, 111 were deemed to have met all of the academic requirements, but only 25 of them were offered admission. That's kind of a step back. We recognize that there's a problem in rural Alberta. Our postsecondary institutions need to recognize that. With the amount of funding that we put in as a provincial government, we should have a little bit more say in addressing the problems. As I've said in the House many, many times, I'm not looking at a permanent change to postsecondary education, but what we need to do is highlight the issues that we have in the province and direct our efforts toward those. Basically, yeah, again, you know, only 22.5 per cent of qualified rural students actually received an offer from that school. On the same day I talked about the University of Calgary. We had 127 applications to med school; 119 were deemed to be qualified, and out of those 119 qualified applicants, only 11 rural students received an offer of admission.

This is where we're having the problem. I don't expect, you know, students that have grown up in Edmonton, Calgary, or major centres to be as attracted to a small-town setting, but if we can take our students from those small areas of Falher or northern Alberta, St. Paul – my son is a good example of that. It took him three years to get accepted into med school because he couldn't answer all the questions at the interview process properly and they score heavily against you because you don't have access to the research facilities and to be able to work in a hospital setting, which is something that they like to prioritize. You know, I've often said that they need to change the questioning to a little bit more rural standards, like maybe talking about cattle. I know it has nothing to do with med school, but it might get a lot of these kids accepted a little bit earlier.

These are the things. Like I say, it's nothing against urban students at all, but we need to address the fact that we have a problem in rural Alberta. I think it's far more likely that a student that grew up in that town gets accepted at the U of A or the U of C, gets some help from the provincial government with tuition, and maybe gets some help from their municipality as far as living expenses, with the agreement that they're going to move back to that community. We're really seeing in our small rural settings that, you know, we're trying to attract young families to come back and live in those communities. As a young couple that wants to raise a family and you're looking at moving anywhere in the province, one of the big things that you look at is access to health care. Are you going to be able to have an obstetrics facility to go and have a baby in? Right now we're in a crisis situation in Bonnyville, Cold Lake, and St. Paul when it comes to delivering babies.

I look out at the snowstorm that we had this morning. We got about three inches of snow last night again. The highways were glare ice for 30, 40 miles coming in. We're getting it again. Putting these people into a situation where they have no choice but to travel down these highways is tough. These are all things that we have to consider when we're looking at expanding and promoting our rural physicians and rural medical professionals. I mean, I can . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Motion 504, brought forward by the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul. I appreciate him bringing this motion forward, and admittedly I have not been advocating on this file nearly as long as this member has. Admittedly, as a resident of downtown Edmonton I did not know a lot about rural health care in the province of Alberta at the time that I had the honour of being appointed as the opposition critic for Health.

However, in my first year in the role I very quickly got a crash course, and that was, unfortunately, because of the chaos and disruption that was caused certainly for physicians and then later on throughout the pandemic for many rural health care professionals due to decisions by this government. Indeed, when the former Minister of Health moved forward with a number of changes that he was demanding, after this government tore up the contract that existed between doctors and the province of Alberta, it was rural health professionals, rural doctors that reached out to my office the most.

We have a short time for debate, so I'm not going to go into all the details, Madam Speaker, of what happened during that period, the concerns that were raised, but I will simply note that rural doctors were among the most that expressed the biggest concerns about the impact that this government's short-sighted decisions would make on their ability to continue to practise and provide services in their areas.

[Mr. Rowswell in the chair]

Rural physicians, of course, tend to work both – a lot of them like to have their own family clinic, and then they also work in the rural hospital. They are multidisciplinary. They enjoy the challenge of taking on a number of different roles and providing full service in their communities. The decisions made by this government directly undermined their ability to do that, and it took weeks for this government to sit up and listen and begin to make some changes. In that time, unfortunately, we did see some very good rural physicians, like the folks at the Moose & Squirrel in Sundre, that withdrew from the local hospital and have not yet returned. We saw the loss of doctors from the province of Alberta, and we've seen that continue since. Three times as many doctors left this province in 2021 as in 2019, 140. And, sadly, that impact is being felt far more deeply in rural communities.

I appreciate what the member said about this being a long-standing issue, but absolutely this problem has been badly exacerbated under this government. Now, that said, the proposals that the member is bringing forward, the things that he's talking about in terms of how to remedy this: absolutely – you know what? – I would agree with him on those.

Again, I've had the chance to speak with doctors from all corners of the province and indeed a number in rural areas and a number who worked at some of the clinics that were most respected for training rural doctors: the folks down in Pincher Creek, the folks in Sundre, and others who have been training up young doctors in the province and have been responsible for helping us get so many of the excellent rural physicians that we have been able to get. They agree with the member, as does the College of Physicians & Surgeons of Alberta and others, that the best way to recruit more doctors – and I'd agree, probably other rural health professionals as well – is, first of all, to offer more training where they are.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

If we recruit more people from rural areas, give them the opportunity to learn in their community, to get experience in their community, they're more likely to stay and to work in that community. So, absolutely, that is a good investment, and I'm pleased to hear that this government, after some of the real damage that it did, is taking steps to try to correct that. That is one step that absolutely I would agree with.

The RESIDE program: certainly, it's a small step, again, compared to the damage that has been done, the doctors that have been lost, but indeed I have heard support for that from some of the folks that I've talked with, some of the rural physicians, who feel that could help work towards that. I would agree with the member that perhaps looking at other incentive programs to bring other health professionals into some of these rural areas – absolutely, I agree. That could help solve some of these problems.

But, frankly, Madam Speaker, I think the most important thing that we need to get if we want to attract more health professionals is to actually have a fair contract, and sadly that's been undermined by this government. It's been dragged out far longer than it had to be. The initial contract, when it was unilaterally cancelled by this government – let's be clear; let's remember: this government went on an incredibly aggressive campaign to attack and smear physicians.

The then Minister of Health went on social media. They put up an entire website accusing these doctors, including many of these rural doctors, of abusing their position, misusing the billing system. For two years as these doctors, including many rural physicians, called on this government for virtual codes to be extended, to add the complex modifiers so that they could provide care to their patients in the midst of a pandemic, this government sat on its hands and refused to act, refused to listen, in large part at the beginning because they were intentionally trying to grind doctors down to try to get a better budget line.

This government has created an atmosphere. Again, I have talked to physicians as recently as last month, talked to physicians in Red Deer who said: "You know what? They lost contracts with anaesthesiologists who definitely specifically named the lack of a contract, the antagonism of this government as the reason why they decided not to come to Alberta."

Now, I know that the member who brought this forward was himself advocating and that he was demanding that the health care minister take action. Indeed, I believe that is in part why that Health minister finally did backtrack on a portion of the changes that he was trying to force through. I respect that the member brought forward that advocacy on behalf of his constituents, but there is still a lot of damage that needs to be undone, and all the programs in the world, all the incentives are not going to undo the fact that we still have a lot of uncertainty.

I recognize that the current Minister of Health certainly presents a much better face for this government in those negotiations. We are seemingly seeing some progress made, but this government still continues on many levels to push things to the very last minute. I know there's a situation right now with hospitalists in the province of Alberta. We have the situation with medical physicists in the province of Alberta where this government is indeed grinding right up to the very last minute within days of contracts ending. That still creates further chaos in the system. That is going to make it more difficult to recruit health care professionals indeed and specifically to rural areas, too.

The member mentioned, you know, speaking with nurses and others who were talking about the concerns they had about being redeployed during the pandemic and the stresses that were created. Again, Madam Speaker, those were decisions by this government on how it handled its COVID-19 policy, and again they repeatedly seemed to use our health care professionals – doctors, nurses, others – as a crash mat to take the impact of their political decisions. They were more concerned about their ability to stay in office than they were about doing the right thing for Albertans and indeed our health care system. As a result, we exhausted many of our health care professionals, which led us to the situation which began last May, where, as the member noted, we had these rolling closures of emergency rooms, closed beds. The Galahad seniors' care centre is still closed, 20 seniors still displaced because of a lack of nurses and other health care professionals. That has exacerbated this situation that we find ourselves in now.

Let's not forget that as we went into the fall, then, and into that fourth wave, as case counts were rising, this government was demanding 5 per cent wage cuts from those same nurses. Now, certainly, they arrived, in the end, at a better place, but let's not forget that that was the message this government sent to nurses in the midst of the fourth wave. Again, that creates an atmosphere where it's far more difficult to recruit.

It creates an atmosphere where it's far more difficult to convince people to go into postsecondary and study to be a nurse or a doctor when they see that their government is not going to value or respect them and indeed when they're going to have a Premier and others who talk about them as being a cost on the public balance sheet that has to be rectified as opposed to people who are bringing valuable services and, as the member noted, helping to support the economy in rural Alberta. As many members in this House have said in this House as they've spoken up for their constituents, our rural communities depend on having health care services available. That is at the core of these communities, and if the hospitals are undermined, as they have been in this last year because health care professionals have been undermined and attacked, then that hurts those communities.

With that said, I absolutely support this motion from the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul. I appreciate him bringing it forward. I appreciate the very practical suggestions that he is putting forward on how we begin to address these issues. It's just my hope that this government will also address the other many outstanding issues. Again, these programs are not going to be enough to undo the lack of trust that currently exists between this government and many health care workers. That is going to be the chief thing we need to overcome if we want to support our rural communities.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you so much, Madam Speaker. I appreciate this opportunity to speak on my good friend's motion. The Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul has been an excellent advocate for rural health care. Though I know that we shouldn't say names, I do have to acknowledge his nickname when we were in the opposition during the 29th Legislature. It was Dialysis Dave for his advocacy for the community of Lac La Biche in getting a permanent dialysis centre. Again, we can acknowledge the former Health minister also for her support on that. That was definitely a demonstration of good co-operation by both sides of the House to address the real needs of communities.

The system that we currently have, with the educational systems being focused in the larger centres, which is natural and is a model that is throughout the world in every nation – let the big schools be in the large centres. But the problem with this is that when we see people getting educated in these communities, in these large centres, they certainly become attracted to and desire to live in those very same centres and they become acclimated to all the amenities and the services available in large cities. I believe my good friend from Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul's hope is that perhaps more educational opportunities in rural areas will be supported.

Certainly, one example of this, if we were to look at Ontario as an example, is the Northern Ontario School of Medicine. Madam Speaker, back in 2005 Ontario decided to invest in a college to produce physicians in the communities of Sudbury and Thunder Bay, two smaller communities but very far away from Toronto. Many years later, when they reviewed the success of this school of medicine, it has exceeded expectations. It has been just a wonderful demonstration of what happens with this. To that effect, my understanding is that approximately a large percentage of students that are educated in this program actually stay in rural and remote communities, not necessarily in Thunder Bay or Sudbury but certainly in some other small communities around there, and to great success, keeping physicians in rural areas where we really need to attract these people.

Not only that, Madam Speaker, but this school in Ontario has also succeeded in supporting Indigenous Canadians in becoming physicians and who then practise their skills in many of these rural areas where they're from. This is a fantastic thing and something certainly that I hope we consider mimicking here in Alberta, perhaps a northern Alberta school of medicine with locales in Grande Prairie and Fort McMurray, as an example. Again, when we're trying to attract physicians and other health professionals to these rural communities, we have to look at the current impacts. Certainly, if we take Fort McMurray as an example, right now there are 46,000 trips a year from Fort McMurray to Edmonton just to see health care specialists and other professionals that aren't available in Fort McMurray. Despite a very rich community with an average household income of almost $200,000, despite the fact that the industry there creates, according to our last budget, $10.3 billion in revenues for this government, we have a hard time attracting people to this community to work as health professionals.

The ability to have a school of medicine in Fort McMurray, as an example, would be fantastic and certainly a way of not only attracting physicians but keeping them if not there then in other rural areas. Again, we continue to struggle in maintaining a lot of physicians in these rural areas as well as other health professionals. Lab technicians, diagnostic imaging, like people with nuclear medicine abilities so that they can run CT scans and whatnot, are so valued and so important. Paramedics are another area that we need more of. Certainly, in Fort McMurray we're blessed to have a paramedic program at our local college, but a program like that needs to be expanded in other areas. Certainly, northeastern Alberta, in particular, could definitely use some ability to attract people to this field.

Now, don't get me wrong; our government has done a lot to try to help in these areas. Our government committed $90 million towards the recruitment and retention of physicians to rural areas, and our government is also providing $57 million towards programs like the rural, remote, northern program and other programs similar to that like the rural education supplement and integrated doctor experience, or RESIDE. These programs play an important role in physician recruitment in local areas, but again we can do more. We can listen to the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul and start institutions that educate these people and get them acclimated to working and living in rural, northern, and remote communities.

With that, Madam Speaker, I just wish to thank you for the opportunity to speak here, and I hope the members of this House support this fantastic motion from my good friend.

Thank you so much.

4:20

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I do want to take a few minutes and talk about Motion 504, brought forward by the MLA for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul. I really appreciate this motion. I know that this member has been working on this issue from the time he first was elected, and it likewise has been a great concern in my constituency, too. I just want to read it.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to continue working to improve access to health care for residents of northern Alberta by increasing opportunities for postsecondary training in health care fields for rural students who agree to work in areas of rural Alberta that require medical professionals, once they have completed their training.

This has been an issue for quite some time in rural Alberta, of course, not having enough physicians, and now we see a shortage in nurses, too. It's been a great concern. We need to be able to get this under control. We've seen many shutdowns in my constituency of hospitals, and I think that when we look at the difference between rural Alberta and urban Alberta, again, we don't want to see urban Alberta suffering the same way as rural Alberta is as far as having hospital closures. Likewise, I don't think urban Alberta wants to see rural Alberta have hospitals shut down and not have access to health care in a reasonable distance from where you live.

Recently the Swan Hills hospital was shut down. I've got a daughter that lives there, and she's 34 weeks pregnant. Of course, it caused me alarm, when she was having some issues with her pregnancy, that she wouldn't be able to get to a doctor without a minimum hour's drive, maybe even more. Depending on the roads it might have been inaccessible altogether because weather in that area is very temperamental. We've seen the Fairview hospital close down beds from a nurse shortage. We've seen McLennan hospital shut down many times for lack of physicians.

I think there are many issues, and I know that this will take care of some of the issues or will work towards some of the issues that we see as far as health care professional shortage in rural Alberta, but we also have some other issues, too, and I just want to point out a couple of things. Right now we have students from Alberta, youth born and raised in Alberta, that want to become doctors, want to become nurses and can't get into the Alberta educational program, postsecondary educational program, so they travel outside Canada to be able to get their licence. The problem is that there are barriers to get back.

I know, for instance, a young lady in northern Alberta that grew up in a small rural town. Her grandmother was a doctor. She wanted to be a doctor, too. She couldn't get in in Alberta, so she travelled to England to become a doctor, and now I think she's been licensed there for over a year and a half. She's trying to come back to Alberta, but she can't because the process takes too much time. She could go almost anywhere else in the world, but for some reason we can't get her back here, and she wants to come back. She wants to practise in northern rural Alberta in a small community. The exact people that we want are not able to come back and do what we want them to do, so we need to be able to take away those barriers for bringing people in.

I know that we need doctors where we need doctors, not just doctors coming into Alberta, but we need them specifically where we're short doctors, and we see that need all across northern Alberta and all across rural Alberta. It mentions that in this motion, that we need these doctors in rural Alberta. It starts off talking about, you know, health care for residents of northern Alberta, but I know that it mentions in here, too – it talks about all of rural Alberta.

Another problem we had. We had a female doctor that wanted to come into McLennan, and the process and the testing – I think originally they were doing tests twice a year to allow the doctors to be certified to come in and practise. Well, then with COVID they shut it down to just once a year. This doctor came in, I think, a month or so after the test, which means she had to wait 10 or 11 months before the next test to be able to come in. There are processes like that that need to be changed so that we can remove these barriers to get doctors and health professionals to rural Alberta.

But I think one of the things we can be working on immediately is what this motion addresses, our postsecondary institutions right here in Alberta, where we can bring our Alberta students that want to practise in Alberta, particularly rural Alberta, and make sure we have places for them so that they don't have to travel outside the country to get their education and then go through this long, drawn-out process to get back.

I really do support this motion. I think it's fantastic. I want to thank the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul for bringing this forward. It is very important. It's very timely. There's never a bad time to be talking about the importance of rural health care and making sure that we have the services in rural Alberta that the people in urban Alberta have. Again, we don't want to see people in urban Alberta suffering, and they don't want to see us suffering in rural Alberta either. I think it's something that could be supported all around in this House, and I'm going to support this. Again, I appreciate the member bringing it forward.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the motion? The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Madam Speaker. First and foremost, I want to thank the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul for introducing this important motion in the House. As a member and resident of a rural area I have experienced the health care shortage issues present in our community first-hand. On March 15 Alberta Health Services sent out an e-mail to many of my constituents in Whitecourt informing them of a temporary interruption of C-section services at the Whitecourt health care centre. Many people might hear this news and wonder what the big issue is and why they can't go to another clinic. Unfortunately, they can't. The next closest health care centre is in Edson, over 95 kilometres away. Under perfect conditions that trip takes over an hour.

Can you imagine going through all the stress of pregnancy and then being told you may not be able to receive a life-saving C-section that you may need? It's not a feeling any expectant parent should go through. In a country like Canada no pregnant woman should worry about whether or not she and her baby will make it through labour and delivery, especially not in Alberta, the province with the third-highest GDP in the country.

I must admit that now seems like the perfect time for this motion to be brought forward, considering it will benefit everyone: the residents of rural areas, the students, young professionals starting their careers, and current health care workers experiencing significant strain. Earlier this year our government announced a $6 million investment to increase Albertans' access to the care they need, and those funds will be used over three years to help students pay for medical school costs.

Some exchange students will complete residency training in rural Alberta and agree to practise in a rural Alberta community when their schooling is complete. That is excellent news; however, physicians are not the only health care workers who are scarce in rural areas. All health care professionals are. This includes nurses, mental health professionals, social workers, physician assistants, respiratory therapists, dentists, pharmacists, speech-language pathologists, physical therapists, occupational therapists, physical and behavioural therapists, medical laboratory scientists, dietitians, and many, many more. Therefore, it is essential to have a plan in place to attract allied health care professionals to rural communities.

It's also important to remember that working in rural areas requires knowledge about those specific communities. Madam Speaker, that is why this motion is so important. Having a chance to gain experience and training from rural areas will allow students to understand rural upbringing, available resources, common health concerns, and societal needs. Studies have been conducted in Canada and the U.S. regarding the success of retaining health care professionals in rural areas, and they have all concluded that a positive undergraduate rural exposure and targeted postgraduate exposure outside urban areas are consistently associated with a greater probability of physicians choosing to practise in rural communities in the long run.

I would also like to point out how this motion is beneficial to students in different health care fields of study. This program will grant them hands-on experience, including the scope of practice required of a primary care physician. In many cases because the community is so small, students are able to work closely with the same attending physician all year. This is particularly valuable because it allows them to build on their experiences, have a more in-depth knowledge of their area of study, and grow as part of a team that can identify their strengths and weaknesses and provide tailored mentoring.

Madam Speaker, many of the leaders in different health care fields are of the opinion that rural rotation should be a part of every health care related curriculum. They're correct, because a rural rotation would introduce students to a career path that some may never have considered. What is more, according to a 2019 study in the long run working in rural communities has resulted in practitioners being less burned out than their urban counterparts. This is mainly due to the strong presence of community and family in rural areas. So often health care workers will take care of whole families. They will see and help them through birth, death, trauma, and, really, all parts of individual lives. In rural Alberta health care professionals forge relationships with their patients, which is vital for patient care as well.

Madam Speaker, an increased number of rural training programs alone won't solve the crisis in rural health care. Most pressingly, we need additional government funding for rural residencies. In addition, the lack of adequate infrastructure in some rural areas still needs to be addressed. Currently our government is modernizing and improving rural health facilities across the province, including in my constituency, and I look forward to watching this process continue as rural health concerns are heavily dependent on having appropriate facilities.

Now, I don't want to turn the focus to only doctors, because Alberta is currently facing a health care worker crisis in many fields, but most of the research available has been focused on doctors. Many people may not realize this, but the number of physicians that left Alberta last year nearly tripled compared to prepandemic years. Of the total of 568 physicians who left the profession in 2021, 140 left the province to simply practise elsewhere, in comparison with 87 in 2020 and 54 in 2019. While it may not be the cause in all cases, more often than not individuals in the health care field decide to leave due to burnout. This is particularly strong in rural areas, where health care workers continue to feel a growing strain and increased workload as there are staff shortages all around.

Madam Speaker, Budget 2022 has assigned specific funding for postsecondary institutions to target seat expansions to support Alberta's recovery plan. Now more than ever before we need to address the disproportionate shortage in rural communities and help stop the brain drain that the Alberta health industry is experiencing. The current partnership with the Rural Health Professions Action Plan has an initiative dedicated to offering educational resources and school outreach to encourage students to pursue careers in rural health care and providing enrichment and training programs to rural health practitioners to maintain and upgrade their skills.

Madam Speaker, advocacy is another important part of improving rural health concerns, which is why the Rural Health Professions Action Plan supports communities to attract and retain health professionals, brings a stronger voice to rural health workforce issues and accomplishments, and conducts research and analysis to develop innovative programs and policy towards improved rural health services.

I support these investments and the focus on expansion, and I do want to thank the government and the Minister of Health and the Minister of Advanced Education for their devotion to addressing Alberta's health care crisis. But I really want to once again focus on thanking my hon. colleague from Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul, who, like many rural colleagues, has truly been advocating at length for improving access to health care across every profession in rural health. Thank you, hon. member.

I would encourage all members of the House, like me, to vote in support of this motion. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate that. I so appreciate what all my colleagues before me have said, especially the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul for putting this motion forward. I'd just like to start by reading it.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to continue working to improve access to health care for residents of northern Alberta by increasing opportunities for postsecondary training in health care fields for rural students who agree to work in areas of rural Alberta that require medical professionals, once they have completed their training.

Madam Speaker, I want to start by talking about rural Alberta. I've lived in Medicine Hat and in rural Alberta since 1974, and I absolutely know that there is no better place in the whole world to live. The people are so friendly. I could spend all 10 minutes here telling you about my neighbours, all they do for me. I just have to open up my garage, and they come running to help me. It's amazing. And people are like that everywhere. You know, throughout rural Alberta they are so willing to be friendly, to lend a hand.

We all know about the economic opportunities in agriculture, forestry, oil and gas, and with some expansion of irrigation, and that is wonderful. Of course, Medicine Hat and Cypress county have the added benefit of the best weather in all of Alberta, so let's not forget that. Madam Speaker, rural Alberta is so extraordinary a place to live. But this is our biggest challenge: health care, to protect, as the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley said, our young families, our opportunity to have children and watch our families grow.

I'll just tell you about three stories that are on my mind. I heard about a young hockey player who broke his leg on the ice in small-town, rural Alberta. They had problems getting him to the hospital because there was only one person in the community with the level of EMT that it took to drive the ambulance, and, like everybody else, he was on a holiday. He needed a holiday. So they had to come up with another system to get him there, and fortunately it worked out. But that is one of the stories why, when people think about taking their family and their friends to rural Alberta, they do it with caution. It makes them think twice.

I think about when previous governments have changed some of the diagnostic laboratory testing. I think about one lady who did it for years and years in small-town Alberta and went to everybody's house and knew their neighbours, knew what they needed and when they needed it, and when that was centralized, it wasn't properly taken care of. We all know about HALO and HERO. We're expecting good news this week on some fairness and equity there. But, Madam Speaker, those are the kinds of things that make people hesitate before they move out to areas that have so many other things.

But also doctors. I'm so grateful to have represented for 10 years Cypress-Medicine Hat, and it's easily three young Albertans a year that come to my office with perfect university scores – you know, 4.0s out of Calgary or 9s out of Edmonton – with lists a mile long of volunteer work and community engagement, and for some reason they can't get into medical school. Now, I missed some of the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul mentioning some of the statistics, but I think that it was, like, almost three-quarters of those that apply can't get in. At the same time, some of our emergency rooms – we just saw last week that Ponoka's emergency room was closed overnight. What, to me, was amazing about that one: it was the very day that we had just approved $25 billion in health spending from the year before, with the 700-plus million dollars in supplemental supply, and we're announcing an emergency room being closed. I hope they got it going again. I hope the locum or whatever was necessary got figured out for that, you know, what could have been done.

Madam Speaker, again, I think of three or four of these younger people that have come to me that have ended up leaving Canada for their training: Ireland, the Caribbean, America. I don't think a single one of them has come back. My hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley talked about some of the bottlenecks to coming back, but I don't think these other young Albertans, these other young doctors, ever decided to come back, where their first preference was to practise in rural Alberta, to practise in Medicine Hat.

I think of how word spreads. When their 10 or 20 or 40 friends in university or high school with similar aptitudes and similar interests hear that one of their shining stars, one of their champions couldn't get in, do you think that encourages these other people to try? I bet you not. That's why I'm so thankful that the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul put this forward. This is not only about the 30 people or so, the 30 young Albertans that came to see me in the last little while. It's about the hundreds of their friends behind them that would pursue a similar career, and it's about the hundreds of Alberta patients that aren't being serviced in emergency rooms.

The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo mentioned – I think he said that 46,000 of his citizens and constituents come into Edmonton every year for their treatments. Okay. So it costs the citizen, it costs the Albertan money to get here and do that rather than the system, but it's a huge cost. It's a huge lack of service, again, when it was stated that we have the third-biggest GDP in the world.

An Hon. Member: In Canada.

Mr. Barnes: In Canada. The third-biggest GDP in Canada. Thank you.

Anyway, regardless, two years ago oil and gas royalties were $3 billion, this year were $13 billion. What an opportunity to put some of that money into solving a long-term problem. Of course, a motion is a value statement to the government. A motion doesn't have the means to measure the government actually doing this, but I hope that this government will give it direction to not only increase spots at the U of C and the U of A for doctors, but I hope it will also go a long way to make sure that all the other allied health professionals have the opportunity to receive service and give service.

Again, the hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo mentioned about 46,000 people a year from his area going to Edmonton. In southern Alberta they go to Montana. They end up spending big money to get a knee or a hip or a shoulder fixed in Montana instead. Wouldn't it be better to take care of those people here? Wouldn't it be better to give them that quality of life and that opportunity for professionals to grow here?

It's always hard to talk a bit late, when a lot of the things have been talked about, but again my compliments and my thanks to the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul for a motion that is bang on, exactly what Alberta needs. I hope the government will put in the measurement and the desire to make this happen. I will be supporting it.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wish to speak to the motion? The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright.

Mr. Rowswell: Thank you, Madam Speaker. First, I'd like to thank the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul for proposing Motion 504. It will go a long way to ensure that rural Albertans receive adequate health care services. Rural communities represent a significant part of Alberta's population, and they are key to our province's economic growth and overall success. I remember that the same member has said numerous times the amount of revenue that flows into the province's coffers from rural Alberta, and it's incumbent upon us to make sure that we create a good lifestyle there, where people can get medical services, which is part of a lifestyle, to maintain those places so that we can continue to create the revenue that comes into the province's coffers.

There's more that contributes to ensuring that local populations are met with the best health care than just building hospitals. We need the people. We need outreach programs, satellite clinics, mobile services, in-home services, digital services, which we found out about this year relative to telehealth and virtual care. We also need to expand opportunities for other practitioners such as nurses and health care aides to shore up medical services.

To achieve these services, we must first be cognizant of the differences and the challenges separating rural health care from urban health care. It wasn't one of the things that I was up to date on when I first came to this House. I had certain things I wanted to work on, and health care wasn't one of them, because I didn't know exactly how it worked, but I've learned. I know that in an urban setting there are doctors that are clinical doctors. There are doctors that specialize in the emergency units and other ones that specifically do rounds at the hospitals. In rural centres they do all of that. They do their clinicals in the morning, and they're available on shifts for emergency care. They can put in a lot of time, and that may not suit everybody. You know, it takes a special person to accommodate that and work at it.

They're very well known in the community. I know that when I wander around my community and you get talking to people, they know their panel size, which is interesting, you know? They know who's got the biggest client list or patient list or whatever, and they do know that.

I know they've been very involved. Like, we raise a lot of money for – we find a specific need. For example, Wainwright needed a new CT scanner, so it became a project of the community. Actually, on April 23 we're doing another fundraiser in Wainwright just to continue to do this, and they put money in as well as other people in the community, but they're there. They're supporting it. Everyone knows. They know who everybody is. We did another one in Lloydminster, and it was the health foundation that was helping raise money to relocate our dialysis machine. Well, the doctors were there and very involved in raising money for that, and in the end we got the money. The CT scanner is going into Wainwright as we speak, and the money is in place for the renal dialysis machine in Lloydminster to get replaced, so that's good.

Another thing that I found that was interesting was medical students. We met with a group of medical students in the Legislature in one of the rooms up here. You know, all I'd heard was how tough it was to get rural doctors. When we sat down and met with this group of people, they said, "We loved coming to rural Alberta to do our residency." That kind of took me aback. I said: "Well, what do you mean? All I hear is that you guys don't want to come out to rural Alberta." The reason they liked it is because they got a broad range of experiences. They didn't specialize and get pigeonholed into a certain area, so they really enjoyed the fact that they were able to get a broad range of experience. But then they left. They went back to wherever they came from, so it was a problem keeping them in those, and it might have something to do with the potential hours of work.

Another problem that happens is when we're trying to get a lot of doctors. When they're trying to recruit another one, they're looking for specific talents as well to fill in the complement of skills that are available in the community. And the doctors got very involved in that, with health councils and trying to get people to come in for that, and that's the doctors' component of it.

The other one: like, we do have the RESIDE program, and that is specifically for doctors, where we're going to – just going to check my notes here and make sure I get it right. Anyway, I think it's about $2 million for 60 students, in that range, that we're putting that money to, and the goal is to say: "Okay. Come here. We'll pay money towards your tuition, but you've got to commit to stay in the community for a certain length of time." And the goal is that . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt.

Under Standing Order 8(3), which provides for up to five minutes to the sponsor of a motion other than a government motion to close debate, I would now invite the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul to close debate on Motion 504.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, and thank you to all the members that spoke in support of my Motion 504. This is really nothing new, folks, a decades-old issue. It's been going around for a long time. As a matter of fact, I have a 72-page report, the rural health services review, that was initiated in 2014 by Premier Prentice and then Minister Mandel under the supervision of Dr. Richard Starke, the MLA for Vermilion-Lloydminster. The issues – I've read through the whole thing. It's 72 pages long. Nothing has changed, right? The good thing about it is that we don't have to do another review, because it's already been done. We need to take some action.

I'd just like to point out to the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat that it's actually worse than you stated, sir, because only 9.2 per cent of rural applicants were accepted at the U of C in 2021. Nine per cent. We have a problem in rural Alberta. We need to recognize that as a government. We need to recognize that at the postsecondary school level as well. We need to work together with all levels of government – federal, municipal, and provincial – as well as with our post-secondaries to fix this problem.

We need to encourage rural students: work hard, and we will support you to improve your community and train in your community. We need to step up our program a little bit. As a matter of fact, exactly what the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat said, it's that students watch these, you know, superintelligent students that grew up in their school apply and apply and apply and apply and apply, get rejected and rejected, so if you're a grade 11 student, you're going to kind of change your focus from med school to something else because you see that it's just nearly impossible to get accepted to it. I think that's something that we really need to change.

I'm trying to change that at the municipal level. I'm trying to encourage my junior high and high schools to start talking to those students in the grade 6, grade 7 level, so that they can work on their marks so that they're the top of their class and get accepted, and make sure that we have the support, that finances aren't the roadblock when we have a good student that can get into med school. They're very valuable to their community. They improve the overall value of the community for attracting young families, which is what we need to continue to make our communities grow.

Remuneration may be a part of it. Like the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo said, you know, when we look at the contribution from these areas to the province and rural Alberta, maybe we need to spend a little bit more. I know that there is a program out there, but it needs to be reviewed because it's not been very effective.

We need to remove the roadblocks for assessments of our international students. I know a number of them personally from St. Paul, two young men that couldn't get into U of A and U of C, so they went and studied abroad and cannot get back in. They're willing to come back to rural Alberta, practise and stay and raise their families for 30 years but can't get in, can't get an assessment.

We need to make it a priority with the College of Physicians & Surgeons that when we have an applicant that's willing to commit to a long term in rural, they get the high priority for those assessments.

Surgical facilities. We've got some great surgeons that are living out in rural Alberta. Cold Lake and St. Paul specifically I can speak to. You know that yellow line that runs down the highway? It's because traffic goes in both directions, and I can't see why a person from Edmonton – if they could move up four months in their surgical wait time, they're going to come out to St. Paul. They'll come out to Cold Lake. They don't care. If they knock four months off a wait for a knee surgery, why wouldn't we do that?

I'm going to probably run out of time here, but we need to make better use of our rural facilities and our rural colleges to get the education upgraded so we can educate our rural students to come back to our rural communities. Please, everybody.

I thank you in advance for supporting Motion 504.

[Motion Other than Government Motion 504 carried]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 9 Public's Right to Know Act

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to be here today to move second reading of Bill 9.

This is the Public's Right to Know Act, which will make it easier for Albertans to find information about crime in communities throughout the province. As the name of the bill itself indicates, we believe that folks have a basic right to know how crime is affecting their community. Madam Speaker, today we're delivering on a platform commitment to put forward legislation that's designed to uphold and to strengthen that very right. Another promise made, another promise kept. If passed, this legislation would require the provincial government to report currently available crime and justice system metrics annually. This would involve publishing information like police-based crime data on the government of Alberta website and tabling the information in a report to this House every year. This annual reporting requirement would enhance transparency by creating an expectation among the public that the government will provide Albertans with this information at regular intervals and ensure that it's easy to find and easy to understand.

Now, we know from talking to folks that there's a strong appetite for this kind of information as well as valid reasons for wanting it. During a tour of the province in 2019 the former Minister of Justice and Solicitor General heard from many rural Albertans who were concerned about crime, and they also told him that they wanted more information about what was happening in their communities.

Transparency is certainly a principle that's worth upholding, but increased openness isn't the only benefit of legislation like this. There's a saying that goes back centuries: knowledge is power. Well, there's a reason that expressions like that have become so popular. It's because they're true. Information empowers people to make better decisions. Improving access to crime data could help decision-makers at many different levels develop policies and take actions that are based on evidence. A troubling crime trend could expose gaps in services and lead to the development of new initiatives or the development of new enforcement strategies. An example: a rural crime watch group may make different decisions about the need for volunteering or volunteer patrols or public awareness efforts after they've taken a look at and studied crime data that's in their area.

At a more basic level this is also about empowering Albertans to make better decisions about their own personal safety. Knowing property crime statistics may prompt someone to lock up their car instead of idling it with the key in the ignition, or a business owner may decide to invest in surveillance cameras or an alarm system. What these examples have in common is that in both cases having access to reliable information can bring about better outcomes. A better informed public can help build safer communities for everyone in Alberta, and it starts with ensuring that folks have easier access to information that they're entitled to know.

I hope members on both sides of the House will support this legislation, and I ask that we move second reading of Bill 9. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to join the debate on Bill 9? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much. I'm pleased to rise and speak to Bill 9. I think that to open my comments on this bill, the first thing worth saying is: what, Madam Speaker, does this bill do? And the answer is: nothing. This bill doesn't do anything. It's called the public's right to know, and it requires that the minister publish a report.

What needs to be in that report? Well, Madam Speaker, what needs to be in that report is information and data. "What does that mean?" one might wonder. Well, unfortunately, the answer sure can't be found in this bill. It requires the publication of information and data that the minister considers necessary or advisable. That's what it requires. I mean, I would love for someone to explain to me how this requires the minister to do anything. Now, we certainly just heard the minister speak, and he said that it will require the publication of crime data. Well, he may choose to publish crime data, but it's sure not required in this bill. This bill doesn't require him, again, to do anything at all. It requires simply that he publish a report and that that report contain information and data. For all we know, he could publish a report entirely filled with the number of patrons at some coffee shop. This bill doesn't require anything.

Now, the Lieutenant Governor in Council – that's cabinet – can in fact make regulations about this, but we don't know what those regulations are going to be. They're not made at this time – they can't be; that's the normal course – but my issue with this bill is that it is entirely void of substance. Leaving literally everything to be defined in regulation, leaving literally everything up to the discretion of the minister isn't really legislation. The point of legislation is to bind government officials. The point of having to come forward to this House and put forward a bill is to have something that is before this House, that the members of the Legislature get to decide on the substance of, to require the government to do things. This bill doesn't require the government to do anything except to publish a report which may contain information; we know not what.

I think this bill is incredibly problematic, and it's incredibly problematic because it's being sold as something that's going to increase transparency, but the bill itself lacks anything resembling transparency. If the minister had come forward to this House with a bill that required him to publish reports and then listed the type of information and data that was required, I would be supportive of that, but this, I mean, essentially says that he can publish a report and it can include things. Well, I mean, I think the minister probably could have published a report and it could have included things without this bill. This wasn't something that needed to come to the Legislature. He could have just published a report if he was feeling so inclined.

I think it's worth talking about what ought to be in this bill. I mean, one of the things that could be included in this bill, that's definitely worth reporting on, is information about cases at risk from Jordan. The Jordan case, as members of this House will be very aware – myself in particular because I was the minister when it came down – significantly altered timelines before criminal courts. It was a big change in the law when it came down, and it required governments, particularly provincial governments, to move very quickly, and in fact the federal government made multiple changes to the Criminal Code arising from Jordan to try and tighten up the timeline procedures. Now, that's not to say that cases didn't get tossed out for unreasonable delay before Jordan, but it certainly became a much bigger issue after Jordan.

Now, this minister, the minister who gets to decide what statistics are relevant to be published, went out in the media and declared that no cases were beyond the Jordan timeline, that nothing was at risk. It's difficult to describe that using language that I am allowed to use in this place, but it was factually inaccurate in the most large sense of the word. There are, in fact, many cases, and in fact the Crown prosecutors' association came out and contradicted the minister because it was just completely inaccurate. It just absolutely isn't the case. And this is the minister who gets to decide what's published in the report, the minister who doesn't think any cases are at risk for Jordan.

How about information on how many sexual assault victims have been denied funding as a result of this government's changes to the victims of crime act, changes that were rejected by the community, changes that were rejected by victims' advocates and which this government trotted out and did consultations on fixing?

[The Speaker in the chair]

What happened to those consultations? Well, Mr. Speaker, who knows what happened to those consultations? We never heard back from them. This government went out, they consulted on how to fix the mess they had made of the victims of crime act, how to fix the fact that they had cut victims of sexual and domestic violence off from what little supports they were entitled to; nothing ever came of it. It's still like that.

This same minister actually proudly walked into estimates and told us how much money is being taken from the victims of crime fund, money that was intended for victims, and being used in other priorities that this minister has. So he's the one who gets to decide whether that's relevant data or not?

How about race-based data? I mean, I'd say that there could be very little more relevant to the criminal justice system, but that's certainly not mentioned in this bill.

We have, Mr. Speaker, a problem and have done for a long, long time. Anyone who denies the existence of systemic racism, quite apart from being wrong, is saying something quite problematic about the data, because the data is quite clear in terms of incarcerations that, you know, Indigenous Albertans, Black Albertans, many Albertans of different races are far more likely to come into contact with the justice system: they are far more likely to be incarcerated. If we take seriously the idea that every person is equally likely to be capable of committing a crime, then it has to be something in the system that is responsible for those results, because the results are clear, and that is incredibly troubling. It should be incredibly troubling to us all.

What we need is information because there are, unfortunately, many people out there who still believe that systemic racism is not a thing that exists. So let us test that hypothesis, let us publish the data, and then we will know, because as a justice system we absolutely must take accountability for the impacts of decisions and for the impacts of the system that we have created. To suggest that in a system where, you know, close to 40 per cent, at least at last look, of the people incarcerated at any given point in time are Indigenous when they represent closer to 6 per cent of the population, to suggest that there is nothing wrong in the system that's causing that problem is to suggest something incredibly troubling.

I think we need to take this seriously, and I certainly think that that is the sort of data that should be in this bill but isn't. It's certainly possible to do, because my colleague the Member for Edmonton-City Centre has brought forward a bill on precisely that.

Here's another thought. How about data on how many police resources are being used to deal with the lack of affordable housing? This is a huge, system-wide problem. We use the wrong systems to deal with the wrong problems. We use the most expensive and the least humane solution we can think of, in many cases, to deal with people who aren't housed. This government has embarked on a mission of cutting affordable housing. They brought forward a bill that they claimed would increase it but didn't.

I won't go down the rabbit hole of that bill, because it was incredibly troubling to say that something's doing the opposite of what it's actually doing, but definitely the amount of affordable supportive housing being built under this government has been significantly lower. Municipalities have been begging for help to build affordable housing, to build permanent supportive housing. People from throughout the sector have been begging for help to find better solutions than people staying in shelter for the length of time that they stay in shelter, and this government has turned a blind eye and a deaf ear and everything they can think of. This government has ignored them, and that's incredibly problematic because this is extremely costly.

How about data on the number of people who wind up in the justice system, in police custody, in our jails, going through the court system and the cost of that relative to the cost of housing those people? I think that is information that would be extremely informative to Albertans. I think if Albertans saw that information, if they saw the true cost of cutting affordable housing, they would be incredibly supportive of investing.

How about data on how much social disorder and how much crime is due to underfunded social programs? That would be important data. I mean, if there's one thing I heard consistently from police throughout the province it's that they don't want to be the first line of intervention for a mental health crisis. When we talk about police funding versus funding in other areas, it is often the case that people misapprehend, and they think that the police want to be the people who are responding. They don't, but you have to answer 911. There's actually case law on this.

When someone phones 911, there is a duty to respond. When every other system fails, when someone falls through every other crack, that's what's left, 911. They have to come. It's not because they want to come. It's not because the police want to be in charge of the most acute mental health crises in this province; it's because they are legally bound to do that. So if we could get the data on how much we pay to essentially underfund mental health services, I think that would be incredibly illuminating information for Albertans. I think that would completely change public opinion on how we spend and where we spend.

This is supposed to be an act about the public's right to know, the public's right to understand information about the criminal justice system, so it should require the publication of information. I think that this information, information about the true costs of not investing in affordable housing, about the true costs of not investing in social programs and mental health programs and programs that support people to not come into contact with the justice system, would be incredibly illuminating, and I think that this bill should require that information.

How about progress on Indigenous overrepresentation in our correctional centres? That would be incredibly important information. This is an issue that has plagued the justice system for decades, probably since its inception, although we probably don't have good data that goes back that far, but I would suspect that it is. How about data on that? How about if we publish that? I think if the people of this province truly understood the scope of the problem, truly understood the level to which we, as a set of government systems and individuals who work within those government systems, have failed Indigenous people in this province, I think that would be very illuminating information for them.

This, at the end of the day, is my big issue and my big concern with this bill, that it allows the minister to cherry-pick data to support whatever narrative he happens to choose to drive at that moment. It doesn't require anything. It doesn't require the publication of data on any subject, and it leaves it entirely to the discretion of the minister. That is incredibly troubling because in the hands of the wrong minister what it means is that the data that is being published can be used to paint an inaccurate picture. You can use truth to paint a picture that is not, in fact, the truth by simply picking and choosing what data you put forward. That is my huge concern with what's going to happen with this bill, that they're going to pick and choose what data comes forward based on what data happens to support whatever the narrative of the moment is.

This is a government with a demonstrated history of willingness to be blown around by political whims. They claim to be the government of law and order, and they sit silent while members of their own caucus go to support an illegal border blockade that cost hundreds of millions of dollars to the economy.

Mr. Hunter: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is called. The hon. Member for Taber-Warner.

Point of Order Allegations against Members

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I call a point of order on 23(h), (i), and (j). The hon. member knows that this has been an issue that has been talked about in this House. Speakers have not made rulings but have cautioned the members to be careful in the way that they are expressing the events that actually happened down at the border. The hon. member knows this. She's been in this House many times when this has been an issue. I would ask that she apologize and withdraw those comments.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is absolutely not a point of order. In fact, this would not fall under 23(h), (i), and (j). The member has been really quite measured and reasonable in her approach, and she's stating a fact in mentioning the illegal blockades. This is not a point of order, and I would love for the member to be able to continue her eloquent speech.

The Speaker: Are there any others?

I am prepared to rule. I'm not convinced that at this time this is a point of order. The member was speaking quite broadly and not specifically.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Yeah. I think the point there that I was attempting to make is that this government's support for law and order, much though they may espouse it, waxes and wanes depending on the political will of some of their members, and that's problematic.

Again, this is a bill that doesn't require them to do anything. It's a bill that allows them to pick what data they bring forward. We've literally just seen a member of this House rise and attempt to argue that something which is illegal was not illegal. I mean, I find it problematic that that's where we're leaving this.

Meanwhile, as we have this bill that doesn't require the minister to do anything, this government is in a position to move on a myriad of issues. They could move on the victims of crime fund. They've certainly done the consultation. They could put back the supports – put back the supports – for victims of sexual assaults, for victims of domestic violence, for victims of any sort of crime at all. This government has massively cut the supports they give to victims. They've shortened the timelines, and they've disallowed a series of lines of benefits in a way that suggests they just don't understand trauma at all or what the costs of trauma are. The benefits were very small, but they allowed, say, a victim of sexual assault to take some time, not a long time but at least a few days, off work to deal with their trauma or to pay for some counselling to deal with their trauma.

The government could be bringing forward a bill that fixed that problem. The government could be moving forward with ensuring that we continue forward with the RCMP contract. I mean, this is a huge concern to many Albertans. There are lots of things that could be in this bill, but instead it has nothing.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to join in the debate this evening? The Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View for framing what are arguably some of the greatest flaws in this legislation. I am of course pleased to speak to Bill 9, which is titled the Public's Right to Know Act. It's a three-page bill, but certainly it doesn't really insist on the right to know because most of the sections begin with "may." We all know that "may" is just about saying that the government can choose to do something or may choose to do it, but there is nothing actually compelling them to do it. The section that says "shall," the only section really that has a "shall" in it, is section 3(1).

The Minister shall prepare a report respecting data and information relating to the criminal justice system in Alberta, including data and information in respect of the year immediately preceding the year in which the report is prepared, that the Minister considers necessary or advisable to carry out the purposes of this Act.

Now, I want to say that when I think about reporting annually, we have an excellent process in place in this Legislature. It's actually annual reports that relate to each and every ministry, and within them they should be related to the actual business plan objectives as outlined in the government's budget, a budget which we have just finished considering in this Assembly, the ministry business plan for Justice and Solicitor General for 2022-25.

The government has chosen to only have three outcomes that are going to be measuring their success of their delivery of the business of the Ministry of Justice. One of the reasons why I highlight this is because we used to have much more extensive publication of what our goals and objectives were for each of the respective ministries, but this government has significantly pared it down over the last two years to only three actual measurable performance objectives.

Then even within that, the performance metrics that they tie to them don't necessarily make sense to the actual objectives; for example, performance metric 2(a), "Performance Measure: Provincial Court of Alberta lead time to trial for serious and violent matters." There are some targets mentioned. There's no reference to prior years, so you would have to go back. Oh, and the target is 24 weeks, so half a year, half a year for lead time to trial on serious and violent matters. That's a flat target. They don't plan on reducing that at all for the next three years that their business plan is out.

If the government actually wanted to take the matter of serious and violent matters seriously, they would adjust the way that they present and the way that they plan through their actual business plan, just like any private organization has objectives that they outline for their shareholders. Albertans are the shareholders of Justice in the province of Alberta, and we deserve to have a government that takes their role seriously in actually addressing serious matters of justice being delayed and therefore denied.

If the government wanted to take this matter seriously, I would strongly encourage them to amend the way that they're conducting themselves through their business plans in the province of Alberta, specifically as it relates here today to the Ministry of Justice, because what happens with the business plan and then, in turn, an annual report is that the Auditor General can actually provide some of that auditing function on behalf of the people of Alberta as an independent officer of this Legislature to actually say: "The government set these as their key objectives. This is how they govern themselves. Did they achieve those objectives?" Then that information comes back to an all-party committee of the Legislature, of course, Public Accounts, and we have an opportunity to actually probe more deeply into: did the government indeed work to achieve the objectives that it said it set out to achieve, and what are the measures of success or failure as it relates back to that?

However, Mr. Speaker, instead what we get is a three-page bill full of may's, that "the Minister may enter into an agreement with any of the following bodies for the provision of data", that the minister may "collect and use data and information, including personal information," subject to regulations. The minister, oh, shall lay a copy of the report before the Legislature. But, again, what value is the report when it's predicated on "may"? Giving the minister already – and I will say that the minister absolutely has the ability already to do these types of things if he or she so chooses.

The city of Edmonton, for example – I just went to pull it up, but they're doing some work on their website – has an interactive heat map of the city where you can actually look at the different types of calls that happened and what's going on in a variety of neighbourhoods. You can do that throughout the entire city. There's nothing limiting that sharing of data in real time, and it's all data. It's not the data that the minister so chooses at that point in time, as the Member for Calgary-Mountain View so rightfully pointed out. There are ways for us to have consistent, transparent, and available to the Auditor General opportunities for accounting and holding the government to account on actually delivering its mandate if that was what the government actually wanted to do.

Instead, what appears to be the case is that the government wanted a communications exercise, to be able to say that they're doing something when it's really that they're doing nothing. They're giving themselves the right, if they so choose, to report on things that they may or may not want to choose to report on. Like, it is such an exercise in a government that once claimed to care about law and order, but clearly there are multiple RCMP investigations, as the Premier just reminded everyone of today, one including his own leadership campaign from the last time and, as has been highlighted, the well-documented participation in matters that significantly harmed the economic well-being particularly of southern Alberta through the most recent blockade measures that members have participated in.

Again, if the government wanted to be more open and transparent and actually wanted the public to have a right to know, I would ask . . .

Mr. Rutherford: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted. The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Point of Order Allegations against Members

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Under 23(h), (i), and (j). I just caught, I think, the Member for Edmonton-Glenora referring to our side participating in blockades. I think members have been clear about when they spoke to constituents, when they went down to Coutts, what they did, what had happened at the time when they went. To continue the narrative that they participated in the blockade is a false accusation.

The Speaker: The Opposition House Leader.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I believe that this is not a point of order, that this is a matter of debate. My colleague was talking about a wide range of issues, including the reported-on fact that UCP MLAs attended the blockade and attended what was happening at Coutts, well reported in the media. I believe this is a matter of debate. I was listening to my colleague's language. She did not mention any specific members, did not accuse anyone of anything. I don't believe that this falls under 23(h), (i), or (j), but I look forward to your ruling.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing none, I am prepared to rule. I know that members inside the Assembly will quite often make accusations about a wide variety of protests that members of the Assembly may or may not have attended, with a variety of facts of their attendance at any of those events, so at this point in time I don't find this a point of order but a matter of debate.

Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Let's talk about outcome 3 in the most recent business plan for the government of Alberta. I did talk about outcome 2. Outcome 3 talks about introducing "a new model of victim service delivery to ensure victims have the help they need, when they need it." But, of course, we know that it doesn't restore the actual victims of crime fund. That could have been a much better use of the public's right to know. This bill, in my opinion, could have been about something. It could have been about helping those who are survivors and victims in having a path back to being able to have some compensation to help address some of the harm that's been caused to them, but the government instead has chosen simply to put, you know, a new model as one of their objectives and no accountability with regard to that in terms of legislation. They could have brought forward a bill.

Then 3.2 talks about continuing "to implement digital transformation to improve Albertans' access to services, promote system sustainability." Sure. No measures at all to talk about what it is that they'll be measuring to determine whether or not they were successful in achieving that objective. And then 3.3: "Work with the courts and other stakeholders to develop options for individuals and families interacting with the justice system who could benefit from targeted services, interventions and supports, where appropriate." Again, no actual ways of measuring this identified clearly through the actual business plan and budget documents. So if the government wanted to take the opportunity to create a bill and try to package it as a communications exercise, they certainly had the opportunity to address any of the key objectives outlined in the budget that the government just passed and could have acted in that regard.

Earlier today we had an opportunity to reflect on some of the challenges that the province has been facing in terms of crime, and the minister, I think, is right to highlight that those who have been impacted directly by crime – it has a serious negative consequence for most Albertans who've experienced it, whatever that crime might look like. Again I want to say to folks who've already worked to ensure greater levels of transparency that, unfortunately, I don't think this bill is going to do that in any sort of meaningful way given the way that the legislation is written, the vagueness, and that it, you know, simply appears to be a communications exercise rather than actually talking about the types of information that will be included or disclosed and in what ways.

Again, there is an annual report for Justice each and every year, which the Auditor General reviews, and that is probably one of my other biggest concerns with this bill, that it is simply a way for the minister, whoever that happens to be, to package some information that they want to share with people and say that they're doing it in a bill. The minister can certainly write reports any time he or she sees fit and can present information to the public much more frequently than annually if they so choose and can do it in a way that is responsive to the needs of the citizens of Alberta, but this bill doesn't compel any of that, and it doesn't ensure that there's any rightful oversight when it comes to actually reviewing the information to see if it's actually responsive to the needs of Albertans.

I do want to take a moment here to say that if the government wanted to do something to take a bill and to turn it into a government bill, I suspect that my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre would welcome the opportunity for his private member's bill to be taken by the government and moved forward as a government bill. I think that he's done considerable outreach with the community, and we've heard repeatedly how having broken-down analytics, including race-based data, would make for more honest reporting and for an opportunity to have better demographic analysis and better programming in place to address some of the root concerns that people feel with the justice system here in Alberta. Of course, it isn't just an Alberta-specific problem, but there are some serious problems with the justice system that I think we as a society need to address, and we could do that through a meaningful piece of legislation that talks about gathering actual race-based data to help inform better policy-making decisions.

Maybe the minister wants to do something around that, this minister today, in relation to this bill, but there is certainly nothing compelling that in the way this bill is written, and I don't think Albertans have confidence that this government will act on that in a meaningful and sustained way. It really does feel like this is a bill about nothing, and that is disappointing, because there are so many pressing issues as we continue to navigate through this important time in Alberta's history, and I would have loved to see a Justice bill that talked about restoring some of the harm done to the victims of crime compensation fund and about having greater accountability and transparency when it comes to the government's decisions and the government's actions and the way that those are carried out in our society and how it impacts the justice system. I think that we did have an opportunity for that, and the government has really missed seizing the day. It was sort of teed up for them, and they have really missed the mark, I think, on this.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I think I'll cede the remainder of my time to my colleagues. Thank you for the opportunity to engage on this discussion here today.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to briefly address Bill 9 and to just carry on where my colleagues both from Calgary-Mountain View and Edmonton-Glenora have talked about the shortcomings in this bill. I, too, see that this bill does little to address the priorities of Albertans. It does little to address the key justice issues that are before this province at this time, and my colleagues identified some of those key justice issues, like the victims of crime fund, where there is a report that has been laid before members of this government and could be followed up with in terms of a bill to positively impact the situation for victims of crime, serious crime.

There is, again, another issue of overrepresentation of Indigenous persons in the correctional system and institutions. That could be the subject of a bill, and I think all would welcome that. Of course, the underinvestment in the mental health system and the impact on those people who have mental health challenges by the system of enforcement in this province or indeed the impact on people in poverty with regard to the system of enforcement and policing services. The significant number of Albertans that are dying daily as a result of drug poisonings, five Albertans daily: are there better ways that the public could find out through the Solicitor General on how to deal with that situation?

All those important issues are overlooked by a bill that purports "to increase transparency and accountability with respect to the criminal justice system." That's purpose (a); (b) is "to help Albertans better understand the criminal justice system;" and (c) is "to ensure Albertans have information about safety of their communities." You know, when I read those purposes, the three of them, I'm struck with the fact that any Justice minister and Solicitor General could do those things today. They don't need a bill. The fact that it's codified to say, "This is your job" is a failing, I think. I don't see the purpose of this although the minister stood up and said, "Well, this was a platform commitment made, commitment kept," or something similar.

Mr. Madu: Promise made, promise kept.

Member Ceci: Yeah.

Like, you need to be told how to do your job? That's what's incredible, that you don't know coming into this place that you're here to serve the people of Alberta, that you need to be told how to serve the people of Alberta. That's astounding. And the fact that these purposes are written here when they can be done already – you don't need a bill. It's another example of a bill, Mr. Speaker, that seems to be wasting the time of this Legislature. Is that side so bereft of ideas about how to improve the lives of Albertans that they have to go back and say, "Well, maybe we'll put down what our jobs are and bring that into the House?" That's what I'm hearing from the other side. Though you can talk about how much you're following the platform commitments, it seems to me that what you're not following is common sense in the big sense of the word.

The Speaker: I'll just remind the member to speak through the chair.

Member Ceci: I was looking right at you.

The Speaker: Well, just because you're looking at me doesn't mean you're speaking through me. If I say "you" but I'm looking somewhere else, it doesn't mean that you're not speaking through me. So if you speak through the chair, you might be saying "they" as opposed to "you." This is very helpful and lowers the temperature.

Member Ceci: All right, Mr. Speaker.

I will continue. Where's the crossjurisdictional analysis? Has any other province brought forward a bill like this? I would say I haven't seen any crossjurisdictional. Maybe our critic, who was informed about the bill, may have heard about it, but I doubt very much that any province or territory is bringing forward something like this before their Legislatures.

I doubt that time has been taken to do these things, because already information can be provided to citizens of Alberta. If they want to know about rural crime watch, they can sit down with their police detachments and find out more. That happens now. That happens every day in this province. That was an example that was used by the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General, and he talked about knowledge being power. Well, if that's such an important consideration for him, he and the previous Justice minister have had three years to put that knowledge before Albertans. It says, you know, in here that the year you start working on a report, you will prepare it for the year before, so 2019 information could have been prepared in 2020; 2020 information could have been prepared in 2021; 2021 information could have been prepared this year. None of that's happened.

I'm not so sure that the government is all that concerned about information getting out to the communities, or they would have started this. Here we are three years into their mandate, and they bring this bill that they say is a result of a platform commitment. Why the wait? If it was so important, why wait three years to bring it forward? Only they can answer that, Mr. Speaker.

I think this bill doesn't do much. I think I've made that pretty clear. I think that the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General should know what their job is, and they should share information that's important to Albertans with regard to justice matters, with regard to policing matters, and if they need a bill to tell them to do it, then maybe they're not the right person for the job.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows has risen.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to this bill, Bill 9, Public's Right to Know Act, on behalf of my constituents and fellow Albertans. I'm going to restate some of the comments my colleagues made. You know, it's very sad to see that we are quite not utilizing the time of this House to do the things that Albertans expect from this government. The other way I could say it is that this is obviously another example of this UCP government wholly out of touch and still having not learned lessons from their previous three years' experience and discussing legislation that does not really change anything in the law that already exists.

I just wanted to go back two years. In June 2020 15,000 people showed up to the Legislature grounds. We heard them and we promised: "We will go back to the public. We will consult with them, we will hear their issues, we will consult, and we will summarize the report. We will develop recommendations based on that and will bring them to the House." We have done that. Since then we spent almost from June, July up to May of 2021, almost 10 months, consulting with Albertans, hearing their concerns when it comes to racism, and summarized a broad report of 12 pages. I just wanted to echo their concerns with regard to the justice system, what we heard. Those were individuals, racialized Albertans and community leaders, and they were experts. They were experts from universities, colleges, with their extensive experience and knowledge on the issue of hate crimes.

There were a few things they actually echoed, and they loudly said their minimum requirement if the government wanted to really progress to further tackle hate crimes or the issues that minorities are experiencing in this province.

One of the biggest concerns that we heard was about creating citizen oversight processes. There's a huge complaint that there are not enough resources, that there are not enough processes and procedures to go through or to get help with that, to help them address, file complaints, then, further, to investigate complaints when it comes to the challenges they're facing in communities with law enforcement. They ask for ongoing antiracism and cultural knowledge and sensitivity education and trauma-informed training for law enforcement. These were kind of the issues they raised. They expected that by those consultations, by raising those voices while advocating in communities, this government would listen and hear them and, further, actually take initiative to establish these processes.

The other thing they asked for was creating and funding a cultural and diversity liaison – that position could help better integrate the needs of our communities and policing and building and supporting trauma and for mental health supports for vulnerable populations – again and again. Even a few weeks back the members from the South Sudanese communities did not only demonstrate after the painful death of their community member in Calgary – not only in Calgary, but they drove all the way to Edmonton to raise their voices and concerns on the Legislature steps here in Edmonton. They handed a letter to my colleague the Member for Edmonton-City Centre, and I expect that letter would have been passed and forwarded to the Ministry of Justice. I would have been so happy to hear if the minister would have something to act on or announce or acknowledge that he has received those concerns and complaints, the issues that the community members are raising, and, if he heard anything, to send a message back to those community members so that he is willing to take actions, according to that, to address their concerns.

The biggest thing: the motion I brought back when the then Justice minister of this government announced the Police Act review. The government totally failed to acknowledge and address the communities' call, the communities that were disproportionately represented in the remand centres, in the jails and cells. That was a call that the government needs to establish an antiracism panel that would have been comprised of the community members, community leaders, Indigenous community members, and racialized communities, specifically those communities that are disproportionately represented in these problems. But the government did not give unanimous consent. We reiterated that call many times, community members reiterated that call many times, and I'm reiterating that call once again in this House, and we don't see – the government did not even acknowledge that concern that we have been raising for the past more than a year now.

Those are kind of the concerns. When we go back to our ridings, when we go back to the communities, that's the type of concern that they're raising and the types of issues that they're concerned with, not what we're discussing in this House, that does not even make a single change to the law that already exists, that the government is claiming to do that they can already do under the existing law. No one is stopping the Justice minister from issuing annual reporting or listing the data that this bill is claiming it will allow the minister to do.

The other biggest thing that I hear from my community members is the government's changes to the victims of crime fund, that I heard from the women's association within my community. Not only that; I remember that institutions, of which I can name a number of organizations – the Alberta Council of Women's Shelters, the Association of Alberta Sexual Assault Services, the Alberta Police-Based Victim Services Association – out loud unanimously, like, all together in solidarity, spoke against the government's move to make changes to the victims of crime fund, but the government seems to be not listening. That is why Albertans still cannot trust this government. Still the government is out of touch with Albertans.

If the Justice minister wanted something to be doing in this House, that was something: to revisit their decision, listen to Albertans, listen to the people who are suffering, who are impacted by those changes, and address those issues in this House. We would have been happy to debate that bill as well. We would have been happy to support that bill as members of this House, but that is not happening.

The other biggest concern that we have been hearing about and that is not really helping and that is the biggest concern right now in this province is Jordan timelines for the cases in the courts. The government has said many times that they will hire more prosecutors. They acknowledge the lack of prosecutors and the lack of staffing in the justice system, but there's no piece of legislation they brought forward to really address any of those issues. Even though the government itself has acknowledged those problems, the piece of legislation we are discussing does not even touch those issues. They are important.

In 2016 the Supreme Court of Canada condemned the culture of complacency, complacency within the legal system, that led to lengthy and excessive pretrial delays and strained the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms' protection of the rights.

The government has acknowledged that lack of staffing, lack of prosecutors could compromise the Jordan time frames, but again in this bill we are not seeing that this piece of legislation will bring any kind of improvements, that they will hire more prosecutors or hire more, you know, staffing in the justice system or improve in any way to achieve the Jordan time frames regarding the justice system.

The other thing that Albertans are out loudly saying – and an overwhelming majority of Albertans showed again and again that they're not for Alberta policing. More than 90 per cent of Albertans showed their trust and their feelings. They don't want to get into a kind of debate that does not really help Albertans or Alberta as a province or Alberta's economy or Albertans' lives.

These are the kinds of issues the Justice minister could have been, you know, moving forward or bringing the debates to discuss in this House what Albertans are currently concerned about. None of these issues, none of these concerns that were raised by Albertans are a piece of this legislation, what this legislation is focusing on, or what legislation will achieve if this bill, this legislation, is passed. Due to this, right now I can just say that we cannot really support this piece or proposal under Bill 9, Public's Right to Know Act, as it does not further the interest of Albertans. It does not bring the changes to the justice system that are important to Albertans.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, second reading of Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act. The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am very pleased to rise to speak to Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act. You know, sitting down here and listening to members opposite, all you hear are issues that have absolutely nothing to do with Bill 9. That is consistent with what we have come to see from the members opposite in the last two and a half years. Certainly, that was also the case when they were in office between 2015 and 2019. You hear them talk about a particular bill that seeks to address a real problem, and all of a sudden they take interest in that particular subject matter but devoid of any substance whatsoever. They had four years. Each and every one of the concerns that they have raised: they had four years to have tabled a bill to address each and every one of those things. But, no, they didn't do that because they were solely interested in hammering Albertans, in hammering businesses. They chased billions of dollars out of our province. Their policies drove away investors, created hundreds of thousands of people out of employment.

Here we are talking about a bill that is the product of consultations and town halls that my predecessor, Doug Schweitzer, had with rural Albertans. I'm sorry, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: I'm sure that the hon. minister knows not to and will refrain from using proper names.

Mr. Madu: Yes. I withdraw, Mr. Speaker.

My predecessor, the former Minister of Justice and Solicitor General, took the time to tour all across our province, including rural Alberta. He heard from them that they want to understand why it has been so difficult to tackle rural crime. I as Justice minister continued on that particular work throughout last summer. I travelled all across our province, mostly in our rural communities, and I heard the same thing. This bill is the product of the consultation that we had with folks in our rural communities.

At the end of the day, the question is that we need data to better understand what is going on in our rural communities. That is exactly what Bill 9 seeks to do. Bill 9 would establish a regime by which the province, the Department of Justice, enters into an agreement with the government of Canada because there are certain data that we can't get from them. The RCMP would not release certain data to us without an agreement. There are certain data that we can't even get from the municipal governments. There are certain data we can't even get from other areas of government, so this particular bill, in section 4, would require the Department of Justice to enter into an agreement with those municipalities.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud of this particular bill, and I'm proud to support it.

The Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt. However, pursuant to Standing Order 4 the time for debate has concluded.

The House stands adjourned until this evening at 7:30.

[The Assembly adjourned at 6 p.m.]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 9 Public's Right to Know Act

[Debate adjourned: Mr. Madu speaking]

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. members.

I see the hon. Member for the wonderful riding of Edmonton-West Henday has risen.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise this evening to speak to Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act. As I had the opportunity to review some of the work that we see within it, I think that on paper it looks reasonable. But, like much of other pieces of legislation that we've seen come forward from this government, it's often light on details, and at the end of the day we have to wait for further consultation and regulations to come forward to truly see what this government has in mind for the legislation itself.

When we look at what's before us, specifically before the regulations have been developed and some of the final ideas have been completed, the fact is that within the legislation I think that it does very little to address the priorities of Albertans. In the same breath, it does little to address the key justice issues that Albertans have and the concerns that they brought forward to myself and my colleagues over the last few years with this government in place.

One of the main issues that we continue to hear about – and we raised our concerns at the time the legislation was brought forward regarding changes to the victims of crime fund, a fund that was put in place to support, as the name suggests, victims of crime. Unfortunately, at the time of that debate we saw this government moving to divert the majority of the funds, 60 per cent of the funds from that program, that very important program, into other programs or other parts of the ministry or in the department. That continues to be a concern, something that we aren't seeing addressed through Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act.

Further, we saw through this budget, if I am correct, a further cut to the victims of crime fund by approximately 12 per cent. We continue to ask as a caucus and myself as a representative of those in my community who may be trying to access funds like the victims of crime fund: why are we going down this path, and why, when we have the opportunity to fix problems that this government has made, aren't we instead having conversations about that, or why aren't we seeing opportunities to fix that in Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act?

While I think that the principle of this legislation is reasonable and we can get into further what this might actually mean for the responsibilities of the department and the minister, I think that at the end of the day – and we've actually heard the minister quite clearly explain – this doesn't necessarily change a lot of the opportunities that the minister has to provide this potentially critical information in the first place, that in many cases there were opportunities to do this already.

Instead of addressing the priorities of Albertans, we see a government that's more concerned with passing legislation that the minister himself admits isn't necessarily needed. I know or I believe that this was a platform commitment from the UCP, so I can appreciate that they are working as fast as they can to move forward on those platform commitments that they had. The fact is that while we are going through that process, we should be ensuring that while we are reflecting on opportunities to strengthen the justice system and strengthen the transparency within the justice system and within the ministry even, we are actually taking those opportunities and making sure we are doing the best that we can when those opportunities are before us.

I think it's quite clear, from some of the discussions that we've seen and looking to even some of the opportunities that we have in the opposition with Bill 204 and that we have as a House, that this legislation doesn't necessarily ensure that specific data that Albertans are very clear should be recorded and reported – it is quite lacking, and we have opportunities in the House.

Again, a perfect example is Bill 204, the Anti-Racism Act, to ensure that things like race-based data are being collected and reported on to ensure that we are able to, in the case of systemic problems, do our best to combat those types of things. While I can appreciate that with Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act, that may be, in principle, what the government is trying to accomplish, I still do have concerns, based on the vagueness, I suppose, of the legislation before us, that we are going to ensure that that is indeed the case, transparency in recording and reporting of these types of incidents, that it is done to the best of our ability.

Again, when we look at Bill 204, the Anti-Racism Act, and the idea of collecting data within the justice system related to race-based data and also providing a framework that requires public bodies to collect that important data and evaluate it, I think that in Bill 204 it's quite clear what the objectives are and how we get there, a road map to ensure that we are bringing forward more transparency. I think that is somewhat unlike what we're seeing in Bill 9. Again, we see in Bill 204 an opportunity for an Anti-Racism Advisory Council that can make recommendations based on that data collected. We don't see any such thing in Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act.

When we take a moment to just quickly review what we saw in the UCP platform regarding this act and potentially the idea of why it may have come forward, we see that they want to enact the Public's Right to Know Act, of course, which will require annual reporting, by judicial district, on a wide number of measurements. It lists those: numbers of crimes committed by a person on bail, on probation, on parole. The list goes on. I think, first of all, that we see some of this data already being highlighted and collected by the government and Statistics Canada, specifically regarding the crime severity index, potentially, and other aspects of the system as well.

Again, when we have the minister saying, you know, that it's quite likely we would have been able to do a lot of this work that is being proposed by the legislation already, all the details aren't clearly laid out in the bill in terms of what specific outcomes they're expecting or any mention of an advisory council or, potentially, additional funding to ensure that this data collection is done correctly, again looking at specifically what data is going to be collected and how it's going to be used. While it is reasonable to support this in principle, I think that there is more work that should be done regarding this legislation and ensuring that we are taking the time to be as transparent as possible through the process or ensuring that, at the end of the process, transparency is going to be increased.

You know, we've seen other decisions by this government or conversations that they've brought forward specific to justice, the Justice department and the system, and one that continues to be a concern for my colleagues and colleagues from municipalities across the province, whether we're talking specifically to the Alberta Municipalities organization or Rural Municipalities of Alberta, is that they've all been very clear on this continued talking point from the UCP government that they do not support the idea of an Alberta police force, that it will take important resources out of those communities, that it potentially could lead to less transparency compared to what we have now. Those have been clearly laid out by, again, municipalities across the province, but we continue to hear from the minister, from the Premier, from this government that they are still interested in pushing ahead down that path. I think it clearly shows that there is a disconnect between the UCP's priorities and the priorities of everyday Albertans, the priorities of this government and the priorities of municipal leadership across this province.

I think it's reasonable to say, again, when we look at the decisions to divert funds and further cut them from programs like the victims of crime fund, this government, while it has had ample opportunity to correct some of these mistakes that they've made already, hasn't taken those opportunities, and it's deeply frustrating to myself and to my constituents and to many Albertans across the province, especially those who are actually trying to access these programs.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 9. I think that, in principle, it's reasonable to see a reason to support this. I think that it would have done us well to see more details about exactly what data is going to be collected, how it's going to be collected, potentially what kind of extra funding we might see to ensure that it's collected on a systematic basis, to ensure that the data is, you know, equitable across the board, and to ensure that communities have ample funding to do the work that the government may be asking them to do through the regulatory process.

With that, I look forward to hearing more discussions on this. I think that, again, as we talk about our caucus's proposal around Bill 204 and the importance of collecting data such as race-based data, with what we're seeing here from the government, I think that there are some similarities. I hope that when the vote on Bill 204 comes up, the UCP government recognizes those similarities and opportunities to do what's right for all Albertans in that instance.

With that, I'll take my seat, Mr. Speaker, but I appreciate the opportunity. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate, always, the opportunity to speak in this House about matters before us. You know, I take my role here in the House as opposition critic very seriously and read each of the bills and read supportive information that's made available to me, and I'll quite frequently do a fair amount of research myself on each of the bills. But, you know, I've commented a number of times in the House here that the bills that we're seeing in the House repeatedly are bills without substance, and here we are yet again with another bill.

I know that in the fall session I made comments that we had a significant number of bills that were only four pages long, and in this case the bill is only three pages long. Again, as I have sought to make comments to this government, I sort of wonder why it is that they proceed with bills with such little substance to them when they clearly have decided to open up a file and look at a particular topic. Why don't they actually spend some time working with members of the community to talk about how you might make the bill robust, make the bill effective, and so on?

But I've finally come to the conclusion that the UCP government has taken the position that their supporters can count but they can't read. As a result, they are able to say that they have, you know, produced X number of bills, some number that sounds good, in this House and that they have filled some X percentage of their campaign promises, hoping, of course, that nobody looks beyond those simple numbers and actually looks at: "Well, what did they do? Did they actually do something that's going to make our life better or not?"

Frequently we're finding ourselves with these bills that, you know, surely were written in just a few minutes – I previously joked about it being written on the back of a napkin – and here I am in exactly the same place again.

Just as with some of the bills in the fall, I have some serious concerns that yet again this legislation is simply putting into legislation practices which are just normal governance practices that would be expected of any minister anyways, and I don't know why they feel the need to constantly legislate their own minister's behaviour. I guess it's a lack of trust that their minister will actually engage in due diligence and follow standard governance procedures if they don't have it in legislation forcing them to do it. I'm just not quite sure, you know, what's going on here other than simply a chance to bolster their numbers so that they can have easy talking points that make it sound like they're engaged in something when they're not.

Let's just take a look at this bill for a second. Of course, you know, as I've said before, it's not the size of the bill but what you do with it. I read through this bill, as you all can if you happen to have 15 or 20 seconds, and . . .

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker: A point of order has been called. The Deputy Government House Leader.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on 23(h), (i), and (j), specifically comments meant to create disorder in this Chamber. This is the second time that member has used what I believe is a phallic reference in this Chamber regarding it's not the size of the bill but how you use it. He did it back in October of last year in the last session. At that point it was certainly more overt. At this point in time I think it's quite ridiculous that that member thinks that such a joke is suitable in this Chamber and worthy of the time of members of this Chamber. Frankly, the members of Edmonton-Rutherford did not elect him to come here and make jokes of such a nature. I would encourage that member to retract, apologize, and let's not try to use a bad joke again in this Chamber.

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen to respond.

Member Loyola: Mr. Speaker, this is just another attempt by our friends over on the other side of the House to distract the member while doing his interjection here in the House. He is providing ample information and opinion regarding not only the people that he represents but, of course, all Albertans, and he's simply, you know, adding to the debate. With all due respect, I don't believe this is a point of order at all.

The Acting Speaker: I also don't find this to be a point of order. I also didn't see that the comments that were made by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford had really in any way decreased the decorum in the room. I think that now is the time for the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford to continue with the call.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to get back to what I was saying. I just every once in a while like to provoke the government to stand up so I know that that they're actually listening to what's going on in the House. It's nice to have evidence every once in a while.

Let's take an actual look at this bill and take a look at: what does this bill do? How's that? Does it do anything at all? I can tell you that this bill, by its own description, does only two things. One, it says that you can prepare a report, and two, it says that you can let people read it. That's it. That's what this bill does. It doesn't tell us anything about which particular data is in this bill, you know, what the requirements are for the construction of the bill. It doesn't say who has to be consulted, who has to be involved. It doesn't have to say what mechanisms of data collection or data analysis are to be used. It doesn't describe categories or chapters or sections that must be included in the bill in order for it to be a complete bill and to meet the requirements of this. It simply says that you can actually write a report.

Now, the minister himself has agreed that the minister can write reports now. In fact, we would hope that the minister actually engages in writing reports in order to be able to describe what it is that their ministry is doing. It doesn't actually provide them with any significant support or direction in terms of what is to be done.

The second part of this, of course, is that section 5 talks about actually letting people read the report, which actually I'm finding myself wanting to support because, of course, we're in this House with this odd situation that the murdered and missing Indigenous women and girls report that came from Ottawa three years ago was supposed to have led to the creation of a report and so on, and here we are three years later with the report not being issued to the citizens of the province of Alberta. We still haven't read the report. I don't even know if there is one. I've been told there is one, but I have no evidence that there is one because they haven't shared it with anybody.

So what we actually have is legislation that does reflect the problem with the government; that is, if you don't write it down that you have to create a report and then in the next section say, "Oh, you must let people read the report," apparently it doesn't happen. Apparently, the Minister of Indigenous Relations doesn't have this kind of requirement on him, so, you know, I guess I have to be supportive here. I have to be supportive because it's quite evident that indeed, unless they are directed by legislation, ministers of this House will not actually let people read a report that is being paid for by the citizens of Alberta. What an odd situation we're in. The whole point of this is the Public's Right to Know Act, and we actually have a government that is choosing not to let the public know unless they're forced into it by their legislation. What an odd situation that we are in here.

I certainly wish that this government had taken the time to expand this report, to give us some understanding and details as to why it is that a minister needs this level of direction in order to function competently in their job, why it is that without this kind of direction a minister can, like the Minister of Indigenous Relations, ignore the province of Alberta and not issue a report and not share the report with people. It's really odd that we're finding ourselves in this position.

I guess I'm going to end up voting in favour of this in the hopes that maybe we could even include this piece of legislation in all government legislation, that if you actually do any work, could you please let some of us know about it so that we can actually see whether or not, you know, it's something that was worth all the time and energy that was put into it?

You know, here we are with this very thin piece of work yet again, a piece of work that suggests that something that should normally be done be done but doesn't give any direction, doesn't give any circumstance, doesn't give any context, doesn't give any timelines, doesn't give any depth, doesn't give any categorization of the information, doesn't give any suggestion about who needs to be consulted or what kind of source of information needs to be sought in order to do this. It doesn't give any sense at all about how that data will be analyzed, what mechanisms will be used to turn that data into some kind of policy. It doesn't give any kind of direction on, you know, how the mechanisms from the data collection will then lead to somehow informing the public. How will the public know? Where will it be reported? Who will get a copy? Will it be every citizen in the province who will have access to it? Will it be only specialized groups that will have access to it?

Really, this report has done very, very little. We have such a very small piece of effort here, as we have so many times. I think we're over 12 bills now that are four pages or less long, and when you consider that actually two of the pages are about, you know, table of contents and so on, that really means that there's only, like, one page of actual information, at least better than the one bill that actually, literally had only one line in it.

But here we are. We find ourselves again with a government that has done the least that it can possibly do in order to say that they did something because they want to tell people that they did something. Of course, they will report widely, I'm sure, that they put out this great bill called the Public's Right to Know Act, and unless people are taking the time to actually delve into the act, they will just assume that the government actually did achieve something, some progress in terms of the citizens' right to know.

It's a shame because, you know, I'm always trying to look for times when I could support the government and the work that they're doing. I really want to be able to do that. It's always the first thing. What can I support in this bill? What can I be happy about? Yet here again I find myself only supporting it, I guess, ironically, because I actually do want to see a report, so it's really nice to have legislation that would allow a report to occur.

What this government is not doing, of course, is that they're not actually delving into the problem at hand. They're not looking at the issue of crime. They're not looking at the causes and the mechanisms of crime. They're not looking at the mechanisms of discovering crime, responding to crime, preventing future crimes, somehow rehabilitating those people that commit those crimes, the reintroduction of those people back into society in a way that would be positive and beneficial to society. These are all things that I would have loved to have seen the government do. I probably could have jumped up and said: I found something I support you on. I'm really looking forward to the opportunity to be able to do that with vigour.

As I've said so many times in this House, the government's work is so much less than it could have been. They like to talk about the possibility of doing work rather than actually doing the work itself. They like to have the appearance of being in motion rather than actually being in motion, and that's frustrating. It's frustrating for the people in the province of Alberta, who actually expect their government to achieve things, to get to a place where they can celebrate some of the government actions, but indeed they cannot because the government has not chosen to put some meat on the bones. In this case, I'm not even sure that I can say that the bones are there. It doesn't even ask you to do various things in order to be able to put this report together. At this point we have maybe some nascent cells, I guess, available here that hopefully one day will grow into something that will be recognizable and useful to the people of the province of Alberta.

You know, I would have really enjoyed a bill that spent some time looking at important crime issues in terms of crime and response to criminals and rehabilitation of criminals and moving us toward a safer and less violent society. I certainly would have loved all of that. I would have loved if they had, for example, gone back to the victims of crime fund, which they pilfered last year, and returned that money to the victims of crime and actually developed programs to assist people who have been victims of crime and enabled them to benefit from the dollars that come in through the criminal system and are put into the victims of crime fund but have been shuffled out by this government over the last year, which is a real shame.

I can certainly tell you that in my conversations with people in the Indigenous community about the things that could have been done regarding the murdered and missing Indigenous women report, that apparently is out there but nobody has seen, they certainly would have loved to have seen some of that money in a bill like this, for example, being put forward to actually help people who have been victims of crime. It would be really nice to know that the government, rather than reducing the number of court support workers for Indigenous women, which they have over the last year, were instead helping them.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, it's an honour to rise here tonight. We live in a world where information is easier than ever to access. The Internet has made it as simple as three clicks for someone to learn in depth about a recently passed government policy or a matter of seconds if they want to know who their local elected official is in order to report a problem. Albertans used to spend long hours doing their own research, looking up specific topics if they wanted to learn about Alberta's justice system, for example, but now they can do that all from a phone. That's why I feel that Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act, fits in well with today's standards of information.

Crime is a topic many discuss over the dinner table or while watching the news, and they take crime into consideration when deciding where to purchase a home or spend their time. It factors into many very important decisions Albertans need to make for their families. Bill 9 will be a great tool for Albertans to make educated decisions in their daily life. The ability to access a provincial database with crime stats is a great tool in their tool kit as they make decisions for their family.

While Stats Canada does have this information readily available to the public, having a provincial database gives this government the flexibility to highlight statistics that tend to be the most concerning for people such as data about violent and serious crimes. The public has a right to know how crime is affecting their community, and this legislation would uphold that right by requiring the provincial government to report the stat annually, at a minimum, through a report in the Legislature and by publishing the information on the government of Alberta website. This would give Albertans the option to access the information for whatever purpose they need, whether to learn about a local area that they live in or for interested stakeholders around the province.

Some people ask: now, how does this line up with the government's red tape reduction initiatives? Well, Mr. Speaker, people have a right to know how crime is affecting their community, and this bill would reduce red tape by making it easier for them to find statistics about crime. It's all about ease of access. Having a place for the public to simply click and read would be an enormous help down the road as this government includes more crime stats into the database. Making this information available to the public will also be a great help for local leaders looking to respond to concerns from residents or to help them make educated decisions for better outcomes in their local communities.

I hope my colleagues agree that Bill 9 will aid the government's plan for increased public access to information, and I look forward to seeing what other kinds of statistics could be added to this database in the future. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs has risen.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this evening to speak to Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act. I've read through the bill, and, you know, it does some things that, in my understanding, the minister is already eligible to do. When it comes to writing reports about his ministry, I think that that's something that is well within his ability. We don't need legislation for that.

I see under section 2:

The purposes of this Act are

- (a) to increase transparency and accountability with respect to the criminal justice system in Alberta,
- (b) to help Albertans better understand the criminal justice system in Alberta, and
- (c) to ensure Albertans have information about the safety of their communities.

Well, when I look at what this government has done and their track record on crime, I would argue that what's happening, unfortunately, is that the harshest way that individuals are learning about the criminal justice system is from being victims of crime.

I can speak first-hand to what it means to be able to support someone who is the victim of crime. I was a volunteer with the Sexual Assault Centre of Edmonton for many years, and throughout my time there I would have to say that this was probably one of the most difficult experiences for the victim in the sense that a lot of their needs came from needing support through the criminal justice system.

When someone is sexually assaulted and they are able to find the strength to, first of all, report the assault and then go through the horrific experience of the examination of a sexual assault, where you're literally being poked and prodded and scraped and swabbed and questioned and questioned and questioned and reviolated, and then find the strength and courage to go forward and to start the process of the criminal justice system, it's very daunting to have to sit in a courtroom and sometimes speak directly to your aggressor. There are many cases where what police call the bad guy decides to self-represent, so they're the ones who are questioning the victim. I can tell you that through that process it was very humbling to see the incredible amount of strength that these individuals were able to muster to get through this process.

So when I see a piece of legislation that talks about helping Albertans better understand the criminal justice system, I could say that anybody who's been a victim of crime and been part of that criminal justice system knows full well what that entails. The way to get through it, Mr. Speaker, is to provide supports to the victims of crime fund, and what we saw this government do was drastically reduce that program.

They reduced the time allowed for a victim to make a claim. It used to be two years that a victim had the opportunity to file a claim. I can tell you, through my work in social work over the years, that two years doesn't seem long enough for someone to get the strength to come forward and file a report. This government reduced that time period. That is a huge detriment to so many in the province that are eligible for support, that deserve support. But because of decisions that this government did when they were looking at the victims of crime fund, they reduced their eligibility simply by reducing the timeline of two years. I believe that it's now 45 days, which is absolutely unacceptable.

The other piece of this legislation: "to ensure Albertans have information about the safety of their communities." While I think it's important to be able to educate people about their communities, I also think it's important to provide supports and services to help reduce those criminal activities. It's not just about educating what's going on around you; it's about making sure that people that have been impacted are adequately supported, and we're looking at reasons why people are entering the criminal justice system in the first place.

When we look at people that are abnormally or highly impacted by involvement in the criminal justice system, when we look at Indigenous communities, when we look at racialized communities, we know that there's a higher number of those individuals that are being harassed by police, that are being charged by police, that are entering the criminal justice system and are getting extremely difficult sentences that aren't equivalent to the general population. I think this legislation is talking about all of these wonderful things, about education, but we're not looking at some of the bigger picture things that need to happen.

When this government had the ability to look at the victims of crime fund, not only did they reduce the timeline for the ability for someone to make a claim, but they also took part of the funding and allocated it to policing and, I believe, to hire lawyers that would assist, which is also important, but it shouldn't be at the cost of victims. I think that when we hear from victims and we hear from advocates, they've been pretty clear about what is needed to address crime in the province, and it's supporting victims.

So it's not just about an education campaign about how your community is safe, but we need to support the communities where we live, and that's more than just doing a report on the criminal behaviour in your community. I question what types of things are going to be subject to public release. We know that currently there are offenders in the system that do warrant a public release. When an offender is being released and they're deemed high risk, a notice goes out, and the community is informed that so-and-so, with this description, was charged with, was sentenced to, and is still a risk to the community. We have that information. We know when these individuals are being released.

What are the criteria that are going to be reported in the community? What is the consideration for individuals that perhaps couldn't afford a great defence team? We hear of cases where people are wrongly accused, they're wrongly confined, and then through appeal they're able to overturn the ruling because they were actually not guilty.

I'm curious about what criteria are being put in place when we are releasing these reports and this information to communities in an attempt to keep them safe. Who's providing this sort of resource and information to the ministry to determine this list? I know that it was very controversial when it was determined that the high-risk offenders' information would be published. There were advocates on both sides talking about the impacts of that information being released.

I think it's very important to talk about more than just information sharing. We need to talk about support and services. I can tell you that when someone is being released, in my experience with supporting victims, typically that victim would be phoned, and they would be advised: your offender is being released into the community. And that immediately triggers stress. If a victim has any sort of PTSD, all of that could come rushing back to that individual, and what supports are in place for that? What is the consequence of providing all of this information to a community in an attempt to keep them safe if we're not supporting the victims that put this bad guy in the criminal justice system in the first place? Has that been considered?

When we are talking about informing the public, what is the consequence to those that have been impacted by that individual? I can tell you that when I've been working in the realm of social work, any time there was a bail hearing, any time there was an appeal for release or a parole board hearing, the victims were notified that their offender has asked for this to happen, and just the simple knowledge that that person is asking to be released was a trigger, and it created incredible amounts of stress for that individual and their loved ones, who saw the individual go through it, whether it was their co-workers, their children, their spouse, their parents. It has a huge impact when we talk about these things.

When we're talking about making sure that Albertans are safe under the Public's Right to Know Act, what supports are being put in place for those that have been impacted? This is a big piece that's missing, and it's a big piece that we have continued to see this government cut. Having significant cuts to the victims of crime fund is incredibly detrimental. It has ripple effects as well. It has an impact on the access to mental health supports. It has impacts on the health care system, social services. There is an impact when people aren't getting their mental health needs met, and when it's because they were a victim of crime, they deserve compensation and supports, and to reduce that doesn't mean that they're not going to still attempt to get those services and reports; it means that they're going to go to other systems to do it.

What does that look like? Well, it could be a call to Children's Services because the school has called in saying that, you know, child A hasn't come to school in two months. When we follow up with the parents, we find out that perhaps their offender has been released, and mom is traumatized and can't get out of bed and has nobody to call, no supports, no services. Is that child at risk? That's what would have to be determined. Could it have been prevented if they had a worker that they could call through the victims of crime fund, to say: this is what's happening for me? Perhaps.

When we look at ways to truly support Albertans when it comes to crime, we need to look at more than just information sharing. I think it's an important component of it, but it absolutely is not the only piece that actually helps Albertans. We don't see anything in this legislation that actually addresses the key justice issues.

We've heard about concerns from racialized communities, about police harassment. We on this side of the House have listened, have worked with those communities to come up with ideas that would help address their concerns. None of that is mentioned in this piece of legislation. These are people that are being wrongly targeted by a policing system that was sent there to protect them. Why isn't that in this legislation? Why aren't we talking about things that we could be doing to better support Albertan communities?

The legislation says: to educate communities about their safety. Well, I think that educating communities about safety goes both ways. We need to work with our individuals that are working in the police forces and work with communities and have a collaborative approach about what the needs are rather than just publishing names of offenders that are going to be living in your community. Again I go back to: what is this offender list? Who's being reported? What criteria are being put in place to have these crimes published? You know, I've worked with people that have been charged, have been in the corrections system, and they, too, have a story. They, too, have an experience that perhaps would be completely missed in just a publication of their name, their address, and the crime that they were committed for. That puts those individuals at risk, too, if we're not using some significant criteria to make sure that this person is at risk of reoffending.

I have worked with colleagues that work on that unit that monitors high-risk offenders, and they are very diligent in making sure that that individual knows that they are there. That individual that's been released: they know that they're a high-risk offender. The police know that they're a high-risk offender, and their job is to make sure that that person continues to be monitored.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Calgary-South East has risen.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise in support of Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act. If passed, this bill would be the first legislation of its kind in Canada and would require the provincial government to report crime data annually, to make that information publicly accessible. In addition to the annual reporting requirement, which enhances transparency, additional accountability is added through the requirement to table a report in the Legislature, making these statistics part of the official public record.

Bill 9 will bring consistency in timing and a more user-friendly approach to crime statistics for Albertans. This will help my constituents and Albertans broadly to better understand what is going on in their communities. While Alberta already obtains police-based crime data from Stats Canada, this legislation enables the minister to enter into information-sharing agreements with the federal government, other provinces and territories, municipalities, and police services. This collaboration and improved access to crime data will help policy-makers at various levels to make evidence-based decisions that will hopefully lead to better outcomes and safer communities.

While there may be some costs for the technology used to report these metrics and possibly for staff to collect and publish this information, it's expected that these costs can be covered within the ministry's existing budget. In my view, these minor costs will be significantly outweighed by the benefit of providing Albertans and their families with easier access to valuable public safety related information.

I'm looking forward to supporting Bill 9, and I would encourage the hon. members here to do so as well. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's hard not to grow increasingly more and more frustrated with this government as they bring in pieces of legislation that ultimately state that the minister can do what the minister already has the privilege of doing in this House when there are so many more matters that need to be addressed when it comes, in this case specifically, to our justice system.

Mr. Speaker, I think that one of the gravest and most heinous of the realities that we live in here in the province of Alberta is the fact that, especially, Indigenous people are overrepresented in our prison systems, of course, at the provincial level and at the federal level. When you start looking at the numbers, you see that Indigenous men, for example, make up 23 per cent of the prison population, and then when you look at Indigenous women, it's actually 27 per cent whereas overall in the population Indigenous people across the entire country are closer to between 3 and 4 per cent. How does this make any sense? How does this make any sense, that we have so many Indigenous people overrepresented in the justice system?

You'd think that this is an opportunity for this government to address this particular issue. They say that they're doing as much as they possibly can in order to – and I would say that it's lip service, Mr. Speaker. When I go out into the communities and I hear what people have to say, they feel like this government is just paying lip service to the whole issue of the calls to action of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. It's a shame because, you know, especially the Minister of Indigenous Relations likes to get up in this House and say that he's doing everything possible to actually address the calls to action when it comes to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, but what he's been able to do is next to nothing. Absolutely next to nothing.

The reality is that that's not the only concern when it comes to our judicial system, which I think is the most grave of all, though, because, I mean, it has to do with the relationship that exists between Albertans, Canadians, and Indigenous peoples. You have to ask yourself: okay; well, what's the root of the problem? Like, a lot of the time the fact that Indigenous people had to go through the whole residential school system and the trauma of having to go through that and the intergenerational trauma that is then passed on to children, grandchildren: this is something that's very real. It's studied. It's well quantified in research by academics and professionals that actually deal with this. We could be seeing a bill that could actually address these issues; instead, we see this bill, Bill 9, here in the House, which, like I was saying at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, really just amounts to providing the minister with duties that the ministry should already be dealing with.

We also have the fact that last year this very government decided that they wanted to raid the victims of crime fund and use monies from that particular program for other means, which we see absolutely nothing about. They have not demonstrated in any feasible way that they're actually addressing issues related to actually helping families. I'll remind members of the House that Alberta has 73 victims' services organizations. Seventy-three victims' services organizations. When this whole issue actually came out regarding this move, which is intended – like, this victims of crime fund is intended to aid the victims of crime and actually put people and put families first.

So here we have another irony, Mr. Speaker. This government gets up time and time again, and it's like they like to put families first, put people and families first. But here's a very concrete – a very concrete – example of how, instead of putting people and families first, they actually went in and they actually raided this particular fund and, in the end, had 73 organizations throughout the entire province calling their bluff on the fact that they like to put people and families first when it comes to this particular issue.

Those 73 victims' services organizations came out very diligently in order to tell this government – you know, just last week I was telling members on the other side that they say that they like to listen to Albertans, that they like to listen to stakeholders, and that they're doing what stakeholders and Albertans want, but again, Mr. Speaker, I put forward the argument that they only like to listen to Albertans and stakeholders that actually agree with their political ideology. And I remind them that they're here to represent more than just those who agree with their political ideology. Here we have an example of 73 victims' services organizations that were completely against what this government presented in this House, and they have done nothing to rectify that – nothing to rectify it – not for the people who were actually victims of crime or the organizations that actually help the families and the people that actually go through that crime here in the province of Alberta.

We've discussed the fact that we have a severe and damning problem with systemic racism inside of our judicial system, our justice system as a whole, the fact that, as I was stating, Indigenous people are overrepresented in the justice system, and then on top of that we have a government who, when it comes to the issue of attacks on Black Muslim women here in the province of Alberta, has also done next to nothing. Now, don't get me wrong, Mr. Speaker. I think it's very important that places of worship should be protected, and it's great that a grant has been provided so that, you know, the boards of directors can actually put up surveillance cameras and things like that in order to deter people from marking places of worship of all kinds – it doesn't matter which religion – with profanity and racist symbols and the like. That's fine. It's good. But the specific question before the House last year was the increasing number of attacks on Black Muslim women in the province of Alberta, and we have yet to see any action from this government to address that specific issue.

The Minister of Justice could have used this opportunity to present a bill to this House that would actually address that particular issue. That's why, when people hear what this government has to say, all they can think of is: it's nothing but lip service. They say that they're doing something to address racism here in the province of Alberta, but when it comes to the actual concrete problems that Albertans are facing, they actually are doing absolutely nothing to address it. You know, it's concerning that over nine Black Muslim hijabis were actually attacked here in the province of Alberta. Perhaps people remember how I was impacted by that when the whole issue of the London family happened and that it was important for us to address this head-on. That's why I find it frustrating. I find it frustrating to be inside of this Legislature and realize that this government is doing nothing to actually address that particular issue, because these are real people in communities all around Alberta.

You know, like, the bill here – I'll read out of section 2(c). It says here: "to ensure Albertans have information about the safety of their communities."

How does this particular bill address the fact that Black Muslim hijabis walking through their communities are actually going to be able to do so safely? And not just them, Mr. Speaker; anybody that actually dresses in a diverse way. We have lots of Albertans that choose to dress in a diverse way when they're out doing their business, and because of that, they're targeted inside of their own communities.

You know, I was at an event a couple of weekends ago with the Hoyo women's collective. They were doing their celebration of International Women's Day. One of the Somali members of the community who's a Black Muslim hijabi got up and was talking about the fact that how cowardly – how cowardly – it is that an individual would run up on a grandmother from the community and attack that grandmother from behind. So then it begs the question, because they were looking at me and they were looking at all the other politicians in the room that day, and they were saying: what are you doing to address this? This bill could have been something to address that. The Minister of Justice could have done something to present in this very House a real issue Albertans have been facing for decades, I would say, since we started having more immigration of Muslims to the province of Alberta that actually wear hijab and especially Black Muslim women, no matter what communities that they're coming from. It's a shame. Again I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I'm frustrated.

We've taken this opportunity to actually present Bill 204, the private member's bill, which would actually collect race-based data, and we've heard nothing but lip service from members on the other side when it comes to this particular private member's bill. I'd like to add, Mr. Speaker, that every private member's bill that has been presented by this side of the House has been absolutely squashed. They don't even let us debate it.

So the level of frustration continues to grow and grow and grow, because there is no political will on the other side of this House to actually debate the matters that Albertans are really concerned about. Or is this government trying to tell me that Black Muslim women don't matter? I wouldn't put that on them, Mr. Speaker, because I don't believe in shaming people, but this is a real issue. This is a real issue that needs to be addressed, and it could have been done by the Minister of Justice with this particular bill, but again we see nothing but platitudes and lip service.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall has risen.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Earlier I heard a couple of speeches from the government side as well. Colleagues on that side presented this bill as groundbreaking and something that has never happened in the history of any Legislature and how Alberta will be first and all those things.

However, I didn't see much in this legislation. When we were going through law school, there used to be an assignment – I think my colleague from Calgary-Cross may remember that – where you have to draft a piece of legislation based on given facts and some instructions. For the most part, instructions will be that you will pick up the facts that are of a substantive nature and you will leave them in the body of the act, and if there are things of an administrative nature that need to be figured out, like kind of day-to-day functioning of that program or that legislative scheme, those things may be left for regulations.

In this one, essentially, they have left everything not only to the regulation but to the discretion of the minister. The main clause of the bill reads that "the Minister shall prepare a report respecting data and information . . . that the Minister considers necessary or advisable to carry out the purposes of this Act." The whole act is based on three broad statements of purposes that can be interpreted, I guess will be interpreted, by different people differently and can be interpreted in many, many different ways. Based on those three purposes of the act, the minister has unfettered discretion to include whatever he deems fit.

I think that kind of bill even in a law school assignment for law school assignment purposes will get a failing grade. It has no substantive provision, no certainty, nothing. It's the worst example of a skeleton legislation, and here we listen to government colleagues say that it's groundbreaking legislation and that nobody has ever done it. No wonder nobody has done it, because there is nothing in this legislation at all. We don't know what information will be collected. We don't know what criteria the minister will use to collect that information. We have no information whatsoever when we think of this legislation.

Even the UCP's platform, where that commitment was made, page 65, is more specific than this piece of legislation. That at least says that the right to know act "will require annual reporting, by judicial district" – not by the minister – "on a wide number of measurements" and lists "the number of crimes committed by persons on bail, probation, parole, subject to a deportation order for criminality, or previously removed for criminality." A lot of dog whistle in there, too, but at least there are some specific details that you can see from that platform, that: okay; that's what they are committing. There is nothing in this piece of legislation that you can say that that's what's happening there. I suspect the prime motive for bringing forward this legislation is that they can check a box, that, oh, there was a promise made in the platform, so we have fulfilled it. It does not give the public any more information that they already don't have. It does not give the minister any more authority that the minister does not have.

All of these reports – for instance, the Calgary Police Service quarterly publish on serious violent crimes, on basically everything that goes on in the city. Stats Canada publishes those. The city of Edmonton publishes those. Saying that we will put that together in one report: that doesn't help. What will really help is if government steps up and takes steps to address those issues, to address those problems.

Instead, what we have seen from this government in the last three years is that in every budget they have butchered the Justice budget. They have butchered services that the Justice department provides. None of that speaks to the priorities of Albertans that we talk to. I represent a very diverse riding. I have people from many different cultural, ethnic, religious backgrounds, people of many different talents. I think the issues facing them – if government would act to do something about that, that would actually help people.

For instance, my colleague from Edmonton-Ellerslie talked at length about attacks on racialized, hijab-wearing women. There are people in my riding who are fearful of going out, getting onto the C-Train just because of who they are. That should be the focus of this government. Those individuals, those Albertans, have a right to know that they can be who they are. That's the responsibility of the state, to make sure that they are safe. As was mentioned, yes, there was a grant given to religious, faith-based organizations – good on the government – but many of these attacks were at bus stops, at shopping centres, at parking lots. Many of them were even on the streets and on the roads. We have not heard a thing about what government is doing to address that one, and those people have a right to know what their government is doing about it.

There was a report, after almost three years of consultation, presented by Alberta's first Anti-Racism Advisory Council: 48 recommendations, almost 11 recommendations relating to the justice system, including collection of race-based data. To this date this government has not said a word about that report. Those on the receiving end of systemic racism, those on the receiving end of racism, those on the receiving end of hate-motivated crimes: they have the right to know why this government is so quiet, so silent on that report. Those are the kinds of issues that my constituents share with me.

As stated here, "to increase transparency and accountability with respect to the criminal justice system": if they really want to increase transparency and accountability, there are many things that they already know and will still refuse to share. Just reporting on those numbers also doesn't resolve anything.

For instance, due to the Jordan decision from the Supreme Court of Canada, some reoffences must be prosecuted within 18 months, and indictable offences must be prosecuted within 30 months. There are thousands of cases that are at risk of being thrown out because they're already at that threshold, at the 18-month threshold, at the 30-month threshold. And, yes, I understand that applications need to be made – they won't be automatically thrown out – but instead of doing this stunt, I think government should be putting forward a solid plan of how they will address those delays so that people who have been wronged can get justice from their justice system. Again, we don't see anything on that from this government.

Then the victims of crime fund: not only that those Albertans who are victims of crime are not seeing their cases moved through the justice system; government also raided the victims of crime fund. Since June 2020 they have diverted 60 per cent of the fund on other initiatives, which are not supporting victims of crimes. Just year over year, from last year to this year, there was a 12 per cent reduction in supports for victims of crimes. I think those victims also need to know why it's a priority for the government to check a box from their platform but not their issues.

Why is government failing on a basic and fundamental responsibility of making sure that all Albertans, all citizens are able to feel safe in their communities, and that whenever they are wronged, there is a system in place that will help them with that, be their justice system, be their supports from the victims of crime fund and other services? But those services, those funds: they're on the chopping block. Albertans are getting less because of this government's policies.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to join? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has risen.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill. They're very instructive, I think, the comments that the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall had framed up in regard to this bill. The well of knowledge that I draw from in regard to justice issues is much less deep than perhaps some other people in this room, but I also, I think, can offer a perspective as to just asking for clarification on this Bill 9, to perhaps seek a more clear understanding of what the Justice minister is intending and the government is intending with this bill, and then for us to make sure that it is substantive and is meeting the public interest, and, of course, I think all bills must pass that test in order to be relevant.

I guess the first question that I have – because, of course, this bill seems to be seeking to require the Minister of Justice to publish an annual report with data and information relating to the justice system, specifically disclosing information about parole and people up on charges and so forth. So I'm just curious to know if the minister, in fact, can do that now, right? Can the Minister of Justice in fact publish a report on individuals on bail or parole, as was discussed before, or what specifically has to change that is blocking the Minister of Justice now from being able to do that? Because, of course, the first test of the salience of a bill is, you know: does it make a certain action stronger?

The second question I have for the minister and for the government in general is, you know, why the minister is choosing in this bill not to specify which data should be included or disclosed in an annual report for the public. As was mentioned here before – and definitely I have an interest in this issue as well – you know: to what degree is data collected around race-based crime and/or arrests by the police, and how can we use that sort of data to improve the justice system for all, right? Of course, the justice system isn't just to seek to protect the public from crime, but it's also to ensure that justice is served for someone who might be charged or arrested as well.

I know in this world of algorithms and so forth that we can create tremendous sort of narrowing of probabilities down as to where and when certain crimes might be taking place and a certain geographical location and other uses for data like that. But, you know, I'm also concerned about the converse version of that, Mr. Speaker, which is to presume that you conduct justice using an algorithm as your basis for focusing, deploying forces in certain neighbourhoods, having certain programs for different racialized groups in our society, and so forth.

You know, data is an unbelievably powerful tool that we have, and it's only getting exponentially more so over these last few years and into these next few years, especially. So we really want to make sure that this Bill 9 is addressing that and respects both the integrity of data that we're collecting and what kind of data we are collecting and how we disclose that data as well. It's not just a matter of saying: let's open up the books and let's all see what's there. It's a question of: what is the minister going to choose to disclose and how and under what circumstances, and framing that data as well for the public's knowledge, to know more.

Another question I have – again, I guess it's related to that, Mr. Speaker – is with Bill 9 as it's written, and I'm sure the minister can clarify this for me, right? Like, under Bill 9 what would stop the minister from picking and choosing which data they choose to disclose, right? You know, all information has a certain meaning, and of course if you can craft certain details that you put together, then you're creating a story, right? It's very important, especially in the service of justice – right? – that we act through legislation to depoliticize the execution of justice at every turn, really. I'm just concerned, again, if the minister has carte blanche discretion as to which data he or she might be disclosing and then creating a narrative around that that maybe doesn't necessarily correspond to reality or making our communities safer or the execution of justice for people who might be charged to be the very highest quality possible.

The last question I have as well is, you know, again around the minister supporting the collection of race-based data, which we have, I think, an interest in and, I think, a common interest. I've heard the former Minister of Justice talk about this, and I've heard other members over the last few years speaking about this as well. You know, we actually, coincidentally, Mr. Speaker, have a bill before the House right now, Bill 204, which would seek to in fact create a framework for us to move forward, to compel our various police forces and the criminal justice system to give us that sort of information. So I could see a marriage between this Bill 9 and the disclosure information and then, of course, with Bill 204, the opening up of what sort of data we can in fact have and then making much more informed decisions about our justice system, to in fact make it more just. That's the best word you can use to describe the justice system if possible.

Those are some of the questions that I had. I know that, you know, there are a lot of challenges around the justice system here in the province. I mean, these are challenges that just didn't appear overnight. I certainly watched these things in opposition before and then when we were in government, and now, in 2022, we see some of those same things, but they've just been exponentially, in some cases, more of a problem. Certain issues around the timely execution of justice – right? – having people go to trial in a timely manner: that problem has just exacerbated itself here in Alberta over the last number of years.

I know that we can use COVID as an excuse, and it certainly was a material issue around booking court dates and so forth; however, you know, here we are now, and we're not out of the pandemic by any means, but we're trying to work for a long-term solution because, I mean, justice still needs to be served, right? If you have a person that is up on trial and doesn't get a date in a timely way, then that affects the execution of justice in a profound way.

One thing that we can talk about more, Mr. Speaker, is increasing capacity in our courts, increasing capacity to have trials being called in a timely way. I mean, I think that's something that all of us could agree on that needs work. You know, there's nothing worse than perhaps making an arrest and putting up charges and then losing that charge because the courts are tied up and there's no room to have a trial. That works both ways as well, for the accused and the general public and the police system. It's just frustrating all the way around. So these are some of the issues that I think we need to talk about in regard to justice.

Again, you know, I was just being honest to suggest that I don't have the same degree of understanding or experience in the justice system as some of our learned colleagues have here, but those are some of the questions that I have.

With that, I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, could I adjourn debate? Thank you.

9:00

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 10

Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore has risen.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. This is a very emotional day for me personally. I'm honoured to have brought this piece of legislation forward, but before I get started, there are many people that need to be thanked for helping this, including the Associate Minister of Status of Women and the former and now standing ministers of Health. It took a lot of work on everybody's part to bring this together. It's been seven years of my life that I've been working on this. When you come from an amazing culture like I come from, it's incredible when you get to work with those groups of people from various cultures to help bring forward a piece of legislation that actually protects women and girls.

Around 11 years ago we started doing some work around honour beatings, honour killings, child marriage, FGM, human trafficking, and many other things. As you know, we recently just did a release on human trafficking and the task force and their information that they're bringing forward, another very proud moment, for sure. It takes an entire group of people to have a piece of legislation like this come forward. It's complicated and it's difficult.

I would just also like to tell everyone in here that some of the stuff I'm going to talk about today could be fairly triggering. I just want to let you know that there's some fairly strong language, and there may be some uncomfortable language for folks, but I think it's very important for people to understand why this is happening.

One of the things that we were asked when we were talking about legislation coming forward regarding female genital mutilation was: what's happening at the federal level, but where could we start here in this province? One of the questions that comes up over and over again is: does it actually happen here? Yes, in fact, it does. The actual act is not carried out here, as far as we know, but we have something called the cutting season where little girls are sent to other countries to have this procedure occur for lots and lots of different reasons. The whole point of this legislation is not in any way to go after cultural rationalities, but it's to prevent violence against women that is perpetuated as a result of what people would deem as culture.

Just so you know, female genital mutilation happens on every continent in the world other than the most northern continent. You know, though, it happens everywhere else in the world. In fact, some of the biggest situations that are happening are in the United States right now because their federal legislation did not align with their state legislation. This came to my attention a few years ago in the United States, and it really started the process as to what needed to happen in our province. To everyone in here who is debating this legislation, even to be able to bring it to the floor is such a huge privilege. We will be the first Legislature in Canada to pass legislation like this, in line with many other countries, but even the United States is having issues with passing state legislation. Even 24 countries in Africa have passed this legislation. There has been no legislation in Asia we can see as of yet; however, we are seeing this happen in Africa.

There have been a lot of questions around culture as well, Mr. Speaker. We did not lead this legislation. This is not us as a Legislature or people of Alberta imposing our values on other cultures. We've been very blessed to have been led by many, many other groups and cultures that are helping us to understand what our part is in this globally, because it is a global issue. When we're talking about human trafficking, in particular about children, we have to just go that extra step to understand what we're responsible for. What's particularly special about this legislation: it's professional legislation that helps to define for our wonderful doctors in this province what they're able to do. I just wanted to start off with that, by expressing how proud I am.

There are decades – 250 million women right now are suffering. This could be happening to a little girl somewhere in the world. But, more than that, Mr. Speaker, 250 million women have either undergone or are suffering from the very, very severe effects of female genital mutilation. In a country like Canada, when we say that we protect women and girls, we protect women and girls, end of story. There cannot be pieces of definitions that either do or don't. You either do or you don't. This is one of those important things that we need to do within our province and within our country to start the conversation. And I mean that, because a lot of people don't know, and it's such a worthy discussion. What it does is that it leads to other layers of legislation to protect vulnerable peoples. Any time we can do that, I believe we are on the right side of history.

Female genital mutilation is a practice that has absolutely no health benefits, nor is it medically necessary, and instead it, in many ways, causes a great deal of harm to the health. There are four types of FGM. This is where it gets a little tricky, so I apologize for the language, but I think it's very important that we use the language and that we honour that and that we honour the people that are going to be doing this.

I think I'm supposed to move second reading. I'm sorry if I didn't do that. Thank you. I got so into my conversation. May I keep speaking after that? Okay. Excellent. Thank you. Sorry.

We have four types. The first one is called a clitoridectomy. This is a partial or total removal of the external part of the clitoris and prepuce, which is the hood of the clitoris.

Excision: partial or total removal of external parts of the clitoris, labia minora, with or without the removal of the labia majora.

Infibulation: narrowing of the vaginal opening, with the creation of a covering seal by cutting and repositioning the labia minora and/or removal of all the external clitoris pieces.

[Mrs. Frey in the chair]

Other procedures to the genitalia of women or girls for nonmedical purposes include pricking, piercing, incising, scraping, or cauterization. If that didn't make you a little bit nervous, congratulations to you. Every time I read it, it makes me more anxious, more upset, more concerned, and more committed than ever to making sure that all levels of domestic violence, sexual assault, and sexual violence are ended. We know that we can't always end these things, but we have an absolute responsibility as a culture, as a group of people, and as families in this province and in this country and globally to make sure we're doing the very best by our girls and our women and anybody who is vulnerable.

Some of the complications, as you can well imagine, that come from this are urinary tract problems; painful urination; vaginal problems, including massive infections; menstrual problems; and, of course, pain during intercourse. But the biggest problem is that we have the death of women and babies, thousands and thousands and thousands of them. Women have to be reopened in order to deliver babies quite often, as you can imagine – in rural areas it's very, very difficult to do – and then are quite often forced to be sewn up again after the fact.

One of the things that we learned – we did a very, very, very, very intense consultation, Madam Speaker: hundreds and hundreds of groups and organizations not just here in Alberta but across Canada and across the globe.

I also want to thank one particular woman, Giselle Portenier, who did the movie In the Name of Your Daughter. If you haven't had a chance to see that, it's imperative that you do. The first 10 minutes are extremely difficult to watch, but it gives an idea of what happens and the cultural practices. In Africa there are many, many groups, both women- and men-led, in the 24 states that have legislation against this, that are leading the discussions around this to help people understand that there are other ways to show coming of age but, more importantly, that girls are valued and are beautiful the way they are. This is because the way girls are put together is considered impure in some places but also because they believe that it's reducing promiscuity and makes a girl more valuable.

Kenya, in fact, right now has some of the strongest legislation in the African diaspora but are having very, very serious concerns with girls being cut and then being paraded out into the main squares and being showered with gifts and money as a result of their sacrifice to help uphold their villages. You can understand from that perspective – we can't go into this with a stigma because we don't understand where these cultures are coming from, but in Canada, in Alberta we absolutely have the ability to make these changes. In fact, I would suggest that it takes courage to do it. It's going to take the courage of this entire Legislature to be able to make sure that we're able to pass legislation that helps.

I was talking to you about the childbirth complications. Eighteen per cent of children that are born to an FGM victim or survivor are alive but need to be resuscitated. Those are significantly higher statistics than the average. Quite often they're ending up having to be born through a C-section because of the trauma to the baby. Five per cent are stillborn or die, and there's a clear link between those born alive and resuscitation and then stillborn in FGM. There's some very, very solid evidence to show that these are obviously not in the best interest of the woman or the child. But then again we also have a lot of folks who've survived and babies again we survived, and we have a tremendous amount of posttraumatic stress and depression and anxiety. This legislation is very thorough in that it provides supports, services, and potentially reconstruction as well for any woman that has been impacted.

I had the privilege of meeting Dr. Andrea Hunter, who is a reconstruction plastic surgeon, who's actually going to be working here in Alberta, who's hopefully going to be able to help us, because one of the biggest problems we had is that when we were speaking to doctors, they didn't know how to approach this discussion, as you can well imagine. This gives them the ability to not only be able to have discussion to educate and elevate discussion around women but also to be able to have criminal influences as well should a family not follow that direction or should a doctor be participating in any way, whether that's, you know, facilitating the surgery happening, helping to organize. Like, there are a lot of things that we can prevent and at least help that discussion happen. I would challenge every other Legislature across Canada to get their own version of this legislation going.

You have to also understand from the aspect of the girls and women who've already been through this. For the girls who are going through this, there is such an immense amount of stigma and low self-esteem. Many of them actually miss their regular physical appointments because they're afraid of being seen that they've been altered and then how to answer those questions. It's very, very, very difficult. Again, if you don't think that it's happening here and our doctors aren't seeing it, let me tell you that they are.

Over the course of the last two and a half years I've met hundreds and hundreds of women, both here and across Canada, that have told me their stories of survival, of intimidation, of stigma, of the many, many things that put us into a situation where we believe that this is okay, that an abuse of a little girl like this would be okay. Again, we have the opportunity to educate and really elevate the discussion so that we can help that education piece of it and help families to make healthy decisions here in Alberta. A lot of folks think that it's really just tradition, and it's not. This is a cultural practice that is in every single faith on every continent except for Antarctica, every single one.

I think that it's important that we go over some of the misconceptions as well, Madam Speaker. We hear all the time that it only happens in Africa or other diasporas. That's false. It's practised on every continent pretty much. Even in Europe right now the numbers stand at about a million girls that have been impacted, and that's because they're doing some data collection. We're hoping also, based on this legislation, that data will be able to be collected. We understand how important this data is, but it's also about wanting to share that data. The doctors now will have – it's mandatory for them to report if they see this, so at the very least there is information about what is going on so that should a case come forward, where abuse needs to be brought forward, we're able to do that. There are misconceptions that it only happens to adult women. The majority of girls who underwent female genital mutilation are under the age of five. Cutters claim that there are health benefits.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I don't mean to point fingers because, again, I'm not trying to impose what I believe on other cultures or coming from other countries. Having said that, though, it's passed down from grandma to grandma to grandma – that happens in these countries where they're cut – so you can imagine trying to change the perception and the discussions around that and how important that discussion is. We have the idea that there's been this long-standing tradition, that there are health benefits, but it actually stems from the idea that female genitals are dirty, and in order to be clean and not promiscuous, they must be cut.

I was going to say, too, that, like, I think one of the biggest problems that we noticed throughout this and what I learned in these discussions is that it's very, very difficult to have a lawsuit come forward. There have been very few lawsuits that have even come forward. In Michigan the court case was brought forward after state legislation was just recently passed, and they were still not able to get justice for these little girls because it was considered vindictive to go back after the same case again. In whatever way it was handled, it was not being seen as a day of justice for the girls between the ages of nine and 14 that were cut in the United States. It was seen as an act of desperation for lawmakers to come forward with this new legislation, so they couldn't even retroactively go after the doctors that were doing this practice.

I think the most difficult part of that read was that they were saying they were just doing a little cut, a little nick. Well, we're talking about a very tiny and significant part of a woman's body, and anything that happens in there is going to have long-term results. Again, the hope is – we're going to be having some meetings with some of the Senators in the United States, too, about their decisions, and the governors, around what's going on because I think globally we just really need to come together on this discussion.

In the Health Professions Act a couple of the things that we're going to be dealing with specifically, so that folks understand this legislation – please, if you have any questions about this at all or anything outside of, like, what we discuss in here, I would be, like, more than honoured to help out and discuss this. It's really important. If there's anything that I can do to help or people that you know that may need to have a conversation about this, like, please feel free to reach out to me any time. I'm certainly not the expert by any stretch, but we'll get people connected to the right people.

This is what has been said in the laws, in the existing laws, and how we'll be strengthening those laws with the permission of the House. The procurement or performance of FGM by a regulated health professional in Alberta is prohibited, and "a person who has been convicted of a criminal offence related to the procurement or performance of [FGM] is not eligible for registration as a regulated member under [the Health Professions Act]." The proposed amendments make reporting conduct related to female genital mutilation to law enforcement mandatory.

The proposed amendments will also require health profession regulatory colleges to adopt standards of practice relating to FGM and cutting. The standards of practice will address things like education related to the prevention and prohibition of FGM, Mr. Speaker, obviously, supporting victims, securing and providing further supports that may be necessary to protect a child at risk, and how to manage the resulting physical and psychological trauma to support a victim. This would mean potentially even supporting surgical procedures to help the FGM survivor to either have a natural birth or subsequent repair post that. So it's fairly substantive and, I think, a very, very good jumping-off point.

I think that as we go through the process, we'll probably hear back from a lot of docs and, through the physicians' and doctors' help, understand how that's going. I think it'll be very profound in understanding what kind of data we're dealing with in our province, especially, I mean, as Alberta is opening up and we see the opportunities, the amazing opportunities in our province right now. We want to attract as many people as we can from all over the world to come to this beautiful province and live here and contribute to the immense and beautiful fabric that is Alberta. We will be able to stand just a little bit taller knowing that we have legislation that protects women and girls in this way and that is a layered type of protection that goes on top of the other protections that have come not just from this government but governments before us as well.

I often say this, that our society is only as good as our humanity, and that's why these discussions are so important, because it's not about a bad group or a good group or bad practice or good practice or bad people or good people. It's not about that. It's about evolving and taking seriously the things that we say in our country and in our province and truly, truly believing in the power of good legislation to be able to come forward to protect our women and girls.

Thank you so much.

The Speaker: I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member. I'm not sure – the chair may have missed it at the beginning – whether or not you actually said “I move second reading” or “I'm pleased to move second reading” or something to the effect.

Mrs. Aheer: I was a little late, but, yes, I did. Thank goodness our whip was on it.

The Speaker: Excellent. Excellent.

Are there others? The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to start off this evening by thanking the Member for Strathmore-Chestermere, or Chestermere-Strathmore . . .

Mrs. Aheer: It works both ways.

Ms Issik: . . . for all of the amazing work and dedication that she has done on this cause. She has put countless hours into this. She's put her heart and soul into this for the sole reason of protecting women and girls, and I know that I am not alone amongst Albertans for being grateful for her efforts. It's been truly remarkable to watch her dedication to this issue.

You know, the one thing about this legislation that's amazing is that it actually takes a proactive approach to addressing female genital mutilation. Although we're not aware of health professionals in this province who offer this procedure, if even one woman or one girl experienced it in this province, it would be one too many. Under this legislation any health professionals convicted of performing or facilitating female genital mutilation or cutting would have their permit to practise and their registration cancelled in this province. Additionally, health professionals convicted of this crime in other jurisdictions would not be allowed to practise or register in this province. That's what makes this different. That's what makes this legislation different.

Also, it would be prohibited that a complaint alleging procurement or provision of FGM go to the alternative complaints process. Again, very important. It makes it mandatory to report any conduct related to FGM to law enforcement. Again, unique in this country and, I think, actually unique probably in almost all of North America, except for maybe Michigan. That's why this legislation is so important.

It's one of the greatest tools we've got to combat any form of gender-based violence because it promotes awareness and it promotes education. Bringing this practice to light is incredibly important. It needs to come out of the shadows. One of the important ways that that will happen is by the health profession, by the regulatory body, the college adopting standards of practice related to FGM. That's something that doesn't exist currently, and it is needed. The college would have, if this legislation is passed, a year from the date that the legislation comes into force to develop and implement the new standards of practice. Naturally, the content and nature of these standards of practice would differ depending on the types of services offered by each profession; however, they may focus on elements such as training related to prevention of FGM or securing supports to protect a child at risk.

The Member for Chestermere-Strathmore did outline some of the other pieces around reconstruction and other sorts of practices that would support women and girls that have been through this. The standards would encompass managing treatment, recovery, and, as I mentioned before, supports for women. Alberta's government would work closely with all of the regulatory colleges to ensure the standards of practice adequately address prevention of the act and provide the support for survivors that I mentioned.

I want to note that although this practice is sometimes called female circumcision, it is in no way comparable to male circumcision, nor is it a religious practice. Female genital mutilation can cause serious, long-term health problems in the women who have experienced it, and those have been enumerated here tonight. It can cause complications with childbirth and menstruation. It can lead to harmful infections and even death. For many women around the world female genital mutilation means a lifetime of pain and fear, and I am proud that Alberta is being a leader in standing up against this practice.

This initiative is in complete alignment with this government's broader effort to protect vulnerable women and girls from sexual violence. If this legislation passes, we will be the first provincial jurisdiction in Canada to introduce legislation addressing this. I encourage all members of this Assembly to support this bill so we can help ensure that no woman in Alberta has to experience this horrific crime.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs, followed by the Member for Lethbridge-East.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my privilege to rise this evening to speak to Bill 10, the Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022. I'd like to start by thanking both members that have spoken to this in second reading. I think the passion that the member brings for this is incredible, and it's really heartfelt. I think, you know, that by identifying this topic and by starting with it being a trigger for many is a huge starting point, where I would like to start the discussion when we're talking about this.

I think that when we talk about legislation that has such a profound impact on women and girls, there are so many elements that we need to consider when we're making these decisions and we're going through something that is such a profound topic, that has such an impact on those that are impacted by genital cutting and those that are working with the women that have been impacted. It's both ways when we're talking about this practice. When I have done some research about this practice – you know, I come from a children's services background, and this is a conversation that we have as professionals, about the impacts on our young women and girls.

It has to start with education, and it has to start with a general understanding of what this means and what's happening in the province. Even if the procedure didn't happen in the province, when our physicians and health care providers are working with these young women, they need to understand what the next steps are and what happens after that.

I appreciate this legislation. It talks about, in depth, the criminal component of it when the practice happens in the province, but oftentimes we know that this happens out of province and these women are here, and we need to know that when we're going forward with this legislation – and, you know, I've heard the associate minister talk about next steps and practice – we need to really ensure that we get it right, that we're looking at ways that not just support the young women and the girls but that support the health care providers that are providing service to these young women, because it is traumatic, and it does have an impact, and there needs to be an understanding, I would even argue, at an entry-of-education level, so in postsecondary, when we're talking to nurses, when we're talking to social workers, when we're talking to physicians, obstetricians. It should be part of the curriculum of what we're talking about.

It should be a conversation that everybody in the health care profession is comfortable having, because it can be a conversation that people automatically have an assumption of what that means. We've heard in this House that it is not a spiritual practice, so having that understanding that sometimes it's bigger than the why. It's: "How do we support this individual? What do they need? What are that individual's beliefs about it? What does it say about them?" and really, really working hard to try not to stigmatize the young women, because there are values that we hold and judgments that we hold. As a social worker coming to people with the most neutral understanding – and no judgment comes from a place of education, right? So if we're talking about the standards that are going to follow this piece of legislation, I think going even further than just educating our current health care professionals, looking at those that are entering the field and the practice and having those conversations about how we can support women.

Having a really open conversation about the supports that women can access: it's something that I learned through working at Terra, which is a school for pregnant and parenting teens. Some young women would find themselves pregnant and not know what services and supports and resources were available. They didn't have people in their family that they could trust. So how do we educate the broader public about services and resources and information if their home isn't a safe place to access that information, if their community of origin isn't a safe place to access that information? How do we get the message out there that women can access safe information, health care? It's so important to be able to do that.

I appreciate the criminalization piece of it. My understanding is that it's already in the Criminal Code. That education component is just so essential. We need to look at ways that we can, you know, understand genital cutting in a bigger scope. We need to include many professions, midwives. We heard the member talk about the importance of childbirth in that and that women experience alternative ways of childbirth. They might have a midwife. They might have a doula. It's not just perhaps a physician that is working with these women, so having that understanding on that level as well. I would also suggest that social workers be included in that because we typically have social workers in place in hospitals, whether they come in through the emergency room, whether they're dealing with children through the CAP Centre at the U of A, so having just a multidiverse understanding of the impacts of this and being able to genuinely really support those that are working with the women.

One of the things that I wish I saw in this bill was more talk about the women and girls. I know that it talks about the prosecution and the criminal piece, but for a piece of legislation that says Protecting Women and Girls, some sort of reference to being able to support the women and the girls and that that next step is coming, to talk about the importance of understanding that there is trauma affiliated with this and that the government is looking to genuinely support those women and girls. I truly hope that that's the intention. I've heard you both say that. I would like to see that that's something that's happening.

It's something also to understand that it might not necessarily be done through health care providers. Solely focusing on health care providers, I think, would be part of that education piece for the general community, but they might not have gone to their doctor for this procedure. It might have gone through someone in the community. There are other ways. Just because it wasn't a health care provider doesn't mean it's not a criminal act, and there's still trauma affiliated with that. I see the associate minister nodding. I appreciate that.

I think that, with that, Mr. Speaker, I will take my seat and continue to listen to the debate. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East has risen.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to support Bill 10, Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022, and it's dealing with female genital mutilation. This is a rather uncomfortable and difficult topic to actually contemplate and speak about, particularly as a male, so I'd like to thank the very strong women that spoke previous to me on this, on both sides of the aisle, that they took the very courageous stand to bring this incredibly sensitive and generally unknown topic to our attention to address it for so many women and girls.

As I was contemplating speaking about this, I asked myself the question: how does one begin to describe female genital mutilation? Words like "unconscionable," "heinous," "dangerous," "painful," "brutal" all come to mind. Particularly in the western world, this type of practice is virtually unthinkable. What about from my perspective as the father of four daughters? How horrific to consider it even remotely happening to one of my children. Therefore, should not every woman and girl in Alberta have that same care and protection that Bill 10 would offer them and do just that?

Female genital mutilation is a dangerous practice, Mr. Speaker. According to the Criminal Code of Canada this practice carries a charge of aggravated assault. This is something that we can never have practised in Alberta. One thing I'm glad that this act takes into consideration is that anyone convicted of female genital mutilation in another jurisdiction would not be allowed to practise medicine here in Alberta. I don't think it should be allowed to be practised anywhere, but I'm very glad that within our jurisdiction we are taking steps to prevent it.

My colleague from Chestermere-Strathmore pointed out last week that, if passed, this bill would make Alberta the first jurisdiction to directly address this horrible practice. As I said before, as a father of four daughters I'm proud that Alberta is the first province to act, and I'm very hopeful that other provinces will follow suit. Mr. Speaker, this is not a partisan issue. Even if you're not the parent of daughters, I would imagine everyone in this Chamber has a niece, a cousin, a close friend, a relative of some sort that they would not be able to imagine being subjected to this crime.

I know I've mentioned my daughters throughout the speech, and I will continue to because of this piece of legislation, that is intended to make our province a safer place for them and others just like them to live and prosper. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to learn that according to statistics that the government brought to our attention when the bill was tabled, there are estimated to be 200 million women and girls world-wide who have undergone female genital mutilation or cutting and that are still alive today. Two hundred million. I cannot get over that number. That is – what? – 20 times the population of Canada or more. It crosses at least 30 countries. What is even more disturbing is that something like 3 million girls are estimated to be at risk of undergoing this illegal practice every year. Three million girls. This cannot happen. It's unacceptable. I wish we could protect women and girls around the world, but we can't. That's not our jurisdiction. But we do have the authority and the obligation to do that right here in Alberta, in each and every one of our hometowns, to make them a safe place, a safe haven for women from around the world to come and live and prosper.

As the Minister of Health stated last week, these changes make it even more clear that any health professional performing FTM or cutting will never practise in Alberta again. I don't like that we have to make this clear, but based on the evidence that has been shared in this House, there is, clearly and unfortunately, a need to do so.

Mr. Speaker, that is why I am compelled to rise and support this bill. As members of this Chamber have pointed out, girls and women undergoing any type of FGM procedure can face lifetime health problems, not only the obvious physical effects and trauma but devastating psychological problems as well that can arise from being subjected to this barbaric practice. I believe everyone in this Chamber would agree that wanting to protect the women and girls in their lives – their daughters, their nieces, their cousins, their friends, all the women and girls in their communities – is paramount. We here in Alberta have the opportunity to set the path for other provinces and territories to follow to protect women and girls. I appreciate that this bill states that if a medical practitioner is convicted of this crime, their practice permit and registration are cancelled immediately. At this point a crime has been committed, and there is no need for a regulatory hearing. What there is a need for is the guilty party's swift removal from the profession so that they can never be in a position to harm a girl or a woman again.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, while I'm happy to speak in support of this bill as a member of this Assembly, I know that as a loving father there is nothing I wouldn't do to ensure their safety. I believe that this amendment to the Health Professions Act is important for women and girls in Alberta and will be a great tool to make sure that anyone practising FGM will never ever be in the position to do so again.

Thank you again to the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore and the Associate Minister of Status of Women for their incredible work to bring this forward. From me, from my community, from my community with many members from around the world, and from the father of four daughters, thank you, through you, Mr. Speaker, to them and to the members opposite for speaking in support of this bill. I would ask that everyone else would also rise and support this bill.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this although I must admit I'm a little loath, as an older male, to say too much, because I certainly think other people know much more about the topic and have put much more energy into making sure that they've got this right.

I guess I want to start my speech by thanking the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore for the work that she has done on this bill and, you know, I think, for the many years even prior to introducing this bill into the House, on this topic. Of course, it is one which is very serious and one that I think needs to be addressed.

Many of you will know that I have many years of experience working in the area of sexual assault, and of course this type of topic certainly came up a number of times in my time as an instructor of social work. I also did receive a number of papers from students about this topic and learned much about it. Listening to the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore, I thought, was refreshing in terms of how direct the conversation was, how specific the use of clear language about what was being said. I think that is something that really needs to be done more often in this House, so I certainly commend not only their work but their words tonight on this important subject.

I do think that this bill is in line with, you know, a real trend. As I say, students have been writing papers about this in my classes for a number of years. I know that in Alberta the college of physicians back in 1994 began the process of ensuring that none of their members participated in this type of activity, and of course the federal government also made female genital mutilation illegal in May 1997. So, I mean, this has been a topic that has been in the public consciousness for a period of time, and certainly I want to support the people who are doing the work to make sure this is moving forward and doing it right.

I know that it's a difficult topic to talk about. First of all, the natural anguish you feel when you hear about the actual activities that take place make it difficult to speak to. But you also realize that it does take place in the world, and, like when I was dealing with child sexual abuse, you know, sometimes it was hard to bring up the subject to talk about with people. You're trying not to turn people away from an important topic, yet you need to address the topic with sincerity and depth and not make sort of side references to what it is but actually speak directly to the actual things, and I think the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore did that very well.

I know it's very difficult. People around the world practise this because for some reason they believe there is a reason to do this, certainly not any reason that we in this House would share. But we also, then, understand that the work is complicated. It's complicated because you want to find a way to invite people to understand why we are moving forward with these kinds of bills to stop this from happening, to help them to understand this new perspective, knowing that it will be difficult for many people to understand that perspective, particularly, as the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore said, as this is something that has happened generation after generation after generation in families. We're inviting them into a place that they have no experience, and as such it can be very, very difficult.

Finding that way to move forward takes nuance and a delicacy on some levels, and I appreciate that the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore and, of course, the associate minister for women have tried to walk what can be a difficult line and, I think, have done so somewhat successfully. I certainly don't have any complaints. I would love to find ways to be supportive about the work as it moves forward and really look forward to the work that needs to go around this kind of legislation to ensure that people who have been involved are somehow given the supports to make the transition, to make the move. I look forward to hearing about, you know, the budget items that will be supporting this, the types of services that will be available – I know some of that has been spoken to already this evening – but not just the services that are available but the process by which we will ensure that this kind of activity really ceases to exist in this country.

I guess I'll end my comments here just saying thank you to everyone who is helping to move this along. If there's some way that we in the opposition can help to ensure the success of stopping genital mutilation in this country and indeed around the world, then certainly we, too, wish to stand and be counted.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to applaud the incredible work done by the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore on this bill. I know that she's been working on it for a number of years. It's something that she's very passionate about and something that there's a lot of misunderstanding and misinformation about as well. One of the points that I really wanted to get on the record – and the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore spoke to it as well as the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs – was that this is not a religious practice, and I cannot stress that enough. On this particular issue I myself and others in the community have heard misinformation and it being repeated and repeated that this is actually a religious practice. Of course, it's not. I really want to thank the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore for making that very important point.

It's unfortunate, because it so happens that sometimes people do mistake a cultural practice for a religious one, and then people tend to just keep propagating that misinformation in the community. On this particular issue I think it's something that is really important, that if you ever hear that piece of misinformation, you correct it immediately, please, as I have tried to do many times, no matter what community I'm visiting with, if I happen to hear that piece of misinformation.

If the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore wouldn't mind, I would welcome an interjection from her simply because I'm really eager to know a little bit more about the groups that she actually consulted with on this particular issue, so at this time I cede to her if she wouldn't mind speaking a little bit to that.

Mrs. Aheer: May I?

The Speaker: A reverse interjection.

Mrs. Aheer: I know. I would be happy to. Thank you so much. It was such a robust consultation. Thank you to the member, through you, Mr. Speaker. It was a real labour of love, actually, over the years because, like I was mentioning earlier, we shouldn't be leading this discussion. The diasporas where it's very, very obvious are where those interactions need to happen. One thing that I'd love to share with you is that I met with Rhobi. She is a leader in ending FGM in Kenya, and she, a bunch of the girls from the movie In the Name of Your Daughter, and I, had a Zoom call together. Rhobi herself, the one young girl, is one of the young girls who was able to escape female genital mutilation and ended up going back to her family, but her family had said that, no, this is going to happen. So she ended up staying on at the shelter . . . [Mrs. Aheer's speaking time expired] Sorry. I can talk about it later.

9:50

Member Loyola: No, and I thank you for that, hon. member. It's important for me, and especially when it comes to this matter – and, of course, unlike some of the debates that happen inside this House, this is not a political, partisan one. I think that for the most part we agree on most aspects of the bill. There is one particular issue that I'm a little bit concerned about, of course, that I'm interested in knowing from the minister. How do you think that this particular bill will actually help the women and girls that you're seeking to protect? You mentioned that health professionals may get access to, for example, supports and things like that, but through careful reading of the bill itself I didn't actually see how women and girls will be supported.

Mrs. Aheer: May I?

Member Loyola: Please go ahead.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you so much. The Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs brought this up as well. A big chunk of any changes in intervention and how we proceed has to happen with education and empowerment. I don't think that the women who have survived this procedure or are going through it or anything are well served by an automatic jump into justice in terms of criminality until we've had an opportunity to actually talk with the families. Of course, if a family is trying to send their child away and is facilitating that or a doctor is facilitating that, that automatically leads to criminality. However, there are many, many opportunities, Mr. Speaker, for us to intervene previous to that with the doctors and physicians having knowledge to be able to intercept. The biggest problem that we've had in the past, at least from my consultations, was the difficulty in understanding how to bring up the conversation and have it, because they didn't understand if it was religious or if it was cultural practices or how to bring up that conversation.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much for that, hon. member. As we move forward, I think that it's really important that we identify those particular aspects of the bill because, at the end of the day, it is the women and girls that have experienced this incredibly horrendous – and I am at a loss for words to actually describe this practice, as some of us have already stated in this House. And, of course, it's really important that we don't continue the stigmatization on this particular issue. I think that although it's something that we find horrendous and unacceptable, at the same time we need to proceed with caution, especially with those communities that, again, are confusing a cultural practice for a religious one, as you pointed out, Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

I think it's really important as well that as we continue debate, we speak specifically to the supports that health professionals are going to get. I know that I'm going to do my due diligence and actually reach out to health professionals that I know of myself and ask them what they think about the bill, not because I'm, you know, trying to create any kind of angst or discord but just to do my due diligence with reaching out to them as well.

Once again I want to thank the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore for all the incredibly hard work that she's done with this, the Associate Minister of Status of Women, as well, for bringing this piece of legislation into the House. I look forward to learning more as we continue the debate. With that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 5

Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022

[Debate adjourned March 22: Ms Goehring speaking]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs has some time remaining should she choose to use it. The hon. member.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this evening to speak to Bill 5, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022. When I was speaking to this the last time, I was talking about the importance of PTSD being included in this. One of the things that I mentioned as a concern was the government's position on removing access to workers to claim PTSD as part of their work impact.

Part of this legislation that I think is so important is that it expands those that we need to protect on our Alberta roadways. I know that when I was doing my consultation for PTSD Awareness Day, you know, I spoke to those that provide a response to motor vehicle collisions or any sort of involvement, whether it's a tow truck or an emergency response vehicle, and the trauma that those individuals face is quite significant.

So when we're talking about traffic safety and we're expanding those that we need to slow down for when we're passing on our roadways, I would encourage this government to look at the other component of this and the trauma that we're saying in Bill 5 is a reason for their safety, that we need to make sure that we are slowing down not just for emergency vehicles but for roadside assistant responders and such. We need to take that same argument and apply it to the mental health services that we provide those individuals. It's confusing to me why under Bill 5 we talk about the importance of their safety, their physical safety, yet we don't talk about it in other realms of legislation. We don't look at why their emotional safety is just as important. I think that it's incredible that we're continuing to acknowledge worker safety, and this piece of legislation does that.

It opens up the Traffic Safety Act. One of the questions that I did have when we were discussing this, that I haven't received a response to, was: how many lanes are being impacted when we are required to slow down? Currently the legislation indicates that it's the immediate lane where you have to slow down. So I'm curious if there been some consideration in expanding how many lanes would be impacted so that all lanes of traffic are required to slow down. Often what happens is that you see emergency vehicles or a tow truck on the side of the road. In that first lane people slow down, but then the other lanes of traffic are going 110 down the highway.

Mr. Eggen: A hundred and 10?

Ms Goehring: A hundred and 10 is the law.

But it doesn't impact the entire roadway. So there are subsequent actions that could impact or enhance this piece of legislation. I think that exploring how many lanes are impacted by this piece of legislation would be great.

I think the other piece is ensuring that there's a strong educational component to this, to understand and to educate those that are driving about what the rules are. I know one of the things that I went through when my kids were doing their driver's test is that that was really the only time that as a driver I sat and reread all of the rules. I would argue that that's probably most drivers; they do the test, they have their licence, and then they're probably not being updated on current laws. I think it's important that when we look at safety, education be a huge component of that, so making sure that there's a big push to educate Alberta drivers about what it means to keep our workers safe on our roadways.

I know AMA is a wonderful organization that does some great education campaigns. I can think of one of their commercials that they had done encouraging roadside safety, and it started with what looked like some sort of carnival happening on the side of the road with lights and all these sounds. It then changed the scene to show that it was emergency responders. It wasn't something that was fun and exciting happening; it was a safety concern, and they were doing their job. So the message from that commercial was to make sure that people slow down and that important work is happening on the side of the highway. It's not something that workers or drivers should dismiss.

I think that we become complacent when we see emergency vehicles and we just kind of do the status quo. So now that that is changing, we need to make sure that Albertans are aware so that we can keep workers safe. We need to make sure that we're all slowing down when we're seeing vehicles pulled over on the side doing work. That ensures the safety of all the motorists that are responding as well as those that are doing the work.

If education is rolling out, I think a clear message needs to happen. I worked with a gentleman who was working with the city of Edmonton and addressing the response times of Edmonton fire. They were trying to determine what was causing the delay in responses, and loud and clear it was people not merging properly to let the emergency vehicles through. They had determined that, especially in the downtown core, simply hearing sirens didn't alert a driver to pull over to allow the emergency vehicle to proceed. I mean, that's something that you learn as a driver immediately, what the response is when you see lights coming at you, what you're supposed to do, and people just simply weren't doing it. So one of the things that the city of Edmonton tried to do was change the siren sound of the fire trucks. That was something that they were hoping would have an impact to alert drivers that something is happening, because they were used to hearing sirens, but they weren't responding in the way that they were supposed to.

I know that as drivers sometimes we go on automatic – you go on your route home; you kind of tune everything out – but that's when accidents happen, and that's when, unfortunately, emergency responders aren't able to do the job that they need to do to keep us safe. When we're talking about Bill 5, it's something that I can obviously support because it makes sure that anybody that's going to work: we're going to try and ensure they get home safely.

I'm looking forward to continued discussion and continued debate about this, and I hope that some more information can be provided about some clarity about the lanes specifically, if it's expanding to more than the immediate lane and, if not, if that's possibly something that could be considered. It's something that I know I've heard when I'm speaking with members, that specifically emergency roadside assistance would like to see, because it's difficult when traffic is still continuing to go the 110 kilometres while they're trying to get someone home safely.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I thank you for giving me time to finish my remarks on Bill 5, and I will take my seat. Thank you.

The Speaker: On second reading of Bill 5, the hon. Member for Calgary-McCall-Bhullar.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's Calgary-Bhullar-McCall. I rise to speak in favour of Bill 5, and I think it's an important piece of legislation. Speaking of Bhullar-McCall, it reminds me of our friend and colleague Manmeet Singh Bhullar, whose life was cut short in a tragic accident on the roadside while he was stopped to help a fellow motorist. This piece of legislation will make sure that those who are passing by highway maintenance workers, emergency workers, first responders, tow truck operators, or even any Albertan who is stopped on the side to help somebody – they need to slow down, and that will save lives.

I'm glad to see that there is a mention of an educational component to this legislation as well. That education campaign, I hope, will get the message out far and wide to make sure that not only these people are aware of this legislation, that people are aware of these changes but that people are aware of what they need to do when they see flashing lamps, when they see highway workers, when they see emergency vehicles. As my colleague from Edmonton-Castle Downs mentioned – I think it’s true for most of us – we only read about these rules when we first go for the written test, and after that I don’t think there is a way of kind of continued development, for lack of a better word. When I read about this educational component, I hope that it’s more substantive and it reaches far and wide to all Albertans.

The second thing I will briefly comment about. When the minister was speaking at second reading, she said that some in opposition may suggest higher fines, new fines and referred to them as cash cows. I think that it was not the opposition who coined this term; it was the then UCP sitting in opposition, who used to rage against those cash cows and higher fines, but I think that changed when they got into power and power got into their heads.

The third thing. I think it’s important that when we are talking about making roads safe, we also talk about and make sure that roads are open. That’s the only, I guess, functional utility of roads, that they’re open for traffic, that they’re open for transportation. If they’re not open and there are no vehicles on it, I don’t think that then we need these laws.

What we saw during the illegal Coutts blockade: many of our roads were closed for many days, weeks, almost 21 days. When we asked the minister at the estimates about not taking steps to cancel their licences or taking some other steps, the minister shared – and I’m paraphrasing – that she didn’t have those legal authorities. While this traffic act is now open, that is an opportunity to make these roads really safe and make these roads safe from those illegal blockades and send a strong message to those who were blocking our roads, to those who were damaging our economy, to those who were sitting illegally on our economic corridors and making roads almost unavailable for fellow Albertans. I think that was the opportunity to send a strong message, even to those who were cheering them on and even participated in those blockades. I think that’s the opportunity that this government missed while they had this piece of legislation opened already.

I hope that at the committee stage the minister will be open to suggestions, amendments that will ensure that roads are safe, that will ensure that roads are not only safe but that they are open as well and that those who would try to blockade them illegally, those who would cheer on those kinds of illegal blockades – that the government and the minister will have the legal authority and the power that the government and the minister need to dispel those illegal blockades. With that, I thank the minister again for bringing forward this legislation, and I hope that at the committee stage the minister will be open to making roads even more safe for all Albertans.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Yes. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It’s a pleasure to rise here tonight and speak to Bill 5. Road and highway safety is a top priority for this government, as it should be. Every day thousands of Albertans get in their cars and head to work, school, or to their kids’ hockey games at the local leisure centre. Their safety remains paramount thanks to road enhancements, for example, highways 11, 19, and 15 twinning projects.

Now, those safety concerns have been addressed for our first responders as well. Every day they put themselves at risk while saving the lives of car crash victims and other calls for service along our province’s very busy highways. Thanks to the current protection under the Traffic Safety Act they don’t have the added anxiety of drivers speeding past them as they perform life-saving duties. Thankfully, tow truck drivers are protected under the current provisions. Most of the time they are the ones on the side of the road after emergency crews pack up and are most at risk of being hit by a passing motorist.

Mr. Speaker, these current protections shouldn’t just include tow truck drivers and emergency crews. Roadside workers face the same if not more dangers since they work on the side of the road each and every day. The overwhelming majority of Albertans feel the exact same way. Last year this government heard from over 15,000 survey respondents, with 92 per cent of them supporting all drivers giving one lane of space when passing a roadside worker vehicle when its lights are flashing, and 60 per cent felt that the current passing laws were inadequate. These proposed changes as part of Bill 5 will offer similar protection to those workers along with snowplow operators. As much as I hate to admit it, most of our year involves the threat of icy and snowy roads like it is outside right now, and those operators are up very early in the morning, working until late in the afternoon to make sure that roads are clear for the safety of everyone else. We should make sure that they are safe while doing so.

The same can be said for roadside workers, who for some time spend all their day controlling traffic and standing on their feet for long periods of time. These are the people most at risk when doing their job, and we as a government need to do our job to make sure that they can get home safely once they are done. Alberta drivers must be aware of just how dangerous it can be on the sides of highways and that they pose a tremendous danger to these workers. Roadside workers in a high-risk environment deserve the best protection to ensure that they can go home safely to their families at the end of their shift.

Now, I’m thankful that in my riding I can speak with the Minister of Transportation on issues like this as many of my constituents travel and work along provincial highways like 628, highway 16, Yellowhead, and 779 daily. Their safety is critical, and these changes help provide them with extra security, knowing drivers will have to slow down on both sides of the highway. With these updated changes coming out next year, education will play a big part, and I look forward to this government’s plan to update the public ahead of the enforcement date next March. Safety of this province’s roadside workers and snowplow operators has always been and continues to be extremely important, and Bill 5 does a great job of reflecting that perfectly.

Thank you again, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing and hearing none, I am prepared to call on the minister to close debate. The hon. the Minister of Transportation to close debate.

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move to close debate on Bill 5.

[Motion carried; Bill 5 read a second time]

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, I rise to move that we adjourn the sitting for tonight until tomorrow at 1:30 p.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 10:16 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, March 29, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interest and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, I'm very pleased to introduce a very special guest joining us today in the gallery – I know that some of you may have met with her, and I look forward to meeting her on behalf of Members of the Legislative Assembly tomorrow morning – Ms Idit Shamir, consul general for the state of Israel, accompanied by Mr. Jordan Falkenstein, director of government relations for the consulate general of Israel in Toronto. I invite you to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, also joining us in the Speaker's gallery today are Jordan, Beck, Laine, and Neva Camponi. They are the family members – I know that you're never supposed to pick a favourite child or a favourite staffer – of one of my favourite staffers from the Speaker's office, Ms Erin Camponi. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Utility Costs

Ms Ganley: Let them eat cake. When first asked about skyrocketing energy prices, the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity proudly rose and declared he planned to do nothing. Nothing. When presented with stories from hundreds of real families trying to choose between buying groceries and keeping the lights on, this government tells them not to worry; it's just the market working. The UCP takes a billion dollars in increases in income taxes out of the pockets of working families and calls it modest sacrifices – food, heat, power: modest sacrifices? – but they have more than four times that to give away to highly profitable corporations with not so much as a single job in return.

They talk about fiscal discipline, but insurance companies aren't required to explain why they need more than 5 per cent a year every year in increases. Not to worry, though. The Premier's insurance went down, so I guess there's no problem.

The associate minister seems so out of touch with the impact that energy prices were having on families. I asked him if he even knew what they were compared to a few months ago or a year before. He didn't. Not even a rough figure, an attempt, some sort of indication that he knew what Albertans were up against. Nothing. Nothing, which coincidentally was his plan to address the cost-of-living crisis. This UCP government is far too busy with their own internal power struggles to worry about what Albertans are up against. Their so-called help, $50, sure won't feed a family facing hundreds in new costs. Maybe they do think they can eat cake or at least heat their houses with it.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we know what became of the French aristocracy. Fortunately, Albertans don't have to go to such lengths to rid themselves of their out-of-touch rulers. They'll have that chance in 2023.

Federal Energy Policies

Mr. Schow: The NDP-Liberal coalition is attacking responsible Canadian energy yet again. The environmental extremist and chief Liberal minister Steven Guilbeault has announced a wide range of policies that will harm Alberta industries and invade our provincial jurisdiction. Don't get me wrong. I support measures to reduce emissions, I support technology and innovation to make our industrial economy cleaner and greener, but what I cannot support are punishing taxes and regulations that will kill Alberta jobs, will penalize Alberta families, and will harm our economic recovery. Mr. Speaker, we are already seeing the destructive effects of ill-advised climate change policies that will be punishing us for decades.

The actions of Minister Guilbeault and people like him have restricted the development of energy and resources in western countries like Canada. They have blocked oil and gas development. They have obstructed the construction of pipelines and LNG export facilities. They have shut down safe and emissions-free nuclear power stations. In doing this, they've handed control of global energy markets to some of the world's worst regimes, like Vladimir Putin, Iran, and the socialist dictatorship of Venezuela, just to name a few. They have also killed Canadian jobs, restricted Canadian supply, and driven up prices for Canadian families, worsening the Trudeau inflation crisis.

Despite this, the Liberal-NDP government wants to double down on their failed ideological policies. They want to further limit the development of our oil and gas sector, further jeopardizing our energy security and raising prices at the pump. They want to attack our reliable baseload electricity regeneration, further driving up utility bills. They want to ban the import of new efficient gas and diesel vehicles that the vast majority of Albertans need to get to work and take their kids to hockey practice.

Mr. Speaker, as always, it will fall on the government of Alberta to defend common sense in Canada and defend our energy sector, and I'm confident that we're up to the task.

Canadian Freedoms and Russian Disinformation

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Mr. Speaker, as Canadians we are proud of the freedom we have and the sacrifices that were made. We don't recognize often how lucky we really are to live in a free nation. In Canada the Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees our right to the "freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other [means] of communication" and to the "freedom of peaceful assembly." Here in Canada these rights allow for people to be able to protest government decisions that run counter to their beliefs and allow for varying opinions to be expressed through various forms of media.

Unfortunately, there are parts of the world that do not share these values, as we are seeing with the invasion of Ukraine. That's right, Mr. Speaker. The communist, socialist propaganda machine is alive and well with Mr. Putin. The Putin media has been tasked with spreading the propaganda message on Ukraine, and what is the message? Mr. Putin would like the Russian people and the rest of the world to believe that Ukraine is run by a bunch of neo-Nazi fascists that pose a threat to the Russian state. He would like the Russian people to believe that he is fighting the good fight against tyranny in Ukraine. While he is committed to the massive disinformation campaign, he has also shut down social media channels with Russia to prevent the truth from seeping in.

But the Russian people know better, Mr. Speaker. They recognize that Russia is the aggressor in Ukraine. They recognize that their lives are being negatively affected by sanctions due to Mr. Putin's war, and they are out protesting this horribly senseless war. Unfortunately, they do not have the right to do so, and thousands have been arrested for having views counter to those of Mr. Putin.

The war is a reminder of how lucky we are to live in a free and democratic country like Canada, and I hope that those in Russia one day will know the freedoms that Canadians often take for granted.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Postsecondary Education Budget Protests

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, our actions demonstrate our priorities, our values, who we are. Actions are how we demonstrate to the world what we most care about. Clearly, the UCP's actions towards postsecondary prove that they do not care one bit about students in this province.

Yesterday was the Alberta student day of action. Across the province, in Lethbridge, Calgary, Edmonton, and elsewhere, students gathered to stand against the damaging cuts to our postsecondary institutions. Despite the blowing snow, students marched from the U of A and Grant MacEwan to the Legislature protesting budget cuts and the resulting tuition increases. In Calgary students demanded that the province reverse their budget cuts and freeze tuition. Across the province these students had their tuition increased despite taking fewer classes, some faculties and departments losing staff and capacity, and some students unable to complete the degree that they began.

It's becoming harder and harder to get ahead, and as people are struggling with skyrocketing increases in the cost of living, students are shouldering a large part of the burden, with some having to decide between pursuing an education and putting food on the table, at this time when we should be looking ahead, cultivating talent, and planning for a sustainable future that doesn't just look at the world in terms of election cycles but in terms of future generations.

What have the UCP done? What are their actions by which we can judge them? Massive increases to tuition, increased debt load to students to balance their books, failure to distribute student aid, limited accessibility to programs like engineering and counselling psychology. They created massive barriers to enter postsecondary altogether. Mr. Speaker, the list goes on and on.

Students took action yesterday. Their actions show their priorities. I can say with pride that our NDP caucus stands with the students, faculty, and support staff of our colleges, universities, and polytechnics.

Energy Security in North America

Mrs. Allard: Two weeks ago I had the privilege of representing our province at the Energy Council's conference of federal meetings in Washington, DC. The Energy Council is a nonpartisan legislative organization comprised of 14 energy-producing states and two Canadian provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan. Formed in 1975, the council serves as a forum for energy and related environmental policy dialogue. As an appointed member for Alberta, I met with U.S. Senators and members of Congress in Washington as well as a variety of policy influencers and stakeholders to discuss many issues around energy, chief among them, Mr. Speaker, energy security.

I was able to highlight again and again that Alberta is the answer. What's the question, you may ask? Well, let me tell you. In short, the real question is: how can the U.S. address the demand for oil whilst continuing to source it from credible jurisdictions? The answer is Alberta. How can we establish a North American energy security strategy to ensure we are using ethically sourced, responsibly produced oil and gas and make daily life affordable to our constituents? The answer is Alberta. The U.S. needs to partner with Alberta, Mr. Speaker. We need to work together to ensure there is security in our energy supply across North America, not dependent upon totalitarian regimes with questionable production practices.

Mr. Speaker, this is not only an issue of energy security but of environmental stewardship and wealth distribution. The leftist agenda demands that we keep Alberta oil in the ground, but the global demand for oil continues to rise, so what does this achieve? Two things: first, that we displace ethical, world-class environmental standards in production, and second, that we shut in production in North America, costing jobs and livelihoods here; we transfer that production and wealth generation to jurisdictions that oppose the west, like Russia. That's disgusting. North America must come together to ensure sustained production to meet our own demand, and we must develop a North American energy security strategy for the long term.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Continuing Care

Ms Sigurdson: The COVID-19 pandemic hit residents of continuing care the hardest. According to the National Institute on Ageing over 1,605 Alberta residents in continuing care died from COVID-19. Many of these deaths were preventable. Every life lost is a tragedy and should be a call for action to transform the continuing care system. Throughout the worst of this pandemic Albertans reached out to me worried that their loved ones were not getting the care they needed. Their loved ones were being left for extended periods in their own waste and not being fed in a timely manner.

The UCP conducted a continuing care review about a year ago, calling for increases in the amount of home care provided, improving working conditions, and increasing the proportion of full-time staff. I was hoping that the continuing care legislation announced yesterday would have shown some movement on these important actions. Instead, what the Health minister introduced was mostly administrative. There are some reasonable changes in the act, but Albertans need more than administrative change. We need action.

Albertans deserve a government that is willing to take the action needed to care for the elderly in continuing care. Instead, sadly, Albertans are left with a self-obsessed government that is only worried about its own survival. Ministers are more concerned with making stump speeches for the Premier than working for Albertans. Staff are even being pulled away from work to campaign for the Premier. We are left to wonder: who is doing the work of governing at all?

Albertans were told nearly a year ago to expect transformational change in continuing care. What are the UCP waiting for? Over 1,605 people in continuing care lost their lives during this pandemic. If these losses, the grief that families are experiencing, and the scars of this tragic pandemic are not reasons for the UCP to act, I do not know what is.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Taber-Warner.

Federal Liberal-NDP Agreement

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week Albertans heard the devastating news that the federal Liberals and the federal NDP had reached a governance agreement that would see the Liberals remain in power until 2025. For Albertans, there couldn't have been worse news. The Trudeau-Singh alliance marks another three long years of anti-Alberta rule. Whatever happened to the vitriol between these two leaders? We heard lots of sniping at each other in the last election. Now, all of a sudden, this dysfunctional relationship has blossomed into a match made in heaven. Rex Murphy described it best in an article entitled Liberal-NDP 'Coalition' Will Make Canada Worse off, but that's just fine for Singh and Trudeau. In this article he describes them, and I quote, with no core ideas, no core principles other than: how can we best hang onto power and how can we get a slice of it for ourselves? Make no mistake, socialists love to hold onto power. They love to virtue signal. They love to raise taxes and increase government overreach through red tape.

Just how is this going to play out for our largest industry here in Alberta? One only has to go back to when B.C. Premier John Horgan formed a coalition with the Green Party in B.C. The concession Horgan more than willingly made to get the Green support was to oppose and take court action against the Trans Mountain pipeline, which is our only access to tidewater and foreign markets. Who was right there cheering on? His close friend and ally – that's right – Jagmeet Singh, of course, who, for all intents and purposes, is now the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada. Singh has stated openly that he wants the federal Liberals to scrap the program where the feds are partnering with us on the cleanup of oil well sites, a $1 billion program that is restoring and protecting our environment. So much for the NDP being the stewards of the economy.

There's no doubt that trouble is brewing, but the question in most Albertans' minds is: where are the Albertans? Where are they going to land?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Agricultural Land Prices

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have a crisis in the country. Toronto and Vancouver, Canada's two largest cities, have become the most expensive places to live and compete internationally. You might believe that this real estate crisis is confined to our country's largest cities, but that is not the case. The secret to Alberta's past and future success has been the family unit dotted across the prairie, working and owning the land. The question is now: will this have any part in Alberta's future? Increasingly, it seems that the only way to establish a family farm is to inherit it or millions of dollars. The price of land in Alberta has taken off like a jet plane, with Ontario pension funds, large financial institutions, and international investors and speculators riding first class. Alberta's young families have been left on the tarmac like unvaccinated deplorables, watching as the dream of landownership and Alberta's future are bought up by the elites, toasting their champagne flutes to another good deal done.

Mr. Speaker, our rural communities are already being depopulated by the economy of scale needed for modern agriculture. With the cost of living and interest rates ballooning ever higher as a result of Justin Trudeau's refusal to turn off the money-printing machine, Alberta families are being pushed out of the basket and their own homes with no parachute in sight. These billions of dollars from Bay Street, Wall Street, and Shanghai have left Alberta's next generation with no hope of owning a family farm. None of the world's elite give a flying rat's behind if the communities of Manning, Wildwood, Coronation, or Stavelly become ghost towns.

On our current path, Mr. Speaker, the result will be the emptying of rural Alberta, with the corporate machine, rather than Alberta families who live there, running and owning the food supply for our country. Shareholders will be richer, yes, but our citizens will be poorer. Rural communities will be made up of renters no longer attached to the land that they live in with their homes. Now the folks who run and own this province will be out of province, out of touch, and landowners again, flying first class in a plane and a province that used to be owned by Albertan families.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

2017 UCP Leadership Contest Investigation

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Premier admitted that he's been questioned by the RCMP as part of an investigation into the 2017 UCP leadership race and alleged fraud therein. Now, for those at home, there is a long-standing parliamentary tradition that when a Premier or a minister is under investigation by the police, they step aside to ensure there is no real or perceived opportunity for influence over the judicial system. But the UCP? The rules around upholding the public trust do not apply to them. Why does this Premier and his cabinet continue to feel that they are above the law?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we heard the same fear and smear from the NDP all through the last election, and Albertans rejected their politics of personal destruction. Here's the problem. That kind of defamatory attack made in the privilege of this place is what encouraged her ethics critic to violate the law by seeking to violate my personal privacy. Why doesn't she understand that every time she goes into the gutter, all she does is lower the tone of Alberta politics? That will be, I fear, her legacy in this place.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, the appointment of a special prosecutor is the only thing standing between this Premier and a conflict of interest in a police investigation that goes to the heart of his current role in this Assembly. Now, three or four Justice ministers ago the UCP appointed that special prosecutor but then refused to release their name. They said that they're from Ontario, and that's it. Three years later the investigation is still ongoing. Will the Premier today stand and tell us the name of the prosecutor secured by Alberta Justice to protect the integrity of this investigation? Who is protecting . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, I don't know, nor should I. It would be inappropriate of me to ask that question. The Crown prosecution service and police services can always request, when they deem it appropriate, advice from outside counsel, and I understand that's what happened in this instance in 2019.

Ms Notley: The Premier wasn't the only one interviewed by RCMP. The Minister of Infrastructure was interviewed, as was the former Minister of Justice. Both went to great pains to say that they themselves were not the ones under investigation, again, over two years ago. Mr. Speaker, these are allegations of fraud, of vote tampering, of serious abuse of democracy around this Premier's leadership campaign. Will the Premier today please rise in the House and say, with one hundred per cent absolute certainty, that he is not the subject of this investigation into alleged voter fraud around his leadership campaign?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I was informed that I am not.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, for three years the RCMP has been investigating the UCP and the leadership race that elected the Premier for identity fraud, allegations of votes being cast using fraudulent e-mails, and people becoming members of the UCP without their knowledge, people having their personal identification numbers taken so their votes could be cast by someone other than them. The Premier admitted yesterday that he was interviewed by the RCMP but refused to tell us anything else. Why was the Premier interviewed by the RCMP, what did they ask him, and what did he tell the RCMP? Simple questions.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, that question is inappropriate. Of course, if I have an interview, it is a confidential matter for those interviewing me. What I can say is this. The NDP dragged all of these allegations through the mud in the 2019 election, and they were sent packing, the first majority government in Alberta history to not make it past one term, because Albertans oppose the politics of personal destruction, of defamation, and division, which is the stock-in-trade of today's NDP.

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, this is about trust, and the Premier is not alone when it comes to the RCMP interviewing members of this government in regard to their multiyear identity fraud investigation into the UCP. The ministers of jobs, seniors, social services, Infrastructure: all have been interviewed by the RCMP when it comes to this scandal, and now the Premier has also been interviewed. Premier, this is about justice and our democracy. Why should the details of that interview really be hidden from Albertans? It's a simple question, especially when many suspect the UCP's current leadership review process is rigged in the . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, if the member has questions for the RCMP, I suggest he puts it to them. Of course, police operations happen independent of government. Perhaps he does not know that, but what I know is that his colleague and ethics critic violated the law to violate my personal privacy and that of another Alberta citizen. What did he know about that, what did his leader know about that, and why did they create an environment in the NDP where that kind of illegal and unethical conduct was deemed acceptable by their ethics critic? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. member has the call.

Mr. Sabir: The question is: why was the Premier interviewed by the RCMP? These are serious concerns if the RCMP is interviewing the Premier and looking into the UCP leadership contest that the Premier won, and the Premier is referring to that as sour grapes. I hate to break it to the Premier, but the RCMP doesn't investigate sour grapes for three years now. The Premier keeps deflecting. He points to others who have been fined for their roles. I'm asking about his role in this corrupt leadership contest that elected him. Can he finally come clean on this and stop hiding from the people of Alberta?

Mr. Kenney: Again, Mr. Speaker, if he has questions for an independent police agency, he should put those questions to the independent police agency, but that's not what the NDP is about. They are about the politics of personal destruction, of defamation, division, and deceit. They're addicted to it. But Albertans want a government instead focused on their concerns like the cost of living, which is why we're scrapping the fuel tax this week, like a balanced budget, like a growing economy, like delivering on nearly 90 per cent of our election commitments. That's why the NDP is losing right now in the polls, and you can see how desperate they're getting.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Corporate Taxation and Investment Attraction

Mr. Bilous: In the last election the UCP promised that if they cut corporate taxes, investment would come flooding into the province, but even before the pandemic investment dropped, our economy shrank, and 50,000 full-time jobs were lost. As a result, companies laid off hundreds of staff or invested elsewhere. In the middle of the pandemic the UCP doubled down on their corporate tax giveaway and even accelerated it, but that hasn't led to increased capital investment either. Now Alberta's unemployment rate is higher than the national average, and Calgary's is the highest among major cities in the country. To the Premier: why does Alberta continue to fall further behind other provinces under this UCP government?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, talk about leading with your chin. You know, the NDP said that we were going to lose $4.6 billion in revenue through the job-creation tax cut. In fact, we are generating $400 million more in revenue on that 8-point rate than the NDP was under their 12-point rate. Why? Because this has stimulated $60 billion of new private-sector investment in Alberta's economy. We led Canada in economic growth last year. We were projected to do so again last year. Last year was the best year ever for film and television, for the energy sector, for our exports, for high tech and so much more.

Mr. Bilous: Corporate tax revenue in 2018 was $4.8 billion; your numbers are less than $4 billion this year. According to RBC economists capital investment is expected to increase across the country by 8.5 per cent, with Saskatchewan leading the way at 18.5 per cent. Meanwhile Alberta will have the second-lowest capital investment growth rate at 4.8 per cent. But here's the thing. It's still well below investment levels seen in our last year as government. In 2018 capital investment was $62 billion. Well, the numbers don't lie. We know this government has played fast and loose with the truth. Will the Premier admit he's failed to deliver his . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons Albertans fired the NDP government was because of their jobs crisis, that they created by driving tens of billions of dollars of investment out of this province, and that's exactly why we were elected on a pledge to implement the job-creation tax cut to make Alberta the most attractive place if not in North America, certainly in Canada for new job-creating investment, and now we are seeing the results, with a projection that we will see corporate tax revenues increase from $4 billion to $4.5 billion and then to nearly $5 billion on a rate one-third lower than theirs.

Mr. Bilous: All forecasts. Meanwhile under this UCP government Calgary head offices have shrunk. With higher oil prices we've seen corporate profits increase dramatically. According to the UCP's last budget corporate profits increased 147 per cent in 2021 and are forecasted to increase another 31 per cent this year, but oil companies aren't spending money on capital investment. Instead, they're choosing to spend profits on dividends and share buybacks. The Premier went to these companies with cowboy hat in hand at last year's Stampede and begged them to spend. As we know, the Premier is all hat and no cattle. Given that he's failed to get them . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

2:00

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, you can't blame the NDP for not knowing what's going on in the oil and gas sector, because they hate the oil and gas sector. The NDP's entire reason for existing is to attack Alberta oil and gas. Look at what their ally Justin Trudeau is doing in Ottawa today with his new outrageous environment plan, his 25 per cent proposed increase in the carbon tax. Now, I want to give the NDP a trigger warning. They won't want to hear this, but here it is: drilling activity in Alberta in oil and gas this year so far is up by 80 per cent. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

AISH and Income Support Payments

Ms Renaud: Since 2019 the UCP has cut 514 jobs from Community and Social Services. As a direct result of the UCP's changes and massive staff cuts, vulnerable Albertans are at increased risk of harm. My constituent Darlene reached out to me because her income support benefit was cut by $200, which is significant given that her core benefit is less than $900. As a result, she's behind on rent and utilities, and she was in the hospital, so unable to make this government's appeal window. She can't get assistance from the ministry, and she's been calling them for a week with no response. Does the Premier consider this a modest sacrifice or just onerous?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, once again a misleading question from the NDP. In fact, the provincial budget for Community and Social Services is being increased in this budget that we just passed. But here's the good news. It was also a balanced budget, which means that those programs are sustainable. As long as the NDP, with their reckless increases in spending, was driving us into an endless sea of debt, that would compromise the fiscal sustainability of social programs because more money would go to bankers and bondholders in interest payments and less would go to support the vulnerable.

Ms Renaud: I received many e-mails and calls from people in other constituencies about dangerous wait times being experienced by AISH and income support recipients. Barrington Sr. from Red Deer wrote to me because he was unable to get prescriptions refilled. The stress of this is taking a toll on him, yet another preventable harm that will end up stressing an already overburdened health care system. The Premier talks a big game about supporting these extremely vulnerable Albertans, falsely claiming that they're the most generous benefits in Canada when we know they're below the poverty line. Will the Premier tell this House how he plans to address these dangerous wait times that are causing harm?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, in point of fact, the overall budget for Community and Social Services received a $36 million increase this year. That's part of the plan. During the pandemic we invested a total of $132 million for civil society . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. If the Leader of the Opposition wants to ask another question, I invite her to rise to her feet to do that.

Until then, the Premier has the call.

Mr. Kenney: . . . an additional $130 million to civil society partners to help care for the vulnerable during the pandemic.

Mr. Speaker, with respect to AISH benefits they are 40 per cent more generous than the analogous benefits across the country, on top of which we have the most generous suite of social benefits and taxes; 40 per cent of Albertans pay no provincial income tax at all.

Ms Renaud: Mr. Speaker, these are real people that need answers, not rhetoric. The UCP has cut 514 workers in social services. We know that caseloads have exploded to dangerous levels. People aren't getting the help they need. Is this Premier finally willing to admit what is crystal clear to Albertans, that cuts to income support, the slashing of 514 jobs, the systematic removal of supplemental benefits for housing and food have created a crisis, a real crisis? Will the Premier admit what Albertans already know? He can't be trusted with the truth and for vulnerable Albertans.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the budget for AISH, assured income for the severely handicapped, goes this year from $1.3 billion to $1.37 billion to $1.45 billion to $1.5 billion. Why does the NDP insist on referring to large increases in public spending as cuts? Is it because they studied too much discovery math, or is it just because they're dishonest?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Human Trafficking

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Human trafficking is a very serious crime, from which we are certainly not immune in Canada. It happens throughout our communities, our cities, our small towns, and places where people would not normally suspect such wicked operations of ever occurring. Generally trafficking incidents tend to happen in more urban centres, but the lasting effects ripple throughout our entire country. Human trafficking involves a process of recruiting, transporting, or holding victims to exploit them for forced labour, their organs and tissues, or sexual purposes, stripping them of their rights, freedoms, and humanity. To the Premier: can you please tell us why this government struck a Human Trafficking Task Force and who was on it?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Our government ran on a commitment to fight human trafficking. This is a horrific crime that happens right here in the province of Alberta. That is why it was such an honour to be with members of the Human Trafficking Task Force this weekend as they provided our government with recommendations on how best to combat human trafficking in our province. Task force members, along with the chair, Paul Brandt, include former Minister of Children's Services and Solicitor General Heather Forsyth, Reach director Jan Fox, Edmonton police chief Dale McFee, RCMP member Douglas Reti, Catholic Social Services director and First Nations advocate and . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Well, given that our government introduced Alberta's first-ever standardized definition of human trafficking and legislation to combat traffickers two years ago but that vulnerable Albertans continue to need additional policies to protect them as human trafficking cases in Alberta continue to increase every year and in Canada are growing at one of the fastest rates of any criminal activity, to the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General: what is this government's plan to address the task force's recommendations?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government has accepted in principle nearly all of these recommendations, and we are already taking action. We're establishing an office for combatting human trafficking to co-ordinate our province's work on this important issue. We've also increased support for ALERT, the Alberta law enforcement response teams, created specialized human trafficking and exploitation units to support victims directly, investigate human trafficking activity, and we are working with local groups to build networks that support victims and survivors like those that we fund in Children's Services under PSECA.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again to the minister. Well, given that human traffickers impose life-altering and oftentimes life-threatening restrictions on their victims, in which freedom does not ever seem possible, and that victims can feel forgotten by the system and feel alone in the process of recovering from their pain and trauma and further given that seeking proper aid to rediscover their humanity can oftentimes be intimidating for victims, to the minister: what supports are available to survivors to address financial, physical, and emotional needs once they leave their horrific living arrangements and their traffickers?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I want to thank the member for her question and thank the task force for their amazing work, including Paul Brandt and Heather Forsyth. Very strong work. In addition to Budget '22 funding women's shelters at the rate of $51.3 million, we also provided funding for the family violence line at 310.1818. This support line provides services in 170 languages, including Indigenous languages, where women can seek supports. We also provide funding for those escaping abuse through the Alberta supports benefit . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Postsecondary Education Funding

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was with students in Calgary for Alberta's student day of action. They shared their experiences of having to drop classes, change programs, drop out of school entirely, or choose between getting an education and putting food on the table. The UCP decimated the postsecondary budget. Then the same minister signed off on staggering tuition increases. The students asked me to ask this minister about budget cuts and jacked-up tuition rates. Will the UCP listen to the students and commit to reversing their reckless cuts and reverse their record-breaking tuition hikes?

Mr. Nicolaides: Mr. Speaker, I'm always happy to listen to students. I meet, of course, with them very regularly and, more importantly, apart from just listening, actually take their advice and guidance and turn that into reality. As an example, one of the things that student leaders told me about on a very frequent basis was the need to create more bursaries for low-income students. You know, we did. We did exactly that. There's $50 million over three years to create new bursaries for low-income students. They also asked us to make adjustments to loan limits, and we did that as well, taking their advice into consideration.

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, given that this UCP minister actually underspent the student aid budget by $4 million last year and given that life has become deeply unaffordable – tuition increases, student loan rate spikes make it hard just to pay off debt – given that these students need support now more than ever and that these students are meant to be the major drivers for our economy for decades to come if they actually stay here and don't flee the UCP, can the minister explain to all of us why this government cares more about filling their coffers than they do about future prospects for young people and long-term economic viability?

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, Mr. Speaker, the question demonstrates that the member doesn't understand how the postsecondary budget works. Any dollar that's raised from tuition revenue goes to the institutions. The government doesn't get a dime of that, so I'm not sure what the allegation is. But when it comes to investing in students, our government is committed to doing precisely that. That's why we're providing $171 million over three years to create 7,000 additional spaces in our postsecondary institutions. As well, we're providing $15 million over three years to expand apprenticeship educational opportunities, $6 million over three years to expand work-integrated learning opportunities, $8 million over three years to create additional microcredential programs. There's more.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that this minister needs a little tutorial in his own budget estimates – in his own estimates he said that he paused student aid because he had so many applications and also shared that they didn't give out the student aid because they didn't want to spend and to ask for more money – and given that already Alberta has fallen short of other provinces in offering student aid and given that higher upfront costs create even more barriers for hopeful students, can the minister let all of us here know today who actually supports his reckless cuts to our colleges, universities, and polytechnics? Certainly, students don't, faculty doesn't, researchers and support staff . . .

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, Mr. Speaker, of course, over the last few years we've worked to bring funding and spending in our postsecondary system in line with other provinces. Having done that work, we're now providing more to create additional spaces and additional seats. As I mentioned a moment ago, we're investing $171 million to create – the member is right – 7,000 additional spaces. Those are more spaces than have been created in over a decade in our postsecondary system. We're providing key investments to help ensure that when our students complete their programs, they graduate with the skills, knowledge, and competencies they need to succeed.

Insurance Premium Costs

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, I have a really simple question for the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Service Alberta, one I sincerely hope either of them can answer. To either minister: how much has the average Albertan's auto insurance increased since the UCP government was elected?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. What I can say today is that this government dealt with the systemic issues that were driving up costs in the automobile insurance industry. What I can say again today is that seven major insurance companies have either dropped rates or requested a decline in automobile insurance premiums for their customers. Why? Because we dealt with the issues that were creating price inflation in insurance.

Mr. Carson: Well, given that I didn't get any kind of answer there and given that the minister either doesn't know or doesn't want to tell the House just how much the harmful policies of this government have driven up costs for Albertans relying on their vehicle to get to and from work or to pick up their kids but given that I want to give the minister another opportunity, will the minister commit to tabling all information he has regarding skyrocketing insurance rates in the House tomorrow? If he won't, what is he hiding?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Unlike the members opposite, who simply put a Band-Aid on automobile insurance rates by putting on a 5 per cent cap, this government dealt with the systemic issues driving up costs. Rates went up 5 per cent or more under the previous government. This year we've seen Intact drop rates by 2 per cent, Belair by 2 per cent, Zurich by 2.7 per cent, AMA by 7 per cent. We're seeing automobile insurance rates go down.

Mr. Carson: Well, given that most Albertans surely aren't seeing those savings that the minister claims and given that the cost of everything is going up with the UCP in charge and given that they're making matters so much worse by pulling the cap on electricity, pulling the cap on auto insurance increases, increasing property taxes, school fees, tuition, and so, so much more, can the minister explain why he both wants to drown my constituents in debt and also withhold vital information about the cost-of-living crisis they're facing?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, our government is dealing with the systemic issues that are creating affordability for Albertans, unlike the members opposite. The members opposite didn't have the courage to deal with insurance pressures. They simply put a cap on. The members opposite, on electricity costs, added over $7 billion of costs . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: The members opposite added over $7 billion of costs to our infrastructure system, Mr. Speaker, ultimately broke agreements with power purchase companies, creating a $1.4 billion liability for Albertans, and imposed a carbon tax.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Federal and Provincial Energy Policies

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The NDP and the Trudeau Liberals recently signed a deal that would grant Justin Trudeau a majority until 2025. This deal is bad news for Alberta as both parties are against supporting Alberta's oil and gas industry. It is disappointing, to say the least. Thousands of Albertans rely on the oil and gas sector for employment, but even Alberta's provincial NDP has refused to support jobs in that industry. To the Minister of Environment and Parks: how is the UCP fighting for Alberta's oil and gas industry against the Liberal-NDP coalition?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's clear now more than ever that the NDP-Liberal alliance will not help facilitate pipelines. They will not help the oil and gas sector, and they will not help Alberta jobs. That's because they want to phase out oil and gas. Yet the world demand for oil and gas is going up – it's going up – as supply is going down, as we need to weed out Russian barrels of oil. The question is: where is that oil and gas going to come from? We believe it should be from Alberta. That's why we're advocating across the border to say: look north; Alberta is the solution.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that we are now only days away from yet another increase in Justin Trudeau's carbon tax, which will cost a Canadian family $50 for every tonne of CO₂, and given that the carbon tax has been the root cause of thousands of lost jobs and investment dollars being retracted in Canada as well as in Alberta under the previous NDP government, can the same minister tell Albertans what our government is doing to support Albertans against a thoughtless and unsympathetic Prime Minister?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The federal government is simply out of touch with Canadians. They're out of touch with global supply-demand fundamentals with energy. They're out of touch with the whole issue of energy security. While the federal Liberals are jacking up the carbon tax, we are providing relief for Albertans by suspending the fuel tax, that will ultimately drop fuel prices by 13 cents a litre, effective April 1.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that there has already been a substantial increase in the cost of electricity and natural gas for Alberta families and given that the former NDP government worked hard with their own carbon tax to make heating a home and driving a car unaffordable luxuries for Albertans and given that the carbon tax is set to increase at the end of this week, to the minister: what is your response to Justin Trudeau on behalf of Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is correct. Unfortunately, Justin Trudeau and his NDP alliance are moving forward with a 3-cent increase on gas tax on April 1 and, shockingly, continue to move forward today with a 40-cent – 40-cent – increase per litre long term on the climate plan. Tonight inside this House we will be debating on a motion calling on the federal government to remove their carbon tax once and for all. The real question is: will the NDP stand with everyday Albertans, or are they going to continue to stand with their close ally Justin Trudeau?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South has a question.

Child Care Affordability

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta families and businesses are working hard to get back to work after the COVID-19 pandemic, yet the UCP government was one of the last to finalize a federal-provincial child care agreement despite the fact that access to affordable child care is a key driver of economic recovery. Better late than never. To the Minister of Children's Services: how many additional subsidized spaces have been created as of today?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I do want to point out to members of this House that while we were not one of the first provinces to sign an agreement with the federal government, because we did take the time to fight for a fair deal for Albertans, we were, in fact, one of the first two provinces to roll out affordability dollars for parents. Now, part of our plan is making sure that parents in every single licensed space right across this province, whether that be facility-based child care, preschools, or day homes, qualify for these additional supports. We are working to create an additional 12,000 spaces this year, and thousands more have been created in the last few months.

Mr. Dang: Given that it seems the minister doesn't know how many spaces have been created to this day and given that many Alberta families are still recovering from the devastating financial effects of the pandemic and given that these same families are dealing with the soaring cost of living and given that child care centres in my constituency have raised concerns that even though they have the spaces, they've been told that they won't actually receive the grants for all of those spaces, why is the government making it so difficult for child care centres and families to secure affordable spaces?

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, as I've said a number of times in this House, any time you roll out a new program, there are going to be questions. We have offered and certainly I've offered to members of the opposite side of this House that any time a child care operator is having difficulty entering their information on the system, we are more than willing to help. That is what our ministry is dedicated to doing. Parents started seeing these dollars roll out in January. I do believe the vast majority of child care operators have been able to roll out these affordability dollars for parents and families. We are hearing very positive feedback, and we're seeing enrolments start to go up, which is excellent news.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that it seems like this minister is full of nothing but empty words and given that the UCP government's federal-provincial child care agreement web page actually states that this agreement aims "to ensure families can choose the child care that works for them" and "support licensed child care," what is the government actually doing to ensure that these promises are rolled out besides the talk that we're hearing today?

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The member opposite doesn't love my words, so let me use the words of child care operators here in Alberta. A quote from Tricia Cunningham with Sigis Child Care Society in St. Albert: because of this agreement our fees for children aged two to four dropped from $44 a day to $23 a day, and parents eligible for subsidy have seen their fees reduced to $13 a day. What does that mean? It means we did exactly what we said we would do. Parents are able to access these supports right across the province, and this is great news because these parents can now get back to work and drive Alberta's economic recovery.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Indigenous Relations

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This week the Pope and Indigenous representatives are meeting to discuss reconciliation. As this historic meeting unfolds, it's important to take a deep look at how this government is addressing reconciliation with Alberta's Indigenous communities. This UCP budget cuts funding to Indigenous Relations by 18 per cent and continues the slow defunding of the crucial water for reserves program. On the eve of this historic meeting on reconciliation between the Vatican and Indigenous communities is the minister really going to stand by his plan to reduce support services for Indigenous communities?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member is a little bit confused. I think he learned in estimates that we're actually increasing our budget in Indigenous Relations, an additional $2 million for reconciliation. What we call it in Indigenous Relations is reconcili-action. You can see it out there working right now. I actually just signed off on – I had to crack my hands, so many reconciliation grants were going out the door, over $8 million and along with Health another $8 million there. There are a lot of projects going forward this year, and I'm just happy to see them happening.

Mr. Feehan: Given that this government, after taking office, ended the training of civil servants in Indigenous history and culture that our government announced and given that this government also provided no money for the urban Indigenous initiatives, which they previously cancelled, and given that as the eyes of the world are seeing the importance of addressing reconciliation, Alberta should be a leader in achieving this, will the minister end his neglect and undo these senseless decisions? Why is this government committed to taking us backwards on reconciliation?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to say that we actually increased our budget again on urban initiatives. Many things going forward this year. Again, several grants were signed off this morning to help out various projects that are going forward throughout the province. We're working on our garden. It's a reconciliation garden, and we're going to be putting a panel together that'll be helping to name it and work on developing a proper memorial for it. We're so happy to be doing that. I remember when we first started the garden, Chief Billy said that that was the most appropriate thing we could do. It brought hope and healing to the community.

Mr. Feehan: Given that it's been three years since the federal government released their findings from the missing and murdered Indigenous women and girls report and given that in the past two years this government has done next to nothing and has not even released findings of the Joint Working Group on Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls despite their final report being submitted to the minister over two months ago, when will the minister finally release this report? Will he commit to immediate action or a solution to the question of reconciliation to ask those who've been waiting for years to keep on waiting?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is probably one of the most important things we've been working on because it is so important to the families. We started out this journey with a ceremony. The panel came to me and they wanted to do full circle, so we received the report in ceremony just last week. The panel members have told me that this is some of the most important work they've done in their career, and I support them on that a hundred per cent.

Even before the report was out, Mr. Speaker, because it is so important, this government started working on several initiatives, everything from our declaration of Sisters in Spirit Day and many other projects.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Emergency Medical Services

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta's EMS system is strained under the competing demands of small rural communities and big urban centres. I have the honour to serve alongside my colleagues in this House on the Alberta EMS Provincial Advisory Committee to provide the Minister of Health with solutions to some of these challenges. Budget 2022 recently announced that an increase of $64 million will go towards addressing EMS system pressure and continuing to make EMS more responsive to community needs. To the minister: can you tell the House specifically how this funding will be used to support front-line EMS workers and rural service providers as well?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. The $64 million in Budget 2022 goes directly towards adding more ground ambulances and crews while providing more sustainable funding for helicopter air ambulance services in Alberta. These additional supports increase the overall capacity throughout the province and improve efficiency in the system. The measures in the budget provide direct support to our front-line EMS workers, who have admirably risen to the existing challenges in the system, which the events of the past two years only magnified.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker, and through you thanks to the minister. Part of the province's response to EMS pressures is a 10-point plan from Alberta Health Services. Given that point 2 in this plan is to hire more paramedics and further given that there's a plan on launching an hours-of-work project to help relieve staff fatigue, again to the same minister: what are the plans to attract more potential paramedics to the province or encourage citizens to enrol in paramedic programs to achieve the goal and implement this project?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you for that great question, Mr. Speaker. Once again I want to thank our EMS workers for their vital work, especially in the last two years. To help them manage fatigue levels, AHS has already taken steps to combat this problem and create a better working environment for new and existing staff. Since January AHS has hired 66 new staff, nine temporary full-time and 57 casual staff. These new staff members provide immediate relief for those who desperately need a break. EMS is also working with learning institutions to expand class sizes to allow more paramedics training and graduation.

Mr. Speaker, thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again to the minister, through you. Given that Budget 2022 only details the addition of five 24/7 ambulances to each of Alberta's largest cities, Calgary and Edmonton, plus one to Airdrie and given the recommendation to improve integration between EMS and hospital staff to improve the overall flow of operations, again to the Minister of Health: how will this help rural areas, who already have fewer ambulances than the larger centres, and what does this do in areas that don't house their own hospital?

Member LaGrange: Thank you again for another important question. Adding 20 new ambulances in these urban centres over the next two years will alleviate the existing pressure in suburban and rural areas. This reduces the need for rural ambulances to answer calls in the urban centres, meaning there are more available to respond to the calls in their immediate communities. Additionally, EMS began a pilot project in the rural areas of the northern zone on January 9 to better manage the transfer of patients who do not have acute-care needs. Mr. Speaker, we're doing more to increase EMS capacity.

2:30 School-based Mental Health Supports

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, the last years have been extremely challenging for students, staff, and families. Alberta kids have been through so much over the course of the pandemic, and the impact to their mental health cannot be underestimated. Experts say mental health supports will have to evolve quickly as students face new anxieties and stresses. Considering that this government has failed to meet the mental health needs of students to date, will the Education minister now finally commit to placing a mental health therapist in each and every school?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Mental health, obviously, is of concern to all of us and particularly within our schools. That's why we've added an additional $110 million over the next three years, $30 million in this upcoming year, to address mental health concerns. It was on the recommendation of the child and youth well-being panel, that made further recommendations. Of course, we're concerned about mental health, and we're going to continue to prioritize that in our budget.

Ms Hoffman: Given that that answer was a no and given that experts have said that in order to protect children's resilience, we must give them proper support to process their experiences, the tools for emotional regulation, and access to safe professional guidance in the form of properly trained mental health therapists in schools and given that the recent data from the University of Calgary shows student stress also comes from economic strains suffered from families and with so many Alberta families having their hours cut or, in Calgary, experiencing the largest unemployment of any major city in the country, will the Education minister commit to putting a counsellor ...

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, I want to draw your attention to the fact that we've added over $700 million to the budget over the next three years, a 1 per cent increase to base, a 1 per cent increase to operations and maintenance, a 4.6 per cent increase to transportation, as well as an additional $110 million over the next three years, $30 million in this upcoming year, to address child and youth well-being, especially around the mental health area. It is of grave concern to us, and we're going to do everything we can to address it.

Ms Hoffman: Given that educators stress that mental health supports go hand in hand with academic success, especially for students who have suffered significant learning loss during the pandemic, and given that Leanne Timko, the director of learning services with Calgary Catholic school district, said that, quote, learning is about taking risks, about knowing you might make a mistake and get something wrong, end quote, but those who learn recognize when their mistakes are made and they pledge to do better, will the Education minister admit that she's failed Alberta students and learn from her mistakes? Will she fund a counsellor in every school, or will she continue to show Alberta families she can't be trusted?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member opposite never fails to continue to make mistakes. Again she's made another mistake. We are adding another $110 million, on top of our $700 million, over three years in our budget. We're increasing the supports to our students. That's on top of the fact that last year we added an additional $40 million to address specialized learning support funding. We're continuing to make sure that it is of top priority to address the mental health of our students. We know of the concerns, and not only is it the Ministry of Education, but all my fellow ministers are working collaboratively to address these issues.

Deaths of Children in Care and Youth Transitioning out of Care

Ms Pancholi: Mr. Speaker, 47 children and youth in the child intervention system have now died between last April and today, most of them Indigenous. This heartbreaking trend has continued to develop over the past year. It is our responsibility as legislators to do everything in our power to learn from and better prevent the deaths of children in government care. This is a continuing crisis, and it is time to act. I'm asking again: will the Minister of Children's Services convene an all-party committee to address the safety of children in care and outstanding recommendations of the Child and Youth Advocate?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It has been a difficult two years, and my heart does go out to the families of those children and young adults who have died and those who have had interaction with the child intervention system. We know that there are going to be changes that need to be made. Unlike the members opposite, we're not going to wait for an all-party panel. I've asked the ministry to do a review into what we're seeing in these cases as this year has been very different and we're seeing different trends in terms of the data and information we're seeing. We are absolutely committed to being transparent, accountable, and taking action where . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Given, Mr. Speaker, that a discussion about the deaths of children deserves more time than a 35-second exchange – and that's what this is about – given that we could work together on this, I urge the minister to reconsider. Now, given that last year the Minister of Children's Services committed to a review of policies and practices when it comes to the deaths of children in care, can the minister update this House on the state of this review? When will it be completed? Who is conducting it? Who is being consulted? Will the report be made public, and will the members of this House be able to consider it? Most importantly, when can we expect action?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have spoken about this. I have said that I would make this report public. Obviously, we had expected this in January, but we did have a number of staff away with COVID, so that has slightly been delayed, but there are three different groups that we see. We see supports for those who are transitioning into adulthood. We're seeing also a group of infants, and we want to look at the circumstances surrounding each and every one of those cases. And then for children in care, as I've already said, I will absolutely make it public. If the member opposite has recommendations, we'd be happy to hear them.

Ms Pancholi: Given that of the 47 deaths this year 21 were young people over the age of 18 who are receiving financial assistance, a grim record, given that B.C. just extended supports to youth transitioning out of care to age 27 and given that once again the UCP is out of step with best practices and chose instead to defend, through the courts, cutting young people off supports for the sole purpose of saving money, if the minister's report finds that decisions of this government in any way contributed to or failed to prevent the situation that we face today, will the minister commit publicly that that information will be included in the report and guarantee full transparency and accountability?

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, we are not actually seeing what the member opposite is saying is the case, and I have shared that information with her before. What we are doing is that we've just transitioned to a transitions to adulthood program. We've always said – I started saying it in 2019 – that we needed to do better than have a financially focused support system for young adults who are transitioning into care and putting in place, really, a series of supports and check-ins to make sure that young people have the supports and services and connections that they need to succeed.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Camrose.

Rail Transportation

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Far too often we have been faced with and are threatened by blockades of our borders and halts to our railway. These careless actions cause worry and harm in our economy and for our farmers. Farmers on our side of the border and on the other side both rely on each other to have seed for crops and feed for their cattle. To the Minister of Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development: what is our government putting in place for farmers that are experiencing these price fluctuations and supply challenges?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a great question. Our essential services need to remain essential. We were very happy to see CP and the teamsters agree to binding arbitration, and we look forward to a ratified agreement.

What are we doing? We're very proud of the business risk management suite of programs that we have in partnership with the federal government – AgriInvest, AgriStability, AgriInsurance, Agri-Recovery – in disaster situations like we saw during the drought last summer. Very important programs. There's enough risk in agriculture, from weather to rain to price increases and bad federal government policy.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Camrose.

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that we are faced with daily challenges of getting our landlocked oil to global markets by any way we can as we still must heavily rely on the railway system and given that Gibson terminal in Hardisty relies heavily on the rail system, which sees about 1 in 4 of all barrels exported from western Canada and moves about 210,000 barrels a day, to the Minister of Energy: what can we do to protect terminals like the Gibson terminal in Hardisty from suffering negative impacts from halts to the railway system?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to start by saying that I very much enjoyed touring the rail terminal last summer with the member. It was an excellent opportunity. There's no question that we have to keep the tracks open. We need this private-sector rail capacity to be able to supply greater volumes of oil into the United States to displace Russian crude, that needs to be weeded out. We have room to move more crude by rail with existing private-sector rail that's out there and not being utilized, but we have to keep the tracks open. That's why we brought in the infrastructure defence act.

2:40

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Camrose.

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that it's not just natural resource products and farmers that rely on the goods and services transported from the rail system – we also see everyday Albertans, family-owned businesses, and other sectors across Alberta rely on these rail systems – to the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation: what plans are in place to protect all sectors of hard-working business owners and families in the event we face another halt to the railway system?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, ensuring that we have alternate routes of transportation, ensuring that we have sound transportation infrastructure is critical in this province. It's all about business resiliency. And trigger warning for the members opposite: business resiliency needs to ensure that corporations and businesses are profitable – profitable, Mr. Speaker – that they have strong balance sheets. That's why we went forward with the job-creation tax cut. That's why we're improving the regulatory environment. We are creating resiliency in Alberta businesses.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will continue to the remainder of the daily Routine. [interjections] Order. If you'd like to have private conversations, there are places to do that.

Rural High-speed Internet and Broadband Strategy

Mr. Rowsell: Mr. Speaker, Alberta's government has made an historic $390 million funding commitment to improve broadband access in rural, remote, and Indigenous communities, helping to eliminate the digital divide. The pandemic made it clear that access to reliable high-speed Internet is not just a luxury. In today's modern and increasingly digital world it's a necessity, a necessity which will cost approximately $1 billion.

Alberta's government worked hard to secure an expanded dollar-for-dollar matching agreement with the federal government, bringing total public-sector funding to $780 million. We anticipate that this financial commitment will drive significant private-sector investment, pushing overall investment north of $1 billion, helping us to eliminate the digital divide. With funding secured, our government announced Alberta's broadband strategy, which outlines how we will deliver universal connectivity to Albertans by spring of 2027.

Alberta's broadband strategy strengthens our economic recovery and diversification. It emboldens our education and health sectors, enabling socioeconomic development. We are currently hard at work reviewing Alberta's focused applications to the universal broadband fund. With negotiations under way, we expect the first round of approved projects to begin construction later this year.

Improved broadband access has long been a concern for constituents in my riding of Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright. The Alberta broadband strategy and secured funding is yet another example of how this government doesn't just listen to the concerns of Albertans; we take action to make lives better for Albertans. My constituents and Albertans alike eagerly anticipate the first round of approved projects.

I want to thank the Minister of Service Alberta for taking the time to develop a coherent strategy and securing the funding to make it happen.

Notices of Motions

Mr. Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, I rise to give oral notice of a bill to be introduced, which I will sponsor, that being Bill 205, Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General.

Bill 12 Trustee Act

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce a bill being Bill 12, the Trustee Act.

[Motion carried; Bill 12 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Are there tablings?

Seeing none, I do have a tabling today. I'm tabling six copies of the office of the Child and Youth Advocate's Mandatory Reviews into Child Deaths report.

Bill 2
Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

[Debate adjourned March 23: Ms Pancholi speaking]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has six minutes remaining, but I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung is on his feet.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure this afternoon to rise and speak to Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, which, of course, is a piece of budget legislation. It attempts to speak to making life more affordable, following the government's stated ambition to convince Albertans that that's exactly what they're trying to do, but in fact it fails to do that on a number of counts. The largest and most difficult to explain is the failure to index tax brackets to inflation wherein the government in this piece of legislation, the budget implementation act, locks in the horrific decision to tax inflation. It's something that the Premier, in his former role with the federal government, really waxed eloquent against on numerous occasions. He used to call this tax on inflation an insidious and pernicious tax grab, and now his government here in Alberta is working overtime, taking an additional $1 billion out of the pockets of hard-working Albertans.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Now, that's a significant chunk of change, Madam Speaker – it's a billion dollars – at a time when the provincial government is trying to claim that they're not raising taxes. They'll point to other elements and say: "No, no, no. No raise in taxes is going on right now." What's actually happened, of course, is that this billion dollars is coming out of the pockets of Albertans as a direct result of the bracket creep that the government is engaging in. Albertans are not fooled by this. They know and feel every ounce of the increase that this government is putting forward that's coming out of their pockets.

The economic insecurity that the province is going through right now is being felt on so many levels by Albertans. It doesn't matter whether it's the cost of insurance for automobiles. That's one thing that's really, really a huge burden on the backs of Albertans. You know, the billion-dollar tax grab involved in the budget implementation act is one thing, but it's added onto the other burdens that Albertans are already feeling. It hurts, and it demonstrably will affect the quality of life of Albertan families. The $1 billion is something that will especially hurt lower income families, as usually happens when extra tax burdens are placed on the population.

The cost of everything is going up, Madam Speaker, as we all know and as we hear from our constituents every day no matter where they are from: Airdrie or Cochrane or southern Alberta, anywhere, northern Alberta, Edmonton, Calgary. We know we hear from our constituents on a daily basis about how difficult life has gotten because of the increases in everything that they're seeing. This bracket creep tax increase that the government is engaging in through the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, is something that was an unnecessary burden on Albertans. It was a tax grab that the government was hoping perhaps they could claim didn't exist.

But Albertans are not stupid, Madam Speaker. They are very well adept at understanding, especially at this time of year when we're all about to do our taxes, that if indeed the tax brackets are not indexed to inflation, it's going to cost you more. It's a tax increase by any other name. Albertans are not fooled, and they're not impressed by it either. To be taken for fools is not something that Albertans have suffered gladly over the years. This government, by failing to index the tax brackets to inflation, by implementing this bracket creep, and by taking a billion dollars out of the pockets of Albertans, is adding to the burdens that we're already feeling.

Inflation is skyrocketing for a number of reasons. Of course, the government totally fudged the numbers in their Budget 2022. They estimated inflation at 3.2 per cent, but recently, Madam Speaker, Statistics Canada measured inflation at a 30-year high of 5.7 per cent. Of course, now we see the government taking an extra billion dollars out of the pockets of Albertans who are already suffering.

The worst act, I think, that this government is taking, Madam Speaker, when it comes to placing burdens on individuals in this province, who will suffer once again because of this billion-dollar tax grab, is to those who are already on some form of government support. Particularly, I talk about those who are on AISH. The Premier in his remarks today during question period spoke about those individuals in a very offhanded way, in my opinion, and in a very callous manner talked about how they were receiving the most generous government support payments across the country compared to others who are receiving AISH-type payments.

The amount of money an actual AISH recipient receives in this province is not something that is easy to live on, Madam Speaker. It is almost impossible, I would say, to live on. You're certainly not living with dignity, and it begs the question always of why indeed we can afford to give out $4.7 billion in tax decreases to profitable corporations, yet somehow it's beneath us to make sure that those who are least able to afford to earn a living themselves, those who rely on government assistance, somehow don't deserve the dignity of a living allowance that allows them to live above the poverty line.

To have the Premier today in question period, Madam Speaker, claim proudly that the AISH money that is received by Albertans is above average and that that somehow makes it an acceptable amount is beneath the dignity of this House. I think that if indeed we were to have anything to celebrate about the money that AISH recipients receive, it would be to actually claim that it is well above the level which is required to live comfortably above the poverty line so that you don't have to as an MLA find people somehow groveling to seek slightly more dollars, a few dollars extra a month so that they can actually, you know, have their children eat a little bit better in the subsidized housing that they barely are able to afford. I'm embarrassed to know that the Premier thinks that the current level of funding for AISH recipients is something to be proud of.

Yet on top of that, Madam Speaker, the Premier sees fit to fail to index the tax brackets to inflation and thus takes a further billion dollars out of the economy of this province, directly out of the pockets of those least able to afford it at a time when costs are going up in so many other ways.

Utility bills are another example, Madam Speaker. The government is proud once again to give 50 bucks a month for three months, a total of $150, to balance off the cost of escalating utility bills. Of course, Albertans once again are not fooled by that. Like, 50 bucks a month is 50 bucks a month, but it's not going anywhere near the way that Albertans hope to have been relieved from utility bills that have gone up $500 to $700 more a month. There has been a pittance thrown the way of Albertans who are suffering the most.

While the provincial government is minimizing the benefits to those who are least able to afford a reduction and maximizing costs out of the pockets of Albertans for things such as tuition fees, they're yet claiming or trying to claim that there's no tax increase to Albertans. Of course, as we do our taxes this tax season, for those that are wondering exactly how much it will cost them, this billion-dollar bracket increase is something that will become painfully clear to them as they realize this government is once again hitting them with a tax increase while at the same time trying to claim that they're not. That adds salt into the wounds, Madam Speaker.

For a government that wishes to extract an extra billion dollars in tax revenue from the taxpayer, Albertans at least expect an upfront and honest approach to it, and that's not what they're getting here. What they're getting is the government saying to them: no, we're not increasing your taxes. Well, perhaps the level, the rate may not be going up, but they're changing the rules, fudging the lines, making sure that they get their billion dollars in revenue. They're doing it in a way that is kind of insidious and pernicious, to use the Premier's former verbiage when he was railing against this bracket creep as a federal minister. Yet somehow when he does it here to the Alberta citizens, the Alberta taxpayer, it's not a tax increase. Well, they're not fooled, and they're not impressed, Madam Speaker, by this Premier's performance on so many accounts.

The average family, Madam Speaker, will lose $500 alone just because the basic personal exemption in the income tax act isn't being adjusted for inflation. So 500 bucks is what you're going to see as an additional tax increase on your tax bill as an Albertan. Thanks to this provincial government and the bracket creep, you know, this phantom tax increase, that the government says doesn't exist or didn't happen, is going to be a real $500 out of the pockets of Albertans, and it's going to become apparent very, very quickly as we do our income tax in the upcoming few weeks. Some of us have already done them and realized, of course, that we're getting nailed 500 bucks by this UCP government that would like us to believe that, in fact, our tax bill isn't going up, but it's exactly the opposite. That's the type of argument that this government tries to use in so many cases, and Albertans aren't being fooled. They'll say: "No, no. It's not happening. That's not what's going on." In fact, that exactly is what's going on, and Albertans realize it.

Tuition fees: another example. We just had students across the province rallying to oppose the hikes to tuition fees. Then the minister of postsecondary education, of course, gleefully gets up in this House repeatedly to rail off figures, saying, "Oh, we've increased spending on postsecondary education," when, in fact, what's happening is that the tuition fees are really going up. They may have spent X dollars in one year, but it doesn't really make up for the billion dollarwise that they decreased in previous budgets.

The attempted deception to have Albertans try to believe that they're actually minimizing the taxes and the fees and making life more affordable is not something that Albertans are swallowing. They try to talk about a spoonful of sugar in the form of a 13-cent reduction in the provincial gas tax. But tell you what, Madam Speaker, it doesn't help the real hard medicine go down when you're looking at the billion-dollar tax grab that this piece of legislation is actually implementing and that Albertans will feel as soon as their taxes are done.

Tuition fees are something that are a barrier to entry into university. To have the audacity, on top of that, to say that, well, we're going to cushion Alberta students and their families from the increases in tuition fees – and some of them are huge increases – by increasing the limits to the loans that they are able to get as students is crass, is really crass.

I mean, out of university, if you're looking at a debt of tens of thousands and in some cases over $100,000, students may justifiably say in their own minds: well, I'm not going to do that; what's the sense of going into debt that far when indeed I can do something else and not face that debt burden? That choice causes brain drain, Madam Speaker. That choice forces students to go elsewhere, where tuition is lower or where government supports recognize the fact that the youth and the education of the province are important.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there other members wishing to join in on the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise in the House to speak to Bill 2, Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. This budget implementation act and the terrible decision made by this government to tax inflation, that I wanted to speak to: I will come back to this later on. I just wanted to speak to the concerns that I'm hearing from my constituents and the people I'm meeting on a daily basis.

I got a call from my constituency when driving on the way to the Legislature this afternoon, and they wanted to know what kind of supports they have in this budget for their communities. We have been listening to our constituents. We have been listening to Albertans for three years, specifically racialized communities, what they are demanding, that they don't feel secure in their communities, in their places of worship, nor at their homes, in public places, in shopping malls. That's what they were worried about, and that's what they were asking the government for, to step up and to improve their safety and security and introduce the programs to combat racism in this province.

We had the Premier's Anti-Racism Advisory Council. They worked hard. They created the report and the recommendations, submitted them to this government, and it was expected that the government would take some initiatives in this budget to address the concerns raised in the ARAC report. We didn't see it in this budget. Those are the real concerns my constituents are concerned about, and I haven't seen anything.

On the contrary, I remember that when this government came into office in 2019, we had a ministry that had a budget for multiculturalism and diversity and inclusion. That was reduced in the year 2020-21, and that has been totally eliminated in this budget. I'm getting calls from people from racialized communities from across this province. They're asking me if I'm raising their concerns. They're asking me if I'm representing their voices in this House, and if I'm doing it, what is the government's response to it? What kind of action are they taking? What kind of lessons are they learning from it?

It was very sad to see that after the rising cases of hate in this province, the government, instead of supporting this, removed the community group antiracism grant program. They removed the antiracism human rights education funds. So every step of the way they have been attacking those programs that were helping the vulnerable and marginalized communities in this province. Those are the questions I am receiving. Those are the concerns people are worried about in our communities.

I asked this minister. First of all, the ministry was actually moving, the Associate Ministry of Multiculturalism and Immigration, from Culture to the labour ministry. That was very sad to see, that the government sees multiculturalism through the lens of labour, not through community and citizenship but through the lens of labour, and not even that. Under that ministry the government has totally eliminated the budget that has been subscribed to the program in the past two years. Those are the kinds of concerns and questions that I'm hearing from my community members every time I meet them, every time the people come into my office. They want me to bring these messages to this House. Any time we are discussing or debating something around financial statutes or the budgets, they want to see why these communities are being ignored.

The government and the Premier only remember these communities when it comes to getting help and support for their personal benefit. We have seen the rallies. We have seen the tweets, we have seen the messages, increasing messages around those communities and appeals from the government in relation to the coming leadership vote and debate. But when it comes to serving those communities, the government is totally failing.

The other concern I have been hearing for the past two months is the rising cost of utilities, the affordability issue. I remember even a few months back, in the early days of the session, when my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie actually arose in this House to ask the question: our constituents are concerned about the skyrocketing cost of utilities; does the associate minister have any plan to deal with this? The minister took pride in jumping off the seat and saying just one single sentence or word to answer the question: no. That is very discouraging. It is very sad to see that this is what is happening in this House, and that is not being discussed in this budget.

On the contrary, the government has taxed inflation. It's not about what the Premier has called it while he was a federal politician, how many names he called it: insidious, pernicious, or vicious. What is more important is that he knows what it is. He understands what it is. Still, it's sad to see the hypocritical position the Premier is taking, not only the Premier but his Executive Council and the people sitting around him, not even speaking a single word, but the Premier was saying it on the record not only once, not only twice, not only in one year, not only in the second year. He has a history of those understandings, but he implemented the same thing in this province when he got the option, when he got the choice, when he got the option to serve these very people, and he's mum.

Every single day my colleagues are rising in this House and asking this question, "Why is this government raising the taxes on the very people?" and we are not getting any answer. The minister is simply deflecting from the topic when it comes to answering these questions.

Affordability. Costs keep growing in the province, and the unemployment rate keeps growing. People keep losing jobs. Over 14,000 people lost jobs last month. In the last quarter people lost jobs. Affordability is a concern. People are struggling to pay their bills. It is not even a small increase in their utility bills. The rates have been increased three times.

I would be happy to see if any of the government caucus members want to debate on this, that this fact is not true. Three times. The utility bills rose three times. I'm surprised to see that none of the government caucus members rose in this House and represented their constituents' issues. They're struggling, and they're calling for the government to act and take real action to address this issue, but so far what we're seeing are fake programs that the government is trying to use as a distraction. A $50 rebate per month for those who have seen an increase of $600 in their bill: this is how much the government cares about Albertans.

The rising cost of tuition fees. After coming into office, one thing the government did with speed was – they didn't like a cap on anything. I think they don't like the word "cap," even when it comes to protecting the very Albertans, the people to whom we promised during the election that we would keep their interests before us, or first, before anyone else.

They removed the cap from the insurance prices. They removed the cap from the utility prices. They removed the cap from tuition fees. And now what is happening? People are struggling with unprecedented skyrocketing costs, whether it comes to utility bills, insurance premiums, or this hike in tuition fees. Not only that; the government doubled down on Alberta's youth by rolling back their minimum wage, saying that that will actually help to reduce unemployment or create more jobs in Alberta. On the contrary, what happened is that they saw a higher unemployment rate than in the history of this province. But the government still did not take a lesson from it.

What we are talking about, what we are saying is that these are not just NDP views. This is not just rhetoric. These are facts. The government has these facts, we have these facts, and these facts are being discussed and published on a daily basis in the media. The government needs to answer these questions, and government needs to address these problems. This budget does not talk about anything but more of this.

By passing this budget, Albertans will see their taxes going up because of this inflation being taxed in this budget, that our Premier has called vicious and pernicious tax creeps. Albertans are about to pay, like, $1 million more in taxes under this UCP government because the Premier did not hear Albertans on something . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to join in on the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker and to my colleagues for this opportunity to engage in the consideration of Bill 2, which is titled the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, which is the act to implement our budget, so it probably won't come as a huge shock to members opposite that I'm not keen on the no-help budget. In case you didn't hear it in question period any of the days since the budget has been presented, I'm putting it on the record at this moment.

Let me talk about what I would have liked to have seen in this budget and what would actually be a helpful budget for the people of Alberta and the folks that I've been spending a lot of time talking to throughout this province and especially, of course, the folks in Edmonton-Glenora. I have to say that the number one issue that gets brought up with me right now when I am meeting with folks, typically on their doorsteps, is affordability. The number of people who are experiencing significant hardships, particularly with their electricity bill, with their power bill, is shocking to me. I will say that it doesn't matter if they're a young person who's renting or a young family who's renting or if they're a senior who's been living in their house for 50 years. They're all expressing significant concerns about the big increases to their power bills.

This has been one of the most difficult winters, I would say, for families, and it's not because their usage is going up. That certainly isn't the case. The current government decided to forge ahead with ideology and get rid of a cap that was in place to ensure that rates couldn't go up significantly, and of course as soon as they lifted the cap, they knew what was going to happen. If they thought that rates would stay low, they would have left in the cap, but they lifted the cap, and of course rates went up. It has impacted families in a significant way.

Sometimes we'll hear members opposite say: well, good news; we're going to create more opportunities for people to find jobs. Well, the proof is in the pudding on that one, Madam Speaker, and that's that there are still significantly larger numbers of unemployed Albertans than there are in many other parts of the country, I think, only second to Atlantic Canada. Specifically, Calgary, the largest city in the province of Alberta, has the highest unemployment right now of any major city across Canada. For folks that are being told, “Well, just get a job; that will help you pay your bills,” that’s not really a realistic option for a lot of folks right now given the situation here in the province of Alberta.

The government seems to have its blinders on and its earplugs in when it comes to acknowledging the real hardships. When I think about the seniors who are telling me about their pressures, are you telling that 85-year-old who’s been living in her house for over 50 years that she needs to go get another job to pay her increased power bills because the government got rid of the cap? I sure hope not. I think that that is pretty disrespectful to the many, many people who’ve helped create opportunities for all of us to prosper here in this province over their lifetimes and, hopefully, not just for ours but also for future generations. Affordability, I would say, is probably one of the number one issues that continues to get raised with me over and over and over again, and specifically power bills have been really difficult on ordinary families in Edmonton-Glenora and throughout Alberta.

Another one I want to highlight – and we won’t see it quite yet, because the bill will come very soon but not yet – is educational property tax. Here we have an opportunity where the government stumbled backwards into a very profitable international price of oil. That means that Albertans, who are the owners of these resources, have a government right now who has the opportunity to invest that back in making life more affordable for the families who are the owners of that resource but instead has decided that they are going to actually increase educational property tax, increase school fees, increase licences and fees, accounting for over $117 million in increased educational costs being downloaded onto ordinary families.

The current government also continues to fail to build for what we need today, let alone what we need into the future. We see Albertans across this province in need of better, energy-efficient, high-quality learning environments for their children. In areas where there are schools, many of those schools were built in the Peter Lougheed days and certainly have cycled their life cycle for that school building and aren’t rightsized to the number of children that live in that community or that neighbourhood. We see on these Legislature Grounds that the government will take the time to remove buildings that they believe are inefficient or ineffective or are a drain on the resources of the provincial treasury, but when it comes to actually replacing schools with appropriately sized schools that are safe and quality, for everyone to learn in, the government has ignored the needs of municipalities and school boards right across the province.

At a time when they have stumbled into this additional revenue and it could be going towards helping every Alberta family, instead they’re continuing to double down on their practices of making only certain profitable corporations, large profitable corporations, more profitable and leaving everybody else to pay more. So $117 million in educational property taxes, fees, licences – that essentially is education property taxes and school fees – in my opinion, does not help ordinary Alberta families.

When we need schools – in Edmonton public alone there were five schools on their year 1 needs assessment, and the current government granted zero schools for the second-largest division in the province of Alberta. Overwhelmingly, the vast majority of Alberta families continue to choose public education, and the government, for the second year in a row, completely shut out Edmonton public families from any capital investment in this budget. In Calgary over three years there were two years where there were no new schools for public or Catholic families in the city of Calgary and finally, here in the third year, one – one – new public school and one new Catholic school for our largest city, the largest and third-largest districts in the province and continuing to grow.

It really doesn’t say to kids, “When you come to school, we expect you to do your best and give your best, and we believe in you,” when we fail to actually give kids the kinds of educational opportunities that they all deserve. Let’s start with the buildings, right? There’s tons of research that shows that kids who go to well-maintained, clean, safe schools learn better. I’ve asked many custodians over my time, specifically when I served on the Edmonton public school board: tell me more about why that is. It’s because we’re showing kids what excellence is. When kids show up to school and they’re in a safe, well-maintained, happy, high-functioning building, we know that we’re giving them our best. Of course, they know that we expect their best from them as well.

But this government certainly isn’t giving their best to children when it comes to school facilities across the province, leaving many to travel, even within the capital region here, over two and half hours round trip, for example, to the closest francophone school for many families who live in the Edmonton area. Again, francophone schools: completely shut out of this year’s budget province-wide, not one school, at the same time as, of course, there have been court decisions making it explicitly clear that francophone families have a Charter right to equal access to educational opportunity. The government continues to ignore that and to ignore the needs of families who want to exercise their right to access a public francophone school or a Catholic francophone school in an equal opportunity within the province of Alberta. So the government has really given no help to families when it comes to education capital.

Of course, when you actually look at the tables at the back of the budget documents and you compare the tables – I imagine that many members have gone through the tables – you can look at the full-time equivalent staff loads for certificated and noncertificated staff in education, for example. You can look at it for the Ministry of Energy, for example. You can compare one year to the next. What we see in education is that between the time when the NDP was in government and today, there are 1,000 fewer teachers in Alberta schools. That’s the government’s own budget documents. They’ll say, “Well, the NDP said it’s one year.” No. We said, “Between when we were in government and today, it’s 1,000 fewer.” Yes, they’ve moved their accounting practices around a bit, but the tables don’t lie. You can find out exactly how many teachers there were three years ago versus how many teachers there are today in this budget.

Wow. Time flies when you’re talking about all the things that could have been in this budget. I want to take a few minutes to talk about the importance of – it probably won’t surprise people that I care deeply about public health care and public health services and resources that we all rely on. I’m very proud of the fact that in the first few months, actually – there was a spring election, and by the summer, when I had the opportunity to serve as the Minister of Health, we made a firm commitment to the people of Alberta, the people of Calgary that we were going to build the Calgary cancer centre. We were going to stop the political yo-yo that Conservative governments had done to the people of Calgary over more than a decade, and we were going to move to make that happen. I am glad to see that it is continuing to make progress on the building.

What I will also say, though, through the extensive consultations we had with staff and with patients and with family members of patients – there was a dad who I think about often when I think about the Calgary cancer because his wife had passed away, but he and his child wanted to stay connected and do something better to leave families in Calgary in a better position than where they were when his wife was a patient at the Calgary cancer. He talked about the people who worked there and how there was a need to expand on the services.

Instead, what we're seeing through the current government and the budget that's been presented is a continued contraction in the number of people who are working to deliver services in the Calgary cancer centre, as is well documented now through media reports. I can tell you, having loved many people who've lived with cancer and died of cancer, that that time between diagnosis and treatment is agonizing. So for anyone who is continuing to wait for their treatment options to hear that we're losing expert technicians from the Tom Baker cancer centre and that the primary reason they've cited is because of a lack of trust and a lack of respect and a lack of fair negotiations around their compensation – they're not part of the union – and that they have felt that they need to leave when they are given far better opportunities in other provinces is devastating for those families and for every single Calgarian and anyone in southern Alberta who's relying on the Tom Baker for their cancer treatments.

These are the kinds of things we could be addressing in this budget. We could actually focus on the main issues that our constituents are raising with us. We could talk about health care and education and affordability and economic diversification. We could actually fund additional staff for Calgary cancer today to make sure that we provide those additional services in the Tom Baker as they transition over to the new Calgary cancer centre.

We could make sure that we're increasing funding to support long-term care. For anyone who lived through the stress of having a loved one in long-term care or continuing care over the last two years, one of the scariest things, I think, was realizing that people needed to put somebody they loved in a congregated care setting when we saw the devastating impacts that COVID-19 in particular had on congregated care sites and also when we saw the issues with having staff work multiple part-time jobs in multiple settings and how quickly something can spread like COVID, which had deadly consequences for many, many Albertans, especially those who lived in these types of congregated care settings. We could be looking at putting things in this budget to actually help address the root issues that led to so much harm and suffering over the last two years, like additional staff for long-term care.

We could be moving forward on the absolutely necessary south Edmonton hospital. The last time Edmonton got a new community hospital was the 1980s, when the Grey Nuns opened. That is not acceptable. We should not be looking at our second-largest city, one that has grown significantly and continues to grow, and continue to deprive it of basic community hospital opportunities for all Albertans who access the capital region and especially those who are living in south Edmonton, who need a hospital. This government has continued to delay and dither when we know how important it is. We know that there's a very clear business case, and we know that it's important to the success and well-being of ordinary families and also can support the economic diversification of that part of the city as well, creating good opportunities for people to live and work close to home, if we were to move forward in a timely fashion on the south Edmonton hospital. Clearly, this government has no intention of doing that given that there isn't any kind of concrete action related to its construction in this budget.

Also, I want to highlight – it was cut in a previous budget, but it should have been restored in this budget – the child and adolescent mental health facility, that is so desperately needed here in Edmonton, in, I believe, my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood's riding or very near to her riding, anyway. We need to have a facility that says, again, to those children that I talked about, the importance of quality schools. We need to have a health care facility for kids who are suffering, for their families who are suffering that says: we care about you; we're putting you in a quality space that has wraparound services, in-patient and outpatient support, and we're going to make sure that you get the help that you need because we believe in you and we care about your future.

Really, it's hard to say that today, when you look at some of the places and the incredibly long wait-lists that families are facing when it comes to accessing support for children who are suffering emotionally and mentally.

I would be an enthusiastic supporter if this budget would have hit some of those key marks, if it would focus on real affordability.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to join in the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: All right. Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'll put my glasses on so I can see everybody's lovely faces. Yes, it is absolutely an honour to rise in this Chamber. You know, it is my first time being able to speak in the week, and I always like to just talk about the fact that we are still in a pandemic and that we still have so many incredible front-line workers, who are doing so much for us every single day, and I don't want us to forget. I don't want us to forget about the fact that we deemed them as heroes for many months, and then we seem to forget their contributions. So for those on the front lines in health care, in education, in retail, wherever it might be, just know that you are seen and that you are so much appreciated for the work that you do.

All right. Hard to follow my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora on the budget. She is always full of wisdom, and I really appreciate it. I'm going to piggyback on a few of the areas on which she focused because they are critical ones to me. And, like she said, you know, she frames her comments largely based on the conversations that she has with her constituents. I know that she's been out knocking on doors a lot in Edmonton-Glenora. Like me, when she's out knocking on doors, she asks her constituents: "What's top of mind for you? What are your big issues? What are your big concerns?"

You know, I shared this, actually – gosh, I can't remember; time is confusing, and my memory for time these days is quite weak – probably last week. I just shared that I've been door-knocking in various parts of the province, and no matter where I seem to be, the issues are the same. They seem to transcend socioeconomic backgrounds, that sort of thing.

Most recently I was out in Edmonton-Manning with my colleague the MLA there, you know, in a little bit of a different neighbourhood than most of the neighbourhoods that I represent. But, again, what were the top issues that we heard on the doors in Edmonton-Manning this past weekend? Affordability, for sure. Affordability was top of mind. We may have folks say to us: "Well, yeah, but you probably prompt people, and you probably mention: how about those high power bills, and how about those high electricity bills?" No, absolutely not. Those are issues that are organically raised. And you can watch me. If anyone would like to come door-knock with me, I'd be happy to have you hear some of those concerns. Truly, that's what I say. I say, "I'm your MLA" or "I'm with your MLA and just really want to hear what's top of mind for you."

Affordability. A few people did bring up just how much higher their bills have been over the last few months. Again, that's something I've heard in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood as well. I've heard it in some of the other ridings that I've door-knocked in, like Strathcona-Sherwood Park, Morinville-St. Albert, and I'm looking forward to knocking on doors in a number of Calgary ridings in the upcoming weeks. I don't want to anticipate what they'll say, but I have a feeling that many of those issues will be the same.

Affordability is certainly a top issue. You know, to tie it back to this bill that we have in front of us – I should name it – Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, yeah, this government and this minister really had an opportunity to address affordability. I haven't had a chance to be up in the Finance minister's riding lately although I do have family from up in the Grande Prairie-Wapiti region, and my mom is actually a northern Albertan. Well, she's from the Valleyview area, but I spent lots of time in the Grande Prairie area, too. I can imagine that affordability would be top of mind to many of the Finance minister's constituents.

I am curious. It's unfortunate that it's the opposition MLAs who seem to be the only ones speaking up and speaking out about affordability. I would have hoped that one of them might have joined the debate today, but alas not. I would be curious: just how does the minister respond to those concerns that his constituents raise around affordability? [interjection] Actually, yeah, I'd love to have him intervene. Why not?

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker and to the member for giving way. I'd be pleased to answer that question. Absolutely, Albertans in the Grande Prairie-Wapiti constituency are concerned about affordability, as they are, I believe, right across the province. We're in a time of significant inflation. In February the Canadian inflation rate was 5.7 per cent, and we are very aware of that phenomenon. As we take a look at the various levers that governments have in times of inflation, we've reflected on those levers, and we've worked to understand: what is the best possible policy during times of inflation? Is it simply to borrow from future generations and add more fiscal stimulus into the economy, exacerbating inflation? If we take a look at the root cause of inflation today, it's certainly caused by constrained supply chains. It is caused by very liberal central bank policy, monetary policy.

Member Irwin: Thank you. Thank you, Minister. I appreciate that. I actually was just chatting with the minister backstage – that's probably not the right word – back there, and I do find him to be quite reasonable. But I will have to disagree with him because, you know, he's talking about the action, or rather the inaction, they've taken when it comes to inflation. This budget implementation act very much locks in the terrible decision made by this government to tax inflation.

It was that same Premier – and we've heard many people in this Chamber throw back at this Premier the very words he used in I think it was the '90s, the '80s, maybe before my time – who talked about how a tax on inflation was, quote, an insidious and pernicious tax grab. Yet this very government and this very Premier are doing exactly that, and they are taking an additional $1 billion in income tax out of the pockets of our constituents, my constituents in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, that minister's constituents in Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

You know what? This would be a hard pill to swallow in itself, but add on to that that this is all happening with the backdrop of higher utility bills, higher insurance costs. This minister was asked, just earlier in the day, by my fantastic colleague from Edmonton-West Henday about auto insurance and, if I remember correctly, was asked quite explicitly. I believe the question was something to the effect of: do you know how much auto insurance has gone up? Very short, very succinct. Well, that minister did an incredible dance in not answering that question. But the reality, as my colleague talked about, is that our constituents are seeing rising automobile insurance costs as well.

Tuition fees. Let me tell you about the fact that I spent yesterday – I didn't get a chance to march over from the U of A with the students, but I met them in the parking lot just out here. I'm bad at directions; I should never point. There were a number of students who marched in a beautiful spring snowstorm to rally against high tuition costs and about budget cuts.

I have to tell you – and this is not just me being, well, cheesy. I'm often cheesy, but honestly I was so inspired by those students. They basically had an open mic yesterday on the stairs outside of the Legislature, and they talked about the impacts of rising tuition costs on each of them. What was, I think, most inspiring to me was the fact that they weren't doing that just for themselves. They were doing it for future generations because they know that the choices that this government is making through Bill 2, through their bad-news budget, will have an impact on future generations as well at a time when we should be encouraging young people to attain a postsecondary education, whether that's a university education, whether that's a trades-based education, whatever it might be. There should be opportunities for young people across this province, but this government is making it more challenging.

One of the students talked about – it was an engineering student whose name was Adrian. Apologies that I don't know his last name off the top of my head. He was an engineering student. He talked about the fact that, you know, we should be seeing diversity in the engineering faculty. We should be seeing people from various socioeconomic backgrounds, international students. Like, he's a young white guy. He said: I don't want my faculty to just be more people like me. His point was that postsecondary education is becoming something for the privileged, for the wealthy. This government is making explicit choices to make it more challenging for young people to have an opportunity here in postsecondary education.

A couple of other students stood up and spoke as well. A lovely student named Joannie is at Campus Saint-Jean. She's a student there. I've met her before. She's an incredible advocate. She talked about how – and I'm looking at my colleague from St. Albert, qui parle français aussi. On va parler français.

Ms Renaud: Oui. On peut pratiquer.

Member Irwin: Oui. On peut pratiquer un peu.

She talked about the fact that she is not able to access her education entirely in French – whereas, you know, those who came before her have been able to – because of budget cuts to Campus Saint-Jean, right? I look at my colleague from Edmonton-McClung as well, who I know is a francophile comme moi. It's absolutely absurd that someone like Joannie doesn't have an opportunity to see through her entire education in the language of her choice, which is French.

You know, these are the kinds of real-world stories that I wish – I wish – this government were listening to. I had an opportunity to speak at the mic yesterday. They said, "We don't usually have politicians." I said, "Well, you know, if any of the UCP MLAs want to come join the rally and speak, they certainly can." I did shout at the Minister of Advanced Education, but I don't think he heard me. But I wish he would truly – and I mean it quite seriously – listen to those stories.

What we see as a result of this government's choices is that we are seeing young people leaving. We're seeing young people choosing to study in other jurisdictions, where it's more affordable, where they see more job opportunities. My colleague from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview just earlier in question period talked about the loss of jobs, right? What kind of young person – he can talk about tech as well, right? There could be so many opportunities for young people in this province, but this government is making explicit choices that are making it more difficult.

Oh, goodness, I've only talked about a few things here, and I've got so much more to talk about in this bad-news budget. Tuition and affordability are certainly a big one.

Now, my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora spoke quite wisely about education, and I had the chance last week in budget estimate discussions or supplementary supply, I should say, to just talk a little bit about the fact that in my own riding of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood there's one school. It's called Delton school. It's in a lovely neighbourhood just north of where I live, in fact. It was number one on Edmonton public schools' capital list, a great school community. This government will come back, and their response will be: yeah, but it's not fully at capacity.

Well, let's think about this. It's terrible logic. It's not at capacity because young families in my neighbourhood of Delton are seeing that, well, maybe there's not a future here. My colleague from Edmonton-Glenora said it quite well, right? We want young people to be in safe, healthy schools. They don't all have to be new. They don't all have to be new. I get that. I taught in Bawlf school when it was an old school. They've got a new building now, but I've taught in schools that – Bawlf school just had one little window. I still remember that. That was not good for my vitamin D levels, but, you know, it was a safe, welcoming, caring school environment for the students there. Of course, it was in need of upgrades, and I'm happy that it got them.

The same thing for the school in Delton: we would see more parents choosing that school if they knew it was, you know, a building where they felt confident sending their kids to. Don't get me wrong. There are amazing families and students and staff at that school right now, and I'm so proud to represent it. But the fact is that this government chose to not heed the number one request of the Edmonton public school board, and that was a new Delton school. Yeah. That's incredibly frustrating to me. It's hard as their MLA to have to try to find some sort of logic in this government's decision-making, and I'm not seeing any, right?

You know, I think that if there is one theme to my speech today – and I know it's probably hard to draw too many themes from a scattered speech – that might be to just listen, right?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Madam Speaker. We've had some very good debate this afternoon on Bill 2, wide ranging as it always is in this Chamber. I'm excited personally for a balanced budget, one focused on growth, and growth in all sectors as well. I think that that absolutely needs to be highlighted, as Albertans have had a tremendous opportunity in whatever profession or vocation that they are in to make sure that they've got a chance and an opportunity at a job, job security, and growth in income, and that is what is exciting about this budget as well. It is balanced, and there is . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, my apologies. You do not have the ability to speak at this time as you've already spoken on Bill 2.

Perhaps there is another member that I could recognize, which looks like it will be the hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would like to recognize everything that we just heard. I think it was bang on. I don't need to go into any more detail. I'd like to move that we adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Motions

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Federal Carbon Tax Increase

18. Mr. Kenney moved on behalf of Mr. Jason Nixon:
Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly call on the government of Canada to stop its planned April 1, 2022, increase of the carbon tax to $50 per tonne and its further plan to increase the carbon tax to $170 per tonne given that Canadian families are struggling with the highest inflation in 30 years.

Mr. Kenney: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I rise on behalf of the Government House Leader to move Government Motion 18.

Madam Deputy Speaker, the number one issue facing Albertans right now is the cost of living, inflation, particularly energy inflation, because that makes everything more expensive. According to Statistics Canada we are experiencing 5.7 per cent inflation in Canada right now. That is a 30-year high, and that is a tax on people's savings. It is a tax on everything.

It is driven by a number of factors, Madam Speaker, including the significant recent increase in energy prices, but, in addition, the federal government is ultimately responsible for monetary and at a macro level Canadian fiscal policy, both of which have been aligned by this Liberal-NDP coalition government in Ottawa to increase inflation.

We're now in, I think, the eighth consecutive year of quantitative easing, which effectively, to put it in plain English, Madam Speaker, is when central banks massively expand the money supply. That is sometimes called for at a time of a severe recession, like we experienced, for example, in the spring and summer of 2020. When there is a huge destruction of demand in private-sector economic activity, it is sometimes necessary for central banks to step in to stimulate growth and to stimulate demand by increasing the money supply, but to carry on a policy like that indefinitely, even in the face of inflation, makes a bad situation much worse. Printing more money means that money becomes less valuable, and that's effectively what inflation is.

But on top of that, Madam Speaker, the federal government has a deliberate policy to make the cost of living more expensive for everyone and everything we do. That is the explicit stated goal of their carbon tax. It is not a coincidence that food inflation in Alberta has been 18 per cent since 2015. What happened in 2015? Well, the Alberta NDP brought in their job-killing carbon tax in 2015, immediately following the election. It was very interesting. They never mentioned it once in the preceding election campaign, but they imposed the largest tax hike on the province as soon as they could.

By the way, Madam Speaker – guess what? – a fellow named Steven Guilbeault was at the news conference in the basement of this building, in the press gallery, standing alongside the now Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the NDP, to cheer on and endorse her Alberta NDP carbon tax. It is no coincidence that the same Steven Guilbeault, a former Greenpeace radical arrested for criminal acts to advance his environmental extremism, today introduced a new federal environmental policy that could be devastating for Albertans, our economy, the cost of living.

Madam Speaker, the carbon taxes are designed – when I hear the NDP stand up with crocodile tears about energy inflation, the cost of electricity, the cost of gas, the cost of home heating, the cost of food, when I hear them pretend to care about this, it's like an arsonist pretending to care about a fire that he just set. You know, it is the desired outcome of their policies. Like, this is not even up for debate. Many of these issues are complex and you can debate them and come at them from different perspectives, but the obvious, stated, explicit purpose of NDP-Liberal carbon taxes is energy inflation. That is the whole point, to take the basic cost of energy and then add onto it and add onto it and add onto it with taxes. Why? Because they literally want to punish people for consuming energy. In this energy-rich province the NDP is so ideologically, zealously opposed to energy production and consumption that they actually want to punish people for consuming it.

Madam Speaker, we could not disagree more strongly. We believe that people should not be punished for consuming energy. Now, the whole concept of a carbon tax in theoretical economics is that of a so-called Pigouvian tax. A Pigouvian tax means a tax designed to disincentivize certain kinds of behaviour. The whole history of taxation is filled with remarkable examples of human behaviour being distorted by incentives and disincentives through the tax system.

One of my favourite examples, Madam Speaker, is that in 16th-century England, in the Tudor era, some tax collector had a brilliant idea of imposing a window tax because – whoever did this was an ideological fellow traveller of the NDP; you know why? – in the 16th century having a window was a sign of being wealthy. It was a luxury that most people could not afford. Glass was a very rare and expensive commodity. You know, the NDP of the 16th century, in their class warfare mentality, their resentment of people who could afford glass, said: let's tax those windows; the more windows you have in a house, then the higher the tax you have to pay.

Well, to this day if you go back to some of the villages and towns in England and see 16th-century buildings and homes from that era, guess what you see? Plastered up window frames all over England from that era. Because how did people respond to the tax on windows? They plastered up their windows so they didn't have to pay the tax. That is just, I think, one of the earliest and most colourful examples of how statist throughout history have ended up distorting human behaviour through the power of taxation, and that's exactly the idea that inspires their Pigouvian carbon tax.

Now, I cannot understand why they're so zealous about this, Madam Speaker. I accept that we do need to intelligently reduce greenhouse gas emissions, including CO₂ emissions. There is compelling evidence and a scientific consensus about the reality of anthropogenic causes of climate change. Of course, the climate has always changed. The climate always will change. There are both natural and human-made causes behind climate change. These are, I think, largely evident scientific facts, but the notion that we can somehow radically reduce greenhouse gas emissions and have an effect on global climate by making it more expensive for people to heat their homes, drive to work, pick up their kids from soccer, or turn on the power at home is perverse because, at the end of the day, people only have so much money and consuming energy is not an option.

Now, I know the NDP's response to Albertans who say: "I can't afford potentially $2 a litre gas. I can't afford continued food inflation. I can't afford these high electricity prices." The NDP response is: walk or take the bus. Remember that? The Leader of the Opposition, when she was asked about this, said: well, I don't just mean go and buy electric vehicles, but you can also take the bus.

Well, Madam Speaker, I look at my colleague from Innisfail-Sylvan Lake. I don't think there are many buses or subways out in his riding. I don't know what buses they're talking about. When I look at my colleague from Fort McMurray, most of his constituency is the size of a European country. In northwestern Alberta people don't have the option of taking a bus. They have to get in their pickup to get to work, to take their kids to school, to go to town, to get to the market, to get to the store. It's not optional. Maybe for some people living in central Fort McMurray there's some transit, but that's a minority of his constituents. They don't have those options, especially in this big province, especially in our rural communities.

The carbon tax is a prejudicial attack on rural people in particular. It is a transfer of wealth from intense energy consumers in rural communities to the minority of people who live in urban cores, who don't need to necessarily own a car, and they live in a thousand square-foot apartment as opposed to having to heat a farmhouse and a barn and run a small business on the side. I submit that the green, left obsession with making life more expensive for people is a disaster. It's an economic disaster, and it is a disaster for folks who are just trying to pay the basic costs of living.

Now, right now, Madam Speaker, the average middle-class family with – well, I should say that right now the carbon tax is $40 a tonne, going to $50 a tonne on April 1, and once it reaches that level, it will cost the average family – that is to say, with about a $70,000 household income – $600 in costs, but they're not done there. They want explicitly – again, this is not some Conservative conspiracy theory. This is not some political rhetoric. This is the stated goal of the Alberta NDP in cahoots with their ally the Trudeau Liberals. Their stated goal is to increase the carbon tax by another 400 per cent, from the current $40 to $170 a tonne; $170 a tonne from the current $40. That would take the cost, out of an average family's household budget, of $2,000 a year. Albertans, working people, families simply cannot afford this.

Now, when they're put on the spot, the Liberals and NDP say: "Oh, don't worry about it. We're going to send you all a rebate." A rebate. Well, Madam Speaker, the Parliamentary Budget Officer, an independent officer of Parliament, just confirmed that the majority of households will be net losers on this fiscal shell game of carbon taxation and then rebates. The majority of households will pay significantly more in carbon tax than they get back in these putative rebates. But, of course, our economy is much bigger than just households. Our economy includes businesses, in Alberta hundreds of thousands of small businesses, and nonprofits and community organizations, and they all have to pay. None of them get a rebate.

Madam Speaker, just the other day I was in the constituency of the Member for Calgary-Klein, and we were at a wonderful local community hall that, you know, provides a place for seniors to be active and families to gather. While I was there, I visited the Calgary Filipino golden age club. It was the seniors in the Filipino community. They got all dressed up to the nines, and they held a big celebration. They had a dance night. I thought it was just so wonderful to see those seniors in their 70s, 80s, some of them in their 90s – I'll tell you, they were very energetic. They tried to drag me out on the dance floor. I don't want you to see the video of that. But, you know, wonderful, kind, hospitable folks, and it was just great to see them getting together after COVID and reconnecting and having a good time.

But the director of that community centre came up to me and said, "Premier, last month we had to spend $2,000 on the carbon tax just to pay for the power and the heating in this community centre." And she said: "We're in kind of a low-income area here. We can't really raise our membership fees. We try to offer free space to these little nonprofit community groups. We don't want to charge people if we can avoid it. We don't have any big-business sponsors. How are we supposed to pay this carbon tax?" And I said, "That's a very good question." And I said, "You know that they're planning on raising it by another 400 per cent?" You know what she said to me, Madam Speaker? She said, "Well, we just won't be able to operate; we'll have to hand the keys back to the city or something; like, we won't be able to pay $8,000 a month in the winter to operate our little community centre" there in north Calgary.

Do they care? They call themselves the party of compassion. They couldn't care less. What about those Filipino seniors? What's your answer? Nothing. What's their answer? To sign a coalition deal with Justin Trudeau to raise the taxes on that little community centre by 400 per cent while calling themselves compassionate. I'm sick of this hypocrisy, these guys standing up in this place pretending they care about inflation and the cost of living. Madam Speaker, Albertans are struggling and shocked to see their electricity bills, and rightfully so. Then they get these socialists standing up and caterwauling about this when they created the whole problem. They created the problem.

In their hard-heartedness and incompetence they spent 7 and a half billion dollars – they approved that – in additional electricity transmission infrastructure that we didn't need because we were already overbuilt. But because the NDP don't understand economics, they don't understand business, they don't understand electricity markets – all they understand is that they've got an ideological impulse to punish people for turning on the power – they put in 7 and a half billion dollars of higher transmission costs, and guess what. Here's what the NDP doesn't understand. They think there's a free lunch, but there is no such thing, as Milton Friedman famously said. "There's no such thing as a free lunch," so who pays for the 7 and a half billion dollars? We do. We all do. Four and a half billion Albertans do on our power bills. That little community centre, those Filipino seniors on their fixed modest incomes: they have to pay for it.

I know that the NDP, in their foggy, socialist, utopian minds, they imagine: well, you just make the rich corporations pay for it. What does that even mean, Madam Speaker? What does that even mean? Like, let's just walk that through. If we were to – and they didn't. They didn't. In their own power policy they passed all those costs on to consumers. Lest anybody be gullible enough to believe the beggar-thy-neighbour, class warfare, failed economics of these socialists, hear me. If you take just the industrial consumers – let's say our forestry plants, our forestry lumber mills. They are major, intense consumers of electricity. Imagine we make them pay a hugely disproportionate share of the NDP's transmission costs. Well, guess what's going to happen to those lumber mills. They won't be able to compete with lumber mills in B.C. and Quebec, that operate on hydro power. So what will they do? They'll shut down, and they'll lay their people off. That is NDP economics.

Now, not only did they put in 7 and a half billion dollars into transmission that we're all paying for, but they also made a complete hash of the power purchasing agreements, and that's a complex, basically, contract between power producers and the government. The NDP made such a hash of it that they had to pay out $1.3 billion in compensation to the power companies because of their carbon tax, because of their zeal to shut down the single most reliable and affordable form of baseload electricity in this province, which is thermal coal. They wanted to be able to go cocktail parties in Ottawa and hang out with their heroes, like David Suzuki and Steven Guilbeault, and say that they were green. They don't care what the cost is for those low-income seniors. So that $1.3 billion got added onto our electricity tab as well.

What's more, they then, in their zeal, brought in these regulations and carbon taxes that shut down all those thermal coal plants and forced those generators to spend hundreds of millions, billions of dollars in converting to natural gas. By the way, I agree in the long run that that was going to happen, and in the long run natural gas is a good, reliable form of baseload power, but they were in a zealous, ideological rush to do it overnight. Billions of dollars in costs got passed on to consumers. I don't know whether it was just cold-heartedness or incompetence or both that the NDP did these things.

Then the carbon tax itself. They started it at $10 a tonne. Is that right? Then it went to $20 a tonne. Then it went $30. Now it's at $40. April 1 it goes to $50, and they're going to get out their pompoms and cheer on their ally Justin Trudeau on April Fool's Day for his 25 per cent increase in the carbon tax. Then the NDP and the Liberals want to take it to $60 a tonne and $70 a tonne and $80, all the way up to $170. But it won't stop there. A study from Environment Canada said that for Canada to achieve the Paris climate targets in terms of emissions reductions, it could require a carbon tax as high as – fasten your seat belt, Madam Speaker – $400 a tonne. Four hundred dollars a tonne. That would be like a 1,000 per cent increase from where we are right now.

Now, I've used this analogy before. It's worth repeating. Why do they come in and start at $10? They just hope that nobody's really going to notice it. It's just a few pennies. It might be a couple of pennies on a litre of gas or whatever. People won't really notice it. It's called the frog in the pot, the old analogy, the old metaphor, Madam Speaker, where you put a frog in pot of hot, boiling water and the frog's fight-or-flight instinct kicks in. The frog jumps right out of that pot. The frog saves himself. But if you put the same frog in a pot of cold water and you turn it up to just lukewarm, the frog is getting kind of cozy and having a bit of a bath. You turn it up from there to warmer, and the frog is getting more relaxed, like he's in a sauna, he's in a whirlpool. And then you just turn it up to a boil, and by now it's too late. You've got to boil the frog.

It is the incremental increases in taxation. It is so fundamentally dishonest. Here's the deal. These socialists and their Liberal allies in Ottawa know full well that if they imposed a $170 or a $400 carbon tax cold turkey, if they imposed a $2,000 incremental cost for a middle-income family to survive or a $4,000 incremental cost at a $400 carbon tax, you know, they wouldn't win a seat. Madam Speaker, they would be done for good in electoral politics not just in Alberta but right across the country. So their little, tiny incremental increases are designed – they are fundamentally misleading. They are fundamentally misleading, and that is why we are having this debate.

We are having this debate to plead with the government of Canada to stop the dishonesty, to stop seeking to punish people simply for leading normal lives. Yes, we would love it for people to invest, when they can afford it, in more energy-efficient appliances and vehicles and maybe upgrades to their home in time. You know, maybe some tax credits and incentives for things like that make sense. People over time can make adjustments, as they are, to reduce their energy consumption. The big gains on reducing emissions, Madam Speaker, are not going to be found by telling those low-income seniors that they have to spend $2,000 a month in some punitive tax; the real gains are going to be made through the miracle of modern technology on an industrial scale.

Now, for example, the oil sands pathways group has estimated that with a capital investment of approximately $30 billion in carbon capture, utilization, and storage technology in this province – by the way, a technology that the NDP has always been opposed to – we could reduce the absolute emissions from the oil sands by nearly 50 per cent, getting them halfway to their net zero target by 2050. Now, that's something we can get behind. In fact, it was something Alberta has been behind. It's something we've invested nearly $2 billion in. Not just that, but the Alberta carbon trunk line and the infrastructure to support it. It's why we are trying to find common ground where we can with the federal government over an investment tax credit to support that. Now, that's the kind of practical thing that makes a big difference, not nickel and diming seniors on fixed incomes, not punishing community nonprofits for simply heating their operation. Madam Speaker, that is why this motion calls on the federal government to pause its scheduled carbon tax increase.

Obviously, this side of the House would like to scrap that tax altogether. The Bill 1 that we passed was the carbon tax repeal act. For the record the NDP voted against it because they were angry with us for making life cheaper for Albertans. Go figure. That was in May, June of 2019, okay? Then fast-forward to January 1, New Year's Day. Justin Trudeau's holiday gift for people was to impose his federal carbon tax on Alberta. Right away we kept our election commitment. We sued him in the Alberta appeal court. We joined our friends in Saskatchewan and Ontario as intervenors in their courts. We won that case as that being an unconstitutional intrusion in our ability to regulate our resources at the Alberta appeal court by a 4 to 1 decision. It went to the Supreme Court of Canada; regrettably, we lost that case by 5 to 3, so now we have this federal carbon tax.

You know, I think what's happening is that people are getting mugged by reality, and central Canadians are realizing exactly what the green left has been up to all along, which is to drive them into energy poverty. Madam Speaker, if I could add another dimension to this, a moral dimension, driving people into energy poverty hurts the poorest the most. It doesn't matter what kind of nonsense rebate schemes you come up with.

[Mrs. Frey in the chair]

Hear me now, Madam Speaker. The increase in natural gas prices – and this is a point that my friend the Minister of Finance frequently makes. Because we have not had enough investment in upstream oil and gas exploration and production, we have a global scarcity of supply. That means the price has gone up dramatically for natural gas, and natural gas is a necessary feedstock for fertilizer production. Now, Europe has already shut in, shut down half of their typical fertilizer production because of the unaffordability of this natural gas, and sadly much of the natural gas they are using for fertilizer feedstock comes from Vladimir Putin's Russia, fuels his war machine. You see how all of this is connected.

But here's the problem. That global reduction in fertilizer production, driven by green left energy policies, driven by them opposing pipelines, LNG facilities, carbon taxes, discouraging energy production through misapplication of ESG principles . . .

An Hon. Member: Tanker bans.

Mr. Kenney: . . . tanker bans, and all of it – all of that means less fertilizer production.

Now, I know that for the socialists, like, when a conservative starts talking about something as mundane as fertilizer, their eyes kind of fog over. They don't really get what – “who cares?” is probably their attitude, Madam Speaker. I'll tell you who cares. The billions of people in the developing world who can barely afford to feed themselves care because as that fertilizer comes off global markets, global agriculture yields will plummet. They will plummet. The real green revolution in much of the developing world was all about increasing agricultural yields so that countries like India went from chronic starvation and malnutrition to being net exporters of grain. Why? Because of crop science, because of smarter seed technology, and, yes, because of ever more effective fertilizers.

Now, I know they don't understand farming or agriculture, and they don't care. They don't care. But here's the reality. In Africa, in Asia, in Latin America hundreds of millions of people in the next year are going to experience food scarcity not just because of the conflict in Russia but because of a lack of fertilizer, which is driven by energy inflation, which is the desired outcome of green left policies like this carbon tax. How many people need to starve for them to care? How many people in the developing world need to go into malnutrition?

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The same people, by the way, in the developing world, many of them, have no access to reliable, affordable energy. Madam Speaker, I've been to many developing countries. Often when you land, the first thing you can smell is the smell of carbon, of people gathering twigs and cow dung and garbage to heat their homes and cook their dinners. Why? Because they do not have what we take for granted, which is affordable, reliable energy and the infrastructure to support it. What is the answer of the utopian green left in the rich northern countries? So sad, too bad.

The oil exports. You know, I remember visiting Narendra Modi when he was then chief minister of Gujarat in 2008 in Ahmadabad, and the first words out of his mouth were: Minister Kenney – I just violated the rules by using my own name. Excuse me. He said to me: “Minister, how can we get Canadian LNG? We're building an import terminal on the west coast over here in Gujarat. We want your LNG.” And he said to me: “Right now we have contracts with Qatar, but Qatar finances the ISI in Pakistan, which destabilizes us and funds terrorism in my country. We want democratic, reliable Canadian energy.” Are we any closer to getting it to him? No.

Some Hon. Members: West.

Mr. Kenney: West. Got to get that right. The Member for Lethbridge-West actually wrote a foreword to a book by another Greenpeace radical that was promoting illegal civil disobedience to stop pipelines. She actually stood up at a rally in Prince George, B.C., opposing the Northern Gateway pipeline. Maybe if we'd gotten that pipeline – and my colleague the hon. the Minister of Energy worked for eight years . . .

Mrs. Savage: Nine.

Mr. Kenney: . . . nine years of her life, that she lost, on trying to get that pipeline built while the Member for Lethbridge-West was out there trying to stop it.

Madam Speaker, here's the point. There are people in India who have to burn waste sometimes, if they're very low income, to heat their homes, and that is because we didn't get the Canadian energy to them. They don't care. They're out there – they get on their moral high horse. They go out there in front of this building with Greta Thunberg two years ago, and they're all star-struck. They're all star-struck. They're out there with Extinction Rebellion and Greenpeace and all these folks, and they're calling for no more pipelines. That's what you've got the NDP caucus out there chanting: no more pipelines. They were pushing and shoving to get in the camera's shot with Greta Thunberg because in the weird left-wing salons that they inhabit, that's a badge of honour or something. That's what they care about, woke, politically correct points, not the people in the developing world who desperately need affordable and reliable energy.

I'm here to say that they're wrong economically, they're on the wrong side of the cost of living, and they are on the wrong side of global peace and security. They're on the wrong side morally by promoting energy poverty. You know what they say? "Oh, don't worry; those poor folks in the developing world, well, can just buy windmills and Teslas and solar panels," when they're heating their homes, in some countries, with dung. Madam Speaker, it is time for some realism and sanity in the energy and environment debate in this country. This government gets it.

I'll close where I started, by saying that the number one concern for Albertans right now is the cost of living, which is – it's all connected. When it's more expensive to buy diesel – well, right now a litre of diesel in Alberta is over two bucks, and we're the cheapest in Canada. But just imagine this. Imagine your good Alberta trucker – I know my colleague from Calgary-Falconridge has a lot of good, hard-working truckers, by the way, a lot of them from the Punjabi community, wonderful, hard-working long-haul truckers. God bless them. They kept our grocery stores filled through COVID. Right now some of his constituents who are truckers are down there in San Diego taking on loads of groceries, and they're going to then drive from California all the way up to Calgary, and they're going to unload those groceries. Then those groceries go onto the shelf at Safeway and IGA, whatever, Superstore.

Guess what. The gas that those guys have to pay for gets embedded in the cost of the groceries. Again, this is basic economics, so I don't expect the NDP to understand it. The higher the fuel price is, the more the carbon tax is, the more expensive the lettuce is. What does that mean for poor people? It means they're less able to afford produce, and they have to instead buy food that's less good for them. We want people to eat well, eat healthy, but the healthy stuff often costs more because it needs to be transported from places south of here.

This is why, Madam Speaker, we're doing everything we can. It's why at midnight on April 1, like, Thursday night at 12:01 a.m., the Alberta provincial fuel tax will be suspended: 13 cents a litre, gone. That's a big-ticket item. Now, that's predicated on there being high oil prices, $80 and $90 WTI. Right now we're trading at about $105, so that will certainly be there for the next quarter and quite likely for the balance of this year. If it's there for the balance of this fiscal year, it would represent a total reduction in fuel taxes for Albertans in the range of $1.4 billion. That's real money. To put it in comparison, when the NDP first – I think in 2018 they were bringing in $1.3 billion on their job-killing carbon tax.

I'm so excited about this. I want to thank the Minister of Finance for coming up with it. I was bugging him pretty hard, Madam Speaker, about finding a solution to the inflationary issues and the cost of living. He is such a great conservative. There were other people saying, "Let's do rebates and everything else." He said: "You know what? We conservatives believe in lower taxes. Let's lower this tax. Let's eliminate this tax." I want to thank the Minister of Finance for his wisdom in putting that forward: $1.4 billion. This is what I love about it. Unfortunately, we didn't win at the Supreme Court on the carbon tax reference. We're stuck with the Liberal-NDP carbon tax, but this is our backdoor way of providing people with the relief that we sought when we passed Bill 1 in May 2019.

On top of that, I want to thank the hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity, who came forward with a proposal for an electricity rebate, recognizing the disaster that we've inherited in NDP electricity costs. As soon as the power companies can put it on the bill, we'll be providing people with a $150 rebate if they consumed less than a certain amount of electricity. Basically, I think 99 per cent of households and small businesses will get the rebate, and that's worth about $300 million. So combined, on an annualized basis we're talking $1.7 billion of consumer relief from Alberta's government, far, far more than any provincial government in Canada is providing.

But here's the tragedy. On Thursday night of this week there will be folks working at gas stations across the province who go in to enter the new pricing, the new taxes, and they'll take 13 cents off the cost of a litre to reflect our suspension of the Alberta fuel excise tax, but then they'll add 3 cents to the price of a litre to finance the Liberal-NDP carbon tax hike in Ottawa, so people will only be 10 cents better off. I'm sorry to Albertans, but we're doing everything we can to fight their carbon tax. I don't know what more we can do. I really don't.

Here's the weird thing. People say to me: well, why don't you have a made-in-Alberta thing rather than the Trudeau one? Well, Madam Speaker, that's what we're looking for. Like, down in New Brunswick, you know what they did? They just took their provincial fuel tax, and they renamed it the carbon tax, and the feds said: "Oh, that's fine. That's good. We're good with that." We went to Ottawa, us and Saskatchewan, and we said: "Can we get the same deal? Can we just rename?"

An Hon. Member: No.

Mr. Kenney: Exactly. The answer was no, because who are we? We're just Alberta. We're just the key engine of Canada's economy. We have the largest industry in the country. We contribute $20 billion net to the rest of the country, so do we even get fair consideration? No. We'll keep fighting for the best deal we can get, but at the end of the day we're doing everything we can.

Now it's the time to be tested for the NDP. You know, Madam Speaker, Alberta's NDP is in their constitution legally just like a local branch plant of Jagmeet Singh's federal Canadian NDP.

Mr. Getson: Just a franchise.

Mr. Kenney: They're the same party, the same membership. Yeah, they're a franchise. They just signed, through Mr. Singh, a coalition agreement with Justin Trudeau, so I know that they probably have to check in with headquarters, with Mr. Singh and Mr. Trudeau on this motion. They've got to get their marching orders from Ottawa, from Mr. Singh and Trudeau on this motion. If so, I can predict that they're going to vote against this. They're going to vote against it because they actually support these carbon taxes. They actually support.

Here's my message to Albertans in closing, Madam Speaker. If you're upset with inflation, you have every right to be. If you're upset with the price of electricity, you have every right to be. If you're upset with the price of fuel, you're right to be, and if you're looking to find a solution to all of this, let's vote the Liberal-NDP coalition in Ottawa out of office at the earliest opportunity. At the earliest opportunity.

Madam Speaker, in closing, I once again encourage members to vote for this motion, to vote for reducing the cost of living on Canadians, to oppose this federal carbon tax increase because it will make life even more challenging for people at the worst possible time.

Why in the world does the NDP want to make energy more expensive while we're living through 30-year-high inflation? I'm looking forward to them trying to answer that question.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

4:30

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others wishing to join the debate on Government Motion 18? The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Mr. Walker: Well, thank you so much, Madam Speaker. It was a pleasure to listen to the Premier's amazing speech on this. He hit all the key points, as he always does, and I'm really excited to follow and contribute to this Motion 18. I really hope that we can find unanimity, that we will have unanimity in this House, that we will collectively pass this motion, both the government and the opposition, because, as the Premier pointed out in his remarks, if you're on the side of working Albertan families, Henry and Martha in Sherwood Park, in Rimbey, in Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland, in Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright, you should be supportive of this motion and opposed to this egregious, precipitous rise in the carbon tax, 25 per cent on April 1, April Fool's Day. But the fools are really in Ottawa, with this unholy coalition of Jagmeet Singh and Justin Trudeau.

Madam Speaker, in my time speaking to this motion, which I will be speaking in support of, I am horrified that we're at the point where we have to even speak to this. There's a lack of common sense in Ottawa – we know that – and the best that we can do, as the Premier said, is vote out the unholy alliance of the Liberal-NDP cabal in Ottawa. It is all from them. It is all economic pain, no environmental gain, including on this phony carbon tax, which we fought. We did our best. We lost in court, but here we are. We're still doing what we can to make life affordable for Albertans.

In my time I want to speak to the themes of affordability as well as international relations, the ESG-geopolitical component to all of this, as the Premier had touched on – again, the NDP are on the wrong side of that aspect as well – and, furthermore, on the unholy alliance and how, again, this is all economic pain, no environmental gain for Albertans and Canada. I'll also share some constituent stories, you know, through you, Madam Speaker.

I'd say that the Premier was very interesting, talking about the rising costs of products that everyday people need, including lettuce. I kid you not, Madam Speaker. I was speaking to a constituent, as all MLAs do – we're all very hard working – last week on this. The concern of my constituent – we'll call her Jane – was the rising cost of food products, based in part on this 30-year-high inflation, caused as well in part by the disastrous policies of the Liberal and NDP parties' governments, including the opposition here when they were in government with their disastrous policies, leading to huge cost rises that we're still paying for today, as the Premier and the Minister of Finance have articulately pointed out over the last few weeks.

Anyway, her main concern, Madam Speaker, was the huge rise in the cost of lettuce, actually, and the great concern she had there. She was also calling about utility bills. She understood, and it resonated with her. You know, ultimately, she understood systemically that the previous NDP government, when they brought in their disastrous carbon tax, when they overbuilt the transmission line system and cancelled the most affordable form of energy in thermal coal – overall, the genesis of all this pain goes back to the disastrous policies of the former provincial NDP government. It's thankfully former, and it will be former again in 2023, a hundred per cent, the first one-term government in Alberta's history, a total disaster. But, also, their big bosses, ultimately, in Ottawa, Justin Trudeau and Jagmeet Singh, are highly responsible for this burdensome higher cost of living, with this egregious, very injurious rise in the carbon tax on April 1.

I mean, let's put it into context, my fellow members, including the opposition. We are living in unprecedented times, folks, absolutely unprecedented. We have lived through the first pandemic, Madam Speaker, in a century. We at one point were blessed with high commodity prices, but if you go back to I think it was February 2020, around there, oil was trading at a negative price. We're thankful for where we are today, but, you know, the energy roller coaster is something that we always have to be cognizant of, and of course Alberta had been, at that point, in recession for six long years.

Of course, our swagger is back on the economy because of a lot of the free-enterprise policies we have put forward, but take into account all those triple crises that Albertans, Henry and Martha, were facing over six years, in part also due to the disastrous fiscal and economic policies of the previous government, chasing away tens of billions of dollars in capital, Madam Speaker. And they want to talk about affordability? The members of the opposition think they can preach and promulgate on what economic policies are needed when they, as the Premier rightly pointed out, are ultimately the main creators of all this economic pain and unaffordability that Albertans are facing. That is so rich. I know the great people in Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland feel that way. The great people in Taber-Warner get that; all Albertans do. On this side of the House we defend affordability for Albertans, their quality of life. We are on the side of working men and women, their families. That is what we're here to support.

Again, on the affordability, Madam Speaker, as the Premier had mentioned, we are rolling out $1.7 billion in immediate relief to Henry and Martha, to Albertans, understanding that they are facing unbelievable pressures with 30-year-high inflation. We are there to support them, unlike the NDP. I haven't heard a word from them. I haven't heard them complaining or, you know, going to Ottawa to talk to their big bosses and say: "You know what? Could you just hold off on that carbon tax? Like, I don't think it's going to really work. Albertans are hurting right now. Could you just temporarily take a pause?" I'm not hearing that from them, but they want to stand here and say, "I'm door-knocking here, I'm door-knocking there, and I'm hearing about affordability." Well, look in the mirror. You guys are the cause of the unaffordability that Albertans are facing. My goodness, that is rich. That is rich. [some applause] I'll take that. Thank you.

You know, there are so many ways we could look at this. I'm just going to go on to the international relations component, that the Premier was also wonderfully talking about. Here's another aspect of this motion, Motion 18, where the opposition is on the wrong side of history. Their green, left, radical politics are nothing but a pain, economic pain and social pain, for Albertans because they stopped caring probably – what? – 30 years ago, I would say. The left stopped caring about working-class people. They got into woke politics, the radical, green, left movement. It's all about globalism and being a global citizen rather than caring about your country, your province, right? Country first, province first, Alberta first – how about that? – not David Suzuki or whatever Thomas Piketty or whoever is writing. I mean, come on. This is not what they should be caring about.

Anyway, here's a great example. They have been campaigning consistently for decades now against pipelines, against responsible energy development. No one does it better, Madam Speaker, than here in Alberta. We have the highest ethical infrastructure, pipeline standards in the world, but they have been campaigning again and again against energy infrastructure. So what happens when we have a constraint and not enough Alberta oil, for example, on the market?

You have dictators like Putin and the House of Saud in Saudi Arabia. All these dictatorships now control the energy markets. From 2000, when Vladimir Putin assumed power, until now, $4 trillion in Russian oil and gas exports have gone into his coffers to fund war against neighbouring Georgia, against Ukraine in 2014, against Ukraine again in 2021.

Now, I'm not saying that they support that. They absolutely don't. They're good people. We had a great, unanimous motion in the House a couple of weeks ago, standing against Vladimir Putin's war of aggression against Ukraine, and I thank the members opposite for that. But I wish they would understand – and I hope I can cause them to see this and that they will end up supporting this motion in part because of it – that by standing against Canadian, democratic, ethically produced oil and responsible energy projects, they are indirectly propping up and supporting dictatorship oil regimes that seek to overturn the post-1945 world order, that we have all benefited from over the last seven decades of incredible peace.

We don't want to empower Putin. We don't want to empower Maduro or the ayatollahs in Iran. This is not what we need in the global 21st century, where we need to ensure that in the ESG framework – I like how Alberta is leading the way on this discussion. Thank you to the Premier and the Minister of Energy.

Security is also an important component. You're looking at two great powers, Madam Speaker, Russia and China, that are revisionist. They don't like the post-1945 system. More immediate, Vladimir Putin doesn't like the post-1991, post-Cold War system either, and we're seeing that today, unfortunately.

Alberta's destiny is to be the energy arsenal of democracy in the 21st century. It can be the capital "S" in ESG in terms of security. We have the third-greatest reserves of energy in the world. You know, right now, for example, take the world's third-largest economy, Japan. It gets 80 per cent of its energy resources from the geopolitically combustible Middle East. Then, furthermore, those exports go through the South China Sea, which a revisionist power, China, is contesting. That is a critical choke point for them.

The Canadian west coast is closer to Japan than Qatar is, and Canada is a much more stable, democratically reliable country. We have an energy security premium. I know the Premier and the Minister of Energy have gone down to Houston and other places to tell the story of how we need more Alberta oil. Again, the energy arsenal for democracy: that is what Alberta's cornerstone destiny is in the 21st century, to supply Europe, to supply east Asia, all these democracies around the world, so that we can displace and get off nasty dictator oil. We cannot support it.

Anyway, that is Alberta's destiny, and I would ask the members of the opposition to please think about that when they're out protesting about pipelines or virtue signalling for the Scotland crowd or at COP 21 or what have you or to David Suzuki or whoever. Just think about that: you're empowering Putin, the ayatollahs in Iran, et cetera. Friendly democratic countries, as we mentioned, on the European continent, in east Asia, Japan, South Korea, other places: they want Alberta oil.

I had a conversation with a consul general – and I won't say which one – and they were telling me: we want Canadian energy more than any other place, because Canada has the highest standards. Canada is a democracy and such a great friend and also a supporter of the post-1945 world order. But they said: we fear that you guys can't get energy projects done here in Canada. And that is – and I am saying this now, Madam Speaker – because of the radical green left. They believe that by putting people into crushing energy poverty while they enjoy their wine and cheese on the virtue-signalling circuit, somehow they're doing the world a favour, okay? Well, they're not, including on the security component. They're empowering revisionist, post-1945 powers that don't like the world order we're in, and we have to be cognizant of that. We have to be responsible.

I could go on, but I just want to talk a little bit more on the unholy, pernicious, injurious alliance between Jagmeet Singh, Justin Trudeau, the Liberals, and the NDP. I know we have a lot of speakers who want to speak, Madam Speaker. I'm cognizant of that. Just quickly, I've been talking to constituents on this, and they are telling me: "I didn't vote for this coalition. You know, we go in and we vote for one party, but then these two parties get together in cahoots. You have the leftists in with the radical leftists, and it's just not good. It is extremely prejudicial, especially for Alberta. This is not good."

But that's why on this side of the House, the government, we are proud that, as has been the tradition of Conservative governments, we are the guardians of Alberta's interests. Albertans put their confidence in us in April 2019, and I know that we'll gain their trust next year, in 2023, to be the guardians of Albertans' interests within Canadian Confederation. This behind-closed-doors secret deal between the NDP and the Liberals will be nothing but extremely painful and prejudicial against Alberta, and we stand against that. And with all being Alberta first here in this House, all 87 members, you know, that is in principle what most people would think. We should all vote in favour of this motion, Motion 18, to say: pump the brakes, Trudeau and Singh, on increasing the carbon tax.

So I'm hoping that the members opposite will be supportive of this motion and please send a message to their big bosses in Ottawa, their ultimate bosses. Like, even Gil isn't that big of a boss. We're talking the real big bosses, Jagmeet Singh – right? – and Justin Trudeau.

An Hon. Member: Even Big Daddy Gil?

Mr. Walker: Even more so than Big Daddy Gil. He'll like that on Twitter, I'm sure.

Please tell them to back off. This would be the worst April Fool's joke ever. This is painful for Henry and Martha, for my constituent Jane, as she had told me. Please support this motion. Put a call in to your big bosses, Jagmeet Singh and Justin Trudeau, and say: please back off.

With that said, Madam Speaker, I am supportive of Motion 18. Let's be on the side of Alberta working families and against the radical, green, left agenda.

Thank you so much.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others wishing to join in on the debate? The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright.

Mr. Rowswell: Thank you. Well, after those two speeches I've got to tell you that there's not much left to be said. It was pretty impressive, I tell you, so take your expectations down just a touch.

Mr. Williams: My hero.

Mr. Rowswell: Yeah. Right. You know, I'm in that line as well. Like, I've been approaching this issue all the time from affordability. No one cares about that. No one talks about that. They talk about, you know, the virtue signalling of carbon dioxide. I might be alone in this. I don't even know if I agree with my party or if the party agrees with me, but we're talking here about carbon dioxide killing the planet in eight years. That's where we're at, and the entire premise of the carbon tax and all this stuff is related to that. If we're wrong, what are we costing the world? We're taking the most reliable source of energy that there is available to us, the cheapest if we left it alone, and we're just wiping people out. There's the energy that the world needs to operate just to live, the food that comes from it.

I'll mention one thing. The carbon tax is making us have less ability to compete in the world. I can talk about the Canadian Fertilizer Institute specifically. I met with them, and they said: "Look, if we get to a $170 carbon tax – we're an international company. We have to make fertilizer where it's the most affordable to make. Here we are sitting on an ocean of natural gas, and we will not be able to make fertilizer." We'll be subject to the transportation costs and whatever people are charging because we can't make it. It's just unimaginable to me that people would support something like that.

I've made statements relative to where I sit on carbon dioxide and whether it's an impact on severe weather events. You know, I've quoted science, and I've been berated by the NDP. I know that when I first started talking about it, they tried to intimidate me into silence by calling me names. That didn't work, so then they tried to send their trolls after me, sending me nasty e-mails. I fought back on that, and that didn't stop me. Now, you know, like, they're asking my colleagues to tell me to shut up. I refuse to be intimidated because this conversation has to happen. We have to have an honest conversation about whether carbon dioxide is going to kill the planet, and if it's not going to kill the planet or if it's not considered a pollutant, we have to have that conversation.

That's pretty much what I'll say today. The points that were made by the two previous speakers were tremendous. I just wanted to add my little nuance and make sure that that gets stated and that that, hopefully, becomes part of the conversation at some point in this debate.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Just a reminder to all that interjections are allowed.

The hon. Member for Peace River.

Mr. Williams: Well, thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am encouraging my colleagues to vote for this motion, especially those on the other side of the House, my colleagues in the ranks of the New Democrats, because I believe that ultimately this is the ultimate blue-collar, union job, working, you know, average Albertan motion. Really, all it says is that the cost of living is going to be the next question in the general election in Alberta, in Canada, in the United States, in every single western country. It will be a question of: is life more expensive or less expensive under the government we're going to elect? It will be the ultimate question.

This policy is basically admitting – if you don't vote for this motion, if you're supportive of the deal that the NDP and the federal Liberals have struck together in Ottawa, then you're basically saying that you do not care about inflation either. The end result is the same. Whether it's because you've imposed it in this fabricated way through a carbon tax, that's meant to go over $150 a tonne, or if you just let it happen through endless money printing that never ends from Ottawa, they do the same thing. They hurt your constituents as well as my own. I'm asking you: be the NDP we used to know. Be the NDP that doesn't just pander to woke leftists and a few small people on Twitter but instead really looks after the interests, the true interests, of average Albertans. I promise you – and this isn't a threat; this is a reality – that they will vote for us if you don't do that.

Whatever gains you think you get by squabbling over petty, inside politics inside the United Conservative leadership race, you will not see that on election day because average Albertans will say: these guys, the NDP, were trying to cause some sort of drama instead of trying to look after my interests. In Refinery Row out towards Sherwood Park – average, blue-collar, working folks in union jobs in my own constituency, whether they be teachers or nurses or private-sector unions working for trades, will not support the ideology of woke leftism over the bottom dollar of what gets their family ahead.

This is my plea to the members opposite. This is a nonpartisan issue if you fundamentally care about the cost of living for your constituents. This is fundamentally an Alberta – this is an average citizen issue that each and every one of you ought to be paying attention to. If you let this go underneath and you say, "Oh, I can pander a bit more woke, leftist politics to Twitter and just let this one slide," it'll slide way too far and way too fast for yourselves.

But maybe I shouldn't be warning you, because I'm happy to take those votes in my constituency. I'm happy to have my colleague in Sherwood Park get those votes. I'm happy to see my colleagues across the province and my future colleagues yet to be elected in 2023 say: "Thank you, NDP. Thank you for voting against this. Thank you for following that crazy path down the crazy, left, woke, Liberal ideology instead of looking after the interests of average, blue-collar Albertans."

It's going to mean the next election. You cannot with a straight face say that you support carbon pricing in this way and also oppose inflation, also oppose skyrocketing electricity transmission and distribution costs, oppose all these things that end up driving day-to-day costs in the average life of, you know, Henry and Martha or name your constituent, wherever they are. It's inconsistent with reality, but I repeat myself: that's the NDP policy and world view, it seems, inconsistency with reality.

The last thing I want to speak on, Madam Deputy Speaker, is this so-called unholy alliance between the NDP and the Trudeau Liberals. Now, what I oppose about this so, so very much is that we've had how many elections over the last four years federally. I mean, Canadians had a choice to vote for the NDP if they wanted to. The federal Liberals had, I think, three opportunities now to say: we're going to enter into some sort of supply relationship or an informal coalition with the NDP. They didn't do it. Why didn't they do it? Because the voters would have rejected that. They would have rejected it soundly, and they make their coalitions after the election and pull the wool over the eyes of average, swing-vote Canadians across this country.

Conservatives rightfully say, "We will build a coalition in advance; we will rebuff those who are out on one side of the spectrum too far, and we will rebuff those who have unsavoury views that are absolutely inconsistent with human dignity," and say, "This is who we are; these are our views; this is our platform," or as they say across the pond, their manifesto. It was how many pages, Premier? Was it 200-odd pages? Two hundred-odd pages of precise policy that we are executing on. Our members were known beforehand. You vote for Premier Jason Kenney. You vote for MLA – pardon me. I withdraw, Madam Deputy Speaker, unreservedly. You vote for the Premier. You vote for the MLA for Peace River or the future MLA for Peace River. You know that he or she will be a part of the team, and that's who is there.

People who voted in the bellwether constituency of Peterborough federally did not know they were entering into a relationship with the federal NDP if they voted for the Liberals. They didn't know that. They should have, Madam Deputy Speaker, and this is fundamentally the problem with these ad hoc, afterward coalitions. Albertans, Canadians, and the electorate do not know what they're getting until afterwards. That is not how a democracy should work, and that is what allows them to drive up electricity prices and everything that has to do with carbon – everything that has to do with carbon – because now they're even more emboldened.

The voters who thought, "I want a middle-of-the-road plan" aren't getting that. They're getting an even more radicalized, if it's possible, version of the Trudeau Liberals, and they're getting that because of a shady political deal that is in its heart an offence to the very notion of the election that was held. It's an offence because it says: "You're voting for X, but let me pull the wool over your eyes. You're getting ABC instead."

That, I think, is the problem, and that is why I think voters will reject the provincial NDP's plan to play woke politics on Twitter. It is why the federal Conservatives, I believe, are going to win the next election, whoever their leader is. It is because Canadians know that they want certainty, they want the cost of living driven down, and they want to know what they're getting and what they're bargaining for when they go to that voting booth. Madam Deputy Speaker, it is our job to deliver it.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's an honour in this House to speak on behalf of my constituents of Calgary-Falconridge. As the Premier mentioned, I represent the constituency where we have a lot of new Canadians who are involved in the service industry. They drive cabs. They drive trucks. They work in the service industry. They also own small businesses. For the last few days and few weeks I am listening to my constituents over the phones and also at the doors, and they are concerned about the rise in the prices. They are worried about inflation.

I still remember those days when I moved here more than 25 years ago. If you go and rent a basement, they used to rent a basement for $400, utilities included. When I became a small-business owner, we used to sign a lease, and it was a lease net rent plus common area cost. You know what, Madam Speaker? In these days, even if your lease net rent is zero, still you can't afford operating costs because it's more than that lease. This is the reason that a lot of small-business owners are suffering.

Before I get into this rise in prices of utilities, I want to speak about the new coalition we have. The way I see it, what Justin Trudeau did: he has replaced democracy in Canada with a dictatorship style of governance. His latest stunt of collaborating with the NDP is a stab in the heart of this democracy. Shame on Trudeau and Singh. He states that that's what Canadians want. No, Madam Speaker. That's what he wants. This is not what Canadians voted for.

When it comes to the provincial NDP, it's just like politicians coming from different parts of Canada. They tell us when they come to Alberta that they believe in our oil sands or our main industry, but when they go back, they speak differently. At the end of the day, their concern is: the more you hurt Alberta, the more votes you will get in other parts of Canada.

It is unfortunate that the previous NDP government spent reckless amounts of money on energy infrastructure. The money? They never had it, running deficits and spending so much money on this infrastructure. When we look at the bills, the transmission costs, in the year 2008 – I still remember that bill – we were paying $10 just for transmission cost. The same bill: you are paying $50 now. Just five times, or you can call it 500 times.

When people ask us why this cost is going up, it's because of a few factors. The money: they never had it. They ran so many deficits. They kept on spending money, and now we are paying for it. After they left office in 2019, they added approximately, I think, $70 billion in debt to our province, and now we're paying for it, Madam Speaker. They worked hard to make energy consumption unaffordable for Albertans. They worked together with Justin Trudeau to create the carbon tax. It was their hidden agenda. Trudeau brought the carbon tax; they brought their own carbon tax. Started at $20. The Premier rightly mentioned that we might end up paying $400 per tonne. Where will it take us? Just looking at the bill, I think almost one-third is a carbon tax. If we are paying it, we don't have the control. We can talk about the energy cost, but these are the hidden taxes.

Right from day one, since we formed the government, we were up front that we don't want this carbon tax. We brought Bill 1. This Trudeau: he fought with the government of Alberta, with the government of Saskatchewan, too, to impose this carbon tax on us. As a provincial government we are fighting and will keep on fighting. One day, if not in 2023, maybe in 2025, at the federal level we will promise not only Albertans but Canadians that we will wipe out this carbon tax. This is not fair. This is not fair for Albertans. We can't tell them: do not heat your homes; do not drive your kids to the hockey arenas and schools.

As the Premier mentioned on Friday morning, we will be paying 11 cents per litre as a carbon tax. The Alberta fuel tax: the Premier made the right choice to waive this, but it won't balance it. In the year 2030, when they're saying that we will be paying $170 per tonne as a carbon tax, it'll be 40 cents per litre. Forty cents. It doesn't matter what the energy prices are; everyone will be paying 40 cents. If it gets to $400, this is basically more than $1.25 per litre. Who can afford it? The NDP told us they believe in the environment. So do we, but the problem is that they want to punish you. They want to make it so expensive that at one stage you'll say: no, I can't afford to heat my house; I can't drive. This is not what we dreamed about for our future generations.

With the provincial opposition, our Prime Minister has placed his ideological drive ahead of the needs of Canadians and has kept on saying that he will keep on increasing the federal carbon tax $10 every period of time. When my constituents are already struggling to afford other costs such as groceries, this Liberal government is refusing to put aside their politics and work together in making life affordable once again.

Our UCP government committed to removing the carbon tax that was created by the NDP. As I previously said, we passed Bill 1. This was a promise made to Albertans when we were elected, and I was happy to see that we delivered on that promise. Not only removing this; we have offered our support in the last few weeks. Nearly 2 million homes throughout the province will be getting a $150 rebate to help off-set the high and unusual cost of utilities. Madam Speaker, effective April 1 our government has committed to removing the 13-cents-per-litre tax that Albertans have paid at the fuel pumps. This is the response that Albertans need from their government, leaders at the time of financial distress. Instead, they have received no support, absolutely no support, from Justin Trudeau and his Liberals. It is unfortunate to see the federal government so out of touch with reality that they are committed to moving forward with an increase in the carbon tax at the time of this economic crisis.

Madam Speaker, by removing the carbon tax in Alberta, our government has made Alberta an attractive place for the oil and gas industry to establish business. Billions of dollars have been brought back into Alberta after the NDP drove them out during the time they were in office. The NDP proved that this same kind of left-wing ideology being used by Justin Trudeau is bad for business. It makes life more expensive and does not bring any investment or create more jobs.

I'm honoured to represent my constituency, the constituency of Calgary-Falconridge, and I'm grateful that our government has made and also delivered on a promise made during the election. This is the type of leadership that Canadians need, that Albertans need, and they will not find it within Justin Trudeau and his new ally Jagmeet Singh.

Madam Speaker, the members opposite will likely try to turn their back on the UCP and try to convince Albertans that it was our government's removal of the rate cap that caused skyrocketing utility costs. It's simply not true. Albertans will not forget the policies implemented by the NDP that led so many individuals and families to unemployment. Our government is committed to cleaning up the mess made by that government. It is sad to see that they still have not come to terms with the damage they caused as they continue to support Justin Trudeau and his carbon tax. Today is the opportunity for them to send a strong message to both Justin Trudeau and Albertans. This is the opportunity for the NDP to admit that they made a serious mistake by once working with Justin Trudeau to create this tax. Instead of standing with Ottawa, I hope that this time they will stand with Alberta.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak in favour of Motion 18. It's interesting to think about this motion. I thought about, you know: what does it take for a government to raise taxes, and how do you go about doing it? Actually, I listened to an interesting talk on this. The speaker said: you need to have lots of Hollywood star power to be able to try to sell it and make it seem like it's valuable and important, you need to be light on details, and you need to employ a strategy called wag the dog. It's a wag-the-dog strategy. When they're taking this out of your pocket, you don't want to be thinking about that, so they'll be doing all sorts of stuff on this side here so that you don't realize what's going on.

This is why this motion is so important and so critical right now, because we have the opportunity to be able to shine a light on what's been going on and what is continually going on throughout this world, which is an increase in cost to everyday Albertans, everyday people of the world. It's sad that earlier the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood was complaining, when she was talking about Bill 2, how there were no members of the government side standing up and speaking about affordability. Yet we have had, I think, five speakers now talking about the importance of affordability and what happened and why that affordability was lost.

Madam Speaker, as you know, I've been in this House in opposition. I watched as the NDP went forward with their strategy of increasing the costs to Albertans, especially when it comes to utilities. Just so that the members opposite don't forget and that Albertans can remember what really, truly did happen, when the NDP were in office, they decided that they were going to implement the carbon tax. They actually did that prior to the federal government. They can blame all they want on Justin Trudeau: he's the one who brought it in. That's actually not true. What happened was that they brought it in, and the federal government was emboldened by that, and they thought: what a great idea; let's do that. Then they actually implemented their carbon tax on a federal level.

Now, what's interesting is that once they made a policy decision, all of a sudden the consequences of that policy decision started to unravel. One of the consequences of that policy decision was that with utility providers there's a clause called power purchase agreements that actually said that if you change the contract and change the ability of us to be able to make money or not off of these contracts in any way, we can cash in these power purchase agreements and we will sue for damages. This is what happened, and the cost to Albertans, Madam Speaker, was $1.4 billion. That is the cost that was borne in terms of the liability costs. The damages cost was the $1.4 billion.

But what has not been talked about is the fact that when you quickly move from coal to natural gas – there was already a plan for it – what happens is that you move the incremental costs up 100 per cent. You go from 1.5 cents per kilowatt hour to 3 cents per kilowatt hour for natural gas. Now, I remember when they first were talking about doing this. I brought this up in the house, and of course they did the wag-the-dog strategy, where you just talk about other things rather than the actual issue at hand, which was affordability. When you have a 100 per cent increase in input costs, that has got to be something you need to take into serious consideration.

Madam Speaker, the members blindly went forward and added that cost onto Albertans. Yet we have heard for weeks now the members going after the associate minister of utilities, saying that it's the government's fault or it's his fault that these costs have increased. In reality, this was the NDP's approach to utilities, and it was all because they wanted to bring in a carbon tax, the largest tax hike in Alberta history. This is the reason why the snowball effect happened, where they started to bring in these different policies, and as those policies came in, we saw the cost of everything go up.

Now, the other thing to remember, Madam Speaker, is that there's nothing that you can get in this province that isn't trucked, so as soon as you add on a carbon tax, that is going to be a cost to Albertans in everything they do. The NDP knew that the past Conservative governments had already implemented a bill that said that they cannot bring in a PST unless that PST is brought before Albertans in an election, and they refused to do that. What they did is that they brought in something that's almost as egregious as a PST, which is a carbon tax, because it taxes everything, just like a PST taxes everything. The carbon tax was their strategy to be able to bring a PST in, and the cost of everything went up. So when the hon. members to my left talk about affordability, it's hypocrisy, Madam Speaker. It's hypocrisy.

I want to talk about a very close issue in my riding. Everybody in here knows about Rogers Sugar, I'm sure. I grew up on Rogers Sugar pancake syrup on pancakes in the morning. Every morning my dad would make pancakes, and we would have Rogers Sugar syrup on it. It was a household brand. Rogers sugar is produced – actually, the name of it is Lantic Sugar – in my hometown of Taber.

Now, what's interesting about this is that Rogers sugar is made out of beet sugar, and beet sugar competes against cane sugar. Now, what's interesting about that, Madam Speaker, is that out of all the cane sugar that's produced in the world – there's a total of 1.1 billion tonnes of cane sugar that's produced – 906 million tonnes comes from countries that do not have a carbon tax. So Lantic Sugar, or Rogers Sugar, is at a competitive disadvantage to cane sugar already. It also comes from countries that don't have the same environmental standards. They don't have the same ethical standards, they don't have the same labour standards, and they don't have the same cost of living as we do. So how is it that Lantic Sugar, Rogers Sugar, can compete against countries like Brazil, India, China, Mexico? Well, actually, Mexico does have a carbon tax. It's interesting because Mexico has started to lose their cane sugar, and it's just gone to other countries. That's a natural progression.

What's interesting about this is that Lantic Sugar recognizes very quickly that just across the border – my riding is right on the U.S. border – you have a country, the United States, that does not have a carbon tax as well. That carbon tax advantage of the United States – the lack of carbon tax advantage the United States has – is now starting to take away from our ability to keep Rogers Sugar, a household name in our province that I grew up on, from being able to stay not just in Alberta but in my riding, which is a major employer of men and women in Taber-Warner, a major employer that provides good-paying jobs, that provides jobs for people who actually came up from Mexico. The Low German Mennonite population works – a disproportionate number of people from the Low German Mennonite population work in Lantic Sugar. They love it. They love being there. They're paid well there compared to what they would be paid in Mexico.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Through our ability to provide Rogers sugar to Albertans, we not only provide a great product that everybody loves, but we also are able to provide people from other countries, like the Low German Mennonite population from Mexico, with good-paying jobs. We've allowed them to be able to come to our country, to our province and to be able to have a lifestyle that they would never have been able to have in Mexico: buy homes and have a vehicle to be able to take their kids to soccer practice, to be able to go to a soccer game, to be able to go to swimming, have their kids in ballet or in swimming lessons. This is the lifestyle that is actually provided for the Low German population that is disproportionately employed by Rogers Sugar.

Now, 100 per cent of the sugar beets produced in the United States, which is our direct competition, in direct competition with us, have no carbon tax whatsoever. On a regular basis I have to meet with Rogers Sugar executives and management and help them understand why we have the Alberta advantage and to just stick with us a little longer because – you know what? – we're going to be competitive in other ways even though we have a federal government that's bent on doing everything they can to make us less competitive with other jurisdictions.

I hope that the hon. members to my left will recognize the trickle-down effect of bad policy, the trickle-down effect of the policies that they had made in the past that took away our ability to be competitive on a national scale. When we have a situation where you're not price makers, where you're price takers with international products like sugar, there's no way that you can compete if you've got that kind of an input cost going up to $170 a tonne. Mr. Speaker, they are complaining about being competitive at $40 a tonne. At what point do we drive out the Rogers Sugars from this province, from this country to other jurisdictions that don't have a carbon tax? What number does it have to be? I guarantee you that it's not going to be $170. It's going to be well below that. Within years we're going to see a complete change in employment opportunities, good-paying opportunities for our children, for our grandchildren.

There just doesn't seem to be a recognition from these members in the NDP-Liberal coalition that this damaging carbon tax, this increase in those carbon taxes, that April Fool's joke that isn't a joke, is going to cause massive problems and concerns for the very people that they say that they are actually representing, because Edmonton, which is where most of the members to my left are from

– they are also employed. They are also needing jobs. They also need to be able to have those opportunities for gainful employment. For them not to think about that – they think that they can get green energy jobs and that that will be the silver bullet for all of this – is astounding when you think about it, Mr. Speaker.

I will say that I would hope that we would see a change in the hon. members to my left, that we would see a change in the way that they understand and see how economics works and how good policy will create jobs, which is what we're seeing right now. We've created many jobs, thousands of jobs, because we have established back that Alberta advantage again. The NDP don't believe in the Alberta advantage. They actually want to break it down and destroy it, and I believe that Albertans rejected that. We're seeing that right now in the polls as the poll numbers are starting to drop for the NDP as they're starting to see that those damaging policies have a real effect on Alberta families, on each of our families, and also on the NDP's families, yet they are going quickly to do what they're doing.

Mr. Speaker, I am fully in favour of this, and I hope that all members will follow as well.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on Government Motion 18, are there others? The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland has risen.

Mr. Getson: Yeah. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really appreciate the conversation we're having back and forth here. This motion, just for the folks at home that are following along, is Government Motion 18 by the hon. Mr. Nixon.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly call on the government of Canada to stop its planned April 1 . . .

The Speaker: I just might remind the hon. member that no matter what the context is, the use of proper names is inappropriate.

Mr. Getson: I apologize, sir. I got caught out by reading it off the Order Paper, Mr. Speaker.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly call on the government of Canada to stop its planned April 1 . . .

April Fool's, by the way.

. . . increase of the carbon tax to $50 per tonne . . .

It's actually going up from $40.

. . . and its further plan to increase the carbon tax to $170 per tonne given that Canadian families are struggling with the highest inflation in 30 years.

Mr. Speaker and to the folks here, this is like déjà vu all over again. You know, we went and campaigned on killing the carbon tax. The opposition put in this gouge that had set the world on fire, quite frankly, when it comes to Albertans. They had never had a PST before, and all of a sudden they're getting this tax grab that was hitting them. Some of my constituents – there was one gentleman that I'd spoken to. He and his father ran trucks, and he was just looking for a fair deal. He was looking for a fair shake in his own province. He said: I wish they would stop stepping on my throat while they're picking my pocket. That's where we're at. We've already had it once. We challenged it in court. We won, by the way. We won. I think the magistrate had said that it was the Trojan Horse, a Trojan Horse of legislation. We lost in the Supreme Court.

I'm still a little frustrated, honestly, Mr. Speaker, and getting a little emotional here because, again, I hear it from my constituents. We're driving costs. The inflation is up. We keep just hammering them, stepping on them a little bit harder, robbing what little bit they've saved up, especially coming out of COVID. Just as we're starting to take off, we want to throw a drowning man an anchor. Thank you very much, Jagmeet and Justin. That's what's happening. People can't take it anymore. It doesn't make sense. It just does not make sense. Why would we continue to do this? You know what I'm thinking, jokingly? Maybe they don't get it.

But here's the other scary thought: maybe they do. Maybe they really want to drive a wedge between the west and the east. Maybe they really want to bankrupt how many more families out there. Maybe they want to have us rolling tumbleweeds down here. You know what happens then, Mr. Speaker? You break people. When they have dependency on the government, well, that is the neo-Marxist marching orders right to the end: help you; put you in the shackles; keep you dependent; keep you fed; break your will.

We want to talk about people leaving? There's a ton of people leaving. There are more coming into our province because we're still the bastion of hope, but the people that have left – I hear the other side talking about: what could possibly be driving all those engineers, cost control, and professional people out of the Calgary office towers? Well, you hammered the energy sector so hard that they picked up and left. I had a gentleman by the name of Bryce Barkus reach out to me before I got elected. He says: "It looks like a long-haired Liberal hippy just became your Prime Minister. When are you packing up and moving south?" The writing was on the wall. This is from a gentleman at NKE Associates. I worked with him when we were doing Eddystone, Pennsylvania, putting in a trans-shipment facility. He was the guy that took care of the engineering for me on the trans-shipment on the rail tracks. They could see the writing on the wall. Now we've lived through this.

It just keeps getting worse. Now, the same boy band that brought you the emergency measures act, that got put in place: they tried that on. The bromance went so well: "Well, hey, let's start a coalition. Here's a great plan. Tell you what? Why don't we do a little handshake, and you just keep me propped up in power, so then we can do all this really crazy stuff?" You know, there was a line out of Tropic Thunder. I'm going to kind of twist it a little bit, but quite frankly the words of advice were: never go full socialist. This is where we're at. I've got one leader of one party dressing up like Thelma and the other one's like Louise, and they're running the T-bird off the edge of the cliff. The rest of us, unfortunately, are supposed to go along with this in the back? Enough.

The opposition will stand up here and they'll talk about how bad the energy sector is. They'll talk: "Oh, my gosh, the power prices are going up. I can't imagine why. What's happening on my doors, all these people." I wonder if they're honest with the people on the doors. When they look them in the face, instead of saying, "Oh, it's because of the new budget," look them in the face and say: "You know what we did? We messed up. What we did was because of our ideology. We rapidly accelerated this phase-out of coal, which was the cleanest coal tech that we've got in the world because of the Devon institute, that put it in place." They rapidly accelerated that. Then they allowed them to go hog-wild building out the infrastructure for the transmission lines. Because, you know, they're so full, well equipped, they didn't understand this little thing called contracts. When they broke the contracts, they had to pay for them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I'm a little passionate about the coal because, again, that's my area. I understand the tech because I came from that energy sector. For a point of interest, I was the project manager for Enbridge while we were looking at a JV partnership with, turns out – at the time it was called the pioneer project. We were going to do carbon capture and storage, take it off the top of those nice little stacks there, push that down towards Drayton Valley-Devon, re-energize the fields down in that area so that we could have more flow and throughput.

Now, we had a little bit of a technological problem back in 2012, and it was with the technology that was coming out in the carbon capture from Korea. We couldn't make the financial model work. So now when I get elected and I hear we're phasing out coal, I end up running into the same project manager from the other side. I took him for a ride in the truck and said: "Jamie, can we throw this thing back? Can we turn it back?" He goes: "It's too far gone. It's too far gone." I'm going, "It doesn't make sense." [interjections] Yes, sir. Intervention? Sure.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear the hon. member talking about the innovation. The question I have for the member is: does he know of any situation where governments or organizations have been able to tax their way into a solution versus innovate their way into a solution?

Mr. Getson: Thanks for the question, hon. member. Again, the question was: have you ever been able to tax your way to a solution? No. I've never seen that work. You can put in different programs, like the TIER program that we put in place. That was good. Industry worked with us and said: "Okay. Take over from here. We'll pay a little bit extra. Put it into a fund where innovation is held in trust, and we'll grow it." Absolutely, that works. But just to tax your way on the inputs?

When I was talking to this project manager, again going back to Jamie and having that conversation, I'm going, "Well, it takes three parts to four parts the amount of gas to produce the same amount of energy as you do coal." And he goes, "Yeah." But they've taxed the coal – I think it was at 45, 50 bucks at the time – so high that it wasn't making sense. Well, now roll the shot clock forward. I'm in an open house at TransAlta just a couple of weeks ago, and they're looking at me at going: the people are ringing our phones off the wall complaining about the cost of power, and it's all that we can do to tell them it's because we're burning three times the amount of gas, and now we're going to be paying 50 bucks a tonne.

You've made it artificially even higher than the coal cost was when you phased it out. So when you're at your doors, give them my number and tell them to ask me what happened to the power prices so that when they're sitting in Edmonton, they'll understand what the heck is happening on the grid. And the folks in rural pay way more for their transmission costs. This is just a cascading effect, again, of the carbon tax.

Is the intent of the opposition – Mr. Speaker, through you to them: are they Thelma and Louise? Are they the cast of Tropic Thunder? Or are they something else, something way more nefarious trying to drive us and separate us and drive a wedge into this country until we all walk within a soup line with our little dishes?

The Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood is laughing it up. Thinks this is funny. Why don't I go door-knocking with that member and talk to the people about what's happening in their representation? I have folks from eastern Europe calling me and saying: "Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland" – I didn't use my name – "this is scaring the heck out of us. We lived when Romania came down, when the walls came down. We were in Hungary. We were in Ukraine. We were in Russia. We moved here because the land of opportunity, Canada, was a safe place. We're scared. This is how it starts. Where do we go, and what can you do?"

Again, we can have a motion in here. We can plead. The other side isn't playing by the rules, Mr. Speaker. We need to start exercising more of our constitutional rights. If you want to wake up the bromance, let's drag and let's start talking something realistic; let's bring that CPP back. Let's talk regionally. We want to promote pipelines and energy? You see the mess that's taking place over there? Motion 501: I had that two years ago. Not a single member from the opposite agreed with me on that. They wouldn't vote in favour of it, and it was simply talking about economic corridors and pathways to strengthen our country, to step up to do what we needed to do.

Roll the clock forward to where we are today. Holy cow; the world is dependent on communist and socialist oil. Now, is that by accident? Is that why the members opposite and a lot of the groups that they promote, that they show up at protests with – Extinction Rebellion. The Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood really loves that group, thinks they're so good that they should bring them to the classrooms and teach our kids. Well, actually, it's not teaching; it's called indoctrination. To indoctrinate our kids about that type of thing, waving communist flags more often than not: is that part of the plan?

The Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt; however, I provided some reflection on the use of government motions in comparison to the second reading of a piece of legislation. Second reading: significant amount of swath. Government motions: perhaps slightly less swath with respect to relevance. I think it would be prudent for the member to return to the origins, if you will, of the motion. I'm sure there's lots there that he could talk about.

Mr. Getson: Yes. Thank you for the correction, Mr. Speaker. Again, I apologize to the group. Obviously, we're pretty passionate about this. Again, it's simply because I'm a patriot, love my country, love the flags that are represented behind us in our institutions. I feel compelled to express that, to maybe shake up the opposition to maybe vote with us on this for a change, to vote in favour of Canada, to vote in favour of the people out there right now.

When you're at your doors and people are struggling, Mr. Speaker – and I know you know it on your side. I've got people that are wondering if they should chase their businesses across the border. The Member for Taber-Warner was talking about Rogers Sugar. We have a lot of businesses that are doing that right now. We know that they're coming back, that the energy sector is coming back, but can we get our stuff to market? When I started talking about energy corridors, one of the VPs from Enbridge that's on the liquid side had said that the energy corridors, the economic corridors change everything, because they're not talking about expanding and building anymore in Canada. The risk is too high, and the risks of costs of goods and services just get compounded. If we're going to reach that socialist euphoria where we get to 170 bucks a tonne, well, you better get comfortable with nukes really quick, unless we're just trying to drive this thing right to the bottom.

Mr. Speaker, I'm going to take my leave, pass it on to the next member, hopefully, that'll stand up. What we have to do – hopefully, everyone in here will vote with us in favour of this motion. I thank the minister for bringing it forward. I really appreciate everyone's passionate speeches that were made to hear. There was the sound of deafening silence coming from the opposition. I really hope that they can break up the bromance, stand on this side of the House with us, and do the right things for Alberta.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 6

Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont has risen.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the Minister of Culture I would like to move second reading of the Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, 2022.

Of course, this is an act to bring ammolite into Alberta as its official gemstone to join the other 11 emblems, including what I just learned about. Bighorn sheep is the mammal of Alberta, and the other one – rough fescue is the grass of Alberta, in case you were just wondering. There are others. The great horned owl as well. Of course, it's a unique item to Alberta, to southern Alberta. It has a history here unique to us, and to be able to bring it in as the gemstone, I think, recognizes that history as well and is something that Albertans can be proud of.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I'll just conclude my remarks. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont has moved second reading of Bill 6, Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, 2022. Are there others wishing to join in the debate? I see the hon. Member for St. Albert has risen.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 6, emblems of Alberta. It's a brief bill. I will say that about it. I mean, I could literally stand here and count the words on it. That doesn't mean it's not important, but, you know, any time I see a bill that is this light, I always think that there are so many other things that could have gone into this. Again, much like the discussion that we had about the budget earlier, there are a lot of things that could have been placed in here. One of the things: there are so many emblems in Alberta that are important. We could sort of underline their importance and talk about why we need them, but we didn't. Anyway, we'll focus on what's in this bill.

This bill designates ammolite as the official gemstone of Alberta. Now, ammolite is not to be confused with ammonite, which refers to fossil shells of ammonites. Ammolite refers to the gem-quality material made from fossils of particular species of ammonites. Ammonites, for those of you that didn't know at home and are curious, were marine mollusks that became extinct over 65 million years ago.

Now, ammolite, which is an opal-like organic gemstone, is found primarily along the eastern slopes in the Rockies. Why I bring this up about the Rockies is because we've had some really intense debates about protecting the eastern slopes. It's unfortunate that just earlier this week a private member's bill actually to protect the eastern slopes was not supported by the members opposite. I think we all saw a lot of actually nonpartisan public pressure in opposition to coal strip-mining on Alberta's eastern slopes when the UCP did some really sneaky things and changed some policies and changed some rules when they thought people weren't looking. I think the intense pressure caused them to backtrack a little, then do what they normally do, assign a panel and then go through all of those steps, which, you know: better than nothing. What they could have done is actually support this piece of legislation.

I'm going to reiterate what the leader of the NDP said earlier this week. She explained the four things that the Eastern Slopes Protection Act does. It would have immediately cancelled all exploration activities across the eastern slopes, which means a stop to road building and test pits. I think we all learned a great deal, when we did see all of the public pressure and push-back, about coal mining and pit mining.

The second thing it does is permanently prohibit new coal mining and related activities in category 1 and category 2 lands and cancels all existing coal leases on these lands.

The third thing that private member's Bill 201 would have done is prohibit coal mining and related activities in category 3 and category 4 lands pending the development of a thorough regional plan following extensive consultation with residents of the eastern slopes: Indigenous governments, elders, and communities as well as municipalities, ranchers, farmers, agricultural groups, tourism and recreational businesses in addition to representatives of other affected industries and economic sectors, the very people that this government neglected to consult before they forged ahead with their plan.

The fourth thing that this bill would have done is prohibit Alberta Energy Regulator from issuing approvals, including for water permits, in categories 3 and 4 and cancelled leases issued in conjunction with the UCP's cancellation of the 1976 coal development policy in May of 2020. So that is actually unfortunate.

The reason I bring this up, as I said a little bit earlier, is that, actually, the eastern slopes is the place that we find this gem, so you would think that this government would be invested in protecting this area.

Because this is a piece of legislation without a lot of substance – and that doesn't mean that it isn't important. There are pieces of legislation that are not very long that are incredibly important. I'm not saying that. But when you get a piece of legislation like this, it's a little bit difficult to find things to talk about, so I'm going to talk about something that I often talk about that's pretty important and that's somewhat related to this, and that is the science of paleontology, weirdly enough. So these are fossils . . .

Ms Hoffman: Tell us about your son.

Ms Renaud: I will.

Paleontology, for those of you that don't know, is the science of studying fossils of animals and plants. Now, I think most people, when they think paleontology, they think dinosaurs – they only think dinosaurs – but it is not limited just to dinosaurs; it's actually limited to plants. There are two major streams: there is vertebrate paleontology and invertebrate. Vertebrate is, obviously, extinct animals. We know that there's a spine. Invertebrate: there's no spine. No spinal cords. So it's pretty easy to tell.

You know what? Alberta is actually world-class for paleontologists, for researchers in this field. It is absolutely world-class, and the reason I know this – I know I've said this many, many times in this House – is that my son is actually a paleontologist. Right now he's in the U.K., in London. He's working as a researcher. But as he went through university here – he did a degree here, and he did his master's, and then he went to Toronto to do his PhD – I learned a lot from him and his friends, who were really into fossils and dinosaurs. I learned a lot about how important this field of research is. It isn't just about supercool dinosaurs, that you see at the Tyrrell museum, which is a world-class museum and amazing – if you haven't been there, you should go – or the Currie museum, which is in the Grande Prairie area, which is another fantastic and amazing museum. If you haven't gone, you should go. We have world-class scientists right here in Alberta that are doing really amazing research in this field, weirdly enough.

Sadly, though, one of the things that has happened over the last couple of years – and I know that the Minister of Advanced Education will frequently flick this off and just say: ah, that's not true. I do know that it is true. There is a brain drain going on, and people are leaving Alberta. People are leaving Alberta in this sector. They're leaving Alberta specifically because there is no place for them here or there are no funds for research here. They just don't see a future for themselves as a young family or a young person looking at their career, and that's unfortunate. I think if you understood the passion of the scientists that are born and raised here, that study here, that learn here, that go on – they do their summer, their fieldwork here, they assist other researchers here, they invest so much time and energy here. They're such amazing people to represent this province, and those are some of the people leaving.

It's not just my son, it's not just a personal thing, but a lot of his friends are now scattered, actually, all over the world, from Australia to Germany to Japan. I'm trying to think. There's some in France. Like, they're just all over the place. These postsecondary institutions and, in some cases, museums are actually snapping up people from Alberta because we're so well known around the world for the kind of work and the researchers that we produce here. That's really a sad thing. Alberta is about – yeah. There's a reason that we have a little dinosaur on our drivers' licences. Alberta is really well known for the researchers here. I think if we have one leave, it's sad. If we have as many as we have had leave, it's kind of a tragedy. You won't get that back.

People aren't staying, and they aren't staying for a number of reasons, not just that tuition has been increased or that the interest on their debt has gone up. It's not just that. There are so many other things. When people look around them, they want to see their province, their government, their leaders reflect back the values that are important to them. Unfortunately, young people are leaving because they don't see those things in Alberta, which is actually a tragedy for us because our young people, the youth of Alberta, really are our greatest treasure, and they are vital for our future.

You know, I think it's great that we have an official gemstone and it is what it is. I know that ammolite, the history of ammolite, the importance of ammolite to Indigenous communities has been discussed in this House, and that's a great thing. I think that if those communities endorse this, they want this, that's great. It would have been great to see other emblems of Alberta given this attention and this respect. I can think of one, for example, and that would be the Franco-Alberta flag. It's unfortunate that this government chose to enact a policy so that when we have an entire month to recognize francophone communities in Alberta, the flag is flown for one day throughout a month, which is unfortunate. It's unfortunate that this government – they talk about not picking and choosing things, but they certainly do that.

Mr. Speaker, the long and winding road. I do actually support Bill 6. I think it's terrific that ammolite will be adopted as the official gemstone of Alberta. I recognize its ties to – you know, it is a fossil. The importance of paleontology and the fact that I got to say that word and talk about paleontology for a few minutes is a good thing in this place.

I think that, you know, we all recognize that we're famous for dinosaurs, the albertosaurus, the T. Rex, all of the big-teeth ones that are really cool, but we're actually more than that. There's so much more than that in Alberta. They unearth – all the time there are new dinosaurs that are found, new ones that are named for famous researchers that were born and raised here in Alberta and that are known sort of the world over, and that's pretty special. It's unfortunate, though, that a lot of that talent is leaving Alberta.

With that, I will end my comments. Thank you.

5:50

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise today to speak in support of Bill 6. When it comes to the Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, there is a special connection to Lethbridge and ammolite. That's a major reason I am compelled to support this bill. Did you know our province currently has no official gemstone under the current emblems act? The city of Lethbridge does, and it's ammolite. All of the ammolite that is mined is found in southern Alberta. Lethbridge makes up a huge part of what was called and what is called the Bearpaw Formation. It's a geological formation covering most of southern Alberta and extends into western Saskatchewan and northern Montana. However, ammolite is mined exclusively in southern Alberta. Because of that, it is not only Lethbridge's gemstone but also, hopefully, will be Alberta's gemstone. Thanks to this amendment ammolite will be as much of an emblem to our province as the coat of arms, our flag, and the wild rose. I applaud this bill for recognizing that.

For those who may not know or missed it when the member opposite just shared this, ammolite is an iridescent gemstone formed from the fossilized shells of mollusks known as ammonites, which lived in an inland sea east of the Rocky Mountains. After sinking to the seabed, the mud that covered ammonites hardened over millions of years to become shale. The shell properties, combined with southern Alberta's unique geology, transformed many ammonite shells into the ammolite that is mined and used for jewellery today.

Also, ammonite shells have been collected by the plains First Nations for a thousand years and are still collected by Blackfoot communities for sacred purposes, and I want to thank them for sharing their land and their heritage with us in this special way. While ammolite received official status from the World Jewellery Confederation in 1981, the Blackfoot people have found pieces of the stone from as early as the late 1400s. In fact, some ammonite shell segments have been collected by plains First Nations for millennia and are still collected by the Blackfoot people today. They are regarded as sacred material. The stone is in demand world-wide for jewellers, collectors, and many others, all this interest from a mine or a few mines and a history unique to Lethbridge and southern Alberta. With so much interest and history attached to this Alberta gemstone, it is easy for me to support the Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to take time to talk about the Fair Deal Panel, a central campaign promise of this government. When many Albertans think of the fair deal in Confederation, they think of recommendations such as the provincial police force, scrapping the Liberal carbon tax, and rightfully so. However, this amendment helps affirm Alberta's cultural uniqueness, helping to fulfill recommendation 25 of the Fair Deal Panel. Promise made, promise kept, should this bill pass. As I stated earlier, ammolite is uniquely Albertan. A big component of the fair deal recommendations is recognizing our Albertan identity, and we would now have 11 emblems.

The ammolite mine that operates near Lethbridge is also a tourist attraction and a place of employment for several people in my constituency, including some First Nations individuals. There is also the value of the gem itself to consider. There isn't an infinite supply of ammolite in the ground. It is already sold across the country and even in various parts of the world to people who appreciate unique jewellery as well as museums and avid collectors.

There is a tourism market for collectors of gems who go all over the world seeking sparkling or unique additions to their collections. Passionate collectors already know where to find ammolite, and I could get very excited about the possibilities should Bill 6 pass. It would give ammolite the recognition of a true Alberta emblem. It would raise awareness of the Lethbridge area for something that we have had in the ground going back 70 million years.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, this bill is a chance to share some of what makes Lethbridge so special. It furthers our Alberta identity. It increases tourism and awareness in my constituency. It follows through on a fair deal commitment. It promotes the Lethbridge economy and employs hard-working people.

When the Minister of Culture announced that this bill would be tabled, I couldn't help but notice his lovely ammolite lapel pin.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, to the minister: it looks good on him, and it looks great when he shares it with me as well.

When it comes to our heritage and recognizing things that are unique to this province, it is a nonpartisan issue. I urge all members of this Chamber to join me in supporting the Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, and I look forward to seeing more people coming to Lethbridge to find some ammolite for themselves.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre with the time that remains.

Mr. Shepherd: Yes. Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 6, the emblems of Alberta act, and indeed I suspect my remarks on this will be relatively brief, perhaps five minutes or so.

The Speaker: Four.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, four and counting, I suppose, Mr. Speaker, certainly.

As I think a number of members have noted in this House, this is a bill, I think, that we can all support. We recognize the unique properties of ammolite, the innate connection it has for Indigenous peoples here in the province of Alberta, indeed the Blackfoot, who refer to ammolite as iniskim, the buffalo calling stone, connected for them to a cultural myth about the stone having been used, having been found by a community that was struggling, starving in the winter, and finding that the stone was of use in calling buffalo and helping them to provide for themselves. It's said to symbolize wealth, abundance, good health, and stamina. Indeed, for our province, I think, as we come out of this COVID-19 pandemic – we continue to grapple with the virus, but certainly as we are moving in many respects towards a recovery from the challenges that have come with that, I think certainly a symbol of wealth, abundance, good health, and stamina is a very worthy one for us to adopt as a province.

Of course, this brings Alberta in line with a number of other jurisdictions in Canada that have their own official gemstones. We know that British Columbia, of course, has named jade; Newfoundland, labradorite; the Northwest Territories, diamond; Nova Scotia, agate; Ontario, amethyst; and in the Yukon Territory, lazulite. But here in Alberta we have the relatively unique gemstone of ammolite.

I certainly appreciate the idea that is put forward here and certainly that was spoken of by the Member for Lethbridge-East, of wanting to express more about Alberta's unique identity. Certainly, ammolite, in being a multicoloured gemstone, I think, recognizes what is true about Alberta identity, that there is no one singular Alberta identity, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, all of us as Albertans share many qualities in common, certainly we share some unique history, certainly we share some common experience, but I think we recognize that there is a vast diversity of background in Alberta, a vast diversity of heritage, indeed a vast diversity of opinion and political perspective as well.

At times, Mr. Speaker, I think we can get a bit fixated on particular ideas of what it means to be Albertan or what an Albertan looks like, and I appreciate that in this bill we do not have that, that what we have being brought forward here is indeed an emblem, I think, that can be enjoyed by all Albertans. It can be considered representative of all of us as Albertans and indeed, as I said, in its multicoloured facets reflects that reality that there are many, many perspectives on what it means to be Albertan and to represent our provincial values.

I appreciate the minister bringing this forward and giving us the opportunity to support this. I look forward to many more opportunities to discuss those values, that wide range of diverse values that indeed Albertans hold, and how we each as representatives in this House can represent those values, the voices of our constituents, and indeed the diversity of our province.

I thank the Minister of Culture for bringing this forward.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I hesitate to interrupt; however, pursuant to Standing Order 4 the House stands adjourned until this evening at 7:30 p.m.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Tuesday, March 29, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Government Motions

Federal Carbon Tax Increase

18. Mr. Kenney moved on behalf of Mr. Jason Nixon:
Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly call on the government of Canada to stop its planned April 1, 2022, increase of the carbon tax to $50 per tonne and its further plan to increase the carbon tax to $170 per tonne given that Canadian families are struggling with the highest inflation in 30 years.

[Adjourned debate: Mr. Getson]

The Speaker: Hon. members, before the Assembly this evening, Government Motion 18. Are there others wishing to speak? I'm not sure. Is the Member for Grande Prairie rising to speak or standing for other reasons?

Mrs. Allard: Wishing to speak.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm not sure for what other reason I would rise, but I appreciate the opportunity to speak this evening. I'll keep my comments brief. I'm sure there are many that want to speak to this motion this evening.

I think it's pretty obvious, given the context that we're living in, the circumstance that we're living in, that this doesn't make any sense, this additional carbon tax at this time in history. I would say that if I spoke on the statistics and the data coming out of my constituency – and I'm pretty sure it would be similar if we polled all 87 representatives here in the Chamber – the emerging issue right now is cost of living. We hear it every day in our constituencies. We hear it every day in question period. It's not new information to anyone in politics, and it's certainly not new information to any of the constituents who are living with and facing those increased costs. So I find it mystifying why the federal government would choose this time in history to pile on more additional cost to Canadians and to Albertans.

I'm in my 50s, Mr. Speaker. This is the worst inflation that I recall seeing. Certainly, Statistics Canada tells us it's the worst inflation in over three decades. At the same time we hear the NDP, particularly in question period, talk to us about: "What are we doing to help Albertans? You know, what are we doing to assist them with the challenges of the inflationary pressures that we are experiencing in our province?" Yet it's my understanding that they're supporting the federal carbon tax initiative and their allies in Justin Trudeau and his government. It's mystifying. I don't understand it. My constituents don't understand it. It doesn't make any sense, and I don't think it serves to make life better or, actually, to achieve the climate goals.

You know, we talk about climate change – and I believe it's an important issue that we do need to talk about – but from my perspective I see that it's clearly a global problem, and it can't be fixed by a local solution. Even if all of Canada changed dramatically, we would make a dent, barely, in the overall impact of climate change. We're responsible in so many other ways.

Alberta, for example, has the most ethically sourced and responsibly produced oil in the world – in the world, Mr. Speaker – so what would serve better than to have more production here in Alberta? If we're not producing it here, they're going to be producing it somewhere.

As the world demand for fossil fuels increases – we know that that's happening right now, particularly coming out of the pandemic – we know that there are pressures from developing countries, that there are pressures from fiscal stimulus dollars looking to build more infrastructure than would typically be occurring, and as that happens, there's a rise in demand for fossil fuels. They go hand in hand. At this time in history we choose, then, to tax that further? It makes no sense. I believe that we have a responsibility in this House to stand up for the people of our province, to stand up for those men and women working in this industry, and, by extension, to stand up for our country, Mr. Speaker.

I pulled some statistics today. Canada only creates 1.6 per cent of the world's CO₂ emissions presently. I really believe it's a mistake to impose significant economic costs for a trivial impact. Even if we got rid of all the CO₂ emissions, the effect it would have on climate change is less than two-tenths of a degree in terms of the warming effect. I don't want to trivialize it, but, Mr. Speaker, there have got to be more effective mechanisms and levers to pull than this, particularly at this time.

I found it interesting as I was reading about the Paris accord today. Under the Paris accord Canada's current emissions target is to reduce our emissions to 30 per cent lower than 2005 emissions levels – 2005, Mr. Speaker; that's 17 years ago – and we're supposed to do this by 2030. According to climate action tracker progress reports it is projected that in 2030 we will be emitting approximately 250 megatonnes of CO₂ when in 2005 there were approximately 240 megatonnes. Mr. Speaker, although I'm sure everyone can do the math, this would mean that we have less than eight years to reduce our emissions to lower than they were 17 years ago. It just does not make sense. It's not realistic, and I think we need common-sense vetting in our policies. I'm calling on the Prime Minister and his cabinet, and I'm calling on his partner, Mr. Singh, you know, the de facto Deputy Prime Minister. I'm calling on them to think this through and to do what's right by Canadians and certainly by Albertans.

I also just wanted to talk for a minute about this. You know, I live in the north of the province – I'm from Grande Prairie – and I think about the impact that has on families. We're taxing families to heat their homes. We hear every day the complaints about the cost of utilities – and that is an issue; there's no question – but now we're going to support increasing the cost to heat your home? It makes no sense. It will have a disproportionate impact on those at the margin. I realize that there may be a rebate for the lowest income, but somebody is at the margin of the policy. Somebody will be caught where they make just enough money that they bear the full impact of the carbon tax, thereby reducing their income, their living income. I just don't understand the thought process.

I think that it's crazy at this time in history to consider adding a carbon tax. You know, we're heading into a period of growth, but we have to be careful. We could head into a period of stagflation and create ourselves a whole other level of chaos than we've seen so far. And Albertans are tired, Mr. Speaker. They're tired of all the years of loss. They're tired of all the years of setbacks. Finally, we're in a period of growth thanks to policies of this government, thanks to a Finance minister who brought in a balanced budget against all odds, thanks to investment attraction practices, thanks to Alberta's robust recovery plan. We're seeing hope for the first time in over seven years. Hope. And then the federal government is going to dash that hope with a carbon tax? I am happy to rise this evening to speak against this. I'm happy to support Motion 18, and I'm happy to call on Justin Trudeau and his NDP partners to think twice and to cancel their plans to jack up the carbon tax.

With that, I will cede my time. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Also my pleasure to be able to rise tonight in favour of Government Motion 18. I know full well, from filling my own gas tank and buying groceries this weekend, that prices are exceptionally high, and it's that way for all Albertans right now. Families are unfortunately having to make the decision whether to pay their utility bills or go to the store and get groceries, and in just a few days the federal Liberal-NDP coalition government will make it even harder for these very same Canadians and for all Albertans by increasing the carbon tax to $50 per tonne. As a Legislature we cannot let this happen.

Albertans are already facing the highest inflation we've seen in over 30 years, and just two weeks ago the consumer price index reported the rise in costs between 2021 and 2022. Here in Alberta every single category has seen an increase. Energy: 31.3 per cent compared to last year. Food went up 6.2 per cent over the same time last year. Mr. Speaker, on a year-over-year basis Albertans were paying 5.5 per cent more in February '22 than they did in the same month in 2021 according to the consumer price index. The national average was up 5.7 per cent. If this federal government and their NDP allies want to make life easier for everyone, stopping this carbon tax increase is the most logical and common-sense solution this week.

Right now this federal government is out of touch and disconnected with everyday Canadians, and they need to hear their cries for help. Unfortunately, the reality is that this trust-fund Prime Minister just doesn't get what everyday Albertans are going through right now: choosing to pay one bill or the other, deciding where to fill up their tanks to get to work, or to buy food for their family. Gas prices are already extremely high with the cost of energy across the country, and now a rise in the carbon tax would simply mean less money in the pockets of Albertans.

The Premier told Albertans yesterday that this increase would mean that someone driving a small, little Honda Civic will end up paying around $70 just to fill their tank, and that's only if our gas prices stay relatively level. This carbon tax increase is something many Albertans can't and should not have to bear. And it's not like it's only going to happen one time, Mr. Speaker. No. This is only the beginning of carbon tax increases. We know that every single year until 2030 Albertans will see increases in the cost of everything: on their food, their gas, utilities, clothing, furniture. You name it, and it will cost more.

With this first increase coming in just a few days, Albertans can expect to pay about $600 more a year, either directly or indirectly, as a result. By 2030 that number jumps to $2,000. Two thousand dollars. As we work to recover on every level from the COVID-19 pandemic, now is simply not the time to be putting even more stress on the hard-working people of this province. We need to be doing all we can to support them, like this government's commitment to cut the cost of utilities through a $150 gas rebate or removing Alberta's tax on gasoline. They are small support measures, but they're needed to combat the rising costs that we are going to see through this unnecessary carbon tax increase.

Mr. Speaker, you do not raise taxes during inflationary times. To quote my good friend and ally the Minister of Finance: in times of high inflation you spend less, borrow less, and tax less. That's good advice for Mr. Trudeau. Albertans need the support from this government and all members of the Legislature to make their lives more affordable as we see the highest inflation rates in recent years.

Mr. Speaker, it's not just families who will feel the impact of the carbon tax. Businesses will also be adversely affected as they see the cost of operations rise. In my riding of Livingstone-Macleod, where agriculture is one of the main businesses, our farmers and the ag sector as a whole will also bear exceptional burdens when dealing with the rising costs. With carbon tax increases, those industries will be forced to pay more to grow the crops that feed us. The expenses for fertilizer, for equipment, for seed, for maintenance will all increase. The cost of harvesting in the fall will also increase.

Unfortunately, the reality is that the imposition of this carbon tax is driving things like the production of fertilizer south of the border at a time when we should be looking to increase production right here at home in Alberta. The carbon tax increase introduced by the federal government is not one that should be supported as it makes life more expensive for all Albertans.

I encourage members of the opposition NDP to stand up to their friend and ally Justin Trudeau and, instead, to stand with Albertans, Albertans who are calling on the federal Liberals and the NDP to stop picking their pockets and leave more money for them to spend on the essentials of life. The message to Ottawa is simple, Mr. Speaker: stop the federal carbon tax.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others on Government Motion 18? The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville, followed by the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to speak in favour of Motion 18, which reads:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly [of Alberta] call on the government of Canada to stop its planned April 1, 2022, increase of the carbon tax to $50 per tonne and its further plan to increase the carbon tax to $170 per tonne given that Canadian families are struggling with the highest inflation in 30 years.

Mr. Speaker, families here in Alberta are already struggling to make ends meet due to the rising cost of inflation, yet the Liberal-NDP alliance is set to increase the carbon tax yet again on April 1, 2022. Unfortunately, this is not a bad April Fool's Day prank. This is very real and will make life even more expensive for every single Albertan.

Over the past few years we have seen the economic impact that the policies of the Liberal-NDP alliance have had on Albertans. They have already made life exponentially more expensive on Alberta families. Gas costs more, groceries cost more, and homes cost more. Nearly everything we buy costs more than it did a short time ago. This has left many Alberta families grappling with how to pay the bills. I think we can all agree, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the time for the Liberal-NDP idealism. This is a time to look at ways to make life more affordable for Albertans, not more expensive.

We know that the recently announced Liberal-NDP alliance is bad news for Alberta. It will cost the country billions in new programs, will contribute to further inflation, and will make it even more difficult on our energy sector to get our products to market, all this at a time when the world needs more Canadian energy to displace dictator oil from countries like Russia. What's more, Mr. Speaker, is that the inflationary policies of the Liberal-NDP coalition will continue to drive up the cost of living. Policies of reckless spending, money printing, and driving up energy costs by tripling the carbon tax will hit Albertans hard.

Our government has continually fought against the federal government's intrusion into areas of provincial jurisdiction, and we will continue to do so. We have long maintained that the provinces have a better understanding of local circumstances and should maintain jurisdiction over climate change policy development. We challenged the federal government's carbon tax all the way to the Supreme Court to assert that the provinces should retain their jurisdictional authority to do what they are placed best to do, work with the taxpayers and industries to create a better future.

When our government was first elected in 2019, we brought forth legislation that eliminated the provincial carbon tax imposed by the previous NDP government. In response to this, Justin Trudeau imposed his federal carbon tax on our province, a carbon tax that is set to make life more expensive for Albertans every year on April 1. This annual $15-a-tonne increase will bring the carbon tax to $50 a tonne in 2022 and $170 a tonne in 2030. To combat the impact of rising energy costs on Albertans, our government has announced that it will remove the provincial excise tax of 13 cents per litre on transportation fuel starting April 1 as well.

Furthermore, in Budget 2022 we announced consumer protection support through an energy rebate program that will begin in October 2022 to help Albertans manage natural gas prices. Our government will provide a $150 retroactive rebate to help Albertans cover the high cost that many families and businesses paid over the last three months. Alberta's government is working with utilities and regulators to determine the exact details, including rebate timing and distribution approach. Consumers who use less than 2,500 gigajoules annually will be eligible, which includes most households, small apartment buildings, farms, and small industrial commercial operations. The energy affordability program will run until March 31, 2023, and the rebate will be triggered if the company's regulated rate is above $6.50 a gigajoule.

Mr. Speaker, we hope that the opposition support our motion and stand with Albertans, but as often is the case, they will likely support their friend and ally Justin Trudeau. We know that the NDP isn't interested in making life more affordable for working families. They are only interested in pursuing their far-left ideology, which neglects the needs of everyday people. Make no mistake; the opposition supports carbon taxes, and they support the NDP-Trudeau alliance. I am proud that our UCP government is working hard to support working families here in Alberta and that we will continue to do so.

I will be voting in favour of Government Motion 18 and would encourage all members of this House to join me in standing up for Albertans against yet another tax increase. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon is next.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a privilege always to stand up and speak in the House and tonight to address Government Motion 18.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly call on the government of Canada to stop its planned April 1, 2022, increase of the carbon tax to $50 per tonne and its further plan to increase the carbon tax to $170 per tonne given that Canadian families are struggling with the highest inflation in 30 years.

Mr. Speaker, we've heard a lot about how this carbon tax is going to kill jobs and how the Trudeau government is doing something that is really counterproductive when it comes to addressing the whole issue of carbon. I guess I want to focus my remarks tonight on an issue that really just is rock – it's foundational. Either we can tax to try and get rid of carbon production and kill jobs and lower people's standards of living and increase inflation and make it harder on Albertans and Canadians in general, or we can create wealth and still attain our carbon goals. If I have a choice between which path I would rather walk down, it would be to create jobs, to create wealth, to address the carbon issues, and, in the process, make Canadians and Albertans have the capacity to be able to take care of their families and to move forward and to create a prosperous nation and province.

You might ask: well, what can we do to do that? How do we create jobs? How do we deal with carbon while creating jobs? It's been my privilege as a Member of the Legislative Assembly to meet with a wide range of people and a wide range of businesses, and I'm going to present just four – four – of the suggestions that I would bring to the Liberal government for how we can create wealth while at the same time reducing carbon rather than having a carbon tax.

For instance, I believe that one of the areas that we should be looking at in this province and in this country is geothermal energy, and I believe that there's a company in Calgary by the name of Eavor that has cracked the nut. They have the capacity to drill down. You can take two abandoned wells. You can drill down 3.5 kilometres into the surface of the Earth in Alberta. You will hit temperatures of somewhere around 100 to 110 degrees Celsius. You then drill laterally two wells five kilometres apart. You're drilling laterally until those drills come together in the middle, and you create a latticework under the ground like a big radiator, and the water goes down, heats up. Warm water wants to rise, comes to the surface. You harvest the heat. You put the water back down. Because it's cold, it goes down, goes through a second set of laterals, goes back up, harvest the heat, goes back down, goes through the first set of laterals, back up, and you've created what we call a geothermal loop. This technology, created in Alberta, has the capacity to generate electricity, and there is literally no carbon being produced.

They are presently drilling the world's deepest well. It's going to go down 7.5 kilometres into the bedrock, and it is going to allow us to get the heat that we need to be able to produce electricity at a price point that's going to be competitive with natural gas. Ladies and gentlemen, we have the capacity to generate electricity with geothermal energy that is going to eliminate the carbon and, at the same time, produce jobs. In one of the proposals that they have brought to the federal and provincial governments, they would have created 22,000 jobs in the drilling industry over a period of five years – 22,000 jobs – drilling wells, dealing with abandoned and orphaned wells: creating jobs, creating wealth, creating electricity, and reducing carbon at the same time.

I would suggest that we could look at Tidewater Midstream in my constituency, that has received money from the Alberta government – I believe it was something like $20 million or $25 million – in order to create a hydrogen project at the Brazeau River plant, and as a part of that they will be using carbon capture to be able to deal with the carbon that they produce as they are making their hydrogen.

At the same time I've introduced them to another company in my constituency, and this company and Tidewater Midstream are starting to have conversations about matching a vertical greenhouse to Tidewater Midstream where they will take carbon. Rather than pumping it down into the ground through carbon capture, they will be able to use the carbon dioxide to help the growing of strawberries through a vertical farm operation, a neat little idea that is also used to create jobs. I believe that in this project there would be something like about 25 jobs that are created while at the same time taking carbon out of circulation or at least putting it into strawberries, not talking about the amount of carbon that's going to be pulled away because we're no longer having to transport all the way from the southern United States to get those strawberries up into Alberta.

Industrial hemp. We've been working for a while trying to create an industrial hemp industry, and I will give the opposition its due. I can remember having a conversation with a former minister of the environment who gave me a suggestion that if we were going to create an industrial hemp industry, perhaps we needed to speak a little greater than just out of Drayton Valley. So we created the Alberta Hemp Alliance from her suggestions, and I can say that the Alberta Hemp Alliance has grown to be the provincial advocacy for the industrial hemp industry in Alberta and that they've been working hard at growing and enticing businesses to come into Alberta in order to be able to create an industrial hemp industry.

One of the things that I learned very early on was that when you grow a field of hemp, industrial hemp takes five times the amount of carbon out of the air in one year than a traditional North American forest does in 20 years. It's a huge carbon sink.

Presently we grow about 40,000 acres of industrial hemp in the province of Alberta, and I know that I have been working with a couple of companies over the last little while, trying to encourage them to come into Alberta. It looks like they're going to. It looks like they're going to be spending about $150 million in the next two years building a seed-processing plant and providing more decortication facilities for the province of Alberta. Their plans: they want to see at least a half a million acres of industrial hemp in Alberta.

They are going to be taking the hurd from that industrial hemp, and they're going to be creating little pellets, and those pellets are going to be sent down to Indiana, where they're going to be used by one of the major international car companies to produce plastic. They want to have completely renewable industrial plastic for every one of their vehicles by 2030. They're going to be creating 50 jobs potentially in one of the constituencies in this province, that shall remain nameless for now, and will be taking huge amounts of carbon out of the air for every acre that we increase. They are now presently having conversations with some of the major farms, the larger farms, in the province.

By the way, this has the potential to be the highest paying crop in Alberta because they will be paid for the seed, they'll be paid for the long fibre, and they'll be paid for the hurd, the inner-side, woody part of the fibre of this plant. It's going to be creating jobs for Albertans, it's going to be diversifying the economy, it's going to be taking carbon out of the cycle, and it's going to be good. We have the capacity to deal with the carbon issue, not by taxing Albertans and by making people poor but by growing and creating wealth and addressing the carbon issue through the technology that we have.

Finally, another example would be Cream Energy in my constituency, that has produced a solar-powered process for addressing methane leakage in wells. They believe that they could reduce the methane leakage in Alberta by a third – a third – through this process. That will actually save the company's money and make them more productive.

So when I speak to Motion 18 tonight, I speak from a position that rather than creating misery and heartache for families in Alberta and across this country by taxing and taking away their wealth and trying to force them into a pathway that may reduce carbon but is not going to be productive to their financial wealth and their health and their family life, let us look for those kinds of situations where we can create wealth, where we can use technology, where we can reduce the carbon. We can produce a strong, powerful, healthy, diversified Alberta economy, create the wealth, and deal with the carbon. That would be my plea to the federal government rather than looking at a tired, old carbon tax.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Government Motion 18.

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to speak in support of Government Motion 18. It's no secret that Albertans have had several hard years. Just as things are starting to look better, we get hit with massive inflation. Despite what the federal government would have you believe, inflation is present in just about every aspect of Albertans' everyday lives, and it's the highest it has been in 30 years.

One part of the pocketbook hit hardest by inflation is the price of groceries. Let's use meat as an example based on Stats Canada information. Currently grocery prices are one of the highest drivers of inflation and the cost of living in Alberta. To put that into perspective, back in 2007 10 pounds of potatoes was about $4. Now we pay $10. If we adjust for inflation, the current cost should actually be about $5.50.

Of course, we all know that gas prices right now have skyrocketed. Today the cost of regular gas in Alberta is about $1.66. In 2007 gas was 97 cents a litre, which means that when we adjust for inflation, the current gas price should be $1.33.

Why am I bringing this up now, Mr. Speaker? Well, because the federal Liberal government is introducing a carbon tax increase that is set to take effect on April 1, this Friday, coincidentally also known as April Fool's Day. They're planning to increase the tax to $50 per tonne. They have plans for it to reach $170 per tonne in the near future. Only a week into the Liberal-NDP alliance and already Albertans – no, all Canadians – are suffering. The government's role is to look out for the people's best interest, not insert itself and its misinformed and misplaced ideology where it doesn't belong. When people are struggling to make ends meet and pay their bills, the Liberals and the NDP have no business pushing Canadians further down to make their political agenda come true.

You know, Mr. Speaker, in some areas of the world I've heard that the most destructive animal is the hippo. In Canada it turns out that the most destructive thing to our economy and everyday life is a hypocrite. What really gets me is the hypocrisy of the current Prime Minister. Do you think that while the rest of us Canadians are working hard and paying the cost of this carbon tax, the Prime Minister is doing the same? I mean, I'm sure that he will personally be paying the carbon tax out of his pocket on his next trip to the west coast to surf.

The hypocrisy of the federal Liberals doesn't end there. Just yesterday the federal government announced that they'll be purchasing 88 F-35s from Lockheed Martin. This comes only seven years after the Liberals vowed never to replace Canada's fighter jet fleet with the F-35, essentially throwing out all the hard work the former Prime Minister had done. [interjection] That's right. Back in 2015 Mr. Trudeau got up in front of Canadians and criticized the Conservative federal government for not justifying or explaining why Canada needed new fighter jets, and now they're making the very same purchase they were losing their heads over seven years ago. Given their crusade on anything with any emissions, I can only imagine that these new fighter jets are the electric version, Mr. Speaker.

I'm only bringing this up to point out the deep-seated two-facedness that seems to be at the core of the NDP and the Liberals. Albertans have every right to be upset since this federal government has decided to betray them once again. Mr. Speaker, the good news is that on this side of the aisle we care about Albertans, which is why we continue to stand against the federal carbon tax being imposed on everyday working Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, rising household expenses are a pressing concern for everyone. In fact, a recent survey shows that more than half of Canadians cannot keep up with their bills. This goes for all bills. Albertans are feeling the pinch, with higher grocery bills and gas prices. I fail to see in what world an increased carbon tax is beneficial to Canadians.

We need to get something straight: there's no proof the carbon tax works for what they say they're trying to accomplish. The reality is that this is a fee imposed on everyday people and companies that is supposed to work as a pollution tax. The tax increases gasoline and electricity costs, therefore giving consumers a reason to switch to clean energy, apparently. The reason the goal is to set the tax at $170 is because they believe that this will change consumer behaviour.

Unfortunately, the rising fuel costs also drive up the cost of everything else. For example, the cost of freight has skyrocketed from higher fuel costs. According to the International Monetary Fund researchers shipping costs are an important driver of inflation around the world, with the average cost of shipping a container on the world's transoceanic routes increasing sevenfold since March 2020.

When we took office in 2019, one of our first actions was to repeal the provincial carbon tax. At that time we gave gas stations and other fuel resellers 30 days to apply for a refund of the carbon tax paid when they purchased that fuel. Albertan fuel users had until the end of 2019 to apply for rebates regarding fuel use for an exempt purchase in 2017. We also removed the spending restrictions on existing carbon tax revenue, made sure the carbon tax was not charged on sales after it was repealed. We didn't do any of this because our government is working against the environment, like the NDP claims. We did so because there was no hard evidence that showed the carbon tax helped the environment in any way, shape, or form. You know what does help the environment? Clean energy. We've been working tirelessly to introduce clean and renewable energy in Alberta and make our energy processes greener.

Mr. Speaker, we are dedicated to protecting the environment, and we want to give Canadian companies a chance to spend the dollars that would go towards the carbon tax on technology that actually helps reduce their emissions. That's why many of those companies have set upstream emission targets and are working towards a net zero future.

Unfortunately, the same cannot be said about the carbon taxing process, which, frankly, is backwards. The current plan places tax on domestic production. It makes no sense to tax Alberta oil exports while importing foreign oil without the same tax implications, Mr. Speaker. All we are doing is impeding the competitiveness and the progression of Canadian businesses.

Mr. Speaker, we need to continue to move forward in a way that Alberta is accustomed to, which is leading the globe in emissions reduction and environmental standards. That's what would serve Canada's interests, protect the environment, and pressure imports from dictatorial regimes with zero regard for climate change or the environment. There are ways to support people, strengthen the economy, and help the environment. If there's one thing we know for sure, it is that the carbon tax is not the way.

The federal carbon tax is not about helping the environment. It is about taking away jobs in our country and creating more avenues for foreign dictators who are friends with the Prime Minister and his allies. During times of high inflation I struggle to see why the federal government is adding insult to injury. Although we all know that historically the NDP has never been interested in making life more affordable for working families, I hope they come to their senses and support our motion and stand with all Albertans against this federal imposition.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: On Government Motion 18 the hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today in support of Government Motion 18 and to talk about the harm the Liberal government continues to deal onto everyday families and individuals. We need to work together to get through to this newly formed federal NDP-Liberal alliance and to their supporters, who sit just across the aisle from us. From urban areas to rural areas everyone has felt the effect of the Trudeau carbon tax. This tax influences gas prices, grocery prices, increased utility prices, and the list goes on and on.

In the rural areas they have been forced to essentially stay home and not go out or drive over to a neighbour's. Every choice they make has a cost, especially now as these gas prices continue to rise. Just once I would like to see support from the members opposite to help fight the true cause of the rising cost of living, but they continue to support the Liberal agenda. Farmers have had to already deal with their profit margins shrinking from the first implementations of the carbon tax. Now, due to global events, they have been faced with skyrocketing fertilizer in recent weeks, just destroying their profit margins. Now the Liberal government continues to ignore them and has chosen to make their lives even more costly.

Even the parliamentary budget office seems to contradict the Prime Minister. In the report made by the PBO, it concluded that most households in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Ontario will see a net loss from the carbon tax by 2030. By then they plan to have it increased to a staggering $170 a tonne. Carbon taxes don't punish or deter the bigger companies from reducing their carbon footprints; they instead continue to show that they pass the costs on to consumers, which is not right.

The Liberal government has done nothing to stop these costs from being put onto everyday people. There is no reason why any family should have to choose to heat their home through minus 40 degree weather over the payment of other bills just because of the additional costs put on them. Farmers shouldn't have to deal with the uncontrollable cost to feed their livestock, fuel their equipment, and dry their grain. The carbon tax has done enough damage already. We need to find a more effective way to deal with emissions that doesn't pass the costs on to everyday consumers and producers. Even now we are seeing companies taking their own initiative to come up with cleaner ways to harvest resources and create renewable energy.

There are power plants reducing their carbon footprint by switching to natural gas. We see new, innovative systems that capture carbon more effectively. We are seeing all these exciting new things happen throughout our province, all in an effort to reduce carbon emissions. These efforts don't put those costs onto Albertans. No, these companies have made the changes and inventions with no government intervention.

The Liberal-NDP alliance must end for the sake of all Albertans. We hear the same thing every day from members opposite, day after day, that they are concerned about the rising costs to everyday Albertans. But instead of challenging the Liberal government when they are responsible for the aggressive rise in costs from their anti-Alberta policies, they instead misrepresent the facts in senseless attacks on our government. If they truly care, they would fight right alongside with us.

I encourage all members here today to vote with me in sending a strong message to the Liberal government. No longer can they cater to their trust-fund and island-owning friends. The needs of Albertan and Canadian families must come first and the needs of the rich be put on the back burner. This reckless and damaging behaviour to every Canadian needs to stop, and it needs to stop today.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is an honour to rise this evening and speak on Motion 18. I will tell you that I have heard the cries of many of my constituents regarding the increase in the carbon tax and just general intrusion into provincial jurisdiction, and those cries are not falling on deaf ears. I am very frustrated that I have heard very little, if anything, from members opposite. It sounds to me like they're deeply entrenched in the new alliance with the Prime Minister, Justin Trudeau. Mind you, I'd be upset, too, if my dad got remarried and didn't tell me either. What can I say? The reality is that the NDs across the way – I can certainly assume that they are not going to be voting in favour of this motion, predominantly because, well, they're going to do what their new daddy says.

Canadians are dreading, though, what is coming on April 1, Mr. Speaker, which is the day that Justin Trudeau, the new leader of the members opposite, and his coalition with the NDP will take it upon themselves to raise the carbon tax, punishing families for heating their homes and driving themselves to work. It's shocking – shocking – that they would think that this is the right time to do that. It's just utterly tone deaf. The Prime Minister has abandoned his integrity by ignoring the desperate calls of Canadians, and this is the reality we face.

The former NDP government in Alberta worked together with Justin Trudeau and his Liberals to instigate a tax on Albertans, attempting to convince them that it would be a good thing for the province. As usual, they couldn't have been more wrong. Mr. Speaker, the NDP's job-killing carbon tax in Alberta was responsible for record-high unemployment as well as billions of investment dollars leaving our province faster than the Member for Edmonton-South could delete his hard drive.

I hate to say it, but things could actually be worse. Everyday Albertans count their lucky stars that the NDP is not in government as we face the highest rate of inflation in 30 years. During the NDP's one-and-done government Albertans realized that taxing families on the use of natural gas and electricity will not decrease emissions. Let me restate that: taxing families for heating their homes will not make the weather outside warmer, okay? So why would they place a financial burden on the shoulders of Canadians and Albertans when they're already struggling with the cost of living?

We continue to see Justin Trudeau's leadership fail as he divides the country. The way that he spoke to Canadians regarding the COVID-19 pandemic was proof that he has no interest in healing our country following such tough years. With a clear political agenda Justin Trudeau is acting mercilessly and has committed to raising the carbon tax by the end of the week. Our government was elected by over a million Albertans with a mandate to fight against Ottawa for a fair deal. Albertans are not interested in funding Justin Trudeau's theatrical politics with a made-up carbon tax to fight climate change. This isn't a realistic approach, nor is it a fair approach for families who are struggling to pay their bills every month.

As of right now Canadians can expect to pay even more for heating their homes starting April 1. They can expect to pay more for filling their cars with fuel to take their kids to school and to drive themselves to work. Families can expect to pay more for groceries, even higher than what they already pay today. Mr. Speaker, this is no small issue.

The NDP seems happy to ignore it, and I can't blame them, considering they are just as responsible for welcoming this carbon tax into Alberta as the Prime Minister himself. I would like to think that members opposite have enough common sense within their caucus to put aside the theatrics and work with our government in standing up to Ottawa, but of course I won't hold my breath given their thriving relationship with Justin Trudeau. Now, I guess they realize that, just like with daddy, if you make daddy upset, he won't let you borrow the car, so why would they make daddy upset today by going after him and his new carbon tax? Our government will continue to stand against this tax burden on behalf of Alberta families with or without the help of the members opposite. I'm certainly not going to hold my breath to hear one of them stand up today and speak against this.

Justin Trudeau has committed to raising the cost of the carbon tax every year until it reaches an astounding $170 per tonne of CO₂, which is more than four times what Canadians are paying right now. Through you, Mr. Speaker, to the members in this Chamber: I want you to know that I will continue to stand in this Chamber until I am blue in the face and speak on this because that's what Albertans elected me to do. That's what Albertans elected every single member in this Chamber to do. I would hope that members would share the outrage that I have for the federal government. And to members in this Chamber, through you to them, that share that outrage: let me get a hear, hear. No hear, hear?

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Schow: There we go. The outrage, Mr. Speaker, is there.

The reality, Mr. Speaker, is that for the past couple of months we have watched the cost of utilities and fuel skyrocket to record-high prices, costing the average Albertan significantly more each month, and I think Albertans would be interested to know that it was not any policy change of the UCP that caused this inflation. To put it simply, the rise in costs has been caused by the reckless spending of the previous NDP government – shocker – combined with the ridiculous carbon tax made by Justin Trudeau.

On that, for example, Mr. Speaker, I have many constituents who are concerned about utility costs, and they ask me what is going on. The answer is simple. The members opposite overbuilt the grid by $7 billion, saddling them with debt for years to come. I find it interesting that in question period they lob insults across the aisle, suggesting that we're doing nothing to fix the problem that they created. Shame on the members opposite.

Mr. Speaker, it's astounding to have the nerve to come into this Chamber and suggest that we're not doing anything to try to fix a problem that they created, when in reality we have taken a reasonable approach, offering a $150 rebate for the vast majority of Albertans to help balance out the cost of utilities. Now, the members opposite love to suggest that it's only $50. It's $50 a month for three months, which, for those whom math is hard, is $150 over three months. That's the total. Get out your calculators. In addition to that, though, the Premier has committed to removing 13 cents per litre from the provincial fuel tax at the pumps. That is a real, measurable difference for Albertans who need to fill up their vehicles, who can't walk or take the bus.

And I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that constituents in Cardston-Siksika don't have that luxury. Oftentimes many of them have to go into town – and by town I mean Lethbridge – to get groceries, to go to work, to take kids to hockey practice or swimming or whatever they need to do. There's no bus for that. The members opposite should be ashamed that they didn't speak up when their leader said that, insinuated that Albertans could walk or take the bus. How ridiculous is that?

Nearly 2 million homes will benefit from the electricity rebate. Here's the best news of all: Albertans don't even need to apply. Albertans don't need to apply, Mr. Speaker. The rebate credit will be automatically added to nearly 2 million utility bills across Alberta. I'm proud of the approach our government has taken in responding to this crisis. I can't say I'm surprised, but I am quite disappointed in the Prime Minister and his refusal to offer Canadians the relief they need, putting a halt to his ridiculous plan to increase the carbon tax at the end of the week.

With that said, I would encourage members of this Assembly, all members, to think about the message they are sending should they vote against this motion. I don't anticipate or try to predict the outcome of a vote, but I don't expect any members on the government side to be voting against this. My optimism is not quite so high for members opposite. They stand up in question period with no limits on their frustration for the high costs we are facing now, and I hope that they will think with some reasonableness about how this carbon tax hike is going to further hurt the same Albertans they claim to represent.

So, Mr. Speaker, in closing, I will simply say and encourage all members of this Chamber to vote in favour of Motion 18, to stand up to Justin Trudeau and his Liberal government as Albertans are facing an increase in the carbon tax on April 1, something that could not be – well, I guess it could be worse. But something I wish the Prime Minister would take into consideration, the realities that everyday Albertans and Canadians, for that matter, are facing, and that is increased costs of living, cost of food, cost to drive your vehicle. How does this make life better? How does this make life better for Canadians and for Albertans? The reality is that it doesn't, so we call upon the Prime Minister to forgo his increase in the carbon tax, and I call on the members opposite to support Motion 18.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 6

Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, 2022

[Debate adjourned: Mr. Shepherd speaking]

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West on second reading of Bill 6.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words in regard to Bill 6, Alberta's emblems. I was very pleased to see that there was going to be a change in regard to the official mineral of Alberta, and I think that the choice of ammolite is very appropriate considering its value, its great beauty, and its important cultural significance for First Nations people in southern Alberta in particular. It's interesting to see that this mineral is in fact quite widely dispersed around the world, but the particular iridescent form of it that we can find in southern Alberta is quite rare, and certainly either polished or made into different sorts of jewellery, it has a very fine sort of opal-like iridescence, which I think is very, very popular.

I know that even quite a few years ago, when I was in Thailand, I saw ammolite in the shops and in jewellery stores in the capital, and there was, with an acquaintance of mine, a discussion about exporting this gemstone to Southeast Asia because people just found it so distinctive and unique.

Based on its value, both financial and cultural value, I believe this is an appropriate choice for the official gemstone for Alberta, and certainly I think that it is a tribute to the Blackfoot people of southern Alberta as well.

With that, I again reaffirm our support of this bill and of this choice, and I welcome further discussion. Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call on the minister. The hon. Minister of Culture to close debate.

Mr. Orr: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to conclude debate on second reading of Bill 6, the Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, 2022. As you know, ammolite is an important part of our heritage, our economy, our geology, in fact, our culture as well. Recognizing ammolite as Alberta's official gemstone reflects the unique nature of the stone and, quite frankly, of our province as well.

It helps fulfill recommendation 25 of the Fair Deal Panel, because, Mr. Speaker, Alberta's identity is unique and precious, as is the stone. It's made special by our land, our mountains, our plains, our badlands, our natural resources, and also our human history, our culture, our economy, our spirit of resilience, and our people and their diversity. It's all these things and more combined that create an amazing whole that is a particular Alberta identity, unique in Canada.

One of these unique parts is the organic gemstone ammolite. I'm actually wearing a pin made of it right now, Mr. Speaker. This gem is very special and unique, just like our province. Each cut of the gemstone is different. On the pin I'm wearing, it has a beautiful hue of yellow at the bottom, that, to me, represents the southern Alberta drylands. Then farther up it has a sparkling green, that symbolizes our province's parklands. Then a bit further up, the green becomes more deeply luminescent and reminds me of our boreal forests. Then it turns to an incredible blue colour, that represents Alberta's many lakes and rivers. Each stone has a story to tell, just like each Albertan has a story to tell, a unique story.

Mr. Speaker, gem-quality ammolite can be found almost exclusively in southern Alberta. It comes from the fossilized shells of molluscs known as ammonites, that lived in the inland Bearpaw Sea in what is now southern Alberta, which is why it's found almost exclusively there. The tribes of the Blackfoot Confederacy have collected ammonite shells for millennia and continue to collect them today. They consider some ammonite shell segments sacred, and they symbolize the good fortune needed to provide for the tribe's prosperity and survival.

Ammolite is also part of Alberta's economy, mined and used in jewellery for more than a century.

Mr. Speaker, currently there is no official gemstone of Alberta recognized in the Emblems of Alberta Act. If Bill 6 is passed, that will change. It will officially make ammolite an emblem of Alberta. Ammolite will join the ranks of our province's other 11 emblems, including the coat of arms, the flag, the tartan, and others. This is one more way that our government is affirming Alberta's cultural uniqueness, the specialness of our province. Even though this is a symbolic gesture, it has great importance.

Before I wrap up, I just want to recognize Blaine Hyggen, the mayor of Lethbridge, and the city of Lethbridge. The city has proudly called ammolite its official gemstone since 2007. We are excited to also embrace the history, the beauty of this rare and unique gemstone. It is a gem as stunning as our province, and I encourage all members of the House to support Bill 6, Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, 2022.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 6 read a second time]

Government Motions

Federal Carbon Tax Increase

18. Mr. Kenney moved on behalf of Mr. Jason Nixon:
Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly call on the government of Canada to stop its planned April 1, 2022, increase of the carbon tax to $50 per tonne and its further plan to increase the carbon tax to $170 per tonne given that Canadian families are struggling with the highest inflation in 30 years.

[Adjourned debate: Mr. Schow]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika has six minutes remaining should he choose to use it.

Are there others? The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to speak to Motion 18 tonight. Maybe it's no surprise that this would come on April Fool's Day because, obviously, I think this is something that is very foolish, especially at this time but I think, really, at any time.

When I look back to the Alberta carbon tax and when it was brought in – I was elected in the 2015 election – I know the NDP didn't campaign on the carbon tax that they brought forward shortly after being elected. I believe I was the only opposition MLA that was at the announcement. It happened at the space sciences centre building in November, I believe. I was there for that, and it was interesting to see the people that were there. Of course, there were some oil executives that were there, there were some other people there, but what I didn't see were regular Albertans, people from rural Alberta. This would really affect their livelihoods and their lives.

When I look at my life and my representation of rural Alberta, I think about the cost of travel for rural Albertans. You know, it seems like everything in rural Alberta we have to drive to. A lot of us live out on farms. We have to travel to town for groceries, we have to travel to our jobs, and everything seems to involve putting miles on our vehicles. Even with the COVID situation and not travelling as much as normal, my truck has over 250,000 kilometres on it in a matter of about three years. So there are lots of miles driven, and there's just no way to avoid this in rural Alberta because of the distances we have to travel.

I often think about farmers drying their grain. Drying your grain is not an option; you have to dry your grain, or the grain spoils and you lose your entire crop. Of course, the carbon tax is on the natural gas that's used to dry grain. Agriculture products and grain itself have to be transported. Of course, then the cost of the trucking is increased because of the cost of fuel increase. So we look at all of these different things.

You know, we've been talking lately a lot about the rural hospital situation and the doctor situation. People in rural Alberta are always travelling for doctor appointments. Say, in my community of Valleyview sometimes we're travelling to Grande Prairie for specialists; sometimes we travel to Edmonton for specialists. Of course, this adds to the cost of just necessities like medical appointments.

When we look at heating our homes, that's not an option either. We live in a climate that's very cold. I know that everybody I know is trying their best to make sure that their homes are as efficient as possible, but that still doesn't keep minus 40 out. When it hits minus 20, minus 30, minus 40, our furnaces are on. They have to be on because there's no other way to counteract that other than by burning natural gas to heat our homes.

Now, another thing is travel. I guess you could look at the cost of air travel but even just vehicular travel to travel to other parts of Alberta, maybe visiting friends and relatives or even a holiday. That negatively affects tourism and, actually, tourism across Canada, because this carbon tax is, of course, Canada-wide. I think that hurts the opportunity to build unity within our province and within our country as we learn and meet other people from across Canada and across Alberta.

We look at the cost of inflation right now, and we see the price of everything going up. A lot of it has to do with other factors, but this adds to the increase in inflation because everything that we have uses carbon to be moved, heated, or cooled. We look at our groceries. Our groceries are transported. Many of them, the vegetables and fruits and stuff like that, are brought in from eastern Canada, southern B.C., or from the United States and even farther. That transportation cost is increased with the increased carbon tax. Then you look at a grocery store, for instance: that building has to be heated. Those coolers have to be operated to keep things cool. So these things just add up over and over again. You put a tax on one small part, and that tax affects prices all the way across the whole economy.

Of course, we don't have options on things like this. There are no options when it comes to heating your home, there are no options when it comes to buying groceries, and there are no options when it comes to going to work. I know there's been talk about, you know, that there were some comments made by the NDP leader about taking the bus. Well, in rural Alberta we don't have those bus systems. Some of these towns are too small to have buses travelling around the town and everything. Of course, that still doesn't help people from rural Alberta being able to get from their farm or their acreage to the local town where they buy groceries and have their kids in school and those things.

Now, I remember that back when the NDP brought in the carbon tax, they thought that maybe if they just promoted it more, it would help. So we saw the advertisements going on in movie theatres, but I think what we saw happen, too, is that people were so upset seeing it in their face when they went to the theatre, they were actually booing, at the theatres, these advertisements. In fact, one of the MLAs that just was elected in the last election – I was talking to him and talking about that very same thing – said that, yeah, before he was elected, he remembered going to a movie theatre and seeing the carbon tax advertisement come on and actually booing it. You know, these things were happening.

These things are real. I think this negatively affects everybody across Canada but in particular rural Alberta and rural Albertans that have to travel such great distances to gain the services that they need. This is a way of tax. When it was brought in, it was supposed to bring in $3 billion a year in taxes for the government, and that was the largest tax increase in Alberta history at that time. We can't stand by and watch this Prime Minister do this to our economy and to our people. Again, inflation is incredibly high right now. People are hurting. People are having a hard time paying their electricity bills, their gas bills, their fuel bills. Talking to farmers, when we're talking about how much this will increase the cost on their farms, for some of these larger farmers, it's going to cost tens of thousands and even hundreds of thousands of dollars more just by adding on these extra carbon taxes.

We have to be able to be competitive in a world market. We know that our energy is produced at the highest standards, so we should be encouraging our energy use across the world, and we shouldn't be discouraging our energy use within our own country. That makes us less competitive in the world market. We need to be conscious of this because we do live in a world where our economies are all intertwined.

I just want to again say that I want to support Motion 18. I think we need to put the pressure on the federal government as strong as we can here in Alberta and let them know how we feel about this, that we want this carbon tax scrapped. We need to get our economy going. We need to take care of the people of Alberta and make sure that they can live their lives the best they can, and this does nothing but hurt them.

Thank you.

The Speaker: On Government Motion 18, are there others wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, followed by the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and offer some thoughts on Government Motion 18.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly call on the government of Canada to stop its planned April 1, 2022, increase of the carbon tax to $50 per tonne and its further plan to increase the carbon tax to $170 per tonne given that Canadian families are struggling with the highest inflation in 30 years.

Mr. Speaker, the Premier and the government simply refuse to acknowledge or take responsibility for decisions that they've made to make life more expensive and more difficult for Albertans. Of course, they'll say that they didn't cause the supply chain issues or inflation, but in challenging times they've proven themselves capable of, well, nothing; for example, not keeping Albertans safe during the worst of the pandemic and not making a plan to catch up on surgical backlogs. Instead, the UCP government makes bad decisions or are conveniently absent from work when Albertans need a government to be steady, capable, and reliable, when they need a government that listens and has their best interests at heart.

This is what we're seeing again tonight, Mr. Speaker. Albertans are asking the provincial government to provide capable leadership and put the interests of Albertans ahead of their own narrow, partisan interests. They need help. They're asking for it. But instead of listening to Albertans, this government is trying to get us to look the other way, to be distracted. This is an old, sad trick, one that bullies sometimes play in the schoolyard, you know, point up at the sky and then punch the unsuspecting kid in the face.

We're tired of the UCP government's incompetence and its inability to hear Albertans and support them. Instead, the Premier is pointing up or sideways and then punching us with sneaky tax increases, tuition increases, school fee hikes, fees to hike in the parks, and, perhaps worse, a brutal policy to freeze fixed incomes of people with disabilities and also seniors when that freeze is costing groceries, heat, and basic living security. The cost of everything, Mr. Speaker, is going up. And let me be quite clear. This UCP government has all the tools it needs to help Albertans and their families to make ends meet. Instead – instead – they're making everything more expensive and then pointing around the room to find someone else to blame.

I want to be more specific. Under the UCP government they've increased income taxes, property taxes, tuition, student debt, camping and park fees, car insurance, and utilities. In their first budget the UCP deindexed tax brackets from inflation. This is something that the Premier complained about endlessly when he was an MP and when he was head of the Canadian Taxpayers Federation. He called this a pernicious and insidious tax grab that disproportionately hurt low- and middle-income earners. Over the course of this government's fiscal plan this will be a $1 billion pernicious and insidious tax grab. That's $1 billion directly out of the pockets of Albertans.

To make matters worse, the UCP also deindexed AISH and seniors' benefits. So now, as inflation rises, those Albertans on those benefits actually lose money. It's estimated to be a $3,000 hit for AISH recipients and a $750 hit for senior couples over the course of the UCP's fiscal plan. We urge the government to fix this immediately. We will work quickly to amend the budget bill and reindex these benefits so that Albertans on fixed incomes are not bleeding the income that they don't have.

As I mentioned, the UCP also increased property taxes on Albertans. Their first two budgets almost doubled the 2020 tax hike for Calgary homeowners, and they went back to that, well, again this year. This year they're taking an extra $13 million from Calgary homeowners while cutting funding from municipalities. Mr. Speaker, the government needs to reverse these tax hikes.

The UCP has also made drastic increases to tuition and student debt. Just this year they approved tuition increases ranging from 20 to 100 per cent. That means that students will be paying thousands of dollars more each year. Meanwhile the UCP has cut student aid and increased interest rates on student loans. The UCP often talks about burdening future generations with debt. Well, they're doing exactly that with these increases to tuition and student loan interest rates. Not only is this short sighted, given that we need to strengthen postsecondary achievement and that we need to support the sector as an engine of future economic growth, but it's also hurting people right now.

Next up, Mr. Speaker, are camping and park fees. This is another example of the UCP government nickel and diming Albertans. The UCP has repeatedly increased camping fees over the course of their term, and they've also charged people $90 to take a walk in Kananaskis Country. They took an area that belongs to all Albertans and started charging them $90 a year just to set foot in it. They said that the fees would be used to improve access and services. Instead, what Albertans see in this budget is an almost $4 million cut from the operating budget of Alberta parks. For the reference of all members, that can be found on page 91 of the government estimates. Albertans don't trust the UCP, so when they try to distract us and tell us to look away, Albertans aren't falling for it.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, Albertans might not even be able to afford the insurance on their vehicle to get to Kananaskis. Auto insurance is skyrocketing, and that's because the UCP removed the cap on insurance premium increases. Not only that; all we see is a Finance minister patting himself on the back for making insurance companies more profitable every day, and that is a result of that government being lobbied by the insurance industry. I just want everybody to understand that we on this side of the House watch out for Albertans while the people on that side of the House watch out for the interests of lobbyists. Car insurance companies, after they successfully lobbied the government to make the changes that they needed, immediately increased premiums. A lot of them were double-digit increases, and some went as high as 30 per cent. Worst of all, these increases came during the pandemic, when Albertans were already struggling to make ends meet. We called on the UCP to provide relief for drivers, but they refused.

Finally, Albertans have been faced with rising utility bills, as everyone well knows. Again, our government introduced a cap on electricity prices, but the UCP removed it. Since then, power prices have doubled, and Albertans are feeling the pinch. At the same time, the natural gas prices have increased in the middle of the winter. The UCP promised relief in their last budget, but that turned out to be a fake program. It doesn't even take effect until next winter and only if prices increase dramatically. While the UCP has promised $50 for electricity bills, that pales in comparison to the hundreds of dollars extra per month that Albertans are paying on their utility bills. By the government members' own admission the program is paltry.

Due to these high prices Albertans are falling behind on their bills. Our caucus is hearing from Albertans who are worried about being disconnected on April 15, when the ban is lifted. I want to remind members that we even brought draft legislation to the government to extend the disconnection ban, but once again they refused to help Albertans. They wouldn't even debate that in this House.

To sum up my initial points, there are several ways that this UCP government has increased costs for Albertans. Income taxes, property taxes, tuition, student debt, camping and park fees, car insurance, and utilities have all increased under this government's watch. They are a direct result of the policy choices made by the UCP, which means that they have the power to provide real relief for Albertans to address the rising cost of living, but they refuse, and instead they continue to point the finger and do nothing while Albertans struggle to make ends meet.

Mr. Speaker, in the time that I have left, I just want to address some of the comments from some of the government members that we've heard weigh in on the debate. First of all, let me thank my colleagues from West Yellowhead and from Cardston-Siksika for some reasonably solid jokes, at least on the UCP spectrum, talking about damaging hippos and hypocrites and worrying about our dad remarrying to somebody else and not telling us. In the UCP humour spectrum those were solid jokes, so a metaphorical tip of the hat to those members for bringing some levity to the debate.

I do want to address some of the issues, though, that members raised. First of all, I want to correct the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon, who made an egregious error. I almost called a point of order because it was so disruptive, this error that he made, claiming that this borehole that's going to be drilled in his constituency is the deepest in the world. It's not. It's not. Just for the information of all of the members of the Legislature, the deepest borehole in the world is the Kola superborehole, which is in far northern Russia, close to the border of Norway.

Mr. Yao: Your closest allies.

Mr. Schmidt: You know, the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo knows full well that every member of this House supports wholeheartedly the people of Ukraine, and we have long spoken against Russia's invasion of that country. So for him to make these kinds of statements: it's not surprising from the member, but unfortunately it continues his pattern of disappointing remarks.

8:50

Anyway, I wanted to correct the record so that when the member talks about the deepest borehole in the world, he knows that it's the Kola superborehole in Russia.

I also wanted to express some concerns, something that the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon can take back to his friends at the Hemp Alliance. I can't remember the name of the exact organization that he talked about, but he expressed his desire to expand the industrial hemp crop acreage here in the province of Alberta. Let me say that I support that only insofar as it doesn't displace the crop acreage of recreational hemp, which is also a tremendous product, one that does a great service to humanity. I wouldn't want to see that crop pushed out to the benefit of industrial hemp. I hope that the member remembers that there is room for all types of hemp in our great province.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my remarks. I look forward to the rest of the debate on this motion. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Why, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Oh, was that a load of something we just heard. My goodness. I wish to thank the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar for his fantastic comments and, well, a little bit of hypocrisy here, especially considering that he was part of the government that did impose a carbon tax on all Albertans, also chased away so many international companies from the north from our hydrocarbon industries, resulting in the layoffs of a lot of geologists, his fellow co-workers, in APEGA. You know, I hope they didn't get you all the feedback that you wanted on that decision. Nevertheless, I digress.

Mr. Speaker, we are here to speak about Motion 18, which is about the carbon tax and our disgruntlement with that, such a tax that is going up by 25 per cent here on April 1. No, it is not a joke.

You know what? I think we need to take a look at this from another side here. Perhaps we can try to understand where the Prime Minister is coming from in all this. To that, myself I have to look back to my roots. I go way back. And, yes, Mr. Speaker, you can look at me and go: yes, he's from the east; he's from the far east. Yes, sir. I am from New Brunswick, sir, and it's very interesting to see that.

I can only assume that when, say, the Prime Minister goes to where my cousin lives in Acadie-Bathurst – you know, a great Liberal stronghold, unfortunately. But you know what? He probably goes into my cousin's basement and sees that big vat of oil that they use to burn in the oil-generating furnace that burns oil. He probably looks at that, that oil that is imported from Irving Oil from places like Venezuela or Saudi Arabia, and he knows that those are unethical places that produce this product. He's probably thinking: "You know what? We have to put a tax on this. We've got to stop these imports, this oil from these regimes that really trample human rights, that show no respect for the environment. It's absolute atrocities that happen over in these nations." He sees that big vat of oil being burned in my cousin's house, and he recognizes that so many houses, in the thousands, in the Maritimes burn oil, and he probably wishes they could burn natural gas like they do here in Alberta, which is much cleaner and much more friendly. I think maybe that's what the Prime Minister is thinking when he puts in these rules.

Or perhaps – perhaps, Mr. Speaker – he looks at all the people commuting from right across Canada all the way up to Fort McMurray, 10,000 strong, people flying in jets every day, every week, every year, flying in jets. He sees that community and goes: my goodness; we have to do something to discourage that. Maybe they will live in Fort McMurray if he could make it more difficult for them to commute. I cross my fingers because maybe we're in alignment there. Maybe this Prime Minister isn't so bad. It's just interesting to try to understand why the Prime Minister would impose a 25 per cent tax.

I've heard that the Prime Minister is very spiritual and that he believes in the power of the mind, as does the rest of the Liberal caucus, from my understanding. Perhaps they think that if they concentrate enough, they will cause the Earth to tilt so that come the winter months, when we usually have great cold, minus 30 to 40, you know, very cold, maybe we will not get that cold with his efforts to tilt this planet as well as, hopefully, prevent the Earth from going so far away from the sun during those winter months that perhaps – perhaps – we won't need these fossil fuels. That is what the Prime Minister is thinking.

Mr. Smith: Are you suggesting they tilt to the left?

Mr. Yao: Tilt to the left, absolutely. You know what? I'll take it if we can get some more warm months in Canada, which is one of the coldest nations in the world.

But those are the things I think our Prime Minister is thinking, perhaps, when he's imposing such a tax. It's very interesting.

You know, in a nutshell, it's frustrating to see such a tax get imposed on not just Albertans but all Canadians. My goodness. Again, back to New Brunswick, as an example, with an average wage of $13 an hour. How does that impact those people? How are they going to be able to afford groceries? How are they going to afford that lobster that comes off that boat for $7? It's going to make it more expensive for them to ship that all the way to Alberta and everything else, where they make a lot of the revenues from their main industry, which is fishing and seafood. I can't understand why he would put these rules in.

It is difficult. It does hurt lower income. It hurts middle-class families. It is chasing away jobs. A lot of my friends have gone to the United States. A friend of mine just left to Saudi Arabia, of all places, to go work. I have other friends who are in Iraq right now working. All of these international companies: boy, they took the best and the brightest, and that is unfortunate. All good Canadians. Transporting all these jobs away.

Perhaps he looks at – yeah, you know, I honestly can't understand it, why he's putting these taxes. Again, I really think that the Prime Minister has the best of intentions. He really just wants to discourage us from using oil from Saudi and Nigeria and all these other OPEC nations. Maybe he foresaw what was happening in Russia. Who can say for certain? But it has been destructive for our communities.

I can certainly tell you how his taxes have hurt Fort McMurray and have affected my friends and my community. I can only hope that – I can only pray that he doesn't clue in that we are all carbon-based life forms. When he clues into that, I can't imagine the taxes he's going to impose on all of us. Let's make sure he never watches an episode of Star Trek or something. You know, it's just very frustrating.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that it is very disappointing that we see such a tax going on when people are trying to just live and prosper. We see these things that are being imposed on us by someone who has known nothing but a golden lifestyle, a lifestyle with the Aga Khan, a lifestyle where he gets to travel all over the world and dress in all sorts of great things and paint his face in whatever way he wants, with no fear of discrimination. We can only hope that he's got a plan that we're just not aware of and that he will perhaps re-evaluate these things.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I just have to say that Motion 18 is an excellent motion. I'd like to thank the Member for Rimby-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre for putting this motion forward as we attempt to convince our federal government to stop this 25 per cent carbon tax, which Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition so wholeheartedly supports, and that is very, very disappointing.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for the honour and pleasure to speak before this Assembly as we move forward through the evening. Thank you so much.

The Speaker: What a shame.

Are there others? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That's a hard act to follow, but I will certainly attempt to do so. Thank you to my colleague.

I actually just wanted to speak for a few minutes about this. We talked about this a bit earlier today, but one of the things that stood out to me very strongly, I suppose, when our Prime Minister was first elected was how he spoke about feminism and the feminists. It was on his tongue quite significantly. He spoke about it all the time.

I wanted to talk about energy poverty for just a moment, not just here in Alberta but globally, and what our responsibility is to make sure that our resource stewardship of the incredible things that we have in our province not only makes it to Canadians for our prosperity but to other countries. There are many, many countries where energy poverty is the difference between education for a young girl, the ability to be able to have a small business, microloans, burgeoning middle classes in other countries, that we have a responsibility to get energy to.

We take for granted that we can flick on a light, turn on the heat. My colleague from Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo was just speaking about that, about this incredibly cold winter that we had. I have – I've mentioned this so many times in this House, but I'll say it again – 40 solar panels on my house, and believe me when I tell you that it didn't work this winter. If you saw my electricity bills as well, you would be shocked, because there were so many times when we could not tap into the grid that way. Believe me, I love solar. I love all of the options that we have for energy. But I just wanted to say quickly that this isn't just about us. This is about our global responsibility of being able to get that energy to other countries that don't have it, to help see the growth of those countries.

We're wanting to attract people to our province, and in order to make sure that we are able to bring people to this province, we have to be able to support them here with roads, schools, medical equipment. Every single time we talk about COVID, I want you to consider a syringe or a tube or anything that kept a person alive at that time that is made from petrochemicals. Everything we wear half the time, what we're sitting on, your cellphones, everything: petrochemicals. Imagine just for a moment living one day without one of those devices, how you would function. I don't know what I would do if I couldn't just contact my kids with a text and find out where they are at any moment. That's just a privilege of living here and having all of these devices. But just for a moment consider not only what our lives would be like but also the incredible work that has been done in the sector. What the motion is speaking to very distinctly is also not just the oil and gas sector but the various diversifications that come from that sector but also about Canadians themselves.

This is an attack on the people of Canada. It's an attack on our livelihoods, who we are, the identity, especially, of our province, which is why you hear so much pride coming from here. My dad is a petrochemical engineer, and in the 1970s in this province the particulates here were considerably worse than they are now. The amount that the sector has been able to clean their products, to be able to change the way that they deliver resources to us has changed – well, it is measurable. But it is unbelievable to know the difference, especially if you were – my dad would have been in his 30s at that time working in the petrochemical sector. He tells me all the time about what the sky looked like at that time here when you flew into Alberta, when you flew into Calgary, and about the distinct difference that there is now. That is because of, not in any small part, the sector, that worked so hard to produce the best products that it possibly could. So I just hope that, like, beyond all of the rhetoric, we can all agree on that.

I would also, finally, like to say that we keep talking about our resources and who we are, but understand, Mr. Speaker – and the Minister of Energy had mentioned this earlier – that the demand for oil and gas right now is as high as it's ever been. That's not going to change for a little bit, but that doesn't mean that we shouldn't be looking at other ways to produce energy. In fact, these are things that have to happen in concert with each other.

But having said that, for every single barrel of oil that is not created here in Canada, it is created somewhere else that does not have the laws and the restrictions or the production standards that we have in this country. Every single barrel. Every single barrel that comes up the St. Lawrence from another country that does not have the rules and regulations or the human rights that we have in this country, every single barrel that we don't send out that is going from somewhere else: it's called carbon leakage, and that leakage has to be discussed at every single level of this discussion.

When you put a carbon tax on the people of Alberta and across Canada – I'd like to understand if anybody in here has slowed down their driving. Even with what we're paying at the pump right now, how many people have changed their habits? How many people? I know I have to drive to get here. I'm pretty sure that my colleague who just spoke has a two-hour, maybe three-hour longer drive than I do to get here. Our jobs are here. We're supposed to come to work.

So suggesting somehow that a carbon tax is going to alter the behaviour of people who are doing these jobs – what about our agriculture sector? What about that? What about fertilizer? These are all things that are produced, and every time you put a tax on those things, it doesn't help any of that. Quite frankly, people are going to find a way. We're a resilient bunch of people. Would you rather have us burning wood and other things to keep ourselves warm?

Here's the question that we have to ask. We have carbon leakage, but we also have an opportunity to do better in this province. If the federal government was willing to work with us and understand what Alberta is trying to accomplish, imagine where Canada could be. Imagine, for just a minute, being the world leader. We actually already are, but don't you think it's time that our federal government worked with us, Mr. Speaker, together to understand not only how amazing Canada is, how fantastic we are in our resource stewardship but to be so proud – so proud – to walk into a room when you're overseas knowing you come from a country that does it the best and that you're willing to work with people to do even better and that your product lives side by side with all of the environmental pieces that are necessary in order for us to do our part.

But the Prime Minister has to understand that by penalizing the everyday person, especially when you come from a province – we're 4.3 million people in this massive province. It's a huge, huge province. It's the size of some small countries. It is not an easy drive just even going across Calgary or going across Edmonton or anything. We all take for granted, you know, that if you're going for coffee with somebody, you can drive 45 minutes to go have coffee with them, because that is a privilege that we hold.

The question we have to ask ourselves is: when we're imposing these things on people, is it actually changing behaviour? It's not. In fact, if anything, it's just making money for the government, and it's not being translated into federal dollars back into the provinces to help them do better and do better policies and contribute to the ESG. All it is is a talking point to be able to say that you've imposed this on the people, with absolutely no outcomes to show anything different. The companies themselves, Mr. Speaker, by being more efficient, make more profits, do better, do better by the environment, are able to hire more people, and are able to help us supply our roads, our hospitals, our schools. The largest contributors to arts in this province have come from the oil and gas sector.

For anybody who's listening and especially as a heartfelt plea to our federal counterparts, I just wanted them to understand the incredible things that we're seeing now and the ability for us to bounce back and to be able to bring our economies back, to bring our people back, to unify our country, not only through the language with which we speak to each other and the kindness that is required in order to heal post COVID but also to consider those transportation corridors that also unite us across our country through trains, through electricity, through pipelines, water, all of these important things. Let's not take for granted, Mr. Speaker, for one moment how blessed and privileged we are in this country, but having that means we need to share it, get it to other countries. Also, we're not only exporting our incredible products; we're exporting our technology as well, because in typical Canadian and Alberta style, it's not something that we consider proprietary or that we want to hold on to. It's something we want to share with the rest of the world.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others on Government Motion 18? The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education and Member for Calgary-Bow.

9:10

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure for me to rise and speak to Motion 18. I've really enjoyed the debate and discussion in the Assembly thus far, and I'm going to try to be brief here. But if I can, you know, the way I look at this and the way I summarize what this motion is calling for, of course, is: an end to the Trudeau carbon tax. There are many reasons behind that, as you've heard here today, but if I can summarize all of those reasons, it's because they don't work, and they make life more expensive for everyday Albertans and everyday Canadians. That's the only real, tangible thing that we know of when it comes to the carbon tax. That's the only tangible and real effect we know is created by carbon taxes: they make life more expensive.

Now, as some of my colleagues have said here, of course, I agree that we need to take action to reduce emissions, but a carbon tax is the wrong way of doing it. We need to do it through investments in technology and innovation and by supporting our industries to come up with more innovative and technologically oriented solutions to deliver their goods and services and do what they do in a more carbon-neutral manner. That, Mr. Speaker, I believe, is the key to reducing emissions in Alberta and in Canada.

But, of course, the carbon tax increase that's coming on Friday, that's coming on April 1, as we all know, is coming at the worst possible time for all Canadians. Costs are on the rise everywhere, Mr. Speaker. The cost of groceries is increasing; the cost of gasoline is increasing; our utility bills are increasing. I really wonder why, then, is now the right time? Why are we increasing the carbon tax when we are facing these challenges?

Just to put that into perspective, what are we actually facing when it comes to the rising cost of living? We're facing inflationary levels that are at 30-year highs, Mr. Speaker. That's where we're at today, a 30-year-high inflationary level. Now, the reason for that is very clear. The reason for the 30-year high in inflation is due to Liberal fiscal mismanagement and other inflationary policies. No matter how you want to spin it, that is the core of the matter.

I should note as well the hypocrisy that's associated with the increase on April 1. I haven't heard any members in the Assembly discussing it, but from what I understand as well, on April 1 Mr. Trudeau is giving himself a raise – how lovely – a $20,000 raise, not just for himself but for all Members of Parliament. Of course, he's not trying to stop that. He's happy to collect more income when Canadians are challenged, when Canadians are struggling to pay their bills. He's happy to give himself a raise and make life more expensive. I think there's a term for that, and I think the Member for West Yellowhead talked about that. I think the word is "hypocrisy," Mr. Speaker. But we're all used to Liberal hypocrisy and NDP hypocrisy.

But let me give you a quick overview of what some of these increases mean for the average family, for the average person watching at home. Just one thing I did want to note on the topic of inflation, Mr. Speaker. The Bank of Canada – let's take partisan politics out of it – has said that the April 1 increase will increase inflation by half a per cent. So it's not bad enough that we're already at a 30-year high when it comes to inflation, but we're going to pursue policies that are going to add to that. That's what's happening here.

Let me again give you an overview. As it stands today, the average price of gas in Alberta is $1.66. Now, up till 2030 – the Liberals are set to continue to increase their carbon tax all the way up to 2030 – by the time they get there, just factoring in the carbon tax increase, which is factored to result in a 38-cent increase by 2030, it will push that price to $2.04 for Albertans. That's not factoring in inflation, the high inflation that we're seeing. That's not factoring in inflation over the course of eight years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the average family, the average household in Alberta, according to a 2009 vehicle survey by the government of Canada, has stipulated that households in Alberta have 1.87 vehicles on average. So let's look at the average family: 1.87 vehicles. Let's use that as a basis. Presently, with the price of gasoline today, an average family with 1.87 vehicles will spend approximately $340 a month, assuming they fill up their vehicle every two weeks – $340, which for some is even a stretch – $340 a month, or $4,000 a year. Add in the 38 cents that we will get to, facilitated through carbon tax increases, by 2030, and that same family will be paying 25 per cent more. They'll be paying $420 per month, or $5,000 per year. That's a difference of $1,000 per year for the average family – for the average family – for, Mr. Speaker, living their lives, for taking their kids to hockey, for going to the grocery store, for visiting a friend and having coffee.

The Liberals and their NDP allies, which, in consequence, includes the members opposite, who are legally part of the federal NDP, have decided it's time to make life more expensive for Albertans and all Canadians, and I hope the members opposite – because I think we can all agree that we must bring these costs down. I encourage the members opposite to stand up and support this motion, but I'm not sure that we're going to see that, Mr. Speaker.

Furthermore, of course, that increase will occur not just in gasoline, as I mentioned, but the increase will also be felt on groceries, on utility bills, on all facets of Albertans' lives. Now, we know, of course, that the NDP loves carbon taxes. That's why they won't be voting for this motion. They love carbon taxes. Even though they never told Albertans about it and they never campaigned on it, the first thing, or one of the first things, I should say, that they did when they got elected in 2015 was introduce a carbon tax. You know what they did with those proceeds, Mr. Speaker? They hired people from Ontario to install light bulbs in your homes and install low-flow shower heads. That's where that money went. A real effective use of charging Albertans more money.

Now, the other point, Mr. Speaker – and I don't want to go on for too long here – is that we know very clearly that carbon taxes don't work. Now, I'm going to back that up. I believe it's important to provide details. I want us to take a look at B.C. I want us to take a look at British Columbia. In 2007 they introduced a carbon tax, and of course they told the people of British Columbia that that will reduce emissions and help get them to their respective climate goals. Well, let's see where we're at today. Let's evaluate those many years of carbon tax, and I should say, of course, that the carbon tax in B.C. has not been stable at a single price. It's been increasing since 2007 and getting progressively more expensive. So where are we today? According to the government of B.C.'s own data, in 2019 GHG emissions were up from their 2007 baseline. In fact, emissions increased by 17 per cent over the 10-year period following the implementation of the carbon tax. Where's the rationale? It's not working. It's clearly not working in British Columbia.

Now, furthermore, just to just wrap up, Mr. Speaker, what our side of the House here is saying this evening is that Trudeau must stop this tax hike. It's that simple. Of course, Alberta's government is taking measures to bring the cost of living down. We've introduced an electricity rebate, $150 to all eligible households, and as one of my colleagues mentioned, you won't need to apply for this. It'll appear directly on your bill. We're also removing the gas tax on April 1, and Albertans will see 13 cents knocked off the price. Now, of course, with the federal Liberals if they move forward with their increase, unfortunately they won't realize all of those savings. As well, we've also taken action by repealing the NDP's carbon tax, and when I was running in 2019 and knocking on doors in my neighbourhood, one of the top issues if not the top issue that I heard from people in my community, and I think members here found similar sentiment, was that they wanted the carbon tax gone. We delivered on those promises and are continuing to take steps to make life more affordable for Albertans, and I invite the members opposite to support it.

Mr. Speaker, with that, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

9:20 Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. members. I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 4

Municipal Government (Face Mask and Proof of COVID-19 Vaccination Bylaws) Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered at this time? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. It's always a pleasure to get up and speak in this House. Of course, when we're faced with the current proposed piece of legislation by this government, we see yet again the disdain and disrespect that Conservatives, and in this case the United Conservatives, have for different orders of government. Here they are completely disregarding a different order of government and the authority and the power that that order of government has to actually make decisions for its own citizens. Now, of course, I understand that we have those citizens in common, most definitely, but it's important that we respect other orders of government, that we work together when it comes to governing on behalf of all those citizens together as different orders of government, in this case municipalities and us as a province.

I know that it's been said by members opposite that, well, they're just listening to Albertans. Well, then, why not bring a co-operative approach to working with a different order of government instead of simply just dictating to them what must be done? That's what we have here within this bill. Now, it's a slippery slope that we're on, Mr. Chair, because in this case it might be related to masks and masking that this here government is just simply taking a dictatorial approach to other orders of government, and it's going to open the door. If we allow this kind of legislation to pass, then what's to say that next year this United Conservative government isn't going to just simply go and make another move to actually dictate to municipalities yet something else? We don't know that, but that's what this piece of legislation is doing.

You know, Mr. Chair, we put in an incredible amount of work and effort when we were in government to establish big-city charters. There were a lot of people sitting at the table. It was a co-operative approach to thinking up a new way of working in a co-operative manner, again, I stress, when it came to municipalities. This is what we would like – I know for a fact that the municipal orders of government would like to see more of this. Rather than it simply being dictated what they have to do, they would like to see people coming together, sitting down at a table, working together co-operatively to determine how we all move forward, different orders of government, so that we can actually serve the people of Alberta the best way.

It's puzzling, Mr. Chair, because this government was elected as offering and being, like, the champions of rural Alberta and other municipalities outside of the big cities, you know, Edmonton, Calgary, Red Deer, Lethbridge, and then here they are just saying: "Okay. Well, we're just going to dictate everything that has to be done. We're actually going to take this power away from you." That's essentially what's happening here. Again we have an example of this government taking power away from others within the province of Alberta, taking power out of the hands of people, taking it out of the hands of other orders of government.

Now, it's important that we consider that – well, let me take a step back, Mr. Chair. You know, a lot of us remember when this Premier decided that he was going to sign his grassroots guarantee. It's important to know that here we have a reversal of this Premier and this government when it comes to this approach and that here we have the UCP interfering with local decision-making and imposing top-down governance. Now, on this side of the House we respect local democracy. We respect municipalities. As I stated, we put a lot of work into working with municipalities and coming up with alternative ways of funding, which was all just completely reversed and taken back and destroyed by this UCP government.

I think it's important that we respect local leaders, and this bill is going completely against that. It's a shame, because I believe this to be an important part of our democracy. You know, members on the other side of the House like to get up and talk about freedom, and it's hypocritical that here we see, in this bill, them actually taking freedom away from other local leaders and municipalities. You can't have it both ways, Mr. Chair. You either believe in democracy, you believe in freedom, you believe in co-operation, in sharing power, or you don't. That's why, for me, it's important to get up in this House and speak against this bill, because here it may just be – you know, the members opposite will say, "Well, it's only pertaining to masks and masking," but if we allow this to move forward, then what's to say in the future that it won't be regarding any other issues?

What's most disheartening about this bill, also, is the way that some of the members on the other side have actually spoken about this bill. I believe during second reading, you know, I highlighted the whole issue of spanking. I can't believe that a member on the other side of this House, in reference to this bill, brought up the whole idea of just that they need to spank another order of government. Like, how paternalistic can you get?

I think that's what we see with this government, with members on the other side of the House. You know, it's expected from Conservatives, I would say, Mr. Chair, because that's the way they see the world, in a very paternalistic fashion, that others need to be spanked, which I find completely ridiculous. You're essentially saying that this grown-up person, this leader of their community, needs to be treated like a child. I'd like members of this House to think about that. Think about what you're saying when you – you may be anecdotally bringing it up, but you reference spanking. You're essentially saying that others need to be treated as children.

We're talking about leaders. We're talking about leaders of their communities, so I'd like them to check their language on that. If they're going to be dictatorial, then let them say that they're going to be dictatorial when it comes to certain issues and don't hide from the fact that you're actually being hypocritical when it comes to these specific freedoms and the responsibility that these local leaders have over the communities that they represent.

I think that a much better approach, Mr. Chair, would actually be to work in co-operation with these other orders of government. That would be more successful, working in partnership with other orders of government, with local leaders coming to the table, yes, adults coming to the table and actually talking with one another rationally, working out issues, concerns. This is what Albertans expect of the different orders of government, the leaders, the political leaders, that they expect.

It doesn't matter which side of the House. They expect rational. They expect dialogue, right? This is what Albertans expect of us, and I know that members on the other side of the House can agree with that. Then why this bill? Why this approach? Why are you supporting essentially taking powers away from others and moving towards this dictatorial approach? It's not befitting of this Legislature.

Again, Mr. Chair, I would ask the members on the other side of the House to check their language, because it's not becoming of this House either to talk about spanking and treating other orders of government as children. I think that kind of language and, well, this legislation at its fundamental base is essentially just picking a fight. It's picking a fight with other orders of government. I would even go so far as saying that it's crushing local democracy.

So with that, Mr. Chair, I am going to take my seat, but I'd, please, ask the members on the other side of the House to really consider what it is that they're presenting in the form of this bill before us.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: I see the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has risen.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak on Bill 4, one that I brought to the House. I would just say that we heard some words here a few minutes ago, and very few of them actually are applicable to the bill before us, so I will correct the record here.

Mr. Chair, Bill 4, I guess if you were to shorten the name of it, because it's got a long name – it says Municipal Government (Face Mask and Proof of COVID-19 Vaccination Bylaws) Amendment Act, 2022. Wow. That's a long name for a bill. But if I had to shorten the name of the bill, I would call it the Stay in Your Lane bill simply because that's all this is doing.

The advice to stay in your own lane is actually good advice for us on this side of the floor to take, it's good advice for the federal government to take, and it's a good idea for municipalities to take because all orders of government, I'm sure, generally speaking – I certainly believe in most cases it's with the best of intentions – tend to drift into each other's lanes of responsibility. It's a natural thing because we all care about the whole world. Even if it's not the part of the world that we were elected to look after, we just care. I think that's why people get elected, because they just care, and sometimes when people just care, they do or say that they're going to do or try to do things that really kind of go out of the scope of what they were elected to do.

All this bill does is – really, we were kind of forced to do this, Chair, and I'll explain that as I talk here. To be clear, municipalities under provincial legislation have a wide, wide, wide scope of authority to protect the health and safety of their citizens. That was true before Bill 4, and that is true after Bill 4. Municipalities still have a wide, wide, wide scope of authority to look after the health and safety of their citizens – that's how it ought to be because it matters – and because they have those responsibilities, we need to let them do that.

But in this particular case – it's a little bit unfortunate – some members, really, of the council of the city that we're in kind of made a public statement that they were going to override the provincial health rules, which, frankly, the province is responsible for. And that's not to say that the municipality doesn't have a lot of authority in that area, and they should. Here's what doesn't change. Before Bill 4 the municipalities had the authority to determine things like masking and vaccination requirements on things that the municipality owns like the transit system, like the municipal buildings, like a rec centre that the municipality owns and operates, like an arena that the municipality owns and operates, and they still have that authority today. Bill 4 does not change that.

Now, I think the obvious response to what I've said so far is: what does Bill 4 actually change? Well, let's ask the bill. That shouldn't be hard to do because it's a really short bill. It's two pages. I could actually read the whole thing out, I think, in about five minutes. But I think, to stay on topic, section 2 . . .

Mr. Schmidt: Do you have to ask for help to do it, or are you able to do it on your own?

Mr. McIver: You see, Mr. Chair, the folks on the other side: they just can't stand hearing what's going on. The member there in the back row who's been chastised – I think he's set a record for having to withdraw remarks in this House, and I guess he's going to beat his own record. So that's okay. I'll just carry on here because some of the folks on the other side asked for an explanation, and I'm trying to provide it. Hopefully, I don't have to shout over the member opposite to do that.

What the bill says in section 2 is:

Section 7 is amended by striking out “A council” and substituting “Subject to section 7.1, a council”.

So the question is: what is it in section 7 that has changed because of Bill 4? And then section 3 of Bill 4 answers that question. It says:

Face mask and proof of COVID-19 vaccination bylaws

7.1(1) Subject to subsections (5) and (6), on the coming into force of this section, a council may not, unless approved by the Minister, bring into force a bylaw or an amendment to a bylaw that requires one or both of the following:

Okay. Here it comes. Now we're going to learn what municipalities can't do. That's the next section. The next section, that actually says what they can't do, says that they cannot cause an individual to wear a face mask or other face covering for the primary purpose of preventing or limiting the spread of COVID-19 or any other communicable disease, as defined in the Public Health Act.

Or they cannot cause an individual to provide proof of vaccination against COVID-19 or proof of a negative COVID-19 test on entering a premises.

That's it. That's all, folks. That's all they can't do. Frankly, all it says is that they can't override the health order that the Health department made for Alberta, which is a provincial area of jurisdiction. All it says is: stay in your lane.

Now, I will say – because somebody will raise it, and rightly so – that for a period of time during the state of emergency the municipalities had a broader range of authority, because of the COVID pandemic, where they could make these rules, and rightly so, but the states of emergency have elapsed because of the reduced case counts, mostly the reduced people in hospital and the people in ICU, so now the provincial health authority decided that those rules don't need to be in place anymore.

I suppose that if you wanted to read this technically – and I'd be happy if a lawyer disagreed with what I'm going to say next because I'm not a lawyer and I don't give legal advice, but it's my legislation; I think I can talk about it – I think what it doesn't stop municipalities from doing is providing people wear a mask if they go into some building or something that the municipality owns and operates, again, like transit or a municipally owned recreation centre. They have that authority. They can make that bylaw. What they can't do is require people to wear masks in private businesses, which is beyond their scope of authority.

But here's the thing. Even as simple as that is, there's still a check for safety that we put in here, because the next section says, “The Minister shall consider the public interest and consult with the Chief Medical Officer of Health . . . under the Public Health Act in determining whether to approve a bylaw” for something that is not allowed in (a) and (b). In other words, a municipality could still come forward, even with this legislation, with a bylaw to require masks in private businesses and such for COVID-19, but they would have to get permission from the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

In many cases the Minister of Municipal Affairs – and I certainly fall under this category – may not be a medical professional. I am not. So the bill wisely says that the Minister of Municipal Affairs, before he makes a decision on a municipality that wanted to bring forward a mask bylaw that's in the provincial area of responsibility, is required in this legislation – not in regulation; right in the legislation – to consult with the chief medical officer of health to get advice before deciding whether to let the municipality pass a bylaw where the citizens would have to wear masks, for example, in private businesses.

There it is. That's it. And why? The only thing that, really, a municipality can't do is have a mask or vaccine bylaw for COVID-19. Why would they want to if COVID-19 is not there? Now, COVID-19 is still here. I get that, but the provincial health authority, who has the jurisdiction in this area, has said that that's not required anymore. That's it. That's all. No other municipal authorities are hampered. I think that while we disagree on a lot of things with folks on the other side of the House, I hope – I don't know this, but I hope – we can all agree that we're looking forward to the day that COVID-19 goes away. Maybe it never will, but I surely believe that we all hope it does, so that's an authority that in other circumstances municipalities wouldn't need anyways. So there it is.

Unlike the characterization that we heard earlier that municipalities were losing a bunch of authority that they needed, no, they are losing the ability to override the provincial health authority in an area of provincial health responsibility, full stop. Nothing more. That's it. So I kind of feel good about this. The legislation may not ever actually affect a municipality. Edmonton, even after they knew we had this bill coming forward, actually brought forward a bylaw or brought discussion about a bylaw to actually do this and ask. It was defeated, if I understood it right, eight to five, so there were five members that voted to overcome the provincial health rules in the provincial area of responsibility.

Let me say this. I am making the assumption that those members of council did so because they thought, in their minds, that it was in the best interests of the citizens of their city, and good for them. I don't mean that in any way but sincerely. Good for them for doing what they thought was best. That's what we all should do when we're elected. We don't all agree. We're not always right. That's all of us. I mean, I'd like to think I'm always right, but the world has taught me that I am not always right.

The fact is that that's it. It's a stay-in-your-lane bill, very, very, very narrowly focused. I think that there's at least a reasonable chance – I can't guarantee it because municipalities have their own free will to do what they think is best for their citizens, and we'd never want to change that – a municipality still could come forward and say: I want to override the provincial health rules and expand the masking and required vaccination bylaws beyond what's in the, you know, municipal area of jurisdiction. If anything, it could be argued that this legislation actually gives more authority to try that now, to try the Minister of Municipal Affairs on for size to see if he or she might approve that. Of course, whatever he – it happens to be now, but it could be some other he or she, and that he or she would have to, under this legislation, check with the chief medical officer of health.

So there you go. It's kind of a stay-in-your-lane reminder. It may not ever have any effect on any municipality. I hope not, mostly because my deepest hope is that COVID-19 will go away and not be missed. So there it is, Mr. Chair. I felt like we were kind of forced to do this by some municipal members that made public statements about trying to override provincial health rules. This is a requirement to stay in your lane. Let me just say that it's a good reminder for all of us, including our government. People that are elected care about things beyond the legally prescribed scope of authority because they care. If there's anything you want, it's elected people that care. This is just a reminder that while we're caring – and I'll take that as a reminder for me, too – we should try to stay in our lane.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any members? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has risen.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm pleased to provide a few brief comments to this Municipal Government (Face Mask and Proof of COVID-19 Vaccination Bylaws) Amendment Act, 2022, Bill 4, at the committee stage. This amendment act has a bit of a bracketed text, and I would say that perhaps an alternative title might be Well, We Were Going to Fund Raise off This, But It Didn't Work Out Because Edmonton Decided Not to, So We Didn't Have That Opportunity to Fund Raise from the Convoy Wing of the Party Amendment Act, 2022. It's a bit longer, but I think it kind of captures why we're all standing here tonight.

Why are we standing here tonight? Through the fourth wave of the pandemic, the one last fall, the province essentially blew through any credibility or political capital it had left in pandemic management. I hear this on the doorstep all the time. I ask people, you know: "Is it one thing? If you're unhappy with this government, is there one thing?" Unless it's the lack of family doctors, which comes like a blast off the doorstep from pretty well everybody, they just kind of say: "No. It's the chaos. It's the fact that we can't really trust what people are saying." This was in September and October, too, when I was spending a lot of time on the doorstep as well. In kind of late September and through to the end of October, when it was nice out, I also spent quite a bit of time out there.

People have a great deal of patience. Albertans are very generous of spirit, and people usually start, whether on what I call the left or the right or the exhausted middle, with something like: well, it wouldn't have been easy for anyone to manage through a pandemic. I agree. I've even expressed that sentiment in this House. But then they go on to say that that patience and goodwill have worn out over so many months of absolute chaos, and they use terms like clown car, you know, and the fact that they have completely lost trust in the Premier. Any words that he says just mean nothing to them anymore, whether it's on jobs or the economy or health care or affordability, anything, really. They simply do not trust him.

You know, what happened with this particular little fracas was that some folks in the city of Edmonton, and I'm not sure if rightly or wrongly – I'm not a medical officer, so I don't quite frankly know – expressed doubt at the government's trajectory in lifting restrictions very, very soon, according to a timeline that was prior to other jurisdictions in the main, and because they simply had lost trust with this government's decision-making and did not trust that they necessarily had either the public health best interests or even business continuity best interests in mind, simply because people had been just whipped around so many times by really lamentable decision-making. Some folks mused publicly about what they might do, either in Calgary or then later in Edmonton. Then, of course, this amendment act came in, which is a bit of bringing the hammer down in response.

Now we're here a couple of weeks later. Events have overtaken us. It seems to me that there is likely no real reason for this bill other than it essentially amounts to a lot of sound and fury signifying nothing. I'll be interested to see what the Q1 fundraising results look like and if they were able to fund raise off this particular piece of legislation and tap into all that fervour and fever dreams that were coming off the convoy wing of the conservative movement in and around late February, early March, when all of this was going down.

In the meantime what has it done? It has essentially poisoned the well with municipalities. When you have, like, the Alberta Municipalities president saying that we're concerned that the government is setting a troubling precedent without any prior consultation, then when we heard a great deal of disappointment at Alberta Municipalities not just over this but over a number of other decisions, you know, really what it does is – it's unnecessary, and it essentially puts us in a cul-de-sac in which we cannot move forward together. You have one order of government that is just simply going to go at it on their own and municipalities sort of left guessing about what is going to happen in terms of developing their communities.

I think the other thing, you know, this attempt to drive this wedge in this way, Mr. Chair, is also just emblematic of how the pandemic response just went so horribly off the rails in the end and really attempted – and this bill is emblematic of that – just trying to rip at the seams of social cohesion when it was completely unnecessary to do so and drive this politicization of either masks or vaccination or proof of vaccination like either on a card or a QR code. Just completely unnecessary to engage in this sort of divisive polarization of basic public health measures. At this point we just have to hope. We just have to hope that we don't have to go backwards at all. I certainly hope that for my kids and for the immunocompromised people in my life and even just the relatively otherwise healthy people. This is a group of people, across the way, the UCP, that has even politicized the concept of pre-existing conditions. I mean, we all have them. That is to say that we have lungs and respiratory systems and circulatory systems.

You know, I gave it a long bracketed text for this amendment act, but really, Mr. Chair, at the end of the day this is the Vaporization of Good Faith bill. That is what this is. This is the UCP government just throwing a grenade behind them as they walk out the door of their just absolutely shockingly poor pandemic management and response and all of the economic and social and community costs that came with that, a lowlight reel of two years of poor decision-making. When you vaporize good faith like that, you also vaporize trust. That has been broken with municipalities – there's no question – and it's been broken with the electorate, too. I heard earlier the hon. Member for Calgary-Bow talking about door-knocking during the last election. Well, I door-knock between elections. I did it when we were in government, and I do it now. Just go out there and talk to people now: that is what I would say. That word "trust" comes up every single time.

With that, I will conclude my remarks on this bill, on this unnecessary piece of legislation. You know, hopefully, going into the future, we can begin to repair some of those broken relationships of trust both with the electorate and with the municipalities more broadly.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has risen again.

Mr. McIver: Yeah. I might have been wrong in something I said. I gave credit to the other side that they wanted COVID to go away. I think I just heard from the remarks we just heard that they want COVID to stay, on the other side. They see that as their last desperate grasp at maybe getting a slight chance to get back into government.

You know what? COVID has been hard on everybody. No one has raised more money than the folks on the other side based on COVID. No other opposition in Canada has fought their government every step of the way. No matter what the government did over the last couple of years, they have folks on the other side who always say: don't do it. Then they'd stand up here the next day and say: why aren't people getting vaccinated? Well, maybe it's because a third of the elected people in the province are saying: don't do what the government recommends. Then they won't take any responsibility for that.

All they saw COVID as was a way for political gain, to raise money. And you know what? For a little while it worked. Their poll numbers were better. I'm sure they were pretty happy with themselves. You know who's really sad that COVID is going away now and we don't know what the virus will do next because nobody does? It's the folks on the other side. Now they're where they've always been.

You know what? Even when people were mad at us, you know what I heard when I talked to people? "I don't want the folks that were here last. We need you to get us past COVID so that we can vote for you again, because those folks that were here the four years before: we never ever want to get them near the reins of power again, near the ability to have influence and trash our lives like they did for four straight years." Maybe I was wrong in giving them credit for not wanting COVID to be here. It's hard to say after the last speech I just heard. But on this side we really want it to go away. The other good news is that people are a lot happier now, and even the ones that aren't happy tell me that they don't want the folks on the other side. They had a lifetime of that during the last four years.

The Deputy Chair: Are there any other members wishing to join debate on Bill 4?

[The clauses of Bill 4 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Deputy Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chair: Any opposed? That is carried and so ordered.

Bill 5

Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments to be made at this time? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has risen.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate a chance to just say a few more words in regard to Bill 5. As I had said before, I think that certainly I support the idea behind trying to make our roads more safe.

I put on a lot of kilometres in the last few days, and it popped into my head, this bill, as I passed various kinds of things on the side of the road. What occurred to me once again, Mr. Chair, is the importance of standardizing the behaviours around when there is a snowplow or an ambulance or police or whatever on the side of road so that people don't have to think about, "Well, what am I meant to do in this circumstance?" and somehow change or alter that according to the size of the car or the colour of the light or whatever, right? The degree to which we can standardize that so it's almost like internalized in your head – you see the thing, you know what to do. You don't have to have an internal conversation about that. You just do it.

In that sense, this bill, I think, helps with that idea, and for that I do support it. Of course, you have people driving very fast – right? – on the roads that I was on these last few days, and you need to make sure everybody is on the same page in regard to slowing down for emergencies on the side of the road. We need to have a good element of education around this bill as well. I think I heard the minister talking about that before, and certainly that's the key to the highway, literally. It's to have people fully informed on a constant basis of what they're meant to do when they encounter something on the side of the road.

Just a quick comment as well around opening this act. You know, I did notice, when we were talking about other traffic issues that have been occurring here in the province of Alberta and then having an opportunity by opening up this act with Bill 5, we could have – would have, could have, should have – looked at other elements of traffic safety that could have served us very well in the last few months and prepare us for any contingency in the future. I think that during the blockade of the border, for example, at Coutts a lot of people were calling on the minister to exercise her authority to revoke operating licences for folks that were acting illegally, trafficwise and otherwise, at the border crossing. We did hear the minister say that they did do a legal analysis, and they needed to open up the Traffic Safety Act in order to strengthen that so that they could have that tool at their disposal in the future.

Well, by golly, you know, Mr. Chair, here we are with the Traffic Safety Act open right now, and that would have been a good thing to do, quite frankly, because having those sorts of blockades is not safe. It causes a lot of social disorder, and it costs millions and millions of dollars. If we have that kind of tool available to us, using the Traffic Safety Act, that's the way that you can really get a message through to people who choose to block or disrupt traffic: their licences, right? Of course, they probably have a big truck because they also have a commercial operation that involves that licence. I mean, that's the only point that I failed to make previously in regard to opening this act.

I'm fully in favour of opening the act in order to increase safety on the side of a road, and I would encourage people to vote in favour of this. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has risen again.

Ms Phillips: Thanks, Mr. Chair. I also want to add a few comments at this committee stage to the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022. I spoke to this at second reading, and I raised a few questions that I don't know if the minister would like to update the House on. I mean, I'll be voting in favour of this legislation regardless, but we did raise just a few questions around some of the public education campaign and some of those details. If the minister would like to share any of that. Of course, enforcement: the idea is that it would start in the spring of '23, and there's a public education campaign before that, which is very standard for these kinds of things as they're kind of phased in.

Another thing that we had asked about or, I believe, I raised at second reading was if there was any analysis or assessment around serious collisions prevention and any interjurisdictional comparison. For example, Ontario and British Columbia have brought in similar legislation, so if there were other pieces or other information that she wanted to provide there. Of course, we did ask and many of us wondered out loud why additional changes were not included in this act, in particular around commercial licensing or other penalties for engaging in the blocking of highways and the use of heavy equipment to do so, which is already an offence under the Traffic Safety Act, but this was certainly an ability to ensure appropriate penalties for these kinds of activities. It would have been an opportunity in this legislation.

You know, on the way up here there were emergency vehicles stopped at the side of the road again, and some people just blow by still. That's why this legislation is needed, because even with the emergency vehicles – that is to say, police or whatever – in response to the legislation that came in in 2005, still some people, I guess, are blissfully unaware. Certainly, broadening this, I think, would be really helpful because then maybe at some point some of those drivers will finally get the message, and that will make us all safer. Certainly, a lot of the people in this Chamber and probably the hon. minister as well spend a lot of time on the highway. I know that I do, and I would really appreciate more safety measures.

That public education piece is really important. You can't necessarily, you know, respond in a law enforcement way, but you certainly have to within an education way but then having that stick at the end of the day, which this legislation provides for. Some of these fines are quite considerable, Mr. Chair. For the dozens and dozens of people that are listening tonight, fines ranging from $136 to $826 are pretty considerable. That's going to sting, and that's a good thing, too, and I commend the minister for making sure that those fines were, like, appropriate and appropriately calibrated to the offence.

I will conclude my comments there, Mr. Chair, except to just add one thing, which is that there was an ambulance going the other way when I was driving home to my condo at about 5 o'clock. I signalled and pulled over to the side of the road. I was just on a city street. The guy behind me darn near rear-ended me. That has been the rule for a long time, yet some people still don't have the memo, so I wish the minister well in her public education campaign. I am pleased to report that nobody rear-ended me although it was close. You know, sometimes this traffic safety stuff really is a long arc of getting compliance in order, but at the same time it is worth doing because public safety is worth it when it is reasonable, when it is common sense, and when it protects people at work. This legislation does all three.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate as well at this stage?

Okay. Are you ready for the question on Bill 5, Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022?

[The clauses of Bill 5 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Deputy Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chair: Any opposed? That is carried.

I see the hon. Deputy Government House Leader has risen.

10:10

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I move that the committee rise and report bills 4 and 5.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Camrose is rising.

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bills: Bill 4 and Bill 5.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Acting Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. That is carried and so ordered.

I see the Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Indeed, you do, Mr. Speaker, and I appreciate you acknowledging me. Lots of great work done this evening. Albertans are well served by the members of the Chamber, but I move that we adjourn the Chamber until 1:30 p.m. tomorrow.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 10:11 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, March 30, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen, to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interest and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, joining us in the Speaker's gallery today are very special guests of the Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville. I would like to introduce her son Joseph Homeniuk, accompanied by Caitlin Meneses, his girlfriend. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Also joining us today is Rinay Chand, nephew of the Member for Calgary-East, and he is accompanied by Nancy Narayan and Vishal Bijay.

We don't quite have a school group here yet, but they will be joining us as guests of the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley, the Worsley central school from Worsley, Alberta.

Also in the galleries today is Madison Forster, a social work student currently doing her practicum in the constituency office of Edmonton-Strathcona, and Kelly Harris, a constituent and guest of the Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Last but not least, I met some very lovely folks today touring the Legislature. I might just add that public tours are available again to members, their constituents, or members of the public. We have a guest visiting all the way from Toronto and another one from here in Edmonton. Would you all please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Peace River.

Federal Climate Plan

Mr. Williams: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the eco criminal Liberal minister announced his new climate plan. Alberta's government made its position absolutely clear. This plan is insane and unworkable. I must say that the response from our opposition across the way was interesting. They came out and claimed for the first time in their political careers, in their lives perhaps, that they were opposed to Justin Trudeau. They claimed, in contrast to the entire time they were in government, that they were going to stand up for Alberta.

Well, this was curious because the truth is that this is the party that brought in the job-killing carbon tax before Justin Trudeau. This is the party that tried to meddle in our electricity markets and spiked the costs for Albertans to enable the ill-advised green energy scheme, bringing bureaucrats to change your light bulbs and shower heads. Well, I have an answer for Albertans. Just like celebrities at the Oscars on the weekend, the NDP are actors. They're acting, Mr. Speaker. They're acting and pretending that they agree with the priorities of Albertans for purely selfish, cynical reasons. An old dog can't learn new tricks, and that's true for the NDP.

On top of the anti-oil rhetoric of the Alberta NDP, we can see their true position plainly and clearly now through the statements of their federal leader, Jagmeet Singh, who recently struck a new deal, a coalition deal, with Justin Trudeau. They had something to say on this last night. He said that this radical climate plan from the Trudeau Liberals was not radical enough, Mr. Speaker. He said that the NDP were going to use their influence in Ottawa in the coalition that they just formed to make the plan even worse and to make it more radical, to step up the attack on Alberta's ethical energy.

The Leader of the Opposition here in Alberta could come out and denounce her federal leader, she could disassociate from the federal NDP, but we all know that that won't happen. As the old Alberta adage goes, you can't suck and blow at the same time. You can't both be on the side of Jagmeet Singh and be against Justin Trudeau. You must pick a lane, Mr. Speaker. Albertans know which lane we're in over here in the Conservatives.

Cost of Living

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, I'm proud to represent the constituents of northwest Edmonton, and it is my duty to stand up and bring their concerns to this Chamber so that the government can take action. Right now my constituents are being hammered by the cost-of-living crisis created by this UCP government. Utility bills are at a record high, insurance rates have been climbing, school fees, property taxes, tuition, interest payments; the list goes on. And despite their claims, this government is using a sneaky income tax hike to take a billion dollars away from Alberta families. Making life more expensive for Albertans has been a constant focus of this government from day one.

I received a message from a constituent whose bill for electricity doubled to $600. He's never seen, in his life, a bill this high. The UCP only offers $50 cheques and a fake natural gas rebate in return. I've gotten letters from families who are now choosing between buying groceries and paying their power bills, families who are coping with more debt because they can't afford to make the full payment each month, families with two incomes that are worried about having their power cut off, and this government is offering them nothing even resembling support. That's not just from my constituents, Mr. Speaker. Albertans from one corner of this province to the other are struggling with these crises.

While each day the associate minister claims to be empathetic with the high cost of living, he also refuses each and every day to actually take action and provide anything that resembles relief, proving that Albertans just can't trust this UCP to step up for them. Albertans are struggling. They watch this government fail to respond, fail to show real compassion for the difficulties that they are in, abandoning Albertans when they need the help the most. My message to this government today is simple. Albertans deserve better. They deserve a government that cares about them, and they sure don't see it from this UCP.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Military Children

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As we approach the start of April, I'd like to remind this House that April is the Month of the Military Child, a time to recognize the strength and resilience of children growing up in military families.

As the government of Alberta's liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces I am honoured to regularly speak with the forces' members and their families. Parents among them are quick to speak of their children and hopes for the future, yet many of these parents also acknowledge the challenges caused by frequent moves and faraway deployments that are a fact of life for the forces' members and their families. Members can face new assignments to different parts of the country and even sudden deployment that can take them halfway around the globe.

Mr. Speaker, service members can spend upwards of 25 per cent or more of their professional services away from their families. The impact of separation and relocation on children can be significant and lead to emotional and even physical issues. Civilian children, teammates, teachers, and other adults often do not fully understand their experience, which can leave these children feeling isolated, a reality that was confirmed in the 2013 Ombudsman report from National Defence. This is why it is so important that educators be trained and given tools that better assist military children and that we identify the services not only in education but also in health care that can help assist children and their families through frequent relocations.

I want to thank the government of Alberta for always having an open door to learning how we can take more action on these important initiatives. It is so important to be mindful of children who may be living with long separation from a parent and check in on them. Educators, coaches, other adults in the lives of military children can help by being a listening ear and ensuring that each child has access to supports and services they need to flourish as young adults.

Mr. Speaker, there is no shortage of turmoil in this world. I ask that we consider and be mindful of the burden that military children take on. Some will have a parent deployed in Europe at this very moment, and others will know what a broader conflict could bring. Let's recognize and celebrate military children in Alberta communities and all that they and their parents contribute to our province and country.

Greenhouse Gas Emission Reduction Targets

Ms Ganley: We need to reduce our emissions. The science is clear. In order to do that, we need real targets, not aspirational goals. A real plan must protect Alberta workers and their families. A real plan must engage, genuinely engage, with Alberta's energy industry, and that's not what we saw from the federal government yesterday.

For all of that, we need a provincial government that can stand up and speak credibly on behalf of Albertans, that acknowledges the progress we need to make and advocates for real targets and real details. Alberta must play a leading role in the international effort against climate change, and we are proud to contribute, but Alberta deserves real support to build our economy of the future, and Alberta's share of $9 billion is not going to do it, particularly when the energy industry is being asked to do a huge part of the heavy lifting when compared to others like transportation.

Alberta's energy industry has committed to net zero by 2050, a goal shared by Alberta's NDP, but to do that, we need real targets, a real plan with real details and real funding not just for technology but for people who will be displaced, real people with real families who deserve real support. These are reasonable requests, so why didn't they reach Ottawa? Maybe because the Premier of Alberta is not spending his time making that argument. Maybe it's because he's spending his time defending himself from various investigations. Maybe he's out selling memberships for his leadership review, or perhaps he's just too busy making Will Smith memes.

The UCP is incapable of having grown-up conversations about what is reasonable, what is achievable, and how to contribute to making real progress on the real issue of climate change, and the results are clear. The UCP is utterly preoccupied with their own internal political drama, and they are failing Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Lesser Slave Lake Constituency Update

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The last couple of weeks I've had the pleasure of meeting with municipalities from across my constituency of Lesser Slave Lake at the Rural Municipalities association spring convention. We were able to meet with the ministers and discuss the rising needs in our area and look forward to following up and getting help to where it is needed.

There have also been exciting new developments happening in the riding with regard to health care. With the old High Prairie hospital demolition well under way, I am excited to see what AHS will plan for the future of this property. There are also plans to expand on the number of available doctors in the Wabasca area, helping reduce the workloads for doctors and improving the care we need.

I was happy to see that the East Prairie Métis settlement was awarded $300,000 through the government STIP grant. This is much-needed funding and will go towards projects in the community. We're also seeing additional funding at St. Francis of Assisi Catholic academy in Slave Lake. This will help with the cost of much-needed repairs in the school, guaranteeing a higher quality of education for all in our community.

I'm happy to be seeing an increase of in-person meetings, community activities, and events popping up all over as the warm weather comes and daylight gets longer.

Three years ago, when I took office, one of the biggest concerns I heard from businesses was about the lack of work that was out there. I am now hearing from these same businesses that they are having troubles finding workers for all the work that they are getting.

With so many great things happening throughout Lesser Slave Lake and with its people, I am excited to see what will come next. With the pandemic behind us, the restrictions lifted, record investments, a balanced budget, and so much more, I can just feel that this year will be a great one.

Thank you.

Economic Indicators

Member Loyola: The UCP likes to make bold claims about the state of our economy, but they are strangers to the truth, and Albertans can't trust what they say. Here are the facts.

The UCP promised that if they cut corporate taxes, investments would come flooding into the province, but even before the pandemic investment dropped, our economy shrank, and 50,000 full-time jobs were lost. As a result, companies laid off hundreds of staff or invested elsewhere. The UCP doubled down on their corporate tax giveaway, even accelerating it. At the time the Premier said that companies would be irresponsible for not moving to Alberta.

Since then the number of head offices in Calgary has gone from 117 to 102. Now roughly one-third of office spaces in downtown Calgary sit empty, levels not seen since the Great Depression, and Calgary has had the highest unemployment rate among major cities in Canada. According to RBC Economics capital investment is expected to increase across the country by 8.5 per cent, with Saskatchewan leading the way at 18.5 per cent. Meanwhile Alberta will have the second-lowest capital investment growth rate, at 4.8 per cent, but even with the increase in capital investment this year, it is expected to be below levels seen under our government.

When it comes to investment in start-ups, the news isn't much better. Other jurisdictions saw massive increases in venture capital investment. Ontario attracted $7.9 billion last year, a 295 per cent increase over the year before. Meanwhile Alberta attracted $561 million in investment, a 23 per cent increase. Despite having 11 per cent of Canada's population, we only attracted 4 per cent of the venture capital investment in the country last year.

At the same time, wages aren't keeping up with inflation, and the UCP government is responding by piling on more costs to Albertans. In the end, Albertans are working harder and harder just to survive, and the UCP is telling them that everything is fine. Conservatives like to say that they are better for the economy, but life was much better for Albertans under the Alberta NDP. When we form government in 2023, we'll bring back real advantage.

Electric Vehicles

Mr. Rowswell: Mr. Speaker, lately there's been a big shift towards green technologies and energy sources while reducing our consumption of fossil fuels. Yet again I seek to remind this House that there is an underlying cost and consequence to these types of technologies. One of these technologies is the electric vehicle. However, as so often with green technologies, the cost of these highly promoted initiatives is not always communicated.

The push for electric vehicles goes beyond purchasing the said vehicle and accessing its corresponding charging platform. A large influx of electric vehicles would create capacity problems in our electrical system. Notably, EPCOR found that a 15 per cent penetration of electric vehicles into the market would require a $2 billion grid upgrade in Edmonton alone. Transmission and distribution costs already make up more than half of some Albertans' utility bills, yet it remains unclear how much an upgrade of this magnitude in Edmonton will cost them.

Further, Mr. Speaker, while a portion of the money we spend goes to taxes that upkeep our roads and infrastructure when we fill our gas vehicles, the same does not apply to electric vehicles. As gas-fuelled vehicles use roads extensively, it makes sense that they should help pay for their upkeep. However, drivers of electric vehicles also use our roads and don't pay upkeep taxes when they charge their vehicles.

As of April 1 we will temporarily remove this gas tax. However, in the future, if and when the tax is reinstated, it would be critical to find out how electric vehicles could contribute towards road maintenance. Going forward, I believe we need to be open and transparent with the consequences of such green technological advances.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Physician Recruitment and Retention in Lethbridge

Ms Phillips: Well, in the past few days we've learned that it's actually 41 doctors that have left southern Alberta over the past two years. Half the folks in the region don't have a family doctor. Over the last 48 hours I've heard from patients who just got letters from two more doctors leaving Lethbridge. Now, two years ago, right before the pandemic hit, the Leader of the Opposition and I met with a large group of physicians in Lethbridge. They described how tearing up the doctors' agreement would hasten the collapse of primary care in the south zone. This group of physicians warned the Leader of the Opposition and I of a severe crisis coming to Lethbridge. I know these doctors said the same words to the UCP

Health minister, the Premier, and the UCP MLA for Lethbridge-East. They were ignored.

Everything that group of physicians said was terrifyingly correct. The UCP war on doctors has in fact destroyed primary health care as we know it in Lethbridge. We do not have walk-in clinics. You can't get your blood work sent anywhere. It's a disaster when it comes to referrals. I heard from Bryce a couple of days ago, whose dad just lost his doctor. Bryce says: "My dad has Parkinson's, is a cancer survivor, had a wonky hip replacement. Who's writing his prescriptions? Who's doing follow-ups?" And it's not getting better no matter how many times the Health minister stands in this place and fills this room full of velvet fog, telling the people of Lethbridge that he's strategizing to synergize the meetings for an approach to a strategy that may one day result in some more meetings.

The UCP has shredded trust in Lethbridge. I think folks all understand that governing during a pandemic is hard, but what people cannot forgive is systematic dismantling of primary health care and then turning around and telling us that there's no problem, that it's all in our heads, which the Premier did last week in response to a question from me. He said that there are more doctors, that there's nothing to worry about.

No wonder no one trusts the UCP. They are incapable of good faith. The UCP may have been the ones to dismantle primary health care in Lethbridge, but come 2023, they will not be sent back to this Legislature to be the ones to fix it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Budget 2022 and Alberta's Future

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Recently I had the pleasure of meeting with grades 5 and 6 students at Belfast school in my constituency. I was asked many great questions, one of which came from a young lady from grade 6 who asked me how this budget prepared her and her classmates for success in the future. That's a great question, and here are a few key items I want to share with her and with all young leaders of tomorrow.

For starters, our government achieved a balanced budget for the first time in nearly a decade. A balanced budget means that there will be less debt for her to pay, which means that more tax dollars can go towards important things like health care, education, mental health. She will not have to pay for today tomorrow.

Our government is committing $3.5 billion for health care facilities, equipment, and IT systems to expand health care capacity for Albertans province-wide, and this creates thousands of good-paying jobs, jobs she will have the skills and the knowledge to thrive in.

As we focus on moving forward, our government is committed to preparing young people for the jobs of tomorrow by providing $600 million for skills and training development. The new initiatives will address barriers for K through 12, postsecondary students, employment for women, Indigenous peoples, and other underrepresented groups and make Alberta an internationally recognized technology and innovation hub so that she will have the opportunity to be trained and ready for the economy of the future right here in Alberta.

She and her classmates are very caring and concerned about the well-being of others. That was obvious to me. Budget 2022 includes $1 billion annually for addiction and mental health care and additional funding of $60 million for the next three years to build a recovery-oriented system of care. We continue to fund programs that are helping our most vulnerable. To the students at Belfast school, these are just some of the important items Budget 2022 covers. I encourage her and everyone to see how this budget is helping you and our future.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Fuel Prices and Cost of Living

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are struggling with the high cost of living. Inflation is at a 30-year high, and for many Albertans the bills just keep piling up. Now, the Premier claims that his deferral of the gas tax will ensure at least a 10-cent drop at the pumps. The problem is that there's no guarantee this relief won't be swallowed up by retailers before it ever reaches motorists. Today our Energy critic proposed that an audit be done by a third party to report back in a month on whether or not this plan actually helped Alberta consumers. Will the Premier commit to doing that audit today?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, we'll be closely monitoring retail response. We believe that retailers, many of which are mom-and-pop small businesses, will pass on the full savings to Alberta consumers. But you know where we really need an audit? We need an audit on the NDP-Liberal coalition plan to raise the carbon tax by 400 per cent. When the NDP sheds crocodile tears about higher fuel prices, it's like an arsonist crying about the fire that he set. They want gas prices higher and higher and higher. They want it to go up 400 cent in the next eight years. They could change their opinion, though, and vote for our motion against the carbon tax hike tonight.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, the Premier knows the biggest driver of the price of gas is the price of oil. Gas prices have already gone up 20 cents in the three weeks since his plan was announced. Drivers struggling with these spiralling costs deserve support in their pocket. Now, the Premier is expecting a windfall budget as oil prices stay high. Albertans, who are the owner of that resource, deserve to get some of the benefits, too. If he can't work with retailers or anyone to make sure that the price drops, why doesn't he skip them and put the cash directly into the hands of drivers?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the NDP-Liberal coalition in Ottawa released their disastrous attack on Canadian families that will kill jobs, hammer Alberta's economy, that would imply not a carbon tax increase of 400 per cent but of a thousand per cent. Now, just based on the NDP's plan of going to a $170 carbon tax, that would add 40 cents to the price of each litre of gas purchased by Albertans. Why, with 30-year inflation, does the NDP want to drive inflation even higher?

Ms Notley: You know, Mr. Speaker, for the moment the Premier is still in government, and he's the one that should be coming up with solutions. Instead, yesterday what he said was: "I don't know what more we can do. I really don't." Let me help. The Premier could bring in a real gas rebate, give more than 50 bucks on electricity bills, which are in the thousands, restore the cap on car insurance, restore the cap on tuition, scrap his plan to tax inflation, which on its own takes $400 from families. If the Premier is serious, will he do any of these things in his control today or just shake his fist at everybody else?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, at 12:01 a.m. this Friday Alberta's government suspends the 13-cent-a-litre Alberta fuel tax. That, on an annual basis, is worth $1.4 billion of consumer relief. But, more than that, it also means that the GST won't be charged on the Alberta fuel tax. That's another $65 million of savings. Meanwhile the leader of the NDP has taken out her pompoms to cheer on the same Trudeau coalition in their plan to raise the carbon tax by 400 per cent. Why does she want to punish families that way?

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition for her second set of questions.

Child and Youth Advocate Recommendations

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, Starlight was 12 years old. She was Indigenous. She loved to paint. She was exposed to parental substance abuse and later died of a seizure. Barry loved music. He experienced homelessness and violence. He died of drug poisoning at age 15. Celeste was 19. She loved to dance. She experienced abuse and neglect. She was murdered. Now, these are just three stories of children who died in care, detailed in the final report of our current Child and Youth Advocate. These children matter. What is the Premier doing today to prevent the death of children in care?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, every death of a child is a tragedy, and it's particularly serious when we see a child in care for whom the government has some custodial responsibility. We thank the office of the Child and Youth Advocate for their partnership in supporting vulnerable children in Alberta. The Ministry of Children's Services will respond publicly to recommendations issued by the advocate within 75 days. We're committed to being transparent. We'll respond within that time frame. In addition, we're co-ordinating with external bodies like the advocate, the office of the chief medical officer, and the Fatality Review Board.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, more children have died this year than ever before. This is not a one-off. The Premier has seen these numbers coming for months. The advocate's exasperation with the UCP's inaction was heard in the report. "These issues are not new. Rather, they persist despite numerous recommendations to address them, which amplifies the need for stronger accountability." The advocate wants ministries to appear before an all-party committee and answer questions about actions taken and actions not taken. Will the Premier set this up? Will he put children first? Will he find a way to maintain accountability?

Mr. Kenney: Yes, of course, Mr. Speaker, we need accountability, particularly when it comes to the tragic loss of life of children in care. We also need to ensure the proper resourcing of those services, which is exactly why the budget just passed increases the budget for child intervention in the Ministry of Children's Services from $796 million annually to $842 million annually. We've allocated $29 million specifically for the child and youth health services initiative and taken additional action to do everything possible to protect children in care.

Ms Notley: More children than ever have died this year, Mr. Speaker, and the advocate is calling for accountability from each ministry for his recommendations. More safe housing options separate from shelters, greater training for care workers, stronger action on the opioids crisis, earlier intervention with mental health supports: these recommendations and more should be a wake-up call for every member of this Assembly and every member of that front bench. One more time: why is this Premier refusing to set up the committee that the advocate is asking for so that all members of this House . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, I understand that eight of the 15 deaths referred to were amongst children who, sadly, experienced drug overdoses or were victims of suicide. That is reflective of what we know is a broader mental health crisis amongst children and youth all across Canada. That is why we are investing in youth mental health hubs, the mental health capacity building in schools, the Kids Help Phone, the honouring life: Indigenous youth suicide prevention program, and much more to ensure that the supports are there for kids who are facing either addictions or mental health challenges.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods and the Opposition House Leader.

Political Party Membership Sale and Purchase

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, last fall this government filibustered their own Bill 81, and they did it to prevent one of their own caucus members from introducing an amendment. That amendment would have prevented changing the elections laws to allow the UCP to buy party memberships for people without their consent and without their knowledge of knowing that this was done in their name. Will the Premier tell this House whether he believes the UCP should have an Albertan's permission before enrolling them as a party member, and does this nakedly corrupt practice align with the Premier's personal values?

Mr. Kenney: Well, that was a party, not a government, question, Mr. Speaker, but the answer is yes. That is why the bylaws of the United Conservative Party require that people purchasing memberships either do so directly or for a member of their immediate family, unlike the bylaws of the NDP, which include no such requirement. There has never been a statutory regulation of party membership sales. There has never been in our history, nor is there in any other province or at the federal level. The question is: why does the NDP not have a bylaw preventing that kind of activity?

Ms Gray: You couldn't buy memberships for people without their knowledge before their bill, and now you can, and this government's flimsy excuse for why Bill 81 needed to change that does not make sense. It was rejected by Albertans. It was rejected by multiple UCP MLAs who voted against that bill. Now there are allegations coming up that stealth members are becoming part of the UCP's leadership review. It's a concern Albertans and some UCP MLAs share. Will the Premier agree that changing the law to allow someone to buy a political membership in another person's name without their knowledge or consent is undemocratic and un-Albertan? Will he commit to repealing it?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, in their panic to prevent the creation of the United Conservative Party, the NDP went through, I think, four different iterations of elections law. In none of those bills – in none of them – did they seek to regulate the sale or purchase of party memberships, and I know why. It's because they give the unions in their party structure supervotes. Gil McGowan gets to choose 25 per cent of the delegates to an NDP leadership election. I want to know: what deal did the Leader of the Opposition make with him for his votes?

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, I will put the Premier's fantasy about how our party runs against the reality that they changed the law to allow the buying of memberships without knowledge or consent. They did that after a thorough debate in this Chamber, and they did that after three UCP MLAs spoke against it, voted against it, and tried to amend it, but they wouldn't allow that to happen. Will the Premier bring forward a fix immediately to remain committed to the practice of upholding democracy, or will this Premier continue to increasingly embarrass and be desperate in this effort to . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, neither Alberta nor the other nine provincial Legislatures nor the federal Parliament have ever had a statutory provision with respect to the internal governance of party membership sales, but the UCP does. Section 4.1.5 of our bylaws says that members must "have paid the prescribed membership fee, personally or through an immediate family member (spouse, child, or parent)." Interestingly, I have the NDP constitution here, and there is no such provision. You know why? Because they're run by the unions.

Child and Youth Advocate Recommendations

Ms Pancholi: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the office of the Child and Youth Advocate released another mandatory child death review report. From the beginning of April to the end of September last year 18 young Albertans died under this government's watch. In the report the advocate wrote: "We have recently seen an unprecedented number of deaths. This is the largest report we have released during a six-month period." The advocate has repeatedly called on this government to provide greater transparency on what their ministries are doing or not doing to improve outcomes for young people in care. Will the Premier step up and have his ministers finally answer the advocate's calls for transparency?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Any time a child dies, especially when they are or have been in care of the government or have come into contact with the child intervention system, it is a tragedy. We work closely with the office of the Child and Youth Advocate to make changes where they're needed. Just a couple of years ago we did have an all-party panel on child intervention, which was very much needed because there wasn't any transparency within the system. Obviously, we saw that under the members opposite. Out of that came this new process, which will ensure accountability and transparency and make sure that changes are made where they're needed.

Ms Pancholi: Mr. Speaker, I'm wondering if the Premier of this province has spent the time, as I did last night, reading the 113-page report from the Child and Youth Advocate and if he read the stories of each of the young people who died last year. I'm going to say their names because they deserve to be on the record: Claire, Starlight, Suzie, Abby, Barry, Jay, Justine, Nicki, Odin, Joseph, Mariame, Celeste, Mark, Meghan, and Ray. These are real young people who lost their lives last year. The advocate's call is very clear: to provide transparency. Will the Premier allow his ministers to report to this House on their work?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I can tell you that not only did I read the report that the member is speaking about; I read that report alongside every briefing note with details from the ministry so that I could understand where changes need to be made. As I have said a number of times in this House, I am not going to wait to take action where needed. There is transparency. We follow the process put forward by the members opposite. I know the Leader of the Opposition was very invested in that process, that was implemented after the all-party panel. We'll continue to follow that, be transparent, and make changes where they're needed.

Ms Pancholi: Mr. Speaker, the trend that we are seeing right now of the rising number of young people who have died in this province has been reported since last year. This minister has said that she will not wait, but she has been waiting. Albertans have been waiting. And while she's been waiting, young people are dying. The advocate has been very clear in his recommendations. Allow those ministries to come before a committee of this House to report on the work they're doing. It's a simple request for transparency and accountability as Alberta faces a crisis. It is boggling to me why this government would not want to account for that work unless there is something to hide.

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, the reason why I asked my department for a detailed review of each and every one of these cases and to look for patterns that we're seeing is because we will make changes. Unlike the members opposite, who tried to make a media story go away – that is what the members opposite tried to do – we are investing in the recovery-oriented system of care, making sure that there are not 4,000 but 8,000 treatment beds, and I am working with the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions to make sure that there are supports in place to help young people, because they need it, and they need it now.

Rural Emergency Medical Services

Mrs. Frey: Mr. Speaker, I'm not alone in this House when I say that members of my constituency tell me regularly that they're worried about an ambulance being available when they dial 911. That's especially true for rural areas, where the vast distances between cities, towns, farms, and the nearest hospital mean that every single moment counts. Last week this House approved the very first balanced budget in eight years for the province of Alberta, but to the Minister of Health: how does Budget 2022 address rural EMS concerns?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you so much to the hon. member for the question. Access to emergency medical services, especially in rural Alberta, is a key focus of our plan to make sure all Albertans have access to the care they need when they need it. Budget 2022 provides $64 million specifically to ease the pressure on the overall EMS system. We also created the Alberta EMS Provincial Advisory Committee, whose work will guide how we can address these rural issues and issues across our entire province. We know there are issues with rural EMS in Alberta, and we are taking steps to address them.

Mrs. Frey: Thank you to the minister for that answer. Given that one of the issues we hear about often from paramedic crews is burnout and given that the number and length of shifts that they have to do coupled with the extremely difficult situations they're responding to is unimaginable for many, again to the Minister of Health: how does Budget 2022 address burnout and improve capacity, particularly within the community of Bassano, located in the riding of Brooks-Medicine Hat?

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta's EMS workers face a high-stress environment as they save the lives of Albertans. Like others, they deserve a workplace that puts their well-being at the forefront. AHS began implementing its 10-point action plan this year to increase overall capacity and improve the system's efficiency. Point 4 of that plan specifically addresses the issue of worker fatigue. I'm happy to let the member know that Budget 2022 includes $14 million for AHS's hours-of-work initiative to reduce worker fatigue in 14 rural communities, including the town of Bassano in the member's constituency, and I'm also looking forward for any recommendations coming from the advisory committee.

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Minister. Given that another concern for rural constituents is the availability of air ambulances when we need them and given that I've been advocating for HALO to receive stable and predictable funding since day one of being elected and further given that I have raised this with you repeatedly, Minister, the fact that HALO is nearly totally reliant on the local community for support and is currently without a long-term contract to provide air ambulance services to Alberta, to the minister: can you please tell the House when HALO can expect sustainable, long-term, predictable funding so that southern Albertans can get the service that they deserve?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the hon. member for her tireless advocacy for HALO air ambulance, based in Medicine Hat. As the member knows, Budget '22 continues $28 million in supports for ground and helicopter air ambulance services. Last week I had the honour of joining the Premier and the Member for Highwood to announce $15 million in sustainable funding for STARS air ambulance in Calgary, and I hope the Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat and I will have the opportunity in the very near future to speak publicly about our government's support for HALO.

Fuel Prices

Ms Ganley: It has now been three weeks since the Premier announced that the government will no longer collect the fuel tax in an attempt to help Albertans, but simply not collecting the fuel tax doesn't mean the savings will be passed on to consumers. This Premier hopes that retailers will pass it along and that Albertans will see a 13-cent discount, but no one over there could provide any assurance. To the Premier: what specific guarantees do you have in place to ensure retailers pass the savings along to Albertans, or is this just another billion-dollar add-on to your corporate handout?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You can hear the insecurity in the voice of the opposition when they talk about this incredible fuel tax suspension measure. I'm confident that we have enough competition in our gasoline and diesel retail sector. We've reached out to retailers. We're confident that they will be providing relief, the 13, actually 13.6, cents of relief, to consumers. Again, we're taking real action to deal with the affordability challenge.

Ms Ganley: Given that earlier today I called on this government to provide a third-party audit to assure Albertans that vendors actually reduce their prices by 13 cents and don't just pocket the difference and given that Albertans deserve to know that $1.3 billion is going to support them, not pad bottom lines, to the Premier: will he work with us to put an independent auditor in place to make sure $1.3 billion of relief make it to the pockets of Albertans?

Mr. Toews: Again, Mr. Speaker, we will be monitoring how retailers respond to this reduction in fuel tax. I'm confident that they will be reducing the price of gasoline and diesel fuel by the 13 cents a litre. What we hear from the opposition is basically a plan of government intrusion, overreach, overreach that they would ultimately do to every business and every sector in this province. They had four years to do that. They chased out tens of billions of dollars of investment. Tens of thousands of Albertans lost their jobs. We will not do that.

Ms Ganley: Given that a recent study from the U.S. showed that fuel tax breaks often don't get passed on to consumers – most are just pocketed by corporations or retailers – and given that the American Road & Transportation Builders Association chief economist states that this type of tax holiday is often well intentioned but ineffectual, can the Premier stand up in this House and provide actual assurances to Albertans that they will see this relief? If not, why won't he commit to an audit?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, we've reached out to retailers. We're confident that they will be dropping the prices by 13 cents a litre, and for any outliers that don't, they simply won't sell fuel. We have so many retailers across the province, and we will be monitoring it. But what's very evident is that the members opposite know that this is a real relief measure for Albertans. They're trying to create some criticism that simply won't stick. We're providing relief to Albertans today.

School Construction Capital Plan and Calgary

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, the UCP has ignored the growing need for new schools in our province, especially in Calgary. Just one new public school over three years is not nearly enough when kids are being bused out of their communities to overcrowded classrooms. It's the same story for students choosing Catholic education: just one new school over three years. It's not nearly enough for young and growing families in Calgary. What does the minister have to say to parents in Nolan Hill, Walden, Redstone, who all need new schools? What about the kids in west Calgary, who are waiting for a brand new Calgary Catholic high school?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education has risen.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the member opposite knows, we get approximately 400 requests every single year. They go through an auditor-approved process. It's a gated process, and all the requirements have to be met, and they rise to the list. We continue to build schools. We're spending over $2 billion over three years to build schools right across the province.

Ms Hoffman: Given that the no-help budget failed Calgary families and given that students, teachers, and all staff deserve safe and welcoming schools to go to every day and given that more than half of Calgary public schools are over 50 years old – many have asbestos in them, are poorly insulated, and need to be overhauled or replaced – and given that research shows that kids have better student achievement when they're in clean, safe buildings, will the minister tell Calgary public students, staff, and families why the UCP has failed to deliver for them?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. Our schools are safe. They are well maintained. We entrust that to school boards; 98 per cent of all the funding goes directly to school boards so that they can make sure that those spaces are great learning spaces. As I said earlier, the $2 billion investment includes $251 million over three years for 15 much-needed school projects right across this province. We're going to continue to build schools where they are needed, and we will continue to make sure that it's a priority.

Ms Hoffman: Given that Albertans can't trust this UCP government to put students first – the current government won't build the schools that families need, and they're keeping kids and teachers on the road instead of close to home in safe schools – and given that that's why our NDP government worked hard to catch up over the four years we had to address the neglect under Conservatives for many, many decades and given that the UCP government's no-help budget is funding less than a quarter of what we funded when we were in government, why does the UCP continue to destroy the trust of Calgary families?

An Hon. Member: Fearmongering.

Member LaGrange: True. Mr. Speaker, fear and smear: that's all they do. They're so focused on the politics. They don't focus on the kids. We continue to focus on the kids, on school boards, making sure that we address the needs. We have an Auditor-approved process that they go through. We're spending over $2 billion, 66 projects over three years where they only completed 60 over three years. You know, it's actually 60 over four years. Correction. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The Member for Calgary-Klein has the call.

Pipeline Development and Energy Industry Advocacy

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A couple of weeks ago a poll in the United States showed that the majority of Americans, 71 per cent to be precise, would favour President Biden giving an executive order to restart construction on the Keystone XL pipeline. To the Minister of Energy: can you tell the House about the steps being taken by our government to try and convince the U.S. lawmakers to change their minds and reissue the border crossing for Keystone XL?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The reality is that in the United States as well as the rest of the world it's a growing acknowledgement that the world is going to continue to use oil and gas. In fact, demand for oil and gas is going up at the same time supply is going down with the need to weed out Russian barrels. The question is: where is it going to come from? Is it going to come from us, from North America, or is it going to come from regimes like Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Russia? We believe it should come from us. That's why we're engaging with the United States. That's why we've launched an advocacy campaign. That's why we've . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for her efforts. Given that European countries also are shying away from Russian corrupt oil, it also makes a case for an Energy East pipeline. To the same minister: can you update the House on any efforts to challenge federal Legislatures that land-lock our ethical oil here?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The tragic thing is that the Energy East pipeline, if it had been built, would have been delivering 1 million barrels a day of Alberta oil to the east coast to serve markets in Europe and refineries in India, but it was killed by regulatory dysfunction in 2017. Alberta can be part of the solution to supply additional barrels across the world if we could get infrastructure built. That's why we are challenging bills C-69, C-48, and that's why we are going to continue to challenge the NDP-Liberal alliance's unconstitutional effort to . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that we want to see pipelines going east, west, north, and south and given that we know that when it comes to human rights and environmental standards for our energy, we are unmatched – federal government aside, our resources get attacked internationally. To the same minister: can you tell us about our government's recent efforts to remind the world why Alberta is a better source for our world's energy needs compared to, say, Venezuela, Saudi Arabia, or Russia, just to name a few?

The Speaker: The Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. There's no question that the world needs more energy, and that energy should come from places like Alberta. That's why we've launched an advocacy campaign across North American and U.S. markets to say, "Look north; look north for energy security," and to emphasize that not all oil is equal, that ours is produced at the highest environmental standard. That's why the MLAs on this side of the Legislature will continue to point out the insanity of the NDP-Liberal coalition production cap, which is actually a production cap even though it's charading as an emission cap.

Site Rehabilitation Program

Ms Sweet: In the latest report from the Auditor General on the site rehabilitation program a number of concerns were highlighted about the government's performance. The federal funding was meant to save jobs during the challenging times of COVID. While B.C. had allocated 97 per cent of their available funding as of October 2021, Alberta has less than 60 per cent spent by the end of 2021. To the Minister of Energy: how many Albertans in the oil service sector were unemployed and how many companies went bankrupt during COVID because the government failed to spend their federal support?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We're actually really pleased that the Auditor General reported that the government has successfully and is successfully implementing the SRP program and specifically highlighted that there was an effective process for awarding funding, accurate and timely reporting, monitoring to evaluate performance, and that it was meeting all responsibilities under the federal-provincial agreement, including creating jobs.

Ms Sweet: Given that the oil and gas industry is facing challenges with the labour force and given that many workers left the industry because they could not find work during the pandemic – jobs in this program could have been created – and given that the minister's delays have prevented well cleanups, job creation, and job security for the oil and gas industry, can the minister explain how many projects were delayed or are not going forward because of the government's failure to move forward on this program?

The Speaker: The Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can actually report some really good statistics on the SRP program. In fact, over $750 million has gone out the door to date, and in fact 3,500 jobs have been created. Over 9,000 reclamation sites have been under work, 18,340 abandonment sites. This program is putting Albertans back to work. It's providing much-needed jobs in the service sector during a downturn. It's very successful.

Ms Sweet: Well, given that the report also highlighted that Alberta is at risk of losing this federal money and given that the grant has been allocated to be used by the end of the month for Alberta to be guaranteed to leverage all of the money provided by the federal government and given that it'll be a huge disappointment for industry, for landowners, for Indigenous people, and for all Albertans if the government loses this federal money when it's supposed to be creating jobs in Alberta, can the minister guarantee that all the money that's been issued to the government through these grants will be spent by the end of the month and we won't lose it back to the federal government?

Mrs. Savage: Mr. Speaker, the NDP is now so concerned about creating jobs and so concerned about cleaning up inactive wells. Why didn't they do anything during the four years that they were in power? The inventory of inactive wells skyrocketed during those four years, and they did nothing. Zero. Nada. They did nothing. They didn't bring in a liability management regime. Instead, they saw the inventory of inactive wells growing. That's why we're putting that money to work to clean it up, and we're very proud of the work that's being done by our Indigenous advisory council and the industry advisory council to get people back to work.

Addiction, Mental Health, and Social Supports

Ms Sigurdson: A recent study by the Canadian Mental Health Association has shown that Albertans are feeling more stress and financial uncertainty than people in any other province. More than a third of Albertans have stated that they are feeling stressed, angry, lonely, isolated, and sad. This pandemic has shone a light on the major limitations and failures of the mental health system here in Alberta, and the UCP has made things worse by limiting access to services and supports. To the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions: how will he correct this failure and improve Albertans' mental health?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, thank you very much, and thank you to the member for the question. You know, Budget 2022 actually continues a commitment to invest over $140 million over four years to enhance the recovery-oriented system of care that we are creating. I think it's important for everyone to understand that recovery can be substituted for "human," or it could be substituted for the words "wellness" or "holistic." This is a complicated problem with no single solution, but we're committed to funding the system and ensuring that everyone has access to health care.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that root causes of these struggles can include a lack of access to affordable housing, addiction services, and community supports and given that Albertans were more likely to use substances as a way of coping with pandemic stresses, with 20 per cent saying that they increased substance use during the pandemic compared to 13 per cent nationally, and given that the UCP ignored medically proven best practices, made it harder to access addiction services, affordable housing, and community supports, will the minister accept responsibility for all of the additional hardships and pressures the UCP has imposed on . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, what we will accept is being the first jurisdiction in North America to create a recovery-oriented system of care. This is taking actual action. If the members opposite had their way, they would be giving drugs to pretty much anybody who wants them, taxpayer-funded drugs. The policies that the NDP want have failed all throughout the west coast, and when that member had the opportunity, guess what she did?

Mr. Feehan: You are so antiscience it's embarrassing.

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

Mr. Ellis: She quit.

Ms Gray: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at both 2:26 and 2:27 or thereabouts.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that the survey found that 42 per cent of Albertans have mental health struggles related to financial concerns and given that 54 per cent of survey respondents said that they could not afford to pay for mental health treatment and given that we have presented the government with a plan to provide every Albertan with access to five sessions with a mental health professional, to be covered under the provincial insurance plan, will the minister take this survey as a wake-up call and immediately implement the NDP's plan to ensure that every Albertan has access to a mental health professional when they need one?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, we are committed to our recovery-oriented system of care, which is focused on people with mental health and addiction problems. We have made unprecedented investments over the last several years: $53 million in the COVID response, $20 million additionally in this most current budget. We've created accessibility through 211, amongst many other services. There are well over 200 not-for-profits within Alberta that we're supporting. We're continuing to help people.

Driving Back to Work Program

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, truckers play a critical role in keeping our economy rolling. In 2019 the government brought in mandatory entry-level training for all class 1 drivers. This has made the cost of truck-driving training increase substantially, causing shortages of class 1 truck drivers. Our government recently announced funding for the driving back to work program. Can the Minister of Transportation please advise this House how this new funding will address the need for class 1 truck drivers in Alberta?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, transportation is a critical sector, and there is an impending shortage of 4,000 drivers by 2023. That's why our Minister of Transportation is directing $30 million over the next three years to get women and men affordable training required to allow them to earn a living while keeping our supply chains moving. This support will cover the cost of 90 per cent of the training under the driving back to work program.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for his response. Given that class 1 truck drivers provide an essential service, ensuring that goods are able to move from place to place, and given that a shortage of class 1 truck drivers can have a negative impact on product availability in stores and given that the recently announced driving back to work funding will assist eligible class 1 truck drivers with the cost of their training, can the Minister of Transportation advise this House on what the eligibility criteria are for this funding?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House we are laser focused on economic recovery. We know that supporting truck driver training is critical, so to qualify for our driving back to work, Albertans must be at least 18 years old and underemployed or unemployed and ready, willing, and able to partake in training. We want Albertans employed in the commercial trucking industry, and already 8,000 Albertans have received funding to complete their training and testing to become class 1 drivers.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, given that many farmers either need to obtain a class 1 driver's licence themselves or need employees to get this licence to drive their products to market and given that some farmers have paid the exorbitant costs for their employees to get their class 1 only to see these employees leave shortly after as long-haul trucking companies offer them $15,000 signing bonuses, to the Minister of Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development: how will the recently announced funding for a class 1 driver's licence help farmers?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is great news for farmers, for the agriculture sector. This is going to mean more drivers in Alberta broadly, which will help the sector, more young people getting qualified to be behind the wheel of trucks. It's an essential service in Alberta. It'll help, with less poaching from the commercial truck-driving sector taking these young people that we need to take grain to markets. This has been an extreme challenge for the agriculture sector and one we'll continue to work towards.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

COVID-19 Testing

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The COVID-19 pandemic has been the hardest on at-risk Albertans. While our pandemic response is shifting as Albertans adapt to a new reality, there are certain measures that should remain so we can fully understand the current context of COVID-19 and ensure that Albertans are protected. One of those measures is PCR testing.

With the closure of the Edmonton Expo Centre and, I suspect, some other sites to come, we will have less understanding of the current context and transmission of COVID-19. Why is the Minister of Health moving to make PCR testing less accessible to Albertans?

Mr. Copping: I want to thank the hon. member for the important question in regard to PCR testing. Mr. Speaker, I was asked by the media last week on this exact issue. We closed the Expo Centre because, quite frankly, it wasn't needed, but we actually have additional sites here in Alberta to continue with PCR testing. We will continue PCR testing for high-risk individuals and people working in high-risk settings. It's important that we actually continue this to understand what potentially may happen with the next wave of COVID. As the hon. member knows, we haven't moved to stage 3 yet, and we're continuing measures for high-risk settings as well.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton–City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, given that omicron BA.2 is now spreading in Alberta – the chief medical officer of health has admitted that it's expected to trend upwards in coming weeks, so reliable PCR tests will be crucial to maintain accurate infection monitoring – and given that at-home tests are not as accurate as PCR tests, especially with new variants, it's important to have capacity to do reliable testing. Given that this UCP government has often acted too fast to declare victory over the pandemic, giving reason to question why some of these practical processes like reliable testing are being eliminated, especially with hospitals over capacity, can the minister clarify how many sites will remain open?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, just to be clear, we are not eliminating PCR testing. That will be maintained for high-risk settings and for high-risk individuals. When we moved our focus of PCR testing during the fifth wave with omicron BA.1, this was a move not only that was undertaken by Alberta but was taken by every single jurisdiction across the country, because that was necessary. What we know about BA.2 now is that it is potentially more virulent. It can be passed on easier than BA.1, but we understand that it may very well be less severe, and we are watching the numbers closely.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, given that multiple jurisdictions offer more accessible testing, including walk-in and drive-through sites, and given that some are raising concerns about increasing levels of COVID in waste water in communities in Alberta and given that many Albertans are still looking for more support, reliable tests to ensure they're protecting their friends, their families, their communities from a disease that's still, tragically, infecting people and taking lives and given that many are worried that rapid tests don't necessarily provide the certainty and accuracy needed, will the Minister of Health guarantee that PCR testing will remain available for all Albertans that need it to protect themselves?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as I already indicated to the hon. member, we will retain PCR testing for high-risk settings and for high-risk individuals. I'm very pleased that, you know, rapid tests remain available to all Albertans to be able to pick them up. I urge Albertans to continue to pick up the rapid tests and use them because they are very effective for those with symptoms in terms of determining whether or not they have COVID. We are using the same approach that we used successfully through the omicron wave 5, and we'll continue to monitor things closely.

Provincial Campground Cancellation Fees

Mr. Schmidt: Tomorrow this government will double the reservation fees for Alberta campsites. It's part of this government's ongoing mission to make it more expensive for Albertans to access natural places, with their tax on access in Kananaskis, their failed plan to sell Alberta parks, and their plan to tear down the Rocky Mountains and strip-mine them for coal. Can the Minister of Environment and Parks explain his objection to Albertans camping or enjoying the beautiful areas of this province? Will he use this opportunity today to pause his doubling of campsite fees?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, the NDP sure do love to make things up, but in regard to the doubling of the reservation fee, that is correct. That has been done at the request of campers who utilize the system. We were seeing campgrounds being reserved and then people not using them and, unfortunately, families going into our campgrounds and seeing the best spots stay empty all weekend. Then we had lots of campgrounds being scalped on Kijiji. We heard loud and clear from people that use our parks system that they wanted to see the reservation fee modestly increased to make sure we could stop that behaviour.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that this government has already created an affordability crisis in this province and refused any real relief for Albertans and given that just as Albertans are looking to plan their summer vacations, this minister is stepping in with a hike to fees that means that families who are struggling to make ends meet might not be able to afford to access the natural spaces that belong to them, how can this minister justify this latest cost hike to families already struggling under the weight of this government's out-of-touch decisions? Is he trying to make this the worst summer ever for Albertans?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I should provide some clarification. The hon. member is confused. I did say that it was the reservation fee, but it's actually the cancellation fee. What the parks system has done, at the request of the people that use the parks system, is increase the cancellation fee to make sure, again, that families who come and enjoy our beautiful parks all across this province don't end up spending the weekend watching the sites that they wanted to reserve stay empty the entire weekend because people never followed through on their commitments to reserve those campsites.

We continue to invest heavily inside our provincial parks system, Mr. Speaker; in fact, increased provincial park funding by 15 per cent this year.

Mr. Schmidt: The minister better check those numbers because he's not anywhere close to a 15 per cent increase to park funding.

Given that the UCP is deeply focused on ensuring that natural spaces remain inaccessible to the Albertans who own them and given that the Minister of Environment and Parks is deeply untrusting by Albertans following the debacle of the UCP's plan to sell Alberta's parks, mine our mountains, and tax the great outdoors, will the minister pause his fee hike, or will he just admit that Albertans simply can't trust him?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had bothered to stick around estimates instead of leaving only 45 minutes into it, he would have been able to find out that, in fact, we have increased park investments by 15 per cent.

No, I'm not going to reverse the cancellation fee because, Mr. Speaker, the vast majority of users of the system have asked us to do this simple measure to make sure that Albertans can enjoy their campgrounds each and every weekend and throughout the summer and the important, busy times of the year. They can rest assured that, no, we won't listen to the confused NDP; instead, we'll listen to user groups inside our provincial parks.

Education Concerns

Mr. Turton: Mr. Speaker, education is the number one thing we can do as a government to help future generations be successful. To accomplish this, we need to invest significant capital on upgrades for schools that need renovations. One of the projects that needs attention is the Spruce Grove composite high school. It's the largest school in Parkland region, and in order to support the demand in my riding, it needs significant upgrades, which are long overdue. To the Minister of Education: where does this project fall on the government's priority list?

Member LaGrange: Thank you to the member for the question. Each year school divisions submit their three-year capital plans, and each year we receive approximately 400 capital requests. As was done under Budget 2022, school capital submissions will be carefully reviewed through the Auditor General approved gated process, and priority projects will be selected based on health and safety concerns, enrolment pressures, building conditions, functionality in programming, and legal requirements. I look forward to seeing the school's capital plan being submitted in the near future.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for her answer. Given that many families in Alberta have children with special needs who require support and given that this government announced more than $700 million for children over the next three years and given that special-needs programs like PUF require school authorities to step in on families' behalf to assist with special needs in schools, to the same minister: what supports are currently available for families with special-needs children, and what new supports are coming in as a part of this budget? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government believes that all children in our province deserve an education that prepares them for success. That's why Budget 2022 includes $1.4 billion for learning support funding to support our most vulnerable students and includes grants like the specialized learning support grant. This funding will allow school authorities to provide a range of supports and services for students in an inclusive learning environment. I was a rehab practitioner, and it's very important for me that our most vulnerable are our most looked after.

Thank you. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that teachers play a critical role in developing and growing our children and given that many have felt the burden and challenges of teaching both in person and online during the last two years and given some reports stating that there are fewer teachers today than before the pandemic began and given that school boards feel like they need more help to be able to teach our kids to the best of their ability, can the Minister of Education please share with Albertans what this government is doing to increase the number of teachers to support the need expressed by schools and parents?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are providing $342 million over the next three years to help school authorities address cost pressures such as staffing, inflation, increasing insurance, and enrolment growth. Additionally, school board reserves are continuing to increase to $464 million in operating reserves as of last August. We are providing a 1 per cent increase to base and operations and 1 per cent to maintenance as well, and we are also providing a 4.6 per cent increase to transportation, these increasing costs to retain teachers and support staff and for maintaining clean, healthy schools. We're making sure they are well supported.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period.

Prior to rising, if I could beg the indulgence of the Assembly just for one brief moment.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: I mentioned earlier, during introductions, that the school from the community of Worsley would be joining us. They now have. I hope that you'll join me in welcoming them to the Assembly.

Hon. members, in 30 seconds or less we will continue to the remainder of the Routine.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to give oral notice of Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022, sponsored by the hon. the Minister of Education.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Bill 13

Financial Innovation Act

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act.

This bill creates a regulatory sandbox for financial services and fintech companies. If passed, the measures enabled in Bill 13 will ensure that Alberta remains a growing destination of choice for financial services and financial technology companies and that Albertans benefit from innovative products and services for years to come.

Mr. Speaker, with that, I move first reading of Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act.

[Motion carried; Bill 13 read a first time]

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Bill 14
Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training)
Amendment Act, 2022

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce Bill 14, the Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022.

It's so important that we provide a safe environment for victims and their families within our courtrooms. Bill 14 will require the Provincial Court judge applicants to complete sexual assault law and social contact issues education before they are eligible to be appointed. It aims to reduce the risk of victims of sexual violence from being revictimized during a trial and helps ensure that all people who come into the courtroom are treated respectfully and fairly. I look forward to discussing the proposed amendment to the Provincial Court Act. With that, I move first reading of Bill 14, Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022.

[Motion carried; Bill 14 read a first time]

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Highwood, do you have a bill introduction, or are we moving it to tomorrow?

Mr. Sigurdson: No.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Are there tablings? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has a tabling.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise with the requisite number of copies of a piece that was highlighted today in the Calgary Herald around: Limited Funds for New Schools Force CBE to Refocus on Modernizations. That's an interesting characterization. Nonetheless, the story goes on to highlight the desperate need for schools in Calgary.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the Clerk. On behalf of hon. Mr. Toews, President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance, pursuant to the Members of the Legislative Assembly Pension Plan Act the Members of the Legislative Assembly pension plan annual report for the year ended March 31, 2021; pursuant to the provincial judges and masters in chambers registered and unregistered pension plans regulation the provincial judges and masters in chambers registered and unregistered pension plans annual report 2019-20.

The Speaker: Hon. members, at approximately 2:26 the hon. the Deputy Government House Leader rose on a point of order, and that was followed by the Opposition House Leader.

The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Point of Order
Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise today on this point of order. I rise on 23(h), (i), and (j). At the time that the point of order was called, the hon. Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions was speaking and answering a question, and while he was answering that question, the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford very clearly said, "You are so antiscience it's embarrassing." Now, this is language certain to cause disorder in this Chamber, and referring specifically to an individual member in this Chamber is unparliamentary given the context. What I also find ironic about this is that it is coming from a member of a caucus that, when asked to provide evidence on such a matter to support their policy decisions, just quit committee. I would say that this is, in fact, a point of order, and I ask the member to apologize.

The Speaker: The Opposition House Leader.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I believe that this would be a matter of debate if the member had said that the UCP are antiscience and that it's embarrassing given that we've seen a rejection of harm reduction and safe consumption sites that goes against current science, expert advice, and medically proven best practices. That being said, the difference between "you" and the "UCP" is a very small one, and I did not hear the comment myself, so I could not say for sure what the member said. It may be a matter of debate, and I look forward to your ruling.

The Speaker: Are there others?

I am prepared to rule. I am often reluctant to rule on comments made off the record as sometimes it is difficult to hear those. However, I do believe that I heard the hon. member say, "You are so antiscience it's embarrassing," and that is also what the Blues did pick up. I would find this a point of order and not a matter of debate. As such, the hon. member can apologize and withdraw.

2:50

Ms Gray: On behalf of that member I'm happy to apologize and withdraw.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: I consider this matter dealt with and concluded.

At 2:27 the Opposition House Leader rose on a point of order.

Point of Order
Language Creating Disorder

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. During the same interchange between the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford and the minister, on the record I do believe – and I don't have the benefit of the Blues – the minister said, "If the members opposite had their way, they would be giving drugs to pretty much anybody who wants them, taxpayer-funded drugs." Under 23(h), (i), and (j) and specifically House of Commons Procedure and Practice, page 623, I rise on a point of order not because the minister specified a specific member but because I believe that that comment crossed the boundary of what is parliamentary, particularly because he was accusing the Official Opposition of wanting to traffic in controlled substances, accusing us of wanting to commit a criminal offence. While it was not directed at a specific member, I believe that that was an unparliamentary thing to hurl at the Official Opposition while we are talking about such serious matters as the mental health supports for Albertans during a pandemic.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Mr. Speaker, thank you. I do not find that this would be a point of order but, rather, a matter of debate, primarily because that is a general policy of the members opposite, to give drugs. This has been a subject of conversation many times in this Chamber, specifically about safe supply. I don't believe it is a point of order, and in fact when the hon. Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions was making this comment, there were some head nods that appeared to be coming from members opposite. I don't know necessarily where individual members stand on this issue, but as a caucus I do believe that there is a case to be made that they would support legalizing and giving government-funded narcotics to members of the public.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing none, I am prepared to rule. I think that this point of order is proof positive that this is an ongoing matter of debate that has a wide variety of opinions at this time. I would suggest that the hon. associate minister's comments were a point of order and not a matter of debate although many people may adamantly disagree with the position that he holds.

If I could offer a small tip to my good friend, colleague, and hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika: when arguing points of order, very regularly you will find more success if you throw less heat during that, in the extension of that debate. But in this case you are correct. This is a matter of debate and not a point of order. I consider the matter dealt with and concluded.

Third Reading

Bill 5

Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: I see the hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs has risen.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am thrilled today to rise on behalf of Alberta's amazing Minister of Transportation to move third reading of Bill 5, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

This bill will allow the government to improve safety on our roads for roadside workers. I'm very pleased and reassured to hear many members in here express strong support for this very important legislation. This bill is intended to provide improved safety on our roads and highways for roadside workers and enhance existing safety rules for our valuable first responders. We live in a province that can see extremes in weather and highway conditions at any time throughout the year. Everyone has stories about driving through storms and blizzards and the dangerous situations that can arise.

Just think about how hazardous it is to work in these conditions as a snowplow operator or a highway maintenance worker keeping our roads safe and clear. Every year there are dozens of collisions and near misses with snowplows on our roads and highways. Between March 2018 and March 2021 there were 128 collisions involving snowplows contracted by just Alberta Transportation. The Alberta Motor Association reported that since December 2019 there have been 36 near misses and at least 13 serious roadside incidents involving Alberta tow trucks and passing vehicles, collisions resulting in injury, hospitalization, and, yes, death.

Bill 5 seeks to reduce the collisions and risk of injury and death these workers are up against each day on the job. Last year we consulted with Albertans and our stakeholders on safety for roadside workers. Alberta's traffic safety advocacy organizations and those who work in highway maintenance wholeheartedly agree that more needs to be done to protect roadside workers and make our highways safer. About 15,000 Albertans responded to an online survey from March 16 to April 6, 2021. Respondents were very supportive of extending existing protections to snowplow operators and other roadside workers.

Michelle Chimko, president and CEO of the Alberta Motor Association, strongly endorses the changes Bill 5 will provide. A quote from Michelle:

We applaud these changes as an important first step in improving the safety of these essential workers and look forward to our continued work in further improving their visibility and safety.

Ron Glen from the Alberta Roadbuilders & Heavy Construction Association also advocates for stronger safety measures in Bill 5. He says:

Alberta's road construction and maintenance industry puts worker safety first. This legislation is greatly appreciated because we need drivers to slow down and do their part to make their highways – our worksites – safe and efficient for all.

I've also heard consistent support from municipalities for this bill, Mr. Speaker. The highway maintenance industry also stands behind this bill because it will protect their workers and it aligns with their corporate commitment to safety and excellent client service.

From Ledcor Group, one of Alberta Transportation's seven highway maintenance contractors, they are happy about the changes in Bill 5. Ledcor employees are working on our highways and roads every day, and they need the protection that Bill 5 will provide to do their jobs safely and effectively and, of course, get home to their families safely every single day.

Albertans will learn more about the speed limit requirements in the months ahead if Bill 5 passes. We are planning an extensive education campaign that will run during the summer, fall, and winter months until the proposed changes come into force next year. We'll take the time that's required to educate and prepare the public for changes under Bill 5 and help them to adapt their driving habits.

We will work closely with industry partners like Ledcor as well as safety advocacy organizations and law enforcement agencies to inform Albertans about Bill 5 changes. Albertans will also see highway signs throughout the province that reflect the speed limit changes under Bill 5. These new signs will clearly communicate what the changes are so that drivers can obey the new rules.

Bill 5 will improve safety for first responders and many other roadside workers who currently have no legislated protection. I thank all colleagues in this House for engaging in debate on this bill, and I ask all members of the Assembly to vote in favour of this important piece of legislation, which will keep Alberta workers safe when they are on the side of our roads and highways.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has risen.

Mr. Dach: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I see no reason to engage in any opposition to this piece of legislation because, of course, it's something that is a very common-sense addition to the Traffic Safety Act, to give protection to roadside workers, snowplow operators, who know because of the near misses that have occurred over the past number of years how dangerous it can be to be parked along the roadway in your vehicle or perhaps even outside of your vehicle while performing work on the roadway. So I certainly welcome this piece of legislation. We support keeping workers safe.

There are an ongoing number of reforms that could have been done on top of what this Bill 5 actually does that we wonder about, Mr. Speaker. For a number of reasons unknown to me, the minister has kind of stopped short and made this amendment a very singular one, perhaps in reaction to lobbying and certainly forthright and worthwhile efforts at lobbying from members of the public who are involved in keeping our roadways maintained. But there was an opportunity when opening up the act, Mr. Speaker, that I think was forgone, to take a wider view and to bring in some other measures that perhaps are equally as pressing as the matter of keeping our roadside workers safe during their work on the highways.

I think we know, Mr. Speaker, that there were a number of concerns raised during the Coutts blockade. The minister was called upon by myself to exercise authority under the act to revoke the operating licences of people engaged in that illegal activity. It was a good idea and one that we believed was feasible. However, at estimates the minister said that they did a legal analysis, and she believed she needed more authority under the act to actually be able to revoke the operating licences of illegally parked vehicles on the roadway involved in a blockade such as the one we experienced at Coutts and that the act needed to be amended in order to grant such powers to her.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the act is open, and no changes were made in this regard. We're wondering about that. It was a perfect opportunity, given recent circumstances, to allow the minister to in fact do something that the public wondered why she didn't do during the Coutts blockade, and that was to create some difficulty for those involved in the blockade to actually continue to operate a commercial motor vehicle as a result of their actions in blocking the roadway. While I think members of the public think this is a pretty good idea and thought that the minister was acting in a rather toothless fashion, if indeed the minister felt it was necessary to bring forward legislative change to empower the minister to actually revoke the operating licences of folks engaged in the illegal Coutts blockade and similar blockades that might occur in the future, then the perfect opportunity was now for the amendments to be made to the act to give the minister those powers, but nothing like that is happening.

It appears that the government is more worried about alienating members of their caucus that supported the illegal blockaders than actually ensuring the safety of the roadways and keeping the borders and supply chains open. It was a missed opportunity, Mr. Speaker, and we do encourage the minister to consider bringing forward additional amendments to this act to address the situation the minister herself thought needed legislative amendments.

There are also other elements to this act that could have been expanded to involve more than it actually does. It involves, of course, vehicles parked on a roadway: highway maintenance vehicles, snowplows. Certainly, there have been an abominable number of crashes into snowplows and highway maintenance vehicles. Anybody that has had to stop on the side of the highway to repair their own tire if they've had a flat tire realizes just how dangerous it is to be on the highway. Mr. Speaker, I've certainly been involved on the side of the highway for thousands of miles, hitchhiking across this country. I've ridden a bicycle on highways, and I know that it's a dangerous place to be.

I certainly welcome the elements of this legislation that will make it safer on roadways for our public roadway workers. But while the act was open, I thought – and I mentioned this to the minister also in estimates – why indeed we couldn't see some changes to the legislation that would involve other facets of situations where traffic is being impeded or there's a slow-moving or stopped vehicle on the side of the road or on the shoulder.

I speak right now, Mr. Speaker, of vehicles which are required by law in Alberta to display a slow-moving vehicle decal, a triangle, that we see on the backs of many vehicles, whether they be commercial or farm vehicles, and I'm wondering if indeed, while the act was open, we could not have addressed that situation, to keep those farmworkers safe, those commercial vehicle drivers safe, who are driving either roadway construction equipment or farm vehicles or other vehicles that are required to display the triangular slow-moving vehicle placard in Alberta, if indeed similar types of slow-down-and-move-over requirements could have been imposed upon drivers who were passing such slow-moving vehicles.

On top of that, I think another measure that might have been wise to bring forward in this legislation, that perhaps the minister might consider doing as an amendment, would be to take a look at the oversized vehicles that are on our roadways. Numerous corridors exist, Mr. Speaker, for the safe movement of large, slow-moving, oversized vehicles, sometimes with pilot vehicles, certainly, to increase the safety of those movements, but not always. You can have a large, slow-moving vehicle that may not be piloted. But even if it is, I think there should be very clear rules that should be enshrined in the legislation in the same way that the slow-down-and-move-over legislation is enshrining that drivers must slow down and move over to pass stopped roadway maintenance vehicles on the shoulder.

If you're passing a large vessel that's being pulled by semitrailers on a roadway, as you quite often will when you're travelling up to some places in the oil patch or up to Fort McMurray, it's a dangerous situation. It's, I think, incumbent upon drivers to slow down and move over, but the law doesn't prescribe that. There are no prescribed penalties when passing the slow-moving vehicles or the large vessels, oversized vehicles on Alberta's highways or the slow-moving vehicles that display the placard.

There are a number of instances, Mr. Speaker, where I believe the act, now that it is open, could have had its scope widened. There were a number of other situations where indeed highways are impeded by either slow-moving or stopped vehicles. This act could have described further situations that mandated drivers to slow down and move over and also included penalty provisions for those that failed to do so.

The substance of the act, of course, we don't have any difficulties with. I think it's pretty clear to Albertans who have loved ones who are employed on roadside maintenance crews or who themselves have actually had to fix their own vehicle while on the side of the highway – it's very noticeable how dangerous it really is. I know for certain. A friend of mine, that I worked with, had to pull over on highway 2 to the shoulder because of car failure, and the car was rear-ended by another vehicle that came forward from behind. It was written off. They, luckily, weren't killed. It's a dangerous place to be, the side of our roadways.

The Alberta Motor Association, of course, notes that there have been 36 near misses and 13 serious accidents involving tow trucks in Alberta. I'm just wondering if indeed the government has any analysis or assessment on how many serious accidents are likely to be prevented by the implementation of the changes that are contemplated by Bill 5.

I know that it may seem like it's common sense, Mr. Speaker, to slow down and move over if there's a vehicle parked on the side of the road. I know also that before indeed legislation was changed, it was a common sight to see people not doing so and putting at risk the lives of first responders, who were first covered under a former change to the act. Now roadside maintenance workers are also being given the protection of this legislation.

I think there should have been a wider scope and more thought given to who could have been included, what range of vehicles or slow-moving vehicles could have been included in this act. There's still time potentially to do so, Mr. Speaker, if the minister is willing to consider amendments that might be undertaken while the act is open right now and give further protection and perhaps save even further lives of Albertans who are using our roadways who must find it necessary to either stop along the roadway or to move slowly along the roadway and not necessarily a major highway.

We know that a fairly significant amount of agricultural equipment is moved on our secondary and even our gravel roads or county roadways. There are some pretty dangerous manoeuvres taken to pass tractors pulling pieces of equipment on smaller roadways as well, which, I think, bears some scrutiny and perhaps even legislation. For example, Mr. Speaker, it may be wise to make it incumbent upon those who are moving a load that is three-quarters blocking the roadway that they must actually stop and pull over themselves to allow traffic to move around them. There are elements that this legislation could've focused attention on to this slow-down-and-move-over concept that weren't added into the legislation, and I think that they should have been. I say that it's a missed opportunity if indeed the minister doesn't consider adding some amendments. Perhaps it's something that she'll see as an opportunity before the bill actually reaches the final reading in the House.

Other jurisdictions have all passed legislation requiring drivers to slow down and move over for emergency vehicles. Now, maintenance vehicles, of course, are not emergency vehicles – they're more the amber-light-displaying vehicles – but equally they are required to be on the side of the road for their working purposes, and they are significantly at risk because of the location next to high-speed traffic. It will be noted, of course, that the snowplows – they're, obviously, in motion for a lot of their time frame, and the slow-down-and-move-over requirement means that they have to slow down and move over while the snowplow is moving and performing its operations. That's why I thought it might even be wise, given that it already applies to moving snowplows, to include other slow-moving vehicles such as those that are required to display the triangular orange and red slow-moving vehicle placard that we see on vehicles in Alberta. It's something that construction vehicles and farm vehicles and commercial vehicles of various types are required to display.

It's not seen as a necessity, let's say, by many drivers to actually slow down and then pull over when they see a vehicle that is slow moving. We've all witnessed, I'm sure, Mr. Speaker, that many drivers will see it as an opportunity to gauge the distance of oncoming traffic and perhaps to speed up and pull over and pass the slow-moving vehicle unsafely in that manner rather than to slow down and move over. It should be something that is mandated in the same way that the Bill 5 before us mandates drivers to slow down and move over for highway maintenance vehicles, including snowplows and dump trucks or what have you, that might be on the roadway.

Now, I'm sure this legislation will benefit the operators of snowplows and construction equipment or maintenance equipment, and it's something that family members will welcome as well. The fines are significant, and they should be significant, Mr. Speaker, because it's an irresponsible act to go blasting by a snowplow or a piece of roadway maintenance equipment or a first responder, for that matter, who is doing their job at the side of the road. Of course, the rate of speed – the faster you go, the more that your ticket is going to be, and that's as it should be.

I hope the public education campaign that the government puts together does include multimedia platforms as well as, of course, radio and television spots, radio being one that sometimes is forgotten. Some of our rural media as well is sometimes forgotten when the government is trying to advertise new changes. But I think in this case, given that one of the places that we listen to radio most often nowadays is in our vehicles, if indeed the rollout of the public education advertising on the matter before us in Bill 5 doesn't include radio advertising, it would be a missed opportunity.

Now, I don't think we need to be reminded, but it is a sad fact that between March 2018 and March 2021 there were 128 collisions involving snowplows. Now, that's a three-year period – that's only 36 months – and we had 128 collisions involving snowplows. That's a horrendous statistic. Many Albertans will be surprised to learn how frequently snowplows are hit by vehicles on our roadways, and that's a high degree of irresponsibility. Even in the worst of conditions, if you're moving slowly enough, snowplows are visible to drivers who are going slowly enough to move around and avoid colliding with them. It speaks to the wisdom of bringing forward this legislation to protect those operators and to raise awareness in the community amongst drivers that it is totally irresponsible and totally unacceptable to be rolling by at full highway speed when you're passing a roadway maintenance vehicle or you're passing a snowplow.

I think there are other classes of vehicle operators that deserve the same respect and should have had it accorded through their inclusion in this piece of legislation. Unfortunately, they haven't been. I know that for each element that you want to include in a piece of legislation, if you want to include another class of vehicles, it certainly takes a whole lot more investigation and work and deliberation. I understand the minister may have been responding to advocacy from those who were working on the side of the roads, operating snowplows and highway maintenance vehicles. Be that as it may, it might have been appropriate, I think, to try to expedite consultation with other classes of vehicle operators to see if indeed, at the same time, this legislation could have included them as well. I think it would have been a good use of time and probably would have been able to be done within the same opening of the act as right now.

With respect to the revoking of commercial licences of those who would use a commercial vehicle or a farm vehicle to block a roadway with the intent of getting greater awareness for their protest, this is something that I think the minister clearly should have done. We've got a huge, glaring example of the necessity for that type of a tool in the hands of our Transportation minister, and it could have solved what might have ended up in a violent confrontation using weapons by people involved in that blockade who were intent on using them to kill RCMP officers. Indeed, many Albertans were screaming, like, "Do something, for crying out loud, to get the vehicles off the roadway; stop this blockade," yet the minister was claiming: "No. I can't do that. The legislation doesn't allow it." Well, let's make it allow it. Let's amend it.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen to join debate.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to follow my colleague from Edmonton-McClung, who I think raised many good questions with regard to: while Bill 5 is before us, why are we just dealing with one aspect, an important aspect but just one aspect, when there are other issues that have come to the fore of late, notably commercial and farm vehicles being used to blockade; for instance, at the Coutts border crossing, which had a significant effect on the movement of goods down into the United States and the disruption of supply lines?

The opportunity, obviously, is here to consider that and to put some teeth in the Traffic Safety Act that would dissuade people from using their vehicles in that fashion, which was problematic for Albertans and also, obviously, people in other parts of the country. The Windsor bridge – I can't remember the name of that bridge, the bridge going between Windsor and Detroit.

3:20

Mr. McIver: The Ambassador Bridge.

Member Ceci: Ambassador Bridge. Thank you for the generous offering of help from a former city councillor, who didn't offer that much when we were city councillors together. But he may have a change of views, Mr. Speaker. He may have a change of heart with regard to my presentation here today.

Anyway, I want to recognize, of course, that my colleague from Edmonton-McClung was correct in pointing out that many see the opportunity of an open bill as a way to improve the situation for Albertans, and I would just underline that it's unfortunate that the minister hasn't considered this as a necessary action. In my estimation – I certainly hope I'm wrong – we may see more instances, going forward into the future, of people using critical infrastructure in that fashion and trying to make a point of protest. Certainly, they have the right to protest but not in a way that negatively impacts the lives and livelihoods of Albertans and addresses critical infrastructure in that way.

We do have a bill, I just want to point out – I believe it's called the Critical Infrastructure Defence Act, something like that – that was just passed here maybe last spring, Mr. Speaker, and which could have been used in this regard in Coutts, in Alberta's case. Perhaps other provinces, like Ontario, have similar things, and the Ambassador Bridge could have been opened sooner than it was. But subsequent to the federal government, as we all know, passing the Emergencies Act, I think it was called, that bridge was opened up expeditiously, quickly, because of the federal government stepping in.

Not so here in Coutts. That was delayed, in terms of any action, more than 18 days. A Traffic Safety Act that had protections in it, as we're suggesting, for Albertans and for trade could have dealt with that though we did have an act called the emergencies act, and the government failed to use that act – for whatever reason I don't know, Mr. Speaker, but they did – and it was problematic for all Albertans.

What we see before us is an amendment to the Traffic Safety Act which would require, obviously, drivers to slow down, where possible, when passing roadside workers, including snowplows and maintenance workers, when a vehicle is passing on the same side of the highway. If there is a two-lane highway and those vehicles are in the other lane and you're passing them, you have to slow down and move over when their lights are flashing and they are stopped on the highway. You know, it's a small thing for the driving public to do. I don't consider it onerous at all. We are seeing it happen with regard to emergency vehicles at this point in time, and this act would spread that out, so we're talking about snowplows and roadside workers as well.

Mr. Speaker, we've all seen those signs on the sides of highways, particularly around areas where the roads are under construction or being worked on. I think the contractors put them up. They say things like, you know: slow down because we want these workers to get back to their families at the end of their workday. No one can disagree with the importance of that happening. That's a form of education, obviously. Now, this amendment will put some greater teeth into the request of that sign because it'll be against the law, and fines can be levied against people who dangerously – I don't know if that would be the word – pass people working on the roadside or, in fact, cleaning snowplows and other kinds of things.

You know, when I was reading the bill – it's not very long – and thinking about it, I was thinking about other kinds of municipal and county workers that are out there who are just wanting to get home at the end of their shift. While I was a city councillor, there was yearly a memorial that would take place to memorialize workers who had died at the city of Calgary during that year. There are similar kinds of memorial events across this province, Mr. Speaker – I know that it's in the hundreds each year, not a couple of hundred but between 100 and 200 – for workers who, unfortunately, in this province die in their workplace as the result of an injury or an accident.

That's the kind of tragedy that can be ameliorated by doing more. It's not a lot to expect the travelling public to pass safely. If they can't pass safely, then they should learn through a stiff fine. That's obviously something, I think, that's built into this as well. I see that my colleague from Edmonton-McClung talked about that those fines for failing to slow down when passing snowplows or maintenance workers will now apply. That fine would be in a range from $136 to $826, and that variance is based on the speed of the offending vehicle.

Mr. Speaker, with regard to the municipal workers that, certainly, I'm aware of, they see many things on the roadways. It's not just plows, and it's not just tow truck operators or emergency vehicles on the sides of roads. It also includes, like, people who are maintaining roads, people who are painting lines, line crews on roads, crack-sealing crews. But in those cases, you know, there's a greater attention to slowing traffic down. There are often sign and signal people. There are often moving-over kinds of things so that they'll make only one lane available.

You can't pass those kinds of workers on roadways and not take a look at the equipment that they're using. Sometimes there are these huge vehicles that are set up to absorb crashes. You kind of wonder how often they're pressed into service as a result of people, in a distracted way, not knowing, you know, that there's a lot of danger with a pickup or a vehicle hurtling down the roadway at potentially 120 kilometres an hour and the impact. You get a sense of how they're trying to protect their lives by these crash-absorber kinds of vehicles they tow behind their other vehicles to kind of keep everybody safe.

While I have no concerns with this legislation – I think everybody here wants to keep workers as safe as possible wherever they are, whether they're working on the roadside or they're working anywhere – and I see no issues with the substance and the write-up of the aspects that are amending the existing Traffic Safety Act, I do think there was an opportunity to include other initiatives in this bill, and we've made that clear. I do think there is a great deal of support for what's in this bill. The Minister of Municipal Affairs talked about the survey and the consultation that was done and the agreement that Albertans had with that.

I do think that a public education campaign is a good way to start Albertans to recognize that there needs to be a change in their behaviour. The behaviour that they have towards tow trucks and emergency vehicles needs now to be extended when they see flashing lights, whether they're amber or blue or blue and red. That public education campaign will ultimately lead to a safer roadway for Albertans.

That's really how municipalities change things anyway. If they have a new bylaw that they want to bring in – we used to have our Mr. Bruce. We used to call him Bylaw Bill. He would urge us to ensure that we had a good lead of education. He would sit down and explain that to council. He would explain to the public, through any opportunity he had to be in the media: things are going to be different in the future; we're not going to change it right away, but please recognize that there will be a difference in the future. We always did things to improve the safety, protect the public.

That's what this is all about, you know, that families can know that their loved one will be home at the end of their shift instead of potentially injured or worse. I, too, was really astounded that so many snowplows have been hit – it must be quite a shock for the operators in those situations to be involved in collisions, and 128 of those collisions occurred – through Alberta Transportation advising the government and us being aware of that through the information that was published or made available in support of this amendment act.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has risen.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the chance this afternoon to provide some comments for the first time, of course, around Bill 5, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act. You know, as somebody who spent a considerable amount of time before being able to serve the constituents of Edmonton-Decore in this House – safety was certainly one of the topics top of mind for me, spending much of 20 years co-chairing my workplace health and safety committee, spending several years on my union's provincial health and safety committee, trying to find ways to help workers work safely, improve those conditions for members, not only in my own work site but across others that belong to UFCW 401 members. Certainly, when I see legislation that comes forward that increases safety for Albertans, Alberta workers, I'm always absolutely in favour of that.

I'm certainly not in favour when we start to reduce those things, like, of course, we saw earlier in this Legislature around, I think, reducing the effectiveness of workplace health and safety committees. You know, those kinds of things I'm not very excited about. I don't have any issues with promoting and voting in favour of Bill 5, but I think there were certainly some opportunities that we could have taken to, I guess, make things better.

Certainly, some of the members in this House: I have not spent probably as much time as they spend on the highways, you know, getting back to their constituencies. But I've certainly spent my share of time either travelling on the highways, pulling a 24-foot travel trailer behind my truck, and, shall we say, with some of the interesting situations that have cropped up on the highways, either observing or even being a part of those situations.

I guess maybe we could have taken the opportunity with this act being opened to address things. You know, I'll bring this up because it literally happened yesterday coming back from Calgary. On kind of a dark part of the road right around Bowden, what looked like a garbage bin or container of some kind off to the side of the road right near a small bridge and kind of really close to that – and, yes, there were some safety cones out there, but those cones were very dirty. They didn't have the reflective tapes around them, so until you're almost on top of it, you can't really see this sort of thing. Perhaps we could have looked at ways to promote a better, safe situation for drivers around that sort of thing. That's something that just occurred yesterday, so it's top of mind, obviously, for me.

I know one of the things that I heard quite a bit – and this, of course, goes all the way back to the 29th Legislature, when I served in there with a lot of folks – was the concerns from tow truck drivers and the challenges, very unsafe challenges, that they face when they're on the roads. You know, again, as early as yesterday seeing a situation on the road, not only do you have somebody trying to help a stranded driver with their vehicle, but it also requires another vehicle further down from that just to, I guess, try to provide some kind of visibility in terms of either slowing down, moving over. The funny thing, Mr. Speaker, is that even despite that, individuals who were in the lane right beside that still didn't move over, which kind of leads me into this point where they're going to commit to an educational program.

When I started my remarks here on some of the situations that I've come across on the roads, observed, been a part of – I think we're really going to have to take a very hard look at how we're educating because the reality is that we're still seeing situations where drivers are either not paying attention or they're just careless or whatnot. I mean, a simple act of a stalled vehicle on the side of the road stopped, whatever the reason is: if you're on the highway, it's really not a big deal to move over to the passing lane, giving that person a lot of space. We just don't know if they're going to open up their door and walk out. You know, some of our shoulders are not that large, and it doesn't accommodate for the entire vehicle to get as far away from the roadway as possible.

The education for these changes: I really think we need to up the game on that, especially with new drivers, you know, so that they understand the risks on the road. Is it something that we need to, for instance, start applying at the high school level, in grades 11 and 12, where we have new drivers that are going to be coming onto the road, to get them young and open-minded so that they learn these types of habits when they do get on the roads and they do get onto the highways?

It's unfortunate to say that I've been witness to and, you know, stopped for accidents involving new drivers, and unfortunately a lot of times it was due to carelessness. I think we could have had an opportunity with which to look at those things, address those types of training aspects for drivers just so that we can make our roads safer.

That kind of leads me to sort of the safety that some of my colleagues were talking about earlier around our unfortunate recent experience at the border crossing at Coutts. You know, I've seen a bit of an inconsistent approach to these sorts of things. I mean, I've seen responses to individuals who happen to block a roadway – they didn't even have vehicles; they had a couple of bicycles, and there was a very, very stern reaction to that – yet it was a little bit of a lackadaisical response with what, unfortunately, took place down in Coutts. With such a fresh experience in all of our minds, have we not lost an opportunity to learn and make something better for that? My colleague from Calgary-Buffalo had kind of started to touch on this.

I think back, again, on my days in the labour movement, and I've certainly visited, you know, many strike lines. I've been a part of strike lines with my duties through UFCW and even been on my own strike line for a week. The reality is that there is blocking of traffic that happens, whether it be into a business or possibly even a roadway. When I think about that, usually the result is – it's either through a labour board decision and/or even the courts, but it usually happens within about 24 hours. Thinking about my experience on my very own, of course, obviously, we're blocking traffic from getting into the Macdonalds Consolidated, Lucerne ice cream parking area and whatnot. The labour board quickly issued, saying that we could only hold up traffic for five minutes at a time, so for each successive car or truck we could only hold them for five minutes.

When I look at those situations, I can't help but wonder: did Alberta not have the ability to duplicate that kind of a process where they could have gone to the court system, simply got a decision saying that you can't shut down the entire border, that you can only slow things down? I'm speculating here at this point, you know, Mr. Speaker, but clearly the response that we had here was completely ineffective. Is there an opportunity through Bill 5 to be able to look at a situation like that and to be able to handle it differently going forward from here? Just a thought around that and how maybe we could have done something a little bit different.

I guess, as some of my colleagues had mentioned some shocking numbers that we've seen come out around incidents and near misses that have happened, I'd like to be able to maybe say that I was shocked, too, but frankly, actually, I'm not. Again, just my work in promoting health and safety and safe workplaces – these kinds of things are preventable. You know, going back to some of my earlier comments around tow truck drivers, did we have an opportunity? I know the industry has lobbied very significantly over the years about changing from the amber warning light to blue. We have seen some of these changes in other jurisdictions. Was that not, again, an opportunity that we could have taken advantage of to try to protect our tow truck operators along with the education piece about moving over, things like that, slowing down? Perhaps, even though we're in third, we might get an opportunity to hear from the minister around why some of those things maybe weren't addressed in this bill.

Perhaps maybe there are plans for another bill coming up that could address those types of things, which kind of led me a little bit to – I guess I don't really want to call it a concern – a question, maybe. Again, just diving into some of the language of Bill 5 on page 2, subsection (ii), “in subclause (v) by striking out ‘emergency vehicle or tow truck’ and substituting ‘vehicle,’” I guess I'm wondering: did that maybe get a little bit too broad? I know we're trying to encompass things like snowplows and whatnot, but do we now start to cloud – you know, are people going to say, “Well, what's a vehicle?” and things like that. I guess that was more just a thought that I had when I was looking at the legislation and wondering why we didn't choose instead maybe to be a little bit more prescriptive in terms of what we want to refer to or if by doing that, it kind of boxed us in a little bit in terms of trying to increase that safety level, be it for workers on the road or tow truck drivers, things like that.

Did we miss maybe an opportunity, like I said, when we have a vehicle that's broken down on the road? How do we potentially create a safer situation where perhaps we have an immobile vehicle? I made a reference to this kind of bin that I saw late last night coming back from Calgary. You know, I think about when somebody is hauling something of great length out the end of their vehicle. They're required to have a flag on that. It has to be very, very visible so that people can see it. Could we kind of take that sort of thinking where: if something has to be left on the road, does it need to be somehow very quickly identifiable so that you can see it and you can react to it on the road?

I've certainly seen many, many times where vehicles have struck others on the side of the road. I mean, probably everybody has seen those YouTube videos where an officer has pulled somebody over. They've still got all their safety lights on, you know, the orange lights trying to point everybody in the other direction, and you still have an accident. So what kinds of things have we learned from those, and did we have a chance in Bill 5 to maybe address some of those things? Again, as my friend from Calgary-Buffalo said, it's all about safety.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has risen.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 5, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act. I've been thinking, as I've sort of been reading through the bill, considering it, listening to members speak, about some of my own experience related to this field. I've held a lot of different jobs in my lifetime, and during the period when I was pursuing my degree in music performance at Grant MacEwan here in Edmonton and indeed during my dozen or so years working as a musician and studio engineer, I worked a lot of other jobs on the side to help pay the bills and help pay for that schooling. A number of those jobs were, in fact, in road maintenance and construction.

Just out of high school one of my first big summer jobs was working for the county of Strathcona. I got hired out there to work on one of their road crews, actually, a number of their road crews. That was in the summer of 1992, so way back when.

3:50

Member Irwin: Were you 10?

Mr. Shepherd: Nineteen ninety-two, indeed.

In that work I did a number of different things. I worked on a cold-mix truck. That's working with sort of cold asphalt mix, and that's just literally going out with the truck and a few shovels on the many rural roads around in Strathcona county and just patching holes in the road out there, just driving over them with the truck wheel to pack that down.

I also had the opportunity to work on some of the maintenance and construction crews. I got a chance to drive some big pieces of equipment. I got to drive a couple of the wheeled bulldozers. That was mainly in the yard, sort of filling trucks and that sort of thing, but occasionally moving them from site to site with some of the road jobs. Also, driving the large road packers: those are basically just great big giant water tanks with rubber wheels that you use to pack down the roads. I had one incident with one of those packers that scared me a bit, trying to get down and pack the edge of the road on a bit of a steep grade and actually having the side of the road collapse a bit. I ended up, luckily, being able to steer into it and ride that packer down into a farmer's fence without incident, but certainly my heart was in my throat. Admittedly, most of that work was out and off the main roads with that, so I didn't really run into too many incidents like we're talking about with this bill.

I did also follow that up then with a few summers where I worked for the city of Edmonton. That experience allowed me to get on with some of the crews here. Again, working for the city of Edmonton, I had the opportunity to work on a number of pothole crews. When you start out as the new guy on the pothole crew, you get to be the tar man, which means you carry around, literally, a bucket of steaming tar and a broom. You put on the face shield, and you go out and you put tar around the edge of the pothole before you put the asphalt in and pack it down to make sure it's going to stick.

I did also have the opportunity to work with some larger crews in some other situations. I did work with some crews that were doing paving and others, so sort of grinding out the road and then laying down new asphalt. That was in circumstances anywhere from working in back alleys to working on some side streets, all the way up to working on the Yellowhead Trail. I did have some incidents where I was working out beside traffic, at times moving at some higher velocities. Indeed, I had the opportunity on many occasions to do the much less exciting work of being a flagperson. That involved, many times, standing out on rural roads or sitting on rural roads waiting for traffic to come by to sort of let them know if they could go through or not or just simply that that rural road was closed. I certainly got some good reading done in those times.

Certainly, at times, you know, in the safety training we heard some of the horror stories as well about tragic circumstances where individuals who were doing that work, unfortunately, were seriously injured or lost their lives by drivers who were driving too fast. They failed to slow down, were not paying attention, and indeed, unfortunately, on occasion then would find themselves plowing through construction sites. So I can well appreciate the intent behind this bill and the reason for bringing it forward.

I also just reflect, Mr. Speaker, that I'm also well familiar with the dangers of high-speed traffic from my many years as a cycle commuter. For a long time that was my main way that I got around, and that was here in downtown Edmonton but certainly other parts of the city. That was at a time when we did not have any significant cycling infrastructure in the city, no protected or even painted bike lanes of any kind. I got quite adept at, as we called it, playing in traffic, riding as a cyclist in the midst of vehicles. Certainly, when you are out in that position and you are exposed, when you're having people pass within a few feet of you at high velocity, you come to appreciate just how dangerous a vehicle can be.

So, certainly, I understand and support the intent behind this act and indeed the act itself because I recognize the danger that folks that are out doing this important work, that are supporting the ability for all of us to be able to get around the province, to get around our cities, municipalities, different areas – I recognize the need to ensure those individuals are protected.

I know for myself, Mr. Speaker, even as someone who has, you know, been a cycle commuter, who has been on the side and felt the danger that there can be from a vehicle passing by, it can still be easy to lose that sense when you are behind the wheel of a vehicle yourself. It's part of the challenge of it, the psychology of driving and how that sort of removes us sometimes from the impact that we could potentially have.

You know, I think back to the times when I've been driving down highway 2 and I come in past Leduc and I come down the road and I hit Edmonton and it changes from 110 to 90 and then all the way down to 60, and all of a sudden 60 kilometres feels like I'm barely moving at all. But it could still do an incredible amount of damage to an individual. Certainly, when we have situations, then, where we are indeed asking people to reduce their speed, potentially in a highway district or area, you know, from 110 or – admit it. Let's be honest here; 120 is what most folks are doing on highway 2. I'm sure no one here would do that, Mr. Speaker. When we're asking them to slow from that to less than half of that or potentially even a third, that doesn't quite feel right as a driver. It feels very slow. But it is essential to ensure that we are providing protection for folks that are doing this crucial work.

This bill would require that drivers slow down wherever possible when they are passing roadside workers, whether that be snowplows – I think we've all encountered that, all of us as MLAs and some here more than myself, who have to make that regular trip up highway 2 in the midst of winter and the snowstorms. Certainly, we have run into the snowplows. We've been caught behind them, perhaps quietly cursed them at times as we've been in a hurry but recognize the incredibly important work they're doing, that they should have that respect when we are approaching and passing them on the road. Indeed, that would also apply, then, for roadside workers, maintenance workers when those vehicle lights are flashing and they are stopped on the side of the highway.

This basically just affords them the same protections that are given to first responders and tow truck operators. That just makes sense, Mr. Speaker, because they face exactly the same danger. When they are stopped and they are doing their important work by the side of a highway, they are every bit as much exposed as a tow truck operator or a first responder.

So I certainly support the plans, then, to raise the fines, to change the fines for failing to slow down when passing snowplows or maintenance workers, to range from $136 to $826, based on the individual's speed. I think that's appropriate as well, to vary. Certainly, the faster we go, the more danger we present.

I just got my own ticket the other day for driving a little bit over the speed limit on St. Albert Trail and duly went to the Alberta website yesterday and paid my fine of $116. I believe it is appropriate that we have a scaled penalty, particularly for individuals that choose to pass at a real excess of speed. Certainly, I think we've all encountered a few of those individuals as we've made our way along highway 2 as well.

Now, I understand that the government is saying that as part of this they will undertake a public education campaign to let folks know before enforcement would start in the spring of next year. I'd say that's also fair. It's good to give folks a good heads-up of what's coming down the pipe, the changes that are going to be made, so they have the opportunity to respond and change their behaviour. Of course, Mr. Speaker, we would hope that folks are already taking that precaution, already showing that respect to vehicles, but certainly if we are going to be increasing fines and potential penalties, we should be giving folks due notice.

Absolutely, Mr. Speaker, I will be voting in support of this legislation though I would echo some of the comments that have been made by some of my colleagues just noting that the Minister of Transportation did suggest that she was encumbered from taking steps during the recent illegal blockade at Coutts, that she was unable to take some actions. She did a legal analysis and said that she needed more authority under this very act.

Nothing could be fresher in mind. I think the billions that we lost to our provincial economy should certainly be at the forefront of all of us here as legislators and taking steps, I think, to prevent that kind of action in the future through an illegal blockade. Indeed, many members of this House have spoken at length about how they oppose such things, at least in some circumstances other than the Coutts situation. That does seem to be the general consensus.

Certainly, there would have been an opportunity here to make appropriate changes to this legislation to ensure that all such blockades would be able to be dealt with in, I think, a much more expeditious manner than we saw that this government was willing to take in this particular situation.

But that aside, Mr. Speaker, as I said, I certainly support the substance and the intent of what the minister is trying to do here, so I will be voting in favour of Bill 5. Thank you.

4:00

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate on Bill 5?

Seeing none, I am prepared to ask the question.

[Motion carried; Bill 5 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 10 Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate March 28: Member Loyola]

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to join debate on this? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has risen.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is, as always, an honour to rise in this House. Just let me get my glasses on so I can read. I haven't yet had the opportunity to speak to Bill 10, the Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022. I believe it's actually the first bill that's been fully sponsored by the status of women, so as the critic for status of women I'm quite happy to rise and to share my thoughts on this one.

I am going to preface my comments a little bit here, but I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I will get back to the content of the bill. I just want to frame my points a little bit. You know, I want to start by actually talking about how the comments that will likely happen today around this bill could be presented with a content warning or with a trigger warning. This is really timely, that I mention this, because – and maybe the teacher in me will just talk a little bit about what a content warning or trigger warning means. A trigger warning is a statement that's made prior to sharing potentially disturbing content. That content might include graphic references to topics like sexual assault, self-harm, violence, eating disorders, and so on.

I think everybody in this Chamber would agree that the topic of FGM, female genital mutilation, is something that could be absolutely traumatizing and triggering to somebody listening, somebody tuning in. You know, believe it or not – I know I like to joke about people listening to the Chamber – there are people who tune in and watch. I think it's really a good learning experience, a good teaching opportunity – again, it's the teacher in me – that we should take content warnings and trigger warnings seriously whenever we talk about potentially quite traumatizing, triggering topics such as this one, that we join together and acknowledge the impact that it could have on people, on survivors of female genital mutilation.

This is why I do want to just point out that we've seen from this Premier multiple times – I didn't get a chance to fully search Hansard, but he did it this week on Tuesday, I believe, made light of trigger warnings and mocked them. Of course, you can do a little bit of research and reading on trigger warnings and content warnings, and you may find that some people – there's actually a lot of research that says: I'm not so certain if trigger warnings and content warnings are the best approach. Regardless, making light and mocking sensitivities like that I don't think is the right approach. I would think that most folks in this Chamber would agree with that, just as, you know, if we were talking about residential schools, as an example, when you talk with elders and you talk with survivors, you often preface those conversations with the possible retraumatizing effects.

I did actually have the opportunity – I don't think he'll mind me saying it – to talk with the Finance minister yesterday. He mirrored the Premier in making light of a trigger warning. I was actually really pleased that the Finance minister talked to me and said, "I didn't know," and he said that he won't do it again. That was pretty great to hear, and I really appreciated that. I also chatted with the Member for – oh, my goodness, I may get a riding wrong – Chestermere-Strathmore, and she also said that it's not something that we should be doing.

I'm doubtful that the Premier is watching me speak right now, but on Sunday – yep. I'm getting back to . . .

The Acting Speaker: I'm just going to remind all members that it would be inappropriate to comment as to whether or not other members . . .

Member Irwin: Oh, good point. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Yeah. It wasn't quite exactly, but I thought – I think we're all on the same page.

Member Irwin: Yeah. Thank you. I really appreciate that.

I just did want to highlight that, you know, I may not have much of a life because I did watch the press conference on Sunday and actually watched it with much interest. That was on human trafficking. One of the reasons why I watched it with much interest: the Premier was there and the Minister of Children's Services and, I believe, the Minister of Justice and perhaps someone else. Apologies. Why I paid such attention to that is that one of my constituents, Kate Quinn – she's the head of CEASE, the Centre to End All Sexual Exploitation – was there. She made the trip down from Edmonton, from Treaty 6, as she said in her remarks. She went down with April, who is a survivor of human trafficking and someone who's been an incredible advocate for missing and murdered Indigenous women and girls and two-spirit folks, and she cofounded the Stolen Sisters movement.

So I watched with a lot of interest, and I saw the Premier standing there and supporting and saying that this government was going to do all they could to end human trafficking and to take those issues seriously. You know, I felt hopeful. Then on the next day he posted a meme trivializing assault, and then on the very next day he made light of trigger warnings. I'm urging this government, this Premier to do better and to be better. I think he has an opportunity to do so and to allow all of us to really believe his words. I hope to see that with action here soon.

Let me get back to Bill 10, the Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022. You know, I said that I had the opportunity to speak with the bill's sponsor, and I know it's something that she's quite passionate about. She shared with me just the number of stakeholders that she's reached out to on this bill. I think we can all agree in this Chamber – and I shared this in my response to this bill as well – that, absolutely, FGM is a horrific human rights abuse, and we need to all call it out.

You know, I actually recall as a high school social studies teacher in rural Alberta – and the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon would recall as well – social studies 10, that human rights is an important component there, and I remember actually this topic coming up in class. I think it had been mentioned in an article, and one of the students asked: what is FGM? I still remember it so vividly. As social studies teachers, as topics come up organically, we address them, and I remember saying: okay, folks, I'm going to tell you what this practice is, but I'm just warning you. It was actually before I knew the language of content warning or trigger warning because this was, gosh, probably about 10 years ago now. I remember saying: I am going to tell you what this is about. I actually had a student faint in class. I still remember that. I remember it so vividly.

Again, as a teacher you embrace these learning opportunities, and actually then that same student did a project on this issue, so it sort of came full circle, because it was something my students, at that time in Bawlf, Alberta, hadn't heard about. I can imagine that many folks in this very Chamber haven't heard about it as well. We know that it is absolutely horrific, and we know that it is already illegal under the Criminal Code, as it should be.

I'm probably already running close to out of time here. I'm not going to speak a great deal about the specifics around it. I know that in debate yesterday there was some specific detail given from the sponsor of the bill as well. My colleagues will have a lot of specific questions; I'll say my two lawyer colleagues, who will provide some legal analysis of this as well, I know, who will be speaking here shortly, too.

But I do have to get on the record here as the critic for status of women that when I saw that a piece of legislation was coming forward, like I said, the first clear bill directly coming from the ministry for which I am the critic, I was really hopeful, especially when I heard that it was going to be about protecting women and girls. I thought: ah, interesting; I wonder what this is going to be about. I heard that it was going to be about women's health. I must say that while – again I'm going to be very careful on how I phrase this – we know that FGM is absolutely horrific, I want us to all condemn it, it's not an issue that I hear about from my constituents.

There are so many issues related to women's health, health of the 2SLGBTQ-plus community, specifically trans health. It's certainly on my mind, as we head into the Transgender Day of Visibility tomorrow, March 31, just how much work we have to do to advance and support trans health in this province and globally as well.

You know, I think about some folks who've reached out to me, sharing reproductive health concerns, endometriosis, as an example. It's actually Endometriosis Awareness Month. I didn't get a chance to talk about it in the Chamber yet, and we're almost at the end of the month, so a good opportunity to do so. This is a condition that affects thousands of women across this province. I shared an article from someone named Meghan, who shared her story about endometriosis. In her story she talked about the debilitating impact that endometriosis has had on her life, and when I shared it on social media, I had countless people, women, weigh in, sharing their own issues, many of them experiencing wait-lists in getting treatment. It is something for which treatment is not simple, and there is no specific cure, so to speak.

A number of women shared their lack of access to health care. Endometriosis is just one example of many. During the Bill 207 debate the number of women and gender-diverse folks I heard from around this province who encounter barriers when accessing health care – this is not ancient history. This is November 2019, I believe, when we were first talking about it. I could have my dates wrong. Memories are confusing during a pandemic. I've heard from countless people, women in particular, even in urban areas. I remember one woman in an urban area who said that she was being denied birth control from her family physician, right? This is still happening. I give those as a couple of examples of some of the significant health concerns that women and gender-diverse folks have raised with me.

Again, it's not to diminish the critical importance of speaking up and speaking out against FGM, but I do wonder, of all the pressing concerns facing women and girls in the province, that this was this government's priority. I'd love to hear – and I do hope we'll have folks rising on the other side of the Chamber to just perhaps talk a little bit about, you know, why it was that this topic area was so critical. Like I said, my staff probably think I'm a little bit too nosy, but I pay a lot of attention to my inbox because I really do want to know what issues are top of mind for my constituents. I mean, like, I'm sure that all of us in this Chamber don't just hear from our constituents. We hear from folks in other constituencies, folks who might not be getting the support they need. As a critic for status of women and 2SLGBTQ-plus issues, of course, I hear from women and members of the community from all over the province, and I've not had an e-mail about this topic. I'd love to hear a little bit more as to the why – right? – as to why this government felt that this was such a significant priority for this government.

All right. I'll get a couple of questions here on the record, but again I really wanted to present that, because, hey, as I said in my response to this bill when it first was released, if this government, if this minister, the Associate Minister of Status of Women, are looking for any ideas of key priority areas where we could really be supporting women and girls and, hey, specifically women and girls' health, I've got a lot of ideas. I know I've worked closely with our Health critic, the Member for Edmonton-City Centre, too, on both the issues of women's health and LGBTQ2S-plus health, and there are a lot of tangible things that this government could be doing to support those areas. Again – I've got to mention it because I may not get a chance tomorrow – trans health is a big one. I had the pleasure of raising some concerns around trans health in government estimates, and I shared in that room that when we're talking about delays in accessing trans health care, delayed health care is deadly health care for the trans community.

The stories I could share with you. Talking about e-mails, I could share with folks in this Chamber countless e-mails from members of the trans communities sharing just how incredibly challenging it is to access health care. The barriers are many: wait-lists, of course; lack of psychologists. We hear that there are six psychologists across this province who are able to provide referrals, and we've asked Alberta Health and Alberta Health Services to expand the list of professionals, the list of people who are able to provide referrals. We know that access to surgery itself is a huge, huge barrier as well.

With that, thank you for the time. I appreciate the rapt audience.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

We're on second reading of Bill 10. Are there any members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has risen.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and speak to Bill 10. I'll start, as my colleague did, by providing a content warning for anyone who might be watching because we will be discussing some troubling things in this particular bill.

The bill is intended to ensure that health professionals are not involved in the performance of female genital mutilation, or FGM, and that's obviously a good thing. It's rendered illegal by the Criminal Code, so, I mean, I suppose it already was illegal, but it's not necessarily a bad thing to have multiple avenues by which to approach behaviour that we want to curtail. I think that that can be important, providing – for instance, in a criminal court the standard of proof tends to be a lot higher than in other proceedings, so providing other avenues is a good thing. I am glad to see that this government is speaking out against this practice and is taking the steps that are within their control. I think that's a good thing.

I do have some questions about the legislation, particularly the wording of the legislation. The definition is provided for in here. The question I have about the way the definition is framed is: what steps have been taken to ensure that this definition doesn't impact trans folks trying to access health care? Because the definition is – I mean, to prevent the harm, I understand why the definition is broad. I'm a little curious why an explicit exemption for a trans person was not provided in the definition, because I think that that would have been possible, especially in light of the sort of exemptions that are already in there. I think that that is something that could have been added to this bill, and I'm a little curious why it wasn't because we certainly know – I mean, obviously, again, this is another thing where we talk about how, you know, you can take steps forward without solving the problem. Let's put it that way.

I was very proud in our time in government to introduce a bill that prohibited discrimination on the basis of gender expression and gender identity. That was certainly a big step forward, but we know that it wasn't enough. That's why we continued to work with the community to bring in other things. One of the things that I hear frequently about is about access to health care.

In part it's about physicians maybe not feeling competent or able to manage in the area. I've heard from some trans folks that, you know, you go in for a broken arm – and a broken arm is a broken arm. People will not decline to provide care but be reluctant to provide care or ongoing care because the individual is trans. The doctor or the other health professional doesn't necessarily feel that they're sort of prepared to deal with that. That could certainly be dealt with by way of sort of requirements in the curriculum.

But there are also direct problems on sort of the provision of surgeries, for instance. There's a very long waiting list. There are a lot of hurdles to be overcome, but even when you overcome those hurdles, it's very, very difficult to access, and it has been made more difficult to access. Part of this is because it's bureaucratic, and people want to see protections in place, but sometimes these things have unintended consequences, I guess, is my concern.
