See, they made the strategic error because when they voted down the motion that would have sped up the legislative process, that was about six and a half hours after the Member for Calgary-Mountain View did a press conference telling all the media that the rebates were taking too long. That's right. They went in front of the media and said: these rebates are taking too long. Then that member came into this Chamber and voted down a motion to speed up the process. Then they threw their hands up in the air. I mean, Madam Chair, talk about gaslighting Albertans.

I think that the members opposite are discovering that Albertans are on to them, and I think that the members opposite are discovering that Albertans are a little more astute than they thought. Albertans are not happy. They're not happy that these rebates are going to take longer because the NDP refused to work in a bipartisan fashion. We invited them to speed up the legislative process to help us push this through, and what did they say? They said no. Then they come in here and they gaslight Albertans. They come up with amendments that say: you know, we want to have this out by a certain deadline. Madam Chair, we could easily have made that deadline if we had had royal assent on Thursday at 3 o'clock, like we had suggested. Shame on the NDP.

Now, let's go back and talk about some more gaslighting. You know, the NDP talked about how the support that we're providing is not enough. Well, Madam Chair, the total amount of this support to Albertans is $280 million. That's how much we're trying to rush out the door to support Albertans, $280 million. Now, they will throw up their hands and say: oh, what about the rate cap? We're providing $280 million over three months. The NDP's rate cap didn't apply to half of Albertans. If you were on a fixed rate, you didn't benefit from the rate cap, so they got nothing from the NDP. The other folks, that were on the regulated rate option, received $108 million over two years. You know, I would suggest that the support that the NDP provided pales in comparison to the support that we are providing Albertans.

Now, in addition, we've also said that we're going to provide a rebate for natural gas, and again they gaslight Albertans or scare them. I'm not sure what they're doing. It's hard to keep track. But they tell Albertans that this is a fake rebate. Remember that, the NDP standing up and saying, "This is a fake rebate" and that it was a fake rebate because the trigger price of $6.50 was too high? Well, in fact, I know that the Member for Calgary-Mountain View wouldn't know the price of natural gas, Madam Chair, but it's actually trading for $6.75 today. Had this legislation been in effect, then the trigger price would have been released. Again, does that stop them from calling it a fake rebate? I believe I heard it as recently as today in this Chamber, so they continue to gaslight Albertans.

That's not the only support because – I bring this up only because the members talked about the cost of living in general. In addition to those two items that I just mentioned, Madam Chair, we also decided to pause the gas tax, 13 cents a litre on gas tax. That is providing, you know, $8, $9 every time an Albertan fills up the trunk, so it's real support that Albertans feel in the pocketbook every time. But in terms of the total support, actually $1.3 billion is the cost of that support if it goes on for the full year. The total support package that we're providing is $2 billion, yet the NDP would have us believe that the supports we're providing are not enough. Again, they continue to gaslight Albertans and frighten them.

But that's not even the real problem, Madam Chair. The real problem here is that the NDP lacks vision. Now, the reason I say that is that I'm not sure if they read the legislation. Well, in fact, they either didn't read the legislation or they didn't understand it. I'm not sure which. The reason I say that is that this is actually enabling legislation. See, we're putting this legislation in to enable us to be able to do this now and at any time in the future. But if we were to accept the amendments of the NDP as written, it would no longer be enabling legislation. It would be so prescriptive as to be useless down the road, so if we were to find ourselves in this situation three years from now – and heaven forbid, Madam Chair; I hope that we don't – we would have to go through this process all over again. We have the vision that they lack, and we are putting this forward as enabling legislation so it'll be there to support Albertans whenever it's needed.

You know, this is a pattern. They routinely make decisions without understanding the consequences of their actions. It's not the first time they've done this. I remember Bill 6, and I only mention Bill 6 as an example of when they don't think things through. Bill 6 was the farm legislation, and we continue to hear from members there that claim to be driving through rural Alberta, but they can't be stopping in any of these small towns, Madam Chair, because they would be laughed out of some of these towns, because these farmers were upset when they demonstrated such poor understanding and lack of respect for the family farm. Had we actually accepted the initial iterations of Bill 6, there would have been porta-potties in farmers' fields, porta-potties in families' fields. We have a three-generation family farm. It's 2,400 acres in southern Saskatchewan, and my stepdad still goes out there on a regular basis to check the soil and the moisture, but I've got to tell you that he would laugh if I told him that he had to put a porta-potty in his field. But this is what the NDP do.

Now, let's come to something more damaging. Let's talk about the coal-to-gas conversions because this is another example of the NDP lacking the vision to see the consequences of their actions. They sped up the coal-to-gas conversions, Madam Chair, and they ran the victory lap with all of their environmental extremist friends, all of their progressive politicians, their leave-it-in-the-ground extremists. When they were done running the victory lap, they forgot to tell Albertans that, by the way, they just sentenced Albertans to higher electricity prices, and we're seeing it today. In fact, the NDP keeps mentioning the U of C study, which was not peer reviewed by the way, and that study references the coal-to-gas conversions as one of the reasons for the higher prices that we're seeing.

But that's not all. The NDP also spent $7.5 billion on infrastructure when they were in government, Madam Chair. Now, they'll throw up their hands, and they'll gaslight Albertans, and they'll say: oh, we didn't approve that. Well, you know, I will be the first one to be fair to the NDP, and I will say that they did not start the overbuild on the transmission system. What the NDP is guilty of is not stopping it, and I am proud to say that this government stopped the overbuild. If you're wondering, in 2020 we spent $100 million on infrastructure, and in 2021 we spent zero dollars on infrastructure. Compare that to the $7.5 billion that was spent under the NDP.

The AESO recently released their forecast, and they indicated that they have deferred a billion dollars' worth of unnecessary transmission. Again, that was something that the NDP could have looked at. They could have deferred the transmission buildup, but they did not. In addition, the AESO forecasted that we will average $150 million to $200 million a year in infrastructure, again, versus the $2 billion a year that was spent previously. Madam Chair, that's the problem with that caucus; they don't see the consequences of their actions because they lack vision.

Now, in case that wasn't example enough, you know, the Balancing Pool comes to mind. I released an audit last week that was the absolute smoking gun, Madam Chair. This audit, done by Deloitte, confirms that they spent $1.34 billion in losses on the Balancing Pool.

An Hon. Member: What?

Mr. Nally: Yup: $1.34 billion. Then they turn around, and they hang that on Albertans as a ratepayer. You may remember that there was a time when we had a Balancing Pool rate rider that actually paid money back to Albertans. The Balancing Pool has given back over $4 billion to ratepayers.

Mr. Sabir: Point of order.

Point of Order
Repetition
Relevance

Mr. Sabir: Standing Order 23(c). The member is just persisting in completely needless, useless, repetition of things and not speaking to the amendment at hand, which requests the minister to consider putting it in legislation so that Albertans who get a rebate: their connections are not shut off. They're able to get the electricity, get the utilities they need. That's what the amendment is about, and I have not heard a single word about this amendment in the last however minutes.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Madam Chair. This is not a point of order. I don't think listing out the steps the NDP took to raise the cost of electricity is needless repetition. If they're tired of hearing it, they shouldn't have done it. The minister has the ability to lay this out simply because this amendment talks about stopping people from being cut off from their utilities because they can't afford to pay it. They can't afford to pay it because the NDP raised the costs too much for them, and that's what the minister is discussing. It's completely relevant.

The Chair: Oh, the speeches I've heard in terms of repetition. Hon. members, I think this is a good time to get back on track and, most certainly, specifically speak to amendment A2, which has lots of words. I'm certain that the minister's remarks will be a little bit more specifically about those as opposed to other things or more so relatable moving forward.

Debate Continued

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Chair. You're absolutely right. I mean, Albertans are struggling with the high cost of electricity. Why? Well, because of the path that the NDP took us down. I won't belabour the point on the Balancing Pool. I think the point was made that $1.34 billion was hung on the ratepayer, and that is not being paid back on a rate rider that we'll be paying till 2030. Yeah, electricity is expensive because of the NDP.

Again, this goes back to the gaslighting. The NDP come here, and they want us to do this and to do that. But we put a motion forward in this House to ask the NDP to work across the aisle in a bipartisan fashion to send a motion to Ottawa basically saying: do not increase the carbon tax on April 1. They actually voted against that motion, Madam Chair.

Mr. Sabir: Point of order.

Mr. Nally: So on one hand they come in here . . .

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Point of Order
Repetition
Items Previously Decided

Mr. Sabir: Again 23(c), persists in needless repetition or raises matters that have been decided during the current session. That matter was decided during the current session. Unless he wants to bring it back for debate or rescind that vote, I don't think it's in order for the member to discuss that. He should stick to the amendment at hand.

The Chair: The . . .

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are you to speak to the point of order?

Mr. Nally: Yes.

The Chair: Okay. The hon. minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Chair. This is absolutely not a point of order. There is certainly no repetition in this. In fact, I'm bringing up the carbon tax for the first time. The carbon tax is one of the things that has increased the price of electricity, which is causing Albertans to suffer from utility insecurity. Some, unfortunately, are having conversations about disconnection because of some things like the carbon tax. The NDP had an opportunity to vote against that, and they voted to support the carbon tax by the feds. For that reason, I say that this is a matter of debate.

The Chair: I would agree. It's a matter of debate. Where this would come into an issue is if that specific topic were to come up over and over and over again, which has previously been the theme with some other things that have been said. So I would caution you again, realizing that this is a different matter, and encourage you to speak to amendment A2 or not at all, and we can vote on it and move on to the next thing.

Debate Continued

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Chair, but I'm trying my darndest to convince the members opposite of the folly of these amendments. Make no mistake, there is folly – there is folly – in these amendments. Yeah, the carbon tax is absolutely one more example, and the point that I was trying to make was that if they truly cared about the cost of daily living, they would have voted with this government to send a strong message to Ottawa to not increase the carbon tax, but they voted against this government and in support of the carbon tax. I don't know how they can come in here on one hand and complain about the high cost of electricity and then on another hand, you know, vote against that motion.

Madam Chair, I think I've clearly articulated, as clearly as I could today, about why we have to vote down this CYA amendment, so I'm asking all my colleagues to give careful consideration and to vote no towards this amendment.

The Chair: Any other members? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Oh, thank you, Madam Chair. I'm going to be short and sweet, I think, with this. Honestly, the minister just stood up and waxed on for quite a long period of time and actually didn't speak to the amendment, which is specifically speaking to the fact of how we can support Albertans who are at a vulnerable situation where potentially their utilities will be shut off. The minister clearly doesn't want to speak about that because for some reason the government does not want to actually make sure that they're being held to account in this piece of legislation and make sure that they accept this amendment, where we can then ensure that Albertans will not have their utilities cut off if a rebate is to be paid out to Albertans. It's sad, and what is even worse is the fact that we just saw a minister, not only a week ago, standing in this very place talking about this piece of legislation, being asked questions about how it would work, and the response that we heard was: we don't know yet; it has to be put in regulation.

The government wants to rush. They want this bill put through. We're giving suggestions about how to make it better to make sure that the money – the whole intention of this is to support Albertans to deal with their utility bills at a time when they can't afford them. This amendment does that. It gets the money in the pockets of the people that need it and secures the fact that their utilities are going to continue to be available to them. It's pretty simple, yet the minister just stood up and spent 15 minutes talking about all the reasons why utilities are expensive. You're right. They're expensive. So accept this amendment, support Albertans, make sure their utilities are not cut off so that when they get the rebate, they can pay their bills. It's black and white. It's pretty simple. Just accept it, vote for it, and get it done. That's what's going to help Albertans.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to join the debate on amendment A2? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Chair. I am happy to take a moment to speak to this amendment, and I want to come at it from a very different angle because I think my colleagues have articulated extremely well the reasons why this government should be onboard here. But one thing that I think should be added to this debate is something about the serious consequences of taking away people's utilities, with a little bit more depth from my experience.

I was very disappointed, of course, when the government failed to agree to the previous amendment, because it brought timeliness into the bill. Of course, I believe that justice delayed is justice denied, and in this case I think the government has chosen to deny justice. But what's more concerning, for me, in this second amendment is the people who will suffer the consequences of having their utilities cut off.

Now, many in the House know that I was in social work for many years before I became elected. One of the things I did in my time as an instructor in the Faculty of Social Work, prior to coming in, is that I was a coauthor on the Canadian Incidence Study of Reported Child Abuse and Neglect for the last two rounds of the study, that were done in 2008 and 2013. In that study one of the things that we found quite clearly in the analysis of the child welfare system in the province of Alberta is that the vast majority of the cases where children come into care or come to the attention of Children's Services, the child welfare system, is because of neglect, not because of abuse.

In fact, there has been some good analysis showing that lately the amount of child sexual abuse, for example, which is an area of my particular focus of practice for many years, has actually been going down through this study, so we're very grateful and happy to see that. That kind of abuse is no longer as horrendously high as it once was, but what we are seeing is that the cause of children coming into contact with the system is neglect. One of the significant aspects of neglect that contributes to contact with child welfare is people being unable to provide adequate home and shelters, including utilities.

I am concerned about this particular bill because I know that this government spends a significant amount of money in the child welfare system in trying to address problems that occur in family homes. We know that those problems are primarily neglect. We know that absence of appropriate shelter is one of the significant reasons why neglect is identified in a family. In this particular situation what we're asking is for the government to ensure that families do not get into the position of having their utilities cut off, because that would bring them to the place of potentially being identified by child welfare as unable to care for their children, which brings their children into care. From a straight sort of selfish point of view, the government could seek to attempt to try to save some money in the child welfare system by preventing families from being in this kind of crisis.

Now, the situation in this case is such that if you get your utilities cut off, it is because you have found yourself in a position where you're unable to pay your bills. The issue is just simply an issue of poverty. So if we cut them off because they are poor, then, essentially, we are making poverty; we are in a manner kind of criminalizing poverty. That's really not an appropriate thing for us to be doing. If people get their utility bills cut off, there is a double cost here because not only do they have the problem of trying to pay the bill, which they're unable to pay, but once you've had your utilities cut off, you actually have to pay a second reconnection fee to have your utilities turned back on again. So whatever deep, you know, well of poverty that you've been in is exacerbated by having the bill not only remain standing but being added to by having a reconnection fee associated with it.

I'm very concerned that this is a very simple way the government can try to help families from getting to that very horrendous, desperate place where families who cannot at this point already pay their bills are subsequently finding themselves further down the well in terms of being unable to pay their bills and therefore being subject to potential child welfare intervention because of the lack of appropriate shelter, including the utilities.

I think, you know, I certainly agree with the comments made by my colleagues prior about this bill, and I'd just like to add that it just doesn't make sense for us to be working with families to try to enhance their well-being on one hand and then creating circumstances where their ability to provide appropriately for their children is being taxed to the degree it is when their utilities are cut off. I'd like the government just to help us to avoid some of those circumstances and to help us decrease the demands on the child welfare system, which, of course, is being highly stressed right now because so many families have experienced dramatic increases in utility bills, and this government has done nothing for them.

You know, this government has certainly had months and months of time to look at this. The government took some actual, specific, direct action in removing the utilities cap, and therefore the government is actually complicit in this problem. Had they just left well enough alone, we probably wouldn't be here today, but they have taken action. That action has consequences. The government is responsible for those consequences, and ultimately the government will pay financially, but more importantly, families will pay in terms of the stress and potentially even the loss of their children through child welfare investigations.

I think it would cost the government nothing to just pass this amendment here, to just go ahead and say: "Sure. Why don't we just do that one thing. It won't really matter that much to us as a government. It won't hurt us in any way as a government." It just simply is a way of recognizing that some people find themselves in desperate straits and could use a helping hand, and the government by just simply passing one amendment can help some families with that stress.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to speak briefly to this bill. I was listening to the minister, and the minister said it's an enabling legislation. What we are trying to do with these amendments is that we want to put some certainty in this piece of legislation, that it's not just: trust us; we will get it right.

The reason that we don't trust the UCP, the reason that Albertans don't trust the UCP is that they are the least trusted government across Canada and across North America, if I could say that. Nobody trusts this government. They said and signed a public health guarantee. That was out the door as soon as they became government. They said many things during the campaign, but they never followed through on that, so we cannot trust this government on this legislation. There needs to be some certainty.

They already refused to at least guarantee that in five weeks' time Albertans will see a rebate. The government already delayed taking action on this file by almost six months. Utility costs have been going up for months now, and wherever we go in our constituencies, at different events, when we talk to stakeholders, they are concerned about the rising costs of utilities.

Well, somebody mentioned a study from the University of Calgary School of Public Policy where the number one reason for rising utility costs is that utility companies' profits have gone up by five times. The associate minister of natural gas rejected that study right away, that it's not peer reviewed, and then he went on to talk about many other things, none of them reviewed by anyone at all and not helpful either. This amendment at least will give assurance to Albertans that their utilities will not be cut off during the time they are getting this rebate. No one, no Albertan, should have to choose between their utilities and putting food on the table, and that's where people are at.

I was in Banff and door-knocking outside. We went to a house where one person told us that, basically, she has not paid the rent because at least she had some assurance that she won't be kicked out right away, but she paid the utilities so that after April 15 her utilities are not cut off. Albertans are struggling.

A few months ago the same minister stood in this House. When asked what he would do about the rising cost of utilities, the minister said, and I pretty much quote, that: news for the NDP, we won't do anything; the market will fix it. Clearly, the market didn't fix it, and now the minister is putting forward this legislation that enables him to intervene in the market. We need in it that there is some certainty, there is some date that Albertans can hope to get their rebates by, and there is some assurance that while they're waiting for the UCP's infighting to end so they can provide the rebate, their connection won't be cut off. That's what this amendment is about.

I urge all members of this House: think about your constituents. Think about those who are struggling to make ends meet. Think about those who are on minimum wage and fixed incomes. This amendment is about those people; it will help everyone in those circumstances. So please vote for this amendment.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others that wish to speak to amendment A2? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to this amendment. I appreciate the robust debate that is going on tonight. Obviously, I'm rising to speak in favour of this amendment. I'm not sure why the government is so opposed to an amendment that would ensure that utilities aren't cut off until the government's rebate program comes into effect or provides assistance to them. There are only a couple of reasons I can think of as to why the government would be opposed to this.

Madam Chair, if the government stands behind their rebate program and has refused previous amendments that would put a timeline and a collar around those rebates, so ensuring that Albertans will get that assistance – you know, I'm not trying to relitigate a previous amendment that was voted down in this Chamber, but I really don't understand why the government would refuse an amendment that ensures the money gets out the door unless they're planning to drag their feet. Otherwise, there's no coherent explanation for why they wouldn't agree to an amendment to get money out the door efficiently.

In this case, Madam Chair, facing utility cut-offs is a very real challenge for many Albertans. Members of the opposition, during question period and other times in this Chamber, repeatedly demonstrate correspondence we've been receiving from Albertans with ridiculously high utility rates. You know, I appreciate that the bulk of winter may be behind us, but even if that's the case, again, I can't think of a logical reason of why the government is refusing to ensure that folks don't get their utilities disconnected.

As my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford pointed out, the majority of Albertans that are facing utility shut-offs are those who are struggling the most to make ends meet. We've heard a number of stories of families and parents that have to choose between utilities and food. Madam Chair, I can't even imagine being in that predicament. I mean, I will acknowledge that I am extremely privileged, that I have never had to make that decision, but I can tell you that being a parent, I can only imagine the struggle that parents are going through.

The opposition once again is trying to bring forward reasonable amendments to strengthen the bill. This is where – and earlier today, you know, the Assembly voted down a previous bill. The challenge that I have is when party lines and partisanship can blind members of this Chamber from the real reason they were elected. Now, unless I've missed the boat in my 10 years of being an MLA, our job is to represent our constituents first and foremost. I appreciate that we are all here representing different political parties, but I would challenge any member for putting the priorities of their constituents second or third or fourth. If we are all here in the spirit of bringing forward the best possible legislation to support Albertans, then I'm really at a loss, Madam Chair, when government won't accept reasonable amendments.

I'm speaking from a place where when we were government, I remember on bills that I brought forward as minister of economic development and trade acknowledging and accepting amendments from the opposition because good ideas come from all sides of this Chamber. Any member that thinks that only they have the best ideas or their staff have the best ideas or their party has the best ideas, quite frankly, I think, has missed the boat, and if anything, their perspective is quite dangerous. I mean, again, our parliamentary system exists for a reason.

In this example we've got an amendment that would provide an extra layer of protection for the most vulnerable. I know that members on both sides of this Chamber have spoken about and advocated for protecting Alberta's most vulnerable citizens, so it's disappointing, from the sounds of things, that the government is not willing to accept this amendment and is resorting to bipartisan, hyperpartisan attacks. We're in a position where collectively as members of the Assembly we can ensure that before this legislation passes, it's in the best form and shape that it's in.

I find it amusing, Madam Chair, when members or ministers will either play semantics or talk about, you know, that previously the government asked for unanimous consent to speed this bill through. Where is the government's recognition that the opposition has been calling for these supports since last fall? For Albertans who pay attention to the Assembly and debate in this Chamber, they're thinking that it's absolutely ridiculous that the minister of natural gas stands up and tries to accuse the NDP of dragging its feet on this bill when we've been calling for this bill for months.

We're in a position, Madam Chair, where an amendment like the one that's before the Chamber right now can improve it, so I know that Albertans are getting less and less patient with the theatrics and the hyperpartisanship that is being displayed in this Chamber and looking for solutions, real solutions, to help them with their current affordability crisis. My hope is that members of this Chamber will acknowledge that good ideas come from all sides of the House. No party has a monopoly, and in fact governments that think they have a monopoly on the best ideas: friends, we have examples of governments around the world that are not democratically elected who think they have a monopoly on good ideas.

So in the spirit of co-operation, I ask all members to consider supporting this amendment.

The Chair: Are there others that wish to speak to amendment A2?

[Motion on amendment A2 lost]

The Chair: We're back on the main in Committee of the Whole. Any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Me again, Madam Chair. I rise to propose another amendment. I will let it get to the table.

The Chair: Hon. members, this will be known as amendment A3. Hon. member, please proceed to read it.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 18, Utility Commodity Rebate Act, be amended in section 8 by adding the following immediately after subsection (2): “(3) A rebate under this Act must be provided within 30 days of the rebate being authorized under this Act.”

Madam Chair, what this one does is that it means that in subsequent instances, because, as the minister noted, the legislation is enabling and it can be used in subsequent instances, if a rebate is announced, it goes to Albertans within 30 days. This doesn't seem like an extraordinary request to me. I am sure that we are about to hear from the associate minister at great lengths about how it would be absolutely impossible to get a rebate out the door in 30 days, that he could never manage to do that, and a whole series of other bizarre allegations about things that never happened. But I think, Madam Chair, that it would be perfectly possible to get a rebate out within 30 days.

In fact, I think Albertans expect their government to be able to move at this kind of a speed. I believe someone used to say: moving at the speed of business. I think that's all we're asking the government to do. We're not even really asking them to move at the speed of business. We're just asking them to move at – I don't know – something resembling a reasonable speed, that if they promise Albertans a rebate, within 30 days Albertans will have that rebate in their hands. I don't think that's a particularly extraordinary request. I don't think that Albertans will think that's a particularly extraordinary request.

Now, the government having, of course, thus far voted down our attempt to ensure that the current rebate gets out the door by the 31st of March – “rather ironically,” I suppose, is the right word for this – while complaining that the opposition didn't pass their bill in six hours, they can't possibly get the rebate out the door by the 31st of March, which is more than a month away. But it's the fault of the opposition because when they requested unanimous consent to pass the bill – what? – roughly six hours after it was introduced, we didn't comply. I mean, I don't actually think I have to go on at length about that, Madam Chair. I think it's pretty transparent to anyone who happens to be listening that that's absurd and absurd on a special series of levels. This amendment would, I mean, simply force the government to keep their word to Albertans within a reasonable length of time.

The UCP came rushing forward with this bill, a bill which they have admitted is enabling legislation. It doesn't require them to do anything. It simply enables a rebate. They have refused to provide any sort of timeline on that rebate. We're now asking them to do exactly that. Why? Because this issue was raised with them months ago. It was raised by us; it was raised by Albertans. Many people raised the issue. The government did nothing about it. The associate minister rose in this place and said that he planned to do nothing. Then the government promised a rebate on natural gas, a rebate which – I mean, the associate minister literally just rose in this place and said: well, you know, if this had been passed, then people would already be getting a rebate on their natural gas. Except the Premier has said that the rebate isn't going to be until the fall, and then he said that, no, it might be earlier. Then the associate minister said that it won't be until the fall . . .

Mr. Nally: Electricity.

Ms Ganley: . . . so the natural gas rebate is all confused. I'll just remind the associate minister that this bill actually deals with both electricity and natural gas, so I'm well within my rights to speak on both.

The electricity rebate then was again also raised. It was also deferred for a lengthy period of time. It was promised; nothing happened. We called on the government to do the thing that they promised to do, and then finally we see an act come before this House. Well, that's good, but the act, again, is enabling. It doesn't require anything. So we're asking for a time frame, and I think – you know what? – that's really reasonable because people out there, real people out there living their lives, are trying to pay their bills. They're trying to make the decision between their electricity bills, their natural gas bills, and their groceries. That is what people are doing out there, that is what they are writing to us about, and that is what this government does not seem to understand.

All we are saying is that when this government promises those people relief, they ought to provide it within a reasonable period of time. It's not an extraordinary request. Obviously, the members opposite think that it is an extraordinary request, but I don't think Albertans are going to see it that way, and I think that we owe them that. I think that we owe Albertans legislation that guarantees that when this government makes a promise, they have to follow through within some period of time, because demonstrably the government will not do it on their own.

Madam Chair, I am sure that we are about to be delighted by another series of bizarre allegations and a long attempt to describe how a government that has had this problem for months and done nothing about it and has admitted after the introduction of this act – has admitted – that they don't think they can get this money into the hands of people before June or July, makes some sort of attempt to blame the opposition for not passing the bill in six hours – well, again, it's absurd.

Just for the record, for members who maybe haven't sat in cabinet or maybe aren't familiar with this, there is absolutely no prohibition on drafting regulations while an act is still before the House. So I will call the government's bluff, and I will say that I would be delighted to see the regulations turn up the very day after we pass this act, but, Madam Chair, I don't think that's going to happen. I think that this has been one hundred per cent bluster. You know what? Even if the regulations do turn up the day after, I don't think we're going to see the rebate the day after. I mean, the government just voted down an amendment to get the rebate out the door by the end of May, so they clearly don't have any particular confidence that they can manage that.

Again, I think, to be clear, we have been calling for the government to do this. They ought to do this, providing Albertans with some sort of certainty as to the time frame in which they're going to see this money and in a situation where they are generally struggling. You know, seeing the money several months from now is not sufficient to them. They want to see it soon, and that, Madam Chair, is why we have brought these amendments. It is why we have attempted to ask the government to get the money out the door in a timely manner. This will be the second attempt at that. It's why we have asked the government to prohibit Albertans from being disconnected from their utilities while the government is dithering and unable to get the rebate out the door. They voted that down, too.

But, Madam Chair, I suppose I will simply say that hope springs eternal, and perhaps some of the MLAs on the government side will take this opportunity to stand up for their constituents.

The Chair: The hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Chair. It was just shared with me that the fastest way to get these rebates into Albertans' pockets was to not have lost $1.34 billion on the Balancing Pool. That would have been the preferred approach, but I digress. Here we are.

Apparently, the Member for Calgary-Mountain View is embarrassed, and the hon. member is embarrassed because I've called her out for not knowing the price of electricity. In addition, that is the same member that went in front of the media and demanded that we get these rebates out quicker, and that same member voted in this House against getting the rebates out any quicker than we could have. The gaslighting that happens on that side of the House is unbelievable.

You know, I think that we need to change the name of this amendment, too. We're going to call this amendment the Failure to Consult amendment. You see, had the members opposite actually consulted with industry, then they would know that these utilities actually have different enterprise resource planning software, ERP. Now, these enterprise resource planning softwares aren't something where you can just go in and change a billing cycle in five or 10 minutes. It actually is much more complicated than that. I can remember when I was in industry and we had enterprise resource planning software – it was SAP, a great program – you actually had to have SAP consultants come in here to change anything that was SAP related. Madam Chair, the NDP would know this had they done the slightest amount of consultation with anyone from industry, but they did not. Just like everything else the NDP has done, it is littered with unintended consequences.

Again, my ask of everyone on this side of the House is to urge you to vote against this amendment. This would be just one more example of charging forward without knowing the consequences. Such has been the history of the NDP, so I ask the hon. members to politely turn down this amendment.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Madam Chair. That was a great example of where this place has gone to, where the minister gets up and resorts to personal attacks, a level of arrogance I haven't seen since the Redford government, as opposed to talking about the amendment. The fact of the matter is that this amendment is putting a time frame on the rebates. Now, I appreciate that the government needs to work with industry, but asking for a time frame on this I don't think is unreasonable. In fact, when we look at the UCP promise of the electricity rebate, we're now moving into week 10 of the announcement of a rebate without the action of a rebate. [interjections] I know that the minister is yelling right now, and, you know, I'd be happy to go for a coffee with him and explain the ins and outs of how the government could move faster on a number of these programs, so . . . [interjections]

The Chair: Order.

Mr. Bilous: Again, we're talking about an amendment to improve this bill. We're at a place – I believe this is the bill that's replacing the previous failed no-rebate rebate bill. Thirty days, according to the minister, is unreasonable. I would love for the minister to propose, then, a more reasonable timeline.

I'm just nostalgically thinking of a time, not that long ago, in this place where spirited debate could exist in a way that was trying to get to a better outcome. Sadly, the state of our current Legislature – there's a reason that Albertans are disappointed in politicians, because we've somehow forgotten how to have a constructive conversation. Disagree with the ideas a hundred per cent, but by all means, please then present an alternative as opposed to just personal attacks.

If 30 days is unreasonable, fair enough. Then, Minister – through you, Madam Chair, I would ask the minister then to propose a counter. What is a reasonable time frame? Is it 60 days? Is it 90 days? I appreciate that the minister likely has more frequent conversations with industry than the opposition does. That's not for lack of trying; that comes with the position. If we pull out the partisan conversations, it's a reality. And I know this because I was a minister, but that's irrelevant.

The point is: how do we strengthen this piece of legislation? How do we ensure that rebates are going to get out in a timely fashion and that Albertans are going to get them in their pockets? Here we have example after example where my colleague is proposing amendments, and as opposed to the government standing up and speaking about why they are not necessary or how they won't in fact do what we believe they will do, we have a bunch of political staffers behind closed doors writing hyperpartisan comments and speaking points that result in a debate that goes into the mud and is all about character assassination as opposed to the spirit of policy debate.

I look back at exchanges between former Premier Peter Lougheed and Grant Notley, who was a two-member caucus, and the two of them would have extremely spirited debates about policy but were completely respectful with one another and respected each other. In fact, it was Premier Lougheed who ensured that there was a state funeral for Grant Notley when he died. He didn't have to do that, and if they were mortal enemies, he probably wouldn't do that. But I look at where that debate was in our history in Alberta and I look at where it is today, and quite frankly, Madam Chair, it's no wonder that Albertans are disappointed.

Again, whether we're talking about natural gas rebates, whether we're talking about electricity rebates, whether we're talking about how to diversify the economy, Albertans want to see the best policies put forward. They don't care who it comes from, and I think we often get lost in our own Twitterverse, for lack of a better frame, that just reinforces our own point of view as opposed to expanding our point of view, which is the point of the Westminster system, why we have multiple political parties represented in the Chamber. If we don't want to hear any other point of view, then what's the point of having democratically elected representatives from multiple parties?

Mr. Eggen: Democracy.

Mr. Bilous: What's the point of having democracy?

Madam Chair, the point is that what's disappointing for Albertans is that we have lost the ability to have a respectful debate about policy. So I'm hoping the minister will rise and speak to why this amendment is not necessary or if the 30-day time frame is unreasonable and if there is a more reasonable time frame for an amendment like this. How can we ensure that the rebate gets out the door in a timely fashion without a response of, "Trust us; we're going to do this"?

I appreciate how legislation and then regulations work. I also appreciate the fact that to get something on a cabinet committee agenda takes months, and anybody who stands up and argues differently: their nose is going to grow, because it takes time. It doesn't happen overnight. If this bill was passed in all three stages right now, the regulations would not be dealt with tomorrow. They would likely not even be dealt with at the next cabinet meeting.

But the point is, for the purpose of this amendment, Madam Chair, that if 30 days is not the right answer, then I hope the minister can provide the House with, in his opinion, a more reasonable amendment and then possibly comment on if he would entertain such an amendment, and if not, please share with Albertans why not.

The Chair: Any other members to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. It's an honour and a privilege to rise this evening to speak to this very important amendment, and I thank my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View for bringing it forward. So far all of the amendments, obviously, as you can see from the voting record, I've had the opportunity to put forward my support for, because they've all been extremely important to Albertans.

We've heard again and again this evening and over several months now that Albertans are looking for support, and they're reaching out to our offices. This is one opportunity, with the amendment before us, to ensure that this is strengthened in a time where the government continues to say that they are ready to move forward with these rebates as soon as possible and, you know, casting aspersions that it's the opposition holding up this legislation.

But I would repeat that the fact is that if they have these regulations ready, as they claim to, and that it is indeed this debate that is holding it up, then they really should have no issues with moving forward with this amendment that has been proposed by the Member for Calgary-Mountain View, and I would say the exact same thing for the past amendments that we saw in terms of ensuring that the rebate is put in place by the end of May, that there's a moratorium on utility shut-offs for Albertans until a time where the associate minister and the government are prepared to move forward with that rebate. I think those have all been very reasonable amendments, just like the one before us, and I am deeply troubled, as the previous member pointed out, that we have come to a place this evening and several evenings before it, Madam Chair, where we spend more time attacking each other than debating the substance of the amendments before us.

At the end of the day, Madam Chair, I was sent here and all members of this House were sent here to represent their constituents but also be there to say and show that they support those members of the public when the time comes, and that time of need is here right now. Of course, the time was several months ago to take action on this legislation, but here we are several months later with a piece of legislation before us which, in principle, very willing to support and do our best to move it through the Legislature. But, unfortunately, there are no timelines in this legislation for when Albertans are going to see utility rebates. There is no dollar amount attached to how much Albertans are going to see rebated to them. All we can do in the opposition is try to improve this legislation in good faith to show Albertans that this government is really willing to take action.

Up to this point, through the decisions that this government has made to vote down amendment after amendment, it seems quite clear that this legislation was nothing more than a photo opportunity for this government to roll out the red carpet for themselves over and over again while not actually providing any real support to Alberta families. It's incredibly disappointing, again, when we have such a reasonable amendment before us. Albertans are expecting us to work together in this Legislature to create the best legislation, to create meaningful change across this province, and right now what Albertans need is support through utility rebates, and in the absence of that, they need support through a moratorium on utility shut-offs.

We have come way too far through this pandemic and through the lack of support from this government, and it's truly unfortunate that we aren't seeing a government willing to put forward the rebates that they so claim to want to put forward in the legislation itself. So here we are again in the opposition giving them an opportunity to show Albertans that they want to take real, meaningful action and that the policy decisions around rebates are important to them, more important than the grassroots guarantee that the Premier committed to himself and to his caucus members, which has all but eroded to this date, Madam Chair.

With that, I would again urge all members to support this amendment. I feel that it's very valuable, and I look forward to supporting it myself. Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members to amendment A3?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment A3 lost]

[Motion on amendment A3 lost]

The Chair: We are back on the main bill, Bill 18, in Committee of the Whole. The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: If at first you don't succeed, Madam Chair, try, try again. Okay. I have another amendment. Sorry. I'm just making sure I've got the original here. There you go. I'll wait for that to reach the table.

The Chair: It's of medium size. This will be amendment A4.

Hon. member, please proceed.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 18, Utility Commodity Rebate Act, be amended by adding the following immediately after section 8:

Report

- 8.1 If a rebate is authorized under this Act, the Minister must
- (a) prepare a report setting out how the conditions set out in section 2(1) were met in respect of the rebate, including any causes of an increase in the price of that utility commodity,
 - (b) lay a copy of the report referred to in clause (a) before the Legislative Assembly within 60 days of the rebate being authorized under this Act, and
 - (c) within 10 days of laying a copy of the report before the Legislative Assembly in accordance with clause (b), provide a copy of the report to the Market Surveillance Administrator to consider whether an investigation is warranted under section 42(1)(a) of the Alberta Utilities Commission Act.

Once again, Madam Chair, a rather – well, I guess, as you said, a medium-sized amendment. So what this does is that it requires in instances when a rebate is provided that the minister provide a report setting out a number of things, but I would say most importantly, including the causes of the increase in the price.

Madam Chair, had anyone been listening through the debate today . . .

10:00

Mr. Eggen: They are.

Ms Ganley: They may have been, okay?

For the many people out there listening through the debate today, they may have been rather confused because both sides appear to be operating from entirely different sets of facts, and that is confusing. As has often been said, every person is entitled to his or her own opinion but not to their own set of facts.

What this is meant to do is clarify for Albertans what's going on. We have a report out of the University of Calgary which indicates that a large portion of the upswing here has to do with profits, profits that have, according to that report, quintupled. Quintupled is kind of a fun word to say five times. Five times as high as they once were is – I don't know – I would say, a significant increase. That seems pretty significant to me. I think that's relevant to Albertans.

But then we have the associate minister standing up over and over, first of all referring to some legislation that was passed by previous Conservative governments, which sort of overrode the system and allowed the construction of very large lines that are costly. At the time the Official Opposition railed against it. Oh, we weren't the Official Opposition; I apologize. At the time the NDP opposition railed against that. There are some quotes in there. You can go back in Hansard. Both the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona and the leader of the NDP at the time, who was the Member for Edmonton-Highlands – the previous one, obviously, not the current one – were quite clear. In fact, I believe the previous Member for Edmonton-Highlands referred to it as, you know, that you're going to see a rider on your bill that's PC arrogance, or some words to that effect.

The point of this report is to clarify the facts, Madam Chair, and the reason I want the facts clarified is because I believe they show what I have been alluding to all along. I think this is worth while. I think Albertans deserve to know. I think that when prices go up like this, Albertans deserve to know the reason for that.

Now, the thing I think Albertans deserve more than that is a substantive rebate, a rebate within a reasonable time frame, not to be disconnected from their utilities while they await such a rebate, but all of those are things which the government has already rejected this evening. So I am left with this, which is to say an amendment to make sure that Albertans at least understand the facts that are before them so that we can have a rational conversation, and I think that that is what, Madam Chair, democracy is meant to be at its best, a rational conversation, where, you know, we all operate from the same set of facts.

I think, Madam Chair, the thing I would say in closing is this. The set of facts before us is as follows: we are presented with a bill, a bill which enables but does not require rebates; in that bill are no numbers on how much the rebates will be; in that bill is no requirement to provide those rebates within any sort of reasonable time frame. That's problematic. I think it's problematic because Albertans are struggling now, and I think anyone who denies the fact that these Albertans need these rebates, that they need them in a timely fashion is just not paying attention.

The associate minister says that it would be impossible to provide these rebates in a reasonable timeline. He said that we haven't done any consultation. Well, Madam Chair, I can assure you that we have done plenty of consultation. We have consulted with the people who are most important to us as elected representatives, and that is the people who sent us here to this Chamber, the people of Alberta, the people who have written in to us, telling us that they are hundreds or thousands of dollars behind, telling us that they cannot afford life under this UCP government, telling us that their insurance has gone up and their utilities have gone up and their tuition has gone up and the cost of their interest payments has gone up, all due to actions of this government.

So I would say, Madam Chair, that the people who have failed to consult are the members opposite. The people who have failed to consult are the government members who haven't spoken to Albertans, who don't seem to understand the urgency of this situation, who think that they can wait months and months to do anything about this problem and then convince Albertans that it must be the fault of the Official Opposition because they didn't pass the bill in six hours. I say it again: it's absurd. We have done our consultation. We have talked to the people who sent us to this place, to the people who we all serve, to the people to whom we ought to be accountable, the people of Alberta.

With that, I will say that this is one last attempt to ask the government to do something. If they refuse a timeline, if they refuse a rebate that would actually make a difference to Albertans, if they refuse to prevent Albertans from being cut off from their utilities, at minimum they can present them with the facts. At minimum they can tell them why it is that the cost of electricity has gone up. I don't think that that's a terribly difficult request. I am hopeful that maybe just this one small thing the government can do for the people of Alberta.

With that, I would urge all members to vote in favour of this amendment.

The Chair: Are there others? The hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Chair. This evening has been a master class in gaslighting. In fact, it's been the very definition of gaslighting. You know, I can't believe that the NDP will complain about the speed at which rebates are getting out to Albertans, and then vote against getting them out any quicker. That is the very definition of gaslighting, and this is all we've seen this evening.

The really frustrating part is that when you come up with four amendments like this, I mean, this really – four amendments: that means one thing to me. That means filibuster, Madam Chair. It means do everything that you can to distract from the real issue, which is that they made a strategic error last week and they're embarrassed and they're trying to distract from what they did last week.

In the time, the two and a half hours, that we have spent doing this, we could have gotten through third reading of this legislation, and that would have meant that I was then going to be the Minister of Justice's problem, because then I would have went to him at the end of the night and said: when can we get royal assent on these items? But I won't be doing that because we're not ready for royal assent because we're still in Committee of the Whole debating the fourth amendment.

You know, the lead headlines in the Sun and the Journal, Madam Chair, are actually about paralysis by analysis. That is exactly what the NDP is doing. They are burying us under paralysis by analysis with four amendments. I don't know if there are more coming. I certainly hope not.

Madam Chair, I'm going to ask again. We've time allocated. We've had no choice but to do that. My ask of the NDP is to stop the gaslighting, stop the paralysis by analysis. Help us pass this legislation and get rebates to Albertans because that's what matters right now more than anything.

The Chair: Any other members to amendment A4? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Yeah. Madam Chair, the minister who just spoke should be embarrassed from his comments. First of all, debate for two hours in this Chamber is not filibustering; what it is is ensuring that there is proper, adequate, democratic oversight on a piece of legislation. All of us were elected to this Chamber to do our job, and if the minister has an issue with that, well, he's welcome to go to other countries around the globe that don't have democratic debate and have a one-party state where you only hear one side and things are expedient.

I'm quite happy to live in a country that has multiple parties elected to hear multiple points of view. In fact, regardless of the number of votes the UCP received in the last election, there are 24 members who were elected representing a significant number of Albertans, and one would argue that no single member in this Chamber – no single member – received 100 per cent of the votes in their riding, which means that Albertans have diverse political views. So I will not be lectured or accused of gaslighting for doing my job, which is to provide thoughtful amendments to legislation. It's the actions and words of the previous speaker that showcase why Albertans are so frustrated with their elected representatives. I did not hear one single reason of why this amendment before the Chamber is unnecessary.

The amendment here, Madam Chair, is talking about the minister preparing a report as to why a rebate would be warranted. Honestly, I think that's just good policy. If we get to a point that a rebate is triggered because the price gets to a point that is untenable for many Albertans or unaffordable, then the government is going to investigate as to why that happened. We're talking about a legitimate investigation.

I mean, the challenge with this place is that it seems like every day in question period history is being rewritten. The overbuild of the electricity transmission lines was first commissioned under Ralph Klein, and then it was actioned by former Premier Stelmach's government. I know this, Madam Chair, because I was involved in politics at that point. Now, I'm happy for other members, if they were also actively engaged in 2006, to get up and speak about the then policy of the former PCs. Then that continued under Alison Redford's government. To my recollection, there are five MLAs in this place that were here at that time.

My colleague the Member for Lethbridge-West cited a number of different news articles in which the former leader of the Alberta NDP, Brian Mason, in between 2004 and 2008, talked about the overbuild and how much it was costing Albertans and even made a comment about how on Albertans' electricity bill there should be a line that talks about the PC overbuild of the transmission lines. That's accessible. Just google it. It's an article that existed pre-2008.

Then in 2012 I, the Member for Edmonton-North West, the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, and the former leader continued to talk to Albertans about the fact that the PC government committed billions, and we learned the real reason for the transmission overbuild. Even though it was being billed and sold to Albertans as "This is necessary," nobody believed that. It was to export electricity to the United States. Pull up a map of Alberta and look at the transmission line, where it goes. It goes from north to south.

So when members of the UCP get up and talk about, “This was the NDP overbuilding the transmission lines,” that’s patently false. It was a decision that we fought against, in total, for probably about six years, maybe a little longer than that. I encourage all members of the public to go on Hansard, because we are all on Hansard speaking against this. It’s ridiculous for government members today to make the claim that these current high prices are because of an NDP policy. It’s patently false.

I will circle back, Madam Chair, to this amendment. The point of this amendment is only to direct the minister, for lack of a better term, to investigate: when rebates are triggered, what was the trigger? Let’s dig into that. Now, despite what the minister says, entities like the AER and the AESO were commissioned to provide oversight, but keep in mind that these are Crown corporations who report to government. The buck stops with the elected officials, period.

To blame a Crown corporation or, you know, to blame a previous government that had nothing to do with the transmission overbuild and, in fact, at countless moments in the Legislature and outside of the Legislature – in fact, the Member for Edmonton-North West and I were talking about the number of rallies that we spoke at opposed to the overbuild. It’s countless. [interjections] I can hear members of the government chirping, because they don’t like to hear the truth. They don’t like to hear the fact that this government is falsely accusing the opposition.

I love when members talk about: what did you do for oil and gas? Well, we committed 50,000 barrels per day to Keystone XL. What have you done for Keystone? Nothing. We moved Canadians; 4 in 7 Canadians were in favour of the Trans Mountain pipeline. We moved the needle to 7 in 10 Canadians. What have you done? The revision of history is ridiculous.

I believe and I know that both parties support our energy sector. Both parties support our oil and gas workers. We know that our oil and gas sector is the lifeblood of this province. We know that we have incredible potential in a number of other sectors, including hemp and opportunities that were realized by the previous government to support the development on the full value chain of areas like hemp, value-added ag, forestry, life sciences, biotech.

I apologize, Madam Chair. I’ve really digressed from this amendment, so I will circle back to this. I appreciate the latitude members have given me in this speech. Thank you.

This amendment is here to provide oversight and to ensure that there is an adequate – “investigation” is not the right word, Madam Chair – exploration as to why the rebates are triggered and then to share that with Albertans. I think that’s a reasonable request. I think that if the government is truly interested in transparency and accountability and showing Albertans why a rebate was triggered, then I see no reason as to why members of the government would vote against this. So I encourage all members to support this amendment.

The Chair: Any hon. members wishing to speak to amendment A4? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Chair. I just will take a few moments here. I noticed that the minister of natural gas has been presenting himself as an expert on gaslighting. He uses the word quite frequently when he speaks, and I am willing to accept he is an expert on gaslighting, at least the actual doing of it.

I think that the simple explanation for all of this is that the minister has been complaining that because we did not agree to his planned subversion of democracy by changing the rules of the House and debate and passing this bill on the day that he presented it – in fact, he already had said that we were filibustering before even a single person had spoken to it. In fact, the reality is that the government side has said that when this bill is passed, it will be July at the earliest before anybody sees any of this money. It’s also true that if we debate this bill now, as we are supposed to under the democratic process, and continue to debate this bill in the usual manner in which it’s done and pass it in the usual manner in which it is done, the rebates will arrive in people’s homes in July of this year. So regardless of whether we’ve had these debates or not or whether or not we gave consent to the government to subvert democracy, which, thank goodness, we did not, the rebates were going to arrive in people’s homes at exactly the same time as per the government’s scheduling.

All of the statements that the minister made are clearly gaslighting, are clearly not about what it is that the minister is saying they’re about, because the outcome, regardless of the minister’s ridiculous statements, is exactly the same. So it’s quite clear that it wasn’t about getting the money out earlier that the minister was interested in. The minister was simply interested in stopping the democratic process in this House from occurring because of the minister’s embarrassment and not actually wanting to do what it is that this bill is doing.

Now, we know that because when the minister was asked to do something about it a year ago and the members on this side went, “Well, what will you do about this problem?” the minister proudly stood up and said, “Nothing.” Then he eventually got forced into making some move forward and suggested that he wanted to do this as quickly as possible but then has done everything to make sure that we cannot do this as quickly as possible, has stopped every one of the amendments that might have moved this forward. Actually, it was the government side that adjourned the initial debate on this, which we could have had more of on the day that it was introduced so that we could have gotten it through faster.

In fact, this government is not wanting to do what this bill is doing, and I suspect that they’re hoping that if the circumstances are right, they will never have to do it at all. You know, I accept the suggestion of the minister of natural gas that he knows a lot about gaslighting, because he certainly demonstrated a lot of it in this House. Nothing that the government has done demonstrates anything other than the fact that they intend to engage in a process that gives the minimal amount to the fewest number of people at the last possible date.

Now, I think we’ve heard that from this government before with regard to protecting our children from COVID, for example, and many other kinds of acts in this House, so we are not surprised. But what we see is them pretending to do otherwise and accusing the opposition of not going along with their pretense. What the minister, when he gets into one of his rants, is really ranting about is being caught, being caught out saying one thing and actually doing another. I think that kind of behaviour is fairly classic for this government and is really unacceptable.

If this government wanted this money to be in the hands of Albertans today, it would be in the hands of Albertans today. They could simply have had all of the stages of this bill proceed in the timeliest of manners, but they chose not to. They adjourned the debate initially. They could have agreed to any of the motions put forward, the amendments put forward, to ensure that the legislation included timeliness and that the government was forthright in the decisions that they made, but they have refused to do that.

So when the government pretends that somehow they would have acted sooner if it weren't for the opposition, we know they are indeed, as the minister says, gaslighting. He is right. He just simply needs to point that finger at himself, because the answer is that regardless of this process, this money was going to come out on the same day. All of the excuses that he provides are clearly without justification and are an attempt to treat Albertans as fools, something that I think is completely unacceptable and should have this government feeling shame, but they apparently are incapable of that.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other hon. members to join the debate on amendment A4?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

If not, I will call the question.

[The remaining clauses of Bill 18 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Any opposed? Carried.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Chair. I move that we rise and report Bill 18.

[Motion carried]

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie-East and the Chair of Committees.

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 18. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Hon. members, does the Assembly agree in the report? If so, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. In my opinion, the ayes have it. That motion is carried and so ordered.

The Deputy Government House Leader is rising.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We had a lot of great progress this evening debating Bill 18. I think it's a really important bill, and I'm grateful for everyone's participation. With that, I actually rise to ask for unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 77(1) and any other necessary standing orders in order to proceed immediately to third reading of Bill 18.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Third Reading

Bill 18

Utility Commodity Rebate Act

The Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'd like to thank the members opposite for allowing us to go immediately to third reading.

This is an important piece of legislation at a time when Albertans are struggling. We know that there's some great news out there. We know that a lot of the things that we have put in place are working. We are seeing a balanced budget. We're seeing some 130,000 jobs that have been created. We're seeing an economy that, quite frankly, is on fire, so there's lots of great news, but we also are seeing some inflation, and we are seeing the cost of living is now on people's minds because everything is getting more expensive. Of course, there are a lot of reasons for that, and we can look to the coal-gas conversions that have made electricity very expensive. You know, we could also look to the carbon tax.

We have been saying this from day one, Mr. Speaker, that you should not be taxing Albertans for heating their homes in the winter. It's just fundamentally wrong to do so. But, you know, progressive politicians across this country have this childlike enthusiasm for continuing to raise carbon taxes and making everything more expensive for Albertans, and it's wrong. But this is where we are.

We also have a situation where we have an overbuilt transmission system. I have tried to be fair to the NDP, Mr. Speaker. I have been the first to admit that the NDP did not start the overbuild, but they didn't stop it either. We did stop the overbuild, and I've given many examples.

In 2021 we spent zero dollars on transmission, and it's because we have brought fiscal responsibility to the electricity grid. Unfortunately, we still have to pay back the $7.5 billion, and this is what's causing everything to be more expensive. Utilities are going up, and layer on top of that, Mr. Speaker, the geopolitical situation in Ukraine right now, and that is continuing to increase prices. We have an energy crisis in Europe, and make no mistake: it is on our doorstep and it is coming our way and it's causing everything to go more expensive, particularly in the utilities.

For that reason, we have put forward this rebate legislation so that we would have enabling legislation that would allow us to provide immediate relief to Albertans. This would be short-term relief while we do the longer term work involved in lowering prices. Mr. Speaker, I would encourage all of my colleagues, I would encourage the members opposite to support Bill 18 so that we can get these electricity rebates out to Albertans as fast as possible. I encourage everyone to support Bill 18.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, third reading of Bill 18, Utility Commodity Rebate Act. Are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to third reading, and the associate minister has asked quite nicely for support of this bill. I wish there was a timeline, some certainty, when Albertans will get the rebate. The government has been dithering on it for the last six months. I wish there was a ban on shut-offs so that Albertans have some assurance that their utilities won't be cut off for nonpayment, but it's not there. Let's hope that the government realizes that it's a serious issue and moves at the speed of business and does something that benefits all Albertans.

Thank you. With that, we will be supporting this piece of legislation.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call on the associate minister to close debate if there are none. The hon. the associate minister to close debate? That is waived.

[Motion carried; Bill 18 read a third time]

The Speaker: The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. More progress, which is just wonderful to see in this Chamber. But I think that it's time to call it a night, so I do move that the Chamber adjourn until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 10:39 p.m.]

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

Prayers

The Acting Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideals but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. So may Your kingdom come and Your name be hallowed. Amen.

Please be seated.

Bill 15

Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate April 21: Mrs. Allard]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, are there any members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to my colleagues for gathering this morning as we consider government Bill 15, which is currently titled Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline. That's the subtitle, actually; Education Amendment Act more generally.

I just want to start by saying that every child in Alberta deserves a high-quality educational opportunity, which should be consistently available for every child no matter where they live, no matter which system their parents choose – public, Catholic, francophone – and that system, that school, should be supported with excellently trained professionals, who have access to a number of different training programs here in the province of Alberta.

I did my education degree at the University of Alberta but know many exceptional teachers from the University of Calgary, Lethbridge, Concordia right here in Edmonton, and the list goes on. We have some of the best education programming available anywhere in the province, and the Minister of Advanced Education is probably well aware of the exceptional programs we have in Alberta to ensure that teachers can receive the right kind of support and educational opportunities to be prepared for the classroom.

One of the classes that actually really got me excited when I was doing my after degree in education was law and ethics. It is a mandatory course at most postsecondary institutions, maybe even all. From the ones that I considered, it was certainly a mandatory course for every aspiring teacher.

For good reason, Mr. Speaker, because we all must, when put in a position of power and trust – power and trust for a variety of professionals, including teachers, of course, but also health care professionals, doctors. Members of this Legislative Assembly are certainly put in a position of power and authority and trust when it comes specifically to political staff working in this building. Lawyers, of course, are in a position of trust; engineers, who we count on to design critical infrastructure to ensure that we are all safe and can move freely. All of these professionals are in significant positions of power and authority and hold a great deal of trust in society. Ensuring that we have proper oversight and mechanisms in place to ensure that professionals in positions of trust are held to a high, high, high degree of accountability and that everyone can drop their child off at school with confidence that they will be safe, protected, and respected in that learning environment is crucial.

One of the other components that very early on in that law and ethics course, and maybe even in some others, was instilled in us deeply was that teachers are in loco parentis. They're in the role of the parent when it comes to that time of responsibility when they are working together with that child. So that really is a significant degree of confidence and trust that's placed in teachers.

I have to say that when the minister started sort of foreshadowing this legislation and highlighted some egregious examples of times where teachers broke that trust and harmed children, of course, every Albertan who heard about those was heartbroken, devastated, and a high degree of not just empathy but imagining if that was your child or somebody you cared about was front of mind for many Albertans. At that time the Premier and the Education minister and others in cabinet said, "This is one of the reasons why we need to change things," because they believed that the current system didn't work because of specific cases that they highlighted from the past.

I want to say that nobody wants teachers who break that trust to be in the classroom, not another teacher who's in that school, not a member of the ATA disciplinary board, not the minister, I hope. I don't think anybody wants somebody who breaks the trust in a professional capacity, and of course today we're here talking about teachers specifically, to continue in their profession when they have caused significant harm.

I also want to highlight that one of the number one issues that was highlighted about the one specific case that received the most attention was the fact that the ATA didn't notify the police. The number of people who were informed about that egregious act: not a single one notified the police, not local folks closest to the child who found out about the issue, not the ATA, and definitely not the minister. There is a well-documented paper trail between the minister being the one who actually asked to revoke the teaching certificate and therefore received information. All of the information that the current minister received was received by prior Conservative ministers at the time that these horrific incidents took place, and none of them notified the police.

I think that there is certainly an opportunity for us to improve on the process to ensure that police notification is initiated by one or all parties when it comes to any type of horrific breach of public trust when it comes to any professional in this province. I certainly wish that the school or the ATA or the minister would have notified the police. When I read the subtext of what the minister was saying, I hope that she feels the same way as well rather than trying to specifically attack one of the groups that was privy to that information.

Again, every child in Alberta should have access to a high-quality educational opportunity with high degrees of trust, with reasonable class sizes, with appropriate oversight and professional development for all adults working in that building with that child or team or young adult. We are put in a high degree of trust as teaching professionals, as principals, as educational assistants, as school leaders to ensure that every child in that building has access to the right supports when it comes to educational supports as well as a high degree of confidence in the safety and well-being of one another.

The minister has highlighted that it is an incredibly small number of teachers who've broken this trust, and that is something that I hope all of us and all Alberta parents can reflect on, that the vast, vast, vast majority of adults who work in schools with kids are there for all of the right reasons, and they want to do their absolute best to make sure that every child has an opportunity to succeed and feel safe and supported at school.

We know that the opportunities for that additional support under the current government have been significantly breached. Reflecting on the first Education budget, there were promises made by the Finance minister in this House that enrolment growth would be funded, and of course it was not. Immediately the government froze the Education budget even though the number of students was continuing to grow in the province.

Then, not long after, the public health crisis of COVID-19 hit and immediately – well, not immediately. The first week the minister sang the praises of folks like educational assistants and school bus drivers who were continuing to find ways to support families. In this very Legislature she talked about school nutrition programs that had been suspended but bus drivers were delivering food hampers to families in need throughout the province. About a week after she made those very remarks, she gave notice to every school district that they must terminate educational staff who weren't providing direct teaching support. That meant the school bus drivers. That meant educational assistants and many others who were working in schools to find ways to support kids in one of the scariest times of their lives, certainly, when the world changed significantly on a dime.

Then when we actually look through the budget documents – you can compare the tables of certificated staff, which are teachers, and noncertificated staff; typically educational assistants would be the vast majority within that line item – you see that over the three budgets that we've seen from the current government, from the UCP, the number of certificated staff is down almost 1,000. The minister has said, "Well, that's not in this year's budget," because they adjusted the tables for last year's budget to show a significant reduction in the number of teachers, but the black-and-white truth is that if you compare when the NDP was in government to this current budget that's just recently been passed in this House, the UCP is planning and has delivered 1,000 fewer teachers for Alberta students.

If you want to talk about opportunities to provide support and trust and collaboration for kids, making sure you have exceptional teachers who are well trained, who are held to a high degree of accountability when it comes to their behaviour, their conduct, and their delivery of educational supports and information to children, I'm with you. You can't do that in a sustained way by continuing to reduce the number of teachers in schools. [interjection] I welcome the interjection from my colleague for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've been listening closely to my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora. I certainly appreciate the thought she's brought forward, and as she was speaking about the situation in schools – the loss of staff, the incredible pressure those staff are under, the vindictiveness, perhaps, in some respects with which this government has approached the teaching profession – it's certainly put me in mind of the challenges that we are facing in health care in the province of Alberta at the moment, where I don't think we've ever had a more exhausted and demoralized workforce and indeed the challenges, the understaffing that has been created by the actions of this government and the pressure that creates and the difficulty that creates, then, in providing the level of care that is expected for patients and the situations, in fact, dangers, that could present. I was wondering if the Member for Edmonton-Glenora would agree that we seem to have a bit of a parallel here in this behaviour and that, you know, trying to disempower teachers further or attack them in the way that this government has could further jeopardize that situation.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to start my response by saying that a strong foundation in public education and public health care are two of the main reasons why I find myself aligned with the NDP and have for quite some time now, because not only is the NDP the party that brought medicare to Canadians, something that I am incredibly proud to continue to be a steward of as we serve as Members of this Legislative Assembly, but because of the opportunities that I had growing up as the daughter of two teachers, going to public school, most of that time in northern Alberta in a small village called Kinuso, and the impacts that that had on creating opportunities for me and many of my classmates to reach our full potential.

In quality public education, which everyone should be aspiring to, I hope, in this place, every child is in and every child has an opportunity to succeed, and to have the right conditions in place to make that happen, as my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre says, you need to have adequate supports, so you need to have a teaching complement that is reasonably sized, that has fair class size conditions so that teachers can work closely and track the learning and progress of all the students that they are in charge of. We continue to see under this current government, as has been highlighted, now 1,000 fewer teachers when the number of students has not gone down, really, when you look at the numbers when the NDP was in government versus today, and we know that the educational needs have grown significantly.

The term "learning loss" is often used, and I probably have used it myself. I want to be clear that kids didn't lose learning; they lost the opportunity to achieve greater knowledge. When you look at where they're at in terms of their projected growth, if you look at assessments like MIPI or the SLA in terms of where you're at today and where you're projected to be two years from now, almost every child in this province saw setbacks from where their anticipated growth was headed. [interjection] I see an opportunity for an interjection, and I welcome it from my colleague for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Glenora. You know, I know she's quite passionate about education, and she and I have actually had the opportunity to visit a few schools together, both in person and virtually. We were at a school not too long ago – gosh, time is confusing – and it's a school where they're very much stuck for space. I was thinking about the member's comments on learning loss and just thinking about how a school like that that we visited, where the teachers and the staff and the students are dealing with so much and they're doing so in a space that's not been adequately funded – they're doing so in a francophone setting, and they're doing so in a space where everybody is doing all they can to make it work, in the midst of a pandemic, might I add. I just wanted to ask the member to tell a little bit more about what she's hearing from the schools that she's visited.

Ms Hoffman: Thanks very much to my colleague for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood for the opportunity to reflect on what kids are facing in schools today. The school that she speaks of is one that I am proud that the NDP opened in the time when we were in government, and certainly the demand has far exceeded original projections for the community that it serves in Sherwood Park. Now is the time to grow that building significantly to ensure that it can continue to meet the Charter-protected rights of minority language speakers in the province of Alberta, French speakers in the province of Alberta, and to ensure that all the parents who choose francophone education for their children have an opportunity to see their kids reach their full academic potential and language and culture potential as well.

One of the number one issues that folks have raised with us over the last six months in particular, I'd say, are the significant impacts to child and adolescent mental health. When we were in government, I was proud to serve as the Health minister, and one of the projects that I was very keen to see evolve and move forward was the number one priority for the Royal Alex hospital, and it also became a very high priority for the folks at the Stollery Children's Hospital Foundation. It was to build a stand-alone child and adolescent mental health facility here in Edmonton between the Norwood long-term care facility, which is being renamed Gene Zwozdesky, and the Glenrose.

The purpose of this stand-alone health facility would be to provide in-patient and out-patient services and one-stop opportunities for families to know, if you live in central or northern Alberta or in the capital region, where it is you can receive the expert support in a stand-alone health facility. This is still needed even though the current government, the present government, has decided that it's not a priority for them. It is absolutely a priority for families in Edmonton and surrounding area, and it is a priority for those who work in health care and in education. This doesn't mean that there aren't currently ... [interjection] Oh, another opportunity for an interjection by Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Edmonton-Glenora. I know it can be a little bit tricky at times with interventions, but I appreciate so much your willingness. You know, just your comments on health and health care and the connections to education – you and I have talked a lot about a holistic approach to education, particularly mental health. One of the things that I'm so proud of is our advocacy, your advocacy in particular – that member's advocacy, I should say – on the need for mental health supports. I know you don't have a lot of time left, but I wondered if you might just touch on the critical need to continue to take, when we're, hopefully, back in government, a holistic approach to education, wherein the health of every student is prioritized. We know this pandemic has exacerbated the mental health crisis in schools, and without investment, without supports, I fear very much that students' mental health is going to continue to be further impacted.

Thank you, Member.

Ms Hoffman: May I have a time check, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker: Yes. I was actually going to let you know that instead of one and a half minutes, you have three and a half minutes according to what I believe.

Ms Hoffman: I will take that opportunity to say that the stand-alone health facility would be absolutely a significant benefit to the people of Alberta, for the mental health of children and all of us. We also need embedded in the health care system, in the education system opportunities for enhanced support and mental health awareness and crisis support in schools.

This is one of the reasons why we've proposed for quite some time during the pandemic that we get Alberta back to having a counsellor in every school.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt you. I apologize. It's only 45 seconds left.

Ms Hoffman: Okay. Thank you.

Having a counsellor who is available in each and every school: these are things that could be done to make sure that children who are in positions of harm or who have been hurt by somebody in a position of trust or otherwise have an opportunity to actually receive the additional mental health supports that they are so rightfully in need of and that the government should be providing. I would love to see the government take some time to bring forward a bill to actually address the mental health of students who have been facing significant hardships, whether it's by the pandemic or whether it's by others who are in positions of trust.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, I believe the individual who first caught my eye was the hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise here today to take this opportunity to express my support for Bill 15, Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022. Firstly, I would like to express my appreciation to the minister for taking this important step, that brings changes to support our Albertan families first but, most importantly, our children. As well, I commend the minister for taking time to hear the feedback that many of the parents, educators, teachers, teacher leaders, stakeholders, and licensing staff had given.

Mr. Speaker, let's not forget the great efforts our teachers in Alberta have dedicated, especially in the past couple of years, where there were difficult decisions made by our government. If it had not been for our teachers' and our teacher leaders' resiliency and great efforts, our children and families would have been faced with numerous challenges within the education system. This province has been one of the best education systems. It provides quality education through the standardized curriculum, our highly qualified, government-certified teachers, and our modern schools and technology across rural and urban Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, let me remind you that the teachers' union has spent millions of dollars on advertising campaigns to instill fear in Albertans and teachers alike, arguing that changes to the present disciplinary framework will demolish the teaching profession and damage the whole education system. This tale is completely false and incorrect. Bill 15 is introduced in the Legislature to only enhance the standards of the teaching profession by eliminating potential conflicts of interest, increasing openness and accountability, providing peace of mind to parents, and, most importantly, protecting our children.

In Alberta the government has made a promise to take important actions to reform and revise our laws that will benefit Albertans all across the province, and Bill 15 aims to improve the discipline process for all teachers and teacher leaders in order to serve the greatest interests of our kids, families, educators, and the general public.

Mr. Speaker, our system allows our children to become the best, fullest versions of themselves. It teaches how we can become self-aware and conscious about the world we live in, and Albertans and families have been trusting this government to ensure improvement and opportunities continue to make the lives of our children better.

The Alberta government is revising the teaching profession's disciplinary procedures in order to make the educational system safer for kids, their families, and instructors. This involves the establishment of the Alberta teaching profession commission and the appointment of a commissioner to oversee teacher and teacher leader conduct and competency complaints on a reasonable basis.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 15 will protect the entire teaching profession by bringing all teachers and teacher leaders, regardless of who they work for, under one reformed disciplinary process, bringing everyone together under a common touch point and putting the best interests of students, their families, teachers across the education system, and the public at the centre of the teaching discipline processes.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta is the only Canadian province where the teachers' union has sole responsibility, set out in legislation, to deal with the discipline for their active members, with no other alternative. If this is not a clear indication for change, then I don't know what it is.

Bill 15 will put Alberta in step with other jurisdictions and regulated professions such as nurses by removing the conflict of interest that exists when a union advocates for its members while also conducting disciplinary proceedings. In addition, Bill 15 would reinforce requirements for stakeholders in the education system and employers to report to police where there may have been serious harm or a threat to a student's safety.

It would also expand on the employer's duty to notify the registrar when conduct-related employment action is taken against a teacher or teacher leader. This enhancement would minimize information gaps that would threaten student safety. This legislation builds on the students first act, which received royal assent on December 2, 2021. The online teacher registry enabled under this act will make publicly available all hearing, appeal, and minister's decisions where there is a finding of unprofessional conduct or professional incompetency as well as making hearings and appeal dates public.

Mr. Speaker, the students first act amends the Teaching Profession Act, the Education Act, and the College of Alberta School Superintendents Act and was introduced to create a public, online, and searchable database of Alberta teacher and teacher leader information, bringing Alberta in line with other provinces, as well as requiring school authorities to conduct criminal record and vulnerable sector checks when hiring a new teacher or teacher leader and again every five years throughout their employment as well as improved oversight and timeliness of disciplinary matters for teachers and teacher leaders.

Furthermore, the students first act now requires the Alberta Teachers' Association, the ATA, to inform the Ministry of Education about all complaints made against its members, including when a complaint is filed, and improves the efficiency of disciplinary processes by simplifying the ATA's disciplinary committee structure to align with the structure and processes used by the College of Alberta School Superintendents and Alberta Education's registrar.

Mr. Speaker, this database would allow parents to view the status of teacher and teacher leader certificates, including if certificates have been suspended or cancelled for unprofessional conduct or professional incompetency. This will balance individual teacher and teacher leader's rights to privacy, procedural fairness with the public's right to know when a teacher or teacher leader has been disciplined for a serious matter.

Again, Mr. Speaker, let me remind everyone in the Chamber that the great majority of teachers in the province are professionals who are concerned about the safety of the children in their charge. By eliminating any idea of a conflict of interest, the act would raise the status of the teaching profession as well as improve the teaching profession's accountability and openness, that will protect kids and provide parents with peace of mind.

This legislation will build a healthy and trusting relationship with families that have been frustrated for many years with the lack of support they received from the previous government. We are continuing to prioritize children and families by working to improve Alberta's teacher and teacher leader disciplinary systems from kindergarten to grade 12. The initiative of the ministry will strengthen the education system by increasing accountability, openness, and timeliness while ensuring that the laws and related rules that supervise these procedures do not constitute a conflict of interest.

Through Budget 2022 Alberta's government continues strong support for the education system. It provides an increase of more than $700 million over the next three years to support teachers and to address cost pressures in transportation. This increased funding also recognizes enrolment growth. It includes a 1 per cent increase to both base funding and operations and maintenance funding. In 2022-2023 this increased funding will ensure that school authorities can hire the required number of teachers and support staff, address increases in property and vehicle insurance premiums, support schools in maintaining enhanced cleaning protocols, and mitigate the impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic on student learning. Targeted funding of $110 million over the three years, including $30 million in 2022-2023, will enable schools to support students experiencing academic challenges and create school environments supporting student well-being and positive mental health.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I just want to reiterate that this legislation will not only make the educational system safer for kids, their families, and their teachers, but this act will improve the standards and will help us identify gaps within the education system. I just hope that every member of this Chamber respects the rights of a safe education system for our children. Again, I commend the minister for having made this bill into reality for the benefit of the entire province.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has risen.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to rise this morning to add some first initial thoughts here around Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022. I guess before I get to a couple of the comments from the previous speaker, first I'd just like to thank my good friend from Edmonton-Glenora for the insight that she brings to this subject because of her experience as not only a school trustee but also as a school board chair, and obviously for many years she served very, very well there with one single focus – and that was on: how do you get the best outcome for our students, our young emerging leaders, here in the province? – you know, in that former role, at least in the Edmonton area. So I just want to thank her for that.

You know, Mr. Speaker, when I look at Bill 15, I can't help but feel like this is a little bit of a get-back-at piece of legislation. The reason why I feel that way is that I understand – I don't think there's any teacher anywhere that doesn't want the best outcomes for their students. They want them to be able to learn in a safe environment. But just like anything else, unfortunately, you're always going to find at least one bad actor. I could say that about large corporations. I could say that about a trade. I could say that about a politician. When you start to go down the path where you're constantly butting heads and then all of a sudden you see something that sort of creates a bit of an upheaval – as we all know, the curriculum has been a very contentious piece coming forward, and the ATA has been very, very vocal about that. Now all of a sudden: well, you guys aren't doing your job.

Now, I understand that the case that this is mostly based off – again, as I've told this House time and time again, it always seems to come down to the language, and the language that was available at that time: we can certainly have a debate about whether that was, you know, right or wrong. Clearly, it wasn't enough, but those were the steps that had to be followed at the time. So, as my friend from Edmonton-Glenora said, it looks like the ball was dropped at the minister's level, the minister of the day.

You know, we've seen some significant difficulties imposed on the teaching profession over the course of this government's term. We've seen significant funding decreases in education, hence some of my initial comments to the previous speaker talking about increasing funding. Let me ask this question, then, Mr. Speaker: if we are funding education at the levels that they need to be able to hire teachers and staff, then why do we have Bill 21 in front of us right now, which seeks to extend the time that education boards can dip into their reserve funds to be able to pay for things? Why is that necessary if we are indeed funding at an appropriate level?

We know that's not happening. We're short a thousand teachers. We have a lot of students that won't actually have specific funding for them, so we're forcing boards to have to be very, very creative and teachers to be very, very creative to be able to provide that service to those students. I think that kind of debunks that just a little bit, you know. I would expect, then, if that was indeed the fact, that funding is at appropriate levels, that we shouldn't need that section in the bill that has just been tabled in this House yesterday, Bill 21, to seek to extend, allowing boards to dip into their reserve funding to pay for things.

Getting back to the things on the ATA side, as I said, they've been very, very vocal. This seems like a little bit of, as I mentioned in my earlier comments, a piece to get back at education. There are two courses I think you could have taken this. You could have actually dealt with the shortfall in the current language rather than creating this commissioner position. Let's be honest. Really, this is about the minister. This is about the minister having all kinds of authority to be, well, quite frankly, judge and jury or jury and judge and maybe even ultimately executioner. Who knows?

You know, members of the government bench, members of the government caucus who served in the 29th Legislature, as I said, very consistently and persistently were very, very opposed to any additional measures that were given to a minister. Yet here we are, and all I'm hearing is crickets. Did you actually believe that at the time when you said it, or is it just, "Well, now I'm in charge, so it's very, very convenient now, and it works for me," which, of course, means that you didn't really actually believe it to begin with? Again, this is a very significant piece being allowed to the minister around that, so I question why that's happening.

The other direction that it could have gone – and we've seen this now with, for instance, chiropractors and physiotherapists and whatnot, having their profession split up into two organizations, kind of like the nurses. You know, you have the professional organization that will deal with the professional issues, and then you have UNA, which deals with the members, the advocacy on behalf of the members, things like that. Why didn't you go in that direction, then, and force them to split off into two? That would certainly solve it. Then you would have a profession dedicated to only dealing with that, and then you would have the other half that would deal with the membership. Again, I can't help but keep coming back to that, well, this is a little bit of a get-back at the ATA for speaking out quite loudly about the changes in the curriculum and the unwillingness of them to support it.

You know, when we've placed teachers at such a disadvantage, I mean, the work that they've tried to accomplish over the last year – I've got a few friends. They're teachers. I've heard the struggles that they've gone through. I have 26 schools in Edmonton-Decore. All three high schools north of the Yellowhead freeway – all of them – are in Decore. So needless to say, I get the opportunity to speak to teachers, and I hear about their struggles. Saying that you'll be able to hire a few more teachers is not enough. I'm telling you right now that it's not enough.

As my friend from Edmonton-Glenora mentioned at the beginning, all of the cuts that happened right at the beginning of the pandemic, where all of a sudden 25,000 teaching professionals were gone, EAs – one of the biggest things I've heard is about the educational assistants and the lack of them.

Mr. Hunter: It happens every summer. [interjection]

Mr. Nielsen: Oh, I see there's an interjection from my friend from Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much to my colleague from Edmonton-Decore. I'm hearing the other side shout: well, it happens every summer. What was different this year is that kids were still expected to learn. Disabled children were sent home to learn online with no support, and the one lifeline they had, the trained educational assistant who, in many circumstances – I actually talked to a family from the Member for Taber-Warner's riding who said that the educational assistant would call in the morning to help wake up the child, who they had this relationship with for eight months, and have a conversation about what the day was going to look like and how they were going to support them in learning online, and then that lifeline was cut off.

Mr. Speaker, this was incredibly different than what had happened in previous situations because in previous situations kids weren't expected to still be learning. They were on summer break, and this was no break, I will remind all members of this Assembly, when it comes to the hardship kids faced under the leadership of the UCP during the pandemic.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for those comments. I appreciate that. Yeah, I've heard the exact same thing. The comment of "Well, it happens every summer; it was in summer when this happened": you know, again you're flying out comments to try to sound like you're being oppositional, but the facts don't back it up. I consistently see that with this government. Facts don't line up with what they're saying. What they say about legislation isn't lining up, and it's persistently, consistently butting heads every single time, okay?

You know, it would be one thing if I'd heard from only one or two teachers of the struggles, the large class sizes, trying to manage all the students, and then on top that the students that do need that extra attention, that do need that extra help, aren't getting it simply because the teacher physically cannot provide all that help and still be able to teach their students. It's one thing if I've heard it from one or two teachers; the problem is that that's not the case. I'm hearing from dozens.

As I said, 26 schools in Decore. You know, all three of my high schools are full. My Catholic high school has portables at the back of the building that, quite frankly, are unsafe, but that's a discussion for another time. They need those for students to learn in. That's no longer enough. They're actually going just down the street to St. Cecilia junior high to hold classes there in their classrooms. It's been quite the juggling act. Teachers are trying to manage those situations.

I'm hoping that, you know, the member from the government caucus who was speaking earlier is correct, and there is actually funding. There better be a lot of it because we need space in Decore, we need teachers in Decore, we need EAs in Decore. That's not to mention the rest, all of your ridings where there are schools.

You know, I was surprised at the number of class sizes there were. I remember the work that the previous government did trying to build schools, trying to modernize schools, and it had a slight effect, a very, very small one. But that just goes to show you just how far behind Alberta was in terms of its school infrastructure.

I know there's a lot of growth out in northeast Edmonton, and my friends from Edmonton-Manning and Edmonton-Castle Downs have some growth up in that area. That doesn't begin to touch the growth that we've seen just in south Edmonton. There's a responsibility on our part to be able to provide that infrastructure that's there.

You know, I've always found that when you treat people with dignity and respect, you pay them a decent wage, you give them some benefits, you genuinely praise them for the work they do, they'll step up, they'll bend over backwards, and somehow they'll come up with solutions to some pretty amazing problems. Teachers are no different. Going after them like this was not the solution. And based on your own words of the past, again, handing all this authority to the minister was supposedly against what a large portion of you agree with. I bet you that if you'd have gone to the ATA and said, "I think we're going to create two sides to the coin here, have you split up, just like we've done to other professions over the course of this term," like I mentioned earlier, chiropractors, physiotherapists, I can't guarantee they'd be happy, but they'd certainly be a lot less angry than they are right now.

You've pretty much pointed a finger and accused them of not doing their jobs, and that's not the case. They did their jobs based on the language of the day. Am I happy about that outcome? Absolutely not. Can we always do better? We should, but this was certainly not the way to do it.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak at second reading today of Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022. I want to begin by thanking my colleagues for some of their comments already. You know, I want to begin that when we're talking about teachers, the primary thing that I think we're all concerned about, of course, is the special, unique, and trusted role that teachers play in children's lives. They are professionals who are trained and are held to professional standards with respect to their competence and, obviously, instilling not only the love of learning but, of course, the basic skills, also critical thinking skills, and all the important parts that teachers play from early age all the way through the end of high school.

Teachers play that role, but they also play a really important role considering the amount of time that they spend with children, and my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Glenora referred to this. We actually know that, legally speaking, teachers are considered to be in loco parentis, which means they are standing in the role of the parent, not only because of the hours of the day that they spend with children and students but also because of that role that they play in teaching and mentorship, the closeness. We know that that's incredibly important and that there are actually standards of care that are higher for teachers because of that unique role and because, of course, of the vulnerability and young age of children even all the way through high school. That role is critically important.

When we're talking about Bill 15, I think we're all united in this House in wanting to ensure that children and students are safe and are protected, but also I hope we are all united in the goal that they have every opportunity for learning. I sometimes have some questions around that, though, Mr. Speaker, about whether or not we're really united in those goals, but around safety I think we can all agree.

I say this, you know – I'll come from a few different perspectives on this. One is that I worked in my career for many years both within Alberta Education but also for school boards managing issues, to some extent, of teacher discipline and concerns around conduct, not so much around the performance, obviously, or competence, because that's really not the area in which I worked. However, I will say that I think it's important to note that in a profession as large as the teaching profession is in Alberta, as it is across the country, it is easy to pick out really bad examples of bad judgment, sometimes criminal judgment and action, by not just teachers but even those who are responsible for managing those situations, those who it's been reported to, who have not, I guess, taken action properly, and it's easy in those situations to point to those and paint a brush of all teachers.

But we have to remember, to begin with, when we're talking about these issues, that we are talking about a very, very small percentage of teachers, just as is the case, unfortunately, with the general public and with professions at large. Certainly, you know, as a member of the legal profession I'm sure everybody has a story of a lawyer who has not performed properly or has not complied with what people, the general public, would expect as high standards of ethics and conduct. There are bad actors in every group. There is no doubt about that, and we need to make sure that we have appropriate mechanisms to make sure that we can quickly and effectively respond to those issues.

In this case there's an added onus because of the fact that they're dealing with children. So I want to highlight that we are all committed in this House to making sure that we are taking appropriate steps to address really significant conduct issues, that may put children and students at risk, as quickly as possible. But we also have to remember that it is just a small percentage, and we should be careful not to brush all teachers with that same brush, I guess, that same colour, because really we know what an important role teachers play.

Actually, one of the issues that came up at the beginning of the pandemic in my role as critic for Children's Services, which highlighted the important role that teachers play, is that we know that when students had to move online to virtual learning, particularly in that initial shutdown but also as, like, progressive waves happened after that, the second wave, the third wave, many students were often sent home, but particularly in that first, initial shutdown the biggest risk that many children faced, who were already vulnerable, was that they actually would not have issues of safety that may be occurring at their home reported.

What I mean by that is that child abuse that may be taking place at home – teachers are actually often the only trusted adults in a vulnerable child's life, and when they're not around teachers, when they're not in classrooms where teachers can see what's happening, can see, perhaps identify some challenges that that child is facing, there were fewer reports of child abuse, not, of course, Mr. Speaker, because child abuse wasn't happening. In fact, it may have been happening at higher rates because of the isolation that families and children were experiencing. The lack of access to teachers actually ended up putting children at higher risk because there were fewer adults around to actually make those calls and reach out and support them. So that just highlights, again, my view of why it's so important to recognize the role that teachers play and the high standard that we hold them to.

I mentioned, of course, that I have my own personal professional experience with school boards and with Alberta Education, working with teachers. Of course, as MLAs we all hear from our constituents, whether they be teachers, whether they be parents who have concerns, who want to make sure that teacher discipline is addressed properly.

But, of course, I'm also a parent, and many of us in this room are, and I send my children off to school every day, and they have wonderful teachers who, over the past few years of the pandemic, in particular, really rose to incredible levels of excellence and professionalism, of stepping forward in remarkable ways to accommodate the shift in learning but also to keep our children feeling safe and secure when they're at school, calming some nerves now and then, making sure to find creative ways that they can still engage in learning even when they couldn't do field trips or they were doing virtual learning.

I was constantly in awe of my children's teachers in terms of what they did to support student learning. But I also know that I am trusting every day that my children are safe and secure, and I'm so glad that I have a hundred per cent certainty that my kids are safe and secure in their schools with their teachers. That's a comfort that we all deserve and all children deserve as well.

So I think, certainly, steps that are taken to ensure student safety are important. However, I have to say with respect to Bill 15 that there are a number of concerns regarding the particular model that this government has chosen with respect to basically giving the Minister of Education the ability to appoint somebody and making the Minister of Education the judge and jury in terms of teacher discipline, and that actually is not consistent with how other professions are managed.

You know, I'm sure every member of this House is very familiar with a number of colleges, colleges of social work, of physicians and surgeons. The Law Society is another example, for the legal profession, where there is a separate college that actually is the one that assesses conduct and can do investigations and hearings and determine that.

What Bill 15 is asking Albertans to do is trust that the Minister of Education, essentially, can do that, and if there is anything that Albertans do not have right now, other than extra dollars to pay their bills because the cost of living has gone high because of the way this government has raised fees and costs for all Albertans, it is trust in this government, particularly the Minister of Education. It's actually hard to just pick which minister Albertans trust the least, but on this front I can certainly say with confidence that the Minister of Education is probably one of the least trusted ministers with respect to the decisions she's made and how they've impacted learning and students and teachers and schools. I know my colleagues have listed a number of examples.

I just want to point out a few things. There are number of issues with respect to not enough school infrastructure, and I need to say, as the MLA for Edmonton-Whitemud, that southwest Edmonton is bursting at the seams. I am beyond disappointed. Reflecting the concerns of my constituents, our local high school, Lillian Osborne high school, is a great school, but it is bursting at the seams. For that reason, the school board has had to go to a lottery this year, which means even parents and students who live across the street from that school may not get in. In fact, those decisions are rolling out as we speak. It has been a priority for many years that the Edmonton public school board has put forward to this government to build a new high school in southwest Edmonton, and they failed to do so. So I can't let a conversation or an ability to talk about education without representing my constituents who are deeply frustrated with this government's lack of planning for high school space in south Edmonton – I have to comment on that.

When I think about two of the issues that came up during the pandemic that really hit me hard as a parent, that really concerned me, and that I feel we're going to, unfortunately, bear the consequences of for years to come, and not just we as a society but specifically these children and these families, I think about how many young children did not enter into kindergarten or prekindergarten programs in the 2020 school year and the year after that, the huge drop in enrolment that we saw in early childhood education programs, particularly kindergarten, because it is optional in this province for kids to attend kindergarten and this government made parents feel that it was not safe.

I can tell you first-hand I heard from parents. My daughter was in kindergarten in 2020, and parents of kids in her age group who were coming up with her from daycare: I had those parents saying to me, "Well, I don't feel like it's safe to send my kids to school right now because this government has not done anything to assure me that schools will be safe in the pandemic; I don't feel comfortable, so I'm just going to keep my child home." That may be an individual parent choice, but it has implications for that student's learning, and it has implications for all of us. We should all be deeply concerned about the learning loss that has occurred in those critical early years for far too many young Alberta students. They are going to have greater challenges succeeding as they go forward through school. These were kids who were anticipated to enrol in kindergarten and did not. So that is a big challenge that we're going to be facing.

The other thing I have to comment on, Mr. Speaker, in the context of education is that if I had to pick one comment that I heard repeatedly during the pandemic that hit my heart deepest, it was how many parents of children with disabilities that I spoke to who said to me that they felt that their child simply lost a complete year of schooling. They just didn't get school that year, the 2020 school year. That happened, going forward earlier, because they lost their EA for a quarter of their previous school year, when the shutdown happened and this government fired EAs. They lost their EA. Then when they came back in September, most of them did not feel comfortable going back to school, so they were at home. They were not getting an EA. Literally, parents with defeat in their voice is actually what resonates with me, that they actually said to me: well, my child did not get an education this year.

We should all view that as an utter failure. We should all take responsibility for that, but in particular the Minister of Education and this government have to take responsibility for that. In our society if any child feels like they could not get an education when they're entitled to – we are supposed to be one of the wealthiest provinces in the country. We're supposed to have the best education system in the country, and we're saying that certain children were just failed. That's why Albertans have trouble trusting this government on education.

I could speak about numerous other things, Mr. Speaker. I could talk about the curriculum. We've all heard from our constituents on the curriculum. Again, as a parent of two young kids in elementary school who are actually going to be learning from this curriculum starting in September . . .

Ms Issik: Bill 15. We're reading Bill 15.

Ms Pancholi: . . . I have read that curriculum, Mr. Speaker. I have read the updated curriculum. My children are going to be learning from it, and it fails to address a number of the concerns that have been raised. It's disappointing to hear that, you know, the Associate Minister of Status of Women wants to heckle on the curriculum, because I'm certain she's heard from her constituents as well. I'm deeply disappointed that this government is not addressing the concerns about the curriculum, and kids like mine are going to have to learn from it.

Mr. Speaker, when it comes to Bill 15, you know, student safety is a high priority, is the top priority for all – all – of us in this room. But the mechanism by which we do it, I think, needs to be challenged when it's placing far too much authority and responsibility for teacher discipline into the hands of a Minister of Education that, frankly, does not have the trust of Albertans, and unfortunately for very good reason she does not.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to move to adjourn debate.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 16 Insurance Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate April 25: Mr. Toews]

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. members.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has risen to debate.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022. Certainly, the question of insurance is one that has seen much discussion in debate in this Legislature, much more so recently as we've had revelations of the high profits that have been made by insurance companies in the province of Alberta at the same time as this government chose to remove the cap that was in place to protect Albertans against soaring insurance rates. Certainly, many questions about what lobbyist the Premier was meeting with and other folks in his cabinet, some of his former staff and advisers involved in that lobbying effort.

Of course, Bill 16 is not dealing with that kind of insurance. Bill 16 is dealing with a more corporate end of insurance. This is building on some of the previous work that the Finance minister brought into place regarding captive insurance. Specifically, this bill is doing three basic things. It's making some changes to how the captive insurance companies will function. As I said, late last year we saw that the minister brought forward and the members of this Chamber did pass legislation, the Captive Insurance Companies Act, allowing captive insurance companies to be set up, be licensed, and operate in Alberta.

This legislation is making one substantive change to that legislation, creating something called redomestication provisions. That specifies how an Alberta-based company that has a captive insurance company operating outside of Canada can bring them home while continuing to operate so that there's no disruption in coverage. Certainly, there are good reasons why a company might want to do this. I think Alberta does have higher regulatory standards than places like, say, Bermuda. Companies will have to pay some higher taxes, but they will save on other costs and risks, like, say, perhaps to do with foreign exchange.

Now, with the introduction of the Captive Insurance Companies Act, certainly, our caucus did put forward a bit of skepticism that companies would move their captives to Alberta. I was not in the technical briefing, but it's reported to me that officials in that briefing did state rather bluntly that they were pleasantly surprised with the uptake on this, with companies actually beginning to do that. Suncor, apparently, for example, was quoted in the government's news release. It looks like they are planning to repatriate their captives. That, admittedly, has the secondary benefit of creating some additional tax revenue for the province. On that, you know, Mr. Speaker, I will not always criticize the government. I will recognize when something they have done is successful, and in this case it seems that there is some benefit that is coming from this.

Now, the government is also making some changes to allow Alberta to license stand-alone reinsurance companies in Alberta. That's insurance for insurance companies. Whether those companies will be raising their own policy rates, I suppose we'll have to wait and see, Mr. Speaker. But, generally speaking, the reinsurance industry is dominated, apparently, by about 50 large players on the global scale, with the top five holding the majority of that market share. Increasingly, those companies are unlikely to insure insurance policies for certain sectors, and one of those is, unfortunately, the oil and gas sector.

Certainly, we recognize that the oil and gas sector continues to be an important part of the Alberta economy, and it requires that insurance to continue to function. With this legislative change my understanding is that the government is hoping that the enormous amount of capital that's circulating in our oil and gas industry here in the province of Alberta could be pooled to create a local reinsurance company or potentially companies.

At this point – I am certainly not an expert, Madam Speaker – it's unclear, I guess, whether this would work. Certainly, the potential liabilities that are involved are rather large. Companies will need billions of dollars of coverage, but this legislation is simply creating that policy space for that potential solution. It's, I'd say, a good-faith attempt to try to find a solution that doesn't represent any significant downside risk for the province. I have no issue with that provision.

Lastly, it's making things easier for Alberta companies, to my understanding, to access unlicensed insurance. Now, currently Alberta companies only access insurance from unlicensed insurance companies when there is no domestic insurer that will write an insurance policy for a particular risk. Now, certainly, there are some risks involved with using an unlicensed company. For an unlicensed insurer, say, who is domiciled in – well, I don't mean to pick on Bermuda, but it seems to be a handy example. They don't pay – there's really not much recourse for the companies here. It creates difficulties across jurisdictions. The only reason, though, that a company goes down that path with those risks involved is because they don't have many other alternatives. Again, creating a captive insurance company is one such alternative, so if they want to access that unlicensed insurance, companies either go through a government-licensed special broker or they just simply go out and find a policy on their own.

This legislation makes changes to the tax rate that's paid on the premiums when companies don't go through a special broker. Now, as mentioned earlier – well, as has been noted, I guess, Alberta is currently in a hard insurance market. This change brings us more in line with other provinces, makes it easier for industry to access a viable insurance product even if it is from an unlicensed provider. Certainly, I think that as a general matter of public policy we want our industry to be insured so that in the case of a catastrophic event the associated costs aren't ultimately borne by taxpayers.

In general I don't have particular concerns with this bill, but when we are talking about insurance, as we are here in Bill 16, certainly,

Madam Speaker, I think it is worth noting that while all of this may be useful and helpful for the industry and may ultimately have some benefit for the people of Alberta, one of the major challenges that we continue to have in insurance is one that goes completely unaddressed by this government, and that is the soaring rates of auto insurance in the province of Alberta.

You know, we have seen that since 2019, when this government came into power and chose to remove the cap on insurance late that summer, the average auto insurance premium has climbed by about 30 per cent in Alberta as compared to about 17 per cent in Atlantic Canada, 4 per cent in Ontario. That was just over the course of 2020, Madam Speaker. We know that it has continued to go up since. Certainly, that is something I have heard about from many of my constituents. Certainly, none of my constituents have written to me about their concerns about captive insurance.

Now, again, that doesn't mean that – as I've said, we support this legislation, the direction it's being taken. Certainly, it's important to ensure that companies have access to insurance to protect against liabilities coming back to the taxpayer and to keep those dollars within the economy in Alberta. But, also, dollars in the economy of Alberta come from individual taxpayers, who are paying sky-high auto insurance rates thanks to decisions of this government.

Indeed, the report that we finally saw released by this government, after significant pressure, after they've made deliberate changes to try to hide that report, shows that the car insurance industry in Alberta charged Albertans hundreds of millions of dollars more in premiums after this UCP government removed the cap on insurance. They shamelessly generated massive profits on the backs of Albertan drivers, and they are doing it with the help of the UCP government. Now, again, that report was something that had been released every year for 107 years, Madam Speaker – 107 – and this government decided that they wanted to try to hide it because they did not want the public to know that the car insurance industry collected $1.15 billion more in premiums than they paid out in claims. In 2019 and 2020 they collected $1.324 billion more than they paid out.

Again, Madam Speaker, we recognize the importance and the value of the insurance industry. Certainly, again, when we're talking about captive insurance, as we are here in Bill 16, and other changes to make it easier for companies and corporations to be able to access the insurance they need, certainly we recognize the value of that to the economy. Likewise for Albertans, for them to make their contributions to the economy, many, many, many of them need to be able to drive, and the ability for them to afford to keep a vehicle insured means that they are able to contribute more to the economy, and this government has chosen repeatedly to make that far more difficult.

As insurance companies are charging millions of dollars more to Alberta families and business – let's not forget that this affects corporate vehicles as well. Many, many businesses will have a fleet of vehicles that they use to earn their income to pay their taxes to contribute to the economy, and their jobs, their businesses have been made more difficult to operate because of choices by this government.

Certainly, again, we have no objection to the changes that are being made here to benefit some corporations in the province of Alberta and some businesses in the province of Alberta, some of which indeed make significant contributions to the economy, but we cannot forget that there are small businesses, individual Albertans who are trying to earn a living, and this government is making it far more difficult, far more expensive, far more costly for them to do so, and we hear nothing from the government members about concerns for those businesses, but that just goes to show again, Madam Speaker, that this is a government, in many respects, that is far more concerned about large corporations, their wealthy friends, than average Albertans, small businesses in the province of Alberta, who contribute so much to the economy provincially and locally, provide the majority of jobs in this province.

Now, of course, there have been real questions about this. Certainly, we know clearly, reading this bill, who likely spoke with the Minister of Finance about asking for these changes. It's quite clear who the corporations were that benefit, and, again, knowing that, we can again say that we have no real disagreement with this bill. It makes good changes, and there has been much more transparency here than, I think, we have seen from the Premier and his staff, certainly the ministers, in regard to the lobbyists on raising the auto insurance cap.

You know, the Premier has gone on the record multiple times saying that he doesn't recall meeting with any insurance lobbyists, but we know that his own former campaign manager and staffer, Mr. Nick Koolsbergen, is now one of the consultants who lobbied his office, his key advisers, about lifting that insurance cap to give these companies the opportunity to significantly raise costs of Albertans, taking billions more in premiums at a time when Albertans were struggling and continue to struggle, Madam Speaker. So when we talk about Bill 16 and captive insurance, certainly, it's clear here who the minister was talking with and the reasons that it was undertaken.

Here we have the other side when it comes to average Albertans, small businesses, who make significant contributions to the economy, and indeed under this government people paid more in personal taxes last year than was taken in in corporate tax. So the people who are taking the disproportionate burden under this government are paying more in insurance, and the Premier is refusing, the Minister of Finance is refusing, this government is refusing to provide transparency on just who they spoke to in the insurance lobby to make those decisions, which clearly have not benefited the average Albertan.

Now, we recognize, again, that pieces in Bill 16 here indeed may benefit the Alberta economy by bringing some of these captive insurance companies home from foreign jurisdictions to pay tax here. That is a benefit. Ensuring that oil and gas can continue to operate, certainly, as an important part of our economy is a benefit. Where is the benefit, Madam Speaker, in forcing Alberta families who are struggling with soaring inflation even as this government rides that wave of inflation with their unindexed personal income tax? They take more money away from Albertans every single year. Where is the benefit for the Albertans, then, who are being charged the soaring insurance premiums by insurance companies who are pocketing billions?

Certainly, we know that in the run-up to the last election we had UCP MLAs who were talking at great length about the costs that were being put on Albertans' business, churches, other locations, quoting extremely large numbers about those costs, but we hear little from government members now about the costs that their government is imposing on Albertans.

I find it extremely unlikely, Madam Speaker, that the Premier cannot recall having met with a long-term colleague, someone he knows as well as Mr. Koolsbergen, that this government has no idea or claims perhaps that it just simply cannot recall who they might have met with. I think that is information Albertans deserve to know. Frankly, this government's loyalty should be to Albertans, not to lobbyists for the insurance industry, not to the insiders, the corporations that want to line their pockets on the backs of Albertans. Of course, we know that seems to be who this government chooses to favour in respect to its policies.

Certainly, we think about the government's current utility rebate, which it was complaining that the opposition was holding up. Well, Madam Speaker, the government is basically saying: hurry up and wait; pass this bill so we can eventually maybe get some money out in July, August, maybe September. Rejected amendments that were brought forward that would have got those dollars out quickly to Albertans, but it rushed to hand favours out to corporate entities. The insurance cap was off within months of this government coming into office, of course, likely due to the able lobbying of Mr. Koolsbergen and his compatriots. The government rushed to lower that corporate tax rate to the point now where Albertans individually are paying more personal income tax than corporations in the province of Alberta.

So while in general we do not have a particular issue with the provisions that are put forward in Bill 16 and we recognize the value of some of these steps that are being taken, other pieces we'll wait to see what the potential benefit might be. Certainly, we, again, as I said, had our skepticism around some elements under the captive insurance act. But we have seen that some of what the minister suggested might happen, in fact, has. It's unfortunate that we have not seen that reciprocated, that when they removed that cap and we warned that that was going to cause huge costs for Albertans, the government did not listen. And when we have called on them to take clear steps to help ease the cost burdens on Albertans, that are soaring under this government, many because of active choices this government has made as it prioritizes corporate Alberta over individual Albertans, they have chosen not to listen.

On this side of the House we will continue to support when there is legislation that we feel could be of value or certainly where we feel that the government has done its homework and appears to be coming forward with something of value, but we will also continue to call this government out when it continues to take steps that seem to be far more rooted in its own ideology, that fail the people of Alberta, that continue to drive up costs at a time when Albertans are already hurting. Certainly, that is a major concern.

I should also note, Madam Speaker: not only car insurance; condo insurance. Here's a representative for Edmonton-City Centre. We have a phenomenal number of condo buildings. Indeed, I personally have lived in and owned a condo, and I am well familiar with how much condo insurance rates have skyrocketed over the last couple of years. It is creating an immense burden for many condo owners because when those policies rise by thousands of dollars, that goes immediately on the backs of those owners in terms of their condominium fees. So not only are individuals, thanks to this government, paying more in terms of their car insurance, paying more income tax, continuing to pay soaring utility rates on a wing and a prayer that this government will eventually get around to figuring out how to deliver a rebate; they are now also facing the burden of additional costs on their condo fees because of soaring condo insurance.

Madam Speaker, I have not heard a word from the Minister of Finance, indeed from the Minister of Service Alberta, from any member of this government recognizing the immense costs that this is creating for individuals who simply want to be able to own a home, not a word of acknowledgement that those Albertans are paying much higher costs, are facing a much higher burden because of choices by this government.

As I said, no major concerns with Bill 16. We certainly appreciate the number of housekeeping bills this government has brought forward this session, dusting out the closets as it were, I suppose. A lack of substantial legislation, perhaps, certainly very little to actually help Albertans with many of the significant concerns they have, but despite those concerns, we don't have any particular concerns with this particular act, and I imagine that I will likely be voting in favour of Bill 16.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any other hon. members wishing to speak? The first speaker who caught my eye was the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore, followed by the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the chance to add some comments here to the debate on Bill 16, Insurance Amendment Act, 2022. I have to admit that when I first saw this bill appear on the Order Paper – you know, we've heard the government talking about all the work that they're going to be doing on insurance companies and changing legislation to make life better for Albertans, reducing their costs and things like that – I was cautiously optimistic. I really was. Then Bill 16 came out, and it seems a little thin for substantive changes to insurance.

Now, I don't think I have any concerns with the language that's proposed in Bill 16 around captive insurance. I know there are some challenges within, for instance, the energy sector, finding insurance. I appreciate that the government has moved to address those, but I have to ask: what about the challenges that Albertans have finding insurance?

You know, I've brought this up before in this House. I remember having a senior in my office who brought four bills to show me. One showed what his insurance was at the start of the year, before the insurance cap was removed, and then he brought me the one where it started after the insurance cap was removed. For a senior, having your auto insurance go up 47 per cent creates a challenge to say the least, but that wasn't all. He also brought me the two bills from his condo insurance. His condo insurance went up 56 per cent.

Now, that's certainly one of the high ends that I've seen and heard of. I have seen much lower. I've seen some people saying: yeah, my insurances have gone up 10 per cent. I know my insurance at home has gone up roughly about 15 on our house. You know, the Premier stood in this House and very boastfully talked about how he went to the insurance companies and asked for their help for Albertans to try to reduce their costs, and the Treasury minister talked about how they're going to be approving some reductions in around the 3 to 5 per cent. Well, again, going with this one insurance example from one of my seniors, 47 and 56 per cent, how is 3 to 5 per cent going to help them? Not to mention everything else that's been lumped along the way by the UCP government making life more expensive.

Again, here's language not lining up again. We hear talk about how we're making life better for Albertans. Their bills aren't showing that. So why didn't we see some changes in this bill to help Albertans as well? Like I said, I've always said that I don't have a problem with businesses making a profit, creating some wealth. I get that. But when you're building it on the backs of people, now I start to have a little bit of an issue with that. I think you can make a profit without unnecessarily gouging Albertans, and that's what we're seeing in insurance right now.

We all know about the report that came out on insurance, of course, at – what was the time? – 4:37 or something like that, 4:40 p.m., on the last day of a four-day long weekend, not just a long weekend but an extended long weekend. We know, Madam Speaker, that that was done very, very intentionally. We've seen it done before with a report that, quite honestly, doesn't paint a very favourable light for this government. They try to very quietly put it out there, and hopefully nobody notices. Well, not only did we in the opposition notice it, but there were Albertans that noticed it. I quickly got a flurry of calls and e-mails about that saying: "What? Were they trying to sneak this in?"

You know, when it comes to, as all of you have tried to say over and over again, building the trust or rebuilding the trust, actions like that do not build that trust. It's no wonder, like I said, that people seem to think politicians are sneaky and trying to do all kinds of unsavoury things. It's actions like that that create that perception to begin with.

As we know, it wasn't good news for Albertans. We knew it wasn't. Frankly, I was astonished, Mr. Speaker, just how unfavourable it was. I know that my friend from Edmonton-City Centre had mentioned that. I mean, profits over a billion dollars. Again, I'm not begrudging them, but a billion dollars in direct profits versus what they're paying out? I'm sorry. They're building that profit on the backs of people, especially during a pandemic, when people weren't driving quite as often. Stay-at-home orders there for a while: those were never factored in. People started to work from home: that wasn't factored in.

Yet I guess the only reward that Albertans are now getting for literally paying the price of that is somewhere between 3 and 5 per cent, which the Premier, again, as I mentioned, boastfully stood in this House and talked about. I mean, you know, if that's the kind of advocacy that Albertans are going to get, maybe the Premier should hire Koolsbergen back to advocate to the insurance companies for some reduced rates.

You know, Mr. Speaker, why is it that we continually see opportunities for the government to be able to take actions to help people? You boasted about it. You said that you were going to do something. Bill 16 was that opportunity to do that, and you've dropped the ball. I guess that maybe there's something else that will be coming here in the session to address this, not just some kind of – I don't know – fake rebate, like we've seen for the gas and electricity. I remember talking about it in question period. One of my constituents comes in with a $500 bill for one month, and all he's being offered is $50 for that one month. That's $450 that he still has to come up with.

You know, we're debating a bill right now that doesn't say when that 50 bucks is going to show up. I'm going to take a guess here that it's sounding like it's not going to show up in their actual pocket, that you'll just give it to the corporations. Maybe you should just give it to Albertans and let them decide where they want that 50 bucks to go.

I see a lot of rhetoric, but I guess, to wrap things up on Bill 16, again, I don't really have an issue with the bill itself and what it's trying to accomplish. I don't really see a reason at this time to not support it, but I'm not going to stand in this House and congratulate you for yet again siding with the big corporations when, really, you should be siding with Albertans. The corporations don't vote for you. It's the people of this province that vote for you. Maybe you want to at least try to coax some of those, because I'm certainly hearing a lot of people not very happy with you right now.

I'll wrap up there and look forward to the rest of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 16. Bill 16 is a good example of one of those quiet bills that probably won't get very much attention in the community yet is quite a reasonable thing for the government to be doing. I want to spend a little bit of the beginning of my time here just talking about some of the things that I appreciate about the direction of the bill and the purpose of it, with, of course, commentary about things that I hope the government might consider. Then perhaps I'll add a few little commentaries about some of the other things that I certainly wish the government would do with regard to insurance in this province.

At the beginning, I understand that we are in a difficult time for insurance, particularly with regard to the industrial and energy sectors. It's often referred to as a hard market, a situation where, because of a variety of factors, certain corporations, partly perhaps because of what it is that they actually do or the circumstances that they're in, find it difficult to get the adequate insurance that they need, and of course if they do not have adequate insurance, they could be in a very difficult situation if a crisis occurs. If, for example, a tailings pond happened to break and cleanup was required, we certainly would want all the corporations to have the resources necessary to appropriately engage in that cleanup, and if they don't have appropriate insurance, it may be very difficult for them to do that.

You know, I don't think Albertans are against corporations having insurance, but I think we should also pay some attention to why it is that we have a hard market with regard to industrial- and energy-sector insurance costs. There are a variety of reasons, of course, but one of those reasons is that many of the major financial organizations in the world are making decisions about the types of things that they want to insure. It's not simply whether they can make a profit or not. Rather, they are using value-based decision-making. BlackRock, for example, has made decisions not to do investments in certain areas.

We see other companies making similar kinds of investment decisions, and I think that we should pay some attention to that here in Alberta if we are going to be in the right place, the right time with regard to our future in this province. Now, we know that what's happening is that there are many corporations that are incorporating what is often referred to as ESG, or environmental, social, and governance, factors in their decision-making. What that essentially means is that corporations are acknowledging that while businesses have a fundamental task of providing profits for their shareholders or for their owners if it's an independently owned business, that doesn't mean that those businesses somehow are exempt from the fact that they are owned by human beings who have values aside from acquisition of profit.

Essentially, what this is: it's a request by the community to bring some balance to the work that we do. The community is saying: certainly, we understand that business has a function and that business should pursue that function to the best of their ability, but they cannot do so without looking at the externalities. One of those externalities is based on our values of ensuring that people are treated fairly and equally, that the environment is preserved not only for ourselves but for our children's generation, and that, you know, individuals such as the Indigenous community, who have been systematically excluded from the benefits of the profit-making that has happened in this province over the last hundred years, should be considered with somewhat of a preferential eye to ensure that they find their rightful place in amongst all of us who benefit from corporate governance and profit-making in corporations.

My point here is that this bill is allowing corporations to engage in some new kinds of behaviours, which is, I think, satisfactory, but it is not addressing the underlying cause as to why they need to engage in those kinds of behaviours. It's not actually saying: "Why is it that there is a hard market? Why do we need to have alternative arrangements for insurance?" There is certainly an incredible insurance industry in Canada and around the world. I mean, when I lived in Waterloo and I was taking my master's degree many ages ago, perhaps even before the Speaker was born, I was able to see the benefits of having insurance companies, as many of them are headquartered in Waterloo, and see how they contributed to the community and employment and so on. So I know that we have a very strong insurance system in this country, and I would have expected, you know, that it would have been adequate.

I see, however, there are a number of things that this government is choosing to do. The first one, of course, is the redomestication of companies that are used to provide the insurance, if necessary, in the hard market. We know that a number of companies have previously created these kinds of organizations in order to provide themselves with insurance but have had to establish them outside of Alberta, so this bill allowing them to bring those dollars home to Alberta to help the Alberta economy seems quite appropriate.

I'm a bit curious as to why this was not included in the bill that we addressed in the fall given that that was the very focus of the bill in the fall. Perhaps it could have been included at the time, but I certainly am not one to condemn a government for finding its errors and correcting them. I certainly wish the government would do it on a regular basis. Of course, we've seen them return to this House a number of times to improve bills that they didn't adequately address when they first introduced them to the House. In this case the idea is that the redomestication of these companies, these captive insurance companies, would be a boon to the province of Alberta, hopefully increasing capital in the province of Alberta, potentially increasing even revenues to the province over the future. So I'm glad to see that happen.

I'm also happy to see the potential for supporting growth in the reinsurance area. Of course, something that I think is very important is that we understand that insurance companies are a complex web of insurance and reinsurance, which ensures that if a particular tragedy occurs, the pain from that is spread as wide and as far as possible so that no particular institution or government or province bears the full brunt of whatever it is, whether it be a natural disaster or something more horrendous such as war, for example. I'm happy to see that this bill is actually making some moves on the reinsurance area, and I support the government in hoping that maybe a strong reinsurance industry could be centred here in Alberta. As I say, you know, when I was in Waterloo, I certainly saw the benefits of it there. I'd love to see Edmonton or Calgary or perhaps Red Deer or Lethbridge or Fort McMurray, Grande Prairie all be considered as good places to establish reinsurance corporations so that we in the province of Alberta would have the insurance that we need for adequate protection.

The third area that this bill covers and that I have a little bit of concern about is the area of unlicensed insurance. Again I want to point out that we have to look not just simply at what's happening here in this bill but the reasons why this bill was brought forward in the first place. That is that there are some corporations that find themselves in a place where they're simply unable to get insurance, and this bill is trying to open up the door a little bit, just a bit, to allow more access to unlicensed insurance; that is, unlicensed in Canada, maybe licensed somewhere else but within the Canadian regulations.

Now, this is of concern to me because if people are unable to get insurance in the Canadian licence system, which, as I had described, is quite substantive and quite successful and quite storied, in fact, in Canada, then it seems to me that there's something of a message there from, you know, the corporate community about the risk factors involved here. If we are setting up a circumstance where businesses can just ignore the feedback that what they're trying to engage in is too risky even for our local insurance agencies, then I'm a bit worried that we're opening up a door that basically tells people that they don't have to pay attention to risk.

That worries me for the consumer at the end. We know that if you go to an unlicensed insurance agent, they are agents that are headquartered in countries other than Canada, and as a result it creates a jurisdictional problem if there ever is a dispute in this area, because you cannot go to Canadian courts to resolve the problem. You have to go to the courts of another country, which is problematic and increases the risk that insurance will not be paid out when it's supposed to be. You may have the insurance because of the availability of unlicensed insurance being available to you, but you may never get a benefit from that if that insurance company is outside of our jurisdiction and we cannot force them to do the things that they need to do. I realize that that's a very, very tiny piece of the insurance system, and as such it's not something that would make me not want to support the bill, but I am concerned that we are sort of opening a door.

There's always the wedge issue, you know, and I think we should pay attention to that. I don't necessarily use wedge concerns to prevent me from making choices, but it certainly makes me want to pay attention to them and to follow up to see if the wedge does indeed get wider as time moves on.

You know, in total, I've said that I have some concerns here. I think the particular moves the government is making are at least satisfactory, but I'm concerned that they're not actually paying attention to the underlying problem here, and we should pay more attention to those underlying problems so that we don't have to worry about them when we bring forward these kinds of pieces of legislation. We certainly know that this government is quite good about creating more space and more space for corporations to do well, but I'm very concerned that they have done very little to protect individual citizens in this province. As they increase the opportunity for corporations to do more of a wide range of things, I have to ask: are they increasing risk for individual insurance holders here in the province? I'm worried because I don't believe this government has a focus on individual citizens in this province and the risk factors that they have to deal with.

We know, for example, that this government removed the insurance rate cap and caused insurance rates to go up dramatically for individual insured Albertans. As many of the other MLAs have indicated, people came into our offices with increases in insurance that were easily 30 per cent and often more for things like house and car insurance, not across the board, of course, but the fact that the cap was removed did allow that to happen.

Then, of course, we subsequently learned that all of this was occurring at a time that the insurance costs to the industry were going down, perhaps associated with COVID, and that their profits were going up, so what we had is a circumstance where Albertans paid about $385 million more in insurance at the same time that the insurance corporations made over a billion dollars more profit. Now, of course, this was not disclosed in full transparency to the people of Alberta. In fact, a report that had been presented by the province of Alberta to Albertans for over 100 years was suddenly not reported in the same timely manner in which it had been reported for all those many years and was only released on the Easter weekend, when nobody would see it. That is a total lack of transparency.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members – I see the hon. Member for St. Albert has risen.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was going to wait to see if any government members wanted to add their comments to this piece of legislation. It's unfortunate, once again, their silence. Anyway, happy to rise and speak to Bill 16, Insurance Amendment Act, 2022, and, you know, thank my colleagues who have gone before me to do a really great job outlining what this piece of legislation is. I'm just going to emphasize a few points since perhaps some of the government members weren't paying attention.

Anyway, this latest piece of legislation is an interaction of changes to the Insurance Act and is focused on a couple of insurance products that are unique. I'm sure I'm not alone in this Chamber in stating that I had to do a little bit of research to understand fully what these products are and why the changes to this legislation were needed. You know, it does make sense. It's a need for insurance products in industrial or energy areas, and they're the really niche products. As a caucus I think that based on our review of the information, we don't have concerns with these changes. I guess it remains to be seen sort of how successful these changes will be in creating solutions for companies that have asked for the changes, but we'll have to monitor that and see.

This legislation, though, unfortunately, makes zero changes to insurance products that all of us, I think, have heard from in the last couple of years; for example, home insurance. Some of my colleagues talked a little bit about condominium insurance, auto insurance, and life insurance, which continue to be problematic in many ways in that they are becoming affordable to a lot of Albertans.

This piece of legislation basically does three things. The first thing is that it makes changes to captive insurance, which, you know, basically, as some of my colleagues have described it, is self-insurance. Last year we know that the government passed the Captive Insurance Companies Act, which allowed captive insurance companies to step up, get licensed, and operate in Alberta. The legislation makes one substantive change to that recent piece of legislation, and it created redomestication provisions, which basically allow these captive insurance companies that were operating outside of Canada to come into Alberta. Now, of course, there are a lot of regulatory differences, and as some of my colleagues noted, we'll have to monitor and see how that goes.

The second thing that it does is that it makes changes to allow Alberta to license stand-alone reinsurance companies. Now, for those of you that don't know, for the nine people watching at home, reinsurance is insurance for insurance companies. Generally speaking, this market is dominated by about 50 large global players, with the top five holding the majority market share.

The third thing that it does: it makes it easier for insurance companies to access unlicensed insurance. Alberta companies only access insurance from unlicensed insurance companies, so insurers that are not licensed in Canada, in circumstances where no domestic insurer will write an insurance policy for a particular risk. Now, using unlicensed companies presents a new set of risks because if a foreign unlicensed insurer is, say, in Bermuda and doesn't pay, there's little recourse for companies here in Canada, here in Alberta. You know, obviously, there are some risks involved. As my colleagues – and I'm adding my voice to that – have said, we'll have to monitor this and see what happens.

The legislation also makes changes to the tax rate paid on premiums when companies don't go through a special broker, and then the legislation goes into a fair amount of detail about that.

As mentioned earlier, Alberta is currently in a hard insurance market, which means that these changes bring Alberta more in line with other provinces and makes getting a viable insurance product easier for industry, the key word being “industry.” No problem with this if this is a niche area or these were legislative changes that needed to happen to support industry – obviously, that supports our economy – and all of those great things.

I have no doubt that there was some serious lobbying going on to get this work done, which brings me to my point about lobbyists, Mr. Speaker. You know, earlier this morning some of my colleagues and I attended the Public Accounts meeting. It's our one opportunity to ask questions with the Auditor General there and officials from different ministries, to be able to ask questions around their annual report and audit and policies related, decisions related. One of the lines of questioning that we pursued was around lobbyists: can you tell us about the Premier's office, the work in Executive Council around lobbyists, in particular the insurance industry? We know that there have been a lot of things going on.

Sadly, I just wanted to note on the record that the people that were sent to answer questions – I actually felt fairly bad for them – were unable to answer most of our questions, so it was incorrect people sent. You know, always willing to give a little bit of the benefit of doubt, but it certainly seems like there's an attempt to not answer questions or to deliberately muddy the waters or not to pursue any kind of transparency.

What we do know is that there are a number of things that have happened around insurance that are problematic. We know that the superintendent of insurance, an official of Alberta Finance, has released an annual report for the last 107 years. We know, as my colleague just mentioned before me, that not everyone probably knew about that, and I'm sure not everyone eagerly anticipated to read it, but it's an important document that talks about the difference between premiums that are collected and then what is paid out in claims, basically describing the profit margin. What is a profit margin? That is not a bad word. That is not a bad phrase. That is a good thing. But to have an officer of the Finance ministry release a report allows us as legislators to look at that and to see: are the policies that are being passed in this place doing what they're intended to do? Is it benefiting Albertans? Is it benefiting industry? Is there a solid balance?

You know, I would submit that the fact that it was hidden – and by “hidden”: it wasn't released when it should have been released or as it had been released for the last many, many decades. Why is that? Why was that being hidden? Well, I would suggest that in 2019, when the UCP removed the rate cap on insurance premiums after lobbying records clearly point out some busy beavers in the lobbyist department in this area, that they had some influence – too bad we couldn't get answers this morning, Mr. Speaker. We did try. Hopefully, the officials that did show up will take those questions back and table written responses to that committee, but that remains to be seen.

You know, I would just like to add my voice to what my colleagues have said before me about premiums that have gone up during a pandemic. We all know that we've been driving less. We all know that people have been literally working less. They have less money. This government has failed to address those issues.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I hesitate to interrupt you.

However, under Standing Order 4(2.1) we are now adjourned until 1:30 today.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, April 26, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, I'm very pleased to introduce to you a group of officials visiting from the United States. Many of you had the opportunity to meet them earlier today, but I hope that you will join me in welcoming the U.S. consul general to Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Northwest Territories, Holly Waeger Monster; accompanied by Karen Choe-Fichte, minister counsellor for economic affairs; Nathan Donohue, deputy principal commercial officer for the U.S. Commercial Service; and Connie Haider, commercial specialist. Joining them are: Andrew McIntyre, Matt Morrison, and Christina Steed. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Hon. members, it's with the greatest admiration and respect – there is a gratitude to the members of the families who have shared the burdens of public office and public service. Today I would like to welcome the family members of Dr. Winston O. Backus. His family is present in the Speaker's gallery today. Dr. Backus was the former Member for Grande Prairie, who served two terms in the Assembly from 1971 to 1979. He passed away on June 15, 2020, at the age of 99. I would like to ask each of his family members, as I call their name, to rise as they have been introduced: Dr. Backus's wife, Myrtle Backus; his daughter Myrna Sherstan; and grandsons Jesse Sherstan and Cody Sherstan. Please rise. Thank you so much for your service to the province of Alberta through your family members. Now accept the gratitude of members of the Assembly. [Standing ovation]

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, also seated in the gallery today is Marilyn Buffalo, the chief executive officer of the Nechi Institute: Centre for Indigenous Learning. She is a special guest of the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Government Record

Member Ceci: Mr. Speaker, families in Alberta are struggling. They are coping with higher income taxes, higher insurance premiums, higher utility bills, higher school fees, higher tuition, and it goes on and on and on. These are times where families are being forced to make tough choices about whether or not they can afford to buy groceries that week or if they need to pay their utility bill. Families are being forced to take vehicles off the road because they can't afford the insurance bill this government is delivering to them. These are serious times that require a government focused on addressing these issues, but instead they've got a circus running the Legislature.

The Premier is campaigning for his job round the clock and has dispatched the majority of his staff, that should be working to support Albertans, to save his job instead. The Premier is even going to those same families, that he doesn't think deserve support to recover from the fourth-largest natural disaster in Canadian history, to beg for their votes. The Premier's staff are attacking UCP MLAs, calling them clowns, sad and sour, and more. This would be hilarious if it wasn't coming from the very same people who are supposed to be addressing the cost-of-living crisis they created.

It makes sense now why it's taken 10 weeks and counting for this government to get around to delivering their utility rebates, because it's not a priority for them. This is a government that spends more time clowning around and engaging in the drama created by the nonleadership of the Premier.

Albertans during this crisis are looking for a government that prioritizes them, that ignores the drama, ignores the politics, and focuses on making life better for Albertans, for them. The UCP has made it clear that they aren't interested in that, so when Albertans go to the polls for the next election, they will have a clear choice between the NDP, who is laser focused on them, and the clowns in the UCP who can't get their act together. I think, Mr. Speaker, I know who Albertans will choose.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Government Policies and Southern Alberta

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the last few days I've heard NDP MLAs stand up and pretend to care about southern Alberta, but for the years they spent in government, the NDP failed southern Alberta and failed to make any progress on the issues that matter most. They've made all sorts of claims, but, fear not, I'm here to set the record straight.

Our United Conservative government has made huge investments in southern Alberta. We scrapped the NDP's carbon tax, and we did what they could never do: we balanced the budget. Our United Conservative government has negotiated a $780 million deal on rural broadband. We funded the single largest investment in irrigation, a lifeline for our drought-stricken agriculture industry, and approved several new projects, including the Snake Lake reservoir in Brooks-Medicine Hat.

We accelerated capital maintenance and renewal funding. We've committed $90 million to recruit, attract, and retain rural doctors, and we've provided the John Ware youth empowerment program with $150,000 so that newcomer youth are able to be connected to employment services.

We've completed new school projects in Tilley, and we're building a brand new francophone school in Brooks. We've expanded mental health and addiction services through the virtual opioid dependency program and the digital overdose response app, and – get this, Mr. Speaker – we provided $825,000 to Our Collective Journey to enhance their recovery coaching program, but most recently we delivered on funding for HALO air ambulance, an essential service that southern Alberta relies upon. The NDP failed to provide stable and predictable funding, but because of our United Conservative government HALO has a multiyear commitment for $1 million per year to keep HALO in the sky. This came as a direct result of advocacy from UCP MLAs like the MLA for Drumheller-Stettler, the MLA for Cardston-Siksika, the MLA for Taber-Warner, and myself.

All in all, Mr. Speaker, southern Albertans know that this government is here to deliver on the promises that we made. We don't just talk the talk; we take real action. Southern Alberta and rural Alberta will always have relentless advocates in our United Conservative caucus, and I'm proud to be one of them.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Pacific NorthWest Economic Region

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I proudly reflect on the incredible personal, cultural, and economic bonds we share with our closest neighbours, friends, and allies to the north and south in the United States of America. Through the Pacific NorthWest Economic Region, of which I'm humbled to serve as president, we're able to align the shared interests and economies of: Yukon, Northwest Territories, Saskatchewan, B.C., Alaska, Idaho, Oregon, Montana, Washington, and, of course, Alberta.

The bridges we build through our engaged, cross-sectoral working groups, forums, and annual summits are instrumental to regional collaboration and deeply impactful in relationship building and advocacy on common interests between our two nations. Now more than ever it is clear that strengthening ties with the United States is essential not only to Alberta's and Canada's interests but to a shared vision with respect to economic and strategic priorities.

Our shared history and the democratic principles we respect and uphold are but a few of the strengths we build upon each and every day in mutual prosperity in the world's largest trading relationship and along the planet's longest undefended border. PNWER has a strong 30-year history and vision for the shared potential of our two countries while embracing the influence that nonpartisan organizations and people of like mind can have on policy development in our respective jurisdictions and in our national capitals.

Mr. Speaker, the 31st PNWER annual summit will be hosted by Alberta in Calgary this summer, and with all of your support and the attendance of public, private, academic, and nonprofit stakeholders our collaboration and focus on a bright, ambitious, and responsible future will be both immersive and inspiring for those that share our vision for friendship, collaboration, and prosperity for all.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Nechi Institute

Mr. Feehan: Thank you. In my time as Minister of Indigenous Relations I had the opportunity to visit many important organizations created and maintained by Indigenous people. These agencies are deeply entwined with the community and provide services based on intimate relationships that are simply not possible in non-Indigenous agencies.

One such agency is the Nechi Institute of Alberta. The Nechi Institute is recognized as one of the finest Indigenous training, research, and health promotion centres in the world. Nechi Institute is a powerful resource for Indigenous people and communities addressing issues such as: drug, alcohol, and gambling addictions; family violence; and prescription drug use. Nechi provides counsellors, health care workers, social workers, educators, community service agencies, government agencies, and other members of the helping professions with the tools and resources to help heal the pain and devastation caused by addictions and abuse.

Unfortunately, in November 2019 the UCP government summarily evicted Nechi from the building it shared with Poundmaker's Lodge for 36 years without consultation. The government has never been able to explain the reasoning for this drastic assault either in the House or to the institute itself. When I questioned the minister about the issue, he assured the House that he would work with Nechi to find them a permanent home. Unfortunately, this never happened.

For the last two years Nechi has been housed in temporary trailers on the site of the former Edmonton Indian residential school. Elders have expressed concern that the trailers are likely on top of unmarked graves. Nechi has made numerous attempts to move forward with the government only to be met with cancelled meetings and ignored phone calls.

Today the chief executive officer of Nechi, Marilyn Buffalo, is here asking the government to come back to the table and help the institute to find a new permanent home, as they promised but failed to do over the last two years. This government claims to support healing from addictions. We see no evidence of that here. The institute is asking for help to continue to do the important work they have engaged in for over 40 years in Alberta. It is time for truth and reconciliation.

Female Genital Mutilation and Bill 10

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to take this opportunity to speak to Bill 10, Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022. We've received some input recently, and I want to clarify that this bill was not introduced unnecessarily and is by no means redundant to any existing law. The bill is imperative for the protection of girls and women.

Female genital mutilation is a global concern, posing a serious threat to psychological, sexual, and reproductive health of girls around the world. We are putting forth efforts at a grassroots level and from a policy level, but the most successful interventions are led by communities affected by FGM and within the associations that are privileged to work within these communities and, ultimately, answer directly to them.

Mr. Speaker, in this way we uplift community through building and bridging capacity and supports, ensuring that survivors and opposers of this practice are not silenced. Countries in the United Kingdom have introduced education surrounding forms of honour-based abuse, and as of 2020 England introduced FGM education as part of the sex and relationships curriculum for secondary students. This includes education on physical and emotional damages caused by FGM. This is about educating and raising awareness for both the consequences and implications of FGM and the supports available to those who have suffered. Survivors must gain agency to speak about their experience because if social change does not happen, then the stigma and fear will continue, as will the status quo.

Mr. Speaker, this is about building trust and having the conversation surrounding the protection of girls and women no matter what college, agency, or organization is involved. The scope of this bill is not intended to undermine the credibility of regulatory agencies but, instead, to further focus on FGM. It is our collective responsibility to make sure that we are educated and not afraid to engage in important conversations around the health and well-being of our children, specifically girls.

I would like to thank all the consulted stakeholders and the agencies as well as members of the opposition for their excellent input. Mr. Speaker, this is about societal levels of influence. We need a critical mass of advocates to be speaking out; otherwise, change will not happen.

Jan Foster and Lethbridge Schools

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, this member's statement is for the memory of Jan Foster, who passed away on April 19 at the age of 81. Jan Foster was a seven-term Lethbridge public school division trustee. Her commitment to public education spanned 23 years of public service. Jan was as committed to her community as to her son Greg and his wife, Stephanie, and her two beloved grandchildren Aiden and Jordan.

For their sake Jan worked for schools that served the community and understood that schools themselves are a community. That's why she stood up for an inclusive curriculum that sets children up for success. That's why she was a consistent advocate for more funding for children with diverse needs and a fierce defender of early-intervention funding for children with disabilities. She always made sure Lethbridge was heard, advocating for new schools and modernizations to keep up with our growing population.

Indeed, Lethbridge needs several new schools: one more elementary each in the public and Catholic system, at least eight modernizations in district 51, two modernizations in the Catholic system, and a gymnasium modernization at l'école La Vérendrye.

Given that our school-age population is growing, Lethbridge district 51 is disadvantaged by the UCP changes to funding, and we will have staffing challenges. The UCP decision to have 1,700 fewer teachers in the classroom province-wide this fall will have an effect on us down south. Our public district has been critical of the new curriculum, writing a letter as recently as two weeks ago inquiring about resources for implementation.

The last time I saw Jan last fall, though – I chatted with her on social media quite often – she was most worried about the curriculum. Her primary concern was for the students. Her focus was always on children. Perhaps that is why she fostered 60 children and at-risk youth over 15 years.

Rest in peace and rest in power, Jan Foster. We share your vision of public education as the most effective way to build the world we want for our children. You can rest now, Jan. We will attend the meetings, the school celebrations, and community functions for you. For your grandchildren and all children we will defend public education as fiercely as you did.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Federal Travel Vaccination Mandate

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau is punishing Canadians because they made a different decision than what he wanted or commanded of them. As the world returns to normal, Trudeau and his coleader, Jagmeet Singh in the NDP, doubled down on the divisive policy, continuing to require double vaccinations in order to fly anywhere in our country. Despite Trudeau's top doctor saying that we need a, quote, more sustainable approach that needs to be taken, Liberals and their allies press forward with their politically driven policy that damaged the well-being of our country's social and economic strength.

Within weeks of the UCP removing vaccine passports here in Alberta, the federal government strengthened their ideological plan to punish the unvaccinated. While virtually all countries and jurisdictions world-wide have removed their mandates, especially on travel and flights, Trudeau still doesn't budge. He claims to stand up for minority rights while at the same time calling members of this minority racist, misogynists, and white supremacists. Mr. Speaker, Albertans are fed up with Mr. Trudeau and his antiscience and ineffective, capricious policy, whose purpose is to vilify good, honest, hard-working Canadians like those in Alberta who made a decision not to vaccinate.

These pointless travel restrictions can no longer be justified. New Zealand to New York, the world is taking off while Canada keeps millions grounded. Unvaccinated individuals, unable to visit their own family, deserve better from this government in Ottawa. They deserve a Prime Minister who listens and follows the science and cares for their families and his society, not someone caught up in the political theatrics of the woke left. Mr. Speaker, Alberta chose a different path, and soon every single province followed. Happily, COVID-19 is not threatening our health care capacity today, not here, not anywhere in Canada. With millions upon millions of comparatively mild COVID-19 cases in Canada on any given day, this punitive policy has no public health benefit.

I ask that fellow Albertans here today enjoying the full freedoms of movement within our country do not forget those who are still not vaccinated. Don't forget those who cannot visit their family, who cannot go on vacation, who cannot attend a funeral of a loved one, or a wedding. I believe that we need to stand up and stand with those who are being punished by Mr. Trudeau.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie-East.

Federal Travel Vaccination Mandate

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. While the world is opening back up and removing COVID-19 restrictions, including travel restrictions, the federal government of Canada is not. We're over the worst part of COVID-19 and have been out of a state of emergency for quite a while now. The federal travel vaccination mandate is simply unnecessary. To board a flight or to get on a train, anyone that is 12 years plus four months of age or older must be fully vaccinated. They must be ready to show their proof of vaccination at any given time along with several other rules.

Not only does a travel vaccine mandate prevent Canadians from travelling outside of Canada, but it prevents international travellers from coming into Canada as well, hurting our country's tourism industry. Mr. Speaker, Canada is an amazing place, and frankly people are less inclined to come visit our beautiful country when there are excessive, unnecessary mandates making it difficult.

Provinces within Canada are lifting most if not all of their COVID restrictions and vaccine mandates. Unvaccinated people are finally allowed to return to work, go out to eat, go to a gym, and enjoy the many things that they've been eagerly waiting to get to, except for travel. This mandate is causing red tape, and we are one of the only countries left to have it.

I've heard frustrations from many Albertans who disagree with the travel vaccine mandates regardless of their vaccine status. Those who are vaccinated are fed up with the difficulty of extra steps when they have to travel, and those who are unvaccinated are fed up with not being able to travel at all. I've heard one story about a girl who was unable to go to her grandfather's funeral and is still waiting to be able to travel to her home country to gain closure. Mr. Speaker, the time and the place to move restrictions is now. The federal government needs to get rid of the travel vaccine mandate and allow its citizens and international travellers the right to come and go.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Private School Financial Data Reporting

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the UCP tabled legislation that signalled the government's intention to stop reporting tuition amounts at private schools. This issue matters to Albertans because at a time when the province is cutting significantly from public education, Alberta is maintaining the most generous subsidies for private schools anywhere in Canada. The higher the tuition at these schools, the greater their exclusivity. Why is the Premier trying to hide this information from the very Albertans who subsidize these private schools?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Unfortunately, there's misinformation on the other side coming towards us because, in fact, private independent schools do have to report on their audited financial statements, both the public and the private money that they get. They only get 70 per cent of public dollars. What we're actually doing under Bill 21 is increasing the accountability and the transparency on this. They will in fact have to report online their financials as well as to their parents. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, there's a tremendous amount of confusion on this because the UCP is always muddying the waters. Yesterday the red tape minister was explicit: Alberta would no longer collect this kind of financial information from these publicly funded institutions, and officials at her briefing provided documents confirming that. Then the Education minister fired off a late-night tweet saying the opposite was true, almost like these folks don't talk to each other. One of these ministers is either incompetent or intentionally misinforming the public. Which is it, and which minister?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In fact, the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction was correct in explaining that we are in fact increasing transparency and accountability. What we are no longer requiring is a duplicative, redundant piece of information, because we do have that information already coming in audited financial statements. In fact, I believe the members opposite missed the line in the publication where we said that we would be reducing the collection of financial data. Not eliminating; reducing. There is a big difference.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, there are two stories, and let me say that this is about trust, and the story coming from that minister is coming from a minister who doesn't enjoy a whole lot of trust. Albertans won't know how much private schools charge to get through the door at a time when the Premier is telling students in the public system to make do with much, much less. His cuts to PUF for 5-year-olds with special needs is just one of many examples. Why don't the parents whose kids are struggling with overflowing classrooms and fewer teachers get to know all the details about the private schools they are subsidizing but cannot afford to go to themselves?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, that's absolutely ludicrous. In fact, independent schools get 70 per cent funding for operational uses and no capital funding whatsoever. They save dollars for Alberta taxpayers. That being said, this is all about red tape reduction, which the members opposite continue to put on all of our school systems. We are very deliberate about ensuring that we no longer have redundant, duplicative information which we already have through audited financial statements and many other documents.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Private School Financial Data Reporting and Education Funding

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, when it comes to kids' education, the UCP's priorities couldn't be more wrong. Right now class sizes are growing, and we're losing teachers. Students have suffered learning loss throughout the pandemic. There have been serious cuts to supports for children with disabilities. But the Premier's priority isn't to support children struggling in public schools; it's to hide financial reporting for private schools. To the Premier: before he stops collecting this information, can he stand in this House and tell Albertans what the average tuition is to attend a private school in Alberta?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, I'm happy to share the fact that, in fact, the member opposite continues not to do her homework. We added an additional 160 teachers in this upcoming school year. At least that's what school boards are telling me. In fact, they are the ones that are hiring. We've added $700 million to the overall . . .

Ms Notley: Read your budget.

Member LaGrange: Yes; I have read my budget, and I wish you guys would as well because, in fact, we have added $700 million over three years for operational, an additional . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: . . . $110 million for mental health and wellness, 191 additional million dollars for implementing curriculum.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, under this minister's leadership there are 1,000 fewer teachers in schools than there were when the NDP was in government. I know the Premier has friends who want to open more private schools in Alberta, but that's no excuse to underfund public education. Some private schools charge $20,000 or more to attend, and it's public schools that are taking the hit. Edmonton public: there are 1,700 students who are unfunded this year alone, Minister. Why is the minister covering up the finances for private schools flush with cash while cutting supports for kids in public schools?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite continues to provide misinformation. In fact, if she read the budget and if she continued to look at the estimates, what I provided in estimates, 160 more teachers is not a cut in the number of teachers, $700 million – I'm proud of the fact that we added $45 million to address learning loss disruption just this very year. We're seeing tremendous results as a result of that. Edmonton public school division has notoriously reported the wrong number . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: The minister actually wrote me this morning to pump her own tires and pat her own back about the job she's doing in public schools. Seriously. After that she spent the whole night on social media justifying a bill that puts the finances of a private school on a pedestal while the budgets of public schools are being slashed and burned: unfunded students, no new schools in major cities, a curriculum supported by virtually no Albertans, no mental health supports, less supports for disabled students. Does the Premier really think that this minister should be congratulating the UCP when the vast majority of Albertans are giving this minister a big red F?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member opposite is continually upset because we're seeing success in our education system. In fact, we've added additional dollars. I have school authorities constantly thanking me for the additional dollars, the additional supports, the fact that we have engaged. I have school authorities saying that they've never seen this level of engagement on a new curriculum. We are proud of the fact that we have put children first. While the members opposite continue to politicize education, I'm focused on student learning and improving it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Postsecondary Student Financial Aid

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, this morning I was at the University of Alberta, where I heard from a number of students who had been facing significant challenges due to UCP cuts to student aid. Across the province students are struggling. Tuition is skyrocketing, loan rates are going up, and this UCP government has both underfunded student aid and refused to spend the money that they actually allocated for it. At a time when tuition is skyrocketing and student debt is even more expensive, the UCP is withholding student aid money. Can the Premier explain why, when students need the help the most, he is withholding their supports?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That statement is completely false. We're doing nothing of the sort, but I'm not surprised to hear statements like that coming from the NDP because, as the member said, we're cutting student aid. I can't understand. We're providing $15 million over three years in new spending to support student aid specifically for additional bursaries for low-income students; as well, $12 million more in new funding for existing scholarships and bursaries. Only in NDP land is more funding a cut. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, last summer the UCP combined eligibility grants under one main student grant program. The current offerings don't even come close to covering the amount that they need nor the number of students who are eligible, $59 million in needs-based grants. Even just to reach the national average, Alberta needs to spend somewhere around $150 million, nearly three times as much. Is the Premier really going to stand in this House and tell Alberta postsecondary students that they deserve a third of the financial assistance that other learning in other provinces is actually eligible for? Is that really how to encourage people to attend our colleges and universities?

Mr. Nicolaides: Mr. Speaker, I'm happy to tell students in the province that they need and deserve more in financial assistance, which is exactly what our government is doing. As I mentioned a moment ago, we're providing $15 million more over three years to create new bursaries for low-income students; as well, $12 million over three years to support our existing scholarships and other awards. There's more work that we need to do when it comes to strengthening student assistance, but we're moving in the right direction. I want to thank our student leaders, who have been advocating for this and bringing this to the attention of government.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister can talk to someone who I was talking to, a woman named Christina, this morning. She was eligible for aid, but she lost her grant because of the government's refusal to spend the money that was there. She had to drop out of school. Christina said, and I quote: the whole situation has ruined my motivation to attend university again; student aid is supposed to be there to help students, not stress them out financially while they are attending. Unquote. Will the Premier, the minister, or anyone else on this side of the House explain how ruining Christina's postsecondary aspirations is actually good for our province's future?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We're taking serious action under Budget 2022 to create more opportunities for students. We're investing $171 million over three years to create 7,000 additional spaces at our postsecondary institutions, $15 million over three years to support new bursaries for low-income students, $12 million over three years for existing scholarships, $30 million over three years to expand apprenticeship education and trades education in the province. We have a robust vision to strengthen postsecondary education, unlike the members opposite.

Utility Rebate Timeline

Ms Ganley: Alberta families are struggling, and this government simply doesn't care. If they cared, they would have acted on skyrocketing utility rates in November. If they cared, they wouldn't have waited weeks before finally bringing in legislation. If they cared, the minister would be able to answer a simple question like: when will Albertans get the money? Instead, he told Albertans they would have to wait at least a couple of months more. To the minister: when will Albertans actually see this money?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I certainly recognize that there are affordability concerns here in the province of Alberta, affordability concerns brought on by a whole host of reasons, in part due to the tax, spend, and borrow fiscal policy of the Trudeau-NDP alliance. That's the reality. Now, we're bringing in real relief measures for Albertans, including a utility rebate for every electricity consumer. More details very shortly.

Ms Ganley: The Premier seems to be just fine with leaving Albertans in the dark, literally, rather than protecting them from out-of-control utility costs. Our amendments to get the money to Albertans by May 31 were rejected. They opposed our amendments to improve the legislation by preventing power shut-offs. Albertans are losing patience with this dithering government. Can the Premier explain why he thinks Albertans deserve to have their heat or lights turned off while he dithers, blames, and fails to deliver?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, we are bringing real relief to consumers with an electricity rebate. We're working with electricity providers to ensure that customers are not shut off... [interjections]

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: ... that there's a pathway forward to keep them connected.

But, Mr. Speaker, the members across the way are pretty disingenuous being concerned about electricity affordability. It was their policies that created the conditions for the high costs we're experiencing today: the carbon tax, the excessive build of the transmission system, and the early purchase payout of the coal agreements.

Ms Ganley: Despite the increasingly desperate spin coming from over there, Albertans know that the UCP government lifting the rate cap is to blame for skyrocketing electricity prices. Albertans are being forced to choose between their groceries and heating their homes, and they need help now. The associate minister opposed our amendments to ensure that future rebates would be to Albertans within 30 days. Can someone over there tell this House how long they think Albertan families should have to wait to get their paltry rebates: 10 weeks, 20 weeks, 50, forever?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, we're moving forward with electricity rebates. More details to come very soon. But we're taking other action with respect to affordability. We immediately suspended the fuel tax, recognizing that the fuel tax adds costs to Albertans. That is real relief experienced every day by every family, by every senior, by every nonprofit every time they fill up their vehicle with gas. We're bringing real relief to Albertans. The members opposite simply jacked up costs.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross has a question.

Sexual Assault Awareness Training for Judges

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Public confidence is a fundamental component of a strong and effective justice system. It is because of this that lawyers and judges must be diligent when engaging with all those involved within our court system. This is even more prevalent when sensitive cases involving sexual assault come before judges as the court must be especially compassionate when hearing these matters. To the Associate Minister of Status of Women: what is this government's plan to ensure that survivors of sexual assault are treated with dignity and respect within the court system of this province?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta's government has introduced new legislation, Bill 14, requiring individuals applying to be a Provincial Court judge to complete sexual assault law and social context issues education before they're eligible to be appointed. If Bill 14 is passed, it will foster stronger confidence in the administration of justice; encourage greater engagement in the justice system by victims, Indigenous people, and people from minorities and vulnerable populations; and encourage more reporting of sexual assaults, which will contribute to reducing sexual assault in Alberta, which is ultimately the goal.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for your answer. Given that there have been past examples where sexual assault survivors have been revictimized in the court system and given that there is a desperate need for sexual assault training to be developed in a manner that is survivorcentric, again to the Associate Minister of Status of Women: how do you expect to tailor this sexual assault training program for judges to ensure that training is survivorcentric?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. First and foremost, we need to remember that judicial independence is of paramount importance. The actual training will be run through the province's Judicial Council or a similar governing body. It's government's role to set up broad requirements and work with judges to ensure the training requirements are being met. The end goal is that victims of sexual violence and their families are not retraumatized during the trial process and that all people who come into the courtroom are treated respectfully and fairly. Sexual assault survivors deserve to know that the judges who oversee their cases are fully educated in sexual assault law and will not make mistakes in . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you once again to the minister for that answer. Given that Bill 14 states that a judge in Alberta must complete sexual assault law and social context training after being appointed and given that there are numerous judges already in the Alberta court system that do not have this training, to the same associate minister: how will the government ensure that current judges are trained in this invaluable sexual assault training?

The Speaker: The associate minister.

Ms Issik: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. Again, we're going to work with the provincial Judicial Council to ensure that new and sitting judges receive the training promptly while fully respecting judicial independence. Judges have their own education plans and regularly update their skills and knowledge, and we'll ensure that sexual assault and social context training is part of that ongoing education. Sexual assault law and social context issues education for Provincial Court candidates will provide candidates with the knowledge, awareness, and skills to avoid being influenced by attitudes based on stereotypes or prejudice. This will help victims and their families feel safe and secure in the knowledge that future hearings will be fair, impartial, and free from mistakes.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Hospital Emergency Room Wait Times

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Emergency department wait times are soaring in Alberta, forcing people to go without getting the care they need. AHS data shows that in 2022 10 per cent of patients are leaving our emergency rooms in Edmonton without care, an increase from 7 per cent in 2021, so 3 per cent more people walking out of Edmonton hospitals because of the wait times created by this government. Can the Minister of Health tell this House exactly how many Albertans have left without getting care because his predecessor and the Premier decided to repeatedly push our hospitals to the brink?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I want to thank the hon. member for raising this important issue. We've acknowledged several times that the system is seeing a high number of patients. Some of the larger hospitals in Edmonton and Calgary are over 100 per cent occupancy, and I want to thank all of our health care workers, who are delivering incredible service at this point in time.

But, Mr. Speaker, this issue is not unique to this period in time, and it's not unique to Alberta as well. You know, the increase in pressures on hospitals happens on a regular basis. It's seasonal. We understand that, and that's why we need to fix it, and we are investing in the capacity in our system to be able to do that.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that this minister may want to speak to the actual front-line staff and given that, as has been reported by emergency room doctors, people who aren't able to access emergency departments are often forced to return sicker and more critical than before and given that this then puts their lives at risk in addition to the additional pressure on our front-line staff, who are already dealing with the ongoing impacts coming from the pandemic and risking their ability to provide care, and given that this is making an already difficult situation in our hospitals even worse, rather than these same old talking points, what is this minister doing today to ensure that someone who seeks help in an emergency room can get it?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are investing in capacity in our system. We are investing $600 million this year, another $600 million next year, and a third $600 million the year after that. That's $1.8 billion to expand capacity in our hospital system. We appreciate the tremendous work that's being done. We do have seasonal increases in our emergency departments, but we need to fix that. That shouldn't happen every year, and it's happening here in Alberta, and quite frankly it's happening in provinces across the country. We know we need to address it. That's why we're investing in building capacity. That's why we're hiring more nurses. We're hiring more EMS. We're investing across the entire system.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that it was only here in Alberta that this government thought a pandemic would be a perfect time to start a fight with doctors, a catastrophically bad decision that Albertans are still paying for, and given that the Premier and the Health minister have an open invitation to tour the Royal Alexandra hospital here in my constituency of Edmonton-City Centre, will the minister and the Premier take the time to tour this or any hospital that asks them to, speak with the staff, that are struggling with this unprecedented pressure, struggling to provide care, and see firsthand the devastating consequences of the UCP's failed decisions in our health care system?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I speak with AHS and practitioners on a regular basis. I understand, as I indicated earlier with Dr. Hinshaw in our weekly reports, that there is stress on the system. That's why we're acting. We should not have stress on the system. This shouldn't happen every year. That's why we are investing over $600 million this year, $1.8 billion over the next three years to expand capacity, to increase the number of nurses, increase the number of health care professionals. We have increased 1,800 nurses over the last two years, and the staff in AHS is going to go up by 2,800. We are investing in health care.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Nechi Institute

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Nechi Institute is recognized as one of the finest Indigenous training, research, and health promotion centres in the world. Nechi is a powerful resource for Indigenous people and communities addressing issues of addictions and family violence. In November 2019 the UCP evicted the Nechi Institute without consultation from the location at Poundmaker's Lodge, that they had used continuously for 36 years, with only three months' notice. Marilyn Buffalo, the CEO of Nechi, is here in the gallery today. Will the minister tell her why he evicted her and Nechi from their building?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Infrastructure.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We had the lease expire with the Nechi Institute, who was sharing the facility with Poundmaker's Lodge, which is offering critical Indigenous addiction treatment services in that area. When the lease was lapsed with the Nechi Institute, we couldn't extend that because Poundmaker's Lodge wanted to expand the services, critical services, for addictions treatment.

Mr. Feehan: Given that the minister promised this House in 2019 that he would personally assist Nechi in finding a new building and given that the minister has broken his promise and failed to do this, leaving Nechi stuck in derelict trailers on the grounds of Poundmaker's Lodge, and given that this is hampering Nechi in continuing their important work at a time when the drug poisoning crisis is more deadly than ever in the Indigenous community, will the minister tell Marilyn Buffalo why he has not taken her phone calls, not met with her, and not delivered the help he promised in this House?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, respectfully, when the member opposite is claiming that there is no consultation, it's not true. Alberta Health and Alberta Infrastructure offered them help, which they declined to take. That is the fact.

Mr. Feehan: Incredible.

Given that Poundmaker's Lodge is on the site of the former Edmonton Indian residential school and given that elders have reported that the trailers Nechi has been forced into are on top of unmarked graves of children who are buried at the school, can the minister explain to Marilyn Buffalo, who is here to hear your answers, and to all Albertans why he has refused to keep his promise and refused to address this intolerable situation for the Nechi Institute?

Mr. Shandro: Well, that's not true, Mr. Speaker. Staff from both Infrastructure and Indigenous Relations will continue to work with the Nechi board of directors on resolving their concerns. The Poundmaker's Lodge, though, has reported no further issues, and the Nechi continues to provide training through distance learning. This is why it was important for us to make sure that the Poundmaker's treatment lodge continues to have its opportunities to expand and be able to work with us in providing more services to Albertans who need the addiction recovery treatment that they needed, the residential treatment. The Nechi Institute will continue to provide those services at a distance. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Rural Health Care

Mr. Loewen: Health care continues to be one of the greatest concerns of rural Albertans. When a community comes together to raise money for medical equipment, as a government we must work collectively to facilitate their efforts. In the past the Fairview community bought a bilirubin tester, that took nine months and five levels of AHS bureaucracy to gain approval. Albertans need us to do better. Now the community is working to gain approval to purchase a CT scanner for their hospital. Another CT scanner in the Peace Country will help with patient safety and reduce ambulance trips. Minister, will you please provide an update on when we can expect an answer on this important acquisition for rural Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. First of all, I want to recognize the dedication and selflessness that Fairview residents – I met with representatives on a couple of occasions – have for their community in raising money for a new CT scanner. That is the Alberta spirit. But this simply isn't about placing a piece of equipment in a space. It also means staffing the clinic with specialized health care professionals. The member knows that AHS has challenges recruiting and training staff in rural and remote communities, and we are working to address that. We will continue to engage with local leaders on the best way to provide rural health care for all Albertans.

Mr. Loewen: Given that there are other health care issues in rural Alberta and that one of them is the lack of health care professionals and given that there have been many talented, aspiring health care professionals forced to leave Alberta and even Canada to receive their medical education and after completing their education elsewhere faced the arduous and lengthy process of receiving approval to practise in Alberta, forcing them to practise elsewhere, and given that this has left OR rooms in Grande Prairie underutilized at the expense of patients in need, Minister: what work is being done to find a more efficient process to bring our health care workers home?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks again to the hon. member for the question. The mechanism that matches medical school graduates with residencies, the Canadian resident matching service, is a nationally administered program. Now, while the process is not directly in our control, we are working in collaboration with the ministries of Advanced Education and labour and the medical schools of the U of C and the U of A to improve the way we train doctors in our province. We're also providing $6 million over the next three years, through the RESIDE program, to attract 60 recently graduated doctors to communities of need in Alberta such as the town of Fox Creek in the member's constituency.

Mr. Loewen: Given that rural Alberta was chosen to be one of the first areas in Alberta to implement connect care and given that there have been many concerns expressed regarding connect care and the amount of time it takes doctors, already in short supply, to input data while navigating this complicated system rather than focusing on patient care and given that locums, which are substitute doctors desperately needed to provide coverage and keep rural hospitals open, are being driven away due to their dislike of connect care, can the minister please tell us if AHS and the ministry are working on creating processes that will make connect care a less time-consuming process for doctors?

Mr. Copping: Thanks again to the hon. member for the question. Mr. Speaker, connect care is an AHS resource dedicated to charting a patient's progress. Consistent charting is an important piece that enables care teams to support patients and gives patients access to their own information. We recognize that this does create challenges for physicians who have multiple roles within AHS and at their own private practices. I want to assure the member that Alberta Health is working with AHS and the AMA to work through these problems to ease the transitioning to connect care.

In addition, we continue to invest in attracting and retaining doctors across all of rural Alberta; not only the RESIDE program but the $90,000 that we devoted . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

2:20 Homeless Supports and Affordable Housing

Ms Sigurdson: Edmonton is set to lose 44 per cent of emergency shelter capacity serving people experiencing homelessness by June. Nearly 3,000 people are currently experiencing homelessness in Edmonton, with 800 sleeping outside each night. Sadly, the UCP have been inconsistent with emergency shelter funding, forcing shelters to close. They have ignored requests from the city to build permanent supportive housing and have left hundreds of millions of federal housing dollars untouched. Why is the UCP forcing so many Edmontonians to sleep on the streets?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister of community services.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for raising this very difficult, complex issue here. Supporting our homeless population, helping them find the pathway to recovery, is important for this government. We invested $49 million with Budget 2022 committed to supporting homelessness initiatives. In Edmonton Homeward Trust received $29 million of that portion there. On top of the resources we committed to, we established a provincial task force. We're looking for a comprehensive, co-ordinated approach addressing this complex issue.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that I stood with our leader and the Member for St. Albert in Trinity Lutheran church in September, where an emergency shelter had just closed because of funding cuts, and given that in the last two years the UCP have underbudgeted regarding homeless supports by tens of millions of dollars while poverty has increased, why is the UCP continuing this failed plan of underbudgeting for the most vulnerable, leaving them no place to stay but on the streets?

Mr. Luan: Mr. Speaker, nothing can be further from the truth. This government continues to commit our support for this sector here not only with increased resources there, but also we're taking a different approach. Those one-off, isolated approaches no longer address this issue. That's one reason we have the provincial task force established. The Edmonton city manager is a member of that task force along with a federal government representative and significant other stakeholders in the community. We're working hard to address this complex issue here.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that the solution to homelessness is investment in affordable housing and given that the national housing strategy has billions of available dollars and that Alberta needs to step up to get their fair share and, however, given that the UCP have continually ignored the city of Edmonton's request for permanent supportive housing and have left hundreds of millions of federal housing dollars untouched, when will the UCP be announcing details of how they leverage every available dollar from the national housing strategy to provide Albertans access to a home?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is so shameful, that the NDP once again totally don't understand. We've been telling once again, more and more, repeated again that we spent every single federal dollar. We have allocated $561 million in cost matching for the next nine years to build affordable housing. I don't understand what the hon. member doesn't understand. Maybe math is hard for her.

Thank you.

Ms Gray: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 2:24.

Government Policies and Cost of Living

Mr. Bilous: A recent report shows that rising interest rates are driving Albertans toward bankruptcy. While the picture was not good for Canadians in general, from the effects of rising interest rates coupled with soaring cost of living, Alberta was in worse shape than the rest of the country. Currently 52 per cent of Alberta households are within $200 of not making all their financial obligations by the end of the month, yet the UCP keeps piling on costs. Income taxes, property taxes, tuition, park and camping fees, utilities, and insurance have all gone up under the UCP. Why is the UCP adding these costs onto Albertans already struggling to make ends meet?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We're working hard to ensure that Albertans can in fact live in the most affordable jurisdiction in the country. That, in fact, is true. We have the lowest business taxes, the lowest personal taxes, no sales tax, no payroll tax, no land transfer tax, no capital tax. Folks are moving from every province into Alberta right now. Why? Because there's opportunity, because our economic policies are attracting tens of billions of dollars of investment, creating jobs and opportunities for all Albertans.

Mr. Bilous: Given that Albertans are only $200 away from not being able to pay their bills at the end of the month and given that the UCP's income tax increase will cost Alberta families $900 per year by the end of their fiscal plan, cuts to AISH will cost recipients $3,500 per year, and cuts to low-income seniors on the seniors' benefit will cost $900 per year and given that utility bills have increased by hundreds of dollars after the UCP lifted the rate cap, can the minister explain how exactly this government's plan to push Albertans into bankruptcy is good for the economy?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I reject the assertion in that question. We did not reduce AISH payments, we've not reduced seniors' payments, and we've not increased taxes. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Members of the opposition don't just get to yell at the government at their pleasure. They're welcome to heckle strategically. As you all know, the Speaker is a former heckler. You're welcome to heckle strategically, but just yelling at the government is not a heckle.

The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll repeat that. We have not raised taxes, we have not cut AISH, and we've not cut seniors' benefits. Alberta maintains the strongest, most generous supports of any province in the country. On top of that, we're positioning the province for disproportionate investment attraction, and we balanced the budget.

Mr. Bilous: Deindexing is a cut, and it's in your budget.

Given that Albertans are in the worst financial shape in the country according to a report by MNP and given that Alberta's unemployment rate is higher than the national average, with Calgary having the highest unemployment rate in the country amongst major cities, and given that the UCP keeps adding on costs to Albertans already struggling to find work and make ends meet, why are Albertans falling further behind under the UCP? Would somebody please step up and take responsibility for your budget?

The Speaker: That sounds like a preamble, and it's in the standing orders.

The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Most major banks and economic think tanks are projecting Alberta to lead the nation in economic growth not only in 2022 but in 2023. Our policies are working. Investment is pouring into this province. Jobs are being created; in fact, employers are struggling to find employees. That's why we've invested $600 million in Budget 2022 to reskill Albertans, to ensure they can take part in the new economy, the economy of the future. Our policies are working. Alberta is back. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Economic Recovery Plan

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Over the past two years the COVID-19 pandemic caused huge disruptions in Alberta's economic growth. Thousands of Albertans lost their jobs as a result of the world-wide response and damages caused by COVID-19, including many of my constituents of Calgary-Falconridge. Now that we're learning to live with COVID, Albertans need to know whether or not the UCP plan is working to get Albertans back to work. To the Minister of Labour and Immigration: is our plan working?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Immigration and Multiculturalism.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Last week our government introduced a game-changing $600 million investment in Alberta at work to support education, on-the-job training, and to reduce barriers for underrepresented groups. Alberta's unemployment rate is lower than it's been since December 2018, and each month it keeps getting lower and lower. Alberta's recovery plan is working, and more Albertans are sharing in our province's success.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that Alberta's economy was severely damaged by the previous NDP government's job-killing policies and given that their taxation on corporations led to billions of dollars of investment leaving Alberta, putting thousands and thousands of Albertans out of work, and given that our government was elected to clean up the mess made by the members opposite, to the same minister: how are we cleaning up the NDP's mess and getting Albertans back to work?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaidis: Sure. Thank you. As my colleague has mentioned, we have a lot of work to do to clean up the mess that the NDP left us. But rest assured, the cleanup crew is here, and we will get things done, including the $600 million investment that my colleague mentioned to the Alberta at work initiative. This initiative is going to help Albertans who are struggling to find employment find those job opportunities. It's going to help other Albertans reskill and upskill for the jobs of the future, and it's going to help young Albertans make sure they have the skills they need to succeed.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that Alberta is currently in a labour shortage crisis and given that our government has committed hundreds of millions of dollars to helping Albertans get job training through the Alberta at work program, thus attracting more workers and tradespeople to come work in Alberta, to the Minister of Advanced Education: how will this $235 million investment into postsecondary help address the skilled labour shortage?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you. As the member mentioned, we are investing $235 million in Advanced Education over three years. A big portion of that, $171 million, is going to create spaces in our postsecondary institutions. We'll be creating so many spaces, Mr. Speaker, 7,000 additional spaces, in our postsecondary institutions in high-demand areas, including aviation, tech. As well, we're providing $30 million over three years to support trades and apprenticeship education. We are focused on ensuring that Albertans have the skills they need to succeed.

Education Policies and Funding

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, every day this UCP government is making life more expensive for Alberta families. Thanks to the UCP, families are paying more for income tax, more for property tax, more on tuition, more interest on student debt, more for car insurance, and more for utilities, but it doesn't end there. The UCP is also driving up school fees with their cuts to school districts. In Sherwood Park, Elk Island schools announced a 20 per cent increase to transportation fees for students. Why is the UCP making it more expensive for kids in Sherwood Park to get to school?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite knows that 98 per cent of all the funding goes directly to school authorities. School authorities have the ability to set their school fees, and they set school fees. Besides for busing, et cetera, they also set them for extracurricular activities and field trips. This is what school fees are for. Under the previous government they were very upset that there were controls on school fees, et cetera. They were not happy when that happened. We fixed their mess.

Ms Hoffman: Given that at the Parkland school division transportation fees are going up by $70 in some cases and even more than $100 for a maximum family rate and given that families in Spruce Grove, Stony Plain, and surrounding communities are already struggling under all of the mounting costs that this UCP government is piling onto them – the NDP government did work to lower school fees, and we would have continued that work, but this minister repealed our legislation – Minister, will you explain to parents why this current government has cleared a path for massive school fee hike increases and why it's set on making things more expensive for kids trying to get to school?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, the one thing I hear continuously – and I still hear it – is: thank God the NDP aren't in office. Just to clarify, in 2019 we had 711,000 students, and our budget was $8.2 billion. Right now in this upcoming year we have 716,000 students. We have an $8.4 billion budget. I've increased dollars to transportation 5 per cent to the year before, 5 per cent to last year, and 4.6 per cent in this upcoming year.

Ms Hoffman: Given that the current government is deliberately underfunding public education and given that the UCP is forcing parents to pay more in school fees at a time when many Albertans are already struggling to make ends meet and given that the UCP is forcing a rushed curriculum on students that's not supported by parents or teachers and fails to support students, why is this government forcing struggling parents to pay more and get less support, and why are they forcing a broken curriculum that parents don't support, teachers don't support, school boards don't support on Alberta students?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We continue to hear from the Queen of Misinformation, but I want to clear things up. In fact, school authorities: as I said, we've added an additional $700 million over three years. We have $191 million for the curriculum implementation. We have an additional $110 million to address mental health and wellness. That's on top of the $45 million I added last year in terms of dealing with learning loss. School boards have gone from $363 million in operating reserves to $464 million as of August 2021.

Ms Gray: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order?

Ms Gray: Yep.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 2:35.

Drug Poisoning Death Prevention

Ms Sigurdson: The UCP's response to the drug poisoning crisis has been shameful. They have denied evidence about harm reduction [interjections] so they could fulfill the Premier's campaign of stigmatizing proven life-saving methods. January was the deadliest month on record from drug poisoning; 160 Albertans tragically lost their lives. Over five Albertans died a day. [interjections] My question to the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions is simple: when will Alberta stop breaking records for deaths and start to see a decrease in drug poisonings?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Sorry. I'm just a little distracted by your colleague the hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo. Perhaps he might come to order.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, thank you very much. I thank the member for the question. As I've said many times in this House, the loss of one life is one too many, especially in the addiction crisis. But let's be clear. What is the NDP's plan? The NDP's plan is for publicly funded addictive drugs. That's right. The NDP wants to put drugs on the streets. They want to put hydromorphone on the streets. That is their plan. I don't see how more drugs helps a drug situation. [interjections]

The Speaker: I might just caution members of the opposition, whoever is making comments like, "Sit down," that that may seem to be intimidating another member. Of course, members have the opportunity to rise in their seat and answer the question.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that the UCP has continuously stated that harm reduction methods do not work, like the minister just said, and given that I've been advocating for increased affordable housing with mental health support and given that here in Edmonton emergency shelter beds are set to decrease by 44 per cent in June and that continued requests by the city council for permanent supportive housing so people with mental health concerns can get help while having a stable home have been constantly rejected by the UCP, why is the UCP opposed to providing mental health support and stable housing to the most vulnerable?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, you know, I know the NDP always want to talk about the science and believe in the evidence, but the NDP had an opportunity to hear evidence from people from Harvard University, from Stanford University, from Yale University. You know what? They quit. They don't want to hear the evidence. They don't want to hear the truth. We're listening to the evidence, and we are trying to move forward in helping people with severe mental health and addictions issues.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that the January deaths from drug poisoning in 2022 are 21 per cent higher than 2021 – 758 Albertans died in 2021, which is double the total in 2019; the UCP's approach is clearly not working – and given that the UCP has focused on recovery but that cuts to social services such as deindexing income support and AISH, not funding permanent supportive housing . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview has every right to ask a question and the Speaker to hear the question. If she wants to rewind about five seconds, I'd be happy to allow her to do that.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that the UCP has focused on recovery but that cuts to social supports such as deindexing income support and AISH, not funding permanent supportive housing, and cutting critical mental health supports do not serve the mission of recovery, to the associate minister: over five preventable deaths . . .

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, the drug crisis is affecting not just Alberta. I know the NDP wants to think that it's only an Alberta issue, but it's not an Alberta issue. This is a Canadian issue. This is a North American issue. You know, their close friend and ally in the federal Liberal Party – let me be perfectly clear. They are supporting publicly funded drugs. Even the federal minister, their close friend and ally, has indicated that these are addictive drugs. I do not see how, in any rational mind, we can put more addictive drugs on the streets of Alberta.

The Speaker: Hon. members . . . [interjections] Order. Order. Order. That concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will return to the remainder of the daily Routine.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East has a statement to make.

Oil and Gas Transportation Infrastructure

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The provincial government is creating new opportunities for Albertans, and Alberta's economy has been on the right path with the implementation of Alberta's recovery plan. One of the core pillars of this is the diversification of Alberta's economy. As part of this plan there has been a tremendous focus on diversifying accessibility to Alberta's enormous energy supply.

With the ongoing invasion by Russia in Ukraine, the global energy market will change significantly. As a result, there will be likely growing demand for responsible and ethically produced Alberta oil and gas. The future of Alberta's energy supply requires us to make rapid and long-term investment in oil transport infrastructure. In order to achieve this, it is critical for the federal government to do more, remove regulatory gridlocks that deprive our energy supply to global markets.

Alberta and Canada need to work at developing an oil-handling system which will reach large cargo vessels in Churchill port in Manitoba, that would enable the export of energy from Alberta. Developing access to tidewater infrastructure from Alberta will serve as a gateway to supply our energy to the world. The financial gains of this project will definitely improve the competitiveness of our energy while also providing long-term opportunities for many within the province and the country. I urge the government to look in this direction and also put more pressure on the federal government to repeal bills C-48 and C-69, that have limited the movement of the province's oil.

The future of Alberta's energy supply requires us to make rapid and long-term investment in oil transport infrastructure, and the time to act is now. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of the hon. Mr. Toews, President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance, responses to questions raised by Mr. Barnes, hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat, Ms Phillips, hon. Member for Lethbridge-West, and Mr. Loewen, hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley, on March 8, 2022, Ministry of Treasury Board and Finance 2022-23 main estimates debate.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. At 2:24 the Opposition House Leader rose on a point of order.

Point of Order Insulting Language

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. During a question set talking about emergency shelter capacity, the real need for Edmontonians experiencing homelessness to have supports in affordable housing, and other issues of great significance, I rose under 23(j), "uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder," because, as we know, in this House personal attacks and insults are not in order, and the minister said to the Member for Edmonton-Riverview, "Maybe math is hard for her."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe this is a point of order, that that type of insult in this House is unparliamentary. I would also like to note that the last time a member of the Conservative front bench told the NDP that math was hard, it was just a few weeks before Albertans chose an NDP government. Time is a flat circle. I believe we may be repeating history here, but certainly that language was unparliamentary.

Thank you.

The Speaker: It almost sounds like she's continuing debate.
The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I don't believe that this is a point of order. I would suggest that it's a matter of debate, specifically for the use of the word "maybe." The word "maybe" in itself suggests that this is a matter of debate. The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing was commenting on the mathematics that the Member for Edmonton-Riverview was using in the questions that she was posing to the minister. I recognize that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview did not like the answer and certainly, I guess, also didn't like the response that maybe math is hard. But from the fact that she used the word "maybe" and that other things have very similarly been said in this Chamber that have not been called points of order, have gone through, passed the smell test, I would argue that it's not a point of order but, rather, a matter of debate, maybe a matter of debate.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I am prepared to rule, and I do have the benefit of the Blues. "I don't understand what the hon. member doesn't understand. Maybe math is hard for her." That is the statement that the Minister of Seniors and Housing made at 2:22. I would like to note that while the words themselves are not unparliamentary, I think that it is well accepted that this statement, that has become part of the political discourse in our province over a number of years, certainly has some insulting overtones to it. While I'm not entirely convinced that it raises to the level of a point of order, I will offer a very direct encouragement to the Minister of Seniors and Housing. Particularly, directing a statement that may be considered to be insulting at any one particular member is, of course, where caution ought to be used in the future. I consider this matter dealt with and concluded. This is not a point of order.

However, at 2:35 the Opposition House Leader rose on an additional point of order, which we will hear now.

Point of Clarification

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, prior to that point of order, just under 13(2), the argument that the Deputy Government House Leader made, that making insulting statements would be parliamentary if we put "maybe" in front of them, like "Maybe the Deputy Government House Leader is bad at his job": could you let me know if that would be acceptable or unacceptable? I would like to provide guidance to my caucus, and I found that reasoning to be quite suspect. I suspect we do not want to see that behaviour in the House, but I look forward to your guidance. I'm just unclear if it was found to be parliamentary because of the word "maybe." Is that comment . . .

The Speaker: Oh. No. I would suggest that the words themselves, "Math is hard," are not unparliamentary, and given the context in which they were used, I would suggest that it didn't raise to the level of a point of order today. However, I did provide significant caution to the minister in light of the fact that such a comment was directed specifically at an individual. Of course, the use of the word "maybe" doesn't give licence to use unparliamentary language. Just because the Deputy Government House Leader said it doesn't mean that it's fact. While I appreciated his submissions, they were inconsequential to the fact that I didn't find a point of order. Maybe not inconsequential.

Ms Gray: I appreciate that clarification, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for your indulgence there.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

Ms Gray: At 2:35 I rose under, again, 23(j), "uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder." The Member for Edmonton-Glenora was asking about a 20 per cent increase in school fees when the Minister of Education referred to her as the queen of misinformation, directly calling her a liar. I do not believe this is a matter of debate. I do believe that is an insult. That is a nickname that is not referring to a colleague in a respectful manner. I believe this is a point of order.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have been called many things in my life but inconsequential is not one of them. Of course, I kid.

I will get to the matter at hand. I don't find that this is a point of order, particularly because I do believe that in many instances there are members of the opposition who maybe try to pass misinformation as fact. I believe the hon. Minister of Education was pointing out that fact, and maybe that's what was so frustrating to the hon. member opposite and why the point of order was called, or maybe it was the use of the word "queen." I do know that the members opposite have a disdain for — they do not like the monarchy. Maybe it's the title. Maybe princess or duchess would be more appropriate, but I don't believe this is a point of order. [interjections]

I will retract and apologize for those comments. I'd just retract and apologize.

I will say that I don't believe this is a point of order, but I will leave that to your judgment, hon. Speaker.

The Speaker: I couldn't disagree with you more in this case. To be overly certain, I didn't say that you were inconsequential. I said that the argument was inconsequential, and perhaps that was a bit of an overstatement as well.

In this case, however, I would say that it is unparliamentary to refer to an individual as the queen of misinformation. I have ruled on numerous occasions with respect to the language around misinformation, including on June 7, 2021, page 5238 of Hansard. If anyone is inclined to look those comments up, I encourage you to do so. But this is a point of order, and I'll have the Deputy Government House Leader apologize and withdraw the comments.

Mr. Schow: I withdraw and apologize.

The Speaker: I consider the matter dealt with and concluded.
We are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day Government Bills and Orders Second Reading Bill 13 Financial Innovation Act

[Adjourned debate April 25: Mr. Eggen]

The Speaker: Are there others? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud would like to join in the debate on Bill 13.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm just getting my timer going here. I want to, you know, speak fulsomely if I can.

I'm pleased to rise at second reading of Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act. I want to begin by saying that I believe that overall we support this bill, and I believe that the type of innovation that it is setting out in this bill is something that we certainly do support.

We know that the financial services sector within Alberta employs over 60,000 Albertans, and we have consistently stood in this space and talked about the need for innovation and for attracting talent and investment into Alberta and finding new ways to do that. It's one of the reasons why, in this House, the members of the Official Opposition have been fiercely advocating for a postsecondary system that actually, you know, attracts people and actually keeps Albertans here.

We know that within the energy sector, within the transition to a new energy economy there is enormous opportunity for innovation, and of course the oil and gas sector is using a great deal of technology and automation and robotics to really make their systems more efficient. We also know that we need more innovation because that efficiency and automation often do not actually translate into more jobs necessarily, but we do know that there is a great opportunity for more jobs in Alberta by encouraging that innovation.

We've seen, certainly, that, you know, members from the Official Opposition with respect to – actually, I'm thinking specifically about Bill 203, that my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview introduced, which, unfortunately, the government decided is not worthy of debate in this House. It talked about an Alberta venture fund, which is also about encouraging Albertans to do what they do best, which is to take risks and to invest in Albertans. It was the opportunity for Albertans to participate in a small way by innovating and investing into venture funds right here in Alberta that would support Alberta companies.

For some reason the government of the day thought that this was too risky. They believed it was too risky to allow Albertans to, you know, do what we do best: be entrepreneurial, take chances, come up with new ideas, and innovate. They didn't trust Albertans to make those investments on their own, which is shocking. However, we certainly do, so I think this idea of a Financial Innovation Act – clearly, there is some risk that the UCP is willing to take, just not on good ideas from the opposition.

As I understand it, Bill 13 would essentially create what's called a regulatory sandbox, and financial services companies and financial technology companies could basically test out new services or technologies in sort of an environment where there are lowered or limited regulatory frameworks, so basically have an opportunity to innovate and to try out new things and, yes, to take some risks in an idea where regulatory thresholds are somewhat lowered, so to enable that.

Then, of course, if it's successful, you know, that work would come out and be subject to the full regulation that exists for other companies. It's to lower the risk for these companies to try new things and to make it easier and cheaper for them to do that, but it has to have, of course, some guideposts around it because while that's a good opportunity, we want to make sure that we are protecting consumers very carefully who may be investing in these kinds of new financial services and innovations. We want to make sure that they have the protections necessary so that they understand the risks of investing or even purchasing services and goods from a company that has a lower regulatory threshold. But we also want to make sure that those who are making the determination of which financial services should be allowed to operate in this regulatory sandbox have the expertise necessary to determine when it's safe to do so.

As I understand it, you know, it would allow specific companies to apply for a certificate to the Minister of Treasury Board and Finance for temporary relief from certain laws and regulation. I understand there are a number of pieces of legislation that these companies would be exempt from. It includes the loans and trust act, the Credit Union Act, the ATB Financial Act, and the Consumer Protection Act, which I have a bit of concern about, and the personal information and privacy act as well as the Financial Consumers Act, and we know that more legislation could be added by regulation. So, essentially, a company would apply, as I understand it, to the minister for a certificate to be exempt from these regulatory requirements.

I understand that there are some kinds of – you know, there are eligibility requirements. The company must be an Alberta company, physically located here in Alberta. They must be able to demonstrate to the government that their product is new and original, and they must demonstrate that no other company is currently offering the same products or services, and they have to, of course, submit a business case. These are sort of the requirements to apply for a certificate, and then those exemptions can be granted. I understand that they will be explicitly listed on the certificate, so at least consumers have an idea of which regulatory requirements this company is exempt from.

Again, I think that there is certainly some benefit to this, and we certainly see an opportunity from what's set out in Bill 13 and an opportunity for innovation in this space, but I also know that there are some risks that we need to be clear on. First, as I mentioned, this puts a great deal of onus on the Minister of Treasury Board and Finance to be able to apply those eligibility requirements, look at the business case, understand the innovative nature of what's being proposed, and make a determination that that company should be eligible for an exemption.

There is a risk, I believe, and as I understand it, we're talking about very novel companies and novel financial services, something that maybe lots of folks here have heard about, talked about; you know, cryptocurrency and all of that and Bitcoin. Even people who are well versed in these kinds of things find it difficult to fully comprehend, perhaps, what cryptocurrency is, and I will acknowledge that I have tried to go over it a number of times in my head. Every time I think I've got it, then something changes, and I still have to reflect on what I thought I knew.

So it's certainly a challenging space, and we need to be sure that those who are making determinations as to whether or not a financial services company should be exempt from regulatory requirements has the requisite knowledge and expertise to be able to make that risk assessment. It's relying heavily on the government ministry itself and the Minister of Treasury Board and Finance himself. I think we need some assurances that there is the appropriate level of expertise, both within the existing ministry but also, certainly, with the existing minister, to be able to make that kind of assessment.

You know, I think that sort of speaks to the even broader issue here. Really, this is going to be a certificate issued by the authority of the Minister of Treasury Board and Finance, which asks for Albertans to place their trust in the minister to make good and sound decisions. Now, as we know, the current Minister of Treasury Board and Finance is the same minister who has, you know, given in to insurance company lobbying and allowed for insurance companies to make a significant amount of profit on the backs of Alberta drivers, many of which weren't even driving their vehicles much in the last two years but saw their insurance premiums go up. This is the same Treasury Board and Finance minister who lifted the cap on insurance rates.

It's the same Treasury Board and Finance minister who also advised on the decision to throw away $1.3 billion on the KXL pipeline, a pipeline that everybody was advising was not going to happen unless Donald Trump was re-elected. I mean, that's just this minister. He's the same minister who has overseen, against what I believe are his core principles and values as a so-called conservative, allowed for bracket creep, allowed for the hike of personal income taxes without even being honest about what was happening and still refusing to acknowledge it. I mean, there's very good reason for this.

And let's be honest. This is also the Finance minister who, up until the, you know, windfall of large oil price increases in the last few months, was about to enter a budget with the highest deficit ever recorded in Alberta. Certainly, Albertans would have a lot of reason to not have a great deal of trust in the Minister of Treasury Board and Finance, at least this one. Of course, more generally, I could use up a significant amount of time going through all the reasons why Albertans don't trust this government and the Premier in particular, but we don't have time for that.

The other risk associated with this bill is really about consumer protection. It's really about making sure that consumers understand that they may be purchasing services and engaging in financial transactions with a company that is subject to a lower level or exempt from certain regulatory requirements. We need to ensure that there's some kind of education being done to the public or some kind of warning label or some kind of way of transmitting to the consumer that they understand that there may be greater risks associated in this space. You know, there's also a worry that people might just simply transfer their current confidence and trust in our public financial institutions such as major banks and just simply think that the same requirements are applying to these kinds of new financial innovation and financial services companies, which won't be the case under this bill. Those are the kinds of things that we need to be cautious about.

Overall, I think our caucus has been very clear in our support for innovation, and I look forward to hearing more thoughtful debate on this subject. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other – I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I am pleased to rise and speak to Bill 13, which is the Financial Innovation Act. I want to start by making it clear on the record that in general I'm supportive of this bill. I think members should probably vote in favour of this bill. I just have a few concerns, and I think that they are concerns that arise from the level of discretion and a lack of understanding of what the process is going to be for the evaluation of these applications.

Obviously, the act builds on a regulatory sandbox initiative started under the NDP government through the Alberta Securities Commission. Generally I think that was a good initiative, I mean, obviously. These sorts of ideas can be very useful. They can spur innovation. They can sort of create new – they can allow new businesses with new ideas to flourish in an existing environment, and I think that's really important. I'm actually really glad to see the government at least taking steps in this direction because they tend to privilege economic development measures that really, really work for established players generating large profits to the detriment of new entrants to a market.

For instance, this government: obviously, their sort of big throw when they first got into government was to drop the corporate tax rate.

Now, that tax rate is applicable only on companies that are generating $500,000 a year or more, so it is beneficial to those companies but not to new companies because, Mr. Speaker, I'm sure you're well aware that a new business doesn't generate $500,000 worth of revenue in the first year. That almost never happens. In fact, most businesses don't generate revenue in the first year. Most times it takes a little while to sort of get up to speed. It's very unlikely that a measure like that would help a new business or innovation.

Now, it's not surprising that that was the direction of the government because it was a government who said that diversification was a luxury, something we didn't have time for, something we shouldn't be interested in. It doesn't surprise me, but this represents a pretty big reversal, a reversal in direction, and I think that's good.

There are a number of other things I'd like to see them reverse; for instance, the Alberta investor tax credit. That was a program with a demonstrated history of attracting new businesses. It was a program with a demonstrated history of creating jobs. That's the challenge with the direction that this government took. They gave away billions of dollars to corporations. They got no jobs in return because that wasn't where the market was at the time. So they helped only established players, and they didn't help them in a way that created any jobs for Albertans. It just essentially sent profits overseas. This initiative looks like a good initiative. I'd like to see them take more of these good initiatives. The Alberta investor tax credit, as I mentioned, under our government was working really, really well.

They love to talk about the tech sector. Well, initial growth was spurred under our government because we made investments, and then the UCP cut those investments, so companies that were looking at coming here – because companies get legal work and I guess I talk to other lawyers, I heard from a number of people that companies that had been planning to relocate here or create an office here didn't do that because the government cut the program, and then they brought it back. Now it's starting to spool up, but the net result of this government's refusal to invest in good economic policy was that we are now behind the rest of the country in terms of that growth. That isn't to say that we aren't seeing growth, because the UCP government thankfully chose to eventually reverse course and get back onboard with initiatives that were working under the NDP government, but the result of that is that we were behind, so that's problematic. Those are the things I think are good about this bill. Those are the reasons I think it's good.

The reason I think it's problematic is that it gives enormous power to the minister. That isn't to say that there's never a need for that; it's just to say that with this government in particular I think it requires a little more explanation of how a few things are going to be handled. For instance, how are we going to ensure that there is still consumer protection? This is a government that has a long history of privileging the interests of large and wealthy insiders over the interests of regular Albertans. How do they plan to protect those Albertans?

Another big question is: how do they plan to adjudicate who gets these regulatory exemptions and who doesn't? Again, this is a government with a demonstrated history of not being particularly trustworthy when it comes to picking policies as opposed to picking friends. This is a government with a long history of demonstrating that they can't assess risk particularly well. I mean, the problem ultimately is what I would describe, Mr. Speaker, as a loss of trust. The public has lost trust in this government, so they need more explanation of how the rules are going to be applied and how those rules are going to be applied fairly than they normally would.

Now, this is sort of a concept that I'm borrowing from employment law. One of the things that can happen if you do something bad at your job and it's not bad enough that the judge or the arbitrator or whoever it is that's deciding thinks you should lose your job: sometimes you can lose your job anyway, and that happens because there is a breakdown of trust. So when you wind up in a position where the employee and the employer are just – basically, there's so little trust between them that the relationship is nonfunctional. Any little thing that happens going forward in the future is going to, like, turn into a huge sort of catastrophic breakdown because everyone assumes the other party isn't acting in good faith. Essentially, what we have with this government is that the public assumes that this is a government that is not acting in good faith because of, again, a demonstrated history.

Some of the things, I think, that could help with this, that could go a long way to help with this. This government could learn to admit when it's wrong. When it makes a mistake and chooses to reverse course, it could admit when it's wrong. It's reversed course on a number of issues, this government. For instance, Mr. Speaker, they repealed the 1976 coal policy. They tried to go ahead with coal mining in the Rockies. Now, some projects have slipped through. But when they reversed that, there was no standing up and saying: "Yep. Turns out we were wrong. We totally misread that situation. We didn't think about it deeply enough." I really think that this would go a long way to re-establishing trust with Albertans.

Maybe it's just because I was at the hydrogen conference this morning, Mr. Speaker, but I think, you know, the public's confidence in this government would have been assisted a lot – rewind to 2020. The NDP releases a plan on hydrogen, and the UCP laughs. The minister says: it's ridiculous; hydrogen will never come that fast. The idea that we would export by 2030 is absolutely absurd, says the associate minister. And then they release a plan that has us doing exactly that, largely borrowed from our plan. So what happened in between? I just feel like it would go a long way to build trust if the associate minister could just stand up and say: "Yep. I was wrong. I was wrong when I laughed at green hydrogen and said that we would never make it in Alberta. I was wrong when I said that we would never export by 2030. I was wrong when I said that all of these things were out decades." I think that that would go a long way to re-establish trust.

In addition, with respect to this bill you have a situation where the applicants, the people being asked to be exempt from the regulations, are potentially people who know the government; again, demonstrated history of sort of, you know, friends and insiders. This is a government who, at the same time that they wouldn't let physicians use complex modifiers on telehealth during a pandemic, brought in a company to do telehealth. You know, it's pretty clear that there was some wink, wink, nudge, nudge in there. So I think this is incredibly problematic.

The big questions are: does this government have the expertise to credibly assess these proposals and still protect Albertans, and can they be impartial? I mean, if we just look at, for instance, in terms of their credibility, the issue around rebates, right? This issue comes up in November. The government says: we're going to do nothing. Then they say: we're going to do a natural gas rebate. But then the budget comes out, and it turns out that by "we're going to do," they mean, you know, eight or nine months from now, and at the time their current projections weren't showing that obtaining. As it turns out, it did.

But the point is, again, that then they say: we're going to do an electricity rebate. We wait. We wait. We wait. There's no word. There's no news. There's nothing. Then comes legislation. Okay. Fine. It took them weeks to sort of essentially crib previously existing legislation. They bring in the legislation, and on the same day that the associate minister says, "Oh, there's no way we get these rebates to people until, you know, June, possibly July," they charge in and say, "Oh, the opposition didn't pass it in six hours, and that's the problem." The same day – the same day – the associate minister said: "We don't get them out until June. It's going to take us at least two months, and, oh, a six-hour delay is a really big problem for us."

Ms Gray: Ridiculous.

Ms Ganley: Ridiculous. Lack of trust.

Insurance caps: also a big deal. This government came in. They got lobbied by an insider. They remove the insurance cap. Insurance rates skyrocketed. There was an outcry from Albertans. They said: "Oh, no, no, no. There's no possible other way this could have happened. The insurance companies absolutely needed it. Everyone would have gone bankrupt without it." And then, mysteriously, the report that tells us how much insurance companies charged in premiums versus how much they took in in claims just doesn't appear that year. It just doesn't appear. The government trots out. They say: don't worry; all the information is online.

We proved that that is not, in fact, the case, Mr. Speaker, so finally they publish the report, trying to blame the civil service and blame the insurance companies and blame everyone but themselves, who chose not to publish the report, for that. When we see the report, we see that they took in more in premiums than they paid out in claims, significantly more, and, in fact, that that differential has expanded in the interim. Again, it's difficult for Albertans to have confidence that vesting all of this discretion in the minister will result in an outcome that is beneficial to everyone. I mean, the question is, again, whether they're going to protect consumers appropriately and whether they're going to pick companies appropriately. The best company with the best business case may come forward. What if they're not friends of the UCP? What if it's 2020 and they're coming forward with a hydrogen proposal when this government is saying, "Oh, pooh-pooh to hydrogen," before they decide to change their mind?

You know, the problem is that they just don't seem to make judgments based on the facts and the evidence before them. I think – ah, yes – this is a question of risk assessment. That's what the government is going to be doing. They're going to be looking at these companies and saying, like: what is the risk to consumers versus what is the potential benefit to innovation? This is the same government that bet on the re-election of Donald Trump when the polls were showing he had less than a 50 per cent chance of success.

Mr. Rutherford: They showed Hillary as a winner, too.

Ms Ganley: This is a government – well, I mean, that's fine, that the polls may have been wrong about Hillary as well, but we didn't make a $1.3 billion bet with taxpayers' money on her election. I think maybe that's the problem there.

This government went ahead and made that bet. They made that bet without consultation with Albertans. They made that bet without proper financial transparency with Albertans, and they made that bet in what – I don't know. I'm not a big gambler myself, Mr. Speaker, but I think a lot of people would have looked at that and said: "Okay. So we're going to put down $1.3 billion. We have less than a 50 per cent chance of success on any reading of the situation. I don't know. Does that seem like a good bet?" I don't think they would have made it with their own money.

Ms Hoffman: Betcha five bucks they wouldn't.

Ms Ganley: Yeah. You know, I'm not going to take that bet from the Member for Edmonton-Glenora because I don't think that the UCP would have made that bet with their own money. I would be really surprised to hear that that was the case. I think they only made it because they had taxpayer money to spend.

I think that that is the main concern, that this is a government with a demonstrated history of an inability to credibly assess risk. And even if we assume that we clear that hurdle somehow, that we have some sort of policy or procedure that is printed online for Albertans to see in terms of how this government is going to assess risk, then the next hurdle arises, and that's a hurdle of: how do we know . . .

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Grande Prairie has risen.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise this afternoon and speak to Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act. The Financial Innovation Act is poised to be the first of its kind in Canada, one that will spur investment in innovative and new technologies and position the Alberta economy for growth in the financial services sector. This forward-looking legislation provides space for innovation, disruption, and truly incredible minds to bring forward their products in Alberta. This will empower Alberta's fintech entrepreneurs to make full use of their creativity and test their products and ideas right here at home.

If passed, the proposed legislation would create a regulatory sandbox, as many have talked about this afternoon. That regulatory sandbox will make it easier for finance and fintech companies to develop new products and services in Alberta and will diversify Alberta's economy in this space. The regulatory sandbox would offer companies time-limited relief from certain legislation and regulations, making it simpler for them to research, to test, and to adapt their new technologies and services to the needs of Albertans. It would also help companies collect information on new products and services to determine if they are providing value for their customers. A regulatory sandbox would drive increased innovation and competition in Alberta, which could potentially give Albertans greater access to more products and services at a lower cost.

While this sandbox will be the first of its kind in Canada, there are models and best practices that we can use and follow. To the member previously talking about the questions around what I heard was safeguards: I think that's one of the challenges with legislation like this. It being an innovative bill and trying to legislate innovative practice, it's challenging to know how to define the specific guidelines because by definition it's going to be ill defined; hence, the regulatory sandbox. That is, in fact, the guardrails, Mr. Speaker.

As I said, there are models and best practices that we can use, that we can look to as examples that have worked in other jurisdictions. In Canada there's currently a regulatory sandbox in place for the securities industry, for example. Other countries are also using regulatory sandboxes as tools to drive innovation and economic growth while providing that safety within the sandbox, those guardrails.

Alberta would be the first province in Canada to establish a regulatory sandbox for the finance and fintech sector, giving companies additional ways to grow their business and create jobs. It will help financial-related companies expand their offerings to create new jobs right here in Alberta while preparing for Canada's launch of open banking.

We want Alberta to be ahead of the curve, Mr. Speaker, not behind. A regulatory sandbox would provide time-limited exemptions from the following legislation and related regulations: the Loan and Trust Corporations Act, the Credit Union Act, the ATB Financial Act, the Financial Consumers Act, the Consumer Protection Act, and, finally, the Personal Information Protection Act.

Specific exemptions would depend on what kind of relief each applicant is seeking and whether or not the government can safely provide those exemptions as requested. This would be determined on a case-by-case basis as the government needs the flexibility to weigh the relative merits and risks of each application. All legislative exemptions would be disclosed publicly. There's one safeguard there. We believe this will be a strong incentive for fintech companies to move to Alberta and create jobs here, with the added benefit of further diversifying our economy and adding to our growing reputation as a hub for world-class financial services and fintech companies.

To help review applications, the government has formed a working group, including officials from the following: Treasury Board and Finance, Jobs, Economy and Innovation, and Service Alberta as the ministries responsible for some of the related acts. The office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner would also be consulted on exemptions to the Personal Information Protection Act, and their approval would be required for exemptions to proceed, another safeguard for Albertans and consumers in general. The office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner was consulted during the development of the legislation, and the feedback they provided has been incorporated into the drafting of the legislation.

Successful applicants would have to meet all of the following main criteria. First, they would be required to maintain a physical presence in Alberta. In other words, they would need to have an office in Alberta or staff living here in Alberta. Second, the regulatory sandbox would only be for companies that offer financial products or services. Third, applicants must adequately explain why the product or service should be considered new or a material improvement to an existing product or service. Applicants would not receive exemption for products or services that are already offered in Alberta by other companies. Lastly, applicants would have to provide a sound and viable business plan for the testing of a financial product or service. The plan must also demonstrate how they plan to exit the sandbox given that participation would be time limited as defined in the legislation.

I want to assure all members that consumer protection is strongly represented in this legislation, which is specifically designed to ensure companies participating in this regulatory sandbox are held to high professional standards and meet specified eligibility requirements.

These criteria: for example, participating companies may be subject to additional terms, conditions, and restrictions such as consulting a qualified expert or auditor, limiting the number of customers who can purchase the product or service being tested during the testing phase, having adequate capital on hand to support the venture, providing proof of appropriate insurance coverage, implementing specific financial security or surety requirements to mitigate risk and losses, developing new risk management policies and procedures, or having a way for customers to voice concerns and get them resolved, a mechanism for consumer protection and consumer feedback to be captured within the sandbox.

Mr. Speaker, the Financial Innovation Act signals that Alberta is willing to work with innovators and businesses seeking to offer innovative products and technologies. Alberta is willing to allow access to our residents these services, leading the way for Canada. Alberta's regulatory sandbox would provide a strong incentive for financial services and fintech companies to move to Alberta. This would add to Alberta's many other advantages in attracting new business, and it would do so without compromising consumer protection or government oversight. In fact, the sandbox would foster open and constructive dialogue between the government and companies seeking to enter the market. I think this is unique, because this would help those companies get a better sense of the rules and regulations as they exist and open a new pathway for them to become fully regulated market participants.

Mr. Speaker, the world of finance is rapidly evolving, and our government understands that we need to partner with businesses if Alberta is going to stay ahead of the curve. Cutting red tape and making it easier to do business in Alberta is a crucial part of our strategy to grow the economy, to support job creation, and to make Alberta the best place to live, work, and raise a family. I would encourage, therefore, all members of the Assembly to support Bill 13.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will cede the rest of my time. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to the Financial Innovation Act, and I want to start by saying that if the goals of this bill are to grow and diversify the economy, if they are truly to support innovation, then I think that we probably have some alignment and some agreement on where we want to move. The biggest issue with this bill, however, is that it requires a high degree of trust, trust that the regulation-making process or the regulatory sandbox, as referred to, is going to actually protect consumers, and putting these powers through regulation certainly requires consumers to have trust that the government is actually going to act in their best interests.

What we've seen for the last three years is a disregard for that, a disregard for the public money that is invested by the people of Alberta in their government to be able to make prudent financial decisions on their behalf, decisions that should be working toward economic diversification, toward creating a strong, diversified economy with jobs that people can count on to pay their mortgage. What we have seen is a significant reduction in the number of full-time jobs in this province, jobs that people can raise a family off.

The government seems to chase short-term headlines and sacrifice long-term prosperity, so while we have tremendous partners working to ensure a strong reputation nationally and internationally when it comes to emissions and responsible leadership around energy development, we have a provincial government that chooses instead to pick fights regularly with parties that are superfluous to the actual activities of the industry.

For the government to continue to put money into what they refer to as an energy war room while also gambling more than a billion dollars, at least $1.3 billion, on a pipeline that doesn't exist based on the government's hopeful prediction that Donald Trump would win the last U.S. presidential election is completely irresponsible and demonstrates just a couple of the reasons why Albertans have lost trust in this UCP government.

Trust is the key issue here. I have to say that I don't think that there are issues with what we've been told the goals of the bill are. I think that the goals, if they are indeed around supporting more innovation and economic diversification, are things that we in the NDP have been championing for decades and wanting to make sure that we have a strong, diversified economy. But this government has shown time and time again that – the Minister of Finance, the sponsor of this bill, for example, said that diversification was a luxury that we just couldn't afford.

Well, Mr. Speaker, many would argue that we can't afford not to diversify, that we must make sure that we have robust sectors, including the energy sector, traditional energy, of course, being a big piece of that but other types of energy, including renewables, including hydrogen. The hydrogen conference is happening right now here in Edmonton; 4,000 people downtown talking about an industry that we can be leaders in, and we know that the government didn't want us there to talk to people about what the actual vision is for our province and for the energy sector as it relates to hydrogen.

We should be working in partnership across the aisle and with industry and with investors from a variety of sectors to make sure that we can continue to be energy leaders in, of course, oil and gas but also in other spinoff energy opportunities that we have. We also need to be diversifying the economy in other areas, so significant investment in tech and in other growing sectors would be a wise investment from the people of Alberta in ensuring that we continue to have a strong and growing economy.

The fact that this bill asks this Assembly to put such a high degree of trust in cabinet to develop regulations that will deliver when, I would say, arguably, when you look at the history of Alberta, there's probably the least amount of trust in this cabinet of any government caucus that I've seen in the last at least 30 years . . .

Mr. Yao: Go back to 2015-19.

Ms Hoffman: I didn't catch that.

Mr. Yao: I said: look back to 2015 to 2019. You'll see an untrustworthy cabinet.

The Acting Speaker: Through the chair, hon. members.

Please continue.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, the fact that we have, arguably, the most untrustworthy cabinet, from its own government caucus, that we've seen in at least 30 years in this province, the fact that we have a government that is creating legislation that requires them to do the bulk of the work through regulation rather than having the open, transparent process that this Assembly offers through three full readings and proper debate, publication of the actual legislation prior to its passing, the fact that the current cabinet is calling on their caucus and all members of this Assembly to trust them when this is the least trustworthy government in Canada and probably in Alberta's history I think begs a lot of questions around whether or not we should trust the government to actually follow through on what they are saying the intent of this bill is.

With all of that being in mind, Mr. Speaker, I'm inclined – because I want to be able to have faith that the government will do what they say they are going to do, and I also have faith that there will be an election. There must be an election at some point within the next year. According to the law it will be next May. We'll see if this Conservative government decides to follow the law or not, but there will be an election and there will be a new cabinet, and at that time I imagine there will be a higher degree of trust and confidence in the cabinet of the government of Alberta to deliver on the intended goals as outlined through Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act.

With that in mind, I am inclined at this point to support this bill in its current iteration, but I do look forward to continued discussion of the legislation, specifically the government trying to restore some trust, because it certainly has been hindered significantly by the actions of the current government.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for St. Albert has stood up.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 13, Financial Innovation Act. Certainly, as my colleagues have said, there are a lot of positive aspects to this bill, and I, too, would like to go on the record to say I'll more than likely support this bill and, you know, hope for the best. I think it's important to support innovation, but there are a lot of concerns and questions that still remain, so instead of chirping about all kinds of things, perhaps this government will actually listen to the genuine questions and concerns that we have and genuinely bring back some information that will cause us to have more confidence in this bill. I think if that was the case, that we did have more confidence in this bill, we would not continue to hammer away at the same questions.

These actually are questions. The themes of these questions we ask frequently, because this government has been unable or unwilling – I'm not sure which; maybe both – to stand up and answer the questions and provide Albertans with some sort of reassurance that they actually can be trusted and that passing this legislation will mean that, you know, they will do the things that they suggest that they will do.

In any event, there are some things. You know, the substance of the legislation: there are a number of points that I'd like to make. First of all, the power to exempt new financial products from consumer protection laws. The concern, of course, is that exemption from the consumer protection laws can be abused, and you would hope that most governments would not set out to do that; however, this government doesn't have a great track record of actually putting consumers, Albertans, first and putting their interests first, so it would be terrific to get more reassurance. We know that it's critical, that consumer protection is critical, particularly when traditional safeguards are not in place, and with these being such new and innovative pieces of legislation and products, I would suggest that that would be even more important in this case, to provide consumers with some reassurance.

The second thing for this plan I think to really work is to have a bureaucracy with the technical capacity and sophistication to understand the new and innovative ideas and to regulate them properly. Now, I wasn't at the technical briefing, Mr. Speaker, but I understand that there was a discussion around this. That's not to say that it's a bad thing, that every ministry or every organization has every skill and ability that is required to go forward into the future. That's not a bad thing. It's actually a great thing to identify when there are weaknesses or holes and new skills that maybe you should recruit for, you know, to give Albertans some reassurance that perhaps the technical capacity or experience isn't there. "What are the steps this government will take?" instead of "Just trust us; we've got this": I think it would go a long way to reassure Albertans.

You know, I'm sure members know this, that Albertans just do not have a lot of faith in this government. And when you don't have trust, you have fear and you have an unwillingness to go forward and really listen to anything. We saw that repeatedly with COVID, Mr. Speaker. As we continued to see wave after wave, we saw the trust in government just – it was diminished. The government may have been saying really useful things, really positive things, but a lot of Albertans were just tuned out because they felt that they could not trust what was being said. So that is second.

Third – I think my colleague did mention this earlier – is that, you know, Albertans and Canadians in general rightly have a great deal of trust in their financial institutions. I think we're all fairly confident that what we deposit or what we invest with our financial institutions: that things won't change too much, that they won't instantly go bankrupt, and that we have some security. I think additional measures and transparency are indeed required to ensure that risks are never passed on to Albertans and consumers.

Finally, there is a legitimate concern with public disclosure. Government is telling the public that any company with a certificate and operating within this sandbox or expanded sandbox will be listed on a government website. That's pretty much it: on a government website. Well, I mean, I don't know about you, Mr. Speaker, but there are a few government websites that I frequently check, and sometimes, for no reason at all, information just goes – it's just gone, and there's no reason, there's no rhyme as to why it's gone or changed. So I think that Albertans need more than: check the government website. For one, most Albertans aren't sort of as tuned in as we are to what is happening. They aren't checking for updates, they aren't getting all the press releases, and they aren't going back daily to see what's up, so I think it would be really good to have some clear information. You know, just going on to the government website doesn't really say much at all. It doesn't give any kind of reassurance at all.

Let me give you a quick example that happened recently. For the entire time that I have, you know, been the opposition critic for Community and Social Services, one of the things that I do fairly regularly is check in with open data. There are a few things that I check. A couple of them are wait-lists. There are two, actually, fairly large programs that combined are worth close to $2 billion. I would suggest that's pretty significant. Both of these programs, thankfully, used to publish information about their waiting lists. Now, it's a little bit tricky because most people just looking at it wouldn't understand that it's a waiting list because they don't call it a waiting list. They call it in service or in planning or, you know, waiting for a caseworker, whatever, but it's actually a wait-list. There are different tiers of the wait-list.

I was checking it, and then it was gone. It was just gone. I asked the minister, you know: what's up with the family support for children with disabilities wait-list? Last time I checked, there were about 4,000 children/families in there waiting for service. That means that perhaps they were in planning, perhaps they were waiting to be assigned a caseworker, but they were still waiting for services. And the minister said: yeah, there's no longer a wait-list. Poof. Gone. My example, my story is just to illustrate that to tell someone, anyone, "Just trust us; check the website" really is not good enough, not good enough at all.

There were a couple of other questions, I think, to raise in debate. Hopefully, at some point somebody will stand up and provide some information or some answers. One of the questions that I thought was really important is: how will consumers know when they are using a new product or service or technology that is operating within this sandbox and therefore is regulated at a much lower level, as I mentioned? Is the government prepared to consider some type of warning label so that consumers actually know what they're getting into? You know, like my colleague for Edmonton-Whitemud, on numerous occasions I listen to different experts, different podcasts about these products to try to understand: what are the benefits? What are the opposite of the benefits? What are the dangers? What are the risks? Trying to understand it – and obviously things are changing so rapidly that it is actually quite difficult to follow. I think in order to get Albertans as excited about using these products as I'm assuming the government would like, why not provide some more information for Albertans?

Going back to some of the earlier comments, as I said, this is, obviously, a piece of legislation that, if done correctly and it's the right time for it, could actually go a long way to support innovation and to continue to grow and diversify the economy. I think that, regardless of what side of the House we sit on, we all have the same goal in that area. I think that when the economy is strong and flourishing, it's good for everybody. I would hope that, you know, our comments here – we do want to support this legislation, but it would be really terrific to get additional information.

Now, I really would like to say that the thing that troubles me the most is that – basically, my biggest concern with this legislation is that we're being asked to just trust this government. This piece of legislation gives enormous abilities to the minister, and this government has just an awful, awful track record in this department, the Finance minister in particular. As a part of the Public Accounts Committee I could go on sort of for a very long time on what, you know, some of the issues are. There are so many times that this government has said, "Trust us; no, we're not doing it for a bad reason; we're doing it to help Albertans and make life better" when we know that is incorrect. We bring evidence. We show them the information that is accurate, and still – and still – they refuse to see what's right in front of them until sometimes they're called out by the Auditor General.

Let me give you an example. In 2020, I believe it was, the Treasury Board and Finance – well, Community and Social Services; I blame them squarely, but both ministries, let's say – decided that they were going to change payment dates for people that receive income support and AISH. Traditionally people receive these payments a few days ahead of the first of the month. Now, it's a little bit chaotic and sometimes a little bit tough to tell when that would be because it was always really different. I'll admit that it wasn't a uniform date. It was always a little bit different, particularly in December. It was quite a bit before Christmas, so that would leave a longer period of time into January before people got their payment. Without very much notice at all – I don't think it could've been more than maybe a month and a half at the time; actually, people found out on social media – they were told that their payment dates were going to change. "It's for your own good," says the government. "It's for your own good. We're doing this because we care about you."

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Hear, hear.

Ms Renaud: That's not true. That is incorrect. The Member for Calgary-Klein thinks it's a good idea that they changed the payment dates and actually believes, according to his heckle, that they did change the payment dates to help Albertans, when we know it is not true.

We know that people struggled. They didn't get their payments until the first of the month. People couldn't pay their rent on time. They could not buy their bus passes to be able to ride the bus on the 1st. So many examples all over the place we saw instantly when those payment dates were changed. Now, it was so bad that we wrote a letter to the Auditor General, and we asked them to look at this. The problem was that the UCP was trying to make their bottom line look better than it actually was by putting some expense – actually, over $150 million worth of expense – into the next year. They actually booked 11 months of 12 months for expense for income support and AISH. That is wrong. You're not allowed to do that, so there had to be a correction. There was actually a special auditor's report. So for the Member for Calgary-Klein to say, "Hear, hear" when I talk about the payment date changes, either he's just, like, tuned out or has no idea what he's talking about. You know, Mr. Speaker, I don't get it.

That is just one teeny, tiny example of why Albertans don't trust this government. So when the Finance minister . . . [interjection] Sorry?

Mr. Luan: Can I have a chance to intervene?

Ms Renaud: Intervene? No. Thank you.

The other thing. You know, just this morning, actually, another good example of the lack of trust is that the government told Albertans to trust them about auto insurance: just trust us. We were asking questions: "Where is that report from the superintendent of insurance? Why after 107 years are we not seeing this report being released on time?" "Oh, just trust us. No problem. Don't even worry about it." Well, it turns out that during a pandemic, when Albertans were struggling – they were struggling, Mr. Speaker. They were struggling to pay their premiums. They weren't driving their cars like they were.

We knew – I mean, we didn't know for sure at the time, but we could anticipate that profits were likely going to be higher because there were fewer accidents, fewer cars on the road. I can remember during that first wave going to St. Albert and my office and actually taking a picture of the streets. I stood there. There were no vehicles at all, whatsoever. So it didn't take much for us to put it together to think there are likely going to be fewer payouts because there are fewer people driving for fewer hours. It kind of made sense.

So we didn't see that report. "Where is the report? What are you hiding?" It turns out that what was being hidden from Albertans was a huge amount of profit. The profit margin was huge during this pandemic.

Mr. Luan: Not true.

Ms Renaud: You know, they can chirp, whatever, and just say that it's not true. It's factual. It's in the report. It's actually factual. If the member would like to continue to be Trumpy and allege alternate facts, that's fine. Albertans know the truth. The truth is in the report, Mr. Speaker. The report was very clear.

So that is a second example. I mean, I could go on for the next week about the ongoing examples of why this government can't be trusted.

Now, we appreciate this piece of legislation that wants to go in a new place. What we're saying is that this government needs to be very clear and stand up and talk about what consumer protections will be in place and what you are going to do . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has risen.

Member Irwin: Wonderful. Thank you. Very hard to follow that. I think I can speak for everyone on this side when I say that I'm absolutely shocked that, again, no one from the UCP is willing to stand, but they are willing to continue to beak at us nonstop, including Calgary-Klein, Leduc-Beaumont.

Ms Pancholi: The associate minister.

Member Irwin: The associate minister. Anyways, the list goes on.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, we are currently debating the bill. I would look to the hon. member to please direct her comments towards the bill and the debate at hand.

Thank you very much.

Member Irwin: Wonderful. Yes. Absolutely. I am very happy to speak quite briefly to Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act. I just, you know, need to get it on the record that it is quite surprising that we're not hearing from any of the government members other than heckles.

You know, I won't speak long, as they continue to heckle, but I did want to just quickly touch on a couple of points around Bill 13. My colleagues have done a fantastic job, particularly my colleague who just spoke. It's always hard to follow the Member for St. Albert, because she did an excellent job of unpacking some of the broader concerns around trust in this government.

I've done some reading on this, and I must admit I am certainly not an expert in this area, in the fintech, financial technology, sector, but I always want to learn. When I heard about a sandbox, I thought: "That's fun. Let's go play in the sandbox." But, in fact, it's a regulatory sandbox. A regulatory sandbox is a safe space in which companies can test innovative products or services without immediately meeting all regulatory requirements. Wow. There's a lot there although I do find it interesting that this government is supportive of safe spaces in some regards, just not in schools.

I want to just highlight that, you know, we've said, my colleagues have said that we are on the record in support, broadly, of this bill. Obviously, I was not a part of it when we were in government, but I was proud to see the work that the NDP government did when it comes to supporting the fintech sector and the tech sector broadly. I think about some of the investments that the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, when he was minister, made to really expand those sectors and to attract talent to our province.

I find it hypocritical, you know, to hear the government speak and in reading their media releases on this, speaking about how this will help to entice people, fintech companies, to move to Alberta – more competition, lower costs, all these buzzwords – yet this is the same government that wasn't willing to support my colleague's private member's bill on creating a venture capital fund that would do something similar, obviously not in the same sector per se but would also have a focus on innovating and attracting investment and getting folks to move to our province. It was quite, quite disheartening to hear.

I know my colleague – I just want to get it on the record on his behalf – did a whole lot of consulting with folks on this bill. I also know that he spoke – and he shared this in the Chamber the other day; that was yesterday, in fact; time is confusing; that was just yesterday; it feels like we haven't left – in the debate on concurrence and explained that he's actually spoken to a number of UCP MLAs about this bill and had a lot of support, but when we came to the Chamber, unfortunately they were unwilling to support it.

Again, while we are broadly, generally supportive of Bill 13, I find it rich that this government isn't willing to support bills that come from our side of the House. You know, we've talked a lot about the fact that a private member's bill is a privilege, yet we've seen consistently from this government a refusal to support any bill that comes from the NDP. That one on tech: shot down. Another one, on antiracism, from my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre: shot down. Again, I need to get that on the record.

I won't speak too much more on the concerns on Bill 13 because I know that many of my colleagues have. I just want to summarize my remarks by noting again that our concerns here are around trust; you know, trusting this government that they can protect consumers – right? – that they can protect privacy when it comes to some of the specifics around Bill 13. As we've outlined, as my colleagues have outlined in a far more eloquent way than I can, this is a government that has a track record of a lack of trust.

We'd like to hear – I haven't had an opportunity to hear from government members just around some of the ways in which they are going to guarantee consumer protections, how they're going to guarantee consumer safety. You know, as noted, we absolutely respect that this is an innovative approach, and as noted, it's one that has happened in jurisdictions globally, but we've not seen – I believe it was the Member for Grande Prairie who pointed out, too, that this would make Alberta the first provincial jurisdiction to play in the regulatory sandbox, so to speak. We just want some assurance from that side of the House that consumers and Albertans will be protected.

With that, I will end my remarks. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate?

Seeing none, I am prepared to ask the question, noting that the opportunity to close debate has been waived.

[Motion carried; Bill 13 read a second time]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. members. I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 12 Trustee Act

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered at this time? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has risen.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'm pleased to rise and speak today to Bill 12, which is a new Trustee Act. I would like to say that generally we are supportive of this. I am, obviously, familiar with the Trustee Act and the trustee system. In, I'm going to say, 2017 or 2018 this department was moved from – what was it at the time? – Community and Social Services into Justice, so there was actually quite a lot going on at that time. It probably needed a new act.

We had recommendations, I think, from the Uniform Law Conference that ultimately moved over to the Alberta Law Reform Institute. Both of these organizations, incidentally, Mr. Chair, deserve a lot of praise for the amazing work they do. The Uniform Law Conference of Canada makes recommendations in terms of, essentially, standardizing laws across Canada. A lot of these are laws which are applicable in each jurisdiction, and obviously it can be deeply confusing to people who move from one area to another and the law changes for no obvious reason, just for sort of historical context factors. You know, it was done that way in that particular province and always has been that way.

So the Uniform Law Conference makes a lot of recommendations that make laws better, that ensure sort of proportionality and fairness, that deal with laws that have for whatever reason not struck the correct balance, or, you know, society itself is evolving at a considerable rate. Sometimes those changes – for instance, technological changes – can have an impact on the way the law operates, and the Uniform Law Conference of Canada makes recommendations in terms of ensuring that the laws keep pace but also in terms of ensuring that the laws are uniform, as the name would imply, across Canada.

I had the opportunity to work with them on some recommendations they made around criminal justice systems that were discussed at federal-provincial-territorial meetings, which is sort of where the federal Justice minister and the provincial Justice ministers get together and talk. There's kind of a joint jurisdiction. The federal government has the Criminal Code, and the provinces have administration of justice, so if everybody doesn't work together, things don't work exceptionally well.

Yeah, there were a lot of changes that needed to be made. I think that the importance of making those changes and the speed at which those changes needed to be made were brought to bear by the Jordan decision at one point, but I didn't want it to go by without acknowledging the incredible work that they do. Now, they made recommendations, and those recommendations were sort of considered by the ministry and by the Alberta Law Reform Institute in the Alberta context in terms of how they could be implemented here, and ALRI made recommendations with respect to this act as well.

I would also like to take a moment to talk about the fantastic work that the Alberta Law Reform Institute does and to do a thing that we don't see often in this place and say that I am really glad to see that the Minister of Justice – I don't think it was the current one. I think it was the Minister of Justice who is now the minister of labour. But the grant to ALRI was restored. When this government came into office, they cut the grant to ALRI, and the grant to ALRI was restored in the last Justice budget, and I was really glad to see that because the Alberta Law Reform Institute does really, really great work. You heard it here first. There is one instance in which you see a member of the NDP opposition actually saying that the government managed to get something right. I was glad to see that grant restored. I am glad to see that ALRI can go forward and continue to do the work that they do, and I'm glad to see the government sort of moving forward to recommend implementation on that.

Now, that being said, I do have a couple of questions that I'm hoping can be answered. One of them isn't directly about the act itself. One of the projects that was under way, shall we say, when the government change occurred was a project to get a new computer system in. That system isn't actually funded directly through the government. It's sort of funded through a mechanism the trustee's office has itself in terms of collecting money to ensure that the trustee's office can continue to run. That computer system had had – there had been an RFP process that didn't quite work out, so the system hadn't gone in yet.

I feel like in the first budget we saw out of this government, I didn't see that computer system in there. Even though it isn't government public funds that are necessarily going in – it's funds that are gotten through the office of the trustee that go to fund that – it does sort of flow through the government books because of consolidated budgeting.

I'd be interested to know if that project had gone ahead and how it went and whether that's been implemented. That was a really, in my view, important piece of this, the technology, ensuring modern technology and proper security. When we're talking about the office of the public guardian and trustee, they have information about people, people's private information. That information is sensitive. Yeah. I'd be interested to know how that went.

I'd also be interested to know how this squares with recommendations that came out of the office of the Auditor General. I actually don't say this to be partisan or to be difficult for the government. I'm aware, again – this office came to me with some recommendations from the Auditor General already that had not been addressed, and these are challenging issues. They really are. I don't for a second minimize the sort of difficulties in terms of addressing the recommendations.

That being said, I think the Auditor General is right. I think the recommendations are correct and that they do need to be addressed and that it is worth moving forward on this, so I am seeing a report from March 22, 2022, that is published on the Auditor General's website, that indicates that some of those have not been addressed yet.

Now, admittedly, it is a recommendation. The recommendation is to improve and follow policies and procedures. This recommendation is being repeated at this time.

We recommend that the Office of the Public Guardian and Trustee:

- review and assess whether its policies are appropriate, and procedures are adequate to mitigate the risk that client assets could be mismanaged
- improve [the] processes for ensuring compliance with policies and procedures.

I think it goes without saying that everyone in this room is likely familiar with the office of the public guardian and trustee, but they deal with very sensitive matters for very vulnerable clients. It is, obviously, extremely important. Now, I'm not saying that that means it's easy. Something can be important and also be difficult, and this is an issue which, in my experience, is quite complicated and quite difficult. I suspect I may be throwing the minister a softball here because I suspect that the implementation of this act is part of responding to these recommendations.

Generally the way it works is that you've got an act, you've got regulations, and then you've got policies. If your policies aren't working, it could be the policies themselves, or it could be either of the two levels above that. If your policies aren't working, it could be the policies. It could also be the regulations. It could also be the legislation.

It may be the case that this is, in fact, an answer to that question, this act itself, but I would love to hear the minister or someone from the government address that and explain how this addresses this recommendation from the office of the Auditor General and sort of what subsequent actions will be taken. I assume there will be development of regulation, but I'd be interested to know sort of where those are in the process. That is one of the questions I have about this.

I also have a question around some of the definitions in the act. One of the recommendations – sorry; I've got a lot of windows open here – from the Alberta Law Reform Institute, specifically recommendation 11:

The new [trustee] Act should provide that a “represented adult” means: a represented adult under the Adult Guardianship and Trusteeship Act; an incapacitated person under the Public Trustee Act; or any person for whom an enduring power of attorney or personal directive is in effect.

That definition is not in this act, and I would be interested to know why that is. In light of the substance of the act, in light of the material that is covered, it seems like “represented adult” would be something you would want to define.

I am curious, I would say, as to why that isn't in here. In fact, “represented adult” is not defined at all. The majority of the definitions here are in section 1, so unless it's defined, and it may be the case – sometimes this happens, that it's defined elsewhere in the act, but not that I have found. So I would like to know why it's not defined – I think, at first flush, it ought to be defined – and specifically why it isn't defined in this way. My understanding of the history of this matter is that the consultation that was done sort of leading up to this particular report was done jointly by the Alberta Law Reform Institute and the Ministry of Justice and Solicitor General. I assume they had input into these recommendations, into what questions were asked, into how this was dealt with. I'd be really interested to know why that is the case.

I would also be interested to know, and again, I'm hoping – it's committee, so everyone can kind of jump up as they see fit in response to whatever. I would like to know if there are any other recommendations in here that weren't implemented, and I would be interested to know potentially why that is, because I think, again, that ALRI does really good work. I mean, that isn't to say that governments have never, for good and solid reasons, deviated from the recommendations. I'm not by any means suggesting that this is the end of it. I just think that it raises an interesting question of why it is that such a sort of critical and central term to the subject matter before us, to the act itself, would not be defined in the act. I would love to know that.

In addition, the government has kind of brought this forward as: this will free up some court time. I don't question that, actually, at all. I suspect that that's probably true. I think it would be interesting to know how much court time they think that would free up, if there's some sort of estimate on that. It's been kind of my experience that when you move things out of the court, other matters come in. I mean, God, it's been probably 20 years that the backlogs have been building in the court system at this point. It is a difficult issue, but I'd like to know how much of a contribution we expect this to be. There are, obviously, initiatives.

Again, this is one of those interesting areas where there are a lot of bipartisan initiatives, right? We started the e-courts project. We brought in criminal e-file. You know, that was fairly far down the chute, and this government continued that. They continued sort of moving forward with that. Now, obviously, even if you're filing things electronically, like, the document itself still has to align with the letter of the law, so you're still going to need a court clerk to look it over, whether it's coming in electronically or otherwise, but, I mean, those things do sort of move things along. They bring things up.

I can remember instances – I think that anyone who has ever practised law has encountered these instances – where the file didn't wind up in the right courtroom, so presumably rather than having paper files running around through the elevators and coming in and out from the doors behind buildings, having things electronically available in the courtroom, that you just have to access, would probably resolve a lot of those issues and make things easier, because if something wound up in the wrong courtroom, it did tend to take a while to resolve.

I think, you know, again, this is an issue that I don't think is particularly partisan; it's an issue that I think is important to Albertans moving forward. With that, I think I will just say that those are the questions I have. I hope we receive answers. Just to sort of sum up, the things I asked about were: whether, in fact, that new technology computer system has been successfully implemented, as I think that's an important part of this; whether or not this act and the regulations and policy that will follow will, in the minister's estimation, address the concerns of the Auditor General, which are still outstanding, and some recommendations which were repeated just last month, because I think that that is important as well; what the minister thinks the time frame is on that; and how much we expect this to help in terms of the court backlog. Oh, and – see, it's a good thing that I've summed up; even I forgot the last question. Also, why it is that it doesn't include a definition of a represented adult and, specifically, why it doesn't include the definition in recommendation 11 of the Alberta Law Reform Institute report.

With that, Mr. Chair, I will take my seat and thank you for this opportunity. Oh, I think we'll be probably supporting this bill. I should maybe mention that.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Chair. A pleasure to rise in committee on Bill 12, the Trustee Act. Always a pleasure to follow after my colleague the former Minister of Justice to talk about the Trustee Act. It's a bit daunting to do that, and I'm sure that those who are following this debate closely will remember my very riveting comments at second reading on Bill 12, the Trustee Act. But I do think it's important to reiterate at the committee stage here, where we do have a bit more informality and can get a little bit more into the nitty-gritty, that generally speaking, as the Member for Calgary-Mountain View so very aptly concluded her comments by saying, we are likely to support this bill. It actually seems to be, you know, a much-needed modernization and transformation of what really was very old codification of very old English legislation around trustees, long overdue, I think, for modernization.

It appears – this is the work that I'm still working through, because it's not a small piece of legislation and it is a brand new act, that work of comparing what's in Bill 12 to what, predominantly, I think, the proposed bill is based on, which is the recommendations coming out of the Alberta Law Reform Institute and their recommendations which were developed. There are 90 of them. I think that, actually, the last time I spoke at second reading, I kind of gave an overview about seven or eight of the recommendations, but there are 90 recommendations in that report around changes that could be made and should be implemented for trustee legislation in Alberta.

Now, not all of those recommendations but a large majority of them are based on work that had been done by the Uniform Law Conference of Canada in 2012. Obviously, this issue of modernizing trustee legislation is not unique to Alberta, so at that conference they laid out sort of draft legislation that could be used by any jurisdiction to kind of implement some basic principles, most of which have been developed through common law and were well understood by those who practise in this area of law and those who might have a trust to, you know, really standardize what those provisions would look like. Of course, the Alberta Law Reform Institute took that and applied it to the more specific Alberta circumstances and developed these 90 recommendations.

Now, as I understand it, the bill that's before us, Bill 12, the Trustee Act, incorporates roughly 80 out of those 90 recommendations. This is what I understand. Again, going back and comparing them, the recommendations to each provision of the act: I will confess that I have not done that in detail. But what I do note right off the top: just looking at it and understanding that even when it's been introduced by ministers on the other side or even by members on behalf of ministers, as what happened in second reading, it does appear that a number of the key recommendations have been incorporated into the bill. You know, I think it's important to note which those are.

Perhaps for those following along who are very riveted by this discussion of the Trustee Act, I mean, again, a trust is essentially, basically, an individual or a settlor who assigns a trust and says that somebody else will be responsible for managing their property and assets to the benefit of a certain other individual, named the beneficiary. You know, we are kind of familiar with that concept. The reason why it's called a trust is that there is a lot of trust within that relationship. Somebody is bestowing upon another person the ability to make those decisions about their property, but those decisions have to be made in a certain way. Sometimes the settlor might actually be very specific about what those conditions may be, but then the law is also specific about, in some respects, how that can be used and how that must be exercised.

Those recommendations – I note, for example, that probably one of the key issues, sort the guiding principle behind trustee legislation and the way it has been implemented to date, is, of course, that there is the prudent investor rule, which is basically that, you know, the person who is managing the trust must do so to the standard of a prudent investor. So they have some due diligence that they're required to meet. I think that clearly was the way we've been treating trusts within this province for many years, for decades and maybe over a century, actually, but now it's clear in the legislation that that prudent investor rule will continue to apply to trusts, which is important.

One of the pieces that I note – well, I can't seem to tell whether or not, actually, in the bill it is clearly defined. It does still set out the sort of standard of care, which is, you know, the expertise level that must be met by trustees. It says that a trustee must exercise ordinary care and diligence when dealing with trust property, so there are expectations around reading the documents, having a good familiarity with them, seeking more information where you need it, basically, exercising that relationship with due care and diligence.

However, I believe that under the Alberta Law Reform Institute recommendations they actually recommended a two-tier standard of care so that the average trustee – which could be, honestly, any person, right? It depends on the wishes of somebody. It could be that an average person without any specialized expertise whatsoever would be expected to exercise that ordinary diligence and care. However, if the trustee is a professional, perhaps a professional financial manager, maybe has unique skills, those professional trustees must actually exercise a higher degree of skill. So it's two-tiered. It's basically saying: well, who you are determines what your expectations are in terms of managing this trust. I'm not sure that I see that reflected in Bill 12.

I think that goes back to a question that I asked at second reading of this bill. I have not yet heard a response about if the government members or the ministers could set out which of those 90 recommendations were not accepted, the 90 recommendations from the Alberta Law Reform Institute, and why they weren't accepted. As well, I believe there were a number of comments where those recommendations were varied. An appreciation of sort of which of those specific recommendations were accepted, which were varied, which were not accepted, and perhaps the why would be informative.

I see there are a number of other pieces in here that, again, were part of the recommendations; for example, that where there's more than one trustee appointed, they can make decisions by a majority, that unanimous approval by action does not require to involve the trustees. I think that's, you know, simplicity in being able to move forward in a timely way on issues that require unanimous consent from all trustees.

You know, I see that the bill has provisions around appointing temporary trustees, about how to use and apply extrinsic evidence to determine what the settlor's intent was. The settlor, again, is a person who sort of created the trust or appointed the trust. Oftentimes there may be debate about, "Well, what was their intent?" especially if they set some conditions as to how the trust must be exercised. So how to determine what the settlor's intent was, especially if the settlor is no longer around and able to speak to that: I understand that the bill does that.

Now, of course, we know that overall the intent of this bill is to codify and simplify and modernize trustee legislation, but also a key objective is to minimize the amount of time that trusts are being dealt with, negotiated, you know, mediated in the court system, essentially, to free up time in the court system. Of course, that is an objective that in all circumstances we would support. The idea of if matters can be resolved outside of the court system: that's a good principle to begin with. It increases access to justice. People being able to resolve their disputes without incurring significant costs and resources: always a good thing.

However, you know, I do want to note – I think it is worth noting, because it is something that, certainly when we're talking about freeing up the court system, is a very pressing issue in Alberta right now. I would love to hear some concrete actions being taken by this government around the issue of the almost 3,000 cases that are at risk of being thrown out for undue time under the Jordan ruling in Alberta right now. We know that there are almost 3,000 cases that are at risk, and of those 3,000 cases 1,200 of them are for serious violent offences that may be thrown out of the court system, thrown out altogether – the charges may be thrown out – because of the undue delay in them being heard in the court system.

Now, I say that we know that there are 3,000; however, it should be pointed out that apparently the current Justice minister did not know that. He actually went on the record and said that he believed that there were no cases that were currently subject to the Jordan ruling, which turned out, with a quick reference check by many of the many lawyers who work in this field, to be untrue and incorrect. There's actually, as I mentioned, almost 3,000 cases. It's a pretty critical thing for our Justice minister to have a good handle on the current caseloads and those at risk of being thrown out as a result of undue delay. I certainly hope that the Justice minister has done his homework and will actually be addressing this concern.

Now, a key way to address that, Mr. Chair, of course, is the challenge of not having enough prosecutors. We have certainly – well, I recall, not so fondly perhaps, that very early on in this government's term there was a lot of bombastic chest beating about all the prosecutors they were hiring. I believe the then Minister of Justice, who's known for speaking at a high volume, was very emphatic and enthusiastic, talking about all the prosecutors they were going to be hiring. It turns out that that has not taken place. In fact, this is why we're facing the situation, again, of almost 3,000 cases of charges – criminal charges, Provincial Court charges, and charges of potentially violent offences – that may be thrown out.

You know, I think we have to again look at the fact that there is a – the current government is not acting as if they've been the ones who've been in power for the last three years. They're still wanting to point fingers to the past, but they are now responsible for the state of things in this province, particularly when it comes to an overexerted and overstretched justice system and court system. In many other respects – the strain on our public health care system, the undermining of our public education system, you know, all of those pieces, Mr. Chair – it's actually now this government's responsibility. They have been in power for three years although it feels like they spent most of that time in fighting with each other.

I appreciate that this act will come forward and may do some of the work to sort of alleviate some pressure on the court system. A lot more work needs to be done, Mr. Chair. I do certainly hope that the current government caucus members can take their attention away from the soap opera drama that is their current political lives and dedicate some, just a fraction, of that attention to the pressing needs of Albertans.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to join? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has risen.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I rise this afternoon to speak to Bill 12, the Trustee Act, in committee. I'm not sure if others in the House have noted yet, but I am the first male speaker on this side of the House in the opposition to rise this afternoon, following an unbroken chain of very learned women who have been talking about issues in this House. It's a very difficult place to be because the calibre of debate that's been carried so far this afternoon by my previous speaking colleagues, all of whom have been learned women, is something that I seek to rise to at least achieve close to their level of eloquence.

I must note that it was a pleasure over the last couple of hours or so to audit the eloquence that has been uttered by all the previous speakers from our side of the House, all of them being most learned women. I wanted that to be recorded because it was very special, and I was honoured to be in the audience listening to their eloquence and their arguments, and I hope to add something of value to their responses and their input on this debate this afternoon regarding the Trustee Act in committee.

Now, Mr. Chair, all of us have in some way or another been exposed to elements of the Trustee Act in our lives as individuals and families or involved in business or in our careers, but we don't take enough time to realize how important trustee relationships are to our everyday life and the operation of business and government, in particular, and also how we transact ourselves in terms of the phases of our life, whether it be birth, death, marriages. All of these involve trust, and especially as we age, there are trust relationships which take place to give powers to individuals to look after the affairs, either business or health, of others. So the evolution of our trust legislation is equally important, and I know it has been some time since the Trustee Act was amended in large measure. In fact, we have a new act before us, and I'm glad to finally see a new framework for trust.

In my business past, as you will be aware, in the real estate industry my life dealt with trusts every day. Whether as an agent or simply when I managed a real estate office as a sales manager, we were constantly involved with trust situations and administering trusts and ensuring that trusts were handled properly. When, in fact, something went south, something failed, a business transaction failed, it was a result, in almost every case, of a breach of a trust, where somebody had made a promise and never followed through or didn't follow the rules regarding that promise. I think, Mr. Chair, that kind of demonstrates how important the relationships are which are governed by the Trustee Act.

Now, this new framework is a process that was very robust, and much of it follows the Alberta Law Reform Institute recommendations, which are being implemented as a result of consultations with them. However, there are not elements of this bill that address many, many pieces of the justice system that are still actually in need of great attention. We've seen it in health care and education and now in the justice.

I don't know if the trust that's involved in the Trustee Act is something that Albertans have with this particular government. There are examples of lack of trust that the provincial government has engendered in the population in most of our pieces of legislation that we've seen go through this House in the last three years or so, and I think it's something that is an unfortunate development. We see breach of trust as something that the government claims not to be doing, but when in fact we look at the legislation being presented before the House in many cases, it actually does one thing and tries to say another.

More to the point on the background of the legislation before us right now, Mr. Chair, is that in my role in the real estate business before entering government as a member of this Legislature, I know that there was a need to replace the existing Trustee Act with the new act. I know that one of the positions that I shuddered at being put into as a real estate office manager was trying to adjudicate between opposing adversarial parties – for example, a buyer and a seller – when both were claiming the monies in trust, their deposit monies in a real estate transaction, when a transaction had failed, both claiming that they were rightfully owed that deposit.

That is a very, very difficult position to be in, when you have extremely upset people very, very clearly demanding that they should get the money. As a real estate manager, in the earlier part of my career you had to really decide who got the money, and of course that put the manager at risk of perhaps finding themselves the subject of a lawsuit. As the regulations progressed, the real estate managers were able to pay the monies of a disputed deposit into trust, and of course the courts then decided. That's an onerous and costly and time-consuming process, and in the end it leaves many people not feeling that they had a satisfactory resolution because of the cost and the time involved.

I know that there have been amendments to the Trustee Act over time, but this is the first time that it's been comprehensively reviewed. It's largely based on an 1893 English statute that really has fallen out of step with modern practices and issues, notwithstanding some of the developments, such as those I mentioned in the real estate industry, where it has been amended and allowed deposits, for example, to be paid into trusts when there was a dispute between parties.

Now, it does clarify the duties of trustees, the piece of legislation before us, the Trustee Act. It keeps the prudent investor rule that existed in the old act.

However, it does have some new provisions. It establishes a process for trustees to resign or to be removed. I'm sure for any of us who have had the opportunity to read a will, if you've been an executor or you've been given the authority as a trustee to look after somebody's estate or their health or their matters in the event of illness or dementia, the process for somebody to resign or to be removed is a necessary element, and it can relieve particularly family members of a lot of undue stress, which is inherent in that process because you've got some very emotional issues involved quite often, whether it's with a loved one whose care you've been assigned or been entrusted to look after. It doesn't have to be family, Mr. Chair. It could be, for example, in a condominium situation where you're involved as a trustee. You need to be able to have provisions that allow somebody to resign effectively or to be removed if indeed they are ineffective in that position.

I know that this bill has made an effort to look at the Alberta Law Reform Institute recommendations and has in fact implemented a majority of them. There are, I think, 80; 80 out of 90 recommendations from the Alberta Law Reform Institute have been accepted and adopted and implemented into this legislation.

Now, the government is arguing that this new framework will free up court time. It's supposed to add more clarity and hence reduce instances where beneficiaries, for example, and trustees have to go to court. That's a good goal, for sure, but we don't know for sure if that's in fact going to happen. So we'll be watching for that and making sure that indeed it actually in practice reaches its stated purpose.

Now, one of the examples, Mr. Chair, of a newer type of trust is trusts for persons with disabilities. They're trusts that maintain inheritance or significant financial gifts, for example, while receiving AISH, something that our government passed legislation to make possible in 2018. Prior to this there were no parameters which governed or made possible for an individual on AISH to receive an inheritance or a financial gift without having his AISH funds or her AISH funds clawed back.

I was involved in one instance prior to becoming a member of the Legislature, so previous to the 2018 legislative changes that our NDP government made to make this possible. I was involved in one situation with an individual who did receive an inheritance. It took a long battle by very dedicated social workers, who were working, for the most part, pro bono, to insist that this individual's inheritance from parents, designed to allow the person to live with dignity while they were still receiving the AISH benefits and, in fact, designed to allow the person to buy a small apartment condominium with that inheritance and, in so doing, would cost the government less. His housing cost went down as a result of having a small mortgage payment versus higher rental payments. It was a very difficult argument to be successful at winning.

Ultimately, after close to a year, Mr. Chair – and all credit to the individual social worker who was working on her own time to make this happen and tenaciously insisted that this was the just thing to do, that it was the right thing to happen before the legislative changes in 2018, that we brought forward, allowed it to happen. This individual still lives in his apartment condominium, a very small one. It was, you know, affordable at the time. It made that person's quality of life so much better than it otherwise would have been. So that's why it is important to renew the types of trusts that are available to individuals, for example, with disabilities.

This new act, hopefully, will allow the incorporation of new situations that happen to arise more easily than the previous act allowed and won't necessitate the, you know, year-long effort of a social worker in a particular case to implement special circumstances to allow somebody to benefit from a bequeath or an inheritance that would otherwise be simply clawed back from their AISH payments. That relationship was one that always impressed me, Mr. Chair, and I'm so glad that in 2018 we were able to bring in legislation that allowed an AISH recipient to receive an inheritance or a significant financial gift without having the AISH benefits clawed back.

While there definitely are laudable goals in the Trustee Act, there are many things in the justice system that remain untouched and not noticed or not dealt with by the current government. I recently had a conversation with an individual friend of mine I've known for many years who just retired after 38 years as a criminal Crown prosecutor with the federal justice system. I'm looking forward to conversations with him soon and hope to even have a discussion about the Trustee Act and how it may have affected his role as a federal prosecutor in Alberta, if he indeed had still been employed in that role, but also get some better feedback on what the bill might entail for others that he would have had under his tutelage in the justice system.

Further to that, on April 6 of this year the Alberta Crown Attorneys' Association accused the UCP government of chronic underfunding, which they alleged has caused a crisis in the justice system. Mr. Chair, this is not news. This is not new. Unfortunately, across the country, in jurisdiction after jurisdiction the justice system has seemed to be the department least able to defend itself as far as demanding proper funding from Treasury Board and Finance and Finance ministers across the country, and it begs the questions as to why. Why indeed do we see our justice system underfunded? Well, look no further than who the clients are that are served by the justice system, especially in the criminal justice system. You find, of course, that they are, generally speaking, people with low means and little voice, and that's the reason we find that the underfunding has been a lengthy and long-term and chronic problem right across the country and particularly in Alberta.

Now, it's gotten to such a point, Mr. Chair, that the association highlighted that there are significant vacancies for Crown prosecutors, and they even threatened to strike. Now, that's a severe move for Crown prosecutors to threaten to take, and it's strong evidence of a malady that's deep and very, very serious within our criminal justice system, when we have our Crown Attorneys' Association threatening to strike to get their point across but, more to the point, to actually ensure that they are properly funded so that they can function properly.

The government chimes all the time about wanting to have justice and eliminate the revolving door of the justice system and get rid of the recidivism that seems to be taking place, yet one of the things that causes the justice system to fail, Mr. Chair, is that the funding of the criminal justice system and the Crown prosecutors doesn't allow for a timely prosecution of justice. It means that there are too few Crown prosecutors and too few public defenders to look after the huge need that is there, that individuals involved in that system really have a right to expect.

I know that when I volunteered as a court intake unit officer with the Solicitor General's department years ago – and this shows how lengthy and long term the underfunding has been; we're talking in the '80s, Mr. Chair – you would have a duty counsel rifling through a very thick pile of files to quickly try to determine whether or not he could successfully ask for bail for a client that he may have just met moments before, but he had probably 15 or 20 people like that to deal with that morning.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair, for the opportunity to address this bill for my second time. The first time was at second reading. I really appreciate my colleague from Edmonton-McClung and his review of many parts of this bill but particularly the one aspect that I think is called the Henson trust, that part of this bill.

I, of course, was here in 2018, when amendments were made to the previous bill with regard to being able to allow the situation to unfold the way he spoke of it. I was so pleased to hear of the intervention of social workers for that young person to allow the young person to be able to keep the monies that were bequeathed in a will to them and not suffer the injustice of being cut off an important income support program, which obviously was needed for that young person to survive.

I was here, as I said, when that amendment to the previous bill was introduced, and I didn't know all the background – I knew some of it; I didn't know all the background – that my colleague from Edmonton-McClung was able to recount just now. It gives me as a social worker great pride to know that members of the professional occupation that I'm a member of were instrumental in getting after that change, that was necessary not only for that individual, obviously, but for others in that same situation that would follow.

[Mr. Reid in the chair]

The other thing that was recounted by my colleague from Edmonton-McClung and indeed my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View – and I'm not sure if there are others on our side that have addressed this, in support, I might add – is that it is a very comprehensive piece of legislation. Very glad to see that brought to this House. Instead of acting in a piecemeal fashion to address amendments that make sense coming forward, as we did with the previous bill, we're able to see a comprehensive set of legislation particulars brought before us and deal with those here.

I know, for instance, that one thing that was mentioned when the bill was introduced at second by the Calgary-Cross MLA – I heard him talk a lot about the modernization of this act in today's situation, the need to modernize it with respect to the new business potential that could be undertaken under this act. One of the areas that I've been able to research in my time here and spoke about at second reading was real estate investment trusts. I mentioned to members who were here at the time that I represent an area that has a significant number of older buildings that are purchased by REITs, various REITs, whether they're domiciled in Alberta or indeed across the country in Toronto. The activity in that regard has caused some concern for the people I represent in Calgary-Buffalo, particularly with respect to the affordability of their housing going into the future.

I was asking questions at second reading, in particular, around real estate investment trusts and their impact with this new Trustee Act or how they would be impacted. Would they be better off? Would there be some borders put on some of their activities to benefit the great number of renters that there are in Calgary-Buffalo and indeed in Alberta? One of the criticisms that has come from advocacy groups with regard to REITs is that they operate with a lot of government support, whether they are taxed at a lower rate than other corporations, whether they can access Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation monies at a lower rate than other businesses can borrow monies. It's all within the view that, you know, housing is important, and if REITs are going to invest in housing, build housing, that's a good thing. But there are risks. There needs to be a balance with regard to the ability of REITs to access preferred fiscal situations. The balance, in the view of many, is that there needs to be a responsibility REITs have not to increase rents at an unsustainable rate for, particularly, people with lower incomes.

Those were a number of questions that I directed towards the sponsor at second reading. I have yet to understand answers to any of those questions, but I think they're critical for the perspective that my constituents have.

I, of course, listened with interest to know some of the background with regard to the previous Trustee Act and the need to replace it with one that's more modern. I think colleagues who have spent time in the legal profession have done a good job of kind of ascertaining that the number of stakeholders that worked on this act have great reputes and that they have made significant recommendations that should be implemented. Indeed, I am standing to agree that I think they should be implemented as well.

I do want to, in the few minutes I have, just say thank you to the former MLA for Calgary-Currie for being a capable advocate and sponsor with regard to the changes to the previous act, that have made life better for people who are on fixed incomes, particularly those who are on AISH.

I'll sit down and see my colleague rise and address this now. Thank you.

The Acting Chair: I see the Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen to speak.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I rise to speak to Bill 12, the Trustee Act. I want to begin by saying that I think that this is an important topic, one that did come up in door-knocking in prior elections. Originally, when I thought about who might have trustees, I was thinking about seniors or people with significant disabilities. But it was a little girl – she was probably 10 at the time. Her mom was talking to me about her having a trusteeship because her dad had passed away when she was an infant and left her part of his estate. He and the mom weren't a duo, but his daughter deserved an opportunity to benefit from his life's work and his life savings, and his earnings were put in trust to her.

They definitely highlighted some of the frustration they had in being able to access her trust, her assets, to be able to do basic things like go for dental care, buy back-to-school clothes, and a number of other things. Their frustration wasn't with the staff. The staff who work to serve these folks who have assets in trust work incredibly hard, often have too many people on their caseload, and are doing their best with the resources that they have. I want to thank that little girl and her mom for taking the time to talk to me about some of the opportunities for improvement in terms of trusteeship and the way assets are governed for those in need.

I do know, personally, of a few people who have also experienced, mostly through wills or through other types of asset sharing from folks who love them, the need to have somebody help steward their resources in trust. I'm glad that we are considering this bill today. It's nice when you have an opportunity to rise as an opposition member and speak generally in support of a government bill, and that's where I will begin my remarks today.

I have to say that the rules around temporary trustees, for example, are, I think, prudent and things that we need to make sure we have in place as well as enabling trustees to make majority decisions and rules around reporting of trustees to beneficiaries and the establishment process for trustees to resign or be removed. Obviously, folks wouldn't enter into those decisions lightly, but making sure that everyone knows what the process is and what the steps are I think is important.

Just to back up a little bit, there are essentially three key characteristics of trusts: certainty of intention, certainty of subject matter, and certainty of the objects or the assets that we're referring to. The old Trustee Act mainly dealt with trusts established under wills, like the one that the little girl in my riding, of course, was experiencing. But there are other examples of trusts: charitable trusts, trusts benefiting people with disabilities, as was mentioned, or businesses as well. Making sure that we have updated legislation to reflect the fact that sometimes family dynamics are different, that sometimes relationships and why people might choose to bestow assets onto another individual are complicated, and making sure we have a modernized piece of legislation to help address that I think is important.

I do want to reflect a little bit on remarks from the former Minister of Justice on sort of how we got to some of this discussion today. It's my understanding that the Alberta Law Reform Institute created a report in about 2017, I think it was, and a discussion paper with 23 modified recommendations of the original 28. I believe that some of the recommendations are guiding this legislation. I would love to have an opportunity for the Minister of Justice to respond to those in greater detail to clarify for us if all of the modified recommendations are actually being implemented in this piece of legislation, if there are any that have been omitted and, for those that have been, the rationale as to why those amended recommendations aren't necessarily moving forward in this bill. I think that that would be important for us to have as we consider how to move forward with this legislation.

I also want to say that while I am hopeful that this piece of legislation is going to meet the desired intent of modernizing the way that trusts are stewarded and the types of transparency as it relates to trusts, there is a lack of trust with this government and certainly with the Justice ministry. Just to sort of reflect on some of the decisions that have been made in the tenure of the current government, one of the big ones, of course, is that the government is continuing to flirt with the idea of creating a provincial police force. This is probably one of the most unpopular proposals that the current Premier has floated, maybe second to wanting to take people's pensions and do better with them under his leadership than those with the actual pensions themselves feel they are currently being stewarded. That was probably the biggest rejection I've seen in the last few years, people not trusting this government with their retirement savings.

But another very big one, that I know members of this Assembly went out to do consultations on in various communities around the province, was around the idea of a provincial police force rather than other relationships we have with the RCMP or with municipal policing. I would say that I'm relieved that that hasn't proceeded at this point, but the fact that that's still something under consideration is highly problematic.

The current government also made the decision to charge a nonrefundable fee of up to $150 for those who wanted to appeal traffic tickets. Maybe for some people in this room a $150 fee might not be burdensome, but for a lot of folks that would be a significant barrier to justice and being able to argue one's time before the courts and to be able to defend themselves. Fortunately, the current Justice minister has decided to throw the former Justice minister under the bus and reverse that decision. That's a good thing for ordinary Albertans, that they won't be subject to that $150 fee to be able to have some justice when it comes to traffic violations or concerns.

Then, of course, I want to highlight – the changes to the victims of crime compensation fund, I think, are mean. I think that for a government that speaks a lot about law and order, to treat victims and the compensation that they have previously been entitled to, the money that those victims are entitled to, as the government's own slush fund is incredibly disrespectful to survivors and to folks that deserve to have an opportunity to see some retribution for horrific crimes often perpetrated against them.

There is not a high degree of trust when it comes to justice and the current government. That's what gives me a bit of a lump in my throat when I say that I'm planning on speaking in support and voting in support of a government justice bill. But the bill itself, I think, is probably fine. It's the intent of the current government and those who are entrusted to actually execute the law and deliver for the people of Alberta that I still have hesitations about, but generally at this point I will say that I am speaking in support of this bill.

I move that we adjourn.

The Acting Chair: No.

Ms Hoffman: No? I'm just going to sit down, then.

Ms Gray: We're not adjourned.

Ms Hoffman: Oh, sorry. My apologies.

An Hon. Member: No. You're great.

Ms Hoffman: Thanks. I'll cede the remainder of my time to somebody else, who can decide what we're going to do next. Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Acting Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Any other members wishing to speak to Bill 12?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call the question on Bill 12, the Trustee Act.

[The clauses of Bill 12 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Acting Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Chair: Opposed? Carried.

I see the hon. deputy whip.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I move that the committee rise and report Bill 12.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Reid in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 12.

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Continuing Care Act

Mr. Eggen moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment April 20: Mr. Feehan]

The Acting Speaker: Any members wishing to speak to Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act? I see the hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, and on the referral amendment, I believe, to pause and refer this to committee. This is actually my first opportunity to speak to this particular piece of legislation. In just a quick review of Hansard on this debate I think I'm fairly confident in saying that my colleagues have raised a number of excellent questions and pointed out a number of deficiencies in this legislation in terms of explanation from government about what the purpose is of something or perhaps to explain in a little further detail about the direction that they'll take around regulations. I have not seen the government respond in a way I think that's satisfactory, so again I will support a referral to committee.

You know, once again, this is another piece of legislation that is all about: trust us; we'll get things sorted out in the regulation. But there is actually an inherent danger to that, and I would like to start off by giving all of the members in this House just an example of what I mean by that. In the piece of legislation, if you look on page 67, that is where the government is very clearly repealing legislation with this new piece of legislation. They've repealed the Long Term Care Information Act, the Nursing Homes Act, Resident and Family Councils Act, and then Supportive Living Accommodation Licensing Act.

The one piece that I'm going to focus on is actually the Resident and Family Councils Act. You can find the replacement on page 34. It starts on 34 and goes to 35. Basically, what this is is the government telling us, you know, what the legislation that's being repealed will be replaced with. Now, on first glance, it doesn't look like it's all that much different, but it actually is. I think it's really important to draw members' attention to what those differences are, and then all members can reconcile with themselves: are you satisfied with this? Does this work for you? Because I think it's taking us in a questionable direction.

In the first part it talks about, you know, obviously:

A resident of a continuing care... or supportive living accommodation, a resident's legal representative or [an] individual considered to be a... resident's family...

It goes on.

... may initiate the establishment of a resident and family council for the residents of the continuing care home or supportive living accommodation.

It goes on to talk about the resident being able to identify relatives, friends, guardians, caregivers to be considered members of the family. No problem here.

It goes on to talk about:

Where there is no resident and family council in place . . . [the] continuing care home or supportive living accommodation . . . [or the] operator shall post a notice in a prominent place . . .

Talking about, you know, the establishment of this committee. And then that's pretty much it. Now, government will say: "Well, yeah. Don't worry about it. It's in the regulations." But I would like to draw members' attention to the piece of legislation that is being repealed and the information or the legislation pieces that are actually being lost. I think really important pieces are being lost, Mr. Speaker.

I don't know if other members of this House have had an opportunity to attend a resident council meeting, but I have. I actually was invited by a number of residents of Chateau Mission Court in St. Albert, right on the beautiful Sturgeon River, and it was interesting. That's operated by Homeland Housing, and it's an organization that does wonderful work. But I went to the resident council meeting and – as you can imagine, Mr. Speaker, it was a very unique agenda – talked about the kinds of fish that were served on certain days, some people not liking the fish sticks and preferring more fillet and, you know, some of those things. But those things are important to residents: where the flower beds were going to be, and then there was a new swing that was purchased, and would that be in the front or the back? I mean, these are important discussions for people that call Chateau Mission Court home.

But, you know, that's really not what I want to talk about. What I really want to focus on was that there was a lot of work by the organization and by the residents to get them to that place, because the legislation that was brought in under the New Democrats between 2015 and 2019 gave some teeth to this.

I'd like to draw your attention – if any members are interested in the legislation, one of the sections is called establishment of a resident and family council. It actually in the legislation gives direction to the operators to communicate the importance of these councils, to literally tell them about posting and give them timelines about, you know, if this isn't followed through, let's say – let's say there doesn't appear to be interest or people don't want to get involved. It encourages the operators or explains to them how to get people involved, because there's an incredible value to people, especially when they're in continuing care, whether that be in a nursing home or supportive living accommodation.

Now, I'd like to explain to members that supportive living accommodations aren't just for, let's say, seniors that are living in a lodge or something like that. This could be a group of four people with disabilities that are living together in a condominium or living together in a house and are sharing supports. Those also apply here. Those resident councils – we actually call them just resident meetings – are very important to prevent problems and actually encourage and support quality of life for people that live there. But, again, without legislation I believe the operators – and I'm certainly not pointing fingers and saying that operators wouldn't want to do this – are so overwhelmed with the day-to-day work that this may not be a priority if it is not legislated, which is the precise reason that this legislation was done.

Let me tell you that it was a really great day for people that are in continuing care to actually have a legislative voice either for them as a resident or their family members, friends, or guardians. Actually makes a big difference. This legislation talks about: if there isn't one in place or within six months – you know, coming to "every 6 months thereafter until a resident and family council is established." That's key, and that is missing in this new piece of legislation that has been introduced by the UCP. It actually tells people, like, if it's not there – you know, they're not saying, "Impose it right now," but they're encouraging it. Actually, this legislation went through and talked about how to do that.

The other thing that it does is that it legislates some assistance. As you can imagine, Mr. Speaker, to have – and I'm going back. Maybe I'll give you an example of where I worked. There were some homes where there were up to four people that lived together that had developmental disabilities, that shared expenses and shared staff. We did this before this legislation came in, but what we would have is that they would have – they're called a roommates' meeting. But they had an agenda. The staff were required to help facilitate that meeting, not by running the meeting, not by contributing to the meeting but by helping them take minutes, for example, helping them keep a record of their decisions and what they wanted to talk about. But because we were able to support that work, it got done on a monthly basis.

I can tell you that to have people – I mean, it's hard enough sometimes living with people that you're related to. You don't always get along in terms of the menu or housekeeping duties. It is exceedingly difficult for people that are unrelated or don't have a long history with each other, in many cases, to get along. To get along is important for quality of life. So something like a council is not just preventative, but it encourages relationships and all of those things.

I understand that the new piece of legislation does talk about this particular piece of legislation that was repealed. It does replace it with something, but it's less than. It's less. The standard is lower, so the chances of it happening are less, and then the benefits are less. So my question is – I can understand wanting to consolidate a number of pieces of very complex legislation that touch on very complex issues. I can totally understand that. But it's really important that we don't lose the really good things that are in other pieces of legislation and the really good things that contribute to the overall well-being of Albertans. This is not partisan in any way. I would be saying these very same things if the legislation around the family – I'm losing it here.

Ms Hoffman: Resident and family councils.

Ms Renaud: Yeah. Resident and family councils.

I would be saying that very same thing if another government had introduced it because I think we can all admit that we've all probably been into some form of continuing care, whether it's a small group home for people with developmental disabilities or it's a lodge or a nursing home or perhaps it's more assisted living of some kind. I think that we can all admit that there needs to be some work done. People aren't always satisfied and happy there. It can be a really difficult time of life not just for the person that's living there but their family and friends. And to have something like this, a mechanism to try to make things better specifically for the people that live there, not the people that work there, not the operators but the people that live there, to have a specific piece of legislation dedicated to their well-being and their future was a really good thing.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you.

Ms Renaud: Yes. Thank you to the former Health minister.

I'm very, very disappointed, actually – there are a number of other things I'm disappointed about, but I wanted to give this thorough example for the House to understand that when you vote no to sending this to committee to do a more thorough review of this legislation, to make sure we don't miss good things, that's what you're voting for. And it's not just that. There are, actually, a number of pieces of legislation that are being repealed.

[The Speaker in the chair]

One of the other pieces of legislation that is being repealed is the supportive living – SLALA is what I always call it. It's not called that. It's called the Supportive Living Accommodation Licensing Act. Now, I can think back to, you know, when I worked in the sector with people with disabilities, to when this legislation came in. Then there were amendments made, and then there were safety standards that were introduced, inspections that were introduced. Let me tell you that it was difficult.

There are, actually, accommodation standards and licensing. This is a process for, let's say, a group home in this case. So it's 4-plus. They fall under this particular piece of legislation. It was very methodical licensing and very methodical inspection. Now, at first, when I saw the inspection checklist, I was a little bit overwhelmed and, really, to be honest, questioning some of the things that were being done. But as we did it for a few years – and things have evolved since then. You can get, like, a multiple-year licence with little mini check-ins every year. But when I think back to these, these were actually so preventative in so many ways.

What is worrisome to me, Mr. Speaker, is that by repealing the SLALA legislation, by repealing this particular piece of legislation and then not thoroughly addressing some of the issues that I think were outlined in the old piece of legislation around licensing and inspections, all of this is left up to regulation. Once again, we arrive back at the place where it's: just trust us; we'll get it sorted out in the regulation.

Again, Mr. Speaker, sadly, Albertans don't have a lot of faith in this government, and rightly so. They have seen time and time again where, you know, "just trust us" has not really worked out. We have seen that this is a very secretive government, I would suggest the most secretive in Canada. Transparency seems to be sort of their kryptonite. We ask questions; we don't get answers. I'm on the Public Accounts Committee, so every week when we're sitting, we have an opportunity to ask questions about different ministries. More often than not we just get, "Yeah; I can't answer that question; I'm not the right person" or "Yeah; I'm new here" or "No; you're going to have to ask someone else."

It is just so much a lack of transparency. When I see a piece of legislation like Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, I think we can all agree in this place that it is incredibly important that we get this right. This is the well-being of so many Albertans that is at stake, because, really, we rely on this legislation. For the operators: we need to know what they're doing; we need to know what the standards are. By repealing such large pieces of legislation but then making the changes so vague and leaving so much up to legislation, Albertans are asking. Really, this government just doesn't have a track record where we can say: "You know what? We trust them because they've demonstrated to us that they've gotten it right before."

Some of the other pieces that I was a little bit concerned to not see addressed when there are clearly so many problems were around staff ratios, around more clear, decisive language, around fees that can be charged. Let me just say – you know, I am running out of time, but I know my colleagues have talked about this at length. The fact that we do not have an independent seniors' advocate is incredibly troublesome. It is incredibly troublesome. I mean, with what we've just come out of – well, we're still going through COVID-19 – how much we learned, especially during that first year and then again in the second year, and we're starting to see some things happen right now. People that are reliant on continuing care truly are at risk.

I would urge all members of this place to vote to send this piece of legislation to committee to have a better look and to see: are there things that we're missing, and can we make this better?

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on amendment REF1 to Bill 11, the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to address the referral amendment. We are, of course, all going through a time of thinking about the impacts COVID has had on the residents of long-term care facilities and continuing care and the regrettable situation that unfolded across the country, not only this country but others, where those kinds of institutions are in place for the care of primarily elderly people. We know that the National Institute on Ageing has said that 1,677 residents of continuing care have died from COVID-19 in Alberta as of April 12, 2022. That alone, I think, should be reason enough to send this to a committee to look further into this and to allow Albertans the opportunity to witness discussion amongst legislators and to understand the views of professionals in this area, experts in this area with regard to not only this bill but the impact that COVID has had on Albertans in continuing care situations.

Alberta is not unique, as I said. We, of course, in the early waves saw the unfolding of tragedy go on in the province of Quebec – and I think it was repeated, to a degree, here in Alberta as well – to the extent where military personnel were called in to help in nursing homes and continuing care facilities and were shocked by what they witnessed in terms of, particularly, the lack of care residents in those facilities experienced.

No one who has elderly relatives wishes for them to be in a situation like that. In fact, it's probably universal to wish that our relations who need continuing care, who need any type of organized care, either coming into their home or them going into a facility, would have the very, very best opportunities to experience a high quality of life in those facilities. But, regrettably, that's not what happened in many situations, both here in Alberta and other parts of the country, when COVID overwhelmed the abilities of those facilities to provide appropriate care, appropriate, high quality of life care.

That's why I agree with my colleague from Edmonton . . .

Ms Renaud: St. Albert.

Member Ceci: Oh. Yeah. Not even Edmonton. Sorry. St. Albert. You practise that all the time, Mr. Speaker.

Member Ceci: I'm relatively new here.

My colleague from St. Albert talked eloquently about the advocacy that she has provided for residents in long-term care situations and the understanding she has of where that care has changed over time. Not only those residents but the family members of residents have a great stake in wanting to see this act the very best it can be for today's present-day Albertans but also for those in the future.

I believe that no action should be taken here on this bill until we fully understand more about where Albertans are with regard to the care of their loved ones in continuing care facilities and long-term care, commonly called nursing homes, as well as the care provided to people in their homes.

It's with regard to the last area of care, I guess, or sphere of care, that I'm starting to get more and more of an understanding of some of the challenges of relatives and extended family. You know, people want to stay in their homes, Mr. Speaker, and when they lose the ability to fully care for themselves and family is sometimes overwhelmed as a result of trying to provide that care for their loved ones, then they rely on the government and local agencies to supplement what they can't do themselves. What I think we need to do is hear more from recipients, and that's what a referral to committee would allow us.

People talk about wanting more home care for a wider variety of needs in their own homes. We know, of course, that the ability to have that available to Albertans would save Alberta a great deal of money through budget monies of health services or other programs that generally are tapped now to provide care to Albertans. It's not unlike, you know, an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure, that kind of thing. So if we can make that happen.

I know that the promises from the government more than a year ago talked about the desire to increase home care to Albertans, and who can disagree with that, Mr. Speaker? But it hasn't happened, and we need to understand why it hasn't happened and focus attention on that issue. We also know that the UCP talked about how the number of hours of care that residents would receive in long-term care situations should be higher than they are now, today. I can't think of anything sadder, more maddening than to know that there are residents in long-term care who are waiting long periods of time for the bell they push to be answered or for the care that should be delivered to them on a regular basis to be delivered. That, again, is something else, I think, the UCP promised to fix. It hasn't been done, and we need to know why.

Of course, what COVID, across the country as well as here in Alberta, has shown us is that the numbers of staff working in long-term care facilities or continuing care facilities has been inadequate and that the protocols that the chief medical officer of health talked about early on, when the wave of COVID deaths was taking place, was that for the interests and the health of residents, not only residents but the people that work in those facilities, there should be limited transmission, that working in fewer places to make ends meet for the employees was a good thing for the residents and the employees. The government worked, as this government did and others across the country through the federal government, to top up wages of employees in those situations so that they could count on one place of work as opposed to knitting together two or three places of work for a full-time salary. That's again something that the UCP talked about wanting or promised that should happen, that there should be an increase in the proportion of full-time staff available to residents in long-term care situations.

I'm not aware that any of those three things that I've talked about have been done to date, which is another reason why a referral to the Families and Communities Committee would be a helpful thing for Albertans to understand the actions of the government with regard to the seriousness of this situation.

I can't go much further without talking about how disappointing it is to see Bill 11 kind of put off until the future significant regulations that will really make or break this bill. The fact that we can't see those, what is before or being contemplated in regulation at this point in time, is essentially a trust-us-and-we'll-take-care-of-things move. There's too big a risk, I think, not only to the long-term efficacy of Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, and the fact that we don't know if it'll have the proper agency to address what is important to Albertans who are requiring continuing care, but the risk is too big an ask for – in addition to the residents and Albertans who love those residents who are family, it's too big a risk for workers in those long-term and continuing care facilities across the province.

Asking for "just trust us; we'll get it right" hasn't worked out very well with regard to this government on previous legislation they've brought forward. It shouldn't be asked of Albertans who have to spend their lives, what's left of their lives, in continuing care settings. We need the government to be not only transparent and up front, but we need a fulsome debate with full understanding of what regulatory power the government believes it needs with regard to this Continuing Care Act. The number of – I guess a way to put this is that the government doesn't have the greatest track record with being proactive around the needs of long-term care residents in that early on in the pandemic, as I mentioned, not only in this province but in other provinces, the significant brunt of deaths occurred with residents of continuing care. That's another reason not to allow the government to say: trust us; we'll get it right.

You know, there's great stake Albertans have in this, that people in long-term care facilities have in this. Without their opportunity to understand where government is going, there's no guarantee anything different will occur in subsequent pandemics or subsequent significant impacts that threaten the lives of people in these situations. We know that the facility-based continuing care review had numerous recommendations about how to improve and increase the amount of home care provided, to improve working conditions, and to increase full-time staff, but this bill is silent on any of those things. There are consultations that have been done that have not been made public, which is another reason why . . . [Mr. Ceci's speaking time expired]

Thank you.

The Speaker: On amendment REF1 are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A pleasure to rise this afternoon and speak to Bill 11's referral to Families and Communities, to take a pause on this piece of legislation to take a deep dive into many of the components of it, which I think deserve greater scrutiny. I hope to make a compelling argument as to why by focusing on one significant element of the legislation that I happen to have some familiarity with from my past as a nursing orderly trainee. I will get into that momentarily.

I wanted to, first, frame the discussion that we have in a slightly different way than other speakers have so far, and that is to really get at the nub of what we're speaking about, Mr. Speaker. That has to do with the fact that what we're talking about, and everybody's mentioned it, is care. People in need of care are who we are talking about. That definition of care is a very wide-ranging thing. It can be something that describes the services that are received by somebody in long-term care, a nursing home otherwise known, or somebody who's in a situation of designated supportive living or in home care, for that matter. But that care is something that we gloss over when we talk about that word. We should really think about what it means. What is happening in that relationship between the caregiver and the individual receiving that care? It can mean some very intimate things. That defines why it's so important that the individuals providing that care are involved in a system which recognizes what they're doing.

For example, you can have a situation in a long-term care facility or designated supportive living which begins early morning, when the person gets up, or a person may be an overnight caregiver, and they're making sure that the individual doesn't have difficulties overnight, whether it be breathing or falling or any number of respiratory issues or medications that are on a drip. It could be IV situations. Generally speaking, what you end up having is an individual who, say, during their daily care will respond to the resident, go to their room in the morning, rouse them, get them up.

This is, you know, part of the daily activity that I was involved in. You do a proper face wash. Sometimes if the individual is not ambulatory, if they're bedridden, then you have to do a wash of the individual's face and perineal care while they're in bed and get them prepared to at least, hopefully, sit up to take some form of breakfast. That also involves using, quite often, a foam sponge to clean the mouth and get the hygiene of the mouth properly looked after. Then, of course, there's some type of a breakfast that would take place. In many cases, Mr. Speaker, the individuals, if they're in severe straits, will be those that will bite on a spoon. I've had that, where a person was a grinder, and they would actually take the spoon right out of your hand if you weren't careful. You learn these nuances after looking after somebody over a period of time.

That's why it's so important, no matter the situation, Mr. Speaker, whether you're looking after somebody in an institution, in a long-term care facility, or in their home, to have continuity of care with the same individuals involved. Familiarity is developed over time. You get to know that individual, their nuances, their conditions, their needs, their wants. You get to know them as a person. And that individual becomes familiar and comfortable with the caregiver over time. That is a really important element of what we're talking about that may be getting lost in the nuances of just talking about the different styles or, you know, designated supportive living or home care.

The main goal, Mr. Speaker, should never be lost. The main goal is benefiting the individuals receiving care, to improve their quality of life, their daily life on a moment-to-moment basis so that they're not sitting on a commode for hours on end because the individual doesn't realize what their bowel movement habits are. Something as simple and basic as that is realistically what we are talking about when we talk about care, those daily commitments to understanding how that person gets through each day and what their particular conditions are.

What happens quite often, Mr. Speaker, is that we have a revolving door of part-time people, whether it be in institutions or even in a home-care situation, where Alberta Health Services does provide home care – that's the option that's in place – and you don't end up with the same people looking after the clients on a regular basis, and it's very, very upsetting to that individual because you're dealing with very intimate care, basically just as you would with a child, the bodily fluids.

There is a daily workspace of anybody who's looking after somebody in continuing care, whether it be at home or in an institution. The dignity of that individual is something that must remain intact if you're going to look after their overall health, and it is something that is very, very fragile. When you are relying upon somebody else to look after your daily needs, your physical needs, you depend upon them. That is something we shouldn't ever lose sight of.

The reason I'd like to see this bill referred to Families and Communities is so that we can talk more about the intimacy of that care relationship, Mr. Speaker. It seems as though the bill itself may have had its priorities in reverse when it seems to herald a savings of $452 million as a result of shifting residents from long-term care into home care, which is a laudable goal because most of us, I would venture to say almost all of us, would prefer to live at home even when we are in need of care.

I think it's great that the government is looking to shift more people into a home-care situation, where they can receive services there. But what exactly that means is something that we've got to look a little bit more closely at, Mr. Speaker, because when indeed somebody is in an institution, they may or may not have the same individuals looking after them regularly. We do have a situation where part-time help is a problem. We rely upon part-time employees too much, because it's cheaper to have them hired, and they don't get the benefits that a full-time employee has.

When it comes to a home-care situation, Mr. Speaker, many Albertans don't realize that you will have an option to have services brought in by AHS employees, who would be public servants, and, once again – no fault of theirs, but there's a difficulty with maintaining continuity of the same individual coming on, you know, a daily and a weekly basis to provide those services, or you can have the option of having a self-managed care system.

When the government talks about a savings of $452 million as a result of shifting people from institution-based care to home care, my suspicion is, Mr. Speaker, that that $452 million savings is coming as a result of privatizing the service. In other words, rather than having a public servant in an institution or through AHS coming to the house, we're looking at encouraging the privatized contracts to happen with individuals who would come to provide that care. The savings is going to be happening because you end up having people operating at a much lower rate of pay to be contracted by individual families to come to the home to provide these services under a self-managed care contract.

Under this contract, Mr. Speaker, whether it's AHS or a self-managed care contract, there's an assessment that's done to determine what level of services the individual would be eligible for, and then, as a result, the family, if it is a self-managed care contract, would receive a monthly amount. From that, they would have to pay the caregivers of their choice to come in and provide the services.

But the difficulty lies, Mr. Speaker, in that the savings that they are claiming to get from having this devolution of services to home care isn't something that necessarily should be the source of money used to provide more hours of long-term care and increasing the hours of direct care in other supportive living situations. If indeed there's more money required in those situations, it should be funded. But to say that we need to direct those savings, that we need to generate those savings on the backs of the individuals who will be providing the care to those who are needing home care is not just.

The savings of $452 million, I postulate, Mr. Speaker, are going to be coming from the lower wages and benefits that are being earned by individuals who are providing services under self-managed care contracts, and that is not the way to seek extra funding to shift over to another area of home care. The savings that we know are going to be coming out of the pockets of already not really highly paid workers is something that we should be considering carefully in committee when we look at Bill 11 should this referral motion be successful. I take nothing away from the individuals who are contracted to provide home care to families who are under self-managed care contracts, but I think the system should be set up to properly reward those individuals in the same way that they would have been had they been working in an institution providing the same care that these individuals who are now going to perhaps be looking at living at home receiving care would be receiving.

Whether or not that person is under a self-managed care contract or whether they're working through AHS, they should be receiving, I think, a guarantee of a relatively similar amount of money for providing the same amount of care. That, I think, would then diminish the so-called savings that the government is claiming to have, the $452 million, and force the government to properly fund out of general revenue the monies that are required by long-term care or designated supportive living.

We're not talking, Mr. Speaker, about clearing the streets or shovelling snow or the roadway systems; we're talking about daily human interactions and daily care for people that we love. In many, many cases they're the elderly; they're our parents and our grandparents. Also, there are people with long-term care conditions, and it could be even as young as children, people who have been, unfortunately, victims of vehicle accidents or other types of tragedies, where they need long-term care.

Unfortunately, too, there are many young adults who are in long-term care, seniors' types of accommodations, who cannot otherwise be accommodated in Alberta because the facilities don't exist. That's the tragedy that needs to be addressed, and that's something that we could do with Bill 11 if it is referred to the Families and Communities Committee to take a look at, the issue of young individuals who are, in some cases, on an ongoing basis going to university to upgrade their education and coming back to an institution which is largely designed for the elderly, with no social life and no interaction with their peer organization or their peer age group because of the fact that the facilities for that age group of persons requiring long-term care just don't exist. As far as a policy to implement the changes to long-term care, that's one thing that really should be addressed, and I hope to see that in committee on Bill 11.

The Speaker: On amendment REF1, the hon. Opposition House Leader.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure and honour to join in debate on Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, here at second reading and to speak to the referral that Bill 11 be sent to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities, where it can have more analysis and discussion.

I have to start by thanking the hon. colleagues who have spoken to Bill 11 so far today. I know that there's been debate at second reading across multiple days as this bill has been considered. I just want to reflect that in listening to colleagues who have brought forward perspectives from their previous employment, work – the Member for St. Albert, who has worked within aspects of the system, and listening to my colleague speaking just now about his history of having family within the continuing care system and the experience that they've lived – bringing those aspects into the debate, I think, has raised the level of debate on Bill 11.

I certainly, personally, very much appreciate hearing their perspectives, because having a strong and healthy continuing care system is incredibly, incredibly important to all Albertans given the number of Albertans who rely on these services. Alberta right now has more than 33,000 supportive living spaces, more than 15,000 long-term care spaces, and there are already 127,000 Albertans receiving home care each year, so we know that continuing care impacts the lives of many, many Albertans. On top of that, we know from the reviews that have taken place, specifically the facility-based continuing care review, which I'd like to speak a little bit more about, that the number of Albertans who are going to require the support of the continuing care system is growing, so making sure that we are getting this right is incredibly important.

Now, within Bill 11 we see a number of things happening, including multiple acts being replaced with a single streamlined piece of legislation for continuing care. The Member for St. Albert raised a number of concerns that I'd like to take a moment just to echo, including that in the consolidation of other pieces of legislation into this single Continuing Care Act, which is being done to improve transparency and accountability – it makes sense, especially when you're dealing with legislation as old as 1985, regulations similarly as old, and a system that has grown up with inconsistencies, to try and bring that together.

But the point the Member for St. Albert made, that I think is incredibly important, is that within the pieces of legislation that are being combined into the Continuing Care Act, there were varying levels of care or standards. In the Continuing Care Act before us, which is replacing the Nursing Homes Act, the Long Term Care Information Act, the Resident and Family Councils Act, and the Supportive Living Accommodation Licensing Act, the member pointed out some very specific areas where we may be losing positive standards, positive minimum standards, because of that consolidation.

That is one of the many issues that I think a referral to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities would allow us to take a moment to take a closer look at. Certainly, having the Continuing Care Act be there to support Albertans and to support a strong and improving system, particularly coming out of the COVID-19 pandemic, where we've seen we are getting close to 1,700 residents of the continuing care system having passed from COVID-19 – and we saw in so many ways where the continuing care system had weak spots, had challenges.

Now, in bringing forward Bill 11 to address gaps, to try and improve the system, my understanding, through reviewing some of the Hansard from what the minister moving this bill has said and my understanding of the government's progress, is that this is part of the overall review of the continuing care system, which has included some reviews that have led up to this. I mentioned that I wanted to talk briefly about the facility-based continuing care review, of which we have a final report that was released on May 31, 2021, so 11 months ago, approximately. That review included a great deal of consultation and a final report that included 42 recommendations to transform and modernize Alberta's facility-based continuing care system.

Now, I raise this report because the government has been engaged in important work to evaluate and, ideally, reform and improve the continuing care system, but when we look at Bill 11, very few of those 42 recommendations have been implemented in this piece of legislation, and there are significant stress points and areas of concern within our continuing care system that Bill 11 fails to consider. Having the Standing Committee on Families and Communities be able to review Bill 11 and find out more I think would be really important. Now, the final report is out. Certainly, one of the requests I would have for the government would be perhaps more detailed information about the input and the feedback that went into that review.

I see that we only have a few more minutes before the afternoon session will be, unfortunately, ending, so I will spend my final few minutes speaking about one aspect of the continuing care system that I'm concerned is being deferred to regulations. A great deal of the work in Bill 11 is being deferred to regulations, and from the FBCC review what does not appear to be covered through Bill 11, although I'd certainly be happy to be corrected, are those issues that will help support workers in this sector, workers who often are working part-time or contract-based work, workers who in many cases are underpaid, workers who are mainly women, workers who are dealing with incredibly high levels of staff burnout as well as incredibly high demands on their time and on their work.

Certainly, the FBCC review flagged a number of challenges, including labour supply and staff shortages, that exist today. As already mentioned in my remarks, with the increasing percentage of Albertans who are requiring support from a continuing care centre, we need to have a very strong system in place to try and address that. When during the COVID-19 pandemic the single-site staffing was put into place, certainly it was something many people were aware of but not everyone. It became a higher level of awareness of how many of these workers were working in multiple facilities because they could only, in some cases, get part-time hours in multiple places and then of the impact of a pandemic and the public health impacts of that. Also, having these workers, working in precarious positions, not able to get full-time hours and benefits, I think, speaks to the need for the sector to have a real workforce strategy.

This is something that has been acknowledged in other provinces as well. Ontario, in particular, has committed huge amounts of money – I believe it was $1.9 billion annually – to hire more workers, to bring the benefits for those workers more in line with what you would expect, to make sure that there was increased funding.

The Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt. However, the time allotted for debate in this afternoon's session has elapsed, and the House stands adjourned until this evening at 7:30.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Tuesday, April 26, 2022

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 11 Continuing Care Act

Mr. Eggen moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Debate adjourned on the amendment April 26: Ms Gray speaking]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, we are on REF1 of Bill 11. Are there any members looking to debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen.

Mr. Yao: Oh, what a great way to start off.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm so pleased to be able to make the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo's evening by starting off debate this evening. I promise that member that I'll keep my fingers in my pockets because I know how sensitive he is about that issue.

I'm pleased to rise and share a few comments on the amendment that is before us, and that is to refer Bill 11 to committee. I think it is prudent to send this bill to committee for further review because this bill is a quite extensive overhaul of existing legislation with respect to continuing care in the province of Alberta. The act rescinds a number of pieces of legislation, a whole bunch of acts related to continuing care, particularly the Nursing Homes Act, the Hospitals Act, the Supportive Living Accommodation Licensing Act, and the co-ordinated home and community care regulation, and attempts to put all of the legislative and regulatory framework for continuing care in the province of Alberta into one overarching piece of legislation. This is no small task.

I think that the work needs to be examined in detail by members of the Legislature in a committee, because in that way we would be able to dig into sections of the legislation in great detail, ask some members of the public, some stakeholders to come and present to the committee and share their opinions on this new piece of legislation, how they think it will improve or affect the continuing care landscape in the province of Alberta. This is something that requires careful consideration, and I think it's only fair that we hear directly from stakeholders about what the impact of these legislative changes will be. Up until this point the only people whose word we can ostensibly rely on is the minister's.

You know, I think the minister is a decent enough guy as far as he goes – and I will say that he is a significant improvement over his predecessor; that's for sure – but unfortunately he is part of a government that is deeply distrusted by the people of Alberta. So for him or any member of Executive Council to come in and say that this is a piece of legislation that is worthy of support of the Legislature even though it completely transforms the legislative and regulatory framework with respect to continuing care, I don't think that that's adequate. The people of Alberta would not be happy with us if we just came in here and took the minister's word for it that this is the right thing to do. That's one of the reasons that I think the members of the Chamber should vote to send this piece of legislation to committee.

Not only, though, do Albertans deeply distrust what the UCP government tells us on any given day on any given important piece of public policy, but we know that when it comes to managing continuing care, particularly through the pandemic, the government has miserably failed the people of Alberta. As we've heard time and again in debate on this piece of legislation, over 1,600 continuing care residents in Alberta, tragically, have passed away due to COVID-19.

Now, when you're dealing with numbers that high, it's easy to let it just go over your head. What does 1,600 people mean? Well, let me try to put that into some context to make that number more real, I guess. You know, I have a number of high schools in my riding, Mr. Speaker. McNally high school, of course, tragically, has been in the news quite a bit over the last couple of weeks. That school has only about 900 students. Just imagine if every single student at McNally high school suddenly passed away from COVID. We would still only be at half of the number of people who have died from COVID-19 in continuing care because of this government's mismanagement of health care in the pandemic. That's two high schools, two complete high schools, that are lost.

I remember reading an article in I think it was The Atlantic. Ed Yong is a journalist who's been providing excellent coverage about the COVID pandemic with a focus on the United States, but I think that the COVID experience in the United States can be applied to a number of other countries, including Canada. What he found – I hope that I have it right. What this article that I recall reading stated was that for every COVID death there are at least nine people who are grieving that person's loss, nine people for every COVID death who are left behind to mourn the loss, bear the burden of grief, wondering what they could have done differently, I guess, to save their loved one.

In this case, 1,600 continuing care residents in Alberta have passed away. Not only is that a staggering number in its own right, but that means that almost 15,000 people had a loved one who was in continuing care whose loss they are continuing to mourn to this day. Fifteen thousand people. That's about a third of the residents of Edmonton-Gold Bar, for example. We've got about 45,000 people who live in Edmonton-Gold Bar. If we put all of those people in one place, at least a third of the neighbourhoods that I represent would be mourning a loss to COVID-19. This is a staggeringly high number, Mr. Speaker.

You know, the fact that nobody from Executive Council, particularly the Premier, has even apologized for a single death, not once – 15,000 people who would at the very least appreciate words of comfort or solace, compassion, empathy from the government, some kind of acknowledgement of their pain, and there is nothing coming from the government in that respect.

It makes one wonder if they even care that 1,600 people have needlessly lost their lives to this disease that they failed to take seriously. They certainly acted way too late even though the warning signs were quite clear five or six waves in a row. Now we don't even hear about COVID anymore. The Health minister makes an announcement once every week, and he limits that to 30 minutes a week, not even enough time to give journalists an opportunity to ask him any questions about what's going on with the state of the pandemic, with the state of our continuing care system, with the state of our health care system in general. It's as if the government just wants COVID to go down the memory hole, for people to forget about it.

That's why I think it's really important to send this bill to committee, Mr. Speaker, because there are at least 15,000 people who want to know what this piece of legislation will do to protect other families from losing loved ones in this pandemic. It's not over. Just because the government refuses to release any data, refuses to conduct adequate testing, refuses to do any form of contact tracing, refuses to provide timely data – the pandemic is still occurring, and we know that seniors in continuing care are at extremely high risk of contracting this disease and dying from it still.

I think that would be an interesting question for the committee to look into: what will the changes that are being brought forward in this legislation mean for the spread of COVID-19 in continuing care facilities? Is it adequate to prevent the spread of COVID-19? Is it adequate to prevent further hospitalizations and deaths of continuing care residents?

Now, call me a wide-eyed radical, Mr. Speaker, but I don't believe that living in continuing care should be a death sentence. But for at least 1,600 Albertans it was. What more do we need to do to protect people in these continuing care facilities from suffering that same fate? Is this legislation going to be enough, or is there more that needs to be put into this legislation that could be helpful in preventing the disease?

You know, some of my colleagues have raised a number of issues that are not addressed in this piece of legislation regarding standards of work, regulations regarding staffing levels, those kinds of things. Those are critical to not only providing good care under any circumstances but to providing safe care during a pandemic.

You know, I will give the government credit for at least getting one thing partially right. They were dragged, kicking and screaming, into issuing a single-site work order for continuing care facilities, and that was the right thing to do. I shudder to think about how many more people would have died in continuing care facilities had the government not even had the decency to implement that simple measure. But the fact of the matter remains that there are a whole host of additional measures that need to be implemented to keep continuing care residents safe and as healthy as possible.

You know, Mr. Speaker, my impressions of what goes on in continuing care facilities are heavily coloured by the experiences of my oldest daughter, who began her practice as a health care aide in a continuing care facility here in the city of Edmonton in December 2020. I note that that's an interesting juxtaposition, that my daughter was going to work to take care of continuing care patients when members of Executive Council and their companions in the government caucus were jetting off to Hawaii for a bit of a break.

That wasn't the case in our family. My daughter was putting on her scrubs and going to work, doing everything she could to keep the residents in her care safe and healthy and provide them a decent quality of life. That work has been incredibly stressful over the last year and a bit. She has come home in tears more times than she has come home with a smile on her face because of her experiences at work. She's got a workload that is far beyond her capacity and the capacity of all of her companions at work to manage. She deals day in and day out with work colleagues who are stressed to the maximum level because . . . [Mr. Schmidt's speaking time expired]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to get up and speak to this referral motion because I believe it's so important that we do so. Already in debate I've highlighted a number of issues where this bill actually falls amazingly short. I've had exchanges with the minister already on some of those, but I hope to raise a few more today. I acknowledge that Bill 11 is really, you know, an administrative piece of legislation to consolidate bills and regulations and make administrative updates, but we have yet to hear from this government, for example, on the recommendations from the facility-based continuing care review. The minister could've taken this opportunity to bring forward into this House a bill that actually dealt with those recommendations.

Mr. Speaker, here I believe we have another case of this government refusing to actually listen to Albertans and simply going full steam ahead on its own ideological approach. To me, I see it like night and day. You know, I've said it before and I'll say it again, that this government tends to listen to the people that share their ideology and that's it. It's quite unfortunate because, of course, we're here to govern for all Albertans, and as the members on the other side of the House can see and the members over here to my right can see, there are another 24 members in this House that don't particularly share your ideological perspective, and like that, Albertans voted for us to be in this particular space and hold this place, this chair.

I think it's imperative that especially when it comes to continuing care – and, I mean, we've highlighted this before, the fact that 1,600 people lost their lives during COVID. Like, to me, I just find that unfathomable because it's something that could've been avoided had a proper, adequate approach been taken. Now, I get it, you know, because often when we get into debate around COVID, members on the other side are saying: oh, well, did you want to shut down the economy?

An Hon. Member: Yup.

An Hon. Member: No.

Member Loyola: You know, I'm hearing it echoed by murmurs on the other side of the House right now. By no means did we want to shut down the economy.

That's what you get from the other side, Mr. Speaker, this rhetoric of it's either this or that. Always. It always comes down to you're either with us or you're against us. There's no measured approach or capacity – no, not capacity; I would say opportunity to really reflect that it's not the economy over lives or lives over the economy. We can work out in a measured way practical approaches that deal with the issues at hand. We need to get beyond the rhetoric.

I truly would like to get beyond the rhetoric, you know, because it's getting to a state where it's – well, never mind my opinion. Never mind my opinion. Albertans are getting sick and tired of the rhetoric. They want to see concrete action taken. For them, their loved ones are so important, as our loved ones are to us. We're talking about 1,600 people in continuing care.

I understand that the minister is bringing forward this piece of legislation here, but we have so many other things to deal with. For me, it's – I mentioned it before in debate, when we were on the general bill, and I think it warrants repeating here, and that is the fact that when it comes to the workers in this particular industry, they tend to be racialized Albertans, new Canadians. They don't have benefits. Often they're working one or even two jobs to be able to make ends meet. You know, I'm not even going to get into the fact that Albertans are going through a really tough time right now in terms of affordability.

What I am saying is that the approach that this government and previous governments – I'll be honest, Mr. Speaker. It's the actions of previous governments in continuing care that have got us to the stage where we are today, previous Conservative governments. When continuing care went to the profit model, I would say that the quality of continuing care went down. Companies were more focused on their bottom line than actually caring for these – I mean, don't get me wrong. I understand that they hire people to do that work. The people that they hire to do that work I believe are committed and dedicated, and they love doing that job, or else they wouldn't be in that industry. I take my hat off to them, and I applaud them because I wouldn't be able to do that job of caring for people in continuing care. I wouldn't be able to do that job. I mean, don't get me wrong. You know, I have a big heart, but let me tell you, having to take care of people day in, day out: maybe I could do it for a while, but I couldn't do it as a job.

I believe that this government desperately needs to hear from those people when it comes to the issues at hand and the fact that, you know, we – the bill does not do enough. It doesn't even answer, doesn't even address this particular issue when it comes to the people who work in this particular industry. It begs me to ask the question: is the government going to share the consultation report on the bill itself, and what is specifically supported by stakeholders, and where are the gaps when it comes to this? Again, when it comes to staffing, it's a shame that a lot of these workers are in a situation where they had to go from one facility to another facility. We saw that, unfortunately, because of the fact that they had to go from one job to another job, there was a risk of them actually spreading COVID to other facilities. What were the companies doing in order to reduce that risk? That's not being addressed when it comes to this particular bill.

According to the facility-based continuing care review, it mentions that close to 6,000 more staff need to be hired. Six thousand staff need to be hired. Mr. Speaker, through you to the minister, I would hope that he could address, like: what is the minister actively doing in order to make sure that those 6,000 staff members could be hired? And why is that not being addressed in this bill?

In my own particular opinion I believe that there's much that this bill does not cover, which is why we need to refer it to committee so that we can hear from more people on exactly what this bill will actually be doing. Of course, it is a huge concern that – for example, let's even get to the seniors in our community. You know, while we were in government, we had the independent Seniors Advocate. That's something that was taken away, but I think that it would go a long way, especially when it comes to continuing care, for the minister to really consider: how do seniors advocate for themselves to this government and to this Legislature? We need more accountability. We need more accountability when it comes to seniors, particularly those seniors who are in continuing care.

It's a shame that this government actually decided to get rid of that office. I think that it would be a good opportunity to hear from stakeholders that do seniors advocacy to actually address some of the issues that they're most concerned about when it comes to continuing care and the fact that we lost so many people during this COVID pandemic, which, of course, is ongoing.

Regardless of what this government wants to say, there are still people dying because of COVID. There are still people that are contracting the virus to this day. Yes, it might be fewer, but it's still an issue. You know, I'm not even going to get into it with the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, on the effects of long COVID on people and what this government is actually going to do in order to address that particular issue, which I think is something that we can't put on the back burner. We've got to deal with it and how people's lives have been impacted by COVID.

I heard a story about a young man who actually, you know, ironically – I didn't even put this together until now – used to work in continuing care. He actually ended up contracting the virus and now has long COVID. He was a young, healthy man in his 20s. Now he runs out of breath just making his bed. That's the reality that we're dealing with. This is an individual who used to work in continuing care, of course a new Canadian from a racialized community. What's this individual going to do for the rest of his life? Like the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, I wish that this government would actually speak to these people, that they'd have an opportunity to provide feedback, to tell their stories so that they can feel, at the bare minimum, just listened to. It's a grave situation for these individuals. When I heard his story, I couldn't help but just be incredibly saddened by it, a young man not being able to work anymore because he just becomes incredibly exhausted even just making his bed.

So I think that there are a number of reasons why this legislation needs to be referred to committee. It doesn't address any of the, I would say, important and pertinent issues that we could be dealing with when it comes to continuing care here in the province of Alberta. I'd love to hear more from the minister on these particular issues that I'm raising, because we need to get to some kind of resolution on these issues. These concerns I've been hearing from a lot of people in the community. I've been hearing from a lot of people in the community who have been drastically impacted, you know, with a loved one in care. Some of them have passed away.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Minister of Health has risen.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'd like to thank the hon. members for Edmonton-Gold Bar and Edmonton-Ellerslie for engaging in the debate on the referral amendment with regard to Bill 11. I'd like to take a moment to answer some of their questions and, as well, speak to the referral amendment.

First off, Mr. Speaker, it appears that, you know, there are two arguments why the members opposite are suggesting that we take the bill and refer it to committee. The first is in regard to lack of consultation, and the second is in regard, quite frankly, to their arguments that we need to do more in this bill. I want to deal with both of those.

First, in regard to lack of consultation, I'd like to share with the hon. members across the way that there has been significant consultation and significant demand for changes that we're making in this particular bill. You know, over the years many continuing care stakeholders have asked the Ministry of Health to review Alberta's legislation to address the challenges that exist in the system, and the legislation review was part of our broader commitment to transform the continuing care system, to do everything that we can to ensure Albertans have access to high-quality continuing care.

We engaged numerous continuing care stakeholder organizations and received 33 written submissions that identified issues and recommendations for improvement. Additionally, input was received through a home-care and nursing home regulation review that took place. The legislative review was also informed by advice and recommendations from the facility-based continuing care review, which received feedback from over 7,000 Albertans, including residents, family members, caregivers, operators, and community organizations.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank everyone who was involved in terms of developing this, but there has been significant consultation, and quite frankly we don't need to do any more consultation. We need to move forward with this bill, and time is of the essence, but I'll get to that in a second.

The second reason that the members opposite suggested that this should go through referral is not about what's in the bill but about what's not in the bill. [interjection] To the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar: I'll finish my remarks, and then I'll provide an opportunity for you to speak. But thanks for rising.

They speak to a number of issues, and, Mr. Speaker, I fully appreciate that these are real issues. These issues were identified in the facility-based continuing care review, issues regarding, you know, the number of spaces, issues regarding the need to move to home care, issues regarding staffing and how we provide staffing, which is particularly challenging. And we have turnover.

Mr. Speaker, I want to point out to the hon. members that these are important issues, but the reality is that these issues are program issues, these are policy issues, and these are regulation issues that are addressed through regulations and programs and policies today, and quite frankly that is the appropriate place for them to be addressed tomorrow. Sending this to committee to deal with those issues: that's the wrong place. The right place is when we actually do the regulations and we do the policies as government, as we announce our response to the FBCC. I can tell the hon. members that we are taking the facility-based continuing care review very seriously, and we've actually started the transformation. Where the transformation has to happen is in policy, it's in regulation, and it's in the budget.

At the end of the day, it's the money that we put into the system that is incredibly important to get the results. Mr. Speaker, in Budget 2022 we are spending those dollars to start the transformation. We have input significant dollars, you know: $1.7 billion for community care, an increase of $122 million, or 76 per cent, from '21-22; $1.2 billion for continuing care, an increase of $16 million, or a 1.3 per cent increase; and, most importantly, $750 million for home care, an increase of $81 million. That's part of the transformation to be able to enable home care, more slots, because we understand – we heard it from the FBCC; we heard it from the review – that people want to be looked after in their homes, and we will expand that.

This is, Mr. Speaker, a first step – quite frankly, this legislation is a first step – to be able to take all of the legislation that right now is scattered across our legislative environment. There are holes in between. What will this legislation do? Well, it'll do a number of things. We will have one overarching piece of legislation. This will provide consistency and alignment across the continuing care system. It will replace multiple acts with one piece of modern, streamlined legislation. It'll improve transparency and accountability, which is incredibly important, particularly learning lessons from COVID. It will enable a person-centred, flexible, and innovative system of care for Albertans now and also in the future and establish a consistent approach and alignment for legislative requirements and services across the continuing care system.

It'll address gaps in our current legislation and provide greater authority to effectively monitor and enforce compliance. No longer will we only have either “do nothing” or “pull the licence or the certification,” but we'll have a middle road, where we can apply administrative penalties. What's important, Mr. Speaker, is that we provide the service that Albertans need in continuing care facilities, in the continuing care environment, and ensure that we change behaviours to enable that.

This legislation, Mr. Speaker, starts the journey, just like Budget '22 starts the journey in terms of our transformation. The appropriate place for the details, what the hon. members across the way are saying are not in the act, is not in the act, and they actually even recognize this with the language that they use in terms of regulation. That's where it belongs. It belongs in regulation. We need flexibility to modify and change that over time. We've had significant consultation. The members opposite are quite right. This is a matter that we must address, and we must address it now. This legislation will enable us to do this. It'll enable us to start addressing all of these issues once we move into the regulatory framework.

Sending it to committee, quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, is not a good use of our time. A good use of our time is actually passing this legislation, putting it through the Legislature. Then we can continue the challenging and hard work – and it'll take some time – to continue to work with the stakeholders and continue to hear from Albertans to get the regulations done and then also respond to the FBCC, apply the budget dollars associated with that so that we can actually improve our continuing care system.

Mr. Speaker, I'll take just one more moment, and then I'm happy to take a question from the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. I'll ask all members of the Chamber to vote against this referral amendment. I'd ask you to support the legislation for what it is, which is bringing disparate pieces together in one place to provide a single framework so that we can continue the important work of improving the continuing care system.

I appreciate the comments from the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, you know, that this shouldn't be ideological. This should be a focus on “How do we improve our continuing care system?” which we're doing. This is a first step to put in place a framework. I'd ask the members opposite to evaluate it for what it is, which is that, which is a framework. This is far better than the legislation that we have here. It will enable us to make meaningful steps moving forward.

If the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar would like to ask a question or make a comment, I'm happy to listen.

Mr. Schmidt: I appreciate the minister's willingness to engage in debate on this matter; I truly do. The question that I have is asked in good faith. I appreciate that he is saying that we are at the beginning of a journey to reform continuing care and, hopefully, for the better, but I think an important part of the journey is reconciling with the past, particularly with the past mismanagement of COVID. What forum will the minister provide the people of Alberta to share their stories and experiences with loved ones who were lost in the continuing care facilities due to COVID so that they can at least have their experiences heard, validated, and acted upon by this government? Will the minister commit to providing that kind of forum to the families who have lost loved ones in continuing care during the COVID pandemic?

Mr. Copping: I thank the hon. member for his question, and I appreciate that people, sadly, passed away due to COVID and in continuing care facilities. This has happened not only here in Alberta but, quite frankly, around the world. As I indicated previously in this House in other questions and debate, there will be a comprehensive review of the government's response to COVID. But I would like to point out that we already have heard in terms of some concerns that were raised on COVID in our facility-based continuing care review.

One of the key items that came out of that, which we're already taking action on now, Mr. Speaker, is a recognition that, you know, when we took a look at the data – and this is a general observation – the correlation was generally between not public or private or not-for-profit, but it was, really, older facilities versus newer facilities. Really, what that was about was about those facilities where there were shared rooms or shared bathrooms, which tended to have a higher propensity for outbreak. Not all the cases, but there are certain – Bethany, for example, is an exception to the rule on some of this. But we’ve already learned from that, right? We’ve already heard the concerns raised associated with that, and we have taken action on that.

We’re actually moving away, quite frankly, and we’re actually providing the funding to move away from dual-occupancy rooms and moving to a single base room. Mr. Speaker, you know, I’m very pleased that our budget, Budget ’22, not only includes additional funding for continuing care spaces, but it also includes operating expenses. We will have an additional 1,500 more rooms built this year in continuing care, and those are single-occupancy rooms. We are also investing another $204 million in capital in terms of additional continuing care spaces. That includes our standard congregate care spaces but also smaller – we’re looking at RFPs right now – more homelike or campuslike spaces, that are very small and in a smaller number, those types of continuing care facilities. We’ve already put out an RFP for Indigenous communities to build facilities, because we recognize that people want to live closer to home. Also, there will be an RFP for renovations of current facilities in certain areas, and that’s just the first step.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard and taken the lessons learned already in regard to COVID. We are investing capital. We’re putting our money where our mouth is, right? We’re investing capital and additional funds to be able to support the start of our transformation. But, again, the first step in getting our legislation right is this bill, so I’m asking all members to vote down the referral, to actually move forward in terms of supporting this bill so that we can get it right and can move on to the next step, which is doing the policy changes and doing the regulations, you know, in concert with operators, in concert with individuals who use the system, to make sure that we get the regulations right so that we can transform the system and respond to the facility-based continuing care review.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has risen.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’m pleased to rise to speak on this referral motion. I’m grateful that the minister has taken the time to be in the Chamber to hear the debate as well. I think that is exactly how things should go when we are proposing large pieces of legislation that have an effect on people’s lives in such a direct way.

In order to illustrate the point that I think some of my hon. colleagues have made around the need to have some public conversation around what happened over the last couple of years for folks in continuing care – it’s not just people who had COVID and perhaps had complications and then died from it but people who were accessing medical care in the continuing care system during COVID, and the types of challenges that they and their families went through at that time were considerable. What it did was that it laid bare, Mr. Speaker, essentially, the fact that continuing care is barely adequate during normal times and broke in many cases under the strain of the pandemic.

I will tell one story, and that is of one of the minister’s own constituents. She lived in Calgary-Varsity. When I helped pack up her house, it had been 50-some years that they lived in Varsity. About a year ago, over Easter, Mary Braun had a stroke. She was scheduled to go into an assisted living facility with her husband, and that never happened. She moved between acute care and continuing care for the next several months, about six months, eight months, in which her one son that lived in town visited her at least once a day if not twice to make sure that she was getting the hours of care that she needed, because the people who were there either in the acute-care system – but, more specifically, once she was moved to continuing care, she did not have what she needed.

The folks who staff continuing care facilities are run off their feet. They are ill-equipped to provide the level of care that someone at that level of health risk needed. They’re oftentimes health care aides, the HCA, or those kinds of designations. They are not RNs or nurse practitioners or even often LPNs. So the level of care for someone going through rehabilitation, a very elderly person, from a stroke was not there – was not there – for her.

She needed to be in the hospital, but a pandemic was being managed according to hospital capacity, which then affected people who caught COVID, for sure, but as well those who didn’t but needed the health care system. Taking the health care system to the brink meant that Mary Braun’s life was deprived in her end days of the level of care she needed, and ignoring what doctors were saying about the management of the pandemic likely cut her life short during the fourth wave. It meant that in her dying days she was cared for by people who gave their all but who didn’t understand why their government didn’t value their work and was attacking them at that time.

Now, we have a mixed-market system that sometimes can and does regress to the lowest common denominator in continuing care. What the pandemic has taught us is that that does not serve people when we have people in continuing care who do not get the level of care that they deserve. You can queue-jump if you’re willing to pay for it. You absolutely can. That presents an awful set of decisions and dilemmas for families to make very difficult decisions when they are going through very difficult end of life and end-of-life care decisions as it is.

In a better managed system Mary Braun’s husband of 62 years wouldn’t have been across town when she died because there would have been a way to make sure that that assisted living and continuing care system merged so that he could have been there. In a better managed system she wouldn’t have been moved three times in search of relief from the heat because of a completely nonsensical policy of no one being able to open a window during a heat wave, so the rooms were 40 degrees. Elderly people, who are probably not eating enough, probably not drinking enough anyway, stroke patients who cannot eat and drink in the same ways that we can were sweltering, perishing in that heat for bureaucratic reasons.

Now, the goals of legislation need to be that we have standards and targets and rules that we run our system by. This legislation does that, but it does not set fees, set out conditions and standards around occupational health and safety or other pieces that we know we need to protect those workers, make sure they’re not doing the kinds of lifting and so on that will hasten their exit from this important work. It does not set out staff-patient ratios and hours of care. Now, the minister may be right that some of these decisions are best subsumed to regulation, but I would submit to him that probably not all, that at least in some cases, when we have such a clear crisis in long-term care, in assisted living facilities, when the pandemic laid bare so many failures of policy, of regulation, all of the things that the minister says are under the iceberg of legislation – and he is quite right. There must be one or two that we can elevate into saying, as an expression of this Legislature, that these are the rules, thus far and no further.

Even better, given that these are people who have given their entire lives to this province and have worked extremely hard to build their lives here, in the minister’s own constituency in Mary’s case, educating children for 50 years, maybe legislation isn’t just about saying, “Here are the basic rules,” but maybe legislation also aspires to something better for people in their last days, because when all that is left is a twice-daily visit from the most proximate son to make sure that you have something to eat and drink, when all that is left is the daily advocacy from a family member to make sure that you are not sweltering in the 40-degree heat, you need the public, you need this Legislature, you need your community and your neighbours to care about what those standards are and to do better.

One year ago the minister's own review indicated that 6,000 FTEs were required to solve the problem, that we needed to increase the proportion of full-time staff, increase the amount and hours of care, and ensure better conditions of work. Those promises are not fulfilled in this legislation. It is not just people at the end of their days to whom we owe that respect and that dignity and that public responsibility for how we leave, but it is also to their families. So we don't just do it for the care and comfort of the elderly, as if that should not be enough, because it should and it is. But the amount of stress that we put on families, the decisions that people have to make, whether to hire more care, whether to go into for-profit long-term care at the cost of thousands upon thousands of dollars a month just to get what one would consider basic – those are not decisions that family members should have to make, and we should aspire to better.

I think a very quick committee exercise might be able to identify one or two of those metrics or standards or targets or staffing ratios or commitments or absolute public policy goals that we will not waver on, that a cabinet table cannot simply brush aside. Those are endeavours that are worthy of this House, that are worthy of people being able to point to to say: see, we believe in this, we care about this, and we want to alleviate the suffering that this system currently does not advertently cause but definitely inadvertently causes.

I cannot tell you how depressing it is, Mr. Speaker, for a family member to be riding in an elevator in a continuing care facility with an outside medical professional who was coming in to visit a patient and being told that the facility is just a place where we warehouse the dying. We can do better than that. We can do better than that for people like Mary and her family, who navigated this long-term care system through COVID-19. She was a public school teacher her entire life. She educated generations of children. I met someone recently that learned to read because of Mary Braun. So I think we can all take up our share of the work and the burden of making sure that the legislative framework that we have for long-term care is also literate in terms of its standards and what it sets out as our goals as a society.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this evening to speak to Bill 11. I believe we're on REF 1, a referral from my hon. colleague to not have this piece of legislation read a second time but to have it referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities. I really need to acknowledge the powerful story that the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West just shared. I think that hearing Mary Braun's story and her experience was something that this Legislature needs to hear.

There are over 1,600 continuing care residents in the province that, tragically, passed away from COVID. Mr. Speaker, I know that my office has been inundated with heartbreaking, tragic stories like that of Mary, that we just heard. I think the importance of giving voice to those family members, those loved ones, those caregivers is so important, because the best way to learn is to examine what went wrong, and the best way to do that is through human experience, through human story, to hear from those that were directly impacted by those loved ones in continuing care.

I think that referring this to committee is exactly what needs to happen. I don't believe that waiting for government to make up the regulations is something that we can trust. We watched this government during – I'm not even sure which wave it was, to be quite honest: took grieving families' right to seek justice away. I heard the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar ask: how are those that were impacted going to be able to share their stories? The only way to truly make a change is to hear those stories, be present and listen and then learn from it and do better. I think that having it in front of committee – I think you would have a lot more than a few individuals respond, because my office hears from individuals all the time, whether it's a friend who is caring for a loved one or a family member or a staff that works in these continuing care facilities. These stories need to be brought to light. They need to be shared.

We saw what happened when the military went into different provinces across Canada to support the continuing care facilities and the horrific stories that came out of those experiences. To me, Mr. Speaker, the only way that we can truly have an impact and make meaningful change is through having those shared, and having the referral to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities does exactly that. I used to chair this committee, and I can tell you that when we did outreach and asked for community engagement, we had huge success. It was a place where people could submit their stories, their recommendations, their ideas, their thoughts to members that were tasked with doing just that. It wasn't something that happened behind closed doors around a minister's cabinet table. It was wide open for the community to see. Members of the public could come and sit and watch and engage through writing in a submission, asking to present in person.

I have to tell you that being able to be part of that process is so meaningful. Healing occurs when that happens. When we're talking about the importance of this legislation and the desire that the minister shared to get it right, I think this is the logical next step in getting it right, being able to refer it to a committee where that direct focus work can actually occur. I would encourage all members to really reflect on the messages that you've been hearing because I know that it's not just Edmonton-Castle Downs and members of the NDP caucus that are receiving this information. It's being CCed to the minister's office. It's being CCed to the seniors office. We need to bring it to light and share it in committee.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take my seat. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members joining debate on REF 1? I believe you opened this. I think there's actually only one. I believe that Edmonton-Rutherford has spoken to this. Yes, you have. There is actually only one member of that caucus, I believe, who hasn't spoken to REF 1. You have already spoken. [interjection] Yeah, to REF 1. You were the – one, two, three. I believe you were the fourth speaker. There is one should he so choose.

Hearing none, I am prepared to ask the question.

[Motion on amendment REF 1 lost]

The Acting Speaker: We are back on the main bill, Bill 11, Continuing Care Act. Are there any members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Calgary- . . .

An Hon. Member: Bhullar-McCall.

The Acting Speaker: . . . Bhullar-McCall. I was close, though.

Mr. Sabir: I rise to move that we adjourn debate on Bill 11.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 16
Insurance Amendment Act, 2022

[Debate adjourned April 26: Ms Renaud speaking]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Again, you know, here we have another example similar to the bill we just finished debating, or the referral on the last bill that we just finished debating. We have such serious issues that need to be dealt with in terms of insurance. We've spoken at length in this House already about how – you know what I find funny? You know, what I find funny, Mr. Speaker, is that repeatedly the Minister of Finance will get up and he'll be like, "Oh, prices are coming down," but that's after they've gone up 30 per cent. To get up and have the gall to say, "Oh, well, they're coming back down a little" after they've gone up 30 per cent: pardon me for saying so, but to me that's like a slap in the face to Albertans. Really, it is. It's a slap in the face, right? I mean, there's no other way to describe that, to be like: "Hey, we're taking this cap off. Your prices are going to go up by 30 per cent. Oh, but you know what? They've come down just a tiny bit. They've come down just a tiny bit."

At a time when inflation is at its worst, repeated legislation brought forward by this particular government has increased prices on Albertans in dramatic ways, especially during COVID. That exacerbated the economic crisis. Here they had an opportunity to actually address Albertans and the fact that their insurance has gone up so high, yet we got this piece of legislation before us right now. So I find it incredible that they would bring this in. Like, I understand – okay? – maybe this is something that obviously needs to be done in order to help out companies. I get that. But then I ask myself: why is this the priority when Albertans are the ones that are suffering the most?

Albertans are the ones that need some kind of help when it comes to insurance costs. That's the real issue here. That's what most Albertans are concerned about. I mean, I can't tell you the number of e-mails I received regarding this particular issue. To me – yeah, there's no other way to put it, Mr. Speaker – it's a slap in the face. Yet again this UCP government has refused to take any action whatsoever to reduce the auto insurance bills that are punishing families since they removed this rate cap, and Albertans would like them to answer for that.

You know, I see that the members from the UCP caucus are copied on the same e-mails that I'm getting, so I have to ask myself: why are members of their caucus so silent about this? Why do they refuse to even get up in this House and actually discuss what could potentially be done? Give us some kind of an alternative on your side of the House that would actually deal with the skyrocketing costs of insurance in this province. But all we get is rhetoric from the other side, them just blaming it on us, like we do everything in this House. They've been in government for three years, yet all they can do is go to their rhetoric of: well, what's happening right now is your fault.

When it came to utilities, you know, they got up repeatedly in this House and blamed the whole utility costs on us, yet we demonstrated that this is the result of them privatizing the system, actually going all the way back to the decisions made by previous Conservative governments, including Ralph Klein, Stelmach, and Redford. It's incredibly disingenuous – incredibly disingenuous – that members on that side of the House, the minister of natural gas himself get up and blame high utility costs on the Alberta NDP. Incredibly disingenuous.

You know, they like to say that we're responsible for historical revisionism. It's them, Mr. Speaker, who are guilty of this, not us, and they need to address it. They need to address it. Here was an opportunity for this government to actually address the skyrocketing, high insurance costs that Albertans are experiencing right now, at such a drastic time that is COVID, yet we have nothing.

You know, they refused our proposal for a legislative committee that would investigate why auto insurance premiums are so high. Why? Why not study this in more detail? Again, Mr. Speaker, why not have an alternative to actually address the issue? No alternative, no opportunity to actually put together a committee that will delve into why the cost of insurance is so high, but we've got plenty of rhetoric, blaming it all on us, again another reason why Albertans cannot trust this government. They just cannot trust this government when it comes to this particular issue. [interjection] For sure. Go ahead, Member.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, this is the second speech I've heard this evening from the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie saying that we have to stop throwing stones in a glass house. To me, it looks a lot like the kettle calling the pot black. The previous sentence before the intervention was accepted was: you have to stop just blaming us. Also: this is just the Conservatives' fault, going back to Klein. If the member has an issue with a particular piece of the legislation, I encourage him, I challenge him to cite the problem with the bill exactly. Please pick one section of the bill you have an issue with. I'm happy to engage on that. But a general sort of mudslinging of saying, "Conservatives blame us, so we blame you back" and also "You can't do that" is not helpful to the debate in the House.

Member Loyola: Well, thank you for the intervention from the member. Unfortunately, you don't get to dictate debate. You don't get to dictate debate.

Of course, where I was is that this government can't be trusted because all they do is bring rhetoric into the House. They don't give opportunities. I mean, yesterday alone, Mr. Speaker, we had four proposed amendments for one of their pieces of legislation, and they turned down each and every one of them.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Member Loyola: And they're proud of it, which shows that, you know, they can't play with others in the sandbox.

Mrs. Frey: How many amendments you did accept from the opposition?

Member Loyola: I can tell you that we accepted. We accepted. I don't have the exact number off the top of my head, but I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we did accept amendments from the opposition while we were in government. I remember doing it.

To date this government has yet to accept even one amendment from the opposition, which, again, just goes to demonstrate that all they're focused on is their own ideological approach. They listen only to people that share their ideological perspective, and they do not even want to consider amendments that will actually help Albertans, Mr. Speaker. There were four amendments that could have helped Albertans.

You know, this is the thing: we have, again, repeated pieces of legislation that come before this House that don't even deal with the priorities that Albertans have when it comes to the high cost of living here in the province, inflation. We could be dealing with so many issues, yet we get these bills on – I'm sure they're needed; don't get me wrong, Mr. Speaker. But what I'm talking about is prioritizing and working on behalf of Albertans and making sure that certain things are getting addressed, like the high cost of utilities, which we were debating last night.

They weren't capable of accepting even one of our proposed amendments here in the House last night. I can only hope that with this piece of legislation we can actually – well, there's the thing, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that over the last three years this government refused to accept even one amendment. It actually gives you no hope that they're going to accept any. There's actually no political will on this front bench to actually work with us for the benefit of Albertans. That's what we're seeing from this government.

It's not a strange thing to say that they're just so focused on their own ideological approach that they refuse to actually debate any of their bills or accept any amendments or work with us in any particular way to actually . . .

Mrs. Frey: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: A point of order has been called.
Go ahead.

Point of Order Relevance

Mrs. Frey: Yeah. Under 23(b), relevance, Mr. Speaker. I am really confused as to when the member has ever cited the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022. FYI, that is the bill we're on right now, Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act. I haven't heard him say "insurance" in the past three minutes. I've heard the same rinse-and-repeat speech that we've heard on just about every single bill from that member, so I'm curious if he could get back on the task at hand, or maybe he needs new talking points.

The Acting Speaker: Anyone willing to respond? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's not a point of order. It's possible that the member didn't like what my colleague was saying. We are on second reading. We are discussing the principles of the legislation, and usually there is a broad, I guess, range of things that we can talk about. Insurance is one of those things that directly has bearing on the cost of living that Albertans are facing. He was certainly bringing up relevant examples of how other things are adding and piling on to this insurance. I think that he was well within his right when he was discussing about the cost of living.

The Acting Speaker: Well stated, and I agree.
The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Debate Continued

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, let me get to this point, then. If they're not happy with the fact that the primary concern of Albertans is the fact that the cost of everything is going up – and, yeah, I was giving the example of utilities and the fact that they refuse to accept any amendments on any of the things that we had proposed yesterday in debate. Fine. After a hundred years of this government producing a report on insurance to Albertans to let them know what was actually happening with insurance premiums and profits in the industry, they decide that they're going to cover up this report. They're not going to release it. They're not going to try to talk about it, of course, this after a 30 per cent increase to Albertans when it came to their insurance.

An Hon. Member: Can you table that?

Member Loyola: I have several e-mails from constituents stating so.

Mr. Speaker, this is what Albertans are concerned about. This government tried to cover up the fact that immense profits were being made by insurance companies when it came to Albertans because they know that the costs had gone up significantly, and then when we called them out on it, they finally decide to release the information, to release the report. I can tell you that Albertans are even more irate than ever. At a time of economic crisis worsened by COVID, the fact that insurance companies raised costs to such a considerable amount on Albertans – and then they see how much in profit these companies were making: again, another slap in the face to Albertans. That's what this is truly about.

I would like this government to actually prioritize – I would like this government to actually prioritize – the needs of Albertans. When we have a bill like this, which I get – I understand that it's necessary, and I'm not particularly against any part of this particular bill. My primary focus is Albertans first, Mr. Speaker. This government could have used this opportunity to bring forward a bill into this Legislature that would actually deal with the primary concern that Albertans have, which is the high cost of insurance. This government has refused to work with the opposition in any way in order to address any of the issues, has turned down the request or proposal to actually have a legislative committee that could actually delve deeper into these questions.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate an opportunity to make a couple of comments on Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022. I guess, you know, I generally feel okay about this bill. I know that there are some elements of commercial insurance that needed to get cleaned up. Indeed, it's an emerging market in regard to industrial insurance, especially insurance for the industrial space around energy, right? It seems obvious that the energy industry is having a harder time acquiring insurance, especially for conventional drilling and so forth.

You know, one of the background issues that I would think is making that more difficult is that it's becoming clear that over a long period of time lots of drillers – it seems to be part of their business plan to go out, create a company, drill, extract, then leave and somehow disappear or go bankrupt or change the name or do some other legal thing that would somehow extricate them from the responsibility they have to clean up that well. We've seen some version of that played out tens of thousands of times around the province of Alberta. Thus, we have the huge abandoned well problem that is all of our problem, really, just because so many companies maybe chose to do that even as part of their actual business plan to extract the oil or gas from any given site.

Over a long period of time – of course, insurance companies don't fool around, right? They look at probabilities, and they make calculations as to, you know, how likely they are going to have pay out on any given policy. I would suggest that part of the issue around energy companies having a hard time getting insurance is this long-standing circumstance where lots of people were engaged in this kind of irresponsible behaviour, drilling and then leaving, changing the name, going bankrupt, setting up something else, and away they go, right? So whenever we look at having to reform the insurance acts, amendments, in this province for industrial commercial insurance, I think we need to look at the larger landscape in which that insurance is functioning.

It seems to me that, you know, industrial companies and energy companies in particular are constantly looking for different ways by which to get insurance and new insurance vehicles, and I think that part of our responsibility as a provincial Legislature is to make sure we create a landscape that is fair and just and invites insurance companies to function here in a reasonable sort of way, because if it seems like it's a bit of a Wild West where people are allowed to engage in this kind of rogue activity, then insurance companies will say: well, we're not going to participate in that, thank you very much.

Part of what I see with this commercial insurance situation is that, of course, people are having to go overseas more often to get insurance for their industrial commercial insurance. Again, Mr. Speaker, any time that we see some business activity going overseas, then we're less likely to be benefiting from that here in the province, right? If people have to go to Bermuda or whatever to get their insurance and not get that insurance here, locally, then somehow that seems like lost business to our own province, right? That's an issue, I think.

I just want the government, perhaps during the course of discussions around Bill 16, to let us know: like, what's the plan here? It seems to me that – I mean, again, I can see the utility of having to make some of these reforms, but at the same time it just begs that question, for sure.

Of course, the other issue, much larger issue, is that, you know, considering all of the personal insurance issues that we have here in the province of Alberta, I think that, again, this just leaves the door wide open for people to say: well, yeah; let's talk about insurance; let's talk about my own personal property insurance and insurance on vehicles and so forth. We know that those forms of insurance are contributing significantly to the inflationary pressures that families are feeling here in the province of Alberta, more than other jurisdictions. Well, people will often try to say: oh, well, it's all the same in all the other places in the world, too. But in Alberta we have a very special problem where auto insurance, for example, and personal property insurance are increasing at a rate higher than other jurisdictions right across the country or even right across North America.

When at the very same time that food prices and energy prices and really pretty much the cost of living in general are going up, tacking on this outrageous insurance increase for property insurance and car insurance in particular just pushes a lot of people over the edge, especially when we consider that over the last 24 months or more people were driving a lot less. I mean, I know that I was, certainly. It bears out from statistics across the province that people were driving less, travelling less because of COVID restrictions. At the same time as that, their insurance went up significantly. You know, when people look at why and where and what is the cause of this, it points right back to this Legislature.

Just as a word of caution, when you put out a bill with the word "insurance" in it, you know, sure as heck you're going to attract lots of people that are very interested and will read it. Their anger will only continue to simmer when they see that, in fact: oh, the government is not actually dealing with my insurance problem, but they seem to be dealing with some other more esoteric industrial insurance issue that other people must need somehow, but it doesn't affect my problem that I have because I can't afford to insure my car. Like, that's the context in which we're operating, Mr. Speaker, and I think that we need to respect that because it's real, right?

Words are real, and they have meaning, and there's an insurance problem in this province right now.

Another issue that I just wanted to ask and put it out there rhetorically – and then, hopefully, the minister responsible will talk about this, right? – is this whole issue around unlicensed insurance, where you use a, quote, unquote, special broker. You know, those words: again, perhaps I don't understand what this is, but it seems a little bit dodgy. A foreign unlicensed insurer – like, really? – domiciled, say, in Bermuda doesn't pay. I mean, all of those words together, Mr. Speaker, will make you kind of sit up and go: "What? Like, is this something you get when you go to the back of a bar in Bermuda somehow and you can access that special unlicensed insurance?" I mean, insurance is all based on trust and law and, like, established procedures, so anything that doesn't sort of use the words that would describe that, to me, I think, is a red flag.

I'd like the minister responsible – I presume it's the Minister of Finance – to explain that. Are we in such a dire circumstance for getting industrial insurance that we have to somehow aid and abet unlicensed insurance brokers from foreign locations in order to try to get some version of insurance to function? I mean, I just find that a little bit – you know, at first blush, maybe there's an explanation, and, sure, I bet the Finance minister will do that for us because that's just the kind of guy he is, right?

Anyway, I mean, those are the main issues that I saw from first glance around Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act. I mean, I know that there's some version of this that I could see government – let's say us – doing, you know, some version of these things, but we would certainly do it, Mr. Speaker, in concert with reforming the overall insurance landscape here in the province of Alberta, because that's on fire, in case you didn't notice, right? People are literally having a hard time paying their property insurance, their house insurance, their perhaps life insurance, and especially their car insurance.

Well, I could sort of – I always try to visualize, right? Let's say we're trying to do some insurance amendment act, two thousand whatever, for industrial insurance. I'd say: "Okay. Yeah. Let's do that, but let's make sure that we solve this personal insurance problem because it's on fire, right?" We would all say: "Yeah. Let's do that, and we'll have two insurance bills at the same time." And people would say: "Wow. You guys are really acting on this insurance thing, not just for the big energy companies, God bless them, but for my family, too, which I care about even more."

With that, Mr. Speaker, those are my constructive criticisms about this one, and I hope that my questions will be answered. Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

9:00

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm enjoying the debate tonight. Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022, enables new insurance options for businesses, which will support jobs and economic growth in Alberta. Alberta businesses looking to bring their foreign insurance captives home will be able to do so without interruption to their operations. This bill also facilitates access to reinsurance, which is basically insurance for insurance companies, hopefully helping to address some scarce insurance options in portions of our market.

Facilitating access to reinsurance in Alberta's market will have a positive impact on expanding insurance capacity, which I know is a priority for everyone here, which, in turn, should help traditional insurers in serving Albertans and Alberta businesses. In fact, if Bill 16 is passed, Alberta will be the first Canadian jurisdiction to allow provincial insurers to have a reinsurance-specific business model.

Currently the reinsurance industry in Canada is limited, comprised mostly of foreign-based enterprises located in Europe, the United States, and Bermuda. This makes it more difficult, as you can imagine, for Canadian or Alberta-based insurers to access reinsurance. It's critical that we do everything we can to enable the insurance industry to build additional capacity in Alberta and to help diversify our provincial insurance sector. Bill 16 does this, again, by enabling Alberta businesses to bring foreign insurance captives home without affecting their operations and by facilitating access to reinsurance. Bill 16 also proposes a number of administrative amendments to the Insurance Act to enhance clarity and the efficiency of our regulatory framework.

It's a step forward. I don't see any major issues. I think it's a great bill, and I would encourage the members opposite and my colleagues to support it.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and offer some of my comments on Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022. I, first of all, want to start off by thanking my colleagues from Edmonton-Ellerslie, Edmonton-North West, and Calgary-South East for their comments on the legislation this evening, and I would like to do my best to add my own comments, building on the things that my predecessors mentioned in their remarks.

I want to particularly thank the Member for Calgary-South East for a very concise summary of the bill. He said that he would do nothing less, and he's certainly done nothing more, but I do appreciate the concise summary from the member, getting us back to what the bill entails. As that member said, this bill makes several changes to the insurance industry here in Alberta. It makes some changes to captive insurance companies and allows for captive insurance companies to redomesticate here in Alberta, bringing captive insurance companies home without any disruption in coverage.

As some of my colleagues have mentioned, a lot of these captive insurance companies are currently domiciled in Bermuda. Allow me to take a brief tangent, if you will, Mr. Speaker, on the topic of Bermuda. I want to extend my congratulations to the Canada under 17 women's soccer team, who defeated Bermuda this afternoon with a score of 5-nil. So congratulations to them. Of course, the U-17 Canadian women's soccer team has an important connection to Edmonton-Gold Bar. The grandfather of one of the players on the team is a resident of Gold Bar and a friend of mine. We are all very proud of the accomplishments of the under 17 women's Canadian soccer team in their defeat of Bermuda. So, you know, Bermuda, we came for your soccer team today; we're coming for your insurance companies tomorrow. You've been given notice. Bermuda, of course, is a jurisdiction that is no stranger to piracy. I guess we are raiding their insurance companies now but not at the end of a gun or with the use of a ship but with the stroke of a legislative pen. Anyway, this is probably good news for the insurance industry in Alberta.

The other pieces of this legislation allow reinsurance companies to be licensed here in Alberta for the first time. I think that this is an important step to addressing some of the really pressing issues around liabilities in the oil and gas sector in particular. It's my understanding that the government is making these changes in an attempt to allow insurance companies that are insuring oil and gas operations to apply for reinsurance to limit the risk to taxpayers for being on the hook when it comes to the massive oil and gas liabilities that can exist in the province of Alberta. This is an incredibly important piece of public policy that needs to be addressed. I am not convinced that just allowing reinsurance companies to set up shop here in Alberta will be the solution to the problem, but I don't think that there is any a risk to the taxpayers in allowing this to happen.

Then, finally, the bill makes it easier for Alberta companies to access unlicensed insurance. It sounds like a risky proposition to me, Mr. Speaker. I certainly wouldn't want to encounter an unlicensed driver. I wouldn't want to go to an unlicensed doctor. In fact, I'm afraid when I come across an unlicensed dog. So the concept of unlicensed insurers sounds a little bit risky to me, but I understand that there's a small market for that, and I think that these changes will probably be good, on balance, for the province of Alberta.

But, Mr. Speaker, one of my main concerns about this legislation is not the legislation itself but what's left out. As my friends from Edmonton-Ellerslie and Edmonton-North West have indicated, the people in our constituencies are not gripped every day with the issue of reinsurance or whether or not they can bring their captive insurance company home from Bermuda to set up in their garages in Edmonton-Gold Bar. I don't think that there's a single person who has written to me on this very issue. Nobody has said: you know, I sure would like to start a captive insurance company out of my garage and diversify the economy that way. This is something that only very sophisticated, high-finance types really operate in or understand and will benefit from. I don't think the average person in my riding will see any tangible benefit to their daily lives because of the measures that are contained in this bill.

But what they are gripped with is the rising cost of insurance across the board for all of the insurance products that they do buy. Now, my friends from Edmonton-North West and Edmonton-Ellerslie tonight have raised the issue of the skyrocketing cost of auto insurance, and I would echo those concerns. It's incredibly concerning to me, Mr. Speaker, that according to the government's own report auto insurance companies raked in $400 million more in premiums in 2020 than they did in 2019. Four hundred million dollars more in premiums. That's as if every man, woman, and child in the province of Alberta wrote a $100 cheque to a car insurance company for nothing, for getting nothing more than the services that they got in 2019.

Now, I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, there aren't very many families in Edmonton-Gold Bar who can afford to have every member of their household write a $100 cheque to an insurance company. They could certainly put that money to much better use. If you've seen the price of groceries in the grocery store these days, you know that $100 will buy about four gallons of milk, two boxes of cereal.

My point, Mr. Speaker, is that the price of groceries is exorbitantly high; $400 wouldn't even cover my electricity bill last month or my gas bill. The people of Alberta are facing incredible cost pressures in their daily lives, and they don't need to be sending a $100 cheque over and above what they sent to their car insurance companies last year. That's patently unfair. I certainly wish that this legislation acted on the concerns of everyday people with the urgency that they've acted on the concerns of the big insurance companies.

But it's not just automobile insurance that has gotten incredibly expensive. I continue to receive letters into my office every day about the rising cost of house insurance, and these letters have prompted me to look at the rising costs of my own house insurance.

I'm paying $300 more a year to insure the same house that I was in 2019. And let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the way I look after my house, it's certainly done nothing but gone down in value. Shingles need to be replaced; the windows are old. My kids are incredibly irresponsible and reckless, left massive holes in the carpets and in the linoleum, and they've let the faucets in the bathroom leak to the point where I don't think that anything can be fixed anymore. I'm sure that the city of Edmonton property evaluators say, "Well, let's take 20 per cent off what we evaluated this shack at last year," yet I'm paying $250, $300 more than I was in 2019 for this same house. That's not fair, and there's nothing in this legislation to address the rising cost of house insurance.

I know from the letters that I'm getting into my constituency office that I'm not alone. My friend from Calgary-Bhullar-McCall could fill up entire volumes of Hansard with stories about the rising cost of house insurance in the northeast part of Calgary. In fact, he's done a pretty good job of building a very successful political career on the issue of the rising cost of house insurance in northeast Calgary, because it's that serious an issue. The government is completely silent on it.

The one final area of insurance that is also going up is life insurance. Mr. Speaker, you know, people who take out life insurance policies want to know that after they leave this world, there will be a little bit of money left behind for their loved ones to look after their funeral expenses, maybe all of the related losses to losing a loved one, that those expenses are covered.

[The Speaker in the chair]

The cost of life insurance is going up significantly, too, in the province of Alberta. So why is it that the Minister of Finance has made the great effort, worked in great detail, to solve what I would say are legitimate concerns about the insurance industry in Alberta but ones that don't benefit everyday, average Albertans? Why couldn't he put that same effort into addressing the insurance concerns that everyday, average Albertans have? Take some meaningful steps to get the cost of car insurance under control, get the cost of house insurance under control, get the cost of life insurance under control so that the people in my riding and the people in the ridings of Calgary-Bhullar-McCall and Edmonton-Ellerslie and Edmonton-North West can rest assured that they can afford to pay the bills and make sure that their loved ones are looked after when they die, that their cars and any damage that they would incur while driving are covered and any losses to their homes are covered.

It's extremely frustrating, Mr. Speaker, that the priorities of this government are always on big business and in this case big insurance companies. Everyday Albertans are forgotten and in this case are left to pay the price for this government's concern with the insurance industry bottom lines.

In closing, I will say that I will vote for this bill. I don't think that there's anything here that is going to damage the people of Alberta greatly, but again I don't think there's anything in this bill that will benefit the people of Alberta significantly either.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, before the Assembly is second reading of Bill 16. Are there others? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to provide some comments at this stage of debate, where we have a motion to refer this Bill 16 for some further consideration. I do so largely because of what is not in this bill, as my hon. colleagues have indicated. What is on people's minds is their house policy, their business policies, and most certainly people's auto insurance policies. There is no question that the amount of correspondence that we have received on this matter since the removal of the cap on increases has been dwarfed, only really leaving aside the COVID-related correspondence, by curriculum and certainly in the office of Lethbridge-West the tremendously unpopular move to strip-mine the Rocky Mountains for metallurgical coal.

But auto insurance followed closely by utility bill costs are certainly on people's minds, and one of the things that could be in this bill, seized as it is with the importance of various commercial insurance arrangements, is better disclosure to people. There is no question that after 107 years the superintendent of insurance would release a report on the claims ratio of how much insurance companies brought in in premiums versus how much they paid out in claims. Now, the legislation indicates that the minister may make this report public. Here is a fantastic opportunity via Bill 16. Certainly, the public was not amused when they found out from the Official Opposition that this 107-year tradition of telling people what the claims ratio is – that is to say, how much money insurance companies are making from us, direct debited every month. People were not amused when they realized from the work the Official Opposition did that this information had been withheld from them for the first time in 107 years by this government.

Certainly, when it was revealed that auto insurance companies brought in $385 million more this year than over previous years in premiums at a time when, of course, people were phoning them and having policy changes and all sorts of things because their driving habits changed so much, the people were very alarmed, and that's just another reason why people do not trust this UCP government. It's one more reason why a good, solid conversation with the voters of this province might be both edifying for the members of the government side but also give some insight into the types of action that people want to see because it is not just auto insurance, as my hon. colleague for Edmonton-Gold Bar indicated.

People are also quite concerned about their home insurance policies, the actual extent of the coverage. As we learned in northeast Calgary, insurance doesn't cover a whole bunch of things that now happen with alarming regularity, particularly in Calgary and in central Alberta, that is to say very devastating storms, particularly hailstorms.

But, you know, back to my original point, there is no question that this legislation could have provided that disclosure to Albertans and just simply edited the "may" into a "shall," and then people would know. They would know how much insurance companies were bringing in in premiums versus how much they were paying out in claims and whether that ratio reflected the public interest, because ultimately that's what we're here to do, not to make sure that insurance companies are making wild profits, which they, in fact, did in Alberta. It might allow us just a bit better peek behind the curtain so that we can actually work on solutions to a quite difficult problem, the question of Alberta's insurance market, both on the commercial side, with which this bill concerns itself, but also for individuals and certainly businesses, smaller businesses.

There's no question that a committee, which was proposed by this side of the House, was, in fact, a good idea to find solutions. Perhaps if the specific amount of a rate cap was not a tenable solution, we would find that out via committee, but the government voted that down because ultimately they are not interested in saving people money at all. They are interested in at least moving forward with that $385 million more that they took from Albertans, that the insurance companies took from Albertans during a pandemic year, that they were enabled to do so by policy, by a specific policy choice of this government, one of the first things they did.

We also would learn about the hardship that people have gone through over the last couple of years, with workforce attachment being far more uncertain through pandemic time, through even things like whether people are going to go to university or what kinds of programs they are going to take, all of these kinds of things, living arrangements. All of that was upended during the pandemic. Then, lo and behold, people were getting 30 per cent car insurance increases in the mail as well.

Now, I went and had a look at SGI's annual report on this matter of transparency and just speaking to people about the public and making a case for, you know: where's our money going, what are we paying for, and what are we getting for it? They are pretty easy, simple, straightforward questions to answer for the electorate. Voters like it when a government levels with them, which is why they were outraged when that report that had been published for 107 years was withheld from people.

I went and looked at Saskatchewan's auto fund 2020 annual report. Now, of course, the Premier has dismissed Premier Scott Moe's commitment to the Saskatchewan auto fund and Brad Wall's before him as a Soviet policy. Okay; Brad Wall is a Soviet, I guess. But last year, under the Moe government, the Saskatchewan auto fund took in roughly – I mean, it's not quite apples to apples in terms of the claims ratio and how they present their financial statements, but it was roughly the same amount. It was roughly 1 to 1 of premiums to claims, not this wild ratio where you see far fewer claims being paid out than you see premiums in the system that we have here.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker – not only that – but from what I can tell here, the auto fund gave, in turn, $85 million in premium relief to drivers in Saskatchewan, a far smaller province than here and probably a lot fewer sort of large vehicles that people use for small business and that kind of thing just because it's a smaller economy, and interestingly the Saskatchewan auto fund also funds STARS air ambulance and a few other pieces off their investments because, of course, there are a number of investments made by the auto fund to ensure that the auto fund is always there, that insurance product is always there for people.

So, you know, the fact of the matter is that the insurance market is not as difficult for other drivers as it is here in Alberta, and there have to be some solutions for people, but all we see before this House right now is a bunch of solutions for the commercial sector.

Now, this is not to say that the bill before us right now does not have merit. In fact, there are a number of initiatives in this bill that we do not take issue with whatsoever. The changes to captive insurance companies such that there is a redomestication provision: that is an appropriate response to some of the challenges of the hard insurance market here in Alberta, and in fact folks were pleasantly surprised with the uptake in the captive insurance market. Firms will potentially have to use higher regulatory standards and potentially have to pay a little bit more in tax than they would in Bermuda, but they save on other costs and risks such as foreign exchange. This may have an additional benefit of creating both some additional tax revenue for the province if large firms like, for example, Suncor repatriate their captive insurance and also contribute to a financial services market and a financial services sector and the diversification thereof in this province. That's a good idea, and we should do it.

There are also provisions in here to license stand-alone reinsurance companies in Alberta. The government is hoping that the enormous amount of capital circulating in Alberta's oil and gas sector might be pooled to create a local insurance company. It is unclear whether this will work as there are potential liabilities and they are enormous and companies need billions in coverage, but this legislation does create a policy space for a potential solution. Fantastic. This is a good-faith attempt to find a solution that does not represent much in the way of downside risks to the province.

Were we to take this same approach for ordinary people, people would be so much better off. There are a variety of creative solutions in here for the hard market that is the commercial insurance market, but absolutely no consideration is given to ordinary people who have also seen their insurance costs skyrocket. Creative solutions for some, and a great big hundreds-of-millions-of-dollars bill and 30 per cent increases for others. The fact of the matter is that the vast majority of us are the others.

This bill also makes it easier for Alberta companies to access unlicensed insurance, and some hon. colleagues have expressed some concern about that, but the only reason a company goes down this path is because there are few alternatives, and in fact the insurance product is licensed somewhere. It is just simply not licensed here due to its niche characteristics as an insurance product, so companies can go find a policy on their own, or they go through a special broker. This legislation makes changes to the tax rate paid on premiums when companies do not go through a special broker.

The tax rate change is significant here, Mr. Speaker, going from 50 per cent to 10 per cent. That's not significant compared to other provinces, and what it might mean is that there are no instances where companies do not report in to the superintendent of insurance that they are accessing an unlicensed product that is licensed elsewhere. In that sense this is a common-sense change, again, a creative solution for very, very specific, small, niche groups of people and small corporate interests – well, they might be large corporate interests, but they are a relatively small slice of the insurance market – but nothing for the vast majority of ratepayers.

That is why this bill should be referred, because for once, you know, I think it's time for the government to hear from ordinary people on this and on this issue, and for that reason I believe that that amendment should be supported by the House, and now I would like to move to adjourn debate, Mr. Speaker.

Bill 15
Education (Reforming Teacher
Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate April 26: Ms Pancholi]

The Speaker: Hon. members, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford is next.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to address this bill. I always enjoy my time here in the House and am disappointed when I'm told I've already spoken to a bill and can't do it again, but here I am speaking for the first time on Bill 15 at the second stage. I ought to, you know, address a few sort of contextual issues, as is appropriate at stage 2 of the bill, about what this bill is about.

I think the fundamental thing that I want to say in a direct way is that the government has failed to articulate a problem for which they are creating a solution. They certainly have suggested that they want to divide the ATA, but they haven't actually demonstrated that there have been significant or even examples of problems with the current situation.

I know I have on occasion heard members opposite make statements about problems, but fundamentally I don't think they have a foundation in the actual experience of the current circumstance.

That's the politest way I can say it. And I believe that if the government is saying that we need to have a change in the system, they actually have a responsibility, then, to articulate what it is that is problematic with the system the way it is.

For very many years in this province the ATA has had responsibility not only for their contractual obligations to their members in terms of employment and negotiation with school boards and so on but has also had responsibility with regard to discipline.

However, if we look back on the history of the legislation and the powers available to the ATA, the ability to do things with regard to that discipline has been limited not by the ATA but has been limited by the government. As such, in cases where horrendous things have happened – for example, I know that at least once in the House someone had suggested that there was a situation of a teacher who committed a sexual offence against a child or multiple children and was not removed from the profession, and this was blamed on the ATA. Yet if we look back on the legislation, they actually had no authority to do that. They did exactly what they could, and they certainly did bring the case to their disciplinary body, and they went to the full extent of the ability of the ATA at the time, the disciplinary body, to deal with that particular case.

So it's not that I don't see that there may indeed be a problem. I fundamentally believe that any teacher that has had sexual contact with a child should be immediately and permanently removed from the teaching profession, no question about that. I spent much of my career trying to make sure that kind of thing in fact happened.

The simple solution would have been, of course, to provide the power to the ATA to do exactly that, to make the decision that a person would lose their licence and be able to remove that person's ability to teach. And, hopefully, we could work it out with jurisdictions across the country such that it wouldn't only be jurisdictions here in Alberta but, of course, across the country. If there was a problem with that, if that has not been happening, then we should have just made sure that the ATA had the ability to do that.

I just don't see that the government has articulated that the ATA having the dual responsibility led to any particular problems. It certainly, you know, has argued that it is somewhat unique in its set-up. That is, that it's not similar exactly to the teaching professions across the country, and it's not exactly the same as the circumstances in other professions in the province of Alberta. But to suggest that we change something merely because it is unique is an inadequate argument. There has to be some argument that in its uniqueness it is failing to perform some function or that it is doing something that it should not be doing, neither of which has been presented as arguments by this government. As such, I just don't think that there has been the basis for this bill to be brought into the House.

Now, it's also ironic that in arguing that this current situation is unique and needs to change, the government's solution is actually to create a new situation which is itself also unique as compared to other situations in the province. In this particular case what we are seeing is that the decisions that could have been handed to the ATA and allowed for in the current situation are now being pulled into the minister's office, and the minister is being put in the position of creating a board of people who are appointed by that minister and who make all the decisions with regard to the code of conduct and the penalties applied to teachers who are found to be in violation of that code of conduct.

This is giving a huge amount of responsibility to a minister who is extremely unlikely to have any particular knowledge about the teaching profession, you know, may incidentally have had some involvement. Occasionally, I suppose, in the history of this province there may be a minister who actually was educated in education and did have a knowledge of these kinds of things, but it's not normal for us to require a minister to have training in the particular area in which they are a minister, for some good reasons sometimes, because we don't want their personal prejudices from their own personal experiences to interfere with the decisions that are made. In this particular case what we have is the minister taking over massive amounts of responsibility instead of leaving it with the profession to be a self-governing profession.

I think there are numerous examples of professions which are self-governing that have done so quite reasonably well for many decades in this province. The Law Society comes to mind, for example, a self-governing profession that has a board. The benchers, as they're often referred to, are not appointed by a minister but, rather, are voted in by members of the Law Society, and they make all of the explicit decisions about what will happen. In fact, one of the government ministers is in front of that particular board right now for some of their behaviour while being a member of the Law Society. We know that the idea of a profession self-governing and using members of the profession to sit on the board, as elected by members of that profession to represent the values of that profession, is widely used in professions throughout the province.

As such, you know, there's nothing unusual about that kind of thing occurring. So the minister stepping in in order to draw power into herself or whoever happens to be sitting in that chair to appoint the members of the committee, to set the terms of the codes of conduct, to set the punishments is really taking the power away from the people who have the greatest expertise with both their training and their lived experience and moving it into the hands of people who ultimately don't have that expertise, as ministers don't tend to in any ministry. This is not any particular criticism of this minister or ministry in general. It's just a fact that ministers don't tend to actually be trained in the profession for which they are responsible in their ministry.

You know, I guess I'm very concerned that this choice was made. The minister could have addressed whatever they imagine to be the problem, although they haven't articulated a problem, as I've said. They could have done that by just simply establishing a process within the ATA similar to the Law Society, in which a separate entity within the ATA is established and voted on by members of the ATA in order to deal with this as sort of an internal college, not dissimilar to the types of colleges that are done in other professions. Nursing, for example, has a separation, but it does not go to the minister to make decisions about bad nursing practice. It goes to the appropriate place in the nursing college. So there were various solutions here.

I'm very concerned that the minister has the right to put people on this board, because, you know, frankly, that puts us in the position of: do we trust the minister to make decisions about appropriate things? I've got to tell you that, after my experience with the education curriculum that we've had over this last year, I don't believe that we have the trust in this minister.

I can't tell you the number of people in the Indigenous community that were outraged that Chris Champion was brought in to write the curriculum given the things that Chris Champion had said. So if the minister is picking people like that to write curriculum, people who clearly know nothing at all about important factors in curriculum development, for example, such as age appropriateness, scaffolding of information, all of those really important pieces in actually establishing a curriculum, and instead brought somebody in who happened to have a philosophical opinion that apparently the minister agreed with, that turned out to be quite outrageous to the Indigenous community.

Now we're asking that minister to, again, appoint people to a board who are not members of the profession but who the minister wants to have on that board. Given the history I think it's very problematic.

I know that working with the Métis community, for example, looking at the curriculum, the members of the Rupertsland Institute spent a significant amount of time looking at how they could put together information on Métis history, cultures, and traditions that would have been spread throughout the curriculum from kindergarten up to grade 12 at an age-appropriate level and would help to enhance people's knowledge of the Métis, an often-neglected community in our society. After having conducted extensive work on that, when they actually read the curriculum, they were devastated to find that the vast majority of the information that they had presented and the work that they had done was not represented in the curriculum.

That's the problem here. That's the problem when you allow governments, that change in terms of their ideology, that change in terms of their personal belief systems, to actually set down important pieces like curriculum or, in this case, discipline. Those things should be left to people who are the most versed in the area. You know, accountants should take responsibility for the misbehaviour of accountants, doctors should take responsibility for the misbehaviour of doctors, and in this case teachers should take responsibility for the misbehaviour of teachers. If they are not for some reason, then you have to look at the structures that prevent them from doing so. Do they have the powers? Do they have the resources? Do they have the understanding of the needs in this particular case?

I guess I'm just really concerned, so I have to ask myself: if the government has failed to articulate a reason why we need to move ahead and they're acting in this extraordinary way, creating an entity that's not, you know, consistent with the usual practices in this area, then there must be some other reason why they put this bill together. I have to look at the history of the relationship between this government and the teachers in this province. We can just look at everything. I've already mentioned the curriculum and how there has been very little support from the professionals, both from the academics, universities, and teachers in the classroom, for the process of the curriculum and for the curriculum itself.

I also look at the other actions by this government, who have continuously done things like taking teachers' pensions away without any consultation with the teachers at all. It seems that there's one attack after another on the teaching profession. We certainly hear the Premier attack the teachers on a regular basis on some ideological stance, often which is not based in reality, and it's very discouraging to see this.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to join in the debate on Bill 15? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to speak to Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022. It is meant to reform the discipline process for all teachers, teacher leaders, and administration. It's taken me some time to make up my mind on my support of this bill. I think I've looked very deeply into the amount of work the minister and her ministry have done to develop this, and I've spoken to a number of teachers in Lethbridge that have called me on this. I think their viewpoints would be generally undecided or opposed to it, and I have taken their consideration and their talking points to heart.

As I looked further into this bill, I thought of some of the experiences that I've gone through. My background is in construction, engineering. My wife is an emergency room nurse. Her profession has a union; mine did not. One of the considerations that I gave great time to was that as a contractor our work was always independently inspected by a municipality or another governing body to see the work that we did. There are jurisdictions in Canada that don't necessarily have that same process, or if they do, there are many stories. In fact, there are TV shows about it, about general contractors and the job they do. So as a professional in the construction industry I was always very glad to have my work inspected by an independent body so that one of my jobs would never be on one of those television shows showing the train wreck of what happens when things go wrong. From that perspective, having an independent body review work and provide discipline in governance was actually a comfort, not a concern.

One of the other factors that I consider is being a father to five children, all of whom have gone through the public school system in Lethbridge. My youngest is now in grade 11. So we've had a tremendous amount of experience with multiple schools, from French immersion, different elementary, different middle, different high schools. I worked in the schools, and I have nothing but praise for nearly every single teacher that my children came into contact with, whether they're male, whether they're female, whether they're old, whether they're young, whether they were experienced or just starting out in that profession. I found that they provided and they had a singular objective to see that my children succeeded in their classes. I thank them for that. I believe my wife and I developed a very strong relationship with those teachers and are very proud to support those teachers and those public schools that they attended.

Beyond that, my mother was a teacher for almost 40 years, and currently my sister and her husband are both teachers in B.C., so I have some personal connection with the industry. I'll share a little bit more of a story, a couple of personal stories, actually, that create a juxtaposition in my argument in defence of this bill. Way back, a long time ago, my mother was a teacher. I can remember back to when in B.C. teachers were not unionized and they went through that process of becoming unionized. My mother and several others were hopeful – they didn't necessarily want to become part of the union – but I saw as a young boy the power and the potential negative of a very strong governing body, which basically forced and bankrupted several teachers or ruined their careers and forced them to become part of that union. So I had a very early exposure to a distrust of a union that did not work necessarily in the best interests of all its members though they would argue that they did work for the best interests of the majority of their members.

The opposite position was the story with my wife as an ER nurse. She was on duty several years ago when a significant negative outcome event took place, as can happen from time to time in emergencies. This particular scenario ended up with an investigation. There were legal questions, and it was actually a very scary time for my wife and for us as a family. I will say that the united nurses association, that union, stood by, provided counsel, advocated one hundred per cent for my wife. She felt very taken care of and very protected by the union body set in place to advocate for her, as I believe a union should do.

How a union can be the advocate and defend someone in a position like my wife or a teacher if they were in a circumstance as well as provide the opposite side of the argument and be the discipline or investigative body: it does create a conflict, in my mind. I don't see how they can do that well, and I think that's at the bottom of it.

That's what concerns me about the current system as well as it being 85 years old and seeing some of our closest neighbours in terms of provinces, Saskatchewan, B.C., moving in a different direction. I believe that this should provide confidence to teachers, actually, that their union can work without a duplicitous mandate, not only to defend them but also to discipline them. I think that that unifying fact should be a comfort to many teachers as well as remove any question marks that there may have been in terms of conduct. I believe that that can be seen as a benefit and a positive and not a negative.

So having weighed these facts and these considerations from my own life, both from contracting and engineering and those independent bodies, from the experiences I grew up with with my mother being a teacher, and now as an adult my sister and her husband being teachers, and my wife as a nurse who is part of another very large union here in Alberta, I believe that this reform is due. I believe that this reform is reasonable and well considered, well thought through.

Having looked at the bill, it is not a small piece of work. I believe that it represents a considerable amount of thinking, of dedication, and protection not only for teachers but more specifically for students and parents, and having given that type of consideration to it from my own life experience and to represent the people that elected me from Lethbridge-East to be here and represent them, I would urge every member in this House to support Bill 15 and see it passed for the betterment of our education system, for our students predominantly, for teachers, and parents.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others? We'll go to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, followed by the Member for Camrose.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First, I want to take this opportunity to make a few comments of my own on Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022. Let me first start off by thanking my friend from Edmonton-Rutherford for his thoughtful comments. Let me also say that I savour every word that comes from the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford's mouth now that he has expressed his intent to retire at the end of this term. Knowing that his time here with us in the Legislature is growing shorter by the day, I will appreciate every intervention that he makes in debate. I think that's an important reminder, that none of us knows how long we are here, and we should treat each other with the same appreciation and respect that we treat our friends who have already announced their retirement.

I also want to say that I was pleasantly surprised to hear the Member for Lethbridge-East say something positive about unions. We haven't heard a whole lot of positive talk about the role of unions in the working life of Albertans. The Member for Lethbridge-East should be commended for recognizing the benefits that unions play for hundreds of thousands of Albertans in this province, and I appreciate him bringing that to light. Now, he may get himself in some hot water with the Premier for making these positive comments about unions, but that doesn't make the comments that he said any less true. I appreciate him bringing that comment to the floor of the Legislature.

Before I address the particular clauses of this piece of legislation, let me just first start off by making a comment on the issue of student safety, because we've heard the minister and many of her colleagues in the government caucus say that these amendments are designed to address the issue of student safety in the classroom.

Now, I will say that student safety has been top of mind to the citizens of Edmonton-Gold Bar for the last month following the tragic murder of Karanveer Sahota, a 16-year-old student at McNally high school who was beaten and stabbed to death by, allegedly, seven other youths who attacked him at a bus stop outside of that school on April 8.

I had the honour of attending his funeral on Sunday. It was attended by hundreds of friends and family members, community members who were there to mourn his passing. I know that the entire McNally school community is grieving a significant loss and grappling with what the future of student safety looks like in their school. I think we can all agree that no student should lose their life at school. To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that a student has been killed in an attack like this in an Edmonton school, and my thoughts and support are with the McNally community as they grapple with the issue of how to keep their students safe from an incident like this happening again. I certainly hope that all members of the Legislature do everything that they can to provide the resources to our schools to make sure that an incident like this happens never again in the province of Alberta.

It's extremely unfortunate, though, Mr. Speaker, that that task is made much more difficult by the budgetary choices that this minister has made. When Edmonton public school board has a shortfall in funding of 1,700 students, that's more than an entire high school; that's two McNally high schools who have no funding whatsoever. So here we are in a position where McNally high school has to make some incredibly difficult decisions about what they need to do to promote and enhance student safety in their school building and on their school grounds with no resources at hand. The minister has cut their budget. The minister has cut the Edmonton public school board budget by the equivalent of 1,700 students.

I'll take the minister at her word that she is genuinely concerned about student safety, and I will issue her a challenge. If she is genuinely concerned about student safety, not only will she focus her efforts on passing this piece of legislation, but she will go back to Treasury Board and find the money for Edmonton public schools to provide the safe and caring educational environment that every student deserves and provide them the resources to do that.

The next comment that I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is on the issue of what a self-governing professional association looks like in the province of Alberta. My friend from Edmonton-Rutherford went on at length about this, but I want to underline the point because I think it bears repeating. I appreciate the minister's intent to create a self-governing professional body for teachers that is separate from the union, but that's not what she's done here. She's created a system where the government holds all the tools, holds all of the levers of power over professional conduct and discipline.

Now, it's my understanding that this system will allow the minister to create a code of professional conduct. Well, Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge, there is no self-governing professional association in the province of Alberta where the minister imposes a code of professional conduct. That certainly wasn't the case in APEGA, the Association of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of Alberta, which I was a member of. I had the privilege of serving on APEGA's investigative committee, where we were tasked with investigating complaints against our members for violations of the code of conduct. That code of conduct was developed by the members of the association itself. It wasn't imposed upon them by the minister. It was up to the engineers and geoscientists to decide what a sufficient code of conduct was for its members and to hold its members accountable to that code of conduct once it was established.

If the minister is sincere in her intent to create a similar professional association for teachers, then she wouldn't be in a position of imposing a code of conduct onto teachers. She would allow the teachers to develop that themselves and then allow teachers themselves to hold the members accountable to that code of conduct. I think it's the issue of holding teachers to account that is the crux of the matter here, Mr. Speaker. [interjection] I see my friend from Edmonton-North West has gotten out of his chair. I had first assumed that he was going to the bathroom, but he's looking at me with a question in his eyes, so I will take that.

Mr. Eggen: Okay. Well, thank you. I appreciate it. I guess I'm curious, because we were having this discussion this morning, with – you have the UNA and then you have the AARN, right? And then LPNs have their version of their professional association. These magazines come to my house because I've got both in my house. With APEGA, like, do you know much – I want to ask, through the Speaker, how this kind of evolved. It's a professional association. You said that you served as a geologist in APEGA. How did this sort of evolve over time? I'm curious because, of course, if we want to treat professions the same, then we should probably look at these similar parallel structures and how they evolved and how they support the profession.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, I want to thank my friend from Edmonton-North West for his question. I wish I could provide a more complete answer. I don't know how the practice of engineering and geoscience has evolved over time, but I do know that professional engineers and geoscientists have been a self-governing profession in the province of Alberta for many decades. This is legislation that goes back many, many decades. Certainly, as a professional association they've learned from their experiences in the past and revised their codes of conduct and investigation processes, discipline processes as a result of that. I think that the people of Alberta can rest assured that the practice of engineering and geoscience is in good hands because a self-regulating professional organization like APEGA is the responsible body for setting out the expectations for the work of these people and then holding them to account.

Now, I will say that, you know, it's not entirely up to the professional association to conduct their business as they see fit. The legislation is prescriptive somewhat in what it can do when it comes to investigating members and disciplining members and what it can't do.

I know that APEGA has been engaged in a review of their governing legislation for a number of years, and I certainly hope that the government takes a serious look at what can be done to improve the professional practice of engineering and geoscience in the province of Alberta. But the point remains that the minister is largely hands off when it comes to the practice of engineering and geoscience in the province of Alberta. I think that it would be only right, then, that the Minister of Education be similarly hands off when it comes to creating a self-governing professional association for teachers here in the province of Alberta.

It's incredibly concerning to me, as my friend from Edmonton-Rutherford pointed out, that members of the professional conduct and competency panel would be appointed by the minister. Now, I understand that it's the minister's intent to appoint teachers and members of the general public, and that's, I think, not a bad idea as far as it goes. But as my friend from Edmonton-Rutherford pointed out, a truly self-governing professional association would have the majority of its members selected by members of the association itself and not by the minister.

Now, it is not uncommon for members of the general public to be appointed to the boards of professional associations by the minister. That's certainly the case with APEGA. We did have public members appointed to the board by the minister for that organization. Let me just say that, you know, the effort and commitment that public members made varied. We certainly had some very dedicated public members. We also had some public members who were appointed, I think, as a gift from their friend, the minister at the time, and didn't take their responsibilities very seriously.

It's quite concerning to me as a member of a professional association like that when we have no recourse when we've got members on our board who are not taking their responsibilities seriously and not living up to the expectations that are placed upon them as public members who are appointed by the minister. Professional members don't have any power to remove them or replace them. But it's not a big issue in an organization like APEGA because the majority of members are selected by the membership itself and they're subject to regular elections, yearly elections. I think that if the minister was intent on creating a truly self-regulating professional association, she would incorporate that kind of model and not this one that we're dealing with today.

You know, one final issue, Mr. Speaker, that I'd like to address before time runs out is this issue of sufficient sanction. If the model that the minister was presenting here today was sufficient to dissuade teachers from acting inappropriately with their students, then I will vote for it immediately. I wouldn't even debate it; I would just say, "Let's pass this as quickly as possible" and get it in place. But the fact is that there is no investigative and disciplinary system sufficient to prevent teachers from acting inappropriately with their students. The minister has trotted out a few examples and hasn't said explicitly but has implied heavily that if we had only had this model in place, then those teachers wouldn't have been able to do that.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Camrose if she still chooses to do so.

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise in support of reforming the teaching profession discipline process. I'm happy to stand behind this bill which makes the education system safer for students, their families, and teachers. Reforming teacher discipline is important to me, and I hope it's just as important to everyone here today.

The disciplinary system that is currently in place is 85 years old. I would like to think a lot has changed within this time. It's disturbing to know that the ATA has spent millions on media campaigns against to create fear and division among Albertans. They continue to fight, with false claims, to keep this archaic structure in place and, quite frankly, their perceived total control over the education system.

They are doing all of this with the support of the NDP. The members opposite are fighting, in collaboration with the ATA, to keep transparency away from the process and to keep the conflict of interest. The ATA collects union dues and is mandated to advocate for all their members. Why are they fighting to keep the disciplinary power of the members that they rely on for their funds? Why are the NDP fighting to keep it? I find these actions irresponsible. They claim to care about students and teachers, but this is just another one of their facades so that they can help their union friends keep their power, power that belongs to the people of Alberta.

I'm happy to see Bill 15 includes the creation of an Alberta teaching profession commission along with the appointing of a commissioner upon its creation, ensuring an independent and transparent disciplinary process. This will lead to more appropriate and timely actions on cases that are brought forward.

Most teachers are dedicated professionals who love their jobs and care about the future growth of all students and children, which is why we need to come together in supporting this bill. This bill will bring all teachers and teacher leaders under the same process no matter who they work for. The central focus of this new disciplinary process will be the best interests of students, their families, and teachers across the whole education system.

Everyone needs to be under the same reformed disciplinary process, that is separate from the ATA. With the ATA handling all disciplinary processes, the number of cases that involve conflicts of interest will continue to rise. By separating them, we are eliminating any perceptions of conflicts of interest, making the process fair and one that we can trust.

Bill 15 makes the disciplinary process fall in line with other jurisdictions and regulated professions across the province such as nurses. Some of the best parts of this legislation are the increased accountability it will bring to the education system along with an increased transparency. Many constituencies across Alberta are seeing the construction of additional schools and school expansions while welcoming new families from across the nation and the globe.

I had the pleasure of recently hosting the Premier in the Camrose constituency. We had a tour of the recently completed Chester Ronning school, meeting all the wonderful students and staff. We also attended the sod-turning of a new high school, the Elk Island Catholic school.

I want to pause there for a moment and just emphasize the fact that my mother was a teacher, and I'm very proud of the teaching career that she had. I have a sister in Saskatchewan who is also a teacher. They work very hard, and they care very deeply about the students, as the majority of teachers do.

This legislation will give all families in Alberta, as they choose to enrol their kids in our education system – they can do so confidently, bringing more opportunities to public, Catholic, and private schools. Everyone has the right to choose what school they get their education from. They also deserve the same environment that is provided to any other school.

I encourage all my colleagues to not just support this bill but also support better environments for current and future generations. I want all students to grow up and learn in the safest environments possible. By supporting this bill, we can come together to do just that.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

Prayers

The Acting Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideals but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Second Reading

Bill 11

Continuing Care Act

[Adjourned debate April 26: Mr. Sabir]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, we are debating the main bill. I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has risen.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and speak to the Continuing Care Act. This is, I believe, the first opportunity I've actually had to speak to this bill. I think it's a bill – I don't want to say that it is incredibly important, because the bill itself isn't, but it ought to be incredibly important to the lives of residents of continuing care. What this bill actually does is sort of put a series of acts together. Now, I chaired the Legislative Review Committee of cabinet for four years, so I'm aware of the importance of keeping legislation up to date and putting things in the right place and having functional provisions. I don't want to suggest that that's necessarily wrong. I think the problem with this bill is what it doesn't do.

We are living through a pandemic and have been doing so for two years now, and there have been a lot of deaths, unfortunately. That is the sad truth. There have been a lot of deaths, and a lot of those deaths have been in older people. That has been hard for them, hard for their families, and because of those risks a lot of people have spent a lot of time locked down in facilities, and that has been extremely challenging, too. I think anyone who has ever observed the progress of dementia in a loved one can tell you that the inability to get out and socialize, the inability to engage in society: those things have a big impact on the progress. That's tragic because you don't get that back in a lot of cases, Mr. Speaker.

I don't think it's possible to overstate the importance of what we're looking at here today because it saves the lives of people who – well, not what we're looking at; what we ought to be looking at. I should be clear about that. This was an opportunity. It was an opportunity to make major change in a system that has developed over time, and I don't really think it's fair to place blame. I think the system has developed over time, people have certain efficiency goals that they would like to achieve, and sometimes they can pursue those goals with blinders on, so to the exception of all else.

Sometimes they can think of our seniors, of our parents and grandparents and loved ones of the people who have built our communities, as bodies in a facility and sometimes they can think of them as costs, and therefore they can focus on efficiency to the exclusion of all else. I think that if the last two years have taught us anything, it ought to have taught us just how wrong that point of view is. If the past two years have taught us anything, it should have taught us that human lives should be viewed as human lives; they should not be viewed as costs on the system.

This act should have done a lot of things which it doesn't do. There was a report here in Alberta that came out of sort of continuing care and the difficulties that arose. Some of the commitments that this government made were around more home care, increasing the number of hours of care, and increasing the proportion of full-time staff. I agree with 100 per cent of those. Those are incredibly important things.

One of the things that I'm proudest of is the work that the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, when she sat as the Health minister, did to increase the amount of home care available. The truth is that increasing home care is, in my view, the way of the future. Now, that won't alleviate the need for long-term care, particularly dementia care, as we move forward with what is likely to be a sort of crisis of dementia care resources. But moving to home care for those people who don't yet need to be moved into a facility is, I think, incredibly important. This bill doesn't do that.

The number of hours of care: that's also a big one. Again, this sort of drive towards efficiency and failing to see that the people in question are, in fact, people and not numbers has resulted in fewer and fewer and fewer hours of care. Honestly, the provincial standards in this regard, provincial standards which, incidentally, this government altered to decrease, are insufficient. Those hours of care can give people back years of their lives. They can give people back quality of life. Those are things that should matter to us.

Finally, the proportion of full-time staff. That's important for a couple of reasons. This is a thing that happens. When we get into these conversations, people are like: well, efficiency, fewer dollars per unit; that's the best possible way to go. But they don't consider any of the collateral cost. They don't consider the fact that if you treat people better in a lower level of care facility, they won't move to the hospital as quickly.

I used to volunteer in a hospital, Mr. Speaker. I volunteered on a neurorehabilitation unit. One of the people that was there was, actually, roughly the same age as me, but he had suffered a brain injury. He was in the neurorehabilitation unit, and he belonged in a long-term care facility. He resided in that unit for the better part of two years, as I recall. It was a terrible use of resources and not good for him either. So ensuring that we have the necessary number of spots is incredibly important.

The proportion of full-time staff: why is that important? Well, because, again, this race toward the fewest dollars per unit, which I actually think is misnamed as efficiency – I actually don't think that, if you view the system overall, we should be calling that efficiency. Sometimes the things we measure are not the right things. In this instance we tend to measure the dollars per unit, and the result of that is that you wind up with part-time staff working everywhere because homes don't have to pay benefits for part-time staff. They maybe don't get the same vacation. They maybe don't have the same level of pay. That is bad. It is bad for efficiency overall. It is bad for the residents because, you know, if you're in a position where you've contributed your whole life and now you're needing a little help for various reasons, it just seems respectful to be able to know the person who's taking care of you. Some of these tasks are very personal, and yeah, I think it's just respectful to allow someone to work with the same provider and to have those providers there full-time.

It's also better for the care providers. You know, this is a problem in the world generally, and it's a problem increasingly. We call it the gig economy in sort of younger people in the economy. Having to race between multiple jobs to try to make enough to pay your rent and buy food and raise your children: this is a problem. It's a problem with which government ought rightly to concern itself. This isn't how we want the world to be going forward. It's not unreasonable for people in a developed country, in a country with the wealth that Canada has, in a province with the wealth that Alberta has to think that they should be able to, with or without a university education, go to work and work a reasonable number of hours and work at one job and be able to have a life, buy a home, and raise their kids. That's not an unreasonable dream. It's a dream that a lot of people have, and I think it should be a lot more achievable than it currently is for young people coming up through the system, for new immigrants coming into the country.

Increasing the proportion of full-time staff, in my view, is something that has benefits for the residents of these homes, it has benefits for the system overall, and it has benefits for the economy overall in terms of, you know, allowing people to have the style of life that, say, people had 30 years ago, which is really all anyone is asking for. Those are the things the act doesn't do and that I think it ought to do.

There were a lot of recommendations in this report. There are 11 sort of policy directions, if you will, and 42 recommendations, and one of the ones that I want to talk about, and I guess I've been talking about it already indirectly, is about establishing quality of life as the number one priority and goal for Alberta's continuing care system. It almost sounds so obvious, like it shouldn't need stating, but if you actually look at the system and the way it's operating now, it definitely needs stating because, again, in this sort of relentless lens, this lens where we want to decrease the number of dollars per unit at all costs, we only look at the one system, so we look at the continuing care home and we say that we want to decrease the number of dollars per unit, but what we don't look at is how decreasing the number of dollars per – and the unit is a person. Just keep in mind that these are people. They're seniors who have contributed to our province and who have built it.

By decreasing those number of dollars per unit, you get a more rapid decline generally in terms of medical things and particularly in terms of dementia. What you have is a result that those people have to be moved to a higher level of care more quickly, and higher level of care beds are much more expensive. This is the other thing that gets missed when we're talking about the system. I will often hear, when I'm talking to people out in the community: oh, private providers are more efficient because they get more beds per dollar. The thing is that people are comparing apples to oranges because a dementia care bed requires way, way, way more staffing than the lowest level of care, which I believe is 4 if I'm remembering correctly. I may have reversed it. I can't remember whether it goes 1 to 4 or 4 to 1. The point is that the lowest level of care bed is, like, say, a staffing ratio of 1 staff to 10 patients, and the highest level of care, the dementia care beds, are a staffing ratio of, like, 1 or more staff to 1 patient, so yes, of course, it costs more money because it requires more care. So when we consider efficiency, we ought to be considering those effects as well, and we don't.

I think the saddest thing about the strict focus on dollars per unit, about the strict focus on making it less expensive to care for people in a very narrow view of less expensive, is the impact it has on the quality of life of those people. Those lives are worth something. The happiness or unhappiness of those people is worth something, and we should consider that in our deliberations, and the current system in the way it's set up often doesn't. I think there is a lot that can be done to improve that, and I think this bill doesn't do any of it.

Another one of the policy directions, number 2, is closely related. It talks about enhancing the overall care “with emphasis on residents living with dementia.” This is a huge one. People have been predicting for quite a while a sort of mass wave, as sort of more people age, of dementia patients. That is something that we are going to have to grapple with. It's going to land at some point, and no doubt someone, some silly thing like the Canadian Taxpayers Federation or whatever, is going to jump up and down and say: look how crazy this government is; they're spending, spending, spending. But the truth is that we've been predicting that demographic shift for years, and it's coming whether we want it to come or not, so we ought to be thinking about how to take care of that and how to take care of those people and how to ensure that we give them the best quality of life possible.

Yes, of course, we should be considering the overall cost to the system. That's why moves like more investment in home care so that when someone is at a place where they still need a lower level of care, they can stay in their homes – that is vastly less expensive for the system. Vastly less expensive. And it's much better for the individuals as well because they're able to stay in the communities that they have lived in for their whole lives. They're able to continue to engage in what they have engaged in.

What I really feel, Mr. Speaker, about this act is that it is a missed opportunity.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to address this bill. I spoke to it as recently as last night on the referral motion. I think, reflecting back on some of the words that I said and some of the words that my colleagues said last evening, that I'd like to extrapolate a little bit and maybe improve upon the things that I tried to communicate about this bill, Bill 11, Continuing Care Act.

First, before getting into the bill, I just wanted to recognize that the preamble on page 4 of the bill has a series of whereases. I often look to those, if they are part of a bill, to kind of get a sense of what the government or the minister really feels about the bill that they're bringing forward. The third one struck me. I'll just read it into the record: “Whereas the Government of Alberta is committed to ensuring that the delivery of continuing care and the design of the continuing care system in Alberta are based on a person-centred approach.” That certainly speaks to me and, you know, my personal experience not only as a professional social worker but as a person who has had relatives, over the course of my lifetime, go into continuing care and require home care and other aspects of care for themselves that are aspects of this bill or part of this bill.

The person-centred approach, those three words: the concept is one that I'm familiar with. It's client centred in terms of social work. It's doing things from the experience of the person who has to live them or trying to understand how best to design a system so that the person is at the centre of it and their needs are considered in the system that they're experiencing or are a part of or are being taken care of by. I want to start off with that concept and how important that is and then reflect on the bill itself and some of the recent experiences that we've had not only in Alberta but in Canada with respect to the various waves of COVID that have been across this country, that people have experienced.

I think I wouldn't be out of line by saying that the person-centred approach that happened, that people experienced in, for instance, continuing care centres was not very good when COVID was ravaging continuing care centres across Canada. We know that in parts of Canada the military was brought in to supplement, to help, to, in some cases, totally take over from the exhausted or the workers in those places that couldn't keep up with the needs of people in their charge.

We know that in this province – and my colleague has just kind of reflected on it as well – over 1,600 continuing care residents, Albertans, tragically, passed away from COVID-19, and that tragedy must be a call to action to do better in the future. Regrettably, I don't see where this bill is taking that call to action seriously.

I also believe that too much in this bill will be left to regulations, and it's impossible for me or others to know if the call to action to do better will in fact be followed through with by government. When things are left to the regulations, they will be presented as opposed to transparently talked about, as in this place here where we have an opportunity to see what, in fact, the regulations could be or if the government intends to make regulation. They're not here, and that's a problem.

I reflected on her words, I saw that she talked about St. Albert last night when we were debating, and I must tell you that I feel like I've been schooled a little bit in just reading some of the things that she talked about. When I was up talking after her, I was mostly focusing on older Albertans, elderly Albertans and believing that they were the bulk, that they were most of what was thought about in terms of the Continuing Care Act, this bill.

When I reflected on her words, I saw that she talked a lot about younger Albertans who were disabled and who need to rely on the care provided by others, so younger Albertans also are people we need to think about who would benefit from improvements to continuing care situations, whether those are supported living accommodations, facilities, or home care. I've known many disabled adults who have lived their entire lives in their own homes, but they rely on personal care attendants, both living with them and those coming into their homes. So Bill 11, rightly, should do more and be transparent on how it's going to improve the lives of those Albertans. That's something my colleague from St. Albert kind of impressed upon me when I was reading this Hansard from last night and previous days.

I also want to talk about the importance of home care generally and how I believe, as I said last night on the referral amendment we had before this House, that home care is something that we need to invest a lot more in in this province. I don't get the sense from any of the whereas that that's a goal of this bill and future budgets. We know that a pound of prevention equals a – no. The other way around. An ounce of prevention is a pound of cure. Home care is that prevention that keeps people as well as they can be in their own homes. Certainly, I have experience with that not only with my own immediate family but with extended family as well.

I know the workers in those situations are doing the best that they can, but there are many improvements – both they and my own observations of those experiences tell me – that can be made to that program not only investmentwise but in other ways as well. The quality of life of people can be improved dramatically with home care, good home-care staff, good home-care programs, but there's never an adequate amount of time those workers can spend with, in my observations, their clients. There's never an adequate amount of time. They're always rushing to get to the next, the next, the next client.

There certainly needs to be more staff not only in home-care situations but throughout the whole continuing care system, the supported living system. I think that the employment situations in those facilities are very truncated in terms of being able to hire people full-time. It seems that too many employees of continuing care facilities have to stitch together two or three, you know, jobs to make life work for them and their families and to get a full-time salary. We need to see that change.

I know that the federal government – as well, I think that there was some topping up by this provincial government and provincial governments across Canada – topped up the salaries of employees in continuing care facilities so that they could work in one place as opposed to a couple of or three places over the course of their workdays or workweek and that that decreased the spread of COVID in the early days while it was ravaging those facilities and, you know, not coincidentally improved the quality of life of those workers when they can count on being in one spot as opposed to having to move once or twice a day to different places to work.

Just before I go on to reflecting on the bill again, I want to talk about dementia. I think it was my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View who talked a lot about her experience of working in neuro wards and with people who have dementia, volunteering. That is something, I think, that is on the minds of so many people now in the world in terms of, you know: what can they do to off-set or delay or recover from dementia? It's a very personal thing to me as well.

The act is not as robust in terms of what it could say about this whole area that would give more – not hope for a cure; of course, that's not what this act is intended to do – hope to people whose loved ones have dementia and need to go into continuing care facilities, which, thankfully, are starting to be more specifically attuned and built and staffed and programmed to the needs of people who have dementia.

I know that in the southeast part of Calgary, Dover, Southview, there is a new facility that's opened up there just within the last two or three years. In addition to taking tours of it when it was under construction and officially opened, I hear good things from people in the community who know people who are residents of that facility. They call it a neighbourhood. It's designed on a neighbourhood basis, or another word I've heard them say is that it's a butterfly facility in that there's a lot of contact with the residents and they can be in a lot of different places to help their adjustment to that disease.

This bill could have, I think, pointed more towards how it would address the needs of those individuals who have dementia and given more comfort to the families who have loved ones who have dementia. It seems like more and more Albertans, more and more elderly Canadians are experiencing that, and it's a great concern.

The other thing that I wanted to talk about with regard to Bill 11 is that, of course, we know it'll collapse many different acts into this bill, which is a good thing, but it needs to be more transparent, and I think I've made that point clear. The bill is – I guess the way I think about a bill is: if I was the minister, would it hold me accountable to . . . [Member Ceci's speaking time expired]

Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has risen.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is an honour to rise in this Chamber and drink a little bit more coffee. Feeling the need for coffee this morning. I don't know about the rest of you. You know, it is hard as well just to – I came in just as my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View was speaking, and from what I heard, it was a very thoughtful analysis of Bill 11, and then Calgary-Buffalo followed, and equally thoughtful. Anyways, my point is that it's hard to follow Calgary, so I will do my best to represent Edmonton.

All right. It is an honour. I have not had a chance yet to speak to Bill 11. You know, as I've read through the bill, the Continuing Care Act, it just had me thinking about seniors and about the vulnerable folks in my own community. Actually, I was reflecting on the fact that – and just let me preface this by saying it's not “woe is me” because I am incredibly privileged as an MLA, but I was thinking about how I've not had a chance to really visit a lot of seniors in my riding over the last while simply because I just really want to be cautious, and of course for a while there a number of the seniors' residences in my riding were closed to visitors. So I thought about me and thought about how I miss that, but more importantly I think about seniors who have experienced such high levels of isolation and loneliness.

It's hard, you know. Two years of, for many folks – I just think about being a senior who may not have loved ones in the area and needing that sense of community and not being able to connect. So I'm thinking about them, and I'm thinking about vulnerable seniors in my own area. Just this morning I shared a post from my friends at Operation Friendship Seniors Society. They're an organization that I always love to give shout-outs to. I know the focus of the bill – and don't worry, Mr. Speaker; I will connect to the bill. I know the focus of the bill is protecting those who are continuing care residents, but I think about how Operation Friendship Seniors Society supports a lot of seniors who are unhoused or precariously housed in our riding. And there are a lot of them beyond our riding as well lately; certainly a lot of folks in my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre's riding as well. He and I tend to see the most visibly unhoused folks in our communities.

Yeah. Just thinking about, you know, those front-line organizations and those health workers who are supporting our seniors no matter what situation they find themselves in, whether they're housed, they're unhoused, they're precariously housed, and so on. So I think about them.

I also think about some of the continuing care operators in my riding and how, you know – I won't claim to speak for any of them – I can imagine, to echo my colleague from Edmonton-Riverview's comments, who, of course, is our critic for Seniors and Housing, they would have wanted to see more in a piece of legislation.

You know, when this bill was first introduced, she talked about the fact that, listen, we've had over 1,600 deaths in continuing care due to COVID-19. She notes that many of these deaths were preventable, and she was hoping for significant and transformational changes to the continuing care system to be announced, like improving working conditions for continuing care staff or increasing the amount of full-time staff to provide care.

But, unfortunately, what we see in Bill 11 are primarily housekeeping changes, and we've seen that with a lot of bills, to be honest, from this government so far this session. It seems to me – and trust me; I don't have the energy to get a lot of folks up and heckling today, although feel free if you choose – like this is a government and a Premier so focused on just saving themselves and a Premier just saving his own leadership that, you know, at a time when governments should be really assessing the impacts of this global pandemic on their citizens and looking to fill in those gaps that have been so clearly laid bare due to this pandemic, instead of responding with transformational change, with real, tangible legislation and policy that would truly improve the lives of Albertans, this is a government that's choosing to really do a lot of housekeeping, a lot of throwing a bunch of things into bills and calling it red tape reduction or whatever it might be.

That's disappointing. That's disheartening to see, so I echo the comments of our critic for Seniors and Housing, from Edmonton-Riverview, and want to get on the record my disappointment.

What I started to say there is that I can think about the folks who operate in this area of continuing care in my own riding and how much they've been through. I think about the Chinatown Care Centre in my riding, not necessarily in Chinatown proper depending on how you define the borders, minor details, but in the Boyle Street neighbourhood, for sure. You know, that is a centre that has – gosh, I don't know the exact numbers, but they lost a lot of their residents to COVID, Chinese elders who'd built the communities.

I talked to one person. She doesn't live in the area, but her grandfather was in the Chinatown Care Centre, and she just expressed that it didn't have to happen. He was old. I didn't pull up the details, so I can pull those up. I can't remember his exact age, but I believe he was in his 90s. She said: “Yeah, you know what? He was old, but he was healthy, and he shouldn't have died.” What happened at the Chinatown Care Centre is that COVID just spread so rapidly, and it impacted a lot of residents and staff, too.

I think about them and I think about the impact there on my constituents and how they deserved better and how we would hope – in fact, I remember that I wrote a letter along with my colleague at the time from Edmonton-South to the centre and talked about the fact that we were there to support them and that we wanted to do all we could to protect their residents and pointing out that we along with our Health critic and our Seniors and Housing critic would ensure that we would be speaking for their residents. You know, I'm disheartened to have to report back that, sadly, we didn't get a lot of action and we didn't get a response from this government that would really invest in the continuing care system.

You know, I think about Chinatown Care Centre, I think about Virginia Park, I think about all these centres in my riding where workers are doing so much and have tried to do so much to protect their residents in a very difficult time. But they need support. They need support, and they're not seeing that from this government. I guess I shouldn't be incredibly surprised, with a government that has at every opportunity chosen not to side with workers, right? It wasn't that long ago – and, gosh, the list of this government's record on workers is a long and troubling one.

I think about how just recently, you know, this government chose, at a time when, wow, we should be very much supporting those front-line workers, to propose significant rollbacks to a range of health care workers, including social workers, mental health workers, respiratory therapists – right? – folks who, oh, my goodness, have truly been on the front lines of saving lives of COVID patients. This has been this government's response. Again, I know I shouldn't be shocked. But I think about respiratory therapists and workers like that, who've done so much.

I just met with a respiratory therapist, gosh, was it – last week, I believe, who was just telling me a little bit about her work. I can't imagine how hard it's been. In fact, you know, she was there with her – I think I mentioned this already in the Chamber, but it's just such a cute story – soon-to-be wife, who's a nurse. I will be marrying those two in September, in fact.

Ms Hoffman: No. They'll be marrying each other.

Member Irwin: Well, yeah. I know I can't marry – you know what? You're just so pedantic there, Member for Edmonton-Glenora. Okay. I won't be marrying them both, but I will be officiating their wedding. I prefer to just say: marrying them both. It gets, you know, people talking. For Hansard's record I am still single, still looking. Sorry. I went off on a tangent there. The point being – for all those women in my age range reading Hansard, that will be great. Anyways. Getting off track here, and I'm turning quite red as well.

The point being that I chatted with this nurse and respiratory therapist, and they talked about how hard it's been. One was headed to night shift that night; the other one was going off to work in the morning. I think about folks like that, you know, who've just worked ridiculous schedules over the last two years. Anybody in this Chamber who's talked to health care workers is most certainly hearing the same thing from health care workers. This pandemic, despite what some folks in power might say, is still going on, and our health care system is still under significant strain.

All right. Back to Bill 11. Sorry for that little tangent there. You know, I want to just get on the record. This is a bill that doesn't fulfill the Minister of Health's own promises. What did that Minister of Health say here in this Chamber? He said that he would increase home care, he said that he would increase the amount of hours of care that residents would receive, and he said that he would increase the proportion of full-time staff. This bill does none of that. Again, it does a lot of minor administrative changes, housekeeping changes, consolidates pieces of legislation and regulations. And, as one of my colleagues has already stated, we're concerned about how much in this bill is being left to regulations.

You know, we have a great team with a lot of analytical folks, who will be going through that, but we're worried. We're worried that this bill is leaving a lot to regulations. And those regulations are set to come through in the spring of 2023. I don't know if anybody in this Chamber has been paying attention, but there's a lot that's expected to happen in the spring of 2023, probably sooner, hopefully sooner. Albertans are hoping for sooner, that's for sure. But to be serious, this is too big a risk to ask residents and workers in long-term care to just wait, right? They've waited long enough. They've been through two-plus years of a pandemic. It's another example of Albertans not being able to trust the UCP.

Let's as well get on the record the fact that this is the same government – speaking of trust, they've not acted on the recommendations from the facility-based continuing care review. What are they waiting for? What about consultation? Will this government share the consultation report? Who have they spoken to? What specifically in this bill is being supported by stakeholders? Again, there's not a lot of meat here – there's a lot of housekeeping but not a lot of substantive changes – because when we talk to front-line workers, when we talk to residents, when we talk to families impacted by continuing care, this isn't what they're asking for. They're asking for what was outlined in the review. Where is that information?

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to my colleague from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood for her thoughtful remarks and also for bringing a little levity to this morning's debate. I am happy to speak to Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act.

I have to say that generally it feels like the kind of bill – and being the former Minister of Health, I want to say that I'm quite familiar with the legislation that's being amended even though there are many acts that are being amended through this one bill. I spent a considerable amount of time with the Hospitals Act and with the continuing care provisions as it relates to that, and one of the reasons is because in long-term care – there are different types of continuing care in Alberta, and they differ significantly between supportive living at the lowest levels or dementia care or long-term care. One of the biggest differences between lower level supportive living and long-term care in terms of the legislation that governs it is that when you are in a long-term care, you are essentially living in a hospital. You require medical care, and therefore the provisions of the Hospitals Act apply to the care you receive in long-term care.

Some of the biggest differences between lower level continuing care and the highest level of long-term care are around “Who pays for drugs?” and the fact that when you're in a hospital, that's covered under the Canada Health Act. In turn, the provincial government is responsible for paying for medications in those settings. Not the case when you're in continuing care even though a lot of people who are in continuing care designated supportive living level 3 certainly can't live on their own and require constant medical care. It's considered a different level of care, and therefore the provision of medications is not included in the suite of services that they receive in their home, the home they plan on living in long term.

Another one is the requirement around having a registered nurse on-site, essentially a charge nurse. Even in long-term care one registered nurse is not usually, I'll even say, enough. I think a lot of people expect a higher level of nursing care than what is currently provided under the legislation. There are buildings not far from here, for example, where there will be one or two charge nurses for 100 or 200 residents. That is not a high RN staffing ratio, but it is legislated. If we move to the lower standard universally for continuing care across the board, there won't be that requirement anymore around having a registered nurse on-site to provide the oversight for care. That does leave me with some concern.

I know that generally as we've seen many of the changes this government has made as they relate to health care, driven – for example, in their first budget, where one of the first things they talked about was that they were going to be removing folks from the seniors drug coverage in Alberta, which caps the payment of prescriptions at $25 per prescription for the copay portion. Before, if you were a senior who was on the seniors drug plan and you had dependants and others in your life, like a spouse or – sometimes people will have dependent adult children or even be raising their grandchildren. Because it was your drug plan, you could opt your family members and your direct family members in to be a part of your drug plan as well.

One of the first things this government did in their first budget is kick all those dependants off, so only the seniors were eligible, and the dependants had to be on other programs privately delivered or the low-income programs, which, of course, have an even higher copay. Seniors regularly will tell me – and I'm sure that they tell other members of this House – that that $25 copay is significant for them. So to have to pay even more for their dependent children or grandchildren or their spouse was a significant burden for many seniors in the province of Alberta.

When I was the Minister of Health, I was very proud to be able to bring forward the requirement to have patient and family advisory councils. That model is something that happened in other parts of the country but also what happens in other parts of Alberta in other sectors. For example, having a background in education, I was really proud of the work that we were able to do in a collaborative way with parents through school councils, school councils tied to individual schools but also collectively through the Alberta School Councils' Association. The reason why we have – and sometimes people say, like, PTAs or these types of things. There are types of models that exist in other places, but in Alberta it was legislated that a school must make efforts to form a school council.

It is an advisory body to the administration of the school and the other leaders of the school authority, those primarily parents, but there are also often students who participate in school councils, members of the staff. There are some, I know, where there is a senior who lives close by and feels a deep connection to the school or a parent whose children have aged out but had spent so many years contributing to that school that they wanted to stay on for a few years longer after their child was gone. It actually creates a formal body for schools where people can come in and they can collectively give feedback to administration to help guide decision-making processes.

My grandmother was living in long-term care, and my mom regularly attended I think they were called family meetings, where she could come and give feedback on my grandmother's behalf. My grandmother: when she moved into long-term care, it was very hard on her emotionally and psychologically, and she knew that her body wasn't as strong as it once was, but her spirit had never wavered. She was born in the '20s, grew up during the Depression, a hard-working farm girl who at the point when she became a teen moved off the farm to help earn some money to support the family and worked in a hospital as probably what we'd call now a health care aide, without any training. This is what a lot of women, first-generation or second-generation women, in this province did to support their families and to support their broader communities.

When it was my grandmother's turn to move into the kind of facility where she once worked, that was very hard on her. She also struggled with the way some of the staff treated her, and that was also very difficult because, of course, you're in a position of vulnerability. I'm not saying that anyone did anything untoward, but she, like many seniors, struggled to accept their help and wanted to be treated like a peer, not like a dependant. Having a place where my mom could vocalize those hopes on my grandmother's behalf – sometimes my grandmother went to those meetings with her – made a big difference.

There was also a significant Chinese population at the long-term care facility, and there were some family members who would come and talk about the dietary requirements and their hopes for their family members around – for example, the congee was not up to par at the General at the time. They were able to give some advice, provide recipes, and give some feedback.

When I was in a position as minister to try to take some of these models that had sprung up organically in some centres and, I would say, centres that were doing a good job at trying to involve residents and family members in addressing the concerns that they were facing, I thought: why don't we take the best practices that we see here in a number of different care centres? There were many that were very enthusiastic and happy to invite me and others to come participate in their resident and family councils even if they had a different name. Then there were others that didn't have anything in place. We worked with administration. We worked with the public service to create the Resident and Family Councils Act. I am grateful that we were able to get there.

We still know that not every centre will have a resident and family council, but they do have a requirement to post about the opportunity to have one, to invite people to meetings on I think it's an annual basis right now – maybe it's twice annually – and to create space and an opportunity for people to vocalize their hopes in an advisory capacity as it relates to their care. Knowing that this act impedes our ability to ensure that that continues, I think, is problematic.

That's one of the reasons why I was so hopeful that this would go to a committee and we'd have an opportunity to consider this matter wholesomely and ensure that the voice of residents and family members was something that would be enshrined moving forward as well as the requirement to pay for medications for those who are in long-term care and the nursing requirements. I think that those are things that were put in place for good reason, and I think maintaining some oversight in that regard would be beneficial to the residents and to us as the stewards of these publicly funded and some publicly delivered care centres that we have throughout our province.

Also, I know I've been speaking a lot about seniors. It's not just seniors who live in long-term care or supportive living settings. As our colleague from St. Albert often points out, there are many adults with developmental disabilities or people who've acquired a variety of illnesses or injuries. I think about the young mom with a brain injury who was on the same floor as my grandmother for a while, and her daughters, who were six and eight, would come every weekend and spend the entire daytime of their weekend with their mom in her long-term care home. I think about the young man with MS who couldn't live on his own anymore and deserved to have a very high quality of life and to have his home, his long-term care centre, as his place of celebration and to be able to thrive and enjoy his hobbies, his personal choice, and to have a sense of community there.

By doing something that's packaged as housekeeping, that takes away some of the individuality of different types of centres – I think that there could be some risk. I won't say that I think that that's the government's intention. I think it probably is the government's intention to cut drug coverage for people who are living in long-term care. I think it probably is the government's intention to get rid of registered nurses in a number of these centres. The registered nurses were something that was also in their first budget. The number of registered nurses, FTEs, that they were planning on contracting in the province of Alberta was significant. Of course, I'm glad that they didn't have an opportunity to execute that plan because we certainly have needed every nurse that we've had in the province of Alberta, and we need more. That's what a lot of families, I think, especially learned over the last two and a half years.

Over 1,600 continuing care residents in Alberta have, tragically, passed away from COVID-19, and this tragedy should have been a call to action for all of us to ensure that we have single-site staffing capacity. A lot of people say: well, as long as they're getting the hours, it doesn't matter. Like, let me tell you why it's good for patients to have single-site staffing, and then let me tell you why it's important for workers. When you think about being in that vulnerable position of requiring somebody to care for your most basic needs, including feeding you, toileting you, providing your medications, which if you don't have those consistently, can have very negative outcomes to your health – having to accept the care of somebody else is hard enough. Having to accept the care of somebody else each and every day is humiliating for a lot of people. Being able to build a trusting relationship with a few caregivers that you can have an ongoing relationship with is good for the patient in terms of their own self-worth, their own confidence, and their own vulnerability.

But it also means that that caregiver can notice changes in behaviour and changes in medical conditions. You don't need to be necessarily a doctor or a nurse practitioner to be able to pick up on some of those things. It was the health care aides who often would flag for us when my grandmother – and they wouldn't necessarily say these words. You know, for a lot of seniors living in long-term care, they suffer from urinary tract infections. For many of them, it can cause significant psychological trauma when your body is fighting an infection, and it would be the health care aide who helped provide my grandmother with meals who often would pick up on it: something is a little bit off with your grandma. Then we would be able to talk to the charge nurse, a registered nurse, and get some blood work done and urine analysis and be able to treat the issue at hand.

Having that type of information available is good for patients. It's also good for workers because they can be at one site and can focus more fully on their patients, and they can hopefully get enough hours to be able to support themselves and their families.

That's some of the nervousness, the hesitation that I have as we continue to consider Bill 11. Really, this does, once again, come down to trust. Do you trust the government, when it comes to developing regulations, to put your family at the forefront?

With that, I move that we adjourn debate. Thank you.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 16 Insurance Amendment Act, 2022

[Debate adjourned April 26: Ms Renaud speaking]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, we are on Bill 16. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has risen.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A pleasure to rise this morning to speak about insurance and the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022, Bill 16, which I will say is a very clear example, once again demonstrating the government's priorities in this province.

The legislation before us, of course, opens up the Insurance Act, and while the act is open, the government has chosen to deal with measures that I would say serve the macroinsurance industry, the upper echelons of the insurance industry, while there are many issues of the insurance industry concerning consumers of insurance products, individual Albertan consumers, that have left the attention span of the government. The government has chosen to once again serve the corporate end of the insurance spectrum but not the consumer spectrum, and they once again refuse to take any action whatsoever to reduce auto insurance bills, that are punishing Alberta families and businesses since the UCP removed the rate cap.

Now, we don't have issues with what this bill actually does. We don't have concerns with its content. What it does is allow profitable insurance corporations to repatriate insurance companies that are now operating offshore, captive insurance companies, and it allows companies to do things which would satisfy the needs that they have in a large insurance world, where particularly the oil and gas sector is having difficulty becoming insured. The captive insurance market and repatriation of some of these companies is something that has been welcomed by some in the energy sector hoping to take advantage of the pools of capital in that sector, and the intent, I believe, is to have those pools of capital used to self-insure.

We appreciate that element of the legislation, but while the bill is open, there are hundreds of thousands of Albertans who are really struggling with their insurance costs, particularly automobile insurance. Highly profitable insurance companies charged Albertans $385 million more in premiums in 2020 than they did in 2019. Well, that's a lot of money sucked out of the pockets of Albertans to go pay for something they really don't have a choice in having. They need to have their car insurance although, Mr. Speaker, I must say that some people are parking their cars, not because of the pandemic, which is something that was done during the height of the pandemic. People weren't going to work. They weren't commuting as much. Of course, car insurance companies as a result had fewer payouts and as a result were much more profitable, and that's where some of that $385 million more in premiums came in versus the amount that was paid out.

They're making enormous profits as a result of that, but Albertans were hurting, Mr. Speaker. They were suffering at the hands of these companies who were profiting enormously but not allowing the consumers to benefit from the lower payouts that they were making.

That's why, Mr. Speaker, the people of this province have lost faith in this government, because they see the priorities of the government always focusing on the larger corporate world and not on the individual consumers and citizens of the province, and the hope is always that there will be a trickle-down effect to the citizens and the consumers in this province as a result of giving benefit to the corporate world.

In this case insurance companies, profitable insurance companies, were allowed to charge fees that were much higher than necessary in the insurance climate that we were facing in 2019, and as a result Albertans paid more than they needed to at a time when they were having costs escalate in all kinds of places.

A lack of trust emanates as a result of government decisions such as this piece of legislation we have before us, where sort of the macrolevel insurance evolutions are tended to but where the government is paying no attention to elements of the Insurance Act that could have been changed to benefit everyday Albertans. They're putting the profits of insurance companies ahead of the budgets of everyday working families. All of us know this, and all of us feel this, especially younger people who are trying to insure a vehicle to get to work. In many cases employment requires that a person have a vehicle, and of course that vehicle has to be insured by law, and it presents an entry barrier to young people trying to get into the workplace if indeed insurance is unaffordable. This legislation does nothing for those families, for those young people trying to enter the workplace facing barriers to employment such as high and unaffordable insurance costs.

We must do better. We can do better. I think the government should have taken more time, when this Insurance Act was open, to take a serious look at other elements of the insurance industry that could have been considered when there were changes being made to the legislation.

Why is the government taking no action as to the auto insurance premiums, which are skyrocketing? We had a rate cap, and the government today says that, of course, they removed it as a result of their desire to let the market find its own level of insurance premium. Yet, indeed, the cap protected Albertans. It was a 5 per cent rate cap, and it protected Albertans. It wasn't an artificial cap. It was a cap that allowed insurance companies still to be profitable yet made insurance affordable for Albertans. Once again the priorities of the government showed clearly that their interests lie with the insurance companies, not with Alberta consumers and citizens and voters.

Consistently that's the theme that we find in pieces of legislation that keep being brought forward by this government, in particular this one, the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022. You know, even things like the requirements for insurance companies to report on an annual basis: why not make it necessary that the Minister of Finance must by law – by law – prepare the superintendent of insurance's annual report every year? Now, for over a hundred years that annual report was presented voluntarily because it was an expectation, a custom that it be done in this House, and it didn't happen this year, Mr. Speaker.

This year the government decided not to present that report in the regular way, that has been done for over a hundred years and by making a public announcement. In fact, it basically tried to hide it by not saying anything about it. This information has been produced like clockwork for over a hundred years. Now, of course, the government is saying: "Well, it's available online; therefore, we didn't hide anything. It's there for the public to see." Yet there was a difference in procedure, which is important to note, and that is that the announcement wasn't there, and the public presentation of the report wasn't done as it had been for over a hundred years.

It seems to be a practice of the government, Mr. Speaker, in other areas as well to use the excuse: the information is available online; therefore, we don't need to make a public announcement. They just quietly allow the information to be put online without any public disclosure or announcement. They're trying to pull the same stunt with the private school fee payments. The government is saying: well, the full disclosure is available online. I think that we'll probably end up seeing a number more of this type of effort on the part of the government to fail to announce publicly the reporting, the financial reports of different elements of the government operations, whether it be insurance company reports, whether it be private school funding.

Just simply allowing things to be reported online without any annual announcement about it is a dereliction of duty. It's a way the government is using to allow information to just simply fade away, to fade to grey. It's a tactic that I think is rather shameful. I hope by feeling the backlash from the public and by us in the opposition raising concerns about this practice, it will encourage the government to see fit to properly exercise its responsibility to bring forward reports in the manner that they have been traditionally for over a hundred years – for example, the superintendent of insurance annual report on an annual basis – and publicly announce the report rather than just simply having it available online without announcement whatsoever.

There are other elements of the legislation, Mr. Speaker, that should have been brought to light and haven't been. The Insurance Act is not open to anything except, as I said, the macro level of changes. We still can't get answers from this government on insurance and lobbyists. Like, how many times did members of Executive Council or political staff in this government meet with Nick Koolsbergen or his Wellington team on insurance? Why do insiders get access instead of Albertans? The result of that type of influence on government policy is that when such acts as the Insurance Act are opened up, the legislative changes that are made serve those lobbyists' interests. They don't serve, necessarily, the public interest, the consumer interest. They serve the interests of the lobbyists, who have at heart the corporate clients' benefits in mind.

That insurance change as a result of the lobbying here in this bill, this piece of legislation, in and of itself is not what we have an issue with. The changes that have been made are, I think, good attempts to address global insurance issues that particularly the large oil and gas companies have in obtaining insurance and reinsurance for those companies that do actually insure the large oil and gas companies. It's just that the lobbying that is done is the end of the government's investigations into what could be amended while the act is open. There's enough discontent, there's enough heartache, there are enough people who are hurting badly as a result of the skyrocketing insurance premiums in this province right now that that in and of itself should have been a, quote, unquote, lobby effort that the government listened to. But it's falling on deaf ears.

We constantly hear a retort from our – hearkening back to the rate cap that we had in place when we were in government, a 5 per cent cap on insurance premiums, which made insurance affordable and still allowed the insurance companies to be profitable. The government decries that as an interference in the marketplace, when, in fact, what it did was respond to the very desperate hue and cry from the public that they are not able to survive economically in the workplace by being forced to pay these enormous insurance costs.

That's not the only thing they're getting hammered with, Mr. Speaker. That's on top of a huge escalation in food costs, in rent costs. The price of everything is going up as a result of very many global events that are coalescing all at one time, and it's the government's responsibility to do what it can on a local basis to try to lessen that burden, and it has not addressed the requirements to exercise that responsibility in this legislation.

The latest changes to this Insurance Act are focused on a need for insurance products in the industrial energy areas and niche products and their specific concerns within the sector that are supported by the energy sector, which is a good thing, but, once again, the total and sole focus of this government has been on the macro elements of the insurance sector.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Member Ceci: Thank you for that introduction, Mr. Speaker. To follow my colleague from Edmonton-McClung, I just want to speak to – this is my first time speaking to the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022, Bill 16, and of course we all know that this act will amend the recent act that was before this House in the fall, which allowed the creation of captive insurance companies, companies that will provide insurance for their host company. I think all of us learned a great deal from that fall review of captives and their need to be present in Alberta.

I can remember the discussion taking place from the Minister of Finance talking about how this was a hard insurance market and that the creation of captives would facilitate the availability of insurance for companies, particularly within the energy sector, the oil and gas sector in this province. This amendment will further assist that sector in particular, which is an important one to this province and has been the source of a great deal of GDP growth over time since the '50s, '40s in this province. We're going to 80 years or so of the sector being an important employer, generator of wealth. Having problems with that sector being able to get insurance for their operations is obviously a problem, so we need to consider this bill in that light.

I think, as my colleague was saying, while there are no specific concerns with the changes proposed in Bill 16, and these changes were supported by validators in the energy sector as well as task force members, which is indeed really helpful in terms of important stakeholders to reach out to, there is much missing with this opportunity to open up the act for the second time in six, seven months. While I will talk about what's missing shortly, I just want to reflect again on what this bill does do.

The need for insurance for particularly the energy sector can't be overstated, because of the important corporate and public policy reasons that I'll elaborate on. We, of course, know that from time to time catastrophic incidents can occur, have occurred across the world with regard to producers of energy, whether that is – well, it has happened across the world, has happened here in this province. So catastrophic events need to be backstopped with appropriate insurance through those companies. The industry needs the ability to access that insurance. And when there is a hard market and difficulties in accessing insurance at a reasonable price, the Minister of Finance appropriately brought forward to this House ways to address that in this province. That was the previous bill – I don't remember the number – that we dealt with in the fall, and this one now.

We want industry to be insured appropriately so that any catastrophic events and the associated costs can ultimately be addressed by the company and by the industry. We don't want those costs to be borne by taxpayers or passed on to taxpayers in the event that a company lacks the appropriate funds through insurance to deal with that situation, whatever that catastrophic event could be. So viable insurance products. This bill talks about the domestication of stand-alone companies that are somewhere else coming back to this province. It facilitates that to happen. So I'm certainly onside with that.

There are a number of terms here that are new to me, of course. One is that it creates a redomestication provision, specifically how Alberta-based companies who have a captive insurance company operating outside of Canada – I think they call it extraprovincial jurisdictional or something like that, which basically means outside of Canada, likely in the United States or Bermuda, for example – can bring those home and continue operating here without any disruption in their coverage. That's critical because though the chances are small potentially that there is an interruption in coverage between the bringing home of a company that is in, say, the United States to Alberta, there is a chance. And that's what insurance does. It derisks those situations.

So that's a good reason to support this bill, and I will support this bill. There are other things, of course, that companies might want to do, but that's one good reason to do that, to support this bill.

It also talks about the taxation of premiums. It goes on and on and on that what this does is lower the taxation on premiums. I don't necessarily have a problem with that. I know that many stakeholders have looked at this and said it's okay. It works. It'll help companies repatriate their insurers here. So I'm okay with that, too.

A second thing this bill does is that it makes changes to allow Alberta to license stand-alone reinsurance companies in Alberta. There are several pages of that. I certainly learned from doing my own research that the reinsurance industry is dominated by large players and that some of those large players, not unlike investors, are having some challenges with energy sector companies and are helping, I guess, to create a hard market for being able to access insurance.

Companies doing this, taking up this bill and repatriating their reinsurance company and creating a captive: you know, it's probably companies taking their action to ensure that they control their own destinies rather than be at the whim of other companies that are less knowledgeable about their processes and the kinds of business they do.

The oil and gas sector has certainly had some challenges with finding appropriate capital, but we have that capital here in this province. There are many who have grown up, investors who have grown up with the industry and are comfortable with it, and they would also probably be the people who would look to start up reinsurance companies in this province and know the risks they're dealing with, probably more so than others who are not residents of Alberta. With this legislative change the government is hoping, as I just said, that the enormous amount of capital that's in Alberta's oil and gas sector might be pooled to create a local reinsurance company or companies.

The bill generally has the recommendations from the task force, and industry has indicated in terms of validation that it's a good-faith attempt to find a solution that, in my view and the view of others, does not represent a downside risk to this province, so that's a positive step in the right direction.

The third thing I'd like to cover briefly is that this bill will make it easier for Alberta companies to access unlicensed insurance. Unlicensed insurance is not fly-by-night or sketchy in any way; it just means that those insurers are not licensed in Canada. They're in other places. Alberta companies only access insurance from unlicensed insurance companies in circumstances where no domestic insurer will write an insurance policy for a particular risk. So in those cases, where a company does not repatriate or create a company for reinsurance on their own, this act will facilitate them to access reinsurance companies elsewhere.

There's talk, of course, about a special broker using a current domiciled insurance company to get an unlicensed insurance company to provide insurance, so that's something that's in this bill as well, and the taxation on premiums is identified here as well.

I just want to make a few comments about the hard insurance market that my colleague talked a little bit about. When we were government, we worked – and it was particularly around the auto sector insurance, or auto insurance. There were challenges in that, and we did significant work to try and make sure that there was fair treatment with both the companies and Albertans. The cap on premiums was not intended to be a forever thing. It was intended to be a "let's get down to work and figure this out" approach, very much meeting with the presidents of companies. There were numerous meetings and a multitude, a number of presidents – I think there were, like, over 20 or so – that weighed in on what we were doing and what we were requesting of that industry.

The cap was an attempt to generate their willingness to work together and to provide information to the government of the day or the superintendent of insurance of the day that would help the government better understand what the increases to premiums that they were requesting were based on.

We set up a task force with each other and were doing that work when it was interrupted by an election. Work was suspended and ultimately stopped by the incoming government. But it was a genuine attempt to try and understand what the costs to the industry were all about and why that was being transferred into increases in premiums and what the government could do to reduce those costs. We were on that track of doing that work.

But that's not what the hard market for this area is, that is talked about in particular. We've learned a great deal with regard to, as I said, captives, that was brought in in the last bill. This amendment is to facilitate, again, the efforts of the energy sector in particular.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022. This is actually my first opportunity to speak to this bill, so it's a pleasure to put my comments and thoughts on the record with respect to this. I think my colleagues have done a good job of talking about what this bill does, and I think we've already indicated that we do generally support the content of this bill and the efforts that are made here to, you know, create some new, I guess, insurance products and opportunities in Alberta. The hope is that these changes will actually be useful. I know some of them are a bit – well, we don't know yet for sure what the outcome of them will be, but certainly we support that.

If I can go over a little bit about what the bill includes and then make some broader comments with respect to insurance in Alberta right now as this is certainly the topic of this bill. You know, the bill does open up the Insurance Act once again in Alberta and makes a few changes. In this Legislature we considered changes earlier this year – my apologies; it might have been last year – to captive insurance to allow Alberta companies to basically insure themselves. It's different from self-insurance in that it's actually setting up a separate company, a subsidiary company, to insure the broader parent company. We supported that bill when it came through the Legislature.

I understand that the proposed Bill 16 makes a few other additional changes; for example, with respect to the Captive Insurance Companies Act. The legislation now, as my colleague from Calgary-Buffalo and my colleague from Edmonton-McClung set out, makes some changes to that bill to allow for redomestication of those captive insurance companies, specifying how, specifically, an Alberta-based company who has a captive insurance company that's operating outside of Canada can bring that captive insurance company back home while continuing to operate so that there's no disruption in coverage. Certainly, that sounds like something that is – there are good reasons why companies would want to do this.

We understand, of course, that, you know, if an Alberta-based company is operating in another jurisdiction, where there may be more lenient or less stringent insurance requirements and regulatory requirements, a company bringing their captive insurance company back to Alberta may be facing more stringent regulatory requirements and standards here than in a place like, say, Bermuda. They will of course pay higher taxes here. But there are savings on other costs, and that may be a benefit to some Alberta companies who choose to do that. That's one provision of this bill, to redomesticate those captive insurance companies back in Alberta.

Bill 16 also makes changes to allow Alberta to license stand-alone reinsurance companies in Alberta. Reinsurance is, obviously, insurance for insurance companies. I understand that the hope, I believe, with this change is that some of the capital that's currently circulating, particularly in the oil and gas market, could be pooled to basically create a local reinsurance company. This, I understand, is not a guaranteed outcome – and certainly it has some potential liabilities – but it does create an opportunity or at least a space in which a possible solution may arise. Certainly, that sounds like something that companies will have to consider and see whether or not mitigating the risks is possible or worth while to them. Certainly, if it's creating a space for that kind of opportunity, it seems like a good idea.

Of course, the third thing that this bill does is that it allows or makes it easier – I shouldn't say allows – for Alberta companies to access unlicensed insurance. Alberta companies currently only access insurance from unlicensed insurance companies in circumstances where there is no domestic insurer that is able or willing to write an insurance policy for a particular risk. This will allow these companies to access unlicensed insurance. You know, it brings it more in line with other provinces and makes getting a viable insurance product easier for industry. Again, this is important. We do have a vested interest in Alberta in making sure that, for example, our oil and gas industries are able to access the insurance that they need. Especially in the event of a catastrophic event or a huge challenge, we want to know that those companies will be able to manage that risk and access insurance.

You know, broadly speaking, Mr. Speaker, Bill 16 does seem to be something that I'm willing to support, and I believe that some of my colleagues have indicated their willingness to support this bill. However, I think it's important to note that when we think about insurance – and I'm not sure what members of the government caucus are doing, but I know members of the opposition caucus have been very busy knocking on doors, not just in our own ridings but across the province, to talk to Albertans and see what's on their minds, and insurance comes up quite regularly.

I'm certain that if I were to tell Albertans – and, in fact, I'm going to test this theory out when I go out door-knocking in my constituency this week – that the current government is bringing in legislation around insurance, many Albertans would expect that that means this government is doing something to address the very real rise in insurance costs that are affecting them in their day-to-day life, which is insurance costs on auto insurance and home insurance and life insurance and all the day-to-day products that Albertans rely upon. I'm certain that many would say: oh, great; that's good. I know that I've been hearing from my constituents – I know all the members in this House have – about the steep increase in insurance premiums since this government has come into power. Certainly, that would be what their expectation is.

If this government, at a time when Albertans are struggling with high insurance costs, is bringing in legislation around insurance, it must be to help them out: that would be the assumption. As I said, I'm going to test this theory out when I go door-knocking, because every single time I go door-knocking, insurance is raised by people at the doors. So I'll ask them, I'll say: "What do you think? They're bringing in legislation." They will probably be very excited, and then I'll get to say: "Oh, I'm sorry, but once again this government is actually not bringing forward legislation that would help you with your household budget costs and your daily costs. That's, actually, not at all this government's priority. That's not what this bill is about. This bill is about, you know, creating new insurance opportunities for industry, for companies, okay?"

You know, nobody can doubt, as we've said, that this is something we support, but it is not what's most pressing on Albertans' minds when they think about insurance. In fact, we know that not only has this government not brought forward anything to help people with their average insurance costs; they've actually deliberately, intentionally made this more expensive for Albertans, and we know that this is precisely what they were lobbied to do, Mr. Speaker.

As we all know now, the NDP had a cap on insurance rates, that actually would be incredibly helpful to Albertans right now. But what we know – and this is a matter of public record – is that this government was actively lobbied by the insurance companies to lift that rate cap. In fact, Mr. Speaker, you know, for example, the biggest lobbying company, Wellington, that did the lobbying of the insurance companies, was incorporated as a lobbying entity on March 26, 2019, just a few weeks before the provincial election in 2019.

As we all know, on April 30, 2019, the Premier was sworn in. A mere three and a half weeks later, May 24, 2019, according to the lobbyist registry, Wellington registers as an official lobbyist and indicates that their reason for lobbying is to "advocate for market-based auto insurance rates vs an artificial rate cap." That was their filing, May 24, a mere few weeks after the Premier was sworn in. Guess what, Mr. Speaker? A few months later, August 30, 2019, this government lifts that insurance cap and speaks highly of the rate-based market for insurance.

Now, it's not really a surprise that this government did that. We always knew that they were not in support of things that make it easier for average Albertans to pay their bills, but we know that they were specifically lobbied by some very specific interests to do precisely what they did.

Now, in 2019, you know, that was under cover of a lot of things that were happening, but we know that many Albertans reported their insurance rates going up, their premiums going up upwards of 30 per cent. That was a significant amount back then. It's even more in terms of the impact on daily budgets now because of the cost-of-living increases, inflation increases, and then, of course, all the things that this government has done to make life more expensive for Albertans, whether it be property tax increases, utility rates going up. They're paying more in school fees and postsecondary tuition. For a while there they were paying more in child care fees. They're paying so much more. So when you pile all that on, the increase in insurance is significant.

We also know that when the government – it was surprising. It's a hard thing to sell, but, my goodness, the Minister of Finance has worked really hard to sell this, that we should be feeling sorry for the insurance companies because, you know, they really just wanted to get new products out into the market, the poor, poor insurance companies. Then, of course, to fulfill that narrative or complete that narrative, we know that this government took the unprecedented step of not actually releasing the superintendent of insurance report, which had been released every year for 107 years. Why would they want to suppress that report? Why would they not want to release that information for Albertans?

An Hon. Member: One guess.

Ms Pancholi: Yeah. There is only one guess. I wonder if it's because it shows that – guess what? – the insurance companies have been doing just fine, in fact not even just fine; they've been profiting even more significantly than before.

That actually doesn't fit with this government's narrative about insurance companies, so they suppressed that information and finally had to succumb because of the pressure put on by the Official Opposition and then the rising swell of Albertans saying: "Well, hang on. Where is that report? What does it say?" Then, you know, as is prone to happen, the day before a long weekend they tried to bury that report. But it came out, and what does it show? Well, yeah, it shows that, actually, insurance companies collected $1.151 billion more in premiums than they paid out in 2019 and that in 2020 they collected $1.324 billion more than they paid out. Keep in mind, as all of us remember what was happening in 2020, that it was the pandemic. Many people were working from home, many people had parked their cars, some people had lost their jobs, so actually Albertans were driving less, but insurance companies were making more.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I look forward to talking to Albertans when I go door-knocking in my constituency and, of course, you know, when I go door-knocking in various other constituencies like Calgary and around this province and saying: oh, did you know that this government is bringing forward legislation on insurance but not to help you – not to help you – because this isn't the government's priority?

We see that with the same approach they've taken months after, again, the Official Opposition had been calling and Albertans had been certainly writing their MLAs across this province about the increased utility rates. You know, first of all, the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity was saying that everything was working exactly as it was supposed to and they weren't going to do anything to help Albertans. Months later they finally agreed to bring forward some semblance of legislation to actually deliver a utility rebate but with no timelines.

They actually rejected amendments put forward by the Official Opposition to make sure those rebates were delivered in a timely fashion. We think Albertans should have gotten this months ago but certainly by the end of May. Couldn't this government commit to doing something meaningful to help Albertans with their daily costs by the end of May? Perhaps they're too distracted with something else, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps that's why they can't deliver for Albertans, because they're too busy trying to deliver for the Premier. So once again Albertans aren't seeing any of the benefits. They can't even get this government to take these issues seriously.

On the one hand, I could say that it's kind of, you know, unfortunate that the government brought forward a bill on insurance at a time when Albertans are struggling with insurance rates and they are doing nothing about it. At worst – and I think, unfortunately, we have to believe the worst at this point, Mr. Speaker – it shows that once again this government is not interested in looking out for average Albertans, is not interested in meaningful solutions to help Albertans pay their bills and to get by and put food on the table and to participate in the local economy. They're not interested in those things. We always do know where their priority is, and it's on saving their own skins, perhaps supporting their own Premier. Perhaps it's infighting, perhaps it's undermining, but it's not on Albertans. When that's the case, everybody pays except for the lobbyists.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I believe I see the hon. member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rose slowly because I thought perhaps the Finance minister would want to, you know, refute some of our statements, but he must . . . [interjection] Yeah, I know. I'm not saying whether he's here or not, but I thought he may want to join debate.

Ms Hoffman: Maybe after you.

Member Irwin: Perhaps after me. That's right. Actually, he's also free to intervene as well, interject. Yeah. Absolutely. I welcome interjections.

Okay. It is a pleasure to rise again. I will try to keep my marital status out of this speech.

Mr. Schow: He's already spoken to the bill.

Member Irwin: Oh, well, he can interject.

All right, Mr. Speaker. Let us speak about Bill 16, insurance. Now, it is challenging to follow my colleagues, who have just laid out a pretty good analysis of this bill, but I will try my best. You know, like my colleagues, like my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud, I can also point out that insurance is an issue that comes up a lot at the doors and not just in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood but, as my wonderful colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud pointed out, when we door-knock in other ridings. In fact, I know we're both planning to go to the lovely city of Calgary soon and both plan to do much door-knocking while down there. I can predict quite reasonably that insurance will come up at the doors.

As I've stated many times in this Chamber, you know, I do my best to endeavour to really listen to folks when I'm at the doors. I don't say: "Oh, what issues are top of mind? How are you feeling about insurance?" No. I leave it pretty wide open, so unsolicited feedback on just rising costs, affordability in general. On its own you might say, "Okay; well, auto insurance is probably not debilitating to folks," but for some it is. In fact, it's the entire suite of changes or, I should say, lack of changes, inaction from this government that's really impacting affordability for my constituents, right?

We're talking about things like increases to home insurance as well. We're talking about things like tuition. We're talking about – you know, obviously, inflation: I know we cannot solely blame this government for that. I understand. But when a government has an opportunity to address affordability and then chooses not to, that's concerning. Déjà vu from when I spoke – oh, gosh – less than an hour ago on the previous bill, continuing care: that was an opportunity for this government to really address the gaps in the system and present legislation that could be transformational and could tangibly improve the lives of Albertans.

Similarly, again, another bill in front of us, Insurance Amendment Act. You know, this could have been an opportunity for this Finance minister and his government to really address the affordability crisis that so many Albertans are facing and to lower insurance premiums for our constituents, but instead they chose not to. Again, you know, a number of sort of housekeeping-type changes that won't have a direct impact on Albertans. Instead, a bill, a piece of legislation that supports insurance companies.

I want to talk a little bit about – you know, I found this fascinating. I found it fascinating that – and my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud pointed this out quite well – we've seen from this government multiple times, in fact, a government that is willing to put profits ahead of people, corporations ahead of constituents. I'm not sure what other forms of alliteration I can do, but the point is that this is a track record with this government, continuously choosing corporations over their constituents.

A great example of this would be what we saw – oh, gosh, I think it was released, yeah, just prior to the long weekend. This UCP government dropped a report that showed that insurance companies are reaping higher profits than ever before, and they're doing it with the help of this UCP government. Don't quote me on this; let me point to evidence. I'm reminded of yesterday, the evidence, the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions pointing out that this opposition might like evidence and science. Yes, we do. We do like evidence and science. So it was the superintendent of insurance 2020 annual report that specifically outlined that the car insurance industry charged Alberta drivers $385 million more in premiums in 2020 than they did in 2019, and, no, those profits didn't trickle down to Albertans. Absolutely not. It boosted their own pockets and expanded their already-gross margins. No surprise.

I'd love to hear why. Again, we haven't yet heard from the Finance minister his justification on this, but as my colleague pointed out, the UCP attempted to suppress this report for the first time in 107 years. So, folks watching, of which I know there are at least probably three, you know, when this government talks about transparency, accountability, you cannot trust them. You cannot trust them one bit. Why would they cover up that report? Because this report showed that the car insurance industry collected $1.151 billion more in premiums than they paid out in claims in 2019, but in 2020 they collected $1.324 billion more than they paid out. Interesting numbers.

And that Finance minister, as my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View pointed out in response to this very interesting report, likes to say that these have been tough times for the insurance industry. Well, that's absolutely factually untrue because these are highly profitable companies that are truly fleecing Albertans with the help of the UCP. Again, this is at a time when, you know, the UCP is choosing to make everything more expensive for Alberta families.

So we called on, my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View called on Albertans to really – you know, every time you see your car insurance bill, remember that this is a UCP government that chose to ensure that your premiums continue to rise, the same government that chose . . . [interjection] You know what? I will absolutely defer to the Finance minister.

Mr. Toews: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to express my appreciation to the member for giving way. I just want to – I know I only have a minute here – make a couple of comments. I need to correct the record. Firstly, Bill 16 is about, again, further enabling captive insurance corporations in Alberta, further ensuring that we have another insurance product in the province, and also enabling the business of reinsurance to take place in the province of Alberta. It's about adding capacity and competition, something the members don't talk about because their solution is always a rate cap. It's a Band-Aid. We observed what happened when you put a Band-Aid on an issue without dealing with the systemic problems: it results in a pullback of capacity. That's what took place in automobile insurance. This government has worked to correct that. We did it in Bill 41.

Member Irwin: Thank you. I appreciate the minister interjecting. Yes. Absolutely. You know, what's interesting is – again, we've talked a little bit about some of the ins and outs of the bill, but your intervention doesn't answer why at every opportunity you continue to prioritize profits before people and why you continue to choose those already-profitable corporations' best interests instead of the best interests of the people that you represent. So again I would ask: why? Why hide the superintendent's report after 107 years? Why did this UCP government and this minister choose not to be transparent?

Again, we've pointed out that we don't have major concerns with the content of this legislation, but it's what's missing that we're concerned about: no relief for drivers, no relief for homeowners that are seeing soaring home insurance policies. I mean, as we've seen, just ask the residents of northeast Calgary to talk about what they've faced with hail damage.

You know, again, if we didn't see a track record with this government on insurance, of one that continually shows that Albertans can't trust them – again, after 100 years why would this Finance minister not want to produce that report, right? He finally released it, but only – only – thanks to the good work of my colleagues, like my colleagues from Calgary-Mountain View and from Lethbridge-West, putting pressure on this government to come clean and to be transparent.

All right. I'll get a couple of questions on the record before I end my remarks. Why is this government taking no action? How many billions in profits are enough for your friends in the insurance industry? If the Insurance Act is open, why not make certain that the Finance minister must by law prepare the superintendent of insurance annual report every year? Again, why try to hide it?

We're not getting answers from this government on insurance and on lobbyists, and as my colleague from Edmonton-McClung quite aptly pointed out – how many times did members of Executive Council or political staff meet with Nick Koolsbergen or his Wellington team on insurance? Why is it that time and time again lobbyists, insiders, friends of this government get their ear, yet Albertans who are struggling – and we've stood up. We've had Albertans share their stories on the rising costs that they're facing, including rising auto premiums, and this government refuses to listen to those voices. Why are you not listening to the people that you represent?

I'm certain he's busy, but I have to believe that the Finance minister in the Grande Prairie-Wapiti region is hearing from his residents up there. I've spent some time in Grande Prairie. You know, lots of big pickup trucks up there, right? I'm looking at the Member for Grande Prairie, too. I know she's probably hearing from her constituents about rising auto premiums. So why isn't this government listening?

All right. Again, I'll just get on the record our grave concerns. You know, we've been quite clear that it's not the content. The minister is pointing out to us at every opportunity that the rate cap is our solution. Well, we know that this government has refused to take action, any action, since they removed that rate cap that was put in place by our NDP government. We are proud of our record on insurance because we didn't see these skyrocketing increases impact our constituents like this government is seeing right now.

With that, I just want to point out and summarize that, you know, these rising costs are just one example of many that our constituents are facing, and I and my colleagues here in the NDP opposition will continue to speak out and stand up and amplify the voices of our constituents who are struggling right now with affordability. It's one more example that we cannot trust the UCP government.

I'm not sure how much time I have, but I will . . .

The Acting Speaker: Two minutes, but it'll be increased if you give way.

Member Irwin: Sounds good. I give way.

Mr. Toews: All right, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the member for giving way. I just want to again correct the record. This government has taken action on automobile insurance. We, in fact, took action in Bill 41. We dealt with the systemic issues, certainly some of the systemic issues, that were driving up claims costs, soft injury costs, that were creating more contention in the courts around insurance and driving up premiums.

Mr. Speaker, again, I want to point out for the record that we've had seven insurance companies now apply for a reduction in premiums. That's encouraging. That's contrary to the narrative we hear across the way. The members opposite, when they were in government, simply brought a rate cap in and did not deal with the systemic issues that were driving up costs.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to correct the record.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Just for clarity, to the hon. member, for graciously allowing more than one intervention, it means that there are two more minutes added to your time. So there are four minutes now.

Member Irwin: Oh, goodness. I may not take that full time, but it is nice to give way to the minister even though what he is saying is not supported by the evidence. You know, he is claiming to be clearing the record on this. He can speak all he wants, saying that he's taking action on insurance, but that is not trickling down to our constituents, right? This is not having an impact on the bills that our constituents are seeing. They're seeing rising auto insurance premiums. Again, the minister can claim that they're taking tangible action, but it was steps like ensuring a rate cap that truly supported and helped our constituents.

You know, with that, I'd be willing to speak more on this bill, but I know we will – well, actually, I don't know if I will have another opportunity. Regardless, I know the time is such that I will adjourn debate.

The Acting Speaker: It's my understanding that you're making a request for a motion to adjourn debate, correct? Yes. All right.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Bill 12 Trustee Act

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. deputy government whip.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to be here today to move on behalf of the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General third reading of Bill 12, the Trustee Act, which will make it more efficient to manage trusts and lessen the need for Albertans to go to court.

We believe it is our responsibility to continually revise and reform legislation to meet the needs of the modern world and the needs of Albertans. I have been encouraged by the lively debate on this important legislation. If passed, the new Trustee Act would replace existing legislation, which is significantly outdated and based on mid-Victorian era legislation. The new Trustee Act would clarify a trustee's role and their administrative powers, outline specific processes so that in many instances trustees and beneficiaries do not need to go to court, and set out clear provisions to support and improve day-to-day functions of trusts and provide a basis for trusts that do not have extensive terms or that do not cover off all the situations the provisions apply to while making sure people can still set their own terms.

Mr. Speaker, before I conclude my remarks, I would like to just address a few questions that arose during the second reading debate, beginning with Henson trusts. Quite simply, Bill 12 has nothing to do with Henson trusts – as I attempt to flip the page, Mr. Speaker – and Bill 12 does not affect a person's eligibility for government benefits such as the AISH program. I'd also like to be clear that Bill 12 adopts 87 of the 90 recommendations from the Alberta Law Reform Institute. The three recommendations that were not adopted were minor housekeeping provisions. I would encourage everybody in the Assembly to support Bill 12. I will conclude my remarks with that.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, are there any members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has risen.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to join debate today on Bill 12, the Trustee Act, and I certainly look forward to, in due course, expressing my support for the large gist of this Trustee Act replacement that we're looking at. It's not an amendment. It's a new Trustee Act, as the member who just spoke rightly referred to. It was certainly a process that has taken some time. It's welcome to see the act before us now because, of course, the legislation has been in need of updating for a long time.

I think all of us who have been in a position of being asked in the past to be perhaps an executor for the estate of a family member or friend at some point may have considered it to be an extreme honour to be asked to act in that position and perhaps, once actually exercising that role, realized that it was a fairly onerous responsibility to undertake because of the trust requirements that an executor, for example, is forced to undertake. There were lots of situations that were not readily defined under the old act and left the individual who was the trustee in the case of an estate wondering exactly what options existed. There was a lot of clarification that was needed.

This act, I think, goes a long way to doing that because, of course, it adopts about 87 of the 90 recommendations of the Alberta Law Reform Institute but also was based on Bill 12, the Uniform Trustee Act, 2012, as developed by the Uniform Law Conference of Canada. The ALRI tailored that to reflect Alberta's trust law practice over the course of a number of years. I know the initial report was brought forward for public discussion in 2015, and now, of course, we're looking at 2022, so it's been a long time in the development process, with lots of discussion back and forth within the legal community and within those who are involved in trusts. I think that the result of all that discussion has come to serve us well and that this bill before us addresses many of the long-standing deficiencies of the former act.

Often, Mr. Speaker, as I alluded to when I was talking about people being named as executors, trustees are lay people. They don't have specific knowledge of what it is to be a trustee, and until they actually have the appointment invoked and are in that position may really be unaware of the responsibilities that they have agreed to undertake. I think that this act and the recommendations that have been adopted therein from the Alberta Law Reform Institute go a long way to providing guidance to an individual who has accepted a trusteeship role, particularly if they are a layperson, because it does give specific and very detailed references to numerous situations that may occur during the course of a trusteeship that will potentially involve an estate or an executor role.

On top of that, Mr. Speaker, what it does as well – and I commend the Alberta Law Reform Institute for bringing forth this recommendation, and I'm glad that we see it in the legislation – is that it creates a two-tiered standard of care. Of course, as a layperson who finds themselves in the position of a trustee, one would not expect the same standard of care from that individual as you would from a professional trustee. The legislation recognizes that, and I commend the drafters for that. Now, all trustees must exercise ordinary care and diligence, as the recommendations say, when dealing with trust property, but professional trustees must exercise a greater degree of skill. This tiered standard will ensure that any trustee who brings or should bring special skills to the performance of his or her trustee duties will be held to a higher standard. That, I think, is something – it is a principle in the legislation that is well founded in reason. The public who engages a professional trustee has a right to expect a higher standard of care from that trustee than they might from Uncle Sam or Uncle Sally, who happens to be named as an executor and is a layperson in that same role. I'm glad to see that element embedded in the legislation as a principle.

The Alberta Law Reform Institute final report really drills into the minutiae of the scenarios that might come forth during a trusteeship. I'm glad that we are finally getting to a point where a layperson, in particular, and not only that but a professional trustee as well can have clarity and rely upon the legislation in such detail as we find it to seek answers without perhaps going to court. The answers are there in the detailed responsibilities that are laid out in the various scenarios that are dealt with in the 87 recommendations that were adopted. It goes a long way, I think, Mr. Speaker, to addressing the concerns that many have expressed over the decades leading up to the development of this legislation. They were in, basically, a black hole of information where the only recourse was to go to the courts because there was no clarity to the existing legislation. I'm pleased to see this legislation.

But you know what, Mr. Speaker? On other fronts within the justice field in this province there are serious deficiencies that haven't been addressed but that could have been while the justice system was being considered for legislative change by the government. For example, we've recently had the Alberta Crown Attorneys' Association accuse the UCP government of, quote, chronic underfunding, which, they allege, has caused a crisis in the justice system. It seems that it's probably reached a point beyond which we may have ever seen in this province, where the system is so badly in need of greater funding that the Crown prosecutors' association has even threatened to strike. That's a pretty serious measure that they are threatening to take. There are some developments on this front now, but it highlights just how difficult the situation has become and how threatened the system of justice in this province is due to the lack of funding that they faced for a number of years and gotten to the point at which the Crown prosecutors have threatened to strike to highlight the need for proper funding of the justice system in this province.

It comes at a time, Mr. Speaker, when according to the association over 3,000 cases are beyond the 18-month timeline established by the Jordan decision, the 18-month timeline since charges were laid. The government has not addressed this chronic underfunding situation. It chose to, you know, deal with the Trustee Act, which is good, but there are other elements in the justice system that one would have hoped would have gotten the light of day and the attention of government, particularly one that is so extremely dire that the Crown Attorneys' Association, of all organizations, has threatened to strike to highlight the crisis in the justice system that's been caused by underfunding.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Another element of our justice system, Mr. Speaker, that all Albertans are seized with is the notion and the proposal or the desire of the current government to establish an Alberta provincial police force, something that is most unpopular with Albertans, and they have expressed this widely. The government seems to be ignoring that. Even though it would cost approximately $170 million to transition if the RCMP were replaced with an Alberta provincial police force, that consideration, that economic consideration, seems to be of no consequence to the government, who blindly seem to want to simply replace the RCMP as a pet project of theirs. Now, additionally, that transition cost would be between $366 million to $371 million according to a study commissioned by the government.

Now, that indication by the government to want to replace the RCMP with a provincial police force is something that they've refused to respond to when the public has so vociferously indicated that this isn't a direction they want to go in. That's, I think, a failure on the government's part, when it's dealing with justice issues in the province, to properly respond to. The notion should have been dropped a long time ago. Why the government keeps alive the idea that they plan to potentially replace the RCMP with a provincial police force only speaks to their desire to serve a small percentage of the electorate, a base portion, which they require. If they feel that they wish to call an election and hope and try to win it, they have elements like this, like the proposal to replace the RCMP with an Alberta provincial police force, to act as a lure to that element of their electoral base that would support it.

But, by and large, Mr. Speaker, it's not a popular notion in the province, and most Albertans, I would say a large majority, would wish the government to simply drop it. If there are investments to be made in policing, as there are in the justice system in general, as the Crown prosecutors so rightfully claim, that money should be invested in the current RCMP police force that we have in Alberta rather than in the notion that the UCP government has to replace them with a provincial police force, which will cost a whole lot of money that otherwise should be invested to solve issues with the current difficulties that the RCMP may be facing in enforcing the law in the province.

Bill 12, the Trustee Act, is a piece of legislation within the justice realm that we welcome and we largely support. I think it will offer benefits to the world of estates especially, and the legal community, the legal profession will probably be sighing some relief knowing that individuals who are laypeople and acting on behalf of a family member or a friend in an executor role or in other trust situations will have better guidelines or a manual of guidance to refer to while they're exercising their roles as trustees, therefore keeping them out of the court system. I know that the professional trustees also will be comforted to have the detailed guidance as well of the many recommendations that were adopted from the Alberta Law Reform Institute that are forming part of the new Trustee Act, because it also will clarify amongst professionals what the practices should be.

On those two fronts I think the legislation will be welcomed. I think it is a model, perhaps, for legislation of this import, when we're not just amending an act, Mr. Speaker, when we're actually replacing an act which encompasses such importance as the trusteeships and how they operate in the province, to really have a very well-seasoned consultation. That, I think, is what we've seen here, where there have been over seven years of discussion and heavy involvement by members of the legal community, many of whom have been anxious to see these changes and have been unending in their volunteerism, in many cases, to be willing to sit on committees and talk and discuss amongst themselves and with the Alberta Law Reform Institute and respond to questions and discussion papers to develop these 87 recommendations.

Many thanks are owed to the legal community and many individuals who are noted in the Alberta Law Reform Institute's final report, because these things don't happen by themselves. They take hours and hours and hours of work and dedicated study on the part of professionals who spent the time to put it together. I think the quality of that time and that work is reflected in the recommendations that were ultimately made in the Alberta Law Reform Institute's final report. Knowing that, you know, the initial report was put forward for public discussion in 2015 and that that process has been ongoing since then shows us the depth of knowledge and the importance that the legal community attaches to the new Trustee Act.

If this standard was applied to other pieces of legislation, particularly to replacing an existing act rather than simply amending it, I think that we'd end up with better legislation in the final analysis. That's one of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why I'm willing to support the Trustee Act. I think that it gives one a level of comfort knowing that the amount of deliberation and debate that went into it was very exhaustive and that the results are before us now in 87 recommendations out of 90 that were accepted. That doesn't happen because the recommendations were made lightly or simply drawn up in a hurry. That happens because they were well considered, well debated, had lots and lots of consultation and back and forth amongst members of the legal community and those who were affected by the measures of the Trustee Act.

As a result, we have a piece of legislation that the opposition is willing to support and that the government, I think, has rightfully brought forward incorporating the Alberta Law Reform Institute recommendations, that have been in discussion for so long and have been brought forward so carefully. I have no qualms about supporting the Trustee Act.

However, there are, as I say, numerous issues within the justice system that, hopefully, the government will turn their attention to that are equally compelling if not more extremely concerning than the Trustee Act, that is now before us. Those, namely, are the crisis in underfunding in the justice system as well as the government proposal to replace the RCMP with an Alberta police force, which the people in this province don't support. The small percentage that do is simply a group that's being pandered to by the UCP government, and we wish they would stop it.

Thanks.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Bill 12, the Trustee Act, at third reading. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to my colleagues who have spoken previously here today, the Member for Edmonton-McClung, as well as at previous stages of the bill. I also want to recognize the government whip, I believe it is, who introduced third reading.

My sincere hope was that some of the questions that had been asked in committee and in second would have been addressed in the response here at the beginning of third. Unfortunately, I think many of those are still outstanding, and I'm sure my colleagues will have more to say to remind the government of the specific questions that were asked at prior stages of the bill that we were hoping to get some clarity on.

As you've probably heard us say at prior stages, we are inclined to support this bill. It would be a lot easier if we could get some answers to the questions that we've actually asked. I think that any time a government bill comes forward that isn't going to make things worse and might actually make things better, it would be nice to have some collaboration on both sides so that we can feel enthusiastic about supporting the bill. I'm going to be frank that the reason why we have trepidation is because of this government's record on many issues.

This, of course, is a justice bill. I will recap just a couple of the justice issues that we've faced in the three – I was going to say “in the three short years”; for some people, they feel like three long years – years that the current government has had the honour of serving the people of Alberta as the actual government.

So let's go through a bit of a recollection of some of the chaos that has ensued in response to the leadership of the current UCP government. For example, one of the things that the Premier has sort of postured about quite significantly is his desire to create an Alberta provincial police force. This is something that has been incredibly unpopular with Albertans and municipalities alike. I think that there is a very clear lack of trust between this Premier and this cabinet and the UCP and the people of Alberta when it comes to following the law and their relationship with law enforcement.

For example, knowing that many members of the government caucus have been part of an investigation as it relates to the Premier's leadership legitimacy to date – and probably questions will continue to rise in the days and weeks ahead. When the government is under investigation by the Election Commissioner and, rather than comply with the type of questioning that's happening and be forthright in trying to rebuild that relationship and have trust and transparency, instead the government fires the Election Commissioner, it creates a high degree of distrust and then, of course, posturing when we know that there's an RCMP investigation into removing Alberta's relationship with the RCMP and instead having an Alberta provincial police force. This creates great uncertainty, and it creates a greater lack of trust.

As it relates to the Trustee Act, Bill 12 is being sponsored by the Member for Calgary-Acadia, who is the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General. Having this as some of the known history as we navigate a new justice bill and when we ask questions that we think are fair and reasonable about, for example, the Auditor General's recommendations and how this bill will implement those and we don't get any answers from government members even as we're here in third reading, it is no wonder why Albertans find it difficult to trust this government.

I also want to touch base on another change that was made in justice, and that was around the removal of having access to adjudicate a traffic ticket without having to pay a significant fee. At the same time the government brought in a fee up to $150 to appeal a traffic ticket. We know that the then Minister of Justice was pulled over for a traffic violation – I believe that it was distracted driving – and rather than pay the fee or go through his own process, that he was in the process of creating, where people would have to pay up to $150 to be able to appeal their traffic violation, the minister, the Member for Edmonton-South West, decided to pick up the phone and personally call the chief of police.

Speaker's Ruling Relevance

The Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt. However, I have provided the widest latitude possible with members of the opposition discussing the activities of members of the government. However, I have a real tough time connecting many of the comments of the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora to how they are relevant to the Trustee Act other than that they are two justice-related pieces of discussion. I'm not convinced that that is relevant to the debate here today. I just provide some caution with respect to relevance to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Debate Continued

Ms Hoffman: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I'll try to rearticulate the direct connections. May I have a time check, please?

The Speaker: There are nine minutes and 36 seconds remaining.

Ms Hoffman: Great. Absolutely, this is about justice. The bill, in fact, is about trust. It's about trustees: people who are entrusted to take care of, often – assets is one of the main examples that I used in a prior stage of the bill – assets bestowed upon an individual. Regularly some of the examples I've had are minors who might have a parent who has passed away and has bestowed their life's earnings, their savings, their net worth to their minor child, and that needs to be taken care of in a trust. Trusts and trustees, of course, by their nature, are in positions of power and influence, as the government is, as the Justice minister is.

As it relates to Bill 12, the Trustee Act, the question, of course, is – in the reading of the bill I don't see a lot of significant concerns, but I would like to be enthusiastic in supporting the bill rather than not finding any overt negative consequences, which is why my colleagues and I have asked a number of questions about prior decisions as they relate to trusteeship and how this bill will address those recommendations that have been made by folks like the Auditor General as it relates to the Trustee Act. I do want to say again that trust is a significant issue of concern. When it comes to the government saying, "Don't worry; just trust us on this justice bill," there are a lot of current examples as to why the UCP can't be trusted.

I do want to say that in terms of the text of the bill I think that there are some pieces in it that are important for updating. We have had trustees in the province for a significant amount of time, but being able to update legislation to reflect some of the changes that have happened over the last several decades, I think, is important. I am confident that there were a significant number of public servants who worked to make sure that things were addressed, like establishing the process for a trustee to resign or to be removed.

This is something that some of us have probably heard through casework in our offices, because you are in that relationship of trust, and the example again of a minor child having access to assets that have been entrusted to them through somebody's estate. For example, if an individual is having a difficult time getting access to the assets that they need to be able to live their lives and achieve full and proper care, things like money to be able to access optometry or dentistry or some of these things aren't yet covered under universal medicare, that people are still expected to pay out of pocket for, being able to have a relationship with a trustee to ensure that that's done in a fair and timely fashion is crucially important. Sometimes those relationships break down or sometimes trustees – for many people this is their occupation, and sometimes they will maybe move on to a different occupation or retire, so having a very clear and well-documented process about how somebody is to resign or be removed, I think, is important. I believe the bill does lay out those provisions.

Also, rules around temporary trustees. This is something that, I imagine, happens from time to time. There might be instances where somebody acquires a short-term injury that impedes their ability to make their own decisions, and making sure that there is a process for somebody to be put in that role of trust but for it not to be presumed that it last indefinitely, I think, is important because we all know that there are times where people are put in a position of trust that isn't warranted, whether it be as a trustee or whether it be in this Chamber or whether it be in other occupations in society, Mr. Speaker.

We also know that there is some clarification around enabling trustees to make majority decisions, and there will also be rules around reporting of trustees to beneficiaries, and I think that that is incredibly important. I know from a lot of folks who've practised family law how contentious it can be when things aren't clearly laid out, when expectations aren't well documented, and when agreements are assumed rather than put in writing, and that is, I think, always difficult when people are in difficult financial situations and when grief is involved. It certainly complicates a lot of those relationships, and those are some of the most difficult stories, I think, that I've heard around when somebody passes, the estate becoming a significant bone of contention between family members.

So making sure that there is a greater degree of transparency around the rules of reporting of trustees to beneficiaries, establishing trustees to make majority decisions, rules around temporary trustees as well as the establishment process of a trustee to resign or to be removed, I think, are probably steps in the right direction. I know that the Auditor General wanted us to take additional steps to improve the work and the role of trustees in the province of Alberta, so it would be helpful if the government were to be more forthright on those types of discussions and what role they played in this bill.

I also believe that at the introduction of third the Member for Leduc-Beaumont mentioned that there were some pieces, I think three recommendations, that were referred to as insignificant or housekeeping that didn't actually make it into this iteration of the bill, so my question would be: if they're insignificant or if they're just housekeeping, why wouldn't they be in this bill? Why wouldn't we ensure that all of the recommendations were addressed? Certainly, it is a significant process to open legislation up again and to update it. When we do have an opportunity before this House – this is one of the reasons why I think that the three stages that we go through are so important, because it gives us a chance to go through proposed legislation in a thoughtful way. Laws aren't intended to be changed on a whim. Rules should not be changed on a whim. We are in this place to bring forward thoughtful recommendations, thoughtful debate, and to do our best work.

I know that there are some rules that have been changed in this place many, many times. I think the standing orders – I've lost track of how many times. I think it's more than 10. It might even be 11 times now that the standing orders have changed just in the three years of this current government being in this place. Again, those are the rules that we agree to function based on. But it shouldn't be standard practice that regularly we come to this place and we change the rules. And it stands for other laws, too. When we bring in legislation, we should have a high degree of confidence that it is our best work, that all of us, all 87 of us, have put our best thoughts, our best work, and taken the advice of others, like the Auditor General, into consideration when we are amending legislation.

It would have been nice to have had more fulsome responses to the questions that my colleagues have asked. I imagine some of them will reiterate the concerns that they expressed previously since we haven't yet had a response. Hopefully, a later speaker on the government side will actually address some of those outstanding questions of concern.

To reiterate, there are three essential characteristics to create a trust: certainty of intention, certainty of subject matter, and certainty of objects. It would be great if we saw that certainty, if rather than just say, you know, that there were some small housekeeping things that didn't make their way into the bill, we actually saw some clarity around what those recommendations were and why they didn't make it into the bill. If they are simply housekeeping, it would make sense that they actually be incorporated in this draft so we can put forward our best recommendations and put forward a law that we can all be proud of and stand by, which is, of course, our job.

The Alberta Law Reform Institute report of 2017 is something that we should be using as the foundation to make sure that this bill that we are considering has the proper oversight, forethought, and rigour to make sure that it's something that can stand the test of time. We shouldn't be changing rule books. We shouldn't be changing laws 11 times, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This is the second time I've had the opportunity to speak to this act. I'd like to speak a little bit about the conversation so far. When I rose to speak about this act the last time, I indicated that generally I was in support, but I had a few questions, questions which didn't get answered. The interesting thing about this is the why of it. Like, why? Why be belligerent about answering opposition questions just for the sake of it? It makes literally no sense.

The questions were whether there were any other recommendations that didn't make it in besides the definition. The answer was that there were three, and they were housekeeping. There was a question specifically around the definition. That's apparently one of the housekeeping things. Why not just provide a response? Like, it's not that difficult. No one is asking the minister to do this work himself. Just by way of process when a bill is up for debate, whatever ministry holds that particular bill, there's an entire comms department in the ministry. Somebody reads Hansard, they take out the questions, they draft answers, they send it to the minister's office, and the minister can choose to do with that what they want.

When I was the minister, what I often did was go back and say: "You know, I don't think this answer is fulsome enough. I'm not sure you, like, fully – this isn't satisfactory to me. Could you provide a little bit more information? Maybe we can make a change to the bill." There was an ongoing conversation about being respectful of my colleagues on both sides of the House. I actually believe that the work that gets done in this place is relevant and important. I believe that whether or not people are watching at every moment, this is their House. The people out there send us here to be their representatives. The purpose of representative democracy is that not everyone can be in this place, not everyone can read the legislation, not everyone can have a fulsome debate about it, so they elect people from among them to come here and to do that work on their behalf.

It is important work. Whatever the government may think of the House or this place or the people of this province or the conversations around democracy, it's important. [interjection] Oh. Yes. Thank you.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much to my colleague for accepting the intervention. I just was wondering if – we were office neighbours, and I definitely know that she had exceptional staff, many with law backgrounds themselves. If she could talk a little bit about the process and the relationship between the minister, political staff, and the public service in getting fair responses. It's not just the minister. It's not just a handful of political staff. But there is a public service that is certainly willing to get information when asked. So I was hoping that the former minister could maybe talk a little bit about the process and making sure that people's questions were answered, questions that had been asked maybe from members of other parties but certainly deserved an opportunity to be heard and addressed in this place and on record for all Albertans to be able to access. There are times when legislation isn't clear, and the debate that is brought forward in this place helps provide that further clarity to those who are interpreting the law as well.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much for the question. I do think it's important to understand what these folks are doing. They are servants of the people of Alberta. Everyone who comes to this place, whether a private member, whether a minister, whether a public servant, whether political staff, is meant to be a servant of the people. We are ultimately here to engage in democracy, to engage in that political debate. So when acts would come forward, members of the then opposition, when we were in government, would bring forward questions that maybe were new. I mean, it's entirely possible. That's the purpose of the conversation, that sometimes ideas or thoughts or interactions that are novel come up.

You know, the Hansard goes through to the department staff, and the department staff come back and provide responses. Then there's sort of an ongoing conversation between different levels on how to move those responses forward or whether we think they're sufficiently responsive. My political staff and myself would ensure that the responses were, in our view, sufficient.

I mean, it isn't just the opposition that does this. I've seen a number of statements. There are fewer reporters than there used to be, and often you'll just see the statement that was sent out by the minister kind of, like, full text in an article. Statements are often what I would call nonresponsive. They're like an attempt to hide information. Now, I had a press secretary when I was a minister, and her job, most of what she spent her time doing was reviewing those responses to make them more responsive, to put them in language that media and the public understood to ensure that we were being as transparent as possible on the issues because it is incredibly important to do that.

Now we have press secretaries who spend their time spamming the Internet with misinformation. I mean, it really is embarrassing, and it ought to be.

Ms Gray: Thank you for allowing an intervention. I am sensing a great deal of frustration. The question I have is that we heard the opening speech at third reading delivered by the government whip, which began with: we would like to address the questions that have been asked during debate. I and other members of the opposition were listening carefully to what answers were provided. I just wanted to ask: is your frustration because the answers provided were to a couple of questions while so many other questions were not included? Were they complicated questions? Were they detailed questions?

You were listening to the opening speech at third reading, and the responses to the questions you had asked: I think you found that they were not there. That has kind of brought us to this point, where you're talking about the process. But have you put on record all of the questions they did not answer?

Ms Ganley: Good question. An excellent point. I'll thank the member for that question because indeed I have not. The questions that were asked were: the one about whether any other recommendations didn't go through. We've heard that there were three recommendations that didn't go through. They were all referred to as housekeeping. One was specifically about the definition. I don't think it was particularly housekeeping, so I don't actually think that that was a responsive answer, I would say. Another was about a report from the Auditor General. The report from the Auditor General: these recommendations were made before I had the file, they were made before the UCP had the file, and they've been reiterated a number of times.

One of those recommendations is about policy controls and how to ensure that there is appropriate policy control and control over – improve and follow policy and procedure. Specifically, what they say in the report is “review and assess whether its policies are appropriate, and procedures are adequate to mitigate the risk that client assets could be mismanaged” – pretty big risk, I'd say – and “improve its processes for ensuring compliance with policies and procedures.” This is something that has been repeated a couple of times by the Auditor General, and what I asked was simply – and you could actually refer to this question as a puffball.

For those who aren't familiar with the term, it's a term used in question period to refer to a question where a government member stands up and essentially asks the equivalent of, like: could the minister tell us why he or she is so awesome? This could be perceived as such a question because it's entirely possible that this act itself is responsive to the recommendation of the Auditor General to improve policies and procedures, because generally policies – so it's legislation, regulations, policies. Those are the three levels. Sometimes the policies are insufficient because the legislation doesn't allow them to be sufficient.

So it's entirely possible that what I asked was for the minister to stand up and tell me why he's so awesome and doing such a great job, yet the government chose to be nonresponsive to that, which is just – it's such a weird choice. Like, why? [interjection] Oh, yes. Sorry. Another intervention.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you to the hon. member. I just wanted to join in a little bit on this because I'd like to hear a little bit more about the specific questions you asked and why they weren't raised. I also wanted to mention that I actually had the opportunity to work, you know, to be on the other side of things. You mentioned about how, like, these are questions that fulfill debate and you can have their answers. We've already indicated that we generally support this bill. They're just to fulsomely explain what the contents of the bill were.

I've sat on the other side of being a public servant and had ministers under the Progressive Conservatives who would come to me and say: “The opposition has asked this question. I'd like to be able to answer it, whether publicly in the House or to provide an answer to them.” These are not gotcha questions, right? They're genuine questions to fully understand. So, you know, what do you think, given your experience as a minister, would have been a reasonable way in order to address some of these questions? And please go on with any other questions that you had asked that had not been addressed by the ministries.

Ms Ganley: Thank you to the member for that, because she's absolutely right. There is an entire department that works incredibly hard to get answers to these questions for people. This current UCP government has been just nonresponsive – nonresponsive – and the thing is, you know, the members opposite feel like I'm being partisan about this, but the truth is that there are members over there who were private members in the opposition when we were in government, and many of them can probably tell you that I was fairly responsive as a minister. I tried to do my best job because I thought it was in the public interest. The fact that the current UCP ministers are nonresponsive isn't just disrespectful to me as an opposition private member; it's disrespectful to every private member in this place because they aren't in the cabinet discussion either. They don't get those answers either. But they may well be hearing these questions from their constituents as well. So I think that's incredibly problematic.

Just to make sure I get it on the record, because, as it turns out, I've been more long-winded than intended, as always. Just to get it on the record, the fourth question that I asked was about a computer system. It's a pretty straightforward question. Did you get the computer system in or not? It's not difficult to answer the question: they did or they didn't. I can probably go back and check the multiple years of . . .

Ms Rosin: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted.

Point of Order Relevance

Ms Rosin: Mr. Speaker, we've been sitting here for – I don't know – so long I feel as though I've lost track of time. Sorry. This is under 23(b), speaking “to matters other than . . . the question under discussion.” I fail to understand how question period or puffball questions or ministers' responses to e-mails or the willingness to engage the opposition has . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. If the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud wants to join in the point of order, I'm sure that she'll have plenty of opportunity to do so.

Ms Rosin: Again, Mr. Speaker, we are on the debate of Bill 12, the Trustee Act, and I just fail to understand how the opposition's, perhaps, disgruntlement with the engagement from government members has any relation to the matters at hand.

The Speaker: Well, I couldn't disagree more. It's very clear that the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has been referring to questions that she asked during debate about this very bill. It's very clear that this is relevant to the discussion, and she can continue should she choose to do so.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yeah. So the point was that I asked a question about the computer system at the public guardian and trustee's office and whether or not that had been implemented because it was, in my recollection, relevant to the policy controls that the Auditor General had asked about, which may in fact be related again to this new Trustee Act. I'm a little surprised that this has generated so much emotion, but there it is.

The point is that – I mean, it has or it hasn't. The RFP went out; the computer system was built. I'm not sure. I suppose I could go back and check the estimates, but the point is that normally a minister in this place would feel the need to be responsive to that question, would get the response from the department and put it into the speech, whether the speech was delivered by someone else or not. It just seems a little bit peculiar to me that they would avoid answering such a simple question just because they could avoid answering it. It just seems nontransparent and inconsistent with the duty of members and ministers in this place. I do find that a bit frustrating.

It's worth talking a little about the definition. The definition in question, that was suggested to be put in, was a definition of represented adult. I've actually now gone back to the ALRI report and to the bill. ALRI had originally and the Uniform Law Conference had originally been recommending a definition of incapacitated person to include different definitions in different acts just so everything works together. There was some public consultation. I'm on page 38 of the report here, and it says:

ALRI received feedback on the proposed definition for "represented adult". Specifically the feedback indicated that replacing the Uniform Act term "incapacitated person" with the term "represented adult" could create difficulty in practice.

Using the term "represented adult", as that term is used in the Adult Guardianship and Trusteeship Act or the Public Trustee Act, will require that a court order be obtained for the appointment of a trustee or guardian for an incapacitated person. However, other adults who have lost capacity may be represented by an instrument other than a court order. The definition of "incapacitated person" should also capture people who have lost capacity and are represented under enduring powers of attorney or personal directives.

I mean, that sounds kind of long and boring, but it's actually fairly important, so I wouldn't call it housekeeping. I would not classify it as that. Now, as it turns out in the act, they have stayed with the definition, and the definition is almost identical to the definition recommended here for represented person, but they have instead stayed with "incapacitated person" as a term.

I guess, Mr. Speaker, the point of that rather long-winded discussion of which term is defined and which term is used is that there was an answer to that question. It wasn't a particularly complicated answer. The ministry could have chosen to provide it, and the minister hasn't just because he could. It just seems so weird to me that in an instance where you could have an Official Opposition enthusiastically supporting a bill rather than, "Gee, I guess this seems okay," you wouldn't provide those answers. We're not here asking questions about the bills to irritate the minister. We're here asking questions about the bill because, again, we were sent here . . .

The Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt; however, the time for debate this morning has elapsed, and the House stands adjourned until 1:30 p.m.

[The Assembly adjourned at 12 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, April 27, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Members, we have some very, very special guests from our brothers and sisters in the flatlands of Saskatchewan. Members are joining us in the Speaker's gallery today. Hon. Bronwyn Eyre, Minister of Energy and Resources, is accompanied by chief of staff Carter Zazula and Deputy Minister of Energy and Resources Susanna Laaksonen-Craig. Please receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, joining us in the galleries today are two constituents of the Member for Calgary-Hays, the Minister of Municipal Affairs. Please welcome Shannon Sereda and her son Jax Sereda. Also joining us in the gallery today is Blair McCormick, executive director of Calgary Fetal Alcohol Network. He is a constituent and guest of the Member for Calgary-Bow, the Minister of Advanced Education. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River has a statement to make.

Holocaust Remembrance Day

Mr. Williams: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise and recognize Yom ha-Shoah, also known as Holocaust Remembrance Day. Yom ha-Shoah is Israel's day of commemoration for the over 6 million Jews that perished during the Holocaust at the hands of the Nazis. The Holocaust, also known as Shoah in Hebrew, is arguably the darkest chapter in human history and something that we all have the moral duty to remember, as difficult as it may be.

While Yom ha-Shoah is a time for sombre remembrance, it is also a time of recognition of the strength and the will of the Jewish people. The Holocaust took from the Jewish people much life. Under Nazi rule the Jewish resistance included everything from taking up arms against the Nazis to smuggling food to prisoners and helping prisoners escape the death camps. The primary goal of the Holocaust was to eradicate Jews from existence, but this proved to be an impossible task, thanks in part to the work of the Jewish resistance.

It is not uncommon to hear stories about hate-motivated violence being targeted at Jewish people today in Alberta and across Canada. We as legislators and leaders must show zero tolerance against anybody showing discrimination or anti-Semitism against Jews or any other groups and work together to find solutions. I am proud that our government has taken action to fight hatred against Jewish people and others by providing grants to help synagogues and other religious facilities purchase security equipment and training to prevent hate-based attacks. I am encouraged by the work of Alberta's Anti-Racism Advisory Council, which is advising the government on how best to address the issue of racism and promote tolerance and inclusion.

It is all our responsibility to ensure that the evils that occurred during Nazi Germany never happen again and that the stories of those who were imprisoned, tortured, and murdered in the Holocaust can never be forgotten. Yom ha-Shoah is not a holiday. It is a time to rededicate ourselves to the hard work of eradicating hatred, discrimination, and anti-Semitism wherever and whenever it occurs.

Hydrogen Strategy

Ms Ganley: Investors across the globe were watching to see what plans this UCP government has to grow our hydrogen sector. All they got was a reannouncement of a hydrogen centre for excellence, a $50 million investment, but no real plan to grow the sector. The Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity could not say how many jobs will be created or point to any emissions targets they were working towards. The centre doesn't even have a physical centre to work out of. The hydrogen sector is growing fast, attracting millions in investment while this government continues to drag its feet.

Over 17 months ago we released a comprehensive hydrogen strategy that would have set Alberta up for success. Our proposal would get Albertans to work immediately with well-paying, secure jobs in numerous pilot projects and spur construction of hydrogen infrastructure. The current government's plan doesn't have a plan to export Alberta-made hydrogen any time soon. Its target for export is 2040, which is simply too late. Getting our hydrogen to foreign markets early is crucial to securing market share and establishing ourselves as an energy powerhouse beyond oil and gas. Our strategy would begin to export hydrogen well before then. We would do this by working with industry, Indigenous communities, and federal partners to construct needed infrastructure for export.

Creating an ambitious plan to grow the hydrogen sector is not easy. We know because we did it. I want to encourage all Albertans to head to albertasfuture.ca and let us know what they think of our action plan that will help to grow the hydrogen sector. I'd encourage the government members to read it as well. They might actually learn something that could help them to create good jobs for Albertans and attract billions in new investment.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright has a statement to make.

2022 Chevrolet Good Deeds Cup Champions

Mr. Rowswell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to stand here today to recognize a city in my constituency, Lloydminster, and the 2022 Chevrolet good deeds champions, the U13 female Lloydminster Blazers. This is a great deal for my constituency as it is the first time a female hockey team has won as well as the first time a city in the prairies has won the Good Deeds Cup. This wonderful event has gone on for the past six years, and in that time they have challenged over 10,000 hockey players across Canada to go out and do good deeds in their communities. These hockey teams have made a huge impact, with over 1,000 good deeds completed and $550,000 donated to charities across Canada.

This season Chevrolet shifted the focus of this event to make hockey and arenas more inclusive to people from all backgrounds and abilities. The Lloydminster Blazers' focus was ensuring that their arena was built to be accessible to everyone in the community. Part of the reason they won was contributed to the event they ran, the tri-para event, to raise awareness on the importance of building an accessible and inclusive arena.

In addition to them winning the championship, Chevrolet donated $100,000 to the Blazers to be put towards Inclusion Lloydminster, which is a nonprofit organization. A member of Lloydminster, Ross Ulmer, owner of Ulmer Chevrolet, has graciously matched this donation, giving the U13 Blazers a total of $200,000 towards Inclusion Lloydminster and the new arena. This donation will be directed towards making the soon-to-be-built 2,500-seat arena in Lloydminster more accessible and inclusive.

I'm proud to stand here today to congratulate my community and the U13 Blazers on not only this incredible championship but the initiative they are taking to improve accessibility and inclusion in Lloydminster.

Seniors' Supports

Ms Sigurdson: In my role as MLA and critic for seniors and in my own life I'm fortunate to be able to spend time with seniors in this province. They're a font of wisdom, a depth of understanding, and a source of many laughs and joy-filled moments. Seniors built this province and deserve to age in dignity.

Sadly, folks across the aisle don't seem to share the deep respect I have for elders, and I worry that under the UCP they are being left behind. The cost of living is going up, inflation is increasing, yet this government is neglecting seniors' concerns. The cost of utilities: up. Groceries: up. Insurance: up. The seniors' benefit: well, though it's more important than ever before, seniors' benefits are not up. This is shameful. These are not the only places that seniors have felt the pain of choices made by the UCP. We have seen cuts to special needs assistance, cuts to grants, cuts to housing support. It's death by a thousand cuts, Mr. Speaker, but the UCP don't care about the impacts of their thoughtless policies. They terminated the Seniors Advocate, a role which improved lives during our NDP government. The advocate stands up for the interest of seniors and provides support to them.

Now, to add to all of this, the UCP's continuing care bill leaves consequential amendments to regulations, meaning seniors won't actually know what impacts the legislation may have on their lives. Over 1,600 residents died in continuing care during the pandemic, and the UCP does not understand the situation's urgency. Seniors just can't trust the UCP. They make big promises, but at the end of the day a promise is worth nothing if you don't deliver.

The NDP will deliver, Mr. Speaker. We will stand with seniors. We will ensure benefits are indexed. We will put forward meaningful changes. We will reinstate the office of the Seniors Advocate. We will put actions behind our words. You can trust us to follow through.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Electric Power Prices

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again our government must clean up another mess left to us by the NDP, left for Albertans. The NDP failed to address long-term issues within our system, and now everyday Albertans are paying for their mistakes. The NDP's disastrous mismanagement of the electricity system lost approximately $1.3 billion in ratepayer money, which now must be paid back by Alberta ratepayers until 2030. What a shame that our children must pay the price for such terrible policies enacted by the NDP. Thank goodness Albertans fired them in the last election. On this side of the House we stand with Albertans.

Now, with the support of the NDP, the federal Liberals are doubling down on their Alberta-punishing carbon tax, which will only drive up the price of living and drive down the quality of life for all Albertans. The Alberta NDP thought that they had a long-term solution for energy prices, but their short-term, narrow-sighted, Band-Aid fix to energy through the means of a rate cap has now created a $108 million bill that Albertans still have to pay.

On this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, we do not believe in borrowing from future generations to pay this month's electricity bill. That is why this government has created a long-term, stable plan to level the price of electricity so all Albertans can keep their lights on. We will be supporting a competitive market that provides consumers with choice and strengthens the electricity system. Other plans to assist Albertans will include fixed-price contracts to equalize payment plans and floating regulated rates.

Our plans are already working. We have seen more than $5 billion in investment announced for generation projects since 2019, including more than $2 billion for renewable energy projects. The proof is in the pudding. This government has created long-term plans to keep energy costs down while still investing in green energy projects.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Government House Leader

Ms Hoffman: For those of us lucky enough to be elected by Albertans, to be able to come to this place and advocate for the people we represent and for the issues facing this province is one of the top privileges of our lives. Our caucus is full of people who came to this place with a respect for democracy and for the Legislature, that has served Albertans for over 115 years. I wish I could say the same was true for everyone across the aisle. Promising to work hard and stay humble, we have seen a government motivated solely by self-interest.

There is no clearer example of this than the person the Premier chooses to be his voice in this House. The Government House Leader was forced to apologize after his vulgar remarks and for saying that he would change the rules of this place because he was annoyed, the Government House Leader who won't answer simple questions about UCP policy without baseless smears, trying to silence those who disagree with him. He refused to apologize to this Assembly for taking part in a boozy, white tablecloth dinner on the sky palace patio in violation of the rules that he demanded others follow during the pandemic. He fired a single mother who came to him reporting sexual harassment, and when caught trespassing by a landowner, he threatened to shoot her.

Albertans deserve better from the leadership of this government, from a Premier that they can trust, and from his right-hand man, who they clearly can't respect. The Premier promised that he and his team would work hard and that they would stay humble. Albertans see through this, Mr. Speaker, and they want a government who will work with them, not bully and threaten those who disagree with them. We need a better Government House Leader in this Legislature.

Better yet, we need a better government. Alberta's NDP is here, and we are ready to serve Albertans by making their lives more affordable, creating good-paying, stable jobs, strengthening public health care and education, and restoring Albertans' trust in their government.

Thank you.

Addiction Treatment and Recovery

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, Trudeau disagrees with how Alberta is dealing with the opioid epidemic, and our major cities are asking for hard drugs to be decriminalized. Fortunately, Alberta is doing her due diligence with our Select Special Committee to Examine Safe Supply, and we've heard expert opinions from folks that understand the science, folks like the director-general of the Portuguese Ministry of Health responsible for addictive behaviours and dependencies, the face of Portugal's drug policy reform unit.

We've heard from the director of a local detox centre with pre- and posttreatment programming up in Fort McMurray. We heard from clinical psychologists, comprehensive family physicians, psychiatrists specializing in addiction, and professors from schools like Yale, Harvard, and Stanford, people who are subject matter experts in things like addictions, mental illness, homelessness, and substance abuse, people with qualifications in fields like medicine, forensic psychiatry, addiction neurobiology, addiction recovery, and rehabilitation. We heard from a comprehensive family physician focusing on complications from injection drug use and a professor teaching Indigenous cultural safety. We had the only bipartisan drug policy adviser to three U.S. presidents and a policy adviser to other nations like Australia, South Korea, and the United Kingdom.

Invitations were sent out to folks that participate in safe supply programs in provinces like B.C., but unfortunately none were willing to participate. I'm guessing it's because they had no evidence to support their claims.

Fortunately, this government is guiding the mental health and addictions system to be recovery oriented based on studies and science. We've created 8,000 new treatment recovery spaces and eliminated all the user fees. We're developing five new therapeutic communities, created licensing and accreditation standards for other facilities. We're developing drug treatment courts, and we've increased funding for law enforcement and are allowing police to provide on-demand treatment.

We know that consumption sites and decriminalizing drugs do not make communities safer. Setting up an environment to allow individuals to recover from drug addiction does. Behind every addiction is a human being worthy of a healthy life filled with dignity and purpose.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Alberta at Work Initiative

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Over the past two years our government has been working hard, putting in place policies to bring us through difficult times and put our province onto the path of economic recovery. I am pleased to say that Alberta's economic recovery is now in full swing. Because of our government's leadership, jobs lost during the pandemic have returned, but there's still much more to do.

A recent chamber of commerce survey confirmed that half of Alberta businesses are still facing staff shortages. These businesses have indicated that they aren't getting enough applications or the applicants lack the skill set necessary for the position. Skills matter, Mr. Speaker. A skilled workforce is at the very heart of competitiveness and prosperity, and outstanding careers are built on skills. Our government recognizes the importance of access to employment supports so that Albertans can develop the necessary skills to fulfill these roles.

To address this need, our government recently announced $600 million over three years for the Alberta at work program to address labour market needs. The money will be invested in a series of programs to support training and to remove employment barriers due to race, ethnicity, age, gender, and abilities. Under this program $87 million will go to support STEM and trades training, $295 million will go to create training options in high-demand fields, $100 million will go to training for work and the Canada-Alberta job grant to support the unemployed and employers, and $23 million will go to help low-income students join high-demand programs. This builds on the work that we've already done to enhance and support skilled trades apprenticeship training to ensure that thousands of young Albertans have access to postsecondary education and hands-on training needed to help meet our future labour market needs.

These announcements will ensure that Alberta's workforce is better positioned to meet current and future economic needs. Because of our government's leadership, Alberta's economy is back, and the future looks so bright.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Camrose.

New Schools in Camrose and Premier's Visit

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. During constituency week the Premier visited Camrose for a tour of the newly opened Chester Ronning school and the sod-turning for the new school planned for the Elk Island school board. The last time the Premier was with us, we participated in the sod-turning event for the Chester Ronning school. I was delighted to share in the beginning moments of the school and the finished results with him. It was very fitting and well timed that the Premier's visit coincided with this important time for the students and staff.

The one item that everyone commented about was the windows. The previous school was built in a round shape in brick and originally had no windows at all. The environment was not conducive to student learning, and windows were added. The biggest request for the new school – you guessed it – was windows. And there are many windows, big windows, that allow a sky view, and coloured glass to enhance the design. The school turned out absolutely beautifully.

Additionally, there were several RAP students who participated in the construction of the building. My hope is that we'll be able to share it with their children, who will hopefully attend the school that their parents helped build. I am so pleased at how well it has turned out and how beautiful it is and was glad to bring the Premier through to speak with the Battle River school trustees, staff, and students.

After our visits to the new school site for Elk Island Catholic school and the tour of Chester Ronning school, we ended the day off with a visit to Hart House Wine & Tapa. This gastropub is locally owned and operated, with great food, and is an area favourite. I can't wait to show the Premier around to more locally owned businesses in the Camrose constituency in the future. I also welcome all my colleagues to come and check out the great locations that the Camrose constituency has to offer. Come and visit.

The Speaker: Hon. members, prior to moving to Oral Question Period, I would like to make a brief statement. The statement is not with respect to the fact that the Deputy Government House Leader had a conversation with me here at the dais. Those two events are separate.

I would like to remind members that while members' statements have the widest latitude of freedom of speech here inside the Assembly, I do want members to think carefully about the words that they use in those statements and how they may impact other members of the Assembly and in particular when making what may be considered to be accusations about what members of the Assembly do, have done, or may do.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Physician Recruitment and Retention

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, all Albertans deserve access to a doctor in their communities. Sadly, this Premier ripped up the doctors' contract and then led a prolonged fight with physicians throughout a global pandemic. Today a new report shows that the number of doctors and PCNs across the province who are accepting new patients has dropped by half under just two years of this government's leadership. Why doesn't the Premier rise and apologize to the tens of thousands of Albertans who can't see a family doctor right now because of this UCP government's incompetence?

Mr. Kenney: Well, in fact, Mr. Speaker, there are significantly more doctors working for Albertans today than under the NDP. In fact, there's been an increase of 99 physicians billing in Alberta over the first quarter of this year over last year. There are an additional 1,800 nurses more than under the NDP and, in addition, an increase by 230 in the number of paramedics working at Alberta Health Services versus this time last year. This is a reflection of our historic investments in health care, a $2 billion baseline increase in the budget for Alberta Health.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, the Premier continues to cherry-pick the stats and then tell us that there is nothing to see here, but yesterday, or two days ago, Albertans did have something to see. They saw a lineup of 14 ambulances outside the Red Deer hospital. Sources tell us that this is because they've lost nurses, hospitalists, radiologists, anaesthetists, urologists, general surgeons, and good old-fashioned ER docs. The lingering hostility from this Premier's refusal to negotiate a respectful contract is creating parking lot emergency medicine. When can Albertans expect this Premier to step up, sign a proper contract, and stop the bleeding?

Mr. Kenney: Well, in fact, we did negotiate a respectful contract with tens of thousands of Alberta nurses. After they went through four years of no increases under the NDP, this government has provided significant and meaningful increases in compensation in an agreement that was endorsed by 86 per cent of Alberta nurses. It's true that there's been a significant increase in the number of emergency visits in Red Deer, partly because of the rise in COVID-19 cases requiring hospitalization plus staff absences due to illness. It's not the first time. Certainly, under the NDP we saw a stress on emergency wards at various times . . .

The Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition.

Ms Notley: With all that so-called pressure, this Premier's Health budget plans to cut $800 million compared to what they spent last year. It's like talking to a brick wall, only thicker. Meanwhile new stats show more doctors are leaving, ambulances lined up outside the ERs, AHS telling women they can't deliver babies – north, south, east, west – in Alberta, and whole cities without access to a family doctor, Mr. Speaker. Instead of taking any responsibility, the Premier puts on a blindfold to go along with the earplugs. What will it take for this Premier to open his eyes and do something to fix the mess he's made?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the NDP leader just uttered an absolute bald-faced falsehood when she claimed that we cut the Health budget by $800 million. In 2020 the budget was $21.378 billion, and in the budget just adopted for the fiscal year ahead, it's $22 billion. There was a $900 million increase in the baseline budget last year, a $600 million increase in the baseline budget this year in addition to nearly $3 billion of COVID contingency funding for the health care system to the highest levels in Alberta history, the second most expensive . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition for her second set of questions.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, he's reading the budget wrong, but different conversation, different time.

Personal Income Tax Deindexation

Ms Notley: Alberta families are under immense pressure from the rising cost of living. Inflation is at a 30-year high, and Albertans are paying more for food, clothing, and everything else. As columnist Rob Breakenridge correctly pointed out yesterday, the Premier's tax on inflation will now take a billion dollars out of the pockets of families at a time when they can least afford it. This regressive tax grab has to end. To the Premier. We've asked this before. Why won't he act today to reverse his unfair and ever-growing tax on Alberta families?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, there's no wrong way of citing the budget numbers. They're just simply numbers. I know the NDP is not good with numbers, which is why they ran up record deficits while raising taxes and wrecking our economy. The Health budget was $20.285 billion. That's the baseline budget in the budget that she voted against. She voted against the $600 million increase, $22.018 billion. That's a $600 million . . .

The Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition.

Ms Notley: You know, when it comes to helping Albertans, it's all about delay with these guys. On Monday they voted against a deadline for delivering their rebates to Albertans, and meanwhile the Finance minister is musing about maybe getting rid of this mean-spirited tax some time next year. That is too late. A recent survey shows that Albertans are the most financially stressed in Canada. Over half are worried about managing their debt. Albertans shouldn't have to wait for an election year for the Premier to undo his broken promise. Why won't they reverse his unfair tax now?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, this is a tax-cutting government. This is the government that eliminated the largest tax increase in Alberta history, the NDP's carbon tax grab, that is costing Albertans, the average family, $600 a year. But the NDP is not satisfied with that. They want to collaborate with their ally Justin Trudeau to increase that by fourfold.

Speaking of Justin Trudeau, Mr. Speaker, why did the NDP sign their coalition agreement with him without demanding an increase in the Canada health transfer for provinces like Alberta?

Ms Notley: Well, the Premier knows that Albertans actually get 90 per cent of that one back, and interestingly that rebate shows up on time.

Meanwhile this Premier is hiking insurance premiums, raising tuition, jacking up school fees, raising property taxes, and abandoning Albertans while their utility bills go through the roof. Mr. Speaker, families will lose $500 per year because of this Premier's regressive tax on inflation. Now, the Premier claimed on Facebook that he's keeping an open mind, so let's test it. If we did his work for him and drafted a bill to scrap his tax, would he support it, and why not?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we said all along that partial deindexation of the code was a temporary measure to help us address the massive structural deficit left behind by the NDP, which was threatening the province's fiscal future. Thanks to the fiscal discipline of this government, discipline constantly attacked by the NDP, we have presented the first balanced budget in 14 years. We're leading the country in economic growth and in job creation. Yes, as I've said in this place before, that liberates us to give options for tax relief, broader tax relief, for Albertans, starting with the elimination of the fuel tax.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition for her third set of questions.

Ms Notley: They gave $4 billion or more to profitable corporations and took a billion dollars out of the pockets of families.

Provincial Elections

Ms Notley: Albertans have had it with this UCP government – the incompetence, the infighting, the indifference to the public – and this week they're opening the newspaper and seeing speculation of an early election. It seems, quote, unquote, Conservative strategists are lining up some options for the Premier should his leadership vote result be less than stellar. Now, Alberta has a fixed election date, one these guys put in, that has the vote on May 29, 2023. Simple question: will he respect it? Yes or no?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm glad to see that the NDP leader is eager for an election. She'll have to wait, though, because it'll be in May 2023 per our commitment to hold a legislated election date.

With respect to the corporate income tax, Mr. Speaker, the NDP raised it. They raised it by 20 per cent, and revenues went down for four years. This government brought in the job-creation tax cut, and now revenues are skyrocketing. Why? Because this economy has taken off. Albertans are getting back to work, and the recovery plan is working.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, his claim that they'll respect the May date is encouraging, but that's not the same tune the Premier sings behind closed doors. Inside UCP caucus meetings the Premier threatens to call an early election just to intimidate his own members into staying silent. His definition of being too tolerant of dissent is to wield democratic processes like a weapon for his own self-preservation at the expense of Alberta democracy. Does the Premier not realize that Alberta's democratic system should never ever be used as his own personal caucus management tool?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I've never said any such thing. That is complete rubbish. I've pointed out publicly that in our Westminster parliamentary democracy if a government loses confidence, there is an election. This government is not going to lose confidence. This government is going to continue to drive Alberta forward into a period of renewed prosperity, leading Canada in economic growth, in job creation, in diversification, in tax reduction, and, yes, we're achieving what we said we would do: creating jobs, growing the economy, getting pipelines built, and building a stronger Alberta.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, not a day goes by that Albertans don't come up to me and say that they cannot wait for the next election. While I tend to agree, the lawyer in me has a rather strong preference for following the law. However, Albertans are well aware that this Premier will do whatever he can to skew the rules in his favour. His track record on democracy is one of secrecy, scandal, and suspicion, so I ask him this: will he stand and declare that any Premier who breaks or tries a last-minute rewrite of election law is not worthy of re-election?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's pathetic to see how desperate the NDP has become, that they're spinning these conspiracy theories. This government was elected on a commitment for democratic reform, which is why we brought in the recall law, the citizen initiative referendum law, the Senate elections. It's also why we brought in a specific date for the next election, so that the Premier can't play games like she did. That has been passed into law. This government will respect that law, and I'll tell you that the most important thing is that Albertans will have a chance to choose between going back to the economic disaster of the NDP or forward into an era of prosperity.

Insurance Premium Tax Revenue

Ms Phillips: Albertans pay a tax to this government on their insurance policies. As premiums rise, so does the insurance tax revenue the government collects. Budget 2022 projects that insurance premiums and UCP insurance tax revenues are set to soar. After population and inflation are accounted for, this government's own documents show that car insurance premiums will rise by nearly $900 million over the next three years. Just how cozy is the Premier's relationship with big insurance lobbyists that he is willing to campaign on taking another $900 million out of Albertans' pockets?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The opposition's math and the poor use of data is atrocious. They're taking two different data sets, conflating the two, and drawing a conclusion that is nowhere near the truth. Here's the truth: seven automobile insurance marketing companies have offered and requested reductions in automobile insurance premiums. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Opposition has had an opportunity to ask a question. If she'd like to do so, she's welcome to but not while the minister is answering the question.

Mr. Toews: Seven insurance companies have applied to the rate board for reductions, Mr. Speaker. On average automobile insurance premiums are going down according to the rate board. That's the fact.

Ms Phillips: Spin. All we hear is spin, but Albertans never hear the UCP talk about protecting consumers. Not once. Never. Page 205 of the UCP budget shows that since they were elected and over the next three years, they will take hundreds of millions more out of people's pockets in insurance taxes. Why is that revenue gushing in? Because insurance premiums are skyrocketing. If premiums are stabilizing, as we just heard the government claim, why is the revenue that you collect, that you take from people, skyrocketing?

Mr. Toews: I'll tell you why, Mr. Speaker: because the economy is rolling, because we positioned this economy to disproportionately attract investment, create jobs, and create wealth. That's reflected in this budget document. It's reflected in every revenue line of this budget.

Ms Phillips: More spin, more half-truths or quarter-truths, perhaps no truth at all.

Since this minister was elected, the taxes he takes from us have gone up 56 per cent, and he's only been elected three years. After population and inflation growth this government is projected to take $900 million out of Albertans' pockets in car insurance premiums over the next three years. Why does his own budget show his car insurance premium taxes going through the roof? How can he campaign on even higher premiums? Why not just protect consumers?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, the fast-and-loose use of data is atrocious by the members opposite. Here are the facts. On average, according to the rate board, the majority of insurance companies are applying for – hear it – a rate reduction. Here’s the other fact: our economy is starting to roll. The budget reflects it. Every revenue line in this budget reflects it. It reflects increased investment attraction, job creation, increased wealth creation, fiscal capacity, and a balanced budget. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Tourism Strategy

Ms Rosin: Mr. Speaker, over the past two years Alberta’s tourism industry faced soaring viral case numbers, the disappearance of visitation, high unemployment rates, and now, just as things are widely reopening, crippling labour shortages. Alberta’s Rocky Mountains serve as the face of our province on the international stage, and supporting their industry through recovery and into future growth is paramount. Some suggest that mountain parks may recover far in advance of other destinations, which is great news for us, but, broadly speaking, can the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation tell us how the sector is doing today, as we approach the busy and important summer season?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for that question. Obviously, the tourism industry over the last two years has been decimated by the COVID pandemic. We’re working with them hand in hand right now to get them back to prepandemic levels by 2024. That’s why we’ve provided Travel Alberta with over $60 million over the next three years of additional funding to make sure that we can bring back those visitors to Alberta. We’re focusing on routes, we’re focusing on marketing, and also making sure that it is a world-class experience from corner to corner here in the province of Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, I’m glad to hear that recovery is well under way. There’s still so much work to be done. Our mountain towns are preparing for prepandemic levels of visitation already this summer, but we know that these numbers will not equate to prepandemic levels of revenue if the visitors are primarily domestic. Given that Travel Alberta data suggests that international visitors spend far more than domestic visitors every day, this demonstrates the importance of attracting them back and diversifying our tourism economy to offer them high-revenue experiences. To the same minister: what can be done by this government to facilitate this important work?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We need to re-establish flights around the world. That’s why our project bootstrap work, in collaboration with Travel Alberta, is doing just that. They’re investing in the advance work necessary to create the demand to re-establish routes. They’re doing that with airlines. As well, we’re working on a whole range of strategies, enhancing Indigenous tourism opportunities here. People want to experience Indigenous culture when they come to Alberta as well as food-to-table experiences. I’m a city guy, but there are all these farm experiences out there. People want to be there for that. They want that experience. Alberta has it for them.

Ms Rosin: Well, thank you again, Minister. Given the importance of Alberta’s tourism sector to the overall economic recovery of our province and given that 99 per cent of businesses in our tourism industry are small and medium sized, owned and operated by hard-working Alberta entrepreneurs, to the same minister: on behalf of the business community in Banff-Kananaskis, members of which were recently recognized as Alberta’s number one mid-sized chamber of commerce, how will our government carry out this strategy to guarantee the growth and success of Alberta’s tourism sector?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I know the member knows that Banff is the busiest national park in the entire country. On top of that, we have the second-busiest and the ninth-busiest parks in Jasper and Waterton. On top of that, we’ve got Drumheller. We’ve got the Peace Country. We’ve got your constituency of Olds, Mr. Speaker. We have so many opportunities to share the wonderful landscape and the culture of Alberta with the world. We’re also seeing right now the beginning of events coming back to Alberta. Just right now there are 2,000 people at the hydrogen conference, delegations from around the world. That’s the plan. We’re going to get tourism back here in Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has a question.

Red Deer Regional Hospital Emergency Services

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On Monday Albertans spotted 14 ambulances lined up outside the Red Deer hospital carrying patients in need of care left waiting to access the emergency room, emergency patients left to be cared for in the parking lot. Imagine the stress and anxiety they and the paramedics caring for them felt. Parking lot medicine is not acceptable, but it’s happening as a direct result of the chaos in public health care caused by this government. Will the Minister of Health stand in this House and apologize to these patients and the people of Red Deer for failing them on their right to access quality health care when and where they need it?

2:10

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I’d like to thank the hon. member for this important question. As we’ve spoken to many times in the House, the emergency system is seeing a high number of patients across Alberta. The Red Deer regional hospital centre has experienced a surge in demand in recent days due to high volumes of seriously ill patients, a rise in COVID-19 cases requiring hospitalization, and staff absences. On Monday the hospital activated overcapacity protocols to help address patient flow, including transferring existing in-patients who could safely have their care needs met at continuing care facilities or at home, discharging patients to community settings where it’s safe to do so. We are aware of the challenges that the system is facing, and I’d be pleased to speak more about our approach to actually address EMS in particular. We are expanding capacity across the entire system, including EMS, and in our hospital system.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that these pressures created by hospital beds that are closed, by the way, across central Alberta have added to this crisis and that that is on this government and given that while people are suffering in Red Deer parking lots, unable to get the care they need, and these 14 ambulances wait in line, they were prevented from being able to respond to other calls and given that this province is trying to claim its new EMS strategy will deliver better results for communities – they aren't seeing it – will the minister explain how this government let us get to this point in the first place and what he will do today to ensure we never have a line of ambulances trapped, providing care in a parking lot outside the Red Deer hospital, ever again?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows and we've spoken to in this Chamber numerous times, there has been an increase in call volume since last August, a 30 per cent increase, for EMS, and our government is taking action. A number of months ago we announced a 10-point plan to be able to address dispatch issues as well as resources. In Budget 2022 we put $64 million into our EMS system to add additional resources, and that includes another 12-hour shift per day for ambulances in Red Deer. In addition, we appointed an advisory committee to look at issues across the entire system, and I'm looking forward to their report . . .

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that all of these investments, all of these plans are the government trying to fix the system they broke and pushed to the limits and given that this government undermined doctors, ridiculed nurses, has moved to cut wages across the sector and did so during a global pandemic, and are now moving to mass privatization while hospitals are still at the breaking point and given that the answers we're getting today are just not acceptable – the people of Red Deer deserve to be heard – and given that they're represented by a cabinet minister, the Minister of Education, will she stand and apologize for her failure to advocate for her constituents at the cabinet table to prevent these kinds of crises for the people of Red Deer?

Mr. Copping: As I've said before many times in this House, we are investing in our capacity system, in health care across the system, Mr. Speaker. That includes $1.8 billion to expand the Red Deer hospital. We are focused on improving it. As I've indicated in this House before, this is not a new issue, that the hon. member across the way mentioned in regard to the unfortunate issue of people leaving emergency departments at the U of A hospital yesterday.* Well, under the previous government it wasn't 10 per cent, which was this most recent quarter. It was even higher; it was 12 per cent of people leaving. I say that not because the previous government didn't . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Wildfire Fighting Contracts

Ms Sweet: Mr. Speaker, Albertans know about the threat that wildfire poses to our communities. Everyone remembers the devastation that was inflicted by the Slave Lake, Wood Buffalo, and Paddle Prairie wildfires. It's been reported that while firefighters are normally on contract until the end of September, this government has made the decision to end those contracts at least a month earlier. History shows we have fires in September. Can the minister of agriculture and forestry tell this House why this government is removing firefighters right now, when all the evidence points out that we'll need them more than ever to keep our communities safe?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd just start by saying, you know, that nothing is more important or more of a priority for this department than the safety of Albertans, the safety of Albertan communities, protection of their property, and that's why it's a little hard to hear. I know where this question came from. It came from – I know you'll be shocked – a misleading press release from the AUPE.

An Hon. Member: No.

Mr. Horner: I know. I wish it wasn't that way. The facts are these, Mr. Speaker. We flex up our staffing. We flex up our equipment, because – big shocker – there's snow on the ground a lot in the winter. I can get into that offline, about snow . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that I actually have copies of those contracts and they compare to last year versus this year and given that the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change has reported that we should expect to see more extreme weather in the future, including wildfires, and given that I have heard that this government is ending wildfire contracts a month earlier and has even cut the budget for wildfire fighting by 8 to 12 per cent, putting communities at risk, can the minister look to the camera and explain to those communities impacted by wildfires and those that are fearful of the future wildfires how he plans on saving their communities that are at risk?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, there isn't a budget reduction, as that member well knows. We went through it in great detail in estimates. We have a stable budget after a very manageable fire season last year, where we not only protected Alberta and Albertans, but we were leaned on by Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia, states, Mexico. We are doing things in this province in a way that we're looked to by our neighbouring provinces to help ensure the protection of all Canadians.

Ms Sweet: Well, again, given, Mr. Speaker, that the last wildfire we had was actually September 11 in Waterton and that we don't have staff that are hired until the end of September and given that short-staffing wildfire fighting forces will put lives, communities, and the economy at risk and given that while science tells us that we could face more wildfires in the future and that this government is leaving Alberta less prepared and given that two months into the wildfire season the UCP have left the workforce 60 workers short along with positions that are going to end early, can the minister explain: when will the wildfire forces be up and ready to go and trained . . .

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, our last wildfire was not in September; we've had 123 wildfires since January 1. We continue to put out the wildfires outside of the legislated fire season. There are currently 12 wildfires in the province. Nine are under control. Three are being held. There were three fires that burned all winter. We continue to do our job, put out the fires. We flex up in the appropriate season. It's efficient for the province, the taxpayer, and it's safe. [interjections]

The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Economic Recovery and Growth

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again Albertans have proven that they are resilient and up for any task, any challenge. The first three months of 2022 have shown that Alberta's economy is not only recovering, but the full truth is that it's rolling. Could the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation tell this House how many additional jobs we have seen created in this province?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to that member for the question. He is right; Alberta's economy is rolling. Since the beginning of last year we've had over 150,000 jobs. That bears repeating: 150,000-plus jobs since the beginning of last year. Right now Alberta's economy is more diversified than ever. [interjections] The NDP don't like that. They're chirping right now, but you know what? Our unemployment rate is lower than December 2018. Who was in office in December 2018? The NDP.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that that is great news and given that our economy continues to grow and given that new companies are coming to invest right here in Alberta and further given that these investments are in addition to the absolutely amazing, great local businesses that are already thriving here and around our province, to the same minister: could you tell us a bit about the industry sector's diversification that we are currently seeing throughout this province?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, when we started the recovery plan over two years ago, we knew at that point in time that Alberta needed to diversify, and it is happening faster than we ever could have forecasted. The film and television industry literally doubled. Right now across Alberta the largest TV series in Canadian history, HBO's The Last of Us, is happening. Our tech sector is absolutely booming. The first-quarter numbers that came out: over $200 million of venture capital in the first three months. Contrast that to 2017. Who was in office then? Oh, yeah. The NDP. Thirty-seven million dollars in an entire year.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this growth hasn't happened by accident and given that there are so many other reasons to be optimistic about Alberta's economic future and given that our government has stayed committed to supporting economic growth in this province, could the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction tell us about how the government is reducing red tape to help these companies thrive here in Alberta?
2:20

Ms Fir: Well, thank you to the member for the question. Alberta's government committed to cutting red tape by a third, and with over 25 per cent cut so far, we are well on our way to becoming the freest and fastest moving jurisdiction in North America. Earlier this week we introduced Bill 21, which will help Alberta businesses by supporting mobile businesses by enabling intermunicipal business licences and streamlining processes, saving co-operatives over $36,000 a year. In addition, previously we had brought in common-sense approaches and changes such as enabling the creation of entertainment districts, streamlining grant applications for producers and food manufacturers, and so much more.

South Edmonton Hospital Construction Project

Mr. Dang: Over and over my constituents and I have called on this government to get the new south Edmonton hospital back on track. As we all know, it's been over 30 years since a new hospital was built in Edmonton, and the population has only continued to grow. During a time when Albertans have been struggling with so much, including the health care system almost collapsing due to the UCP's mishandling of the pandemic, and while we see the government boasting about its balanced budget, my question to the Minister of Infrastructure is simple. How can he justify the delay with no anticipated open date of the new south Edmonton hospital when it is such an important piece of public health care?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, a large project like the Edmonton hospital has to go through multiple sets of planning, design, procurement, and construction. I updated this particular member a few times already in this House and outside the House that we are going through those steps. Right now on the site the underground utilities are being set. That work is going on well except last year. Because of the ground freeze, there was a slight delay, but the work is tracking on time.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this minister originally said that it was going to be a five-year delay and then in estimates this year announced that it would be an indefinite delay for this project and given that this minister also previously stated that the government was considering using projects such as P3 approaches for this hospital and given that this has disastrously failed in other jurisdictions such as Saskatchewan and given that the government of Alberta and this minister in particular have a poor track record with P3 schools as well, can the minister commit that he will learn from these mistakes and not impose this detrimental approach and put the safety and well-being of our public health care system at risk?

Mr. Panda: I was looking up in the gallery. Even the minister from Saskatchewan couldn't believe about P3 failures there, so I don't know what the member is talking about.

We haven't decided this is going through a P3 procurement method yet, because we haven't reached that stage, Mr. Speaker, yet. We decide based on the best value for the taxpayers of Alberta and how we can utilize the private finance to build this facility on time, on budget.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the lessons this minister seems to be learning from Saskatchewan is how the Battlefords hospital's roof actually collapsed and closed all health care in that region for over a year and given that Albertans' health care system continues to be in danger due to this government's risky policies and given that the government of Alberta's projects website does not provide any information regarding the schedule of the south Edmonton hospital, can the constituents and Albertans that live in Edmonton expect and receive from this minister a clear date on when we can see a hospital opening?

Thank you.

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, there are projects across Alberta happening. The infrastructure investment is unprecedented, including in that particular member's own riding. The minister and I yesterday were there blessing the school site together with the Catholic faith community. I don't know what risks the member is talking about unless he hacked something and found some risk. I would ask him to share those risks with me, and I'll try to eliminate them.

Calgary Downtown Revitalization

Member Ceci: This morning the city of Calgary announced the first round of funding to support empty office conversions as part of their plan to drive down the vacancy rate and revitalize the downtown. Noticeably absent from any of this was the UCP. All they could muster for downtown Calgary in their last budget was $4 million, an amount the CEO of the Calgary Chamber called, quote, absolutely inadequate. Meanwhile downtown Calgary continues to struggle. Why is this government refusing to lift a finger to support an area that has long served as a fundamental part of Alberta's economy and has generated tremendous wealth for the people of this province?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We've just received the downtown working group's recommendations, and we'll be making that public here in the next little while.

But thank God the NDP have not been in office for the last three years, Mr. Speaker. The reason why I say that is that this government has been laser focused on attracting investment and creating jobs, 150,000 jobs since the beginning of last year. Now, under the NDP licence plates from across the country disappeared. But all of a sudden people are moving again to Alberta. We will not apologize for our economic track record. It's amazing.

Member Ceci: Given that Quebec, Ontario, B.C., Manitoba, and Saskatchewan have lower unemployment rates than Alberta and given that Calgary's downtown vacancy rate still sits at 33 per cent according to CBRE, the highest level in the country – in fact, the number of head offices under the UCP has fallen – and given that Calgary still has the highest unemployment rate of any major Canadian city and given that we've already put forward our own plan to bring new energy to downtown, meanwhile this government sits on the sidelines and attacks everyone else's plan, is their only wish that . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation.

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, sometimes they toss you a beach ball, and I absolutely lob it. It's time for an NDP legacy tour for the worst Finance minister in Alberta's history. This government has balanced the budget. At the same time, we have talked in Alberta for decades and decades about diversification. Right now: the film industry, doubled; the tech sector, booming; logistics people are leaving B.C. They're coming to Alberta for logistics because of a business environment. The past Finance minister did not understand business. We do. That's creating jobs.

Member Ceci: Given that the UCP have contributed nothing to Calgary's revitalization plan downtown and given that we've released our own plan to support downtown Calgary, that includes direct support for the city as well as a focus on economic diversification, and given that just last night our caucus held a consultation on ways to further refine and improve our proposals and given that this Finance minister said that economic diversification is a luxury he can't afford and he won't put money towards and that it's not his job to help the largest city in our province, that continues to struggle, is this government refusing to put a single idea on the table? We want to see them.

Mr. McIver: Oh, Mr. Speaker, we're acting on many ideas. I'll remind the hon. member of the Calgary rivers CRL, which will provide $55 million a year for 40 years into downtown Calgary. That's $2 billion, on top of the $5 billion in this year's budget: Arts Commons, $200 million; the Repsol centre, $20 million; the Calgary Stampede Sam centre, $5 million; the SAIT John Ware, $41 million. We are busy helping Calgary.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Obstetric Services in Whitecourt

Mr. Long: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Three weeks ago I stood here and asked about my constituents' options in response to a shortage of physicians with surgical skills in the Whitecourt health care centre. At that time the AHS north zone had told my constituents that the hospital would temporarily be unable to offer C-sections until April 13. But on April 8 Alberta Health Services announced that they were temporarily pausing all obstetrical services at the Whitecourt health care centre for a month. To the Minister of Health. My constituents are frustrated. They want to know what is going on and what is causing these physician shortages.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for representing his constituents. This situation is concerning. Families deserve to know that they can safely receive health care services wherever they are in our province. There are two physicians providing obstetric services in Whitecourt; however, a personal leave of absence and on-call unavailability mean the clinic can't operate at normal levels right now. I want to ensure that AHS plans to resume services in Whitecourt by May 8. Prenatal patients in Whitecourt will continue to receive care from their family physicians. We'll solve this problem over . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, Minister. Given that obstetrics is a high-risk surgical practice that requires a team of experts with specialized skills and given that there are many doctors with international medical credentials wanting to move to Alberta to provide health care, can the same minister explain how we can swiftly evaluate international medical graduates so my constituents can receive the same level of care as any other Albertan?

2:30

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Obstetrics, like all specializations, is a highly skilled, highly specialized field of medicine. As a result, AHS works with the College of Physicians & Surgeons to ensure that every doctor applying to work in Alberta meets the same standards of practice. International medical graduates, or IMGs, must pass an assessment to certify that they meet the same minimum standard for any doctor trained in Canada. IMGs are valuable members of our communities. Recruiting and assessing more so that we can serve Albertans to the highest level of care: we are looking to recruit more, and we will do so.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, again, Minister. Given that for months now I've been unable to explain to my constituents why Whitecourt is lacking services and given that we need a plan to fix these shortages so that my constituents do not need to be transported to a city over two hours away for medical treatment, once again to the Minister of Health: how and when will this recurring issue be fixed permanently?

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Copping: Thanks again, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the hon. member. As the member knows, there are 13 physicians practising in Whitecourt, seven of whom have hospital privileges. A lack of obstetrics-trained doctors in Whitecourt meant that AHS would temporarily divert expectant mothers to the nearby Edson health care facility or another location of their choice. Edson has well-established information and transfer processes with Whitecourt. We're committed to providing services for rural Albertans. We're spending $90 million to recruit and retain rural doctors in Budget 2022, and we'll continue to focus on actually get doctors into rural Alberta.

Victims of Crime Program

Mr. Sabir: As the pandemic was starting, the UCP introduced a bill designed to reduce the supports available to victims of crime by dismantling the victims of crime fund. Since that time they have changed the supports available, and this has resulted in victims either having to pay out of pocket for recovery from their trauma or not having access to supports at all. Simple question: will the Minister of Justice commit to reversing these harmful changes that are retraumatizing victims?

Mr. Shandro: None of that is true, Mr. Speaker. What did happen is that the fund included other focuses as well, including focuses on public safety. We continue to provide funding to victims who require it. We have now received a report from two MLAs who have helped us with advice and recommendations regarding how victims' services funding can be provided and making sure that as much funding can be provided to victims and supports can be provided to victims in the community as possible. We're looking forward to moving forward with that report and being able to make sure that victims get the funding and the services they need.

Mr. Sabir: Given that victims of crime deserve to have access to the supports that they need to fully heal and given that leaving victims with the only option available to them, to sue the perpetrator through the court system, further traumatizes victims and given that the justice statutes bill currently before the Legislature solidifies this government's agenda to leave victims out in the cold, can the minister name any one person from one organization that supports the changes they made to this program or tells them that the reductions are . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General.

Mr. Shandro: Well, yes, Mr. Speaker, and that's why we've continued to work with our victims' services organizations throughout the province and continue to work with all the great engagement work that was done by the MLAs who helped provide those recommendations so that we can move forward in '22 to be able to work forward in working to improve the services provided to those victims, making sure that the services continue to be sustainable and available to those victims so that we can continue to improve the entire system throughout the province for those victims.

Mr. Sabir: Given that the victims of crime fund has been raided to make up for the reckless cuts that this government made to the Justice department's budget and given that we know that survivors of crime, like Emma Wilson, have made it loud and clear that lack of supports is hindering healing and recovery and given that this government still refuses to release the report of the working group on support for victims of crime, what is this minister hiding? When can we expect to see the report? How much longer do survivors have to wait?

Mr. Shandro: Well, fairly soon, as I said, Mr. Speaker. In the meantime the interim victims' assistance program is available to support victims in ways that the previous program didn't. A couple of examples for the hon. member: helping victims with out-of-pocket expenses resulting from violent crime; giving victims of serious violent crime, including those who are victims of sexual assault and families of homicide victims, quick access to counselling; and then, as well, reimbursing victims and witnesses for the expenses that are related to attending court and for support reasons.

Condominium Owner Dispute Resolution Processes Health Card System Modernization

Mr. Carson: I was looking forward to finally seeing new condominium legislation in Alberta so that condo owners would finally have a tribunal process to settle disputes. This is a process that the NDP engaged on and something that the UCP claimed they would support. But with the new legislation completely ignoring it and while powers are being given to condo corporations to fine owners without due process, why is there no tribunal process in the bill, and when will the Minister of Service Alberta introduce one, or is this just another broken promise?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services has risen.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Our government has looked at options for dispute resolution for condominium owners, boards, and corporations, and we know that there is, in fact, value in a system that is an alternative to the courts. At this time we're not pursuing a condominium tribunal. However, again, as we know that there is value in this type of system, it's something that we're open to looking at in the future.

Mr. Carson: Given that without a tribunal if an owner opposes fees set on them, they will be forced to go to the courts and given that the UCP have made significant cuts to the justice system and, as a result, cases are moving slowly, condo disputes should be handled in a tribunal, not the courts. I'm concerned that this legislation will cause condo owners to be assumed guilty until they are proven innocent. Given that without a tribunal there is no due process, how does the Minister of Service Alberta justify condo owners being able to receive new fines without providing an easy way to challenge them?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I said, while this is something that does have merit, it's not something that we're looking at at this time. In the meantime we do encourage condominium owners, boards, and corporations to use existing resources in addition to the courts such as alternative resolution services for mediating disputes.

Mr. Carson: Given that the Minister of Service Alberta finally admitted that he will not deliver on updating health cards from paper to plastic, it is clear that this is a trend of broken promises as he has also failed to deliver on creating tribunal processes for condo owners. But given that the minister has been working overtime to support the Premier on his leadership review and, in fact, is also weighing in on the federal Conservative leadership race, too, why is the Minister of Service Alberta so focused on partisan survival while failing to do his job and deliver on the promises he made to Albertans?

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, I know, in fact, that the Minister of Service Alberta would just be happy to have finally gotten a question from the members opposite, so thank you very much for that. We know that Albertans want more convenience with their government-issued documents. We've been working closely with the Ministry of Health to explore options to give Albertans the option to add their personal health number onto their driver's licence or ID card. The Ministry of Health has of course been focused on protecting Albertans throughout the pandemic, but we remain focused on making life better for Albertans and continuing to consider options to reduce red tape and modernize our services for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Alberta Health Services and Health System Capacity

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have seen very important changes to Alberta Health Services in the last month. AHS employees and Albertans with friends or family members in health care have been calling for the removal of senior management for years. For years Albertans have been frustrated, upset, and disappointed with long wait times, lack of access to physicians, and issues with EMS availability, just to name a few, but new management could mean more problems. To the Minister of Health: what is being done to build a better AHS system for employees and everyday Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for this important question. Albertans elected our government on an aggressive platform of renewal and transformation in health care, and we are keeping that promise. We promise to provide every Albertan who needs scheduled surgery within clinically appropriate wait times and are committed to similar improvements in MRI and CT scans, and we are making progress. These much-needed improvements will foster a better environment for patients and for staff as pressures ease throughout the system. We're also moving forward with the most significant renewal and modernization in continuing care and investing in capacity in our overall health care system.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for his response. Given that these changes to senior management will take time when it comes to choosing the right individuals for the role and given that the previous financial mismanagement and an unhealthy culture within AHS has been expressed by front-line workers, once again to the Minister of Health: with the restructuring of a $23 billion company responsible for over 100,000 employees, will Albertans see a rebuilt AHS system with better financial management, better attitude, and a better culture and a healthy environment for front-line workers?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks again to the member. Alberta's front-line health care workers are the backbone of our health care system. I'd like to take a moment to once again thank them for all their tremendous work, particularly through the challenging times of COVID-19. Front-line services and quality patient care are at the forefront of what we're trying to achieve. Whether that's adding surgical capacity through chartered surgical facilities outside AHS, including 35,000 recently announced publicly funded cataract and noncataract surgeries this year, or addressing EMS pressures through AHS's 10-point plan and through our advisory committee, we are investing in capacity.

Mr. Reid: Given that employees of AHS have endured and pushed through the problems and struggles of the pandemic for the last two years and given that they did so with limited health care capacity inside our hospitals and limited ICU units and given that so many nurses and doctors spoke up surrounding the issues when it came to capacity during the pandemic, again to the same minister: why was AHS unable to deliver the proper capacity levels needed during surging waves of COVID-19?

Mr. Copping: Thank you again to the hon. member. Mr. Speaker, Alberta's health care workers battled through extraordinary circumstances in the past two years, and again I want to say thank you. AHS did respond with capacity to meet the needs of each wave that we've experienced through COVID, but it came at a cost, in certain waves, in regard to postponed surgeries. That's why we're investing $100 million each year over the next three years to increase and sustain 50 additional ICU beds, to bring ICU capacity in line with other provinces. Again, Budget '22 is committed to increased capacity across our entire system; $600 million this year, the next year, and the year after that.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Utility Costs and Rebates

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are living in unparalleled times, colleagues. The short-sighted, quick-fix solutions implemented by the NDP before Albertans fired them have caused a utility price emergency. Constituents in my riding of Sherwood Park are fearing that gas and electricity prices will become unmanageable and unaffordable in the near future. Albertans need relief now. To the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity: can you tell my constituents and Albertans when they can expect natural gas rebates to begin? [interjections]

The Speaker: The Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The members opposite are getting a little fired up right now. But you know what? I can understand why. When they were in office, they were more focused on hiring people to come into your house to screw in a light bulb than they were focused on the economy. Right now Alberta is booming. We have over 150,000 jobs since the beginning of last year. We're also providing relief at the pumps, with electricity, and with natural gas. On top of that, there are jobs here in this province. That's a good sign. People are moving to our province because they believe in its future.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that the energy rebate program will kick in next winter to ensure European-style price hikes do not become a reality in Alberta and given that the price of energy is unstable and unpredictable in current times and given that the citizens of Alberta live in various housing situations, to the minister: can he tell Albertans what living quarters will be eligible for the natural gas rebate?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we're working on implementing the natural gas rebate at the fastest possible instance. On top of that, the member raises a very good point about energy security, something the members opposite know absolutely nothing about. The second-most powerful politician in the U.S., Senator Manchin, came to Alberta to work with our government to make sure that we have energy security across North America. The last thing we want is a European-style energy spike that the NDP want to bring to Canada.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that this government has created new and innovative legislation to help Albertans heat their homes through difficult economic times and given that the NDP-Liberal carbon tax will have extremely detrimental effects on Albertans' wallets and given that Albertans also face high prices for other utilities to run their households, can the minister tell Albertans how this government plans to assist with costs regarding electricity in these uncertain times?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we're helping people at the pumps, we're helping people with electricity, and we're helping them with their natural gas bills. [interjections] The NDP are chirping right now. Where were they to oppose the carbon tax? Absolutely nowhere. They were arm in arm. They wanted it to go higher. We won't let that happen. We're going to continue to fight for Albertans every single day to make sure they have affordable power, an amazing way of life, and low taxes with a balanced budget in Alberta.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will continue to the remainder of the daily Routine.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills I am pleased to present the committee's final report on Bill 205, Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022, sponsored by the hon. Member for Highwood. This bill was referred to the committee on March 31, 2022. The report recommends that Bill 205 proceed, and I request concurrence of the Assembly in the final report on Bill 205.

The Speaker: Hon. members, this is a motion for concurrence, that is debatable pursuant to Standing Order 18. This is an opportunity, if anyone would like to speak to the motion for concurrence, to please rise. I see the hon. member has risen. That debate will take place on the next available Monday.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to give oral notice of Bill 23, Professional Governance Act, sponsored by the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

The Speaker: Are there other notices? Do you have a notice of motion or a tabling?

Ms Phillips: No. Another report.

The Speaker: Oh. Correction. Hon. members, I believe that the hon. the Deputy Government House Leader is just about to propose a unanimous consent request to return to Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees as, unfortunately, the Speaker passed over the chair of the PAC committee. I wondered if he might be willing to make a unanimous consent request to return.

Mr. Schow: Most certainly, Mr. Speaker. I rise to ask unanimous consent from the Assembly to return to Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West, with apologies.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just simply rise as chair of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. I wish to table on behalf of the committee the appropriate number of copies of the 2021 annual report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and to assure the public that a copy of this report will also be available on the Legislative Assembly website shortly.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you, members.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development on behalf of the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Bill 22 Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on behalf of the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity to move first reading of Bill 22, Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022.

This legislation will allow for much-needed modernization of our electricity grid, ensuring it can meet the needs of consumers for years to come while maintaining energy affordability.

[Motion carried; Bill 22 read a first time]

2:50 Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there tablings? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West also has a tabling.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table a couple of items that I have made reference to in debate over the last week or so. One is a letter to the Education minister from the Lethbridge school division board of trustees indicating a couple of concerns, one with the requirements for assessment and reporting for learning loss funding and the other with some fairly sharp concerns about the implementation of the new draft curriculum.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Ms Phillips: I have one other, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Please continue.

Ms Phillips: I have also the quarterly update of the College of Physicians & Surgeons of Alberta on physician resources in Alberta, indicating a net loss of 13 doctors in Lethbridge alone and a number of other places losing physicians in a net way.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of hon. Mr. Nicolaidis, Minister of Advanced Education, supplemental responses to questions raised by Mr. Eggen, hon. Member for Edmonton-North West, March 16, 2022, Ministry of Advanced Education 2022-23 main estimates debate.

The Speaker: Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 15 Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate April 26: Mrs. Frey]

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to join in the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is an honour to rise. I will keep my remarks brief as I know we have much to get on the record today and a few bills that we need to discuss. I haven't yet, but I did want to get on the record for second reading of Bill 15, Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022. Now, I have to say, you know, that it's been a common theme today to have to comment on the fact that we've seen time and time again from this government multiple opportunities to present legislation that would really dramatically improve the lives of Albertans.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Just today I've already had the chance to speak to multiple bills, just this morning, upon reflection, Bill 11, which is the Continuing Care Act, and – gosh, what else did I speak about this morning? – Bill 16, on insurance. You know, those were opportunities for the government to really listen to Albertans and come back to their constituents and be able to say: "You know what? We are listening." And in the case of insurance, as an example: "Here's something, really, where you'll see an impact in your pocketbook, a positive impact for once, because we know many of you are struggling with higher and higher, skyrocketing auto insurance premiums." They didn't, right? Instead, they chose to just do a little bit of housekeeping. Same thing with bills 11, 12, others. The list goes on.

I frame my comments in response to Bill 15 in a similar way just because I hear nonstop from my constituents, not just teachers. I know many folks in this Chamber are probably tired of me talking about my time as a teacher and working in education. The Member for Calgary-Buffalo is shaking his head, meaning he probably would like to hear more of my tales from teaching, and I'd be happy to share those. But, you know, truly, I do pride myself in being very open to folks reaching out to me from across this province. I hear from a lot of teachers. I hear from a lot of parents.

In fact, I even hear from some students. You know, the former social studies teacher in me is always quite keen when students are engaged. After all, a key pillar of our, in fact, current social studies curriculum, that was developed under the Progressive Conservatives, one that received international attention for how visionary it was and one that I was proud to implement in the classroom as a teacher and also work a little bit on, a curriculum developed through a rigorous process, including countless stakeholders, including piloting in classrooms across the province and not just in one school division in northern Alberta that was willing to take it on, like we see with the proposed UCP curriculum – my point in saying all that about the current social studies curriculum, that I was proud to teach, is that a key pillar of that is active, engaged citizenship. So it sure is nice to be able to hear from students who are engaged in the process.

I say all this because of, you know, the issues that I hear from folks associated with schools, which is a whole lot of us. In fact, probably nearly everybody in this room has a connection to schools, right? Well, you all do, in fact, because you all have schools in your constituencies. But you also have family members who attend schools, who work at schools. You were all students at one point. What do we hear from those – I'll call them stakeholders, which is such a governmenty term – impacted by education? They talk about things like how COVID has impacted learning, learning loss.

My colleague from Edmonton-Glenora spoke quite eloquently on Bill 15. Gosh, it might have been yesterday. It might have been the day prior. It might have been two years ago. I don't know. Time is confusing. But the point is that she talked a little bit about that, too, about just, you know, the real fears from teachers and from education workers, EAs as an example, and parents about the impacts of COVID on learning.

We hear about the ongoing disrespect shown towards teachers and education staff over the last two-plus years – right? – with no more stark an example than the laying off of 20,000-plus education workers on a Saturday via Twitter from this Education minister. What a slap on the face that was, being told that they weren't needed, that their work wasn't valuable when these were education workers, particularly education assistants, who were doing so much, going above and beyond to support students in their transition to online learning. I had an EA reach out to me right after that happened. Was it May 2021? Again, time is confusing. My apologies. But I remember an EA reaching out to me and just saying, like: I'm not complaining, because this is my job, but I've literally been working nonstop; I've been connecting with students at home.

I'm hearing from, you know, folks in my riding, where we've got some incredible schools that support kids in what we might call the inner city, in my Boyle Street neighbourhood, St. Teresa of Calcutta school, an amazing school that does so much to support kids. But so many of them are newcomers, and many of them live below the poverty line and don't have Internet at home, as an example, right? Having education staff who are trying to help and trying to pivot, particularly when kids don't have the resources to learn effectively online at home: that's something we're hearing.

We are hearing from teachers and school staff and parents about the fact that: "Listen, we've got rising enrolment yet a thousand fewer teachers in classrooms. We've got a government that's refusing to truly fund enrolment growth despite the spin that you'll hear from them. We've got a government that's refusing to invest in schools, refusing to listen to one of their largest school boards, the Edmonton public school board, that asked in their capital plan: hey, Delton school needs an update; it needs a modernization; it needs a new school, in fact." Delton school, I know, happens to be in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, so I'm a little sensitive to this one because that Education minister chose not to fund it, chose not to listen to the Albertans that she is purported to represent, right?

I could go on, my point being that it's really hard to trust this government on education when issue after issue – of course, you all know me, my love of curriculum. Working in curriculum for about eight years under consecutive PC ministers and then the NDP Education minister, you know, I saw how well and how thought-out curriculum was developed, taking an evidence-based approach, yet we've seen that this government has bungled that.

With this bill, Bill 15, rather than respect our teachers and ensure they have the resources that they need to help students thrive in a safe and caring environment, you know, they took away the supports that are needed. They're forging ahead with that curriculum; they're pausing on building schools. So no wonder. No wonder that when I and my NDP colleagues and perhaps UCP MLAs as well – I can't speak for them, but I know we talk a lot about what we hear from our constituents on this side. When we're out knocking on doors, when we're flipping through our e-mail inboxes, listening to our voice mails, checking our social media, no wonder that education is a top issue. It absolutely is, and it will continue to be.

Bill 15 does nothing to address the big issues in education that we are hearing about. You know, if our constituents don't trust this government on that whole list of education issues that I just mentioned, it's no wonder that they also don't trust this government when it comes to the professional conduct process and what we have outlined in Bill 15, a process where that minister alone can set the standards for professional conduct and she can change them essentially on a whim, unilaterally. That minister is asking Albertans, is asking my constituents who care deeply about education, is asking teachers, is asking parents, is asking students to just trust her. How could we possibly trust a minister who is asking Albertans to allow her to be both the judge and the jury?

Instead of listening to Albertans and making tangible suggestions for a piece of legislation that could support teachers and education stakeholders across this province, this government is forging ahead with Bill 15. With that, I know we'll have much more to say on Bill 15 in committee, and I'm looking forward to that conversation. I hope that we'll get an opportunity to hear more from the minister and as well from UCP MLAs, who I'm certain should have lots to say on this. I can't imagine – well, I know this for a fact. I've knocked on many of their – not many; I won't exaggerate. I've knocked on some of their ridings, and certainly education is a top issue. Curriculum comes up a whole lot on the doors, right? I must admit that I don't think – I'm trying to just rack my brain here – I've heard from constituents or from folks that I've met within other ridings across this province concerns about the professional conduct process, right?

With that, I will conclude my remarks, but I urge this government to think deeply about what its priorities are when it comes to education, because what we see here are certainly not those of Albertans. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to speak to Bill 15? The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Just Taber-Warner, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Just Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak in favour of Bill 15, Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022. I want to thank the Minister of Education for bringing this bill forward. Let me start by saying that I have the utmost respect for teachers and the work that they do. In fact, my father is a retired teacher. He taught all of his life, my mother taught for about 10 years for kindergarten, and in fact I taught for two years as well. The first thing that I started with is teaching.

Teachers have a unique passion and skill set that enables them to mould young minds and to make sure they have the skills and competencies for future success. This government knows that the vast majority of teachers in this province are professionals who value the safety of the students in their care. In fact, Madam Speaker, I want to reiterate that. I have many friends who are teachers. I have no doubt that teachers, 99.9 per cent of the teachers out there, are doing it for the right reasons. They have to wear multiple hats. It's a very difficult job to be a teacher. I know. I did it for two years. The bill that we're talking about here is not to address those good teachers that we have in this province. We have great teachers. It's to address the ones that are falling through the cracks. This is why I am so in favour of this bill.

The Alberta Teachers' Association would like you to believe that this bill is an attack on all of those good teachers I just talked about, the teaching profession, and Alberta's education system as a whole, in fact. They have already spent millions of dollars, Madam Speaker, on media campaigns to create fear amongst Albertans and teachers alike. I have heard these people come to my office and talk to me about these concerns. When I ask them: "Where did you get this information from? Have you actually read through the bill? Have you actually chatted with the minister or the minister's office?" They say: "No. We got it from the ATA." That disinformation that's going out there is concerning.

Madam Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. This is nothing more than a tactic being used by the ATA. We've seen this happen multiple times. I saw this when they were concerned about the fund that manages their retirement fund, moving it under AIMCo. For months I had teachers coming to me, both teachers who were currently teaching and teachers who were also retired, saying, "How dare your government do this?" And I said to them: "Listen, the numbers are quite clear. The fund manager that they were using before versus the fund manager of AIMCo: those numbers show that the teachers will do better under AIMCo."

They had a very difficult time believing me, even though they knew me, because of what the ATA was telling them through multiple, multiple e-mails and pamphlets that they were sending out to these teachers. Madam Speaker, I always said to them: "Listen, I get your concerns. If it was my retirement, I would also be concerned. But the numbers, the reasons why: all of these things are going to be a benefit to you." Hindsight is 20/20 vision. If you look backwards, you can see, you know, where you were right or wrong. Fast-forward to today. We find out that AIMCo has outperformed the fund manager that they had before. Well, it's interesting, because if you talk to teachers today, they'll say: "You know what? You were right, and the ATA was wrong."

In this situation, Madam Speaker, I think that the ATA is also getting it wrong. I think that they are not taking a look at the information that we are presenting, and they have dug in and very passionately, I might add. I'm also hearing from other teachers saying, "How dare you do this?" I have to go back to those teachers and say the same thing I said with the changing of the fund manager: “You know what? Hindsight is 20/20 vision. Let us work through this, and we hope that at the end of the day and we believe that at the end of the day that it will be more responsive to teachers, to students, to parents, and that the system will be better and more accountable.” It’s only the bad teachers who should worry as they will be losing a level of protection their union has previously provided. This is simply a good policy.

Let’s look at the reforms contained in this bill. The current teacher discipline structure in place is a dual-system model that has been in place for 85 years. Under the current model the ATA is responsible for overseeing complaints made against its active members, and the Alberta Education registrar is responsible for overseeing complaints made against non-ATA teachers and teacher leaders. The current system allows the ATA union to be in charge of overseeing the disciplinary process for its members.

Madam Speaker, we know that unions are designed to protect and advocate for their members in exchange for the payment of union dues. There’s nothing wrong with that. That is the natural process of what unions should do. I think we can see the conflict of interest here, however, and that is a problem. We know that there are instances when inappropriate conduct with a student has led to an offending teacher being removed from the school and simply being put in a new one.

I’ve heard lots of the members opposite stand up and talk about: give us evidence; give us the reasons why you’re bringing forward this bill. Madam Speaker, you only have to have one case for this bill to be important. Only one case would make it valid. For the hon. members to discount that: I find that absolutely deplorable. These are children. I have five children – they’re all older now – and I’ve got four grandchildren. I think that it’s absolutely incumbent upon each of us as lawmakers in this Legislature to make sure that we are protecting not just all of them but even the one that might get away. If we can provide a system, a robust accountability system to help even that one, then this bill is worth doing. I’ve actually heard that kind of argument being given by the members opposite multiple times, where they will talk about the one, the importance of the one, the individual. I think that in this situation I don’t hear that argument from them. I find that odd.

Now, we’ve seen also some evidence from a number of cases that the ATA does not understand their duty to report inappropriate conduct to the police in instances of serious harm or a threat to student safety. This is not discipline. This does not protect our children. The only people this does protect are those who are the bad actors. It is clear to see that the current system of teacher discipline is out of date and reforms are long overdue.

So let’s talk about Bill 15 and what it will do in terms of reforming the teacher discipline process. Madam Speaker, Bill 15 will create a single system for addressing complaints under a newly created Alberta teacher profession commission. This commission will be headed by a commissioner and will oversee teacher and teacher leader conduct and competency complaints for all teachers and teacher leaders equally. Under this system the registrar of Alberta Education will be responsible for the intake of all complaints. These complaints will then be forwarded to the Alberta teaching profession commissioner, who will have the authority to address and investigate each complaint and determine the most appropriate course of action.

This bill will increase accountability and transparency by expanding the online teacher registry, by making publicly available information on hearing and appeal dates; hearing, appeal, and minister’s decisions where there is a finding of unprofessional conduct or unprofessional incompetence; any consent resolution agreements initiated by the new Alberta teaching profession commissioner; and dates of hearings and appeals. These changes will ensure that the entire teaching profession is protected by bringing all teachers and teacher leaders under one reformed disciplinary process and will put the best interests of students, their families, teachers, and the public at the centre of the teacher discipline process as well. This bill will bring Alberta in line with other jurisdictions and regulated professions by eliminating the conflict of interest where a union could advocate for its members while also overseeing disciplinary matters.

Madam Speaker, I think all members of this House would agree that children should be safe in their schools and that parents should not have to worry about their children falling victim to inappropriate conduct by the educators they have entrusted with the well-being of the children. I want to remind the members that when we announced this, there was someone from my riding that came forward, the Snows. Mr. and Mrs. Snow came forward and talked about how difficult it was for them. Their daughter was in an inappropriate situation with a teacher. That took five years to be able to work through the processes. During that time that teacher was still able to be involved with kids. That was a very difficult situation for the Snows, knowing that this teacher, who was very inappropriate with their daughter, was still able to perform as a teacher.

I know of another situation, Madam Speaker, where a teacher had molested a child, and that teacher did not lose their certificate to teach. That teacher, actually, was just moved off to another school. In another situation a teacher that had misappropriated funds was actually stripped of their teacher’s certificate. Now, misappropriating funds is wrong, and there needs to be some action taken on that. But there was inconsistency on why someone who misappropriated funds would lose their teaching certificate and someone who molested a person would not lose their certificate. That is something that I think this bill will be able to address to start talking about those inconsistencies and work through some of those things so that we have a system that is fair, accountable, and addresses these issues without bias.

Our government wants to ensure that students are safe at school, and this legislation will provide a fully transparent process to ensure that bad teachers are disciplined appropriately. This bill has a common-sense approach to teacher discipline that will enhance the accountability and transparency of the teaching profession and will better protect students and give parents peace of mind. I will be proudly voting in favour of this bill, and I would encourage all members of the House to do so as well.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to speak to Bill 15?

[Motion carried; Bill 15 read a second time]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I’d like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 13 Financial Innovation Act

The Chair: There are currently no amendments on the floor. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. Happy to rise this afternoon and expand on some of my comments that I started with in second reading. Of course, one of the first things I had noticed about this bill was the amount of abilities that this bill is going to be granting the minister, something again, as I've said before, that members of the government bench and members of the government caucus that served in the 29th Legislature, shall we say, were not very accepting of when they saw that from the NDP government. It's always entertaining, actually, to see that all of a sudden now the shoe is on the other foot and it seems like a good thing to do. That was one of the first kind of flags I saw.

What it essentially comes down to is that, you know, the minister and ultimately the government is looking to not only this Assembly but Albertans to just simply trust them. As we know, that seems to be in very, very short supply from Albertans about the government. I think one of the comments I said earlier was: why trust a Premier, why trust a government when they can't even manage to disclose a donor list? A simple promise that the Premier made during the leadership race, when the UCP was coming together, and hasn't managed to deliver on that in three years. Yet here we are on something much larger, like Bill 13, asking everybody to just simply trust them.

You know, it's not simply just as much as a donor list. When we start to look at some of the other things that are on that list, it starts to cause a lot of concern around that. Like, for instance, with the big corporate tax giveaway that the government made, it was just simply: well, look, we'll give them this tax break, and they'll start creating all kinds of jobs. Of course, data has shown over the decades that that has never really transpired. But we were still going to go down that path again, and right out of the gate 55,000 jobs were lost. Again, looking back, all we heard was, "Trust us; this is going to work," and then doubled, even tripled down to accelerate that a little bit.

My colleague from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood was just talking about the curriculum, the amount of rejection that we've seen from educators and from Albertans with all of the problems that are there: again, really starting to test Albertans' trust of the government. You know, we heard promises of: we're going to fix the insurance system, the big mess that the previous government made of that. Yet again I have constituents coming to me with increases, 10 per cent, 30 per cent on average, some higher than that. If that's your version of fixing, please stop because my constituents can't afford it.

You know, a $1.3 billion bet on Donald Trump: like, that can really shake an individual's trust in their government, to make such a reckless choice. Thirty million dollars a year and the best that we can come up with is two copied logos and chasing after Bigfoot. I have to wonder if maybe Opopogo is next on the hit list.

I think, as I mentioned in my comments in second reading around Bill 13, one of the first things we see is the power to exempt products from consumer protection laws. There are certainly some concerns about how this potentially could be abused. Of course, I said that there are probably a few missing shingles off the roof of my house. Certainly, when my wife feels that she has not gotten what she was promised, whether it comes to a financial service or a product – I can just imagine that she's not alone in that belief, which is why people are very, very adamant when it comes to consumer protections around, say, for instance, financial services, which is what Bill 13 is proposing to bring in. We haven't really heard how this government plans to guarantee some of those things. You know, we can certainly start to go down the whole debate road of: well, that's coming in regulations. That doesn't give comfort to Albertans very much when they're being taken for a ride potentially. It would have been nice to see some of that work.

One of the other things that kind of came up was potentially the bureaucracy, not having the technical capacity or sophistication to potentially regulate some of this appropriately. So one of my first questions, you know, that comes to mind around that kind of topic is: is the government willing to fund the ability to create that? When I see the ability for them to potentially, I guess, contract that out, that would kind of lead me to believe that that's probably not the case. When I think about some of the times that the government has appointed people and such – I hate to say it – there have been very, very partisan appointments around there. Again, if you're going to be criticizing others for potentially doing that, to then turn around and do the exact same thing is a little bit hypocritical.

When I'm thinking about the government of Alberta contracting out, how are they going to be sourcing this, who are they going to be choosing, and are they going to potentially show up on a UCP donor list? I can't help but ask those kinds of questions. And, of course, now that we're in Committee of the Whole, hopefully, we'll get an opportunity to hear some of those answers.

When you are potentially looking at exempting certain things, it begs the question of: well, what are you prepared to exempt, and what aren't you prepared to exempt? It would be very, very interesting to hear from the government side what the plan is around that. What's on the table? What's not on the table? You know, get that kind of stuff on the record.

Certainly, when there are any kinds of challenges to regulations or legislation, part of some of that discovery is going back to the debates that occur in this House. If you want to make it abundantly clear – I've always said, Madam Chair, that when we're creating legislation, it's not for us. We know what's going on. We know potentially – well, sometimes we know what's going on, at least on the opposition side. What's the intention? Put it on the record so then there's no doubt. If there is an honest ability to want to create good legislation, you should have absolutely no problems putting things on the record that people can go back and read – no big deal – so that 20 years from now, when none of us are available here and we can't answer questions and we can't explain what the process was, they can simply read this and know exactly what's going on. That's the simplest way to solve this.

How are we going to be educating Albertans around this? You know, are we going to post something online for them to read, assuming they can navigate some of the times to be able to find those things? It's unfortunate I have to bring this up, Madam Chair, but is it going to be a case of: well, we're just going to do it now; we'll wait to see what happens; then we'll try to maybe fix it, and maybe then we'll try to educate people more on it. It's kind of a little bit of a backwards type of approach, but we have seen that so far through the 30th Legislature. Again, all it takes is one time for it to happen, and it starts to beg the question: well, what else is going to be happening with that?

Like, I'm not opposed to Bill 13, but I think there are some very legitimate questions that we have, that Albertans ultimately have. You know, a lot of times that's what forms some of our debate in this House, trying to get their questions answered that they bring to us. Hopefully, through the course here of Committee of the Whole we'll get some answers to those, like I said, specifically: what is the government planning to potentially exempt, or is there anything that they just absolutely will not grant an exemption to? I think that kind of information needs to be put out there on the record for all Albertans to be able to see so that they kind of know what they're dealing with.

And then any other riskier services or technologies that they'll be able to educate Albertans with – so I think I'll leave my comments at that point. I'm certainly looking forward to hearing more. There's a good chance I may pop up again to have some other things to say based on what the debate is, but I appreciate the chance to expand on some of my comments.

The Chair: Any members to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to rise in support of Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act. If passed, Bill 13 will create a regulatory sandbox for financial services and fintech companies. Regulatory sandboxes offer businesses temporary relief from certain legislative and regulatory requirements, enabling them to test innovative products and services and to expand their offerings to consumers. This particular regulatory sandbox would apply to the Loan and Trust Corporations Act, the Credit Union Act, the ATB Financial Act, the Consumer Protection Act, the Financial Consumers Act, and the Personal Information Protection Act.

Technologies and innovations tested could include application programming interface services, soft tokens, or biometric authentication. A regulatory sandbox is another step forward in diversifying our economy and attracting investment, fostering innovation while at the same time reducing red tape. Alberta is putting itself on the map as a destination of choice for fintech and financial services companies.

Applicants for exemptions would need to meet a number of criteria and may be subject to a number of terms, conditions, and restrictions which the government would determine on a collaborative, case-by-case basis. For example, applicants would be required to maintain a physical presence in Alberta. They would have to offer financial products or services and provide a viable business plan, including details for testing their financial products along with a plan to exit the regulatory sandbox. Applicants would need to explain why each eligible product or service should be considered new and original or, at a minimum, why their offering is a material improvement or adaptation from an existing product or service. Exemptions would be denied for products and services that are already available in Alberta. Protections and oversight will ensure Albertans and consumers are protected, and all legislative exemptions would be disclosed publicly, to the point of the previous member.

The government has formed a working group to review applications comprised of officials from Treasury Board and Finance; Jobs, Economy and Innovation; and Service Alberta. In addition, the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner would also be consulted on any requests related to the Personal Information Protection Act, and their approval would be necessary for any exemptions.

The regulatory sandbox created by Bill 13 will be the first of its kind in Canada serving the finance and fintech sector. This legislation is one of the many ways our government is making Alberta the destination of choice for technology and innovation, and I encourage the members opposite and my colleagues to support it.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you. It's a pleasure to follow the Member for Calgary-South East and talk a little bit about this bill before us, Financial Innovation Act. I was listening carefully because of some of the information that the member was providing this House was very innovative: soft tokens, and there were two other things that he mentioned that I quickly tried to write down. But I guess I got hung up on soft tokens and thinking about that and the fact that what's before us is quite new. As we heard just a second ago, the regulatory sandbox will be established to allow for fintech products and services to work in the space, work in Alberta, and provide those new offerings to Albertans.

I've been reviewing some of the comments made both by the Minister of Finance and the critic for Finance and other MLAs on both sides speaking to this issue, and I've kind of narrowed down some things that I want to discuss about the Financial Innovation Act. I'll put them in this order. I'd like to talk about four things, the first being that this is new, and we as a government need to act in a responsible, reasonable way so that Albertans can be protected from the offerings that will come forward. In that regard there's going to be some judgments from various ministers' departments on those offerings and whether companies fit into this space.

I just wonder. My colleagues here have put forward the question about wondering if we have the adequate expertise. Do we have all the horses needed to be able to make sure we get there in terms of assessments of the products that are going to come forward or services or ideas that will be coming forward with business plans? While I was the Minister of Finance and TBF, I got to know some of the people in that ministry, and they're stellar, but I wonder if there's been work to build up their skill sets around this kind of offering of analysis of business cases. I think it's been talked about that the government may have to contract those services so that they have the necessary skill sets. That would be the first kind of concern I have.

Just with respect to that whole issue I can remember many years ago, several years ago, under previous PC governments, that there was a desire to approve new kinds of financial vehicles for Albertans, and that was payday loans. It was something that before – I think I've got the dates – 2005, perhaps 2006, wasn't available to the extent they became available after the government approved their use, their presence in this province and Albertans' ability to go and get payday loans. We know from the feedback of people who have gone to and continue to go to payday lenders that they get into a cycle of debt and dependency on getting the next loan and the next loan and the next loan. That was something that the PC government at the time felt would be a new offering, a new, innovative thing for Albertans to be able to access.

I can tell you that the work I did before I was elected in 2015 was to kind of chart and analyze the impact of payday lending on a portion of Calgary, southeast Calgary. I can't remember the number of payday lenders there were at the time, but on one strip in Calgary there were somewhere around 20 payday lenders. It could be said that there was far too much money going into the hands of cheque-cashing payday lenders and far too little staying in the hands of people who either didn't have bank accounts or had defaulted out of their bank account from overdrafts and other kinds of things that they had trouble paying off. Anyway, they got into a cycle of debt and could only get out of that debt by some of the programs that were being offered to people in the southeast part of Calgary at the time, savings programs leveraged up with monies from agencies and charitable organizations and other kinds of people who, like myself, wanted to see a healthier process of people getting cheques, going to banks, keeping their bank accounts.

You know, in the past the PC government of the day approved that service, and it was not a good service. When we came into government, in 2015, we reviewed the whole area of payday lending and curtailed, ratcheted back that whole industry to the benefit of many Albertans and Alberta, where more money was kept in the hands of people to invest in the economy, to pay for their own particular needs.

That's one area that – you know, does the government have the competency to know what's in the best interest and protect Albertans? They certainly didn't back in 2006, when that was introduced. I just wanted to put that on the record now in terms of: do we have all of the resources necessary to ensure that the products and ideas that will be offered under this act will be protective, will be in the best interest of Albertans? Many, many people will come in with limited knowledge, and they'll believe the advertising as opposed to the reality, so we need to ensure that that's there from the government competency protection end of things.

The next thing I'd like to speak to is trust generally, and I know that my colleague focused a lot on trust. This legislation gives, of course, power to the minister and various ministries to assess and analyze business plans coming forward. That potentially is a risk if that trust is mislaid and if power is abused. In that case that's a problem for Albertans, and they're the ones who are going to be holding the bag. Regulatory sandboxes have occurred, have taken place in this province already.

With regard to the Alberta Securities Commission, certainly when I was Finance minister, that commission did stellar work, and we together pushed back on the federal government at the time, who wanted to harmonize and bring under one securities commission all work. We felt that Alberta had a unique situation, circumstances that required to continue on its own in terms of an Alberta Securities Commission, and we were successful in that. I'm pleased to see that that's been continued under this government in terms of supporting the Alberta Securities Commission to the utmost so that they can continue to provide that support for our capital markets here.

I want to touch on the third thing, and that's with regard to disclosure to Albertans the ongoing work of those that are successful under this regulatory sandbox and will be offering products and ideas and services to Albertans. I think it's really incumbent that the government ensure that any company that makes it through that sandbox alerts the public that they are dealing with something novel and particularly risky. I just brought that up in relation to payday lending. Many people got into payday lending believing that they could essentially handle the situation, and there probably should have been – “more warning labels” is, I guess, a term – more disclosure not only by the companies but by government indicating that involvement in a company that you borrow money from that is a lender like that can quickly spiral out of control and lose control of the ability to not owe those lenders the thousands and thousands of dollars that sometimes their customers were into them for as a result of borrowing monies.

At this point it's not clear to me how these new products, services, or technologies will be, how the disclosures and how the warnings and how the information sharing with Albertans will occur. I think the bill talks about websites and information being shared in that regard. I just wonder if that's – I question whether that's enough, and I question whether Albertans will be savvy enough to do their homework to the extent that it needs to be done, because many didn't do their homework when they took out payday loans and believed that they could stay on top of that.

That's just an example, more an analogy than a direct connection to what's before us, but it is a learning situation. It is a learning incident that, I think, should give pause to government, to know that in the past Albertans gave way too much credence to the presence of that bricks-and-mortar building being there and believing that it was there for their best interest. For some people who were able to manage that – it never seemed to be a very large majority – that's a fine thing, but most that I knew and talked to were regretful of their involvement with payday lenders in particular.

I know that we need to stay current and stay on an innovative edge in this province, and I'm glad that we're doing that. I think we have some good examples of positive ways that we've done that, either through the Alberta Securities Commission, and some negative incidents. The risks of going down this road are clear, but it doesn't mean that we shouldn't try as long as we ensure that there are the significant considerations and belts and braces put in place.

With that said, Madam Chair, I'm going to take my seat.

The Chair: Are there others to speak to Bill 13 in Committee of the Whole? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to rise this afternoon to speak to the Financial Innovation Act, Bill 13. I've spoken to this bill before, and I will like to add a few more comments this afternoon as the government prepares to implement what they are calling a regulatory sandbox, the first jurisdiction in the country to do so.

I think it's an effort to regulate a burgeoning sector of the economy that we see lots of examples of in Alberta. I see from the explosion of small companies that are looking to enter into the fintech sector with various products and services that it was one which merits the attention of government and regulators because, of course, consumers need the protection that the government can provide from any unscrupulous operators who might wish to bring on a financial product or service that could put them at risk. Also, Madam Chair, there's the other element as well, that the government is going to really want to have to take a close look at how Alberta jobs are protected as we see more and more financial technologies develop and evolve which potentially eliminate Alberta workers here in the province.

One example of this, Madam Chair, arose this morning as I awoke to listen to CBC Radio. It talked about a company. It was a news item about a company which is a fast-food company which is looking to eliminate the need to have order takers on-site – in other words, a human being taking your food order on-site – in their location. What will happen instead is that there has been a new technology developed where, basically, a Zoom call will be made, or it will be constantly in progress, whereby the order will be taken by somebody anywhere in the world. It'll be on-screen. It'll be a digitally operated system where that individual order from somebody who's drawing up either to the drive-in or inside the restaurant, wanting to order takeout food, will be speaking to somebody who could be on the other side of the world. It could be anywhere in the world where the wages are lower.

Now, in this case the interviewer spoke about this particular company using workers in Nicaragua, where the wage rate is about $3.25 an hour. Now, granted, the cost of living in Nicaragua is much lower than it is here, but even on a pro-rated basis that seems like a huge discount towards – we would expect to pay somebody in Alberta a living wage to work and perform the same role. If indeed things like this, Madam Chair, successfully are rolled out by one company in a pilot project, one might potentially see this happen in the whole fast-food industry. You don't need to be a mathematician to really calculate the job losses that would happen in Alberta as a result of the implementation on a wide basis of this type of new financial technology or this new service in ordering fast food, as an example.

One of the reasons that the government not only has to look at consumer protection from the standpoint of fraud or from the standpoint of being overly risky but also from the standpoint of, “How will it affect Alberta employment?” is because many of the technologies that we see and the technology companies that are being developed will obviously involve looking at savings and bottom-line results for the companies that they are trying to market their services or products to. In this particular case I'm sure it looks mighty appealing to many fast-food chains to look at saving themselves $12 or more an hour on labour costs by replacing an Alberta worker with somebody who's in Nicaragua making $3.25 an hour on a Canadian-dollar scale.

That is something that – I don't know if it's really contemplated by the minister as yet in the Financial Innovation Act, but it certainly got my attention when I was listening to the report on CBC this morning about a major fast-food chain adopting this practice on a pilot level, or a pilot scale. If indeed those kinds of savings are available, the ability to eliminate Alberta workers in favour of a remotely operated Nicaraguan worker or somebody elsewhere in the world who is working for $3.25 an hour, that's a bit of a daunting thought.

Now, we do of course have, as a result of the pandemic, a shortage of those workers in that hospitality field, and that's largely caused by the problematic low wages that are involved in that field, but of course businesses will opt, if they can, if it's legally permitted, to go ahead and participate in something that's going to save them that type of a percentage on their labour cost by eliminating Alberta jobs and offshoring something as simple as ordering food at a fast-food restaurant.

It wasn't something that we could have contemplated a few short years ago, Madam Chair, but lo and behold, there are technologies that have been practised by us and everyone around the world during the pandemic that have gained strident use, and the public uptake of things like Zoom is pretty widespread. This particular fintech company has acknowledged that and implemented a pilot project with a major fast-food chain that could change the labour market in the fast-food industry. It's something that should be on the radar of the Alberta government if it is indeed concerned about protecting Alberta jobs.

Now, granted, offshoring labour and offshoring work to lower cost jurisdictions is not a new thing. Our utility companies do it. Banks do it. It's a fairly widespread phenomenon. Notwithstanding that, this is an expansion, and possibly a large expansion, of that offshoring and exportation of Alberta jobs that the government might want to consider looking at when it's regulating within the sandbox the new fintech companies. It's something that I wanted to bring up and know and understand if indeed it is in the purview of the government when it comes to the Financial Innovation Act and the regulations therein.

I'm not sure if indeed that's something that we may be able to hear about from the government. Let's see if indeed that is something that they have any thoughts on. That was one of the interesting pieces of the evolution of the fintech industry that I've come across very recently, and I thought it was pretty germane to bring forward this afternoon in debate. If you try to calculate just the number of workers that would be eliminated if indeed the fast-food industry adopted across the board this digitized order-taking system, you quickly come into the tens of thousands of Alberta jobs that would be lost. That's worthy of some serious consideration. If indeed we are going to be regulating these industries, we may want to take a look at what effect the adoption of that fintech strategy involved in some of these companies would have on employment. It's a concern at a time when our young people are having, really, a difficult time at significant step-up jobs, that we will be perhaps exporting a whole category of entry-level jobs out of the country. It's a serious consideration.

I'm also concerned about financial products being exempted from consumer protection. I know that the intent, I believe, is to make sure that the novel ideas that are contained in many of the new fintech companies, whether it be a point-of-sale system or a new method of payroll or what have you – there's a vast panoply of different types of ideas and small niche opportunities that entrepreneurs have found in Alberta and are developing technologies to serve a need that they see available to them, but indeed the risk, of course, is that some of these can be abused. The consumer protections that need to be put in place are something that Albertans are rightfully concerned about because it's such a new field. It's one that I think regulators have to be careful about because it is a novel and rapidly evolving field of enterprise.

As a result of that, consumers feel that they are at risk of things that they may not be fully aware of, and as a result I think there's a special responsibility on the part of the government within this regulatory sandbox to ensure that certainly there's a wide berth given to the development of products and services, but that has to be balanced with the protection of consumers. That protection should never be sacrificed at the mercy of giving totally free rein to the new companies that have a developing technology that they wish to bring to the market.

The guiding principle should always be and the overriding principle should always be that our consumers are protected, and not only the individual members of the public, Madam Chair, when I talk about consumers. Many of these businesses, many of these new fintech companies that are being developed are business-to-business platforms. So there is a possibility that an individual business that wishes to take advantage of an opportunity to apply the technologies made available by a new fintech service or product could potentially be put at risk as a result. There are wide opportunities for potential abuse if indeed it's not properly monitored.

That's the responsibility of the provincial government when making this regulatory sandbox, that the oversight is there for businesses, large and small, that might take advantage of these new products and services and for the individual consumers who potentially would be at risk. On the individual basis, we're thinking more and more about data and privacy and loss of data and looking at personal identity being at risk. I'm not sure how well and deeply this has been contemplated in the legislation before us. In these exemptions that the minister is contemplating allowing within this sandbox is an inherent risk that there will be unscrupulous operators who would seek to operate within the smokescreen of those exemptions and take advantage of the public or businesses that they sell their products or service to.

The sector is a big employer right now, 60,000 people in the financial services sector. It's a large section of our economy. But the biggest concern, I guess, apart from the protection items, the consumer protection items inherent in this regulatory sandbox that the minister is looking to assemble with this legislation, is that the Minister of Finance is simply asking us to trust him. Once again, it's a theme that's been consistent with this government, whether it's asking us to trust them when they burned $1.3 billion on a pipeline that didn't exist and was known to face opposition from the U.S. government. They made that bet knowing that it was – they were betting against the house, and they lost that bet. It was $1.3 billion up in smoke. Certainly, there was no protection for Albertans there. The government made that bet knowing that it was probably going to fail.

Somebody who consistently has billions of dollars of accounting errors in his budget is not somebody whose trust we should be allowing him to have. We shouldn't be giving our trust to that individual Finance minister. Simply put, the track record of this government when asking for the trust of Albertans hasn't been good. It doesn't breed a culture of trust when we listen to what the government is actually doing in terms of taking risks on behalf of the Alberta taxpayer. Giving away a $4.7 billion tax break to major corporations, who, of course, took it offshore or paid back dividends: the minister, of course, asked us to trust them that that money would be invested on a trickle-down basis to Albertans, and of course that didn't happen. It was money that disappeared.

The ability to trust somebody is something that is earned, Madam Chair. Albertans in this province, clearly, are having great difficulty trusting the government. That's something we hear over and over on the doorsteps, right from one end of the province to the other.

Quite often, Madam Chair, if you're looking at a potential election that's coming up in any given jurisdiction in a western democracy, if indeed people feel that they're economically going to be better off in the future and they're hopeful, they'll sustain the government; if indeed they feel that they're fearful and that things are going to get worse, the government will potentially fall.

But those two rules or those two norms are coupled now with something that's a little bit different, and it really is a significant matter as we approach a potential election season in this province, and that is the matter of trust. It seems to be overriding anything. Like, the government has fallen into an absolute windfall with their treasury receiving billions of dollars in oil royalties as a result of geopolitical situations that exist in the world today, and, notwithstanding that, because of their own trials and tribulations leadershipwise within their own party and the turmoil and the schism that they've got going on there and because of the gambles that they've taken with Albertans' tax dollars over the course of their tenure in the last three years or so, that trust has been broken.

Because of the way that the health care system has been managed during the pandemic, because of the way that doctors have been treated, starting off with having a contract torn up, like, a bona fide, legitimate, signed contract destroyed by the government that was a party to the contract, that is something that is beyond the pale. Who does that, Madam Chair? Well, obviously, it's a government that is not concerned necessarily about the trust of this population. That was one of the first steps that went a long way to taking away a pillar of the trust that governments hope to have.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to rise and make a few comments and join debate in Committee of the Whole. I'm going to put my comments into two categories. I would like to respond to, I think, some of the thoughtful observations and comments from the Member for Calgary-Buffalo around both the value and perhaps some of the risks taken with a financial services regulatory sandbox.

The member was right to raise the concern around consumer protection. Consumer protection is critically important. I have to say, Madam Chair, as we were doing our policy work, as we were looking at other jurisdictions that had gone before us with this kind of a mechanism, with a financial services regulatory sandbox, that was a question I had. In fact, I posed the question to my officials, the officials that the Member for Calgary-Buffalo would know well. My question was: given the fact that we have other jurisdictions that have gone before us with this type of mechanism, have there been examples of where consumers' privacy has been materially breached or where consumers have experienced loss? In other words, have there been events and instances where a product offering has gone off the rails? That is a concern of mine, and the members are right to raise it.

The answer to that, Madam Chair, was that there were no documented instances where there was a material loss by consumers or a material breach of privacy. So while that does not absolve this government and future governments of the responsibility to take every care and precaution in protecting the privacy and the information of Albertans to ensure that Alberta consumers are fully protected, it gave me confidence to continue forward with this initiative and with this mechanism. We have identified a number of data points, in fact.

Transparency is critically important. Again, I've heard that from the members opposite, and they're right to raise it. Transparency is critically important. There are a number of terms and conditions that the minister of the day can impose on an applicant, on a project proponent, on a company, business who would want to utilize this sandbox and offer a product with certain exemptions. But there's also going to be public information that will be required. I'm just going to go through that required public information.

The government will make the following information public on a website: the name of each sandbox participant issued a certificate of acceptance; a description of the product or service each sandbox participant is offering; a list of regulatory exemptions provided to each sandbox participant; any terms, conditions, or restrictions imposed by the minister on a sandbox participant; the expiry date of any participant's certificate of acceptance; as well as any amendment, revocation, and cancellation of a certificate of acceptance.

Madam Chair, a certificate can be revoked by the minister, and that's an important feature here to head off perhaps a product offering that is rolling out in a different way than it was envisioned. So, yes, consumer protection is critically important, transparency is critically important, and certainly we've considered those two essential features, and they are included, and rightfully so, in our approach.

I do want to make just a couple of comments in response to the Member for Edmonton-McClung, because while certainly a number of his comments I think were related to the bill, I have to say that that member went off. You know, this is Committee of the Whole time. I would like to discuss the details of the bill, but I do have to respond, Madam Chair, to a couple of the comments. Firstly, the notion, the insinuation that somehow we have been ultimately producing and presenting financial statements in material error: that's simply not been the case. We've had a clean audit report in every year-end financial audit that the Auditor General has conducted on behalf of this government. That's critically important. That's critically important, as I think all members on both sides of this House would appreciate.

You know, I can talk about the function of an auditor at year-end. An auditor engages typically a client, in this case the government of Alberta and various departments, on appropriate accounting treatment on complex issues. That does occur, and that takes place. It certainly took place with our government, and it took place with the members opposite. That's a reality. But that in no way, shape, or form means that the financial statements are anything but integral. I think it's critical that Albertans understand that and know that the financial statements presented by the government of Alberta are, in fact, integral and, in fact, have received a clean audit report.

I just have to make one comment with respect to our approach to positioning the Alberta economy for disproportionate investment attraction, because the member again talked about our job-creation tax cut. The fact that we reduced corporate taxes, business taxes, by a full one-third: that was not a giveaway. The member alludes to that as a giveaway; it's not a giveaway. In fact, we're just taking less from business owners and groups – businesses, companies, and others – who invest in this province and create jobs and create wealth, from which we all benefit.

Madam Chair, again, I just have to cite the fact and recognize that the business tax rate is only one feature of many that make up a business environment, either very competitive or not as competitive, but it is an essential feature, and it's an important feature. In fact, I can cite Fortune Minerals, who are planning to build a significant processing plant, refinery just outside of Edmonton. They cited the location, the geography relative to an important rail line, and the preferential corporate tax rate. Those were the criteria that ultimately landed them in Alberta. It does matter. That's reflected, again, in the budget that we presented and passed and the fact that, again, the corporate tax rate is just one feature of many in a competitive business environment.

But as we've worked hard to position this province to be most competitive, to have the most attractive business environment possible, we are seeing investment pour in, with announcements week after week, even these days. All that is to say that by reducing corporate income taxes and by modernizing our regulatory environment, I believe we will create the conditions for increased investment attraction, greater wealth creation, expanded fiscal capacity, and higher government revenues to pay for those important programs such as health and education and supporting our most vulnerable. It was no giveaway, Madam Chair. It was simply positioning this province for growth, wealth creation, and future prosperity.

Lastly, the member talked about our fiscal management in a bit of a disparaging way and, again, threw out the fact that, you know, we have a better fiscal result simply and only because of higher energy prices. That's simply not true. We used very cautious, credible WTI projections, oil price projections, projections of $70 in the current year, $69 in the mid-year, and $66.50 in the out-year. Madam Chair, again I will remind all members of this House that had we continued on the spending trajectory we inherited from the previous government, we would not be showing a balanced budget but a $6 billion deficit. That's a fact.

Madam Chair, again, I take exception to those comments. I'm very interested in debating this bill. I'm very interested in hearing from members across the way on this bill: some of the advantages, the opportunities, the risks, and the perils. Let's focus on this bill. Let's focus on ensuring this economy is positioned not only for growth but for diversification. I believe that's a goal that we all share in this House. Let's continue to focus on that goal, and this bill, I believe, further advances the effort and the objective of economic growth and diversification.

The Chair: Are there others that wish to join the debate on Bill 13? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thanks, Madam Chair. Yeah, actually, I'm very excited to get a chance to maybe go back and forth here with the minister a little bit. I was keying in on some of the comments of my friend from Edmonton-McClung. Back during the NDP government I got the opportunity to serve as the Alberta representative on CSG, got to attend a couple of PNWER meetings as well. I was actually invited as a panelist to one discussion around disruptive technologies. Back at that time it was right when Uber was starting to come into Alberta, essentially upsetting the entire cab industry in the province. At least speaking for Alberta, there is significant monetary investment for cab drivers with regard to licences and that.

Some of the other things that we started talking about – my friend brought up around remote cashiers. I started thinking about the self-serve tills at different stores versus actually having a cashier there. You know, the most famous one, I think, going way back in time, is when cars were built exclusively by people, and then, of course, automation and robots came in, which, unfortunately, started taking jobs away from those individuals. Here in Alberta we have examples of driverless trucks in our energy industry. I think I heard once, for instance – I could be wrong about the company – that I believe it was Suncor that had purchased a hundred of these driverless trucks, which means that now there are a hundred people that don't have jobs in that area. I mean, innovation is going to go, new technologies will come in, and things like that.

I guess that when we're thinking about Bill 13 and financial innovation, I mean, let's think about how at one point in time everybody would go to the bank to deposit their cheque and do their business with the teller there and everything like that. Then, of course, the Internet came in, and all of a sudden we could do our banking online. We had a whole bunch of customer service representatives in the banking industry who lost their jobs. Now, ultimately there were some folks that still just would not do their banking online, and I was probably one of those holdouts for a little while, but even I eventually transitioned.

When we're talking about disruptive technologies and, you know, creating that sandbox for that innovation and testing those things, I guess the question would be: are there any kinds of provisions that this government will be looking at – and I'm not one hundred per cent sure if maybe that is addressed in Bill 13 – where the government might be, I guess, reviewing some of these new innovations or technologies that come in that on the surface sound very exciting and look like great opportunities but then, as my friend from Edmonton-McClung had said, might end up costing Albertans their jobs, like this new one of going in to order some food from somebody that's not even in the country, serving that person?

I'm wondering if, maybe by chance, the minister has any ideas on how that kind of thing could be mitigated or, you know, any plans to review some of these things so that rather than after the fact of a lot of people losing – because once they've lost their jobs, that's it. It's pretty much done. Maybe go into a little bit on any kind of plans where, if we do identify a disruptive technology – and I don't want that to sound negative. Those were just kind of some of the words that were used at the time to try to mitigate or help those folks out that might be finding themselves out of a job with a disruptive technology. I'd be interested to hear some of the comments on that.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. Pleased to rise and make a few comments with respect to the question posed, I think a fair question posed. You know, as we take a look back through even recent history, there's always a tension between moving forward with innovation, with new technology, with new and novel ideas and methodology. There's a tension between what's gained in that approach and who might be left behind. That's a fair question, and it's a tension that I believe needs to be evaluated. I would suggest it's a tension that I believe we need to consider, but I believe that tension should not hold us back from stepping into the future but stepping into the future in a responsible, careful way.

One requirement for an applicant to be successful to get a product into the sandbox – in other words, a product that would receive some exemptions and some special terms to be offered in a limited way to test effectively here in the province of Alberta – is that that product would need to be new or novel. In other words, it could not be a product that an existing financial institution is already offering, and it would have to demonstrate some benefit to the public. Now, that benefit may be in a new or novel product that we can't access today, or it could drive an efficiency that ultimately, in a competitive world, in a competitive financial services industry, will drive that efficiency and cost savings to Albertans and to consumers. Again, not just any idea is going to pass the bar. The product needs to be new and novel, and it has to demonstrate the likelihood, probability of some benefit.

With respect to the tension between moving forward with innovation and technology adoption and some of the risks that that can pose to, you know, folks all of a sudden finding that they don't have a job, that maybe they don't have a career, and that maybe they have to retrain, again, I appreciate that question, and I appreciate the tension. But, Madam Chair, I believe we need to, in spite of that tension, move forward with innovation and technology adoption for a couple of reasons. Firstly, historically we can look back at industry after industry where there was transformational change, massive efficiency and productivity gains that ultimately required far fewer people to create as much or more product.

I can look at agriculture. I've got a bit of a background in agriculture. If we take a look at agriculture 75 or 100 years ago, I mean, we were an agrarian society. Certainly, you know, up to probably the 1940s we were an agriculture society in many ways. So many people worked in agriculture. Our productivity was low. We were an agriculture powerhouse in Canada, but our productivity was low. And we were not unique. That was a global phenomenon at the time. But the green revolution came along. Ultimately, bioscience moved forward very aggressively. Plant breeding was taken on, and our genetics improved drastically. Agronomy moved forward very significantly. There was a much better understanding of what plants would need, what agricultural animal production would need in order to increase production and efficiency.

Then there was the technology revolution with respect to technology employed in production practices. Again, whether that was in the production animal agriculture or whether that was in crop science, all of that combined ultimately allowed us in this country and in other developed countries to produce exponentially more agriculture products with exponentially fewer people. No doubt at the time there were concerns around: "What are all these people in rural Alberta or rural Canada going to do? How will they ever get a job? How will they ever transition?" Those would have been real concerns of the day, and I'm hearing those concerns, legitimately, today. When we take a look back at history, we see that a new economy, innovation technology, requires different skill sets, but it requires people. It requires engagement.

Right now in agriculture we have tens of thousands of people that work in high-tech agriculture fields in this province, occupations and professions that couldn't have been envisioned 50 or 60 or 70 years ago. Instead of having, you know, an army of folks working in very laborious types of work in the fields, that work is done by only a few by using technology. Now we have folks working in research and development. We have folks working with soil mapping. We have folks working in cloud-based technologies that have moved the agriculture industry forward exponentially, which, I might add, is very important as we have a growing global population. So a bit of a long answer.

I really believe, with respect to financial services, that the same will be true. If we fail to move forward, our competitors will move forward, and we will simply be left behind. We will not be able to hold back our economy for the sake of ensuring that there's no change or disruption, to use the member's term appropriately. We, I believe, will have to embrace the future, and Bill 13 is about embracing the future. Is there some risk? There's always some risk, but I believe that as a province we need to move forward. As a province, that's our legacy. That's our history. We are a province, we are a people that are prepared to step out and take risks. I believe that Bill 13 and the creation of a regulatory sandbox, the provision of exemptions when a company or business wants to offer new and novel products, is a way to step forward into the future, not without its risk. I appreciate the member raising the concern, but I believe we should and will and must step forward to embrace the future and this technology.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act. I'd just also note that I appreciate the comments we've been hearing from the Finance minister and that he is actively participating in this debate and providing further information. That is certainly laudable and appreciated.

I recognize the importance and the value of looking at financial innovation. We've certainly seen opportunities arise, and if I may take a moment to tell a bit of a personal story, I've certainly seen some benefit myself. You know, a few years ago, back in 2016, I needed to make a purchase online, and for the purchase that I needed to make, the only option that that seller would accept was Bitcoin. This was something that was fairly new to me, certainly not something that I had any of, but I needed to make that purchase, so I purchased a small amount of Bitcoin so that I could do that transaction online. I was left with a small amount of Bitcoin left over, a trifling amount – it was maybe a few dollars – and I forgot about that Bitcoin. It sat there in that digital wallet for a number of years.

Just last year I received an e-mail notification that says: "Hey, by the way, it's been a while. We're going to shut down this account. You may want to just check and see if everything is okay." I said, "Well, sure." It was a little bit of jumping through hoops, took a little bit of work to go through and get in and reaccess that account, but when I did, I found out that that small amount of Bitcoin that I had left there was worth well over $2,000. I can't claim, Madam Chair, that that was any savvy investment on my part, that I had done deep studies, say, of the likes of Mr. Pierre Poilievre, who's a big fan of these things. I can't say that I have his level of expertise when it comes to digital currency, but it turned out that having that small amount, hey, did end up yielding a considerable benefit.

Of course, I also recognize that for folks that are getting involved in these things, there is appreciable risk. Certainly, I know that, to my understanding, the value of Bitcoin has gone up and down quite a bit over the years. Certainly, there have been some who have benefited, and there have been some who have lost. Financial innovation can be very interesting, and offering new products and new opportunities for folks can be very interesting. It can potentially be beneficial. It can be very tempting for folks, but it can also come with a downside.

You know, I think about back in 2008, when we had the burst of the housing bubble in the U.S. We had a significant stock market crash, and that came about for a number of factors, a number of reasons. I mean, certainly, there were a number of people who were taking subprime mortgages who were not really in a financial position to be able to cover that. There were folks who were sort of taking advantage of the existence of these things, different investors, and approaching at times, to my understanding, some misrepresentation and taking advantage of that. Certainly, there were concerns about how some mortgage brokers were going about making those mortgages and those loans.

But, certainly, we also had folks who were trading in bundles of these subprime mortgages. That, of course, was a new product on the market, and that was something that a lot of people were getting involved in. Certainly, a number of people were making large amounts of money doing this, and they were considered to be very smart and savvy investors at the time, but we saw how that resulted. That ended up with thousands and thousands and thousands of people, hundreds of thousands of people, having to default on their mortgages, losing their homes. It led to a massive stock market crash. It led to a serious impact on our economy, to the point where Prime Minister Harper himself, one of the more conservative Prime Ministers we've had, had to actually move forward with a stimulus budget, something I can say – I think all would agree – he was very, very reluctant to have to do. But the impact was that severe not only for the U.S. economy but for Canada.

Now, I'm not suggesting that any of the products that are likely to be developed in this regulatory sandbox that's being proposed by the Minister of Finance are going to be of that kind of a scale. That is certainly a more extreme example, but it is a cautionary tale, Madam Chair, of what can potentially happen. While I personally can tell a story of a real benefit, there are also many who can tell stories of real harm.

Now, that, in and of itself, is not a reason to be against this legislation. I think that in all situations, as the minister himself said just now, as he was talking about impacts on employment, we always have to weigh possible gain versus possible risk. And what the minister is proposing here, to my understanding, with this regulatory sandbox is creating a smaller area in which to try some of these ideas out to minimize the amount of risk that might come. If we find something that is successful within the confines of this regulatory sandbox, there could be an opportunity then to expand that to regulate something in a way that could potentially provide a larger benefit through a larger scale deployment in the financial services sector. And again I would say that that is not an unreasonable approach.

I certainly appreciate the thoughts, you know, that the minister brought forward as he was just talking now about the importance of diversification, trying new ideas. Certainly, that is a refreshing change from his remarks in late 2019, when he declared diversification a luxury at a time when his government was taking away all of the government supports for our tech and innovation industry, including some that had existed long before our government had been in place and that existed in every other province in Canada, like the SRED credit. But as I've noted in previous debate, this government has had a Damascus road experience when it comes to the tech and innovation industry, and certainly there have been some great improvements in their policy towards it.

But, really, the key issue here is a question of trust. Can Albertans trust that if they purchase these products, that if they engage in products that are developed within this regulatory sandbox, they are going to be adequately protected? It seems quite clear that the minister feels that it is the role of government to take those steps to protect them, to provide that consumer protection. He talked about how they looked at other jurisdictions to see whether they'd taken that step, what concerns there might be, talked with the officials, asked: have there been any examples of consumers' privacy being materially breached?

He said that, no, in fact, there were no documented cases of that, which is great to hear, Madam Chair, particularly since, you know, that was a concern that came up, at least, when I was at committee recently with my private member's bill, where government members, in their words, said that they could not let that bill go forward because they were concerned about privacy impacts. I noted at the time that members of this government were very happy to pass Bill 46 back in the fall of 2020, a bill in which there had been no consultation with the Information and Privacy Commissioner, which she flagged as severely concerning and indeed potentially taking Alberta backwards on the protection of Albertans' private health information, but the members of this government party rejected every single amendment that was based on the recommendations from that Information and Privacy Commissioner and voted in favour of that legislation.

So it's good to hear that in this instance the Finance minister is indeed considering that aspect here, but it does lead me to question how this government approaches these sorts of situations. Again, here we have the government speaking up and saying: "Okay. Well, we believe we can provide adequate protection for Albertans who are facing potential risk from products that are developed within this regulatory sandbox. Indeed, it's been our job to do so, and we are capable of doing so." Yet when my colleague from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview brought forward his Bill 203 to establish an Alberta venture fund, these same members of that committee said that they were deeply concerned that, you know, this would look like the government was endorsing something that was potentially very risky for Albertans, that they felt that that was a reason that bill could simply not even be debated in the Legislature.

But here we are with the government bringing forward a bill which, again, will allow Albertans to make investments which potentially may be very risky for them, and suddenly the tune is different because it's coming from their Finance minister as opposed to a member of the opposition. In the last few days I've heard members of the government toss the word "hypocritical" at me and my colleagues. Well, I think it certainly fits here.

That said, I appreciated the remarks that the minister provided and the conversations he had with officials. They looked at whether there had been any privacy issues. They looked at whether any product offerings had gone off the rails, and there was apparently no documented case that they could find of a material loss for a consumer under a previous regulatory sandbox, products developed in such in another jurisdiction. Certainly, I appreciate that the minister considered that and looked at those particular issues.

I certainly agree with him that transparency is critically important, and as he noted, there are terms and conditions that the minister can impose. There are requirements for what must be posted online around exemptions, terms and conditions, restrictions, expiry date, amendments or revocation or cancellation of a certificate. But, again, Madam Chair, I would note that these government members, at least the ones that were at that committee, were deeply concerned about Albertans' ability to understand products that were put in front of them, financial products like the Alberta venture fund, so I have to ask, then: are we absolutely sure that government can and will provide this information in a way that is understandable by Albertans? It's excellent that this information has to be posted online, but the question is: how will this information be posted, in what kind of a format?

Certainly, Madam Chair, I am not someone who has delved deeply into financial services. Certainly, I have a financial adviser. I certainly appreciate their advice. We have conversations about how to invest for my RRSP and other things, but it is not a personal area of expertise. I am not sure that if this was put up on the website in fairly technical language, it would be something that I could say that I felt confident reading and being able to make a decision on. Now, perhaps the kinds of products that are being envisioned here are for folks who are more experienced. Perhaps that will be made clear. I haven't heard clearly on that from the minister, whether this is envisioned as something that's going to be for the general populace, for the average person, who may not have a high degree of literacy in financial services and products, or whether this is intended more specifically for those who do have that level of expertise and may perhaps be browsing and considering these on behalf of clients. That would be something I'd be interested in hearing a bit more clarity on.

The other thing that occurred to me as the minister was speaking on this point is: will there be – and again I’m not aware of it in the bill, but perhaps I’ve overlooked – or are there any limits or requirements on how these products may be advertised or promoted? That is the other question. Certainly, making these products available and having certain fences around them within the regulatory sandbox and certain requirements to be posted online, but the question is again: if these are products that are going to be offered to average Albertans, what requirements are there about how these products are described in advertisement or promoted, or how can they be promoted? Can one of these companies simply take out a Facebook ad and say, “Click here?” Could they just be put out on social media? Can they run advertising on television? What steps are allowed to be taken?

It’s possible that the minister is simply saying that these would be handled like any other financial product, that they would simply have the fences within. But then again, given that these are, for lack of a better term, experimental and certainly subject to unique conditions, are there provisions that that must be included and must be noted when these products are in fact being promoted? I think these are important considerations because, again, the largest component that we have here is trust. I appreciated what the minister laid out about the due diligence he has done and discussions he has had with his staff.

Certainly, if I may stray for a moment into the more political, as all members in this House are wont to do from time to time, Albertans have reasons to question trust in this particular Finance minister for some of the decisions that he has brought forward on behalf of his government; for example, this government’s insistence on continuing to dally with the idea of an Alberta pension plan when certainly the numbers do not seem to suggest that that would necessarily be a wise investment on behalf of Albertans, that there could be costs involved, and that a vast majority of Albertans do not want it. But this minister continues to say that they are considering it.

This minister sits at the cabinet table, where this government continues to pursue potentially the idea of an Alberta provincial police force, which again would raise costs for Albertans and would create new risks for municipalities in terms of the rising costs and put more burden on the backs of Albertans. They want to potentially force Albertans to make that investment despite the fact that Albertans have been very clear, two-thirds, that they do not support that idea.

When we were talking about trust in a government, that’s certainly a considerable issue that – of course, this minister was also at the table and writing the cheques for the $1.3 billion on a pipeline that went nowhere as the Premier insulted elected leaders in the U.S., an investment that cost Albertans and for which they have received nothing. Now, again, Madam Chair, I freely admit that that is stepping more into the political than the direct question of this bill, but it is fact nonetheless.

We do, though, have questions, and we’ll continue to ask. Certainly, there is the potential that we will support this bill under the parameters that are set out. But we do continue to look at it and question and ask about some aspects, the power to exempt some of these new financial products from consumer protection laws. Now, I just outlined some of the basic concerns that would be there and some of the things I’m certainly curious about in how these products may be promoted, sort of how they may be advertised, how they may be put across, who may bring them forward, what shape they might take, how they might be described. Certainly, with the minister having the power to choose to exempt some of these products from existing consumer protection laws, that is something that should be very, very carefully guarded. That is a large power.

I know at times this government has been very fond of awarding some fairly wide and sweeping powers to its ministers. I recall Bill 10, the concerns that were raised around that, and then an entire summer in a committee that had to be spent and an entire bill of amending to undo the very things the government had been warned about.

Again, it is worth asking: what safeguards are going to be around the minister exercising this kind of power on something that could potentially impact Albertans? I appreciate, again, that the minister has talked about having considered this and looked at other jurisdictions, but the fact is that we are talking about new and innovative products.

My understanding is that Treasury Board and Finance, in fact, does not necessarily have the requisite experience on hand for this kind of work. They do not currently have anyone necessarily within the ministry who understands and has expertise in these particular kinds of new, innovative financial products. I’m assuming that the minister himself does not have this expertise, or at least he certainly has not indicated that he has.

Certainly, if he has experience in this, then I would be interested to hear it, but I think he is likely then, in making his decisions around which exemptions he might grant, going to be very reliant on expertise from his department, expertise that the department does not currently have. That was what we were told in the technical briefing from officials, that it might well be the case that Treasury Board and Finance does not currently have the expertise they need, but if required, they could put someone on contract. I would certainly suggest, Madam Chair, that that would be required.

I think that if we are going to have government making these kinds of decisions – and, again, members of this government have expressed their deep concern about how Albertans may be misled or may lack information or the ability to understand something as basic as an Alberta venture fund, so I imagine they are equally concerned, then, with these kinds of complex and new innovative products, that Albertans may have challenges there as well and may be potentially put at risk.

Certainly, I think it’s essential that the minister has expertise available to him to sit down and have these conversations, to provide him with much-needed guidance before making decisions like exempting some of these products from existing consumer protection laws. It’s certainly my hope that the minister is preparing for that now. I admit that, of course, we don’t want to presume the will of the Legislature and which direction we might vote, but certainly I would hope that they are starting to look at that possibility and consider individuals that could be sought out to provide that advice and expertise should this bill pass.

I think Albertans have a lot of trust in their financial institutions in general. You know, I can be fairly sure that when I put dollars in my savings account, it will still be there tomorrow. I have fairly good protections and assurances that when I make that investment in my RRSP, it will continue, those dollars will be there. I generally trust my bank with my mortgage. Albertans consider dealing with financial services companies as safe, and they should. In line with that, then, that ties in with what I have been saying. Albertans have that feeling of safety.

The Chair: Are there others to join debate on Bill 13? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Chair. It’s my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 13 in committee. You know, seeing that we’re in committee and it was lovely to see the Finance minister pop up and correct the record or try to add some comments based on what was said, before I go into some of the other comments that were made and some of my concerns about this legislation, first, let me say that I actually generally am in support of this particular piece of legislation. I would like to get some additional information around some of the concerns we've raised.

The Finance minister, a few speakers ago, actually, you know, talked about how awesome the government books were. Fair enough. I mean, the Auditor General has certainly issued a clean audit. However, I would like to add a few comments there, and I would like to qualify that. If you think back to 2020, there was a special auditor's report issued, and as a result the UCP government needed to correct a few actually fairly significant errors in order to get a clean audit. I think it's important that we get that on the record and that we don't forget this.

At the time our Auditor General, Doug Wylie, actually flagged $1.6 billion worth of accounting blunders and oversights. There are three of them specifically: a couple of really big-ticket item ones and then one smaller one. The first one, of course, you will recall, was KXL. He noted that the government had to make a $100 million adjustment to the KXL pipeline investment. The government made that investment before the fiscal year-end, he said, but the money wasn't reflected in the proper balance sheet. The Auditor General also said that the government failed to update its cash-flow model for the Sturgeon refinery after prices cratered earlier in that year, which was 2020, due to COVID-19 and a global oil price war, leading to a recommended $795 million adjustment in expenses. Madam Chair, that's a pretty big error.

There was also another one that I talked about a little bit yesterday. It was an error around reporting expenses in the correct year. There was $152 million added to costs for two income support programs, those being assured income for the severely handicapped and, of course, the other one being income support itself; that was, barriers to employment and expected to work. The problem, as I explained yesterday, was that the government stated that they were changing the payment dates to help Albertans, which we know is not true and ended up causing a fair amount of harm. Now, there were some reasons that they shared that, you know, probably could have flown, but at the end of the day there was harm. There was not enough notice. The big problem, as pointed out by the Auditor General of Alberta, is that 12 months of expenses were not recorded in the 12 months of the fiscal year, so the UCP government had to correct that error.

Overall, there were – what did I say? – $1.6 billion in accounting errors, blunders, actually, that needed to be corrected in order to get the glowing report that the Finance minister talked about. So I just wanted to correct that.

Moving on, I think that we've heard again and again and again in this place that there is a lack of trust for this government. You know, let's be honest. There's probably not a lot of trust for any government around the world for a variety of reasons, but this one in particular, this particular government, the UCP government, is a government that has a huge trust deficit. So whenever we see a piece of legislation, I sort of look at it as: I think that this government needs to prove to Albertans that they have Albertans' backs, that they are indeed going to do what they say and Albertans will be protected and, actually, life will be made better by that particular piece of legislation. While I will be happy to support a bill that assists in diversifying the economy, that creates opportunity, and that supports innovation – I'm happy to do that – I would like some additional information.

As I mentioned before, one of the concerns that we have is that there is a power to exempt new financial products from consumer protections laws that can easily be abused. Now, you know, don't get me wrong. I am not saying that companies that are able to use this regulatory sandbox, as it were – I'm not saying that their intent will be malicious in any way. I'm just saying that it's best to prevent problems before they happen.

Some of the new problems, you know, with fintech or whatever – and my colleague was really eloquent in describing some of them – are that sometimes these new financial products or these new innovative products have the same problems but just in a new form. For example, a loan is still a loan, electronic payments are still electronic payments, and they come with all of the potential sort of hazards or problems that the original products, or now kind of the old-fashioned products, come along with. However, we've had many years to establish some consumer protections around those older products that we may not see with a new one, with an innovative one that is able to use the regulatory sandbox.

My colleague also mentioned, that I would like to reiterate, a lack of transparency around cost and business models. Often these very new and innovative products can appear to be free or low cost, but they may not be. Sometimes there are hidden costs that don't even appear until after you're into the use of the app or the new product or whatever it may be, and they don't even appear until after you sign up and you're in the process. Sometimes those costs aren't necessarily sort of – the costs aren't financial. Maybe it's a cost around data sharing and, you know, all of those problems that come into play around sharing data and personal information.

This might not sound like a big deal when we're talking about this sort of innovative regulatory sandbox, but if you think about the vulnerabilities of some Albertans – and I would hope that products like this, like the ones we're talking about, would be open and accessible to all Albertans. There are some issues around very simple things like no human records, lack of consumer or customer service, or what happens when things go wrong. You know, I heard my colleague talk a little bit about his very interesting Bitcoin experience, but he had the wherewithal to actually figure out how to go back and find an old account and follow the steps required to do the work he needed to do to see that he ended up doing pretty well after the fact. But what about people that don't? That is often why we have some really basic consumer protections, to provide those safeties and securities for people that may not have the same level of skill.

Fast and easy sometimes causes a lot of problems. You know, fast and easy credit sometimes will create fast and easy debt. Sometimes a lack of regulation or the lack of oversight, the lack of consumer protection will sort of draw in people that perhaps don't have the wherewithal or the ability or shouldn't actually be incurring the additional debt. Sometimes slick mobile apps or things, different products like that, can gloss over or can miss some important protections.

Financial technologies or financial innovations, technological innovations, sandboxes – I mean, it's great. I think that this piece of legislation is building on something that has obviously started. It's nice to see for once sort of government reacting quickly and being innovative and trying to get ahead of things because, as we all know in this place, government can sometimes be really clunky and really slow. So this is good, to see this piece of legislation that will maybe do the opposite.

However, I think that if we want to do it responsibly and well, we need more than just standing up in this place and having, you know, government members or ministers stand up in this place and say: "Yes, we believe in consumer protection. Yes, we want to do the best. Yes, we want what's best for a diversified economy and keeping Albertans' money working for them and keeping them safe." I think that we've all learned that saying it is one thing; doing it is quite another. So I think it would be great if someone on the other side would just be more specific about what concrete protections will be in place. What can you guarantee Albertans will be in place to keep their money safe, their investments safe?

A lot of upsides to financial sandboxes. Obviously, you know, it does encourage innovation, relief from uncertainty and regulation, and it's been great throughout some of the research that I've been doing and some of the reading and listening to the government talk about the upsides. But there are some downsides to a piece of legislation like this. The upside is that we get to test or companies get to test new approaches, sharing information, pilot projects and data sharing, all good things, all with the potential to do great things.

However, there are some serious downsides that I don't think we can responsibly ignore, things like – I'll say it again and again – the elimination of consumer protection, fair lending. My colleague from Calgary-Buffalo mentioned, you know, some of the dangers or why we need consumer protection in lending, truth in lending – what is the real cost in lending? – ensuring clear, plain language so that people understand contracts that they're getting into or the terms that they're agreeing to.

Another downside is the real risk assessment in the promotion. You know, when you start to promote risky innovation, sometimes in the speed or the desire to highlight the really exciting potential – I mean, I think we've all sort of seen that, bought into that – there is a failure to really say that to do your due diligence, you really need to assess this risk for you personally or for your company.

Vague promises of consumer benefit and innovation. You know, I think we've all at one time or another tried a new product, whether it's banking related or otherwise. We've all done that because it just looks so great, and sometimes what is too good to be true is just that.

A concern, too: I have read a number of accounts of a regulatory sandbox having pilots. You know, pilots without specific end dates can go on for a very long time, so have consumer protection or some rules around length of time. This may all be under consideration by officials already, but we as legislators in this place, who will be asked to vote on this legislation, don't know about that. It's always: "Trust us. We've got this. We'll do it in regulation." That may be the case, but it would be great to have more detail.

Finally, I think, you know, that when we talk about new markets and things, there will be an impact on competitors. Let's be honest about that. We've seen it time and again, and I'm not saying that that's necessarily a bad thing. That sometimes is just life, that as innovations happen and if other companies don't keep up and innovate, they will suffer some losses. But I'd like to hear more from the government about what kind of assessment was done to determine what those risks were to competitors.

So those are some of my concerns. I look forward to hearing more from the government about what they intend to do.

With that, I will take my seat. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on Bill 13 in Committee of the Whole?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 11

Continuing Care Act

[Adjourned debate April 27: Ms Hoffman]

The Deputy Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods rising.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise to speak to Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, at second reading today, this afternoon. I had the brief opportunity to begin my remarks on Bill 11 while we were debating a referral amendment that would have seen Bill 11 moved to a committee for more discussion and more analysis. Now, we are no longer on that referral amendment, but I would like to continue some of the comments that I had started to make at that time, specifically because they are incredibly relevant to the main bill as well.

The Continuing Care Act, for those who are watching the debate at home or reading the Hansard after the fact, is a piece of legislation that has been introduced to streamline, to improve transparency and accountability, and is in essence taking four pieces of legislation and combining them.

In my initial remarks I reflected on concerns that there may be loss of some standards in the combination. Certainly, there are concerns with the volume of decisions that are being deferred to regulations through the implementation of Bill 11. Certainly, a lot of conversation has happened regarding how Bill 11 is intended to start implementing improvements to the continuing care system that the government has been consulting on, and in fact it released the facility-based continuing care review 11 months ago, almost a full year ago.

Now, the facility-based continuing care review included 42 different recommendations, and the minister at the time suggested the government would be working quickly to develop an action plan, to study some others. Certainly, when we saw Bill 11 introduced into the Legislature, the members of the opposition were eagerly looking forward to this piece of legislation, thinking that it would be related to some of the recommendations out of the FBCC report, particularly given that the minister at the time said that the recommendations on staffing and hours of direct care would be reviewed over the summer and acted upon in the fall. Here we are in the spring, moving into the summer, and not only have we not seen action on staffing and hours of direct care, but these changes are not to be found inside of Bill 11.

When it comes to Bill 11, there are significant gaps. In my remarks to the referral I had just started to talk about the continuing care challenges that Alberta experienced, and there were challenges in continuing care across Canada. In Ontario we saw them take these challenges very seriously through a review and through a very strong commitment to improve, particularly, the staffing challenges.

Madam Speaker, a lot of the staff in continuing care are overworked. A lot of the staff are dealing with major issues of burnout. A lot of the staff have dealt with a lot of mental health stresses, particularly during this pandemic. We know, for example, that from the implementation of the single-site staffing through the pandemic, it really shone a light on how many of these staff are lower waged, working multiple jobs, and therefore not getting full-time hours or full-time pay or full-time benefits and therefore have to work in multiple facilities, which during a pandemic had major implications to our pandemic response.

I reference this because similar things were seen in Ontario, where the Ontario government has now committed to invest $1.9 billion annually to create more than 27,000 new positions for personal support workers, which are the equivalent to HCAs here in Alberta, as well as RNs and LPNs in long-term care and that those additional funds would be used to increase the number of staff, to start addressing culture change, to start addressing workload and working conditions, and to really address retaining staff and improving conditions of care. Some of these things we saw out of the FBCC review, which had a section specifically addressed to dealing with some of the challenges we have with labour shortages and the current workforce, particularly given the increasing need for continuing care that is coming up.

I really wanted to get on the record here at second reading my disappointment in not seeing more through Bill 11 to address what is happening with the workforce that we currently have given rising resident acuity, the gap between training and experience, the challenging work environments, labour supply, and insufficient funding for staff wages and hours of care, all things that the government has now known for 11 months, longer if you consider the time period during which they were consulting.

As we talk about Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, and the work that has been done to consult on this, it really raises the question along: who has been consulted for this particular Bill 11 piece? Given what has happened within our province during the pandemic, has there been adequate consultation with the friends and families, the loved ones of those who've been impacted by COVID-19 in the continuing care system? I would submit to you, Madam Speaker, that based on the debate so far and based on the government not sharing more information about who they consulted with, how that feedback has fit in – yes, we have the final report of the FBCC, but that was of course completed 11 months ago and did not speak directly to Bill 11 – as there's such a gap between the 42 recommendations from the FBCC report and what we see here in Bill 11, it certainly has caused concerns for a lot of public health advocates, for seniors' advocacy groups, and for the Official Opposition.

Having said that as a bit of an introduction to my remarks at second reading, at this point, Madam Speaker, I would like to move an amendment.

The Deputy Speaker: This will be known as amendment RA1.

Hon. member, please proceed.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much. I move that the motion for second reading of Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the government has not carried out sufficient consultations on the contents of the bill with families whose loved ones lost their lives from COVID-19 while in continuing care.

Madam Speaker, this particular amendment, a reasoned amendment, is predicated on the real challenge the Official Opposition has had in trying to understand Bill 11's positioning within addressing the issues within continuing care. Has the input of the families who have lost loved ones from COVID-19 while in continuing care gone into Bill 11, and how is that reflected here in Bill 11 and the opportunity to potentially come back and introduce legislation that addresses the 42 recommendations from the FBCC report, including improvements when it comes to the workforce? That is one of the areas of particular concern that I have, but certainly there are a number of areas within those 42 recommendations of the FBCC report.

This piece of legislation does not fulfill the UCP's own promise from a year ago to increase home care, the number of hours of care that residents would receive, or the proportion of full-time staff. Again, I will contrast this to the province of Ontario, where investments of $1.9 billion annually have been put forward to address these very real concerns. Bill 11 consolidates but fails to make substantive and meaningful changes, and I believe that that may be because the government has failed to consult adequately with the families and those who use this current system of continuing care.

Now, as I've listened to my colleagues engage in debate on this piece of legislation, I have been struck by the personal experiences that colleagues are sharing and putting on the record, both their work experience from working in pieces of the system as well as their own personal experience in caring for loved ones within the continuing care system. One of the things that I know I have heard from families who have lost loved ones as well as from families who have loved ones within the system is the feeling that the UCP was neglecting seniors through the pandemic and that Alberta was lacking certain protections or measures that other jurisdictions had; namely, an independently accountable independent Seniors Advocate. The UCP removed the role of the Seniors Advocate, claiming that the Health Advocate would be sufficient. They also changed how they were searching for that Health Advocate to appoint someone with ties to their political party.

The Health Advocate here in Alberta has been relatively silent during the pandemic while, to compare and contrast, in B.C. the independent advocate made practical recommendations specific to making life better for seniors. I think that speaks to the need to have a Seniors Advocate here, something that is not happening within Bill 11, and again calls into question the consultation that has been carried out on this particular piece of legislation.

I would note that the Canadian Association of Retired Persons has been reaching out to MLAs across the province – so all MLAs are likely already aware of this – to call for an independent Seniors Advocate. Certainly, this is not something that is a partisan issue; rather, it is one of making sure that there is someone who has that lens, that eye, on to the issues that seniors are experiencing and is responding to that and providing recommendations to that effect.

You may be familiar, Madam Speaker, that the NDP has put forward a private member's bill to create an independent advocate. It would be ideal, through consultation with the families of those loved ones who have lost their lives from COVID-19, to see a Seniors Advocate role potentially incorporated through new and revised legislation to improve the Continuing Care Act. Let us not forget that as of April 12 1,677 continuing care residents of Alberta have passed away from COVID-19. That is a stunning number when you hear that said. We've had a major tragedy within the continuing care system, and we need to be able to learn from it. Other provinces are learning from and responding to the challenges, not only receiving a report and then waiting 11 months and bringing forward legislation that doesn't implement those recommendations, investing real money and putting forward real strategies that will address many of the issues.

Again, I spoke specifically to the workforce challenges because as the labour critic that's an area that I know quite well, but the other areas of the FBCC report are equally important, including enhancing quality of care, recognizing cultural sensitivity and diversity in care, making more information accessible, increasing hours of care to residents – again, something that the Health minister at the time suggested that there would be action on; review through the summer, action in the fall. Here we are in the spring – soon we will be in the summer – and we have not seen that action.

Bill 11, as you may hear from my voice, feels quite frustrating because it misses the mark on what Alberta seniors and other Albertans are looking for from this government when it comes to our continuing care system. I do want to acknowledge that certainly the continuing care system is not just for seniors. We have Albertans of all ages who are within that system and deserve the highest quality of support from this government and from the system that is supporting them.

I move this amendment with the hope that we can actively see more consultation with these families and that the government will share the results of those consultations in a detailed way with this Chamber so that all members can be aware of the feedback that was being given to the government and how that feedback is being used to implement Bill 11, or future legislation, should this recent amendment be accepted.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, we are on RA1. Would anybody wish to speak? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton . . .

An Hon. Member: McClung.

The Acting Speaker: . . . McClung. Thank you very much.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Nellie would be proud.

I'm pleased to rise this afternoon once again to speak this time to RA1, a referral motion brought forward by the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, who I think rightfully focused many of her remarks on the thrust that we've had as opposition members to this Bill 11, and that has been a consistent theme and a current and ongoing insistence that the result of the pandemic and the deaths that have been referred to by the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods and others in this House – I'll once again restate that there were 1,677 deaths of residents of continuing care from COVID-19 in Alberta as of April 12, 2022. That's from the National Institute on Ageing.

That number is an astonishingly high and tragic number, Madam Speaker, and it's something that we had hoped would be a motivation for this government to go forward and address the huge gaps that COVID-19 has revealed and magnified, gaps in the continuing care system not only in Alberta; across Canada. But, for sure, Alberta was not exempted from the glare of those gaps as we saw those gaps reflected in the death rate that occurred in continuing care facilities in Alberta amongst particularly seniors but also others of different age groups who also use the facilities and live in continuing care facilities in Alberta.

Over 1,600 deaths, Madam Speaker. If you think about that, that's the size of, I think, the largest Alberta high school. It's a huge number, and every one of those individuals has families, extended families, and friends who certainly did not anticipate that they would succumb to COVID-19 while in a facility purportedly under the care of professionals who would know what to do in a situation where there was an infection such as this running through a facility.

Many of these deaths were preventable, Madam Speaker, and that's the tragedy of it, that COVID-19 has shown that we have done a poor job in our continuing care facilities of preventing deaths that would be caused by something like an infection of COVID-19 in the continuing care system. These are gaps and situations that have been highlighted before but were neglected over time and that caught up with us in Alberta as well as across the country.

[The Speaker in the chair]

As the Member for Edmonton-Riverview so clearly stated in her opening remarks when Bill 11 itself was introduced in March 2022, the critic for Seniors and Housing for the NDP made a statement saying, of course, that many of these deaths were preventable and that she was hoping for significant and transformational changes to the continuing care system to be announced through the bill such as working condition improvements for continuing care staff and increasing the number of full-time staff to provide care. These have been some pretty basic ongoing demands of our continuing care system that remain unmet, and one would have hoped, as the critic for Seniors and Housing, the Member for Edmonton-Riverview, made clear she hoped, that this piece of legislation would address more than the housekeeping items that it does. It does not provide the transformational changes that the continuing care system desperately needs, and given the tragic failures we have seen over the two years, it's another reason we really can't trust the UCP to do the right thing.

Now, we have been consistently calling for an independent Seniors Advocate. Indeed, our party presented a private member's bill to this House to do just that, yet that was ignored. That's another reason, Mr. Speaker, why we bring forward the amendment that we're considering today to not proceed with Bill 11 at this time but to further consult on the legislation so that the concerns of those 1,677 deceased, the concerns of their family members and their friends, can be properly heard and properly aired. That's where we're going to hear exactly where the gaps are and how people have been affected by those gaps. The individuals who are visiting on a regular basis the loved ones that they know in continuing care situations are the ones that can very, very concisely and correctly identify what the gaps are, what the problems are.

Many of us in this Legislature have had loved ones in continuing care. I know that I have as well. Certainly, it has been frustrating, in my experience, to not feel that I've been heard when bringing forward concerns about either my relative who happened to be in continuing care or situations that I became aware of while visiting continuing care locations. I mean, it doesn't take somebody with experiences I've had working in continuing care situations and having some training in that. The family members themselves are pretty aware that if you've got somebody sitting in a commode for three hours, there's a problem.

It's the case many times, Mr. Speaker, that one staff member doesn't know what the other staff member is doing – there could have been a shift change, two part-timers changing shifts, and communication didn't happen – and, as a result, somebody has been forgotten about. It can be a very difficult thing for anybody, never mind a senior, perhaps with dementia, who has been forgotten on a commode in the room for hours on end. Can you imagine the panic that that causes? Not only that; then, of course, they begin to seek their own solutions and attempt to get up when they may not be able to actually walk anymore, and it causes potential injuries.

That's just a small example of some of the concerns that I'm thinking that residents' family members will bring to light if indeed they are given the opportunity to properly bring their concerns forward by not having this bill continue and be read a second time now and that consultations be sought so that the family members will have the ear of the government.

The number of times that we've heard a family member's horror stories in the long-term care facilities has not diminished as a result of COVID-19. In fact, it became patently clear that the difficulties that we were concerned about before were exacerbated by COVID-19. The tragic number of people who died as a result is something that should have been a call to action to this government to do more than a compilation of a number of different acts to bring together the continuum of different continuing care facilities into one piece of legislation or under one legislative home. The expectation would have been, Mr. Speaker – and I think Albertans, rightfully, are wondering why this didn't take place – that there would have been a significant and realistic review of the difficulties that the long-term care facilities experienced during COVID-19 and are still experiencing. I mean, we haven't learned lessons yet, and this is what we should be doing from the loss of life that's occurred so far during the pandemic.

It's mind-boggling, to say the least, that the government hasn't seen fit to properly consult with a resource that is there at their disposal, a group of hundreds and hundreds if not thousands of people in this province who would be willing to come forward with their experiences that they felt as they witnessed the living conditions and the food conditions, the COVID-19 safety conditions or lack thereof during the pandemic and, as a result, had their family member pass away or their friend pass away. Believe me, Mr. Speaker – I'm certain I'm not wrong – when I say that there will be thousands of people willing to come forward, given the opportunity of a forum to properly discuss what they felt were discrepancies in care that should never have happened. People are not silent when it comes to the health or the life and death matters of family members, particularly those that are vulnerable and that are in care.

It's very clear to me, Mr. Speaker, that the government wilfully decided not to have such a conversation with individuals who've suffered the loss of a loved one during the pandemic in this province and in the long-term care facilities perhaps because it was politically dangerous to do such a thing, because there is ultimately responsibility for taking action or not in this province, and the government has chosen, very clearly, not to take action in this case.

I think that the amendment that was brought forward by the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods is a deserved response to the government's unwillingness to face up to the tragedy that's occurred in long-term care. It gives them an opportunity to stop the clock and say: "Okay. Let's do more than just the amalgamation of the various pieces of legislation that govern the operation of long-term care facilities in this province. Let's find out what the deficiencies really were. Let's see if indeed we can prevent deaths in the future that are caused or had been caused by gaps in the system."

Glaringly in Alberta we've heard calls for a solution in terms of staffing that seemed to me would go a long way to alleviating some of the difficulties we faced during the COVID-19 pandemic in long-term care, and that is having full-time staff, Mr. Speaker. Of course, as has been alluded to by others, full-time staff come with a requirement to pay benefits, so there's a higher cost to an employer to have full-time staff members covering all the shifts rather than part-time. I'm not saying that there's not a role for some part-time, but by and large the continuum of care that people receive on a daily basis is much better if they're being looked after by full-time people rather than two or three part-time people during the day.

You can even imagine it yourself, Mr. Speaker. If you've been in a hospital situation or you've stayed in a place where you needed care, if you had two or three people coming on a daily basis looking after you over an eight-hour period rather than one person, you would soon understand the level of knowledge that those people have, the three part-timers, versus what the full-time person would have of your needs and your conditions and your general state of health and perhaps your likes or dislikes of food, your capabilities, your physical ability to walk, or any number of things that you would expect a caregiver to be aware of. All of that is much better if you are being cared for by people who are with you for longer periods of time.

These are the things that consultation would bring forward and allow us to see more deeply where the gaps are, and that's why I support the referral amendment.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to speak to the referral? I see the Member for St. Albert is on her feet.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise and speak to this amendment, that it not be read a second time because there has not been sufficient consultation on the contents of the bill. I think it's very easy to demonstrate that.

Number one is that, you know, I don't know how many members – they like to heckle: did you read the report? Well, did you read the Meyers Norris Penny report about continuing care and the recommendations that were made? This was contracted by Alberta Health Services, and they were very clear about what needed to be done or what should be done. I would suggest, just based on the discrepancy from the report, the recommendations, what we heard from experts, from families, from individuals themselves, and what's in this legislation and what's missing in this legislation, that there has not been enough time to consult, let alone time to read the various reports.

In any event, about this piece of legislation and why I think it's important to take time and to speak to people and to hear their stories. Strangely enough, I'm going to tell you something that just happened – this just happened – and this relates to Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, and specifically relates to division 2, home and community care, and it starts on page 11. Obviously, it goes on for a little bit until page 12, but it talks about – for those of you that don't know, continuing care is a vast range of supports that provide supports for people that need them. One of those is self-managed care with home care. Home care has a number of different products; one of those is self-managed care.

People in this Chamber might be familiar with persons with developmental disabilities. PDD is what we refer to it as, and that is a financial program under Community and Social Services that actually pays for staff to allow them to live independently in the community or to be employed, people with developmental disabilities, obviously. So it doesn't cover people that do not have developmental disabilities. For example, if you have a spinal cord injury or something that just affects your physical being, you don't qualify for PDD supports. You would, in turn, have to go to home care, which is Health, self-managed care, if that's what you choose.

I just had a phone call about a young man, and I have permission to talk about him. He's 29 years old. As a youngster – I think he's got a bit of a following in the capital region; you may have heard his story years ago – I believe he contracted meningitis, if I'm not mistaken, and as a result, sadly, his arms and legs were amputated. Now, he currently lives with his mom, who is aging – and this is the story of many people with disabilities if they've lived the majority of their lives with parents or other family members – and she is no longer able to care for him as she once did.

Now, thankfully, this young man and his mom do live in a home that's accessible, so they have stable, secure, accessible housing, which isn't the case for a lot of people, but I just want to put that on the record, that he does have that. But he asked for what he needs in terms of care, what his mother is providing right now. You talk about the unaccounted for cost of care in Alberta. This is a perfect example of that. She provides 24/7 care. As you can imagine, without arms or legs there's not much that you can do, Mr. Speaker. You require assistance with all aspects of daily living, not to mention that this young man is very talented in a number of areas and is just dying to work and support himself, but he's unable to do that without physical assistance due to the nature of his disability.

Anyway, after a very long process of applying for the supports through home care, which is a continuation of care, after applying for supports that he needed, he finally got – he went through all of the steps, the final appeal was heard, and then he waited for the decision letter. It actually arrived today, and the answer was: no, you cannot have supports 24/7 to hire staff that you need to help you. In one of the recommendations from that appeal panel – and, again, this is not the Appeals Secretariat with Community and Social Services. This is Health. One of the recommendations was: contact your MLA. That was literally the recommendation. There's a gap in the system. There's a huge gap in the system. Now, I'm not his MLA, but they did contact me. There's a huge gap in the system.

The reason I bring up this particular example, that just happened today, is because this illustrates very, very clearly that we have not, this government has not done everything it can to ensure that the continuation of care, the continuity of care, all of these things are included in this piece of legislation. So I bring that up.

Yesterday I talked a little bit about one of the other examples of concern that I had with this piece of legislation, and that was the wholesale repeal of very large and complex pieces of legislation that actually had been amended over many years, some of them to meet the needs of a number of different communities and a number of different specific needs. One of those that I really want to talk about again is the Resident and Family Councils Act. There's a wholesale repeal of that piece of legislation that I think was proclaimed in 2017 if I'm not mistaken.

Now, to the government's credit, they did actually mention it in their legislation, in their new legislation, which is on page 34. It talks about resident and family councils. It's quite lovely. It talks about, you know, if someone is a resident of continuing care, they do, if they request it, have the ability to form this council. And it goes on to talk about how relatives, friends, guardians are certainly welcome to participate in these councils. That's pretty much it.

On the surface it looks like, "Okay; that's okay; that seems fine; no problem there," until you look at what legislation was repealed and what was lost as a result of the repeal. Again, government will counter and say: well, you know, we'll just take care of that in regulations. Well, I think we've already established that there isn't a lot of trust with this government. I don't understand, Mr. Speaker, why they would repeal an entire piece of legislation and then just address it in a couple of sentences. In any event, what was lost because of the repeal?

I'd like to draw your attention to the Resident and Family Councils Act, 2017, under section 2, the establishment of a resident and family council. Now, keep in mind that all of this is gone. This used to be in place because this was a problem, and this was the enabling legislation that needed to be there to ensure that the work was done. You know, to the credit of operators of all different types of continuing care facilities and services, they're overwhelmed on a daily basis with the work that they have to do. I know this. They have an extraordinary amount of work to do. However, I think that we have made the case – we made it in 2017, and we're making it again now – that if you follow, if operators follow this legislation and the spirit of the legislation as well, it can actually prevent a lot of problems. I know this first-hand because I've actually seen it.

Anyway, what is missing? This is what used to be in the legislation. If there's a "group composed of residents or persons of importance to residents or both . . . in place in the residential facility for any purpose described in . . . [the section], the group is deemed to be a resident . . ." No problem.

Where there is no family council in place in a residential facility, the facility operator – and this is key – must

- (a) post a notice in a conspicuous place in the . . . facility advising residents and persons of importance . . . the right to establish a . . . council,

To give examples.

- (b) ensure the notice remains posted until . . . a council is established.

This is very key, that this information, this education is there until – for people that are, let's say, in the more intense continuing care support, so more towards, like, what we would traditionally call, you know, a lodge or nursing home, family members and friends don't always visit every day, so maybe they may not see that posting until they go and visit. So it needs to be there longer. There needs to be more support to get this work done.

Here's another key one.

- (d) within 6 months after the coming into force of this Act and not less than . . . 6 months thereafter until a resident and family council is established, convene a meeting to inform residents . . . [and] families and persons of importance which was already described to residents of the right to establish . . .

So it's not just about posting the information and leaving it posted until a council is formed. It's about in-person education until that council is formed. These councils are that important. They are truly that important.

It goes on. Let me tell you that the purpose of establishing these is so important. I touched on a few things yesterday. This doesn't just apply to large facilities. I'll give you an example. I was invited to a resident council meeting at a facility in St. Albert. It's actually a blended facility, so there are more independent folks that live with people on another side that are more dependent and have more nursing care. It's called Chateau Mission Court. It was really wonderful to see this council because both groups – as you can imagine, the more independent seniors and the more dependent seniors had very different focuses, but this council laid out opportunities for everybody to have their ideas put forward.

Some of those were around menu, and it's prescribed in the old legislation that residents must have input into their menu. In an age when people are living on very tight incomes and particularly seniors are living on very, very limited income, they can't afford increasing costs that go on even at these facilities, and they do go up. They go up steadily. They go up by little bits, and people cannot afford it. Having these meetings is a venue for people to talk about the menu, nutrition. These might not seem like big things. These are very big things.

Recreation: another huge topic for facilities like this. Even for supportive independent living facilities, which we sometimes call group homes or things like that, where it can be as small as four people living together and sharing expenses, this legislation applies. It's so important to have these resident meetings because it forces them to talk about – you know, I've seen this in my time in my previous job, life, where you maybe had someone that was really into heavy metal and the other three were not, and that could be a problem if there wasn't sort of a space to say: let's talk about house rules; let's talk about when the music has to be turned down.

Mr. Speaker, the value of this legislation that was repealed and then not replaced is that it forced the focus on the residents or the people that, at the end of the day, live there, not the staff, not the operators. They were just there in a support capacity, and they were truly there in a support capacity to take notes, to log the issues that were being discussed, and then to take them back to get information when those information requests were presented.

This legislation was very prescriptive, but it was really essential because, let me tell you, Mr. Speaker – I'm sure people in this Chamber know this – not all operators in continuing care are the same, and not all, sadly, provide the same level of care. That is just a fact. If you don't believe me, you can go through the Protection for Persons in Care Act, the reporting. There used to be online reports about the different allegations and investigations and then subsequent recommendations. It's there. You can see the types of problems that happen. With something like this, the value to prevent problems is huge.

The reason that I keep going on and on about this example is because this is just one of four pieces of legislation that were repealed in their entirety. I'm just checking that it was four; I do believe it was four. They were repealed in their entirety and basically, you know, a few sentences about: "Yeah, we're going to do this, and the rest will be in regulation. Trust us. We'll get it done properly."

Mr. Speaker, I'm worried. The state of continuing care in Alberta is not great for a number of reasons. I'm not saying that it crashed and burned in the last three years. There are some problems that have been around for a very long time. I understand the desire to make things simpler and to bring a number of pieces of complex legislation under one umbrella. I understand the intent may be good, but I am so worried that so many things will be lost as a result. In this day and age, when operators are so busy and so focused on so many different things, at the end of the day, it is going to be Albertans that suffer.

So it is for that reason that I actually support this referral, to just slow down and to do more consultation. You know, we were here yesterday debating. I haven't heard a lot of answers from the government. I hope we get those soon.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

5:50

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River, followed by Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Williams: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak on Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act. It's an important piece of legislation, but before I go into details, I want to, first, acknowledge the very hard work that health care professionals have been doing, yes, over the last two years, especially throughout COVID, but for a very long time. Many of those are working in professional settings that are very, very difficult and trying and burdensome on them not just in terms of the professional obligations but the emotional burden that they face as well, the personal cost that it is to them.

I also want to acknowledge all the volunteers, particularly, that work in this space. When I did something at the request of the minister for the palliative and end-of-life care review, which is, you know, tangential and associated with this health care space, I was blown away by the degree to which that space was people who are caring for others voluntarily. These are volunteers in hospice societies. These are, to be honest, more than anything else, family members, individual family members that spend their time and energy, when they have jobs and children and obligations in their communities, still caring for their loved ones. For my money, there is no better care than family care, where possible, in your home. That's what I think is most important for us.

That is why I think this legislation, Bill 11, is so important. What it does is that it takes six different pieces of legislation, with six different regulations and three different sets of standards, and it puts them into one comprehensive piece for uniformity. What it also does is that it opens up the ability for transformational change in our health care, particularly continuing care, where we're able to invest more, as we've done in this last budget, in home care. Now, this is an important investment. I say that not as a legislator today; I say that as an individual. Sadly, it wasn't from COVID this last year, but my mother did pass away. She passed away while in home care, where my brother and my dad were caring for her. It was incredibly good to have the resources we did for my mother as she passed. It allowed her to be a mom to me, a wife to my father, a sister to her siblings. It allowed us to be able to enjoy those last moments with her before she passed.

This kind of legislation allows us to further invest in those most important parts of continuing care, where we can put the decision-making and the care, the loving care that's just not possible anywhere else, back into homes. That, I think, is just so properly ordered, so right. I want to thank the minister for the work he's done on this legislation to bring us here. I do think it is terribly important for us to recognize the volunteers and particularly those family members who are caring for others, throughout the pandemic, of course, but for all of Alberta's history. We have to find ways for our laws and legislation here to work with their lives in their homes.

That's why this sort of simplification, that members opposite have said is a noble intent, is not only a noble and important intent, but it's urgent. It is important. Delaying this would be a problem. It would be a problem because there are many, many families that need to have that transformative change, that need to be able to get better access to resources, that need to have the standardization of care, these different levels of standards, in one place, and these different acts compiled in one place so that the system is less confusing. It is terribly difficult now for people in health care and continuing care to manage it, never mind individual family members who find themselves, sadly, in these difficult spots trying to work with individuals in the system. So this is an important initiative, and it's timely and urgent.

Now, we heard from a number of different members on the other side and, obviously, the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, who brought forward this amendment RA1, that the purpose is to try and slow things down for the purpose of consultation. I think it's noble, of course, and a good intention, but I think it's important also that we do talk a little bit about the consultation that's brought us to this point right now.

Over the years many of the different stakeholders in this space have been asking for a very long time for the review mentioned but then also for this updated legislation. They have been asking for many, many years for us to look at this. The original legislation, that we're really amending, first came forth in 1985, and that 1985 legislation is something that is outdated, Mr. Speaker, and something where we are not capturing all the different spaces we ought to be when it comes to this legislation, when it comes to these regulations.

I think it's important to understand the sense of how long the people who work in this space and the organizations have been waiting for us to get here. I am reluctant to say that we ought to be slowing things down. I think we should be prudently moving forward.

The good news, Mr. Speaker, is that after the consultation with a number of different stakeholder groups from across the province, we've had 33 written formal submissions, relatively lengthy submissions, on where we should be going when it comes to continuing care. Those organizations submitted them, and that was a part that deeply informed the bringing about of this legislation to where we are today in second reading.

I think it's also important to understand that advice and recommendations from the facility-based continuing care review saw over 7,000 Albertans, including family members, residents, caregivers, operators, community organizations, and many of those groups I mentioned at the start were a part of those 7,000 individuals. Now, that wasn't exclusive to anyone who was in continuing care for any particular reason, whether it be someone there because of old age or struggling with dementia, early-onset Alzheimer's, COVID, or any of that. Every single Albertan had that opportunity, and it's right that every single Albertan should. I'm very lucky that, in the course of when my mother passed away, we were able to have the supports we needed. But were we not, this avenue would have been open to us in terms of consultation.

It's right, Mr. Speaker, to open it up to all Albertans. Any time an Albertan's life is taken away, it is a sad moment. It's very difficult for anyone to deal with, and I think we all have important stories to share. I want to recognize all of them. That sort of input should continue on through this Legislature, with us as MLAs reaching out to our constituents and the constituents feeding those stories in as we come in to debate the legislation, as we come to Committee of the Whole and put forward amendments. I'm sure members opposite will put forward thoughtful ones in the debate to come. I think it is important that we open it up to all Albertans, because not one life lost is any less tragic to any family because of how that happened.

I also think, Mr. Speaker, that it's important we recognize that if we were to continue going on and referring this to committee or, with this reasoned amendment, slowing this down for another round beyond the year already that we spent talking about this with the public, it would delay the ability for us to implement a lot of this legislation, which is absolutely fundamental to moving forward with what I believe is transformative in our health care and continuing care. We owe it to our constituents. We owe it to those who work in this space, with all the sacrifices they've made, to give them a good piece of legislation. Of course we owe them that. I believe that's what we have here. There will be, of course, lots of work to be done.

As everyone in this Chamber knows, this is enabling legislation. A lot of those same standards we had before will be kept or increased when we come to this regulation, but the regulation is the right place for those details to be found, Mr. Speaker. It's where we have the ability to work very closely with different communities to inform ourselves as a government on what those regulations should look like, and of course we'll have the ability, as we see fit, as time comes, as things need to be updated, to change that regulation through orders in council.

This is an important point. From 1985 is a long time to go in a space that has changed dramatically in terms of standards of practice, best practices, levels of care, technology. I mean, in 1985 the fax was a very, very useful thing. Things have changed. To give you an illustration of where we're at now in technology and communications, you can imagine how much things have changed when it comes to continuing care as well.

I think it is incredibly important, Mr. Speaker, that we have a certain amount of agility in how we can move forward as a province so that we can continue to serve very well the seniors in this province, those who worked so hard to build the province, to give us the advantages we have today. We owe it to them, because of the sacrifices they've made, to get this right.

The Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member; however, the time allotted for debate in this afternoon's session has elapsed, and the House stands adjourned until this evening at 7:30.

[The Assembly adjourned at 6 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 13 Financial Innovation Act

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise tonight to speak about and move third reading of Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act.

This legislation would create a regulatory sandbox to help finance and fintech companies develop new products and services in Alberta. Madam Speaker, the benefits of Alberta being the first province in Canada to offer this kind of service are apparent, and I'm proud to highlight them during debate of this bill. These benefits include economic diversification, job creation, strengthening Alberta's reputation as a province that welcomes innovators and new ideas, and, of course, the potential for new investment from a growing sector of the economy.

I want to reiterate today that the protection of Albertans' privacy and personal information is our top priority. We built protections into the legislation itself. Applicants would be required to meet stringent eligibility criteria. For example, they would be required to provide a business plan that includes details of what would be tested and how consumers would be protected. Any time we receive a request for exemptions to the Personal Information Protection Act, we would consult with the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner, and in fact that commissioner and Service Alberta would need to approve those exemptions before the application could proceed.

We're also taking steps to ensure Albertans are fully aware of the companies participating in the sandbox and the products and services that they're testing. A public website will disclose all relevant information, including the name of each participant, a description of the product or service, any and all exemptions for each participant, and any terms, conditions, and restrictions the participant must follow.

Madam Speaker, if you would indulge me for a few more minutes, I will reiterate the benefits Alberta will see from this proposed legislation one last time. At last count nearly 63,000 Albertans were employed in the financial services sector in this province. From 2000 to 2020 Alberta's GDP in this sector grew at an annual average rate of more than 4 per cent, outpacing growth in all other provinces. In 2020 the financial services sector contributed over $14 billion to the provincial GDP. When we talk about diversifying Alberta's economy, this is the sort of thing we're talking about: taking meaningful steps to attract new businesses, investment across a broad spectrum of economic sectors, growing and diversifying our economy.

That's why, Madam Speaker, I encourage all members to support this bill. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there members wishing to speak to Bill 13 in third reading? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity this evening to enjoy this fine evening indoors and talk about this most important Financial Innovation Act. You know, as I read through the act and, of course, listened to the minister introduce third reading, I certainly am seeing many things to be happy with and things that I can support in terms of this particular bill. I'm sort of glad to see, actually, that the UCP kind of went to school on what the NDP did in their government when, through the Alberta Securities Commission, we also created a similar sandbox initiative, that turned out to be, I think so far, relatively successful. I'm glad you picked up on the idea.

You know, I think that it's quite a good step for a government to try to create space for innovation and creative business ideas, so I'd certainly like to see that happen. I mean, the advantage of this kind of a sandbox thing is that people get a chance to try out things that either regulations have prevented them from doing in the past or where the circumstances have just not been there for them to test the waters properly, with the right kind of supports and guardrails up in case. It's good to have a sandbox that allows that opportunity to kind of see: can we push the barriers out a little bit, can we go a little bit farther than we used to go, and can we do so expeditiously, with the right structures in place to allow that to happen?

The disadvantage, of course, with any kind of innovation is that you actually don't know a lot about it. The very nature of it is that things are going to happen that you couldn't have likely predicted. Now, of course, you do your job and your due diligence. You sit down and try to guess what kind of things will happen, and you try to make sure that you've got everything in place to ensure the integrity of the process as it moves forward. But the very nature of creativity is that you're exploring new areas and boldly going where no man has gone before. You never know what kind of troglodyte you might actually run into as you venture forth.

So we need to be a bit cautious here because certainly, with any kind of creativity, there is an increased risk factor. The protection of consumers I think is something that we need to keep centre and foremost in our consideration of the level of risk that we are prepared to accept as a society, because not all actors have been good actors in the history of humanity. Sometimes when people are allowed room, they take that to take advantage of others and to go into places and do things that were not intended but were also not outlawed.

That brings us to a place where we have to kind of look at: can we trust the government to be on top of this and make the right kind of decisions? Of course, we've had some real serious reasons to be concerned about our trust in government over the last little while. We've certainly seen a number of actions taken that, you know, leave people pause to be concerned. I mean, only yesterday I had the chief executive officer of the Nechi Institute in to talk about the fact that the government summarily evicted them from their place of residence, that they had been in for 36 years, and without any kind of consultation, just simply delivery of a registered letter saying: you've got three months to get out.

Of course, at the same time the government minister stood up in the House and assured the House – it's easily found in Hansard – that he would work to find a new location for them. Here we are two years later, and no work has been done in that effort. You know, it leaves us wondering: well, if the government doesn't say what it's going to do in this case, will they say what they're going to do in this other case?

You know, similar things can also be said about things like the doctors' contract, which was, again, summarily, single-handedly killed by this administration without consultation with the doctors. They just went in and said that this contract is no longer valid, with no appropriate negotiations, those kind of things, no notice. We know that the government has taken positions like that that make us wonder: what happens when things start to go awry with regard to this new Financial Innovation Act? Will the government have the best interests of the public, or will they use it as an opportunity to pursue gain for themselves and not for the citizens of the province of Alberta?

We know, for example, that the government also made changes to the indexing of both AISH and the seniors' benefits and, of course, the indexing of your income tax, which, I'll remind everyone in the House, is due on Saturday, I think it is, so you'd best get it in. In that particular case, the government again made decisions to change the rules not for the benefit of the recipients. The AISH recipients have lost money as a result of this, the seniors' benefits recipients have lost money from this, and Albertans will be paying somewhere in the neighbourhood of an extra billion dollars in future years as a result of this change by the government. None of these things were announced ahead of time or consulted on. They were simply done summarily by this government.

So it leaves us in this place where people have to say: "Okay. If we are entering into a world where we are pushing the boundaries and looking for new, creative ways to move forward with our money, who is going to be there to protect us from the obvious increased risk that's associated with doing something that's new? Who is going to make sure that we are, as citizens in this province, well taken care of?" People are quite used to in this province having a sense of security in our banking because we have put in rules and structures over the last hundred years in Canada to ensure that people's deposits are protected and that there's security attached to them.

You know, in Canada when someone gets their paycheque put into the bank, there is no doubt in their mind, the average citizen's mind, that when they arrive at the bank the next day and they put their card into the machine, they will indeed be able to withdraw that money, because they know the system works that way.

I know that in the States they've had some problems with some schemes because they allowed some extra range. There was a credit union – I'm not sure that's the right expression in the States – in the States where people made their deposits, and the CEO essentially just took 100 per cent of them, then closed up shop, so they lost all of their deposits. They went into the CEO's salary. So we've seen financial innovation be terribly devastating in the States because of the lack of regulation.

We can go on and talk about a number of other crises that have occurred with regard to short-term credit and loans, the housing and loans debacle in the States, and so on. We know these things can go awry – we've seen terrible examples – and we have long taken pride in Canada that we watch these horrendous things happening in the States but actually not happening in Canada. Why do they not happen in Canada? Because in Canada we accept that the role of government is to ensure that people cannot take advantage of these situations. So we are in a place now of having to depend on the government to do exactly that.

But I ask the question of the government: what safeguards are in place to ensure that as these risk factors are met for the first time, we have the preparation, both in terms of the structures, the people, the technical knowledge, and so on to move ahead and, of course, the regulations that would allow us to actually move ahead? That's always difficult, I understand, because you don't know what the risk factors might be. Really creative people can be creative in quite horrendous ways sometimes. Of course, we wouldn't necessarily think that that would ever happen, but all of a sudden somebody does something and we go, "Good Lord, we didn't anticipate this was going to come out of this particular bill," but it does.

So we have to ask the government: do you have sufficient safeguards in order to ensure that the citizens of this province are well protected? Do you have the technical capacity to deal with this in-house? If not, are there people who could be brought in to provide the technical capacity when the time comes? Do you need to establish now some contracts for people to be watching the process, people with the expertise to identify problems before they become big problems, while they're still, you know, in the nascent stage of development? Those are the kind of things that we really need to make sure of.

We also need to make sure that in this international world that we have, people don't come into Alberta, use it as a chance to do some things, and then shift all the monies and products offshore, where they cannot be held to account by Canadian laws and Canadian judicial systems. We just have to be cautious of all that. Now, I'm not anticipating, you know, that all these horrendous things I'm talking about will happen. What I'm saying is that they might happen, and it's the job of the government now to say: what will we do to ensure as much as possible that we prevent them from happening in the first place and that we are ready to identify them as they begin happening and before they become a real crisis for the average citizen?

I'm also very concerned about the level of information that will be provided to citizens who may engage in some of these new possible transactions. Their expectation is that these new vehicles, whatever they may be, will be, you know, essentially the same as the old vehicles in terms of their own risk factor, and that may not be true, so we need to have a pretty strong set of regulations about public disclosure that these are new vehicles, that there are potentials for risk, that you may find yourself in a situation that you would not normally expect using other vehicles that are available to you in the financial community.

You know, it's just an issue of being forewarned fairly, and that implies, of course, informed consent. You can only agree to engage in these transactions if you understand what it is you're agreeing to. There really needs to be a fairly stringent set of regulations around how these things need to be described not only to the citizens who buy them but, of course, to the professionals who helped market them, financial advisers and so on, so that they indeed are not able to sell these new vehicles unless they have been properly trained in the implications and the risk factors involved.

These are the kind of questions I have about this particular bill. I intend at this point to support this bill because I do believe in creativity. I do believe in innovation. I think that's how we move forward. Certainly, it's why I have long supported issues such as renewable energy, because I think it is about moving forward. It is about trying something new and making sure that we as a province are not laggards holding back, waiting for the last minute to get onboard, but really are at the forefront of innovation so that people come to us to seek that kind of knowledge, the same, you know, kind of thing that we were doing when we were building our renewable sector here in this province.

We understood that we may not be the only people in the world – maybe not the largest in terms of our CO₂ emissions, but if we learn to handle them very well in this province and to protect sort of a middle-class style of living while at the same time protecting the environment, that kind of knowledge would lead us to be experts in the world. People would come to us, and we'll be able to make profit from selling that kind of knowledge throughout the world.

The same thinking applies here in this case. The creativity is supported. The idea that we cannot go back to the past economy of the 1970s or 1980s, that we need to move forward into a new kind of economy, is something that certainly we on the NDP side of the House have celebrated regularly. We wish that more often the government would be focused on where the economy is going and not where it has been.

I guess I will wrap up my ever-so-brief comments at this time by saying that I hope that all things go well from here on and that we actually as a province benefit from this kind of change.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to speak to Bill 13 in third reading? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to speak to Bill 13. My voice is a little off as I've been talking quite a bit today, but it's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 13. I believe this is the first opportunity that I've had to speak to this bill.

I have a number of comments I want to make. You know, I guess I can start off with my position on this bill, in which I do support this bill. I have declared on a number of occasions in this Chamber over the past several years that I am more than happy to give credit where credit is due, so I will thank the Finance minister for bringing this bill forward. I think there are quite a few elements of this bill that I can definitely get behind.

I know that my colleagues have outlined a few of their concerns. I listened to the Minister of Finance, when he moved third reading, talk about some of the consumer protections that exist in this piece of legislation before us, and I do appreciate that. I appreciate that, Madam Speaker, because it shows that the minister and the government have been listening to a number of questions that my colleagues have raised throughout the different stages of this bill, and I appreciate that the government is addressing them and taking those concerns seriously. That's nice to see.

In my comments on this bill I will take a friendly poke at the minister in that some of the concerns that have been raised by my colleagues and others around risk and risk mitigation sound awfully familiar, in fact, so familiar that I believe some of the UCP members raised those exact same concerns on my bill, Bill 203, creating a venture fund that Albertans can invest in. You know, with that, I say that with a half smile for the minister, which I'm sure that he appreciates, through you, Madam Speaker.

It's important, you know, to recognize that there are some risks. I was happy to hear the minister earlier talk about that companies that are looking for an exemption from the Personal Information Protection Act, or PIPA, have to apply for that exemption, that it's not granted carte blanche. I think that's an important measure, an important oversight. Glad to see that it's not just given carte blanche. Again, Madam Speaker, it's not because there is a lack of trust with our companies and financial institutions. I think it's just good oversight to ensure – and I would imagine that financial institutions welcome this oversight themselves. Why? In a given industry if there is a bad actor in that industry, it tarnishes all of their reputation, and financial institutions recognize that. Quite frankly – I mean, I'm sure the Minister of Finance can attest to this in his meetings with these institutions – they don't want to see bad actors. It hurts their reputation. It hurts the industry reputation. They want to see proper oversight when it comes to legislation like this one before us.

Now, again, I will, you know, make a comment that it is good to see that the Finance minister has finally embraced diversification. I'm sure that – and I say that partly in jest and partly in truth. I mean, the reality is that there have been moments where I have misspoken in my political career.

Mr. Eggen: No.

Mr. Bilous: I know. They were really rare. In fact, you'd have to dig hard to find them.

I'm sure that that comment around diversification is one that the Finance minister shakes his head every time he hears the opposition repeat it. I will give him the benefit of the doubt, that that's likely not what he meant.

In all seriousness, it is important to recognize that, you know, yes, Alberta's prosperity has been largely driven and due to our thriving oil and gas sector. That, I don't think, anyone can dispute, not credibly, anyway. But I think it's important to recognize that Alberta has also been home to a number of other sectors that have flourished and flourished over a many number of years.

I always take pride in the fact that the city of Calgary has the second-largest number of financial institutions and headquarters in Canada. That's no small feat, Madam Speaker. Yes, you know, if you speak to someone from Toronto – it's a stereotype, but I feel like it's fairly accurate – they believe the universe revolves around them. It's nice to see that western Canada and Alberta punch above their weight when you look at the size of our population and the revenue and GDP that's generated from this province and from a number of sectors.

I mean, I'm happy to give a shout-out not only to the financial sector, which – Madam Speaker, I don't know if you know this. Well, you probably do, but many Albertans probably don't know that the financial services industry employs over 60,000 people. That's a significant number of Albertans who make their living working in the financial industry. I'm very proud of, you know, not only our energy and financial industries but our agricultural sector, our forestry sector. Alberta's life sciences is, honestly, one sector that probably doesn't get enough attention when you look at some of the breakthroughs in medicine and in innovative health devices that have come from Alberta. We know that we have an incredibly strong tech sector. We know we have really strong interactive digital media gaming companies here in the province.

We have a tourism sector that we recognize has been hit incredibly hard over the past few years with COVID, but it is a resilient sector that I'm confident, with the right supports, will make a significant comeback. I am glad to see that the government has looked at COVID as an opportunity to reposition some of our institutions, like Travel Alberta, to develop destination products, which is unique to the rest of the country. I've said this to the minister, you know, that I agree with it, and well done.

I think there are significant opportunities that our province has, and some of those have come from policy and from legislation. Some have come, quite frankly, from the innovative entrepreneurs that call Alberta home. Could that be because Alberta and the west had quite a few folks who settled from jurisdictions like Ukraine and other parts of the globe where they had to be incredibly innovative in making a living? You know, I'm proud to be part of a province that has such a rich history but has also turned out, I would argue, some of Canada's best entrepreneurs and innovative companies.

This bill before us creates a regulatory sandbox or at least puts regulations on hold temporarily and, as I had said, with some measures of oversight. They have to apply for those regs to be put on pause so that they can experiment. Now, I appreciate that as soon as we talk about that, there are concerns that members have as far as: how do we ensure that there is proper oversight? How do we protect the privacy of Albertans? How do we ensure that companies who are coming here to experiment will in fact stay here to develop products and not take advantage of the legislation before us, come to Alberta, experiment on a couple of products, and then take those learnings elsewhere? I think it's paramount that Albertans will get to benefit from putting these regulatory requirements on hold so that companies can truly experiment and be innovative in their processes.

That oversight: again, I believe the minister addressed that, but I would feel more confident knowing that companies cannot use Alberta as a stopover on their way to a final destination to implement their learnings that they gather here in Alberta. [interjection] I see the Minister of Finance rising. I am more than happy to give way.

The Deputy Speaker: Sorry. I hesitate to interrupt. Just for the record – actually, my apologies. You may have an intervention.

Mr. Toews: All right. Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I just want to respond to the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, who rightfully raises a concern that companies would come into Alberta and simply use us as a testing ground and ultimately leave the province. We're limited to a degree in terms of what we can do. We can't trap people here in the province against their will. But what we have as a requirement is, in fact, that a company be physically present in the province during the time that they're active, testing a new product, a novel product within Alberta. I believe that's the best we can do, and I'm convinced that when they move to Alberta, if in fact they've come to this province, that in fact, given the entrepreneurial culture, the optimism in this province, and the incredibly competitive business environment, they'll choose to stay.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you. Through you, Madam Speaker, to the minister: thank you for those comments. I appreciate that. I know that in my time in government we looked at, when it came to accessing health data, which – any life sciences company will tell you that Alberta is the crown jewel in North America because of the fact that we are the only jurisdiction that has a single health care delivery system. We are the only one. There is no other jurisdiction in Canada that has a single health care delivery organization. Because of that and because Alberta is such a diverse province, made up of 4 point something million, every company in life sciences that I had sat down with in our time in government was eager to come to Alberta.

One of the conversations that we would have is: how do we ensure that the data that they are accessing stays in Alberta? I appreciate that the minister has required companies to be active in Alberta. Now, I'm not sure – and, you know, I'll beg forgiveness of the House – if there's a time frame around that or if companies could, while they are under a certain company banner – that law applies to them. But if they shut down that company and open a new company in another jurisdiction, can they then transplant those learnings elsewhere? I'm not advocating, Madam Speaker, that we are trying to force companies to stay here or limit them to only operate in Alberta. I think that would be short sighted. I just want to make sure that whatever data or benefits they experience from being here in Alberta, because Alberta is being innovative and allowing for processes that currently don't exist anywhere else in Canada – I'm not sure about North America – they will use that data or those learnings here in Alberta so that Albertans can benefit from being the sandbox. Again, I think the minister partially answered that.

My hope is that there are other potential mechanisms to ensure that Albertans share in that benefit. Again, I'm not talking about limiting those companies from operating elsewhere. I'm not talking about them taking those learnings and applying them to other jurisdictions. I mean, I appreciate that that's how global commerce works. I just want to ensure that Albertans will continue to benefit from this for the long term. Again, as I've said, I think . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to speak to Bill 13 in third reading? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 13. I can say that I agree with the idea in principle. Certainly, as my colleagues have mentioned, I do have questions. I do have concerns. We do live in an increasingly digitalized world where innovations, innovations in particular in the tech sector, are changing things, are changing economies, are changing the way of doing things rapidly around us. It's important that we also change and position ourselves, our economy in line with those developments, benefit from those developments and not get left behind. It's nice to see this bill coming forward.

The minister also mentioned that this is how the minister envisions to diversify the economy. Maybe nobody else from my side was there, but I was at an event in Calgary where the minister said that diversification was a long-term luxury, and . . . [interjection]

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for giving way, for an opportunity to once again, for probably the eighth or 10th time in this House, clarify those comments of over two years ago. The question that was posed to me was in the context of government revenues. At the time we did not have the luxury to diversify the province's revenues. That was critical. We were not in a position where we could look at adding another tax, where we could consider another revenue source at a time when we were looking to position our economy for maximum competitiveness and certainty. I appreciate the member giving way and allowing me to just provide clarity, once and for all, for the comments around revenue diversification with respect to government revenues. I fully appreciate diversification.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Minister, for telling us his view of what he meant, his, I guess, redefined position. While I was sitting there, I heard in no uncertain terms that the context there was that government was moving back towards the policies of the past. That was the context I understood. It was attended by business leaders. It was attended by industry leaders, which are far ahead when it comes to technological developments and diversification ideas. That was the question, the context of the question. The minister then said that diversification was a long-term luxury. But glad that it didn't take that long, and at least we are talking about it, and we are discussing ideas of how we can benefit from the technological developments around us and how we can use those to innovate and diversify our economy.

There are many aspects of the bill which are quite positive, which are quite clear, but there are many details that are left to regulations and not just regulations; pretty much ministerial orders and minister's discretion and the minister working with Service Alberta's consumer protection legislation, the in-charge minister, that will be Service Alberta.

I said that there is broad agreement on the policy approach, that we are taking steps to benefit from technological developments in trying to diversify our economy, but this legislation leaves a lot of details out. I do understand that they can't put every detail in the legislation. Then it gives enormous powers to the cabinet and minister, and I'm sure that some of these powers will assist or may assist a regulatory sandbox. They may assist us to implement the regulatory sandbox.

But at the same time these powers also require that this Assembly and Albertans trust this government. That's a very challenging position to be in given the record of this minister and this government. We are finding it difficult to trust that this government will do the right thing, get it right. We are asked to trust that this government will take all steps needed and necessary to protect consumers, to protect Albertans' interests while these new financial products are developed and introduced in Alberta's market, especially those products that Albertans have not seen before, that they're not familiar with, and they may require a certain degree of understanding of fintech and new technological developments.

Madam Speaker, the key issue here is trust. The bill has positive aspects to it, but should we trust this minister and this government on this issue? [interjections] Some colleagues suggested yes, but I may say that this minister was taken to the cleaners on KXL, a $1.3 billion tag for Albertans. Should I trust this minister?

Some Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Sabir: Then I can come up with new examples. Those who participate in debate: I might draw examples from their portfolios as well.

When Albertans were getting sick, when Albertans were dying, when their loved ones were dying, when the senior care system was struggling, again they asked us: trust us. The result is that we saw 4,000 neighbours – 4,000 Albertans died during wave after wave, wave after wave of this pandemic, and Albertans entrusted them to look after their health care system, their well-being. And, Madam Speaker, they did fail Albertans on many fronts. Throughout the pandemic they were fighting and bullying doctors, health care professionals.

Mr. Rutherford: Point of order. That was bad timing.

The Deputy Speaker: That was a point of order.

Point of Order Relevance

Mr. Rutherford: Madam Speaker, things were going so well there for a little bit. I rise on 23(b). I think the member has strayed quite far off the Financial Innovation Act, and I would just ask, through you, Madam Speaker, that we get back on topic and talk about Bill 13.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Yeah. No. I think, Madam Speaker, it's clearly a matter of debate. The member is just making a direct connection between the elements of Bill 13, that require quite a lot of ministerial authority in the Finance minister, and then, you know, to the degree to which – can we trust that based on other clues that we've had over the last couple of years?

The Deputy Speaker: We're having such a pleasant evening, and I think we can carry on in that manner with some caution given to, certainly, the hon. member to make his comments most relatable to the bill and the debate at hand. I know he has the extraordinary ability to do so. I very much so look forward to that continuation of the debate.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you for your caution. It's my first time speaking to this piece of legislation, and at third reading usually there is a broad leeway, that you talk to the bill in its final form. As I mentioned, that bill leaves out many details. It boils down to the trust in the minister and trust in government, whether or not we should be supporting this piece of legislation. That's exactly what I was saying. There were certain questions that we should trust, and there are many examples – and I gave a few examples – where we shouldn't trust this government. For instance, when they were in opposition, when they were not in charge, they were against bracket creep, the tax on inflation, but when they were put in charge, that's exactly what they did. They signed a public health guarantee; they didn't follow through on that.

All these examples do require us to, I guess, question the government on the provisions of this bill and the things that are not included in this bill. For instance, there are some requirements that are identified in this bill. For instance, exemptions: when it comes to exemptions, then 8(1)(c) gives a whole lot of powers just on the minister's sole discretion, that he can exempt from "a requirement to engage qualified and expert third party consultants."

Then he can exempt from the Consumer Protection Act as well, which is, I guess, the most important aspect. We didn't see some clear safeguards other than again we are asked to trust the minister and the government. The provision says:

8(2) The Minister may, with the agreement of the Minister responsible for the Consumer Protection Act, exempt a Sandbox Participant from any provision of that Act or any regulations under that Act on [the] terms, conditions and restrictions agreed to jointly by both Ministers.

Basically, the entire consumer protection legislation: instead of finding some way, creating some certainty that there will be certain protections that will stay intact, that there will be protection that will not be compromised, the government chose to write the legislation in a way that the minister, with the help of a fellow minister – if they both agree on something, they can exempt the sandbox participant from the provisions of the Consumer Protection Act, any regulation, order made under that act.

That's, I guess, a very broad power that government is giving itself. Consumer protection legislation is long. There are many different areas. There are many protections that they could have identified where we need not give ministers power to override those protections.

Also, this idea of a sandbox is not novel to this government. When we were in government, we came up with these ideas as well. We worked with the Securities Commission, we worked with Alberta Treasury Board, and we came up with a way to adjust the exploitations in payday loans. We came up with solutions for that. Our view was, our focus was that we were focused on Albertans. We were focused on consumer protection.

Here the government is singularly focused on doing this experiment on Albertan lives without saying anything in this piece of legislation on how they will be protected other than that that will be at the whim of the government and the ministers. So that is a serious concern because it's a new, novel idea and there need to be stronger assurances to Albertans that they will be protected and the consumer protection legislation and other similar legislation and regulations will not be waived, sandbox participants will not be exempted from following those protections. We didn't hear that.

Then, even on publication of information . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others wishing to join the debate on Bill 13 in third reading? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thanks, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity just to say a few words in regard to Bill 13 in third reading. I mean, generally I think it's clear that our caucus has found this to be more good than bad, right? There are a number of innovations here that reflect initiatives that we did take and move forward on when we were the government in regard to these so-called regulatory sandbox initiatives. So as an extension of those things, I guess, inherently we do find it to be a positive choice to make.

I think that there are a number of issues that we need to just be wary of when we're engaging in this kind of thing. I think that the issue of government competency in a new initiative like this is definitely something to think about. That's not to disparage the elected members but, rather, the capacity of TBF to be able to have the expertise to quarterback something like this – right? – because clearly from behind the scenes there's a lot that needs to be done. So I would implore this minister, Madam Speaker, to make sure that he is sufficiently surrounded and staffed with people that can administer this and to watch over it amongst the TBF department, because that's where a lot of this will lie.

You know, I think that another issue that we need to watch on an ongoing basis, presumably, if this passes here tonight – I've got a feeling it will. That is to make sure that there is sufficient public disclosure around the new products and services that might come of this initiative. I know that this bill inherently gives quite a lot of power and latitude to the minister, so that minister, with that power and latitude, can also make sure that there is sufficient oversight and that at every step of the way people are getting enough information about what it all entails, like consumer protection information, too, like some sort of a warning label thing where new a product, service, technology, whatever it is, you know, just given that people have to know that it's just not something that – maybe it's new, and people have to have some degree of buyer beware kind of thing, right?

Further to that, as well, there's a tendency, I think, amongst Albertans and maybe Canadians in general that we have quite a lot of confidence and sort of inherent trust in our financial institutions, so we don't want to have new operators taking advantage of that, right? You sort of just think, "Oh, well, a bank is a bank is a bank; they never fail," and away you go. I heard the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford talk about American examples, where, you know, the banks fail on a more regular basis, and that kind of thing just doesn't happen as much in Alberta and Canada, so forthwith there is kind of an inherent sort of trust in our banks.

I've kind of noticed, doing – what was I doing? – my taxes and my ethics disclosure the last few days, that that trust is not necessarily warranted, you know? It's like trying to get something out of a stone sometimes with these banks, especially now that it's all online and there are no actual humans in a room that you can talk to. But that's my own little personal beef for the day. It is a reflection that usually I do trust my bank, too. They're not going to lose my money. I think a lot of Albertans feel the same way.

With a new thing, a new sandbox initiative like this we have to make sure that consumers are protected and their trust is reinforced. They'll say: "Wow, this is new, this is innovative, and I feel like the government has my back in this regard." With all of those things together, Madam Speaker, I certainly do speak in favour of this bill. I've got a feeling that, you know, we'll all watch carefully, Minister, of course, to make sure that this gets off the ground and that it creates an interest not just here in Alberta but across the country and indeed around the world.

Thanks.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on Bill 13 in third reading?

Seeing none, would the hon. Minister of Finance like to close debate?

Mr. Toews: I'm going to waive.

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 19

Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and address the House this evening.

Before I do, with your indulgence, Madam Speaker, I just wanted to say hello to my good friend Denise and her son Roman, who are very keen to join us in the gallery this evening, all the way from Grande Prairie, Alberta. Welcome.

With that, Madam Speaker, I'll get back to the business at hand. It's a pleasure to rise this evening and discuss amendments to the Condominium Property Act. Approximately half a million people . . .

The Deputy Speaker: My apologies, hon. member. You are moving . . .

Mrs. Allard: Oh, sorry. I rise to move second reading.

The Deputy Speaker: On behalf of . . .

Mrs. Allard: On behalf of Minister Glubish.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister . . .

Mrs. Allard: The Minister of Service Alberta.

The Deputy Speaker: Please proceed.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you. Wow. I'm distracted. I'm distracted.

With that, Madam Speaker, I will start again. One more time, it's a pleasure to rise this evening and discuss amendments to the Condominium Property Act. Approximately half a million people, or 12 per cent of Albertans, live in condos across the province. This is a huge cohort of the population, Madam Speaker, and these Albertans cut across all age demographics. As we know, younger Albertans tend to make their first home purchase in a condominium unit, and we also know that many older Albertans like to downsize to a condo from their detached homes to benefit from all that condo living has to offer.

While condominium corporations manage their own affairs through their own governance, protections and standards for Albertan condo owners exist through the Condominium Property Act. Our government has made making life easier for Albertans a top priority, and oftentimes we do that by reducing unnecessary red tape that holds Albertans back from getting things done. That has carried on into this government's approach to legislating requirements for companies, societies, and even for condominium corporations, Madam Speaker. I am proud of all the work the Minister of Service Alberta has done to bring common sense into our basic legislation. The most important part of supporting Albertans is our approach to legislation, and it's listening to stakeholders across industry who know best. You know, the minister is not an expert on condominiums, and I don't think many or maybe any in this House are. That's why we consulted with condo owner groups, condo managers, and condo lawyers. I'm pleased to share that it is their feedback that has informed the provisions contained in Bill 19, the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022.

How did we get here, Madam Speaker? In 2019 we inherited a set of regulatory reforms to the condo property regulation written by the opposition during their time in government. The minister did his due diligence in reviewing the proposed changes to make sure that these made sense and were actually going to help condominium owners and corporations. It's a good thing we checked their work. The regulations as written were rejected by the condominium industry. They told this government that the NDP amendments to the regulation would have created headaches for condo boards and would in no way solve the major challenges faced by those who volunteer their time as board members. We ended up pausing the regulations to do a deeper dive, and I'm glad that we did.

The minister and his team at Service Alberta made improvements that cut red tape and actually made the lives of condo owners better. This government brought those regulations into effect in January of 2020. From there, our work was not done. While consulting with community members, our government heard concerns about unproclaimed act amendments that had been left over from a previous act for several years. Both involved very important matters for condominium corporations: the rules around voting in meetings and recouping the cost of damages. These provisions were to be implemented in the final set of regulatory amendments from the 2014 bill. When the folks in the condo sector talked about these leftover amendments, they were very blunt with us. They told us that those amendments as is were going to bring in too much red tape and be a financial and an administrative burden for condominium corporations. However, they knew that this government would take their concerns seriously, and we did, Madam Speaker. They knew that we weren't afraid of a bit of hard work to get these amendments right. The minister's department got to work.

Throughout 2020 and 2021 Service Alberta had regular meetings with a group of dedicated representatives from community groups representing condominium owners, boards, managers, and lawyers to develop, in conjunction with our working group, a better approach to voting and damage chargebacks, an approach that made sense, Madam Speaker. These amendments are practical, they're realistic, and, most importantly, they are aligned with what condo boards actually want and need while protecting owners' rights. They're the result of a lot of hard work but also a testament to our government's commitment to supporting a healthy condominium sector and to listening to those in that sector.

I'll now take a closer look at what our government has brought forward in this bill. With respect to voting, Madam Speaker, one of the unique aspects of condominium living is that as a condo owner you're basically a shareholder in the corporation that is responsible for maintaining the property, common, managed, and real. Roughly once a year as a member of a condominium corporation you get to attend an annual general meeting, or AGM, to discuss matters relevant to the operation of the development, including the corporation's finances. At a condo AGM owners have things to vote on, big and small.

Currently voting in condominium corporation meetings is solely based on how many shares an owner has in the corporation, commonly referred to as unit factors. In unit factor voting, Madam Speaker, the votes from owners of larger units or owners of multiple units carry more weight than the votes of smaller units or of one unit. It's a proportional representation. For many larger issues such as large expenses or legal situations this makes perfect sense. Owners with a larger stake in the development should in fact have more say in things. But for smaller housekeeping matters, such as approving an agenda, unit factor voting isn't as efficient and is unnecessary. We've heard that it slows the meeting down, takes away time from the needed discussion, and takes away time to vote on more important matters.

The original 2014 amendments on voting sought to regulate various methods of voting such as show of hands and voting in writing. Our working group told us that setting complex requirements around different ways of conducting a vote was just far too cumbersome. Voting needed to be simplified. If passed, our amendments would enable an alternative method of voting on routine or simple matters in a condominium corporation meeting. Each eligible owner would have one vote regardless of the size or number of the condos that they own. In this way, voting can be as simple as a show of hands, and condominium corporations can use this simplified method whenever they need it.

We also wanted to make sure that we're not negatively impacting the current rights of voters. That's why any time the simplified version of voting is used, an eligible voter can still require that a unit factor vote be held instead, provided this is asked for before the simplified vote result is announced. This is a protection enshrined in the amendment act. If a condominium corporation prefers a different method, they will have the flexibility to do so. Corporations will be able to establish an alternative method through its bylaws, which owners vote on and must approve by a higher majority threshold. Condominiums want to have the flexibility to use the method that works for them, and that's what we're delivering today, Madam Speaker, should this bill pass.

With respect to chargebacks the other changes we're bringing forward today will provide condominium corporations with important tools to protect the financial security of all owners and their corporation. As any homeowner will tell you, one of your biggest fears is property damage inside or outside. In condominiums, where people own common property in addition to their personal unit, shared property damage can cause a whole bunch of headaches and costs. For example, guests could damage the hallway walls during a visit or while they are helping to move furniture in and out of the unit. This could amount to hundreds or even thousands of dollars in damage to the common property. Who pays for that, Madam Speaker?

For condominium corporations recouping the costs of damages can be a big expense, especially if the person that caused the damage doesn't want to pay for it or denies causing the damage. With our current laws condominium corporations often end up in court claiming costs of repair for damages attributable to owners or occupants. Obviously, going to court costs a lot of money for corporations and a lot of time for volunteer boards. Those costs often end up being shared by all of the owners in the corporation through increased monthly condo fees, special assessments, or insurance claims. Madam Speaker, this is unfair for the vast majority of condominium owners that are responsible shareholders in the condo corporation, who want their common property well maintained while keeping condo fees low and sustainable.

The 2014 amendment specifically sought to prohibit the inclusion of costs as a result of damages by an act or omission of an owner, tenant, or occupant as a contribution. This was wrong, Madam Speaker. If this had gone forward, corporations would have been left with no way to try to recoup those unpaid costs, leaving them having to go to court or else passing on costs to all owners to cover, including potentially the court costs incurred. Our amendments would allow condominium corporations to charge back damages directly to an owner, occupant, or the person for whom the owner or occupant is responsible, as set out in the regulation. This means that if an owner or occupant invites people over and they damage the hallways or the common room or they run into the garage door, the owner or occupant can be held responsible for repairing that damage.

The chargeback can include the cost of repairs or the insurance deductible cost, whichever is less, related cost services, as well as reasonable administrative and legal fees. This chargeback would be a contribution, so if they do not pay it, the corporation could place a caveat on the condo's title. Now the board will be able to also include reasonable administrative costs and legal fees when placing a caveat. Time and money will be saved by condo corporations, which will benefit the entire group of owners. It is hoped that this mechanism will lead to more predictable condo fees for all owners as unpredictable costs of damage can now be allocated solely to those responsible for creating it.

Finally, Madam Speaker, minor amendments. While the changes to voting rights and the introduction of damage chargebacks are the main focus of these amendments, there are some other minor changes we're making to improve the act. One of the most common questions that pops up in a condominium is the matter of who is responsible for repairing or replacing the windows and doors in the building. Is it the corporation or the individual owners? This is covered in both the act and regulation, which is confusing because the important information is not all in one place and not clear. It's often overlooked. These amendments we're proposing will make this easier to understand by moving all of the relevant sections from the regulation into the appropriate section of the act, so they'll be all together and in one place.

Exterior windows and doors will remain common property unless that particular condominium corporation's condominium plan had them listed as personal property in 2000 and also passed a special resolution before September 2002 to keep them that way. There will be no changes to who owns windows and doors because of these amendments. We're just making the legislation more user friendly and more clear for the benefit of all condo owners and all Albertans.

Another change is required in light of amendments we made last year to the regulation. In 2021, due to the removal of building assessment reports under the New Home Buyer Protection Act, we amended the condominium property regulation to replace our requirement for building assessment reports with a new converted property study. This study must be conducted whenever an existing building is being converted into a condominium and provided to potential condominium buyers before they could purchase a converted unit. Last year's changes strengthen consumer protection measures by creating clear, informative, and comprehensive requirements for the study and ensuring it is certified by an architect or an engineer. A number of wording changes need to be made to the act to reflect the new name of the study as well as to account for transitional considerations.

Lastly, we will also be repealing a couple of obsolete transitional provisions that have expired and are just simply no longer needed in the act.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I'm confident that these changes to the Condominium Property Act will bring immediate benefits to the more than 8,000 condominium corporations and 12,000 condominium owners in Alberta who are their shareholders. If passed, our government will continue to work hand in hand with the condominium industry to implement a supporting regulatory framework that will enable condo owners to take full advantage of the added flexibility we're introducing through Bill 19. I have to rephrase that. Sorry. It's half a million owners who are their shareholders. For these reasons, I am pleased to bring this bill forward and move that it be read for a second time.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Wonderful.

Welcome to our guests in the gallery. I hope you find this evening riveting. It's been a while since we had guests in the evening, so this is a first for us. Welcome, welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I will attempt to be as riveting as possible for our guests in the gallery although I'd like to get them to lower their expectations right from the get-go, and then they'll be less disappointed.

It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 19, the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022. It's good to see that the government is bringing forward this piece of legislation. I have a number of questions. I have a couple of concerns. There are a couple of points, from my understanding of my first reading of this bill – again, recognizing, Madam Speaker, that first reading was recently tabled.

I want to start off my comments by just flagging to members – and I appreciate the member that moved second reading on behalf of the minister was, you know, reading second reading notes, and I appreciate most of the comments. There were a couple in there that were a little bit of a drive-by to our party, which I think is quite unnecessary.

I recognize that modernizing condominium legislation is important. Our government did start that work. I was, for a period of about six months, the Minister of Service Alberta. I did engage in a number of consultations with condominium owners, condominium associations who were asking for an update, which is completely reasonable. Members will hear in my comments that there are certain aspects of this bill that I do find reasonable and that I can support.

I'm hoping to bring to members' attention that, yes, we may have two different political frames on how we deal with situations, but the fact is that we're all wanting to get to the same outcome, which is improving the current condominium legislation.

You know, I'll be the first to acknowledge, Madam Speaker, that there are a couple of – I believe we amended this piece of legislation twice in our four-year term. Was there more work to do? A hundred per cent. I'm just trying to get away from this whole "let's always blame the other side for A, B, C, D, E, F, G" as opposed to: some important first steps were made, we're moving that another step forward, and let's continue to build. I guess I'm trying to say: let's look at this from a glass-half-full point of view as opposed to a glass half empty.

Now, it should be noted that, Madam Speaker, as you're well aware, we are in the middle of an affordability crisis here in the province of Alberta due to a number of factors. You know, in this piece of legislation I think that there was an opportunity to look at how, through modernizing condominium legislation, we can make it as easy as possible for Albertans to be able to get into the housing market. Many Albertan first-time homebuyers enter the housing market through condominiums because their prices are often more affordable than single-family dwellings. We recognize that the biggest investment most Albertans will make in their lifetime is in their home, and Albertans should be able to protect that investment. It's important to ensure that condominium owners are supported and that condominiums remain affordable.

This bill does bring forward some new legislation that ensures that condominium owners are held more accountable for damages. Now, I appreciate that in her speech the member talked about how damage chargebacks will allow for condo corporations to charge condo owners for damages to common areas and property damage. It's my understanding that the government has identified this to be used for small fees. But as we've seen in many pieces of legislation, Madam Speaker, the details are left to regulations. Members of the opposition are not privy to those discussions on where that bar lies.

Again, as has been articulated many times in this place on a number of different pieces of legislation, the government says, "Trust us," and the opposition recounts numerous instances where the government has said one thing and done another and where when we talk to constituents and Albertans, they're telling us that they feel their trust is broken with the government or the government has broken their trust.

You know, my hope, Madam Speaker, is that the minister in Committee of the Whole will be able to provide a little more context on what kinds of damages or fees the condo board can impose upon condo owners. What is the government currently thinking is reasonable to put forward to cabinet to bring out in the regulations? The minister should have a number and should be well aware of it. Again, having served in this role, I know that the department would have already laid out a number of different proposals. So the minister, I hope, will be open and honest with the Assembly on his line of thinking and where he's looking at getting cabinet approval.

One of the challenges I have with this bill in its current state, Madam Speaker – and it's a pretty significant challenge – is that disputes that exist will have to go to the courts. This was something that through consultations that go back quite a ways – as far as what condo owners wanted to see, it was a dispute resolution tribunal. You know, I appreciate the government talks about how there still is due process. The challenge with the government – and it was asked today to the minister in question period, to which the minister responded that it's not something the government is currently looking at and it may come in the future. That's pretty significant.

A dispute resolution mechanism would do a number of things. One, it would ensure that condo owners have access to a process that is timely, will give them a definitive answer, and will give them access to justice. At the moment the only recourse that a condo owner has is to go to court. Well, we know for a fact that the courts are so backlogged today because of a lack of Crown prosecutors, which – instead of just saying that it's the UCP government's fault and they're terrible, I'll point out the fact that when we were government, our Justice minister was berated by the then opposition UCP about not appointing enough Crown prosecutors despite the fact that the federal government had a significant responsibility in that. Yet here we are today looking at putting a dispute resolution through the court system where there is a current lack of Crown prosecutors and more action should be taken by this government.

Mr. Shandro: You're not even going to acknowledge that I'm standing?

Mr. Bilous: I see the member is standing, but I'm not going to give way at this time.

The disappointment is that there isn't anything in this bill – and maybe this isn't the right bill – to be able to address the current backlog in the court system, but there is a backlog in our system. By not including a dispute resolution mechanism that would free up more court time, because it would be dealt with elsewhere, this is a challenge. This is a challenge that is going to burden an overburdened system. So, Madam Speaker, that's significant, the fact that there isn't a commitment from government with a time frame on when and how to implement this.

I know that in other jurisdictions, Madam Speaker, there is a tribunal system. In fact, I believe it's in British Columbia that there is a Civil Resolution Tribunal. So it'll be interesting to see – and I'm guessing maybe the minister has access to this information – looking at resolution times, so the length of time for a resolution, through a system like British Columbia that has a tribunal versus Alberta to this day, which system is more efficient, which system will save tax dollars. My guess is that a tribunal system, which diverts cases away from an overburdened court system, will be more efficient and get to a speedier outcome, which is better for condo owners but also will free up judges, Crown prosecutors, and court time. Maybe it's not Crown prosecutors, but going through the courts still is the use of court resources. That's a pretty significant piece that's missing from this bill.

There was a real opportunity, I think, to address a number of outstanding concerns. As I said at the outset, I'm not about to just stand up and criticize this bill in its entirety and, you know, blame the government for everything from the weather to – I don't know. I can't think of another example. The point is that I'm trying to look at this bill from a perspective of: what is in here that is positive, that I do like, and where can it be amended? Quite frankly, I think that's the primary role of the opposition, Madam Speaker.

Again, you know, I'll comment on – I'm sure I don't have too much time left, but I will comment on elements of this bill that I do like. The fact that changes to the voting process at condo meetings will allow easier access and quicker votes I think is a good thing. I know that that's what condo associations have been asking for. I appreciate that this government, through this piece of legislation, is continuing the work that was started under the previous NDP government. That's a compliment to both governments, which I appreciate is probably a rarity in this place.

Part of another area just of concern is again: how much of the detail is being left to regulations? I appreciate the argument that if you put everything into legislation and, let's say, there's a piece that the government gets wrong or that needs to be tweaked, it has to go through a lengthy process to be revamped. I get that. But there are a number of elements of this bill that are being left to regulations.

You know, I do appreciate a comment that the minister made in, I believe it was, his press release, when he just talked about some of the changes being made – for example, when we're talking about damage to elevators, garage doors, common spaces – that this legislation is intended to protect responsible owners and ensure that they're not bearing the costs of the irresponsible condo owners. I appreciate that. I think, in fact, most condo owners would also appreciate that, that there should be a certain respect of their shared areas. I think most people follow that, but of course there are examples of those who do not, and it can be quite costly.

I will wrap up my comments, Madam Speaker, by saying that, again, this bill, I think, has some elements that I could support. It's got some shortcomings. I'm hoping the minister will be open to a robust dialogue and potentially amendments coming from the opposition or government to augment and enhance this bill. I will state that we are in second reading. I haven't had a full, in-depth analysis of the bill at this point in time but wanted to at least get some of my initial observations of the bill on the record, again recognizing that, you know, there is more work to be done in this area and that condo owners are looking for enhancements to existing pieces of legislation.

With that, Madam Speaker, I will take my chair. I'm interested and eager to hear comments from members. At this point I see my colleague the Minister of Justice rising, and I will give way.

9:00

The Deputy Speaker: Is this an intervention?

Mr. Shandro: Nope. No. He didn't accept the intervention.

Mr. Bilous: Oh.

Mr. Shandro: Oh. You are? I thought you didn't accept the intervention.

Mr. Bilous: No. I wanted to. I thought I was, but I just realized that I don't think I can give an intervention because I'm the first responder to . . .

Mr. Shandro: You said you were done.

The Deputy Speaker: Oh, that's fair.

Are you done speaking then? You have about two minutes.

Mr. Bilous: Well, I'm in the middle of wrapping up. This was, like, the crescendo of my speech, and it's been interrupted, Madam Speaker. I hope that Hansard will – no; I hastily tried to give you the floor, through you, Madam Speaker, to the minister, although now I'm very interested to hear what he's going to say with his full 15 minutes.

With that, Madam Speaker, the jury is still out on whether I'll be supporting this bill or not. There are elements that I'm intrigued by. There are certain elements that I do support, and we'll see where we end up with this bill post Committee of the Whole.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise because I'm inspired by the words of my friend the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. I've seen a theme in what he's said in the Chamber for the last week, I mean, I think even on Monday. We see his comments in the Chamber that evening, tonight: there's a bit of a theme of him advocating for being the elder statesman here in the Chamber, advocating for decorum, advocating for us to consider working together. On Monday I think he was saying that if only we could see fewer personal attacks, for example, in this Chamber. And as I walked home after hearing those words, which I agreed with, I just thought how frustrating it must be for him to be in a caucus that listens so little to him.

Now here he is advocating for us to be able to work together, be able to listen even if we come from different political perspectives in this Chamber, to be able to debate various pieces of, at some times, like this piece, nonpartisan legislation, to be able to come to the right solution for Albertans. Yet here we see the member, for whom I have a lot of respect, saying something that is grossly incorrect, that we have this shortage of prosecutors.

One thing he said that was correct is that when they were in government, the former Minister of Justice and Solicitor General under an NDP government did have that legitimate criticism, and they only had at that time 404 prosecutors, but today we have 453. And, yes, there are vacancies for us to be able to fill. I think there are 42 further vacancies for us to fill, and we have the commitment to prosecutors to fill those vacancies, and that is frustrating for them, and we're committed to working with them.

But we keep on seeing the NDP saying things that are blatantly untrue, in particular when it comes to our workforce capacity. We keep on seeing the NDP saying for years that we have doctors fleeing the province, which is not true. We continue to see doctors, net increases in numbers of doctors, coming to this province. We've heard – I remember hearing in question period from Edmonton-Manning that we as a government have fired nurses. Blatantly incorrect. We have increases, hundreds if not thousands of increases, in nurses in government compared to when the NDP were in government. Now we have this comment.

Madam Deputy Speaker, I see you having concerns about the relevancy. I am answering to the advocacy of the member opposite and correcting what was said that was inaccurate. I thank him, though, for his words Monday night and tonight, and I hope that all of us do listen to those words, but I hope that he is included in the audience and listening to the words that he's saying tonight.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister, for that.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I welcome the opportunity to actually get us back on to the bill itself after our meandering. I certainly don't agree with much of what I just heard. I think I could spend a lot of time arguing against it and demonstrating that it isn't accurate, but I think we should probably stick to the bill at hand, as I'm sure you would like us to do.

I want to just talk about a couple of different areas of this in our first conversation about this bill. Of course, I think that updating the regulations regarding condominiums is something that everyone, on both sides of the House, I think, would generally agree with. Of course, the NDP, when they were in government, introduced many of the changes that were required. Some of them we anticipated would be brought forward by proclamation by the UCP and were not. Much of what we're seeing here is work that was originally conducted in consultations by the previous government and introduced into legislation by the previous government but was hampered by the current government. I'm glad to see that after three years they sort of have found the light but, unfortunately, have done so in a pale way.

I certainly would have appreciated it had they just simply moved ahead with the regulations as had been written by the previous government because we wouldn't be having to spend our time now relitigating that which was already litigated in this House. And, really, it's not that contentious. We all in this House understand that buying a place to live is actually one of the significant historical moments in the lives of many people. Not often do you spend this kind of money on anything else. It's usually the largest purchase ever made by an individual, and it certainly allows them to participate in the economy in a very different way as they build equity and then they're able to use that equity to engage in a variety of other factors.

I certainly have learned the significance of having that kind of equity when I work with First Nations, where many people who live on reserve lands cannot develop that equity and subsequently have a great deal of difficulty in moving ahead financially.

So I welcome any attempt to move forward to make purchasing property more readily available to people in society and to ensuring that when they do purchase that property, they have every opportunity to be successful. But I also appreciate that that means they have responsibilities that go along with the privileges of ownership. In this case I see that the intent of the government here is to ensure that that responsibility is, you know, appropriately handled in a good way.

I think I'd like to talk about two aspects of the bill that I think are problematic and that perhaps we can come to some conclusion on. The first one is short, because it's actually the change in the voting procedures. I know that the primary change here is moving from the ability to use unit votes – that is, each unit in the building gets one vote on a decision – to having owner votes; that is, if there are multiple owners of a unit, they can all vote in a meeting, and so on.

I understand the reasoning for this. You want to be able to have people come into a meeting. You want to encourage all participation of everybody in the building to come down and do part of this work of managing your condominium board and so on. So, you know, facilitating the ease with which all that happens seems to make some sense. And I wasn't particularly worried about this section because it actually indicates that while owner votes are being used, a request for unit votes can be made and must be adhered to if that request is made. So we are back to the place of one unit, one vote.

I wasn't going to comment too much on this section until I heard the Member for Grande Prairie talk about this section of the bill and suggest that it made some sense to move toward owner votes rather than unit votes, not for the reason I just explained, the ease of moving things along, but because she suggested that it makes sense that those who had more invested should have more voice. I think that's a very particularly dangerous idea. It's an idea that those with wealth have more voice in a democracy, something that I find abhorrent. Now I'm very concerned about whether or not I should support the bill because if we allow ourselves to believe that those with more money should actually, literally have more votes in this case – because they have a bigger unit and have more people involved in the ownership of it, is the argument that was presented – then we are suggesting that all people are not equal and that money trumps citizenship rights, and this is something that I cannot support.

Now, having come into the House wondering whether I will support the bill, I am nervous to support the bill. I only bring this up because of my concern at hearing the message being given by the Member for Grande Prairie, but I can see that as the bill is written, it actually does allow for people to request the unit vote and that that takes precedence once the request is made. It makes me feel like maybe I don't need to be completely nervous about that. I just was very concerned at what I heard and felt, that in a democratic society that kind of presentation of ideas needs to be addressed immediately. Having done so, I'll move on to the other concerns that I have with regard to the bill.

Now, the whole intent of this section of the bill is a problem that many condominium boards and condominium owners were experiencing with damages being done in common areas that were very difficult to recoup, and I realize that that is a problem. I certainly have had conversations with condominium boards in my area that had suggested that that was the issue. The problem presented to us when we were in government and, I assume, also presented to members opposite is that the only way, really, to recoup those costs was to take someone to court for the damages and sue them as someone who has done something to your property, not as a member of the condo but just as someone who – the same as if someone randomly had walked down the street and, you know, pulled your lamppost down. The condo owners were saying: "This doesn't make sense. We actually should have some mechanism within the condominium act to allow us to actually address these kind of problems, to levy a fine just for the cost of the damage that's being done."

The whole point of this is to remove the problem of damages being done from the court system, so something I can support although I would've liked to have seen, of course, some more detail in terms of the thresholds that would be allowed. Are you allowed to do this for any amount of damage done, or is it, as in some places, like in British Columbia, only for damages under $5,000? What are the mechanisms for ensuring that? Now, I guess some of that is going to come out in terms of regulations, so I will have to wait, but that always makes us nervous on this side of the House, because we certainly see that regulations are frequently used by this government to do things that were not what we expected to have happen, and it's very discouraging when we see it.

What they have done in this case is they have said to the owner-operators – that is, the corporations – that "We don't want you to have to go to court," and then they immediately set it up so that now the individual who is being charged has to go to court. We have a situation of what's good for the goose should be good for the gander, but it is not. In this case, as the Conservatives so often do, they came down on the side of corporations and went against the individual. So the individual doesn't have the privilege of going to a process that is outside of court in order to challenge any fines that are levied against them.

If the Conservatives felt that it was important enough to move this out of the court system in order to, you know, move it to an appropriate place in terms of handling it and to keep these kinds of things out of what is already an overburdened and difficult court system to get justice in our society right now because of the cutbacks and the fact that the federal government was prepared to provide us with more judges but this government failed to apply for them – we're in a difficult place in terms of the pressure on the courts right now, so I supported the intent here. And then what did they do? They put us back into the courts except that, in this case, they put an individual with fewer resources in the difficult place of having to do it rather than the corporation. So you protect the corporation, but you don't protect the individual. What does that say about your value system?

That's why I am concerned about this particular bill. They could have resolved this by simply doing nothing; that is, all they had to do was put forward the regulations as designed by the previous government for the enactment of a tribunal system for resolutions to take place outside of the court system. All they had to do was just get out of the way, yet again, as we have seen so many times with this government, they got in the way. They got in the way in order to make life better for corporations and more difficult for average citizens in this province, and that's very problematic.

You know, I tend to have faith in people, for the most part, in that if they've done something bad like, say, ruined a garage door, it was probably by accident. It's unlikely that you intentionally ran your car into a garage door in order to cause conflict or damage to a building, but you may have done so because there were slippery conditions or any other number of things. I think we should start in the place that the individual who is being questioned for the damages was not a horrible human being trying to do something terrible but, rather, someone who found themselves doing something by accident that was quite unfortunate and, as such, should be treated to the possibility that they can talk about what was happening for them, how it came to be, and to raise any mediating factors that would suggest that maybe it wasn't completely their fault and so that costs might be shared.

It seems like a fairly decent thing to do, especially for people who are having to live together because they have a shared investment in a condominium, and a tribunal would have allowed that to happen. If the government had simply gone ahead with the tribunal as written up by the previous government, we would not be in the place of having this discussion today, and we would not be in the place of the Conservatives yet again making a decision on behalf of corporations that they will not give to individual citizens. Why they are always doing that I actually, really, do not understand.

Now, other places in the country have similar things to the tribunal, at least things that could have been used as a model if they didn't want to use exactly the one that had been set up under the NDP government. Ontario, for example, has an arm's-length one, and they just have a $50 charge for every unit in order to help pay for those tribunal costs. Nova Scotia actually has a condominium dispute officer, so a person whose job it is to resolve these kinds of things. In all of these cases the government has not set up the individual against the corporation. They've simply provided an opportunity to do that without having to go to the courts. This government, though, has pushed us back into the courts, has made the decision that the burden for that court action is now on the person with the least amount of resources – and the individual always has less than the large corporation does – and it was unnecessary to do it. There is no imperative to go in this particular direction.

Thank you.

9:20

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on Bill 19 in second reading? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to offer some comments as well on Bill 19, the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022. Let me just, first, thank my colleagues from Grande Prairie, Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, the Minister of Justice, and Edmonton-Rutherford for their thoughtful comments.

I just wanted to say that, you know, the minister meandered off topic, and I think my friend from Edmonton-Rutherford called him out on that. He was, like: "Hey, that's the opposition's job, to try desperately to fill time on bills. That's not the minister's job. He's got many more important things on his plate, including a pending Crown prosecutor strike." So I hope that he does his job and lets the opposition do our job, which is trying desperately to tie anything that we want to talk about to the things that we have to talk about, like the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, Madam Speaker.

I do want to talk about comments related to three things. First of all, I do want to address the issue of affordable housing, because I think that condominiums are an important part of the puzzle of solving the problems of affordable housing. I do want to talk about some of the issues that condominium owners in my riding are facing and how they're not addressed in this piece of legislation. Then I want to talk specifically about the issue of a condominium owners tribunal and why that's left out of the legislation and what I hope to see this government take action on in the very near future.

First of all, my comments on affordable housing. Madam Speaker, I have lived in the province of Alberta for almost my entire life, and I will say that the affordability crisis in this province is as bad as I remember it ever being, possibly with the exception of skyrocketing mortgage rates and inflation in the early 1980s, when Albertans were just leaving their keys in the mailbox and going back to Ontario and Newfoundland and wherever they came from before they moved to Alberta to work. It is harder now, I think, to afford a house in Alberta than it has been at almost any other time in our history.

We are certainly seeing the effects of this affordability crisis every day in the riding of Edmonton-Gold Bar. I saw an article reporting that the city of Edmonton is seeing skyrocketing homelessness rates. We certainly see that every day in Edmonton-Gold Bar. The boundaries of my riding include the North Saskatchewan River valley on the north side and the Mill Creek Ravine on the west end of the riding. Those river valley locations are now the homes of what appear to be hundreds of people who can't afford to live anywhere else. It's creating an incredible amount of stress not just for those people who find themselves without homes but for the people in the communities that neighbour those areas as well. It's creating a lot of hardship for everybody, and the government is not doing anything to support people in being able to afford a home.

I recognize, Madam Speaker, that affordability is not the only consideration when it comes to contributing factors to the houselessness crisis – there is a complicated web of circumstances that people find themselves in that contribute to being without a home – but the government is doing its level best to make sure that it doesn't address any of those circumstances whatsoever. In fact, we see the government walking away from a number of commitments that it had made previously to deal with this issue.

I'm thinking specifically about a couple of supportive housing projects that the city of Edmonton is building in my riding, one in King Edward Park and the other in the Terrace Heights neighbourhood. Because the provincial government has failed to live up to the expectations that it set for itself to provide funding for those projects, now the city of Edmonton is in the position of having to fund those entirely on their own, with no help from the provincial government. What were supposed to be incredibly innovative, very helpful supportive housing projects will be a shell of their original intent. I'm afraid that instead of helping to address the houselessness crisis that we see every day in Edmonton-Gold Bar, it will only make matters worse or, at the very least, be an expensive failed attempt at addressing the homelessness crisis. I certainly hope that the government turns its mind to addressing other issues of housing affordability to the same extent that it's turning its mind to addressing the issues that condominium owners face.

Now, I will say that this bill is remarkable in that it neglects to actually address the issues that condominium owners are talking to me about these days. Madam Speaker, the number one issue that I've heard from condominium owners over the last three years, since the last election, is the issue of skyrocketing condominium insurance. Almost every condominium complex in my riding has had somebody come forward to my office to tell me about the financial hardship that the condominium boards find themselves in because of skyrocketing condominium insurance rates. I know that many condominium corporations in my riding have had to level special assessments against their owners just to cover the massive increases in condominium insurance that those boards have faced over the last couple of years. That's not fair. It creates an affordability crisis that the condominium corporations are not able to address. It's well within the purview of this government to address the issue of skyrocketing condominium insurance, and they are doing nothing about it.

In fact, I'm beginning to think, Madam Speaker, that the more profits that flow into insurance companies, the happier this government is. We certainly see that with car insurance, we see that with life insurance, we see that with other types of home insurance, and we're seeing it with condominium insurance. It sure would be nice if we had a government that actually acted in defence of everyday, average Albertans instead of acting in the interests of profitable insurance corporations. That's something that I would like to see the government bring forward in the very near future, action on the issue of controlling the cost of condominium insurance.

Lately we've also been hearing a lot from condominium owners in the Edmonton-Gold Bar constituency about the skyrocketing utility rates. Now, a good deal of condominium corporations levy a condominium fee against the owners and residents of the condominium corporation that includes some of the utility costs. It's either heat or electricity. Some or all of these costs are covered through the levying of a condominium fee, and many condominium associations now are faced with hiking their condominium fees significantly just to be able to afford the utility costs. That's also not fair.

It's even more frustrating for condominium owners in my riding because, unlike on the issue of condominium insurance, where the government has made no promises to provide affordability relief to those people who have to pay those costs, this government has made a promise to get utility costs under control. Yet we've seen them fail to live up to the commitments that they've made time and time again, ever since we heard the throne speech at the end of February. Condominium owners are waiting patiently, incredibly patiently, for relief on their utility costs, and there's nothing in this bill that will provide that for them.

I certainly hope that we hear from the government soon about when condominium owners can expect some kind of relief on their utility rates, because they can't afford to wait much longer. They've run out of patience with this government.

I want to turn now to this issue of a condominium tribunal, which is also not in this piece of legislation, but my friend from Edmonton-West Henday asked the minister to address the issue of condominium tribunals. When she responded to my friend in question period earlier this afternoon, she said: what a lovely idea; we should do something about that sometime. Unfortunately, what we're seeing is that now is not the time that the government thinks that they should do something about it, which makes me wonder, well, when? If the government thinks that it's a great idea, why not put it into this legislation now?

Because it's certainly the case, Madam Speaker, that condominium owners and condominium boards have long needed an effective dispute resolution system that diverts people from the courts. It will save those people time and money, and it will also provide people with modest means an avenue to seek justice when one would be denied to them because they can't afford to go to court.

Let me just say that I think that Alberta has long been an innovator in this space of providing quasi-judicial bodies to resolve disputes outside of the courts. [interjection] I'm sorry that the Minister of Infrastructure is so bored listening to the debate. You know, if he's frustrated with the things that I have to say, I challenge him, then, to bring forward amendments to actually address the concerns of condominium owners. I'm sure that he has the same complaints to his office that I'm getting in to my office in Edmonton-Gold Bar. The only advantage that I have is that I don't have the power, as a member of the opposition, to bring forward the kind of meaningful legislative changes to actually address those issues. But the Minister of Infrastructure does, so why doesn't he, instead of just expressing his discontent with having to be here, actually do something meaningful to address the serious and legitimate concerns that people who live in condominiums bring forward day after day after day?

On the issue, though, of tribunals, Madam Speaker. As much as I would love to see this piece of legislation contain some kind of framework for a quasi-judicial dispute resolution system, I have my doubts that the government would actually fulfill its commitment even if it made one. The reason I say that is because we saw early on in the spring of 2020 the government bring forward changes to the residential tenancy dispute system to allow for mobile-home site owners to bring their disputes to the residential tenancy dispute resolution service, which was a much-welcomed change. But what I said at the time – and I tried to bring forward amendments to actually solve some of the problems that we were pointing out at the time, which, unfortunately, the government voted down without really giving a fair hearing to or even coming up with a meaningful compromise. We see those problems manifesting themselves to this very day.

You know, one of the things that we told the government at the time was that the cap on the damage limits that currently existed in the RTDRS were too low, that $50,000 was too low; it needed to be raised. In fact, the government could just proclaim a section of the Provincial Court Act, as I understand it, that would raise the limit of damages that can be sought in the Provincial Court to $100,000. They don't even have to make a legislative change. They could just proclaim that today if they wanted to. That's something that I think would apply to a condominium tribunal as well, because the damages that condominium boards and condominium owners fight over are significant.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I don't think that the $50,000 charge would be adequate for a tribunal should the government ever put forward the effort to bring forward such a thing to the Legislature.

The other issue that we see . . . [Mr. Schmidt's speaking time expired]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there are others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning is rising.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Pleasure to rise to speak to the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022. I do want to follow up on the comments here on the tribunal that my colleague was speaking about, and the reason for that is that I'm a little concerned about how the process will work when it comes to individuals that may be residing in these condos or, for example, renters that may be living in these condos that may be considered nuisances – nuisance? It's late.

Mr. Neudorf: A nuisance.

Ms Sweet: A nuisance – yeah; thank you for the help – to their neighbours or may not be able to get along with their neighbours or however that would look, that ultimately would become targeted by their surrounding residents. The reason that I'm concerned about that is that if we start looking at a chargeback process, the chargeback process sets up a system where basically the individual is assumed guilty and must prove innocence versus being able just to be deemed innocent and therefore being proven guilty.

You know, an example of that might be something where it's a townhouse situation, and there are individuals who have shared walls, and somehow mice get into the building or something like that happens. It creates issues for more than one resident, but for some reason there is only one resident that is targeted as being the issue. There may not be enough evidence to substantiate that that's where the mice came in. There may be pre-existing relationships where there have been conflicts in the past, where people decide that that is the resident that they would prefer to maybe have move out, or they would like to make it as uncomfortable as possible so that they choose to vacate the residence, or whatever that process is.

I think the issue here is that it doesn't set up an environment where we can ensure that people are being protected. That is where I struggle with this piece of legislation. I think that if there was a process within the legislation that would ensure that condo owners, or if they have renters, have a mechanism where they're able to go through a process that is a fair process, that is a balanced process and doesn't assume that the individuals are guilty first, then maybe this bill wouldn't be as problematic as I think it is. But that is where I fundamentally struggle. To not have a tribunal, which exists in other jurisdictions, that allows individuals to be able to go through somewhat more of a mediation process, then I think that it has a potential to be used maliciously. I'm not saying that the legislation is being drafted in that context. But because of how it is drafted, it could be used maliciously to target individuals residing in condos.

I think we all come from a place of good intention, and the intent is not to have that happen. However, I'm sure at some point all of us have lived in communal spaces, whether it be an apartment building, a condo, a dorm, any of those sorts of things, where there are tense relationships between your neighbours. Those relationships can sometimes escalate and can create very uncomfortable situations. This would be a tool, then, that could be used to try to penalize an individual or a group of individuals, to try to encourage them to vacate a premises or to make it financially inconvenient, I guess would be a word, to try to encourage them to move on. I don't think that we should be looking at a piece of legislation that has the potential to do that without putting safeguards in place.

When we look at other jurisdictions that do have this piece, this buyback component, we have seen that there is that component that is attached to it. We also only have one other jurisdiction in the country that actually does this, which I believe is Ontario. But if we look at British Columbia, we look at Ontario, Nova Scotia, they all have some form of a tribunal process.

In B.C. the tribunal process is able to resolve disputes for any amount and handles other issues that are under $5,000. So if there is damage to your neighbour's property from bedbugs, for example, that may somehow get through the walls, that can go to a tribunal before it is deemed that that person is guilty. I think that's important to have because, again, to target – I think, you know, I'll go back to using the bedbugs example. Bedbugs spread quite quickly and are very hard to get rid of. If you're living in a condo situation that is an apartment-style condo or even a row house and bedbugs are able to get from one unit to another unit and to spread and you have to fumigate, you don't necessarily know. People can assume that there may be a specific unit where they're coming from, but you have to be able to demonstrate that there is evidence of that, and this doesn't allow that to happen. What this does is that it allows for someone to target a specific unit and say: that's the unit that has the bedbugs, and that unit now should be responsible to fumigate the whole building. It's a problem.

Again, if you were in B.C., that would go to a tribunal. The decision would be made. Evidence would have to be provided to substantiate that that person is actually, as would be said, guilty of creating that nuisance and creating that financial cost. In Ontario, you know, again, there's a tribunal authority which supports condominiums and does have a levy. You still have to pay an administrative fee, but it also can do, like, mediation and dispute resolutions. The same with Nova Scotia.

So I think if we're going to look at a piece of legislation that's going to enable this to happen, there has to be a mechanism in place to create fairness. I would be curious to hear from the government why there wasn't a mechanism considered to ensure that condo owners aren't being deemed guilty immediately and why there isn't an appropriate process so that when these financial levies are being placed on to a condo owner, it is done within due process.

I mean, I think we've all at some point experienced a conflict where, you know, people get annoyed because their neighbours aren't shovelling their sidewalks or whatever, and you have to go and talk to their neighbour. Sometimes those conversations go well, and sometimes those conversations don't go well. I'm sure there are members in this Chamber who have worked in enforcement that have probably responded to some of those calls about conflicts between neighbours. How quickly those situations can escalate. So to put neighbours against neighbours to have to resolve these issues I don't think is necessarily the best approach, to be fair.

I think that, you know, we have a mechanism under the landlord and tenant act where if there is a dispute between a landlord and a tenant, they can go to the landlord and tenant act and they can have resolution and they can have mediation, and those processes can be followed to make sure that both parties are entering into the conversation with clear definitions and clear roles and responsibilities and outcomes so that if there is rent that is due or if there are damages to property or any of those things, there is a very clear, defined mechanism that's in place and there is an opportunity for someone to be an intervenor.

So why we wouldn't do something similar for that when it comes to condos I'm a little bit confused by, because ultimately those relationships are similar. You are working in communal spaces, and everybody has a financial invested interest in those spaces. Most condos are, obviously, owned. There is, as we all know when it comes to our financial investments, some emotional attachment to those investments, and you want to make sure that your investment is protected. I would have liked to have seen under this amendment that there is a mechanism for that to happen.

If the government doesn't think that the tribunal is the best mechanism, that's fine, but then what is the mechanism? What is the government willing to do to put in place to ensure that this happens? It can't happen under regulation. There have to be some teeth within the legislation that is enabling this to happen. To put it in regulation doesn't create the same form of legality, I guess, that you would need, especially when it comes to providing and enforcing some form of financial penalty. I mean, that is one of my biggest concerns. Again, I appreciate that the government is not totally keen on it, but I would encourage them to look at coming back to the Legislature and providing the tool that they would be willing to look at, then. When you start talking about being able to leverage penalties, which is what I think – you know, we talk about a buyback. That is sort of – it is a penalty, a lien on an owner. There should be something in place that allows that mediation and that adjudication to happen.

Now, in relation to some of the other pieces of the legislation around voting, I'm a little confused around why the government felt that if there are two people that are residents of a property, they both need voting rights. I'm curious to hear about what the need behind that was. I think that if you have one person in the home, odds are you're talking to the other person in the home and you probably have a consensus, but maybe you don't. I mean, it is stuff that's pretty simple. You're talking about agendas and approval of agendas. You're not getting into some of the more maybe controversial discussions around approving of, you know, upgrading of infrastructure that's going to cost and increase condo fees or any of that kind of stuff. I mean, I am curious as to why that was deemed a necessity and why it needed to be legislated through this piece of legislation, but I guess it is what it is.

I mean, I think that is the biggest piece that I think I wanted to speak to, so I won't carry on farther than that. I would like at some point maybe someone from the government to explain, though, why we wouldn't try to create a tribunal, or whatever you want to call it, to ensure that mediation and adjudication is available and appropriate so that when these conflicts arise, they can be done in a supportive way and not create further conflicts that could escalate to uncomfortable situations for other residences.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this evening to speak to Bill 19, the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022. I have to say that I really appreciate the comments of the debate tonight. You know, this is something that I can speak to with personal experience.

When I was considering a career in social work, I took a job through the city of Edmonton to become a mediator, and part of that training was being able to shadow mediators and be part of the process through the city of Edmonton. My very first real-life mediation was through a condo in Edmonton, and it was the condo board and the residents of that condominium. You know, I was able to see first-hand what, essentially, I guess, a tribunal could be. It was the city of Edmonton that provided a mediation service. I was there as a mediator. The whole purpose of that was to allow the condo residents and the board to come together, both share their sides.

I'm not sure, Mr. Speaker, if you've ever been part of a mediation, but it truly is a collaborative process, where the whole purpose of the mediation is to be able to collectively present your issues, your concerns, have the reasons why those concerns haven't been addressed, and to come up with a mutually satisfied agreement. It's traditionally lower cost. It's traditionally much more easier to arrange. From being a mediator and also later in my career working in the courts, I can say that a mediation is a lot more collaborative, friendly experience.

So when we're talking about condominiums – and, you know, I think this piece of legislation does have some things that make sense when it comes to the ease of voting, those types of things. Those make sense, but we're in the middle of an affordability crisis. We're in the middle of an Alberta court system that is not doing what it needs to do. There's a tremendous backlog.

I can't see how creating a piece of legislation where the first step is to force resolution through the courts is the answer. I know that through the court system there are many systems within that, like JDR, judicial dispute resolution. Those are opportunities within the court system itself that allow individuals to have something alternative to court. Even the courts have acknowledged that there's space where it should be resolved outside of the formal court setting. When I see this come forward and I see that it's missing, you know, kind of the piece that absolutely makes sense, which would be a tribunal, I'm just confused why that's been neglected, why the first step is to go to court when even the courts themselves are structured in a way that tries to use court as the last resort.

There are many different plays and features that are structured within the court system itself that would allow people to resolve their issues outside of needing to be in court. That's because the cost of running court cases is quite expensive. The manpower, the space, having lawyers and judges and clerks and all of those people that are required just to have a hearing can be quite financially cumbersome, but it's time as well. Trying to find docket time is difficult. Trying to find time where all members can come together with that court time is difficult.

When I think to my experience in both the court system and the mediation system – and it's interesting that my first experience was through a condominium – it worked. Having a neutral third party bring the parties together in a space that was agreed upon by both parties was effective. It took a few hours, but at the end of the day, Mr. Speaker, what happened was that they came to an agreement, which is binding through a mediation agreement. We had capacity as the mediators to create an agreement. It wasn't just an arbitrary meeting. There was a result at the end of it. I know that through a tribunal there is also the opportunity to have a court order at the end of it.

So it takes what the courts are already doing in the sense of trying to avoid court time, yet this piece of legislation goes straight to court. I think that when we're talking about ways to make life easier and more affordable for Albertans, doing that only makes sense, so I just am unclear about why that piece is missing. I know that when we were government, we had started that process, but that didn't translate. We know that that was being asked, and it's not reflected in this piece of legislation.

You know, when we look at investments that Albertans make, I would argue that probably a home is one of the biggest purchases. This is a thing that people aren't just going to want to leave unresolved. This is something that they've invested their hard-earned money into, their home. It's a place that is often a sanctuary for us, and when there is a dispute that requires intervention, it's something that should be dealt with efficiently and in a timely manner. Leaving that out of this just simply doesn't make sense, Mr. Speaker.

I know that the issues that I was participating in were things that the residents of this condominium had been struggling with for quite some time. Usually what happens is that it's attempted to be resolved at the board level, so it's quite extreme when it gets to the place where they feel that it can't be resolved, but the next step shouldn't be court. We're looking at a court system right now in Alberta that is incredibly far behind. There are trials that are being dismissed based on time alone, not on anything other than that. To think that something that's impacting your residents needs to go before a court is quite significant.

I think when we hear the government talk about really wanting to help and make a difference, there are pieces of this legislation that do make some changes and make some streamlining decisions, but I don't think court is the solution for condo owners when there is conflict. These are their neighbours. These are people that they live with, that they see perhaps every day. To make it such an extreme resolution doesn't make the situation any better, Mr. Speaker. I can tell you that by the time, in my experience, matters get to court, everything else has been exhausted. It is kind of a last step, last resort, place.

I can tell you that the lawyers that I've worked with over the years and the judges that we've put matters before really try hard to try everything else – mediation, JDRs, even conversations off the record – to try and resolve things, so I think a tribunal would have been the logical first step when we're looking at resolving issues with condo owners. This isn't something that is a major corporation fighting this unknown entity. This is your neighbour, these are the people that you see every day, and it's your home. I would hope that a piece of legislation could have really incorporated what Albertans are asking for, and an easier way to dispute and resolve issues should have been included. Like, we have no understanding why it wasn't included in the bill. We have no understanding if it was based on cost, if it was accessibility. It just doesn't make sense when the UCP had promised that they would create a tribunal, and then it's not in the legislation where it could have been created.

I think that, you know, being able to be in this position and have that insight into what Albertans are asking for is incredible, and I know that a tribunal is what has been asked. I think that when we're talking about legislation, we need to be honest about what's in front of us and what's missing. I think that that is glaringly obvious, that that is a big piece that has been left out of this legislation. I would love to hear some of that rationale and reasoning, and I hope that in further debate we do get to hear this.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Speaker: The deputy government whip.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move that the Assembly be adjourned until 9 a.m. on Thursday, April 28, 2022.

Bill 19

Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate April 27: Ms Goehring]

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm always delighted to rise from my seat in this Legislature to speak about real estate matters. Of course, having been in the industry as a real estate agent for 30 years prior to becoming elected, amendments to the Condominium Property Act are something that certainly interest me. I'm happy to engage in debate, and I look forward to a healthy discussion on this piece of legislation regarding changes to the Condominium Property Act brought forward by the Minister of Service Alberta.

I can't say that I'm overly happy with this piece of legislation and the proposals therein. We could have accomplished, I think, so much more, and what it attempts to do, I don't think it does well. We're in the midst of an affordability crisis in this province, and the UCP have done little to address that with respect to housing. The Condominium Property Act amendments are going to potentially add costs and risk to condominium property owners as a result of the changes that are contained in it. Housing is unaffordable to so many people as it is already, and even the inherent risk in some of these changes is something that might cause millennials, in particular, to decide not to enter into a contract to buy a condominium because of the potential loss of their equity as a result of a dispute that they have no means to resolve other than going through the courts. I'll talk a little bit more about that as my comments progress.

What the UCP has done with this bill is avoided something that we called for early on in changes to the Condominium Property Act which occurred in 2014, much of which was not proclaimed until later on. In fact, the UCP decided to delay the proclamation of much of the Condominium Property Act, 2014, to make changes to regulations, and some of those changes, actually, never got made. One of the things that I'm talking about is the establishment of a tribunal process which would have protected owners in the event of disputes and avoided a lot of court proceedings that were very costly and onerous and time consuming on the part of owners and condominium corporations as well.

Of course, the NDP government of the day had intentions to bring in a tribunal had they been re-elected. That didn't happen. The UCP decided against that, and of course we are at a situation now where there is no tribunal to resolve disputes between condo owners and corporations, and in fact that is something that will remain with these amendments to the Condominium Property Act because the UCP government and the minister have decided that they won't implement it.

That raises a serious question: why? The goal, of course, quite often in bringing forward legislation that has to do with business transactions and operation of buildings and so forth, including condominiums, usually is directed at minimizing the need to go to court to resolve disputes, and that's been inherent in some other pieces of legislation we've talked about this session. Yet in this particular bill that is avoided, and it could have easily been implemented. It would have been a very reasonable and welcome amendment or a piece of the amendment to this legislation that's before us today.

What we have instead is a piece of legislation that still allows the condo corporation, with its larger resources, to wield itself in opposition to an individual owner who may have caused damage through their tenant or just simply through a breakdown of perhaps a water pipe or something like that in their unit that may have caused damage to common property, and of course they would be liable to the condo association, potentially, for those repair costs.

A tribunal, in case of dispute between the two parties, certainly would have allowed for a much less onerous and costly and time-consuming resolution of that dispute. They can be very, very costly. You know, if you are on an upper floor and your water pipes break for some reason or leak and cause a mould issue all the way down the walls in the common property for floor after floor after floor, you can be speaking about not tens of thousands but hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of liability that the condo corporation may be seeking to eke out of the condominium property owner.

Whether or not that individual condo property owner's insurance is going to be adequate to cover such a potentially large bill would be in question. First of all, if there was a situation, in most matters, which are normally not that large, where the tribunal could be invoked or could be in place, you could avoid having the large cost of a court case, and both parties, I think, would have welcomed that. I don't understand why that tribunal was not put in place in this piece of legislation amending the Condominium Property Act.

There's also another element that has drawn my attention, and it has to do with the clarification by putting in legislation rather than in regulations the definition or, I guess, the liability direction on windows and doors. Who is responsible for damages resulting from issues arising from problems with windows and doors on condominium exterior walls? That has been a long-standing, big problem. Of course, we may all recall the so-called leaky condos issue right across the country and the severe damages and costs that they entailed, and quite often there were various significant questions and disputes between condo owners and condo property corporations as to who actually was responsible for those damages.

I might add to that list, on top of condominium exterior windows and exterior doors, the balconies. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, they were one of the major culprits in that leaky condo issue that occurred for a few decades. We've seen the results of that horrendously costly fault in design and/or construction occur many, many times in Alberta. In our city, here in Edmonton, examples are right close to the Brewery District, on a condominium right on 102nd Avenue, where a relatively new building was surrounded with scaffolding and stripped of its exterior cladding to repair the windows and balconies. In many cases what's happened is, of course, that they weren't sealed properly in installation, either the exterior foam insulation that blocked the opening and sealed the window in place and/or the door frame.

Balconies, in particular, were built so that they sloped towards the building whereas the proper method, of course, is to have the balcony sloping away from the building so that water drained off. Water was in fact collecting on balconies and draining into the units.

These, once again, Mr. Speaker, are elements of condominium living that condominium owners may or may not be aware of when they first sign a contract to get into it, but that's all the more reason why we need clarity to determine who actually is responsible for the exterior walls and doors. Who are the owners of those exterior walls and doors? Are they common property, or are they part of the unit?

This legislation, the amendment we're speaking about this morning, seems to put the definitions of ownership into a rather rigid, legislated form which may not be as efficient as it first sounds. It might prove to be a pretty unwieldy way of dealing with the situation. I'd seek a bit more clarification from the minister on this. There are many, many different styles of construction and many different layouts, many different situations where you have windows, doors, and balconies on condominium buildings, and to rigidly define them by legislating where they may be either exterior units that are condominium-owned property, like condominium corporation owned property, versus a unit-holder's property or responsibility or liability might beg lawsuits in and of themselves just in fighting over that definition.

I do seek some greater definition of that part of the legislation so that the reasoning is clear behind using the legislative tool to assign liability and/or responsibility for exterior windows, doors, and balconies versus some other mechanism via regulation or just definition. I really would like to understand why the minister felt that this was the best way to solve the disputes.

I grant, Mr. Speaker, that there have been long-standing concerns about exterior doors, windows, and balconies. The condominium corporation bylaws and those that were originally established by the building contract, the owner before it was transferred over to the individual corporation, usually would describe and define who actually owns the exterior windows, doors, and balconies; who the responsibility or liability lies with, but it was not something that was set in stone. It was optional. It was up to the original drafter of the condominium corporation bylaws to determine who the responsibility or liability would lie with.

Perhaps it was the minister's intention to clarify in legislation exactly how that would be defined. I hope it wasn't to actually try to dictate each individual situation in a one-stop shop manner as to describing all of the exterior windows, doors, and balconies as always becoming the responsibility of one party or the other, because there are too many variances, I think, to use that one-stop shop methodology. That's one significant concern that I had, and I beg for more clarity on that.

Also, on the voting procedures in condominium corporation meetings, Mr. Speaker, I'm not a hundred per cent clear, and I'd like to, really, fully understand exactly what the minister's attempted changes are. My understanding, of course, is that now, if you have unit factor voting in a meeting – you'll have normally I think it's 10,000 or 100,000 unit factors in a whole complex – each unit, according to square footage, is prorated to be a percentage of those unit factors. Each owner is assigned that number of unit factors for that unit, based on the square footage, and that then would be transferred into a voting right capacity at a meeting. So unit factor votes would be something that would be a mathematical calculation to tabulate the strength of the vote, and that's why it may be more complex to determine the outcome of a vote based on unit factors. You have to tabulate the unit factors based on the square footage owned by a particular owner.

What the legislation does, if I'm reading it correctly, Mr. Speaker, is that the votes on simple matters, like agenda changes or noncomplex issues, could be done by a simple one unit holder, one vote rather than breaking it down into unit factors proportionately for simple matters. More complex matters would potentially require a unit factor vote and all the calculations and so forth that are necessitated by that. But how, in fact, one would determine which issue would be available is then questioned.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Happy to rise this morning to add a few additional comments here around Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022. I'll just thank my friend from Edmonton-McClung for his comments. You know, it's always great to have the opportunity to tap into somebody's experience, especially for spending 30 years in the real estate sector. That knowledge can really be helpful when it comes to trying to debate such a bill as Bill 19.

It's funny. The story you were talking about with regard to construction and drainage of water on balconies: I actually have a friend who, you know, many years ago, probably upwards of 30 years ago, had to deal with that exact problem. The construction was faulty. The water was draining into there. Needless to say, the blame kept getting pointed towards him. It resulted in a very lengthy process to try to solve that, cost him a whole bunch of money, and then when it was finally actually determined that it really wasn't his fault, he had to go through the whole rigamarole and process to try to recover monies that he had spent to do that. Such a ridiculous process, really, when you think about that.

Given that, you know, when it comes to home ownership or condo ownership – probably one of the single largest purchases that somebody makes in their lifetime is around a home. Obviously, keeping those prices affordable is always a good thing. When we can get people into a home or they get into a position of being able to upgrade, somebody else then gets a chance to get into the market.

When I look at Bill 19, for all the rhetoric that I've heard from the government, the chest-beating and all the name-calling and everything like that, why the minister, who agreed that we would need some sort of dispute resolution process or tribunal or, you know, adjudicator, whatever you want to call it – where is that here in Bill 19? It's not there. So if you want to sit here and talk about how you're making life better for Albertans, how you're trying to make it more affordable for them, probably the last thing you want to do is say: we realize you have a problem; go to the courts. I can tell you right now, based on my story that I said at the beginning, that that didn't work out that great for my friend. It cost him a lot of money. If you're going to save people money, then give them something that's cheaper, which would be some kind of a dispute resolution process, which is absent here in Bill 19.

What is it? Promise made, promise broken? It's kind of sounding a little bit familiar here, Mr. Speaker. I guess we'll just add it to the list of other things that, you know, have been promised and haven't been delivered. We've heard promises around helping people with their insurance rates, especially for condo owners. I brought this up several times now in various different debates.

A senior in my riding comes into my office with two bills: his car insurance bill and his condo insurance. Condo insurance had gone up 57 per cent. For somebody on a fixed income that's a problem. I have to ask (a) where is this, you know, dispute system so that should he run into some problems, he's got a cheaper way to do it because he's busy paying his insurance hikes that you allowed to happen?

I guess that begs the next question, then, Mr. Speaker. I'm hearing: well, that's going to be coming. When? When is it coming? Next week? Next month? Next year? In due course? Heard that a few times in here. People need to know when that's coming. Kind of like their rebates. They need to know when those are coming, too, because they could use some help there as well. With everything that's been going up and dithering on getting some money out the door to people and then to present a bill where you had an opportunity to provide at least, you know, one relief system for one problem for a group of people, you leave it out. That's a little bit disappointing, to say the least.

You know, when we don't have that process, where are people going? They're going to the court systems. We've certainly heard about how backed up the court systems are. If that system is struggling, why, then, would you continue to push these cases into the courts? I'm not saying that none of them should get there. Certainly, if they start to get really complicated and, as I've heard, sometimes ugly, probably the court is where they're going to end up. If they're pretty straightforward, give them something cheaper, give them something easier. Get it out of the court system, free up the time, and you can start dealing with other matters in an expeditious way.

You know, I guess, by leaving out this system, it'd be interesting to know how you arrived at that decision. I know, Mr. Speaker, that I remember a famous thing that members of the government bench and members of the government caucus, when they served in the 29th Legislature – I believe even yourself, Mr. Speaker, might've asked once or twice during your time there: how about a cost analysis? Is it actually to the benefit of Albertans to push them through the courts, or would it be better for the economy, better for Albertans – reduce some red tape maybe – to provide a dispute resolution process?

I mean, at the end of the day, if, you know, the information that you have that informed this decision to not add this is indeed the best way to go, I'm happy to accept that. I can tell you right now that I can't just trust your word. I have some significant difficulties with that right now, Mr. Speaker. I mean, like I said, as I've said in other pieces of debate, I remember the Premier promising up and down during his leadership: I'm going to release my donor list. Great. That was awesome. Tick, tick, tick, tick, tick. We're still waiting. Haven't seen that donor list. A simple promise like that, and you wonder why I'm a little distrustful when it comes to the words: trust me; we'll take care of it.

I think more needs to be done. Perhaps maybe we could – I mean, it's second reading right now, so it's only, really, initial comments around the bill and how to, you know, ask some questions on how you've arrived here and stuff. Maybe towards Committee of the Whole we might miraculously see the minister come in and table an amendment to provide a dispute resolution process. That would be fantastic.

I know that some of my constituents would probably like to see that. I've certainly heard some concerns around that, and, as I said, the best I can do right now is just point them in another direction, saying, "You might want to talk to legal counsel and consider having to head to a court to be able to get a resolution." Of course, I always hear the same thing back, "Well, that's pretty expensive." "Yeah. It is. I'm sorry." But at the time when I was having those conversations, I was like: "You know, fingers crossed. It sounds like there might be some kind of process that will be coming in."

Well, now I get to go back and tell them, "Sorry; I guess that was just more hot air."

I will intently listen to the debate as we go along. I would certainly urge the government to try to do a little bit more here with Bill 19, and I look forward to hearing more comments.

Member Irwin: I've got an intervention for you.

Mr. Nielsen: Are they allowed?

The Speaker: Please feel free.

Mr. Nielsen: Oh, well, I would love to accept that intervention.

Member Irwin: All right. Thank you to the member for his comments so far. I know he's got a few more comments to share with us. You know, I know that member. I've spent time in his riding of Edmonton-Decore. There are condos. One of the interesting things about Edmonton-Decore is that there is a lot of sort of social housing and a real sense of community in a lot of those areas. I'm just wondering: has the member had an opportunity to talk to or hear from any condo owners in his riding? Has he heard any concerns? I'll be honest; I've not heard from condo owners in my riding. I'm just curious if you've heard any of the concerns that are outlined or aim to be addressed by Bill 19.

Mr. Nielsen: Thanks for that question. Yeah, I certainly do have a few condos that, you know, are in Edmonton-Decore. As I mentioned in my earlier comments, with the one senior that owns a condo who came in with his insurance bills, talking about his condos, I've certainly heard from some that experienced problems. I think the Member for Edmonton-McClung was also talking a little bit about the voting system. We'll have to see how these changes necessarily improve things. I mean, I wouldn't say that I've not heard concerns around that, not a lot, but let's be honest. Most people are pretty focused on their rising bills right now, everything from, like I said, their insurance to their utility bills, personal income taxes. They're losing ground in that department. Having that opportunity to at least make things a little better for them has certainly been something that's come across to me. [interjection] I must be managing to trigger a lot of questions here. I see my friend from St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you for allowing the intervention. You know, one of the things that you mentioned is the lack of a tribunal. Some of the examples we've heard from the other member is that in other jurisdictions there are tribunals for, like, dispute resolution, those kinds of things. Some of the correspondence I get from constituents that do live in condominiums are that they can't resolve issues around things like pets, odours, vaping, smoking, parking, things like that. It can be very expensive and timely and frustrating and can break down relationships in a condominium unit. It's hard to live close to people like that sometimes. I'm just wondering if it's been your experience at all to have any kind of casework or any sort of concerns around disputes like that in condominiums.

9:30

Mr. Nielsen: Yeah. Thanks for that question. No, I can't think of a specific case. I mean, I'd mentioned earlier in my comments around my one friend from years ago that had that problem with his balcony, and it turned out that it was constructed the wrong way. He was the one getting the blame for it, saying that he wasn't, you know, doing all the things he could do to mitigate that, but when it's simply built like that, what can you do?

Yeah, not necessarily in Edmonton-Decore, but I have heard of problems where a condo that used to be pet friendly had decided to change that, so there was a rather large conflict, if I remember the story correctly, around trying to get the ability to have their pet kind of grandfathered in so that they wouldn't be forced to get rid of the pet. As we all know, our fur babies, whether they be cats, dogs, or other interesting pets, become, you know, a member of the family, so a change like that can be incredibly disruptive. Of course, I guess if it gets to the point where the condo group is coming together to vote on these sorts of things, those kinds of meetings can actually really start to degrade very, very quickly when you feel like you're trying to defend your four-legged member of your family. So I've certainly heard.

There's never actually been a case like that that's come through Edmonton-Decore that I'm remembering at this moment, but I've certainly heard about it, you know, through friends and family and whatnot. So having potentially a tribunal or some kind of dispute resolution which could be affordable – like I said, one senior that I have in my riding whose insurance went up 57 per cent, car insurance went up 46 per cent. Top that with all the other expenses that are going up, like utilities, and all of a sudden the prospect of going even to a tribunal, to be quite honest, could even be potentially a barrier even though costs might be significantly lower for them.

I think there's an opportunity to try to create an atmosphere so that people don't have to necessarily go through that because we know that going through the courts is a significant cost. I understand why. Lawyers, you know, have to be compensated fairly for their time and the cases they're doing. But I think there is a better way to be able to do that, and the government fell short here on this. Again, I'm really hoping that some of these stories that we're getting the opportunity to tell here will urge the minister to maybe table some kind of amendment to introduce that into Bill 19, which will allow Albertans another process.

If you're going to stand up in the House and say, "We're making life better for Albertans; we're making life cheaper for Albertans," then you actually have to do that. Like I said, so far we're not seeing that on a lot of files, but here's an opportunity where you can actually do that. So I'm certainly urging the government to reconsider that part of Bill 19.

But, again, I'm happy to listen intently to the rest of the debate here for Bill 19. You know, I guess as we get into Committee of the Whole, there will be opportunities to maybe get up several times, maybe do a little back and forth with the minister on things. What informed the decision not to put in that tribunal? What has he heard around some of the changes that they're proposing around the voting and how that necessarily will impact renters and condo owners?

The Speaker: On Bill 19 at second reading, the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to speak to Bill 19, the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, this morning and to address some of the things that I've been listening to as well as the experience that I've had as an MLA for Calgary-Buffalo and, before that, Calgary-Fort. Both ridings have a number of condominiums, a number of rental apartments, and as I was just reviewing some of the constituent complaints that have come to my office over those seven years in those two ridings, I can tell you that a great number – the tenancy act or people in rental units is primarily the reaching out that has been done by constituents to my office, and of course we've tried to assist where we could.

There are issues of affordability not only for people who are renting but people who are purchasing condominiums. Calgary-

Buffalo, where I now represent, is probably the most dense community, the most dense riding in all . . .

The Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt. However, I'd just like to maybe remind members, while there isn't necessarily one conversation that is catching my attention, the cumulative effect of conversations in the Assembly is making it a little distracting for the Speaker . . . [interjections] Order. Particularly when the Speaker is on his feet. One particular conversation is ongoing, and it vexes the Speaker. Maybe that's a bit of an overstatement. Anyway, the long and the short of it is that if you have conversations that you'd like to have, please take them to the lounges.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: I am shocked, Mr. Speaker, that people aren't listening with rapt attention to the things I'm saying. I'll try and be a little more, you know, expressive to you all sort of to get your attention.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that the great constituency of Calgary-Buffalo has numerous condominiums, from starter condominiums to high-end condominiums. About $250,000 is a starter, to millions of dollars in downtown Calgary and the east side in the Eau Claire area, and they're gorgeous, gorgeous, gorgeous. I'm not invited into many of those high-end condominiums at this time. I hope to be there in the near future, perhaps doing coffee parties with constituents who want to fight for better condominium legislation, as we are doing on this side, or to thank me for fighting for better condominiums.

I was looking at Hansard of yesterday, and I see there's a dialogue, a question back and forth between our critic for Service Alberta and the Minister of Children's Services, who was answering questions of our critic. It focused primarily, Mr. Speaker, on the tribunal process that, interestingly, was promised way back in 2014, when this act was first initiated or first introduced to the House and passed. Here we are eight years later, and the tribunal process is still missing in action.

Four of those years, as you know, the NDP was the governing party of this province, from 2015 to 2019, and we were working on that and working towards bringing that aspect into the act, but here today the UCP government is presenting a bill without the tribunal process as part of this act. The dialogue that went on between the two speakers yesterday, our critic and the Children's Services minister, was all about the fact that the condo corporations' owners are left without a ready process to handle disputes in their condominiums.

I certainly know a little bit about that myself, being in a rental situation at this time where there's an ongoing dispute between owners. You know, it's gotten, from my perspective, a little out of hand because now the different regulatory bodies are being brought in. The city of Edmonton people are talking about going to the courts, and I just think how much easier it would be for those owners in that situation to be able to undertake a discussion at a tribunal and resolve or potentially resolve the problems that they have with each other at this juncture.

I'm also looking at the responses of the Minister of Children's Services, and it's somewhat unfortunate that while the minister talks about, you know, "We're not pursuing a condominium tribunal . . . at this time," she doesn't explain why. She says "at this time" several times and "people can go to court; we're not removing due process from those owners who want to go to court." She doesn't say "court," but she does say "due process" several times, and I'm reading into that. There's no kind of reflection about what the roadblocks are for the government to undertake that action, which is seen by many as one of the biggest stumbling blocks of this act before us today.

I'm just looking at the crossjurisdictional analyses. Of course, with any bill or legislation that's brought forward, the administration, the bureaucracy, the public service will often bring forward crossjurisdictional analyses to kind of locate where Alberta is relative to other provinces and territories. I'm just reflecting on some of that information, when I read down, that B.C., Ontario, and Nova Scotia all have versions of condo tribunals, some for many, many, many years, and they have been put in place, as our critic and I are saying, to handle those issues – lower price issues or lower cost issues is perhaps one way of saying it – in a shorter time frame, and we all know that the courts, as my colleagues were reflecting on earlier before me, are backlogged at this time, taking a long time to get the case to court, and many times people aren't satisfied with the outcome when they go through that process.

But a civil resolution tribunal revolving around condominium disputes might be a way, should be a way, could be a way, I believe is a way to speed up the resolution of problems that owners have with each other and the boards, often, that get appointed, get elected to represent them.

I wanted to reflect on that and to thank my colleague the critic for Service Alberta for dealing with this issue just yesterday in question period and, regrettably, not seeming to get an answer to the important questions that he asked.

The other provinces, crossjurisdictionally, that have – I mentioned B.C. Ontario has a tribunal authority, the Condominium Authority Tribunal. All condominiums are levied $50, I believe, a year to fund that tribunal. It's administered online, and the system goes through stages of negotiation, mediation, adjudication, and by all accounts it is a helpful process for Ontarians. Nova Scotia, similarly, has fewer condominiums there, less population, so they have an officer who is in charge of the condominium arbitration process. We probably wouldn't have just one officer in this province, being the third or fourth most populous province. As I said, in my constituency numerous new buildings are coming up, 25 to 40 storeys, that are owner-occupied condominiums or owner-rented-out condominiums. Helpfully, though, there are a number of new apartments going up that are rental, and that will help to keep the housing in downtown Calgary as affordable as possible.

But that brings me to another issue that I just wanted to bring up, and that's the rising costs of housing relative to inflation. It's a good thing that there's capacity coming along in the downtown core of Calgary. Interestingly, just yesterday the city of Calgary approved three office tower conversions. I guess "tower" might be a bit of a stretch. A 10-storey building is not a tower, necessarily, but it is going to afford eight of those storeys to be housing for people in the downtown. Let me see. That would be in the southwest part of downtown. Two others haven't had their openings or ribbon cuttings. Of course, they're not greenfield. They're conversions, so it would be a ribbon cutting for the fact that they're going to launch the start of the conversions in downtown Calgary.

That's something that the NDP has been supportive of, believing that it's a good thing to look at that 30 per cent capacity or 30 per cent vacancy in the downtown to be repurposed for other uses, knowing that it'll take decades for that 30 per cent vacancy to be absorbed by the regular business coming back into the downtown. It's something that was disappointing to hear the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation speak to and say: you know, we're believing that the downtown will basically recover on its own. That's not the way the city of Calgary believes things will go, Mr. Speaker. They believe that there need to be incentives to start the repopulation of the downtown because the number of businesses that have left, the number of head offices that have left under the UCP is significant for downtown Calgary, and the fact that the city has set out a plan to incentivize – and the NDP, were we fortunate to be government, whenever that is, will support the city of Calgary in that plan.

I just want to say again, Mr. Speaker, that when I look at the bill before us today, I know that there are some changes that are being proposed to the way votes will be tabulated. I know there are some things missing in this bill that have been identified by me and my colleagues. I think the most significant change here is the voting process at condo meetings and certainly know that that can be problematic, and anything that improves that is a good thing. The cash calls at condos for fixing things in the common property are a regular occurrence, unfortunately. My own experiences early on – when I first got elected, my spouse and I had a condo up here and took care of our area as best possible and sold out before it was required to have a cash call of us.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are the others? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, in second reading. A wonderful way to start the day is to talk about condominiums. I actually think about condominiums a lot in my life. I live in a condominium – shocking – and I have for, I guess, about 13 or 14 years now. So I have, you know, a lot of information about how condos operate, the good, the bad, and the ugly. But for the most part I think condominium living can be pretty terrific if you live in a condo that is managed appropriately and you have a board that is functional.

But one of the things, going back to this bill – and when I saw this piece of legislation come up, I was sort of excited, in a strange way, to be excited about legislation. I was excited to see what was going to be contained in the legislation. I certainly had a bit of a wish list of what I wanted to see in terms of not consumer protections but protections for both sides, for condo associations but also for the residents there. Sadly, Mr. Speaker, there are a few things in here that are good around voting, and I'll talk about that, but there's quite a bit missing, and what I think is really missing is the tribunal aspect, and I'll get to that.

But let me just say, for those of you that aren't aware of how condos operate or if you've not lived in a condo or you don't own a condo, that it actually can be a really terrific way to live. It is also particularly, I think, a good housing option for a lot of groups that maybe can't afford traditional single-family homes and things like that or even duplexes, townhomes, things like that. Those are groups that struggle to find affordable housing, struggle to find accessible housing, and those can be seniors, those can be disabled people, certainly youth, of course, singles, and then people looking for affordability.

I'll remind this House that when we talk about housing affordability, we're very specific. There's a specific definition for the words "housing affordability," or the phrase, and that is that no more than 30 per cent of their gross income is spent on housing. It's important to remember that when we talk about housing affordability. Now, when we talk about home ownership, it's a little bit different. I think they're saying that it's over 30 per cent – I think it's about 32 per cent – and in the case of condos that would include things like the taxes that you're paying and also condo fees and then some of the common utility costs, things like heat.

I think it is really important to recognize that condominiums are important, and they're important to provide housing. It's sort of dense housing, but in a lot of locations it's really ideal. My office in St. Albert is actually downtown St. Albert, which is lovely, by the way. If you haven't visited, you really should. Downtown St. Albert is really dense with condominium housing, and there's actually more going up. Right where my office is there are three large complexes, and it's all condominiums.

When I interjected earlier with the Member for Edmonton-Decore, raising some examples – as I do get a lot of e-mail from constituents that live in condominiums that have issues and that would like some information about how to navigate the process, or sometimes they just want to be heard about what they think is missing or some of the problems. Honestly, some of the disputes that they deal with, on the surface you'll think: well, can't you resolve that with your neighbour, or can't you resolve that within the board or with the property manager? Sadly, they cannot, and sometimes it can make your life really difficult if you are living in a condominium in a complex. The ones that I'm talking about are, like, apartment style. It can be really difficult if you don't get a resolution to issues that are really important to your daily living.

I don't mean to belittle any of these issues, but sometimes the issues are around pets. You know, I have pets. But sometimes they're around pets – and you can imagine what some of those issues are – as well as people who smoke or people who vape or people who use cannabis, let's say. Those are real issues and real concerns for people that live in condominiums, and sometimes in some condominium complexes there is no way to adequately resolve an issue.

Now, there are bigger issues, of course, around parking, storage, common-area damages, vehicles, all of those things. And the reason I'm raising these examples is that one of the things I was a little bit disappointed about is that there isn't a tribunal. I think, as my colleague from Edmonton-Decore and, I think, actually, my other colleague mentioned as well, that failure to do that will just mean that there will be more people looking for a resolution using the courts. That's not something anybody wants to see. Weirdly enough, if you just go online and google, like, "resolving condominium disputes in Alberta," you'll get a lot of law firms advertising. I imagine that they're making some business, making some money, not that that's a bad thing. But, you know, I think if we're going to look at what's best for Albertans, what makes life better for them, and what makes life affordable, we need to balance the interests of condominium associations and owners with the residents and owners. I don't think this piece of legislation does that adequately.

When I read the legislation and the research that was done, I was interested to see with the crossjurisdictional analysis that there are a number of provinces that actually have versions of condominium tribunals. British Columbia, Ontario, and Nova Scotia have different versions. The one that I actually spent a little bit of time looking at was the one in Ontario. It's called the Condominium Authority Tribunal. The acronym, which is fabulous, is CAT, so it's easy to remember. It's actually interesting, the way that they lay it out. I'm just going to refer you to some of the information that they have available online. You can see why this is an attractive process and why this would be helpful to resolve issues.

The CAT is actually an online tribunal dedicated to resolving and deciding condominium-related disputes. Now, keep in mind that this is in Ontario. The online dispute resolution system helps people resolve the disputes conveniently, quickly, and affordably. They actually back that up with the information that's available, so you can see that there are very definite timelines for each step. It describes the step, what is done, and then how much time that this needs to be completed in.

The first step will be, like, filing a case, so the applicant files the application with the authority. Actually, that can take one to three days. The delivery of notice: the applicant delivers the notice to the respondent, the intervenors; one week. Then stage 1 is the negotiation. Here's where it gets really important. We're not, you know, hiring lawyers, but there's actually an online negotiation. The users work together to resolve the dispute. I think we could all agree that any time that we can avoid litigation, if we can do any kind of mediation, dispute resolution, it's an ideal way to go and not just in terms of affordability for all parties but in terms of the ability to live together. I'm not saying – it's actually important. For people that live especially in these apartment-style condominiums, where you're sharing a lot of common areas, from parking to where you collect your mail to the main entries as well as your neighbours, it's actually important to do everything you can to live together amicably. I'm sure we've all heard horror stories when neighbours don't get along. Life can be very unpleasant and cause people to move and cause housing insecurity.

Again, just going back to the tribunal, that's why I think it's such a great idea. The next stage of this. Stage 1 is negotiation. Stage 2 is then mediation. That is a two- to four-week process. Here, if the users can't resolve in the dispute resolution in stage 1, this is where they use the CAT mediator, in stage 2. Stage 3 then is the tribunal decision. If the users can't resolve the dispute in stage 2, which is the mediation – so they've not been able through negotiation, which was stage 1; stage 2, mediation – they go to stage 3, which is the tribunal decision. If the users can't resolve the dispute in stage 2, then they actually hold an online hearing. I think that, you know, one of the – well, there aren't a lot of upsides to COVID. But one of the upsides that we have learned is just how flexible and how many uses for online meetings, hearings, things like that – I think that we've all come to understand that this is entirely possible and workable. This piece takes about one to two months.

Then following the hearing there's a deadline within 30 days. The CAT, which is the condominium authority, releases a decision. The decision goes to users, and then the case is closed. Again, that is done within 30 days. It's timely. It's important.

You know, the reason that I spent as much time as I did on this, to talk about what a tribunal can do, is that I'm incredibly disappointed that it's not here in this legislation. Given some of the legislation that we've seen come through in this session and knowing how long we've been discussing some of the issues around condominium issues, I'm surprised that we have not seen this. Anyway, it would be really great if at some point during debate on this piece of legislation somebody could provide some insight or some explanation. Perhaps there's another plan somehow to deal with the shortfall. I would certainly appreciate hearing that. If someone from the government side could explain why exactly the tribunal wasn't included in this bill, that would be most helpful.

If indeed there is a plan to create a tribunal and bring it online, however that will be done, when will that happen? What is the timeline? I think you've heard a lot in the last few days the opposition pressing about timelines. Timelines are super important, particularly when you have government focused on internal goings-on, and when their thinking is as short as election cycles, it's really important to have timelines and commitments to when these changes will happen. I think a timeline is essential. What will be implemented? When will it be implemented? It would also be quite helpful, you know, if one of the reasons – I wasn't around for the debate earlier on this piece of legislation. Is there anything around cost savings? I think we're always talking about efficiencies and affordability. Are there cost savings for not having a tribunal and then having to default to other bodies to decide?

I think my colleagues talked about the chargeback system. You know, I did want to mention I do know that, because I have lived in a condo for some time now, condominium insurance has indeed skyrocketed. I don't blame everything on the government, but I blame a lot of it on this government. I think that they have made some decisions during their tenure that have really impacted affordability in all kinds of ways, and condominium insurance is certainly one of them. I know that I've had to increase mine based on changes that this government has made.

Now, I understand, I can appreciate that both representatives of condo owners who live there, say residents, and condominium associations or the property owners – like, we have to have a balance to protect the association and to protect the owner. Honestly, I think the best way to do that is to ensure that all voices are at the table in the creation of the legislation. I know this government has a pretty rich track record of following the advice of lobbyists. It's pretty clear. You can look in the lobbyist registry, and then you can do a little timeline about what happens and when. I have no doubt that their condominium lobbyists were busy to get some work done.

I'm not saying that all of the things in this legislation are bad. I actually think they'll be quite helpful. But I think there are some things missing. I would like to know: perhaps the minister or somebody in his place at some point during debate could explain what consultation was done with individual condo owners, specifically focused on what they need around dispute resolution. What are the different things that could be done to maintain affordability? It would really be nice to see, for a change, that there is a focus not just on corporations but also on individual Albertans.

Again, my biggest concern – just recapping quickly as I am quickly running out of time – is the lack of the tribunal. I think that we have heard musings from this government, talking about: "You know, trust us. We'll get it done. We're in process. It'll happen." Well, it didn't really happen. I think this is actually a fairly big hole, and I think it could have been a real win for this government to introduce this tribunal. Clearly, it has been successful in other jurisdictions, and I fail to understand why it wasn't included in this legislation. Again, as I said, if there's a reason why it was left out, I'm certainly willing to hear that reason.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to my colleagues who've spoken before me on this bill. It may not shock folks that I share some of the same queries that have been raised by my colleagues, and I sincerely hope that the government engages in responding to those specific questions.

Like many, I also lived in a condo for a significant portion of my adult life, and in many ways it was a very good experience. It, of course, enabled me to help build some equity, to have a sense of ownership and community in my home, and I got to know a lot of people through service on the boards that I served. Folks who step up to serve on condominium associations, on boards, typically do it out of a sense of service and a sense of pride and wanting to ensure that their home is as positive of a place as possible.

As has been highlighted by some of the previous speakers, it is very common for there to be moments of tension because multiple people share the same home. They maybe have different unit factors, they maybe have different square footage responsibilities, but ultimately they share the same home.

I'll speak about the two different buildings I lived in maybe briefly to talk about some of the different pressures that we faced. One was very much a starter condo situation. I was really proud to live there and grateful to my grandmother for sharing a portion of her estate with each of her grandchildren to give me the opportunity to have a down payment at a young age to be able to stop paying rent and start on the path to ownership. Not many people are fortunate enough to have a grandmother who decides to share. At that time entering into the market was much more attainable than it is now. The first home I ever bought was $42,000. The first condo: $42,000.

Member Irwin: No. Where was that?

Ms Hoffman: In Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: No way. When was that?

Ms Hoffman: In 1998.

At that time you could get a CMHC-approved mortgage with 25 per cent down. The idea of saving up that much money was scary, but given that tuition was much lower than it is today and that I was able to work a lot in high school and saved a lot and then also had a grandmother who helped with sharing portions of her estate when she moved into long-term care, it made it possible.

I can't think of many 18-year-olds I know today who would be in a position to be able to do that given the huge rise in housing costs. As mentioned by my colleague the Member Calgary-Buffalo, it's hard to find anything in his riding starting below $250,000, which means that your 25 per cent down is significantly larger than what it was in 1998.

In that building we didn't have any bells and whistles. It was a walk-up. It, you know, had shared laundry. In the spring and the fall – it was close to the stadium – the smell of the many spectators using the plumbing system of that part of the city would create sometimes an aroma in the hallway that made everyone pause and dump buckets of water down all of the drains in the building to try to get things moving.

It was not a luxury condominium like you might find in some other parts of the city, especially today given the way things have moved, but we all were proud of our home. We all worked collaboratively to find ways to beautify it in the spring and the summer, and if our snow service didn't come before we had to head off to work, people would grab shovels, and we'd help each other out. It really did bring together, I think, a lot of the best things about condo living in terms of people working collaboratively and sharing in a really positive experience of being proud to be homeowners.

It was a building that when it was originally built in, I believe, the '60s or '70s was owned by one individual as a rental property. Over the years he liquidated some of those, and that's how we all ended up there. Many of the folks who ended up buying into that building had actually rented from him for quite some time, but because they were able to buy in the 40s and the 50s, they were able to save up enough of a down payment, many of them, to be able to own when that opportunity presented itself.

We are seeing those opportunities be fewer and farther between than we have certainly in quite some time in this province, maybe in the history of this province. Entering home ownership is a goal for many families that is seen as unattainable. Especially right now I want to recognize – and I know the condo market isn't in the same situation as the stand-alone housing market right now, but things are moving so quickly and people are paying above asking in many situations in the housing market. So I think that many people will start to consider condominiums again as a possibility given the pressures on single-detached houses these days.

With that in mind, I think it is incredibly important that we create systems so that when there are points of conflict – and I definitely painted the rosier picture of my memories of living in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood in that first condo very positively. I was there for about a decade. It was a very positive experience. But there were also moments of tension and conflict. There were neighbours who didn't show the same kind of respect to the building that others did, or sometimes they would have house guests who would stay for extended periods of time that also didn't show respect to their neighbours and exhibited behaviour that was in breach of the condominium bylaws, bylaws that we all worked together to set and tried to reach consensus on when we amended them.

There were instances with a couple of neighbours that became especially tense and for good reason. For all of us this was our biggest asset in our lives. Our home was our biggest investment, and when we felt that somebody was doing something to jeopardize that investment, it caused grief, distress. Of course, the fact that it's our home and we wanted to be able to enjoy and take a sense of pride – it was contentious.

There are two things that I wish this bill did that I think are missing. Number one is the tribunal, having a process that doesn't involve having to put extensive liens on somebody's property, having to fine them excessively, having to involve the courts and the banks. It would be much better if there was actually a tribunal process that was affordable and accessible and ensured that every Albertan had an opportunity to have their voice heard when it comes to these tensions that exist around their home living situation. That's number one.

Number two, as I've mentioned, is the excessive inflationary pressures. I'm just talking about the cost to actually enter the market nowadays, but also there are excessive pressures when it comes to condo insurance. We've seen this carry over from, you know, the leaky condo crisis – that was primarily in British Columbia but carried over a bit here in terms of building materials – fires that have happened in condominium buildings, especially those where they're built quite densely next to each other and the building standard didn't take fire prevention as seriously as it probably should have. We've seen issues with rapid construction and, of course, what has been categorized as a boom-bust cycle here in the province of Alberta, where during boom times corners are cut.

We also know that in many other situations – the second condo I ever lived in I loved as well. It was a great experience, but it was built by a bunch of individuals who created a corporation, and then as soon as they built the building, each took a portion of the assets from the building of the units, sold them off, and dissolved the corporation. So there wasn't a mechanism to go after the builder for deficiencies because the corporation no longer existed. Sneaky and definitely problematic for the owners who were in the building. Having ways for people to have proper dispute resolution processes and also be able to have proper accountability to builders is something that I think should be a priority when it comes to bringing bills forward to this place.

I think there are some components in it that are probably moving in the right direction, for sure, but I think that some of the biggest pressures facing condominium owners and those who live in them are around the tensions between ownership and having a dispute resolution process for that as well as the inflationary pressures when it comes to insurance, as the big one, as well as general inflation that we're seeing when it comes to housing prices in the province of Alberta.

I know that condos, of course, are facing a different situation than the housing market, but housing is not as accessible as it was, you know, in the '90s or definitely even earlier than that. I think it's important that we pause and find ways to create better legislation to ensure more people can have an opportunity to access first-time ownership as early as possible and that we set them up for success in terms of the living situation to ensure that they can live there long term with a sense of pride, without having undue distress with neighbours or in their lending situation.

We also know that there was legislation brought forward a number of years ago around doing long-term financial planning for condominium buildings. I think that was a smart decision. It was at the time, I think, seen by a lot of condo owners as an additional burden in terms of having to pay for this building envelope assessment in developing your five-, 10-, and 20-year plan. It was, of course, expensive to bring in these experts, who were so in demand as the whole province was moving forward with doing these types of reviews and entering into this type of planning situation.

However, I think it did create a more realistic scenario for a lot of condos that were being sold in the first five years with condo fees far below what was sustainable in terms of the market. Then what we saw were buildings having regular special assessments that forced people into selling their homes because they couldn't afford the special assessments; they had mortgaged themselves to a point where they were at their limit for what their monthly expenses could be.

Making sure that we have opportunities to focus this legislation on both affordability and also on the dispute resolution process, I think, is where I would urge the government to give some additional consideration, and I would certainly welcome any government amendments that help address those concerns.

With responsible owners, of course, there is this tension. There is regularly a sense of, "Well, I'm an responsible owner, and there are irresponsible owners in the building, and I shouldn't have to pay for their decisions that implicate and risk the equity that we've put into our asset and the enjoyment that we see in our home" rather than, you know, trying to create – and I think even some of that wording was used by the minister in presenting this bill. I get it. There is a sense sometimes of good guy, bad guy situations in times of conflict, but what I would really like to see is the government come up with a proper dispute resolution process rather than leave that adjudication up to boards.

Sometimes, when you're too close to the situation, it can be challenging to provide an objective view, and I'm saying this as somebody who had a loud and disruptive neighbour upstairs who certainly broke the bylaws on multiple occasions. I as a member of the condo board probably was a little extra close to that situation and couldn't have the same level of distanced judgment that is probably best served by somebody on a tribunal, who has a little separation from the closeness of the issue.

Those are a couple of the questions that still stick out for me. I do want to ensure that every Albertan has an opportunity to live in a good, safe home that brings them a sense of pride, and it is getting tougher and tougher under this government. We're seeing houselessness continue to rise. I think the idea of ownership is a pipe dream for many Albertans, and it really shouldn't be. We should be creating long-term, sustainable, quality jobs. People should be able to – I know that when I was a kid, we used to say, "What do you want to be when you grow up?" and everyone would talk about having one job and what that one job would be.

It certainly isn't that case for most Alberta families right now. The number of people working two or three jobs just to help make ends meet is continuing to grow, and the pressures put on them and their families should be the government's priority, and they should be finding ways to make life more affordable for everyday families.

Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others? The Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to join and follow my colleagues. Unfortunately, we've not yet heard from the government on this bill, but I'm certain it's simply because they're writing down all of our thoughtful questions and just preparing their answers. That's got to be it.

Mr. Jean: Absolutely.

Member Irwin: I thought so.

I've loved hearing the walks down memory lane of folks living in condos, particularly my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora, who owned her first condo in beautiful Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. Forty-two thousand?

Ms Hoffman: Yeah.

Member Irwin: Wow. That was impressive in 1998.

Ms Pancholi: A steal of a deal.

Member Irwin: A steal of a deal is right.

You know, I too would love to walk down memory lane just briefly here, and then I'll get to the content of the bill. Well, this is connected to the bill. Sorry. You've all heard this story many times about my first teaching job in Bawlf, Alberta.

Ms Pancholi: Bawlf?

Member Irwin: Yeah. Bawlf. That's right. Don't mock me, Edmonton-Whitemud.

I moved to Camrose in January 2006. That was, as you may recall, a bit of a boom time. Camrose, of course, is also a community where there are many students, and I could not find somewhere to live. I'd looked at one place that was a basement suite. Oh, gosh, it was a little bit scary. The fellow who showed me that was like, "Well, I do have one other place, but, you know, it's a seniors' condo." So here I was. I had just turned 21, and I thought, "Well, you know, let's take a look," because I needed to find something soon.

He didn't know I was 21, but he was like: "I know you're not a student. You're a teacher. But just come take a look." For those who know Camrose, we went over to Camrose Crown Care. It's that pink building right by the high school. I took a look, and there was a nice, beautiful, clean condo available. So there I was, a 21-year-old teacher moving into the Camrose Crown Care condos. Let me tell you that it was probably one of the best places I could have lived, because those seniors – and a lot of them were older seniors, too. Some of them had assistance in their condos. They were just so supportive of me. I'd come in, and they'd look after me and always were interested in how I was doing. I remember my neighbour Ernie was always checking on me, too.

Anyways, that was my first condo experience. I didn't actually own the condo, of course. I just rented it. But after I moved out of Camrose Crown Care, I did purchase a condo in Camrose, my first time owning something. It was an interesting experience. I can echo some of the comments from my colleagues who've talked about the concerns that they have heard from people. You know, it is a lot to take on, because when you own a condo, there are things that are beyond your control as a condo owner.

You know, I think we've talked a little bit about: people are proud when they own a place, whether it's a condo or it's a home. For many Albertans it's one of the biggest investments that they will make. It's important to make sure that condo owners are supported and that condos are affordable. [interjections] Lots of noise in this Chamber this morning.

Member Ceci: You need to be assertive.

Member Irwin: I know. I need to take the stance of Calgary-Buffalo and maybe speak louder and more passionately about condos. I thought I was pretty passionate, but clearly some of the members aren't intrigued.

Mr. Nielsen: Tell them about when you were living with the seniors.

Member Irwin: Right. Exactly. That was a good story I told about living in a seniors' condo, and the Fort McMurray MLAs weren't even listening. I'm disheartened.

Anyways, I do worry about some of the aspects of this condo bill. You know, one of the big concerns that folks have outlined is that we are concerned that this bill will add to the backlog in the courts for more serious matters, and it will take away due process from condo owners in terms of disputes. As has been outlined quite eloquently, there's no tribunal established in this bill, and that's disappointing because condo owners that we've heard from have been expecting one for quite some time.

[Mrs. Frey in the chair]

This government, this UCP government, had an opportunity in this bill to make it more comprehensive and to address that concern over a tribunal, and they've chosen not to. It's another example where this government has promised something, promised a mechanism, in this case of a tribunal, and chose not to do so, and that record of lack of trust from this government continues.

Another example of the UCP . . .

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, hon. member. Hon. members, can we keep our side conversations to a minimum or go into the lounge, please. Thank you. I'm just having trouble hearing the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you. I truly appreciate that, Madam Speaker, because it's just getting hard to hear myself, and, you know, I do appreciate the sound of my own voice.

But this is another example of the UCP failing Albertans. You know, they've asked us on multiple bills – again, I'm getting déjà vu. I think I spoke to three bills yesterday where that theme of lack of trust in this UCP government continued, and I'm also getting déjà vu in the sense that so many of the bills that this government has introduced this session lack any meat, right? I won't say all the bills but the bills that we've been debating recently. When we've asked this government, "Who have you consulted, who are you listening to on these bills, and which constituents are you hearing from?" they fail to rise and to defend where they landed at with their bills. I really want us to hear and am hoping again – and I know I'm sometimes joking in my approach of saying that I want to hear from the members opposite. I do. I do actually hope that they will rise and respond to some of our questions, our questions about the tribunal and the lack of a tribunal in this bill.

Will a tribunal be implemented, or has that Minister of Service Alberta decided that he's not going to address that at all? Perhaps it's coming in regulations. I don't know. Has the minister done a cost analysis comparing, for instance, the cost of a tribunal to the cost of forcing condo disputes to the courts? Again, we don't know. Is the minister concerned about implementing a chargeback system that can allow corporations to charge condo owners without a tribunal to ensure that there is accountability within the condo corporation? I do think some of my colleagues have talked about this a little bit, that there are concerns about accountability.

Condo owners: again, I can be totally honest and say that I haven't heard concerns. You know, I have condo owners, of course, in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. I haven't heard much on this front, but I do trust my colleagues who have spoken – Edmonton-Decore, Edmonton-McClung, St. Albert – on this bill in sharing the concerns that they've heard from their constituents.

I don't want to present the misunderstanding that there hasn't been consultation on this bill. We know that there has been, and I understand and I appreciate that both representatives of condo properties as well as condo owners have provided some insights and have provided some support to this bill, but I want to hear from the minister. We all do. We just want to hear a little bit more about the consultative process. You know, were there alternate positions presented by condo owners, by condo representatives, stakeholders who took different positions? Those aren't reflected in this bill, so we want to hear a little bit more about the process.

Again, I know we're going to have many more questions. We've got more questions as well about just some of the pieces around voting, and I think some of my colleagues raised this last night in the Chamber, too.

You know, I just want to end my remarks by echoing something that Edmonton-Glenora spoke about, and that's just that housing is a big issue, right? Housing is a big issue in the riding that I represent. I said that I don't hear a lot from condo owners, but I actually hear a lot from unhoused folks because I talk to them. As I've shared in this House many times, just every day on my journey to work, whether I'm biking or driving, I come across folks who are unhoused or who are precariously housed. Of course, this bill does not address housing, but I hope that the minister responsible acknowledges that this is an opportunity for this government to invest in housing so that all Albertans have a place to call home. I hope that we will see more bills from this government that address the immediate need for housing.

With that, Madam Speaker, I would like to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 17 Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Acting Speaker: Are there any hon. members wishing to speak to Bill 17? The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Mr. Walker: Thank you so much, Madam Speaker. It's an honour to rise, and on behalf of the Minister of Labour and Immigration I would like to move second reading of Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

Bill 17 introduces changes that would improve Albertans' access to bereavement and reservist leaves and maintain the status quo at postsecondary institutions on bereavement leave. Job-protected leaves like bereavement leave and reservist leave allow employees to take time away from work to attend to personal matters without fear of losing their job.

Madam Speaker, few situations are more personal or more heartbreaking than miscarriage and stillbirth; however, Alberta's laws currently do not explicitly include miscarriage and stillbirth as situations for which employees can take bereavement leave. To recognize the pain and grief felt by parents who lose an unborn child, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, will extend bereavement leave to employees who experience a miscarriage or stillbirth. Proposed changes would allow any eligible employees who would have been a parent to take bereavement leave in order to make this leave as accessible as possible for employees during a very difficult time. For example, biological parents, adoptive parents, and surrogate parents would all be able to take bereavement leave when a stillbirth or miscarriage occurs.

Just in this time, Madam Speaker, I would like to recognize stakeholders that inspired my own private member's bill, which, in turn, I would like to think, and I believe so, helped inspire Bill 17. Of course, I won the lottery, the private members' lottery, last year. It was so amazing to put forward my own private member's bill, Bill 220, to support women and families as regards expanding bereavement leave to miscarriage and stillbirth. We want to ensure parents have the time they need to mourn and grieve the tragic loss of losing an unborn child without the fear of losing their job.

In my engagement with stakeholders, Madam Speaker, I want to recognize the incredible efforts and advocacy and expertise of Aditi Loveridge of the Pregnancy and Infant Loss Centre in Calgary, an incredible champion for supports for women and families, including as regards miscarriage and stillbirth. I also want to recognize and thank Dr. Janet Jaffe from the Center for Reproductive Psychology out of, I believe, San Diego, California, an expert in this field. When I was engaging with Dr. Jaffe, she had a really profound impact on my own understanding of the tragic loss and the emotional trauma, the mental health trauma from miscarriage and stillbirth. In the academic literature it shows that it takes two years for the parents and especially the mother to grieve the loss of an unborn child, and 1 in 4 women, unfortunately, will experience miscarriage and stillbirth.

I also want to thank the economic stakeholders who helped inform Bill 220 and as well informed, ultimately, Bill 17, Madam Speaker, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business as well as the chamber of commerce, to give the economic lens to getting this right at least as a first step forward with the expanded bereavement leave. They were telling me that most employers, as compassionate people, were allowing for this, for people to take time off work that they needed to grieve, anyway, but we wanted to also ultimately – and they were supportive of it, these important business and economic stakeholders – support a bill of this nature to recognize, elevate, and clarify in law that this situation of miscarriage and stillbirth needed to also be afforded dignity and included in Alberta's labour code. I'm grateful to them for that.

I also want to thank the members of this Legislature who were strong champions, supporters of the original Bill 220 and this whole initiative to expand bereavement leave and stillbirth to be included for bereavement leave. To begin, I just wanted to recognize and thank, on the opposition side, the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood for, during the private members' private bills engagement, very thoughtful commentary and inputs. Also, the Member for Edmonton-Riverview made me think a lot regarding the various types of leave, very thoughtful, thinking about all the types. We have bereavement leave, maternity leave, personal family responsibility leave, et cetera. Incredible contributions. As well, the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud gave a very passionate, persuasive speech, I believe, during concurrence. I want to thank that member.

Then, also, on the government side this was a really great bill that brought people together, as does now Bill 17. I want to especially thank the Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat as a strong champion. The Member for Peace River, the Member for Drayton Valley-

Devon, and, of course, the Member for West Yellowhead: all strong supporters of families and women.

Madam Speaker, I am grateful for everyone's continuing hard work and advocacy on the issue that touches so many Albertans' lives.

Aside from expanding eligibility for bereavement leave, Madam Speaker, the rules for bereavement leave will remain the same. Employees who have worked at least 90 days for the same employer can take up to three days' leave per calendar year when a family member dies. The leave length is three calendar days per year regardless of how many family members an employee may lose in a year. However, employees may also be able to take job-protected personal and family responsibility leave or long-term illness and injury leave in certain situations involving pregnancy loss or if they lose multiple family members in a calendar year and use up to their three days of bereavement leave. In some situations, Madam Speaker, birth mothers may be able to take maternity leave if a loss of pregnancy occurs within 16 weeks of their due date.

Employees must give their employer as much notice as possible to take bereavement leave but are not required to provide a medical note or other information. This leave is unpaid unless an employment contract or collective agreement states otherwise.

Granting bereavement leave in situations of miscarriage and stillbirth allows employees to spend time with their families and take care of themselves while knowing they still have a job to go back to. It is one way we can improve Alberta's job-protected leaves to show consideration for hard-working Albertans when they need time away for personal matters.

Now, Madam Speaker, on the important component of reservist leave, proposed changes to reservist leave in Bill 17 recognize the vital role reservists play in protecting the country by making sure they can take the time they need for annual training while keeping their civilian employment. Reservist leave allows Alberta's reservists who have worked at least 12 consecutive weeks for the same employer to take unpaid time away from their jobs to take part in annual training and Canadian Forces operations, and we thank them deeply for their service.

Bill 17 proposes changes that would remove the current 20-day limit on annual training leave so that reservists can take as much time as they need. The MLA for Leduc-Beaumont, who is Alberta's military liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces, has heard from military stakeholders that some reservists do not have enough time to complete annual training and have been using other entitlements such as vacation time to do so. I want to recognize the amazing MLA for Leduc-Beaumont for his advocacy and all of the Canadian Armed Forces members who shared their views with him, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker, Alberta has about 3,000 reservists, who devote their time and skills to the country by responding to emergencies such as fires and floods as well as serving on international missions. These brave men and women should not have to use vacation time in order to complete annual training requirements. Removing the 20-day cap on the amount of time reservists can take for annual training is a flexible approach that allows them to be prepared for deployments and protect their fellow citizens while also participating in the workforce and earning a living.

If they are deployed on Canadian Forces operations, reservists will continue to be able to take leave for as long as needed. Reservists are and will continue to be required to give their employers four weeks' written notice and include their anticipated return-to-work date before taking reservist leave, which can help employers plan for their absence.

If passed, the changes to bereavement and reservist leave will take effect upon royal assent as they are expected to have limited impact on employers, particularly for bereavement leave. Also, we want the changes to be in effect for annual training that may be occurring this summer.

Postsecondary changes. In addition to expanding protections for Albertans who need time away from work, proposed changes in Bill 17, Madam Speaker, would allow academic staff, graduate students, and postdoctoral fellow associations to continue to give their members experienced representation at the collective bargaining table. Under current legislation academic staff, graduate students, and postdoctoral fellow associations have the exclusive right to represent their members in collective bargaining and negotiations, but this arrangement was to come to an end on July 1, 2022. If unchanged, this would result in other bargaining agents being able to potentially represent their members as of July 1. Proposed amendments would preserve the status quo, giving the associations the exclusive right of representation indefinitely.

Academic staff, graduate students, and postdoctoral fellow associations have the experience and expertise to represent their members, Madam Speaker. They also have existing relationships with postsecondary administrations, allowing them to continue to have the exclusive right to represent their members and ensuring a continuity of experience and expertise.

Continuing to give postsecondary associations the exclusive right to bargain on behalf of their members aligns with other parts of Alberta's public sector. For example, the Alberta Union of Provincial Employees has the exclusive right to represent government of Alberta employees.

The change will take effect on July 1, 2022, rather than upon royal assent. This will align with other already-scheduled changes for postsecondary institutions, Madam Speaker, which will allow them to create employer organizations for collective bargaining as of July 1, 2022.

Madam Speaker, the proposed changes in Bill 17 improve or maintain protections for Alberta's employees. They allow grieving employees who have lost an unborn child to take a few days to focus on themselves and their families without having to juggle the responsibilities of a job at the same time. They honour our men and women in uniform by making sure that reservists can take the time they need to fulfill annual reservist training responsibilities while still having a job to go back to, and they preserve the status quo for academic staff, graduate students, and postdoctoral fellow associations to recognize the role they play in representing their members. For these reasons, I am proud to move second reading of Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any other hon. members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's an honour to rise to speak to second reading of Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, moved on behalf of the Minister of Labour and Immigration. Bill 17 will touch on three particular areas in Alberta labour law, and I'm going to speak briefly to each of these three.

First, it expands the current reservist leave that we have in our Alberta employment standards by removing the language around "up to 20 days in a calendar year." Now, Madam Speaker, the reservist force is an important part of our Canadian armed services. Reservists are primarily part-time service positions who often have other full-time employment, and the leave, the job-protected leave, ensures that when they are going out for training activities or other service-related activities, their employment is protected, that they have their position to come back to.

Now, as I understand it, the removal of this 20 days in a calendar year, Madam Speaker, brings Alberta more in line with other jurisdictions so that reservists are not having to use vacation time or other time in order to meet their commitments. My understanding is that when it comes to the reservist leave, making sure that the impact on employers is minimized is something that the Department of National Defence encourages its members to do. As well, we know that there are a number of programs that are available to support reservists as well as their employers, namely the reservist assistance program and the compensation for employers of reservists program.

I am supportive of this change here in the Labour Statutes Amendment Act that will ensure that reservists have the time that they need and the job protection that will protect the employment and have that available to come back to.

The second change within Bill 17 is expanding bereavement leave and making explicit that it covers miscarriage and stillbirth. Madam Speaker, pregnancy loss can be a very, very tragic and difficult time for parents here in Alberta, and including specific language as well as language that's been, as I understand it, written to try and be as inclusive as possible to parents in all different types of scenarios where pregnancy loss can take place is a good change to our employment standards. Ensuring that these employees have access to three days per calendar year through the bereavement leave program and including that explicit language of miscarriage and stillbirth is very positive.

Now, I understand that as drafted, this section will also cover terminations for medical reasons and abortion. But it is not explicit in how this language is drafted. When it comes to this particular section, it is absolutely positive, but I think that the UCP government, in the drafting of this section, has missed an opportunity to make sure that it is as inclusive as possible and covers as many scenarios as possible.

The fact that, in moving this, the language was used that we needed to explicitly include miscarriage and stillbirth – certainly, I think that in order to make sure that we are protecting all parents who are going through pregnancy loss for all reasons, including for termination for medical reasons as well as for abortion – we need to make sure that that is explicitly clear as well. As we continue on through the debate on Bill 17, I look forward to hopefully bringing that conversation here into the Chamber.

I believe that when the private member's bill which is related to this section was debated in committee, Aditi Loveridge, who is the founder of the Pregnancy and Infant Loss Centre in Calgary, who, again, the mover of this bill acknowledged, certainly spoke to the need to have that kind of explicit reference. It's very positive that termination for medical reasons and abortion are covered, technically. That means that Albertans who are experiencing that type of pregnancy loss will be able to use the bereavement leave. Unfortunately, without that being explicit, I'm concerned that Albertans won't be aware of that. Really, this is a matter of clarity, just making sure that what is happening is made clear for all Albertans who may be wondering or curious or needing to know if this counts towards their particular situation.

Now, when Albertans are accessing these bereavement leaves, we do want to put on record that privacy, confidentiality, the amount of information that an employee needs to provide to the employer – employees do not need to provide medical notes or other details in order to access the three days of bereavement leave. My hope would be that the government, through their labour ministry website, would provide guidance to employees about how they can be taking these leaves, the steps involved, what information they would have to require, and what information they would not. In order to access this bereavement leave, employees, I think, will be wondering how much they have to tell their employer. We're talking about some very, very sensitive and very personal experiences and, I know, for many, many Albertans, they would not necessarily want to disclose full details about what's happening.

I do want to acknowledge that the job-protected family and personal leave is also available to Albertans, and having that job-protected leave, I think, is really important to support Albertans in all sorts of scenarios because the bereavement leave is limited to three days in a single calendar year. Certainly, we know that pregnancy loss can happen more than once in a particular year, especially for families that are trying to become parents.

Certainly, as I became an adult, even though we took the sexual health courses in high school, the high prevalence of miscarriage and other pregnancy loss was something that I wasn't fully aware of until I and my friends who are of child-bearing years, many of them were actively trying to become pregnant and trying to become parents. Then all of a sudden you realize that it's not as easy for many people as your sex ed health teachers maybe tried to scare you into thinking that it would be. You can get pregnant with one time, but also there are people who struggle for years trying to get pregnant.

People aren't always aware how common miscarriage is. I know a lot of women can sometimes carry very complicated emotions: grief as well as shame, or feeling like they have done something wrong or have a personal responsibility. I believe the mover in the speech mentioned that 1 in 4 pregnancies can result in miscarriage. It's quite high. Having open conversations about this is really, really important, and having access to the bereavement job-protected leave is positive, but having a strong job-protected leave system is really important.

I was very proud, as the minister of labour under the previous government, to expand our job-protected leaves significantly. Albertans had access to way fewer job-protected leaves than other Canadians, and it hadn't been reviewed. I believe that particular section hadn't been significantly reviewed and changed in decades.

Seeing this update today and the clarity provided for miscarriage and stillbirth is positive. Certainly, I would like to see clarity added for terminations for medical reasons and for abortion, which we understand are covered. That is the response we've received through technical briefings and that has been given to the media, but without it being explicitly included, Albertans might not be aware of that. If it is covered, making that explicit, I think, would be a very positive change and would match the feedback that we heard through the private members' bills committee, when experts like Aditi came to the committee to share their perspective on this section.

Very positive change to employment standards – we hope to improve it with some clarity as we get into debate on this bill through Committee of the Whole. I certainly look forward to hearing more from stakeholders as debate continues on Bill 17.

The final section is changes to the Labour Relations Code. We've got two changes to leaves in the employment standards section and then this change to the Labour Relations Code, and I want to speak very briefly to the history of this. Prior to 2017, within the postsecondary sector, labour relations and postsecondary, there was not the right to strike or lockout. They were not governed under a strike and lockout system. In 2015 a Supreme Court ruling, specifically the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour case in early 2015, deemed that all public-sector employees have the right to collectively bargain and the right to remove their labour as part of free association in a trade union or a faculty association or with some other bargaining agent.

As a result of that, the NDP government at the time needed to update Alberta's labour relations bargaining to make sure that public-sector employees had the right to strike, and essential services legislation was introduced. But at that time postsecondary, including faculty associations and others, was not included. We embarked on a very intense engagement with those stakeholders because postsecondary labour relations was in quite a different state. Probably from fall of 2015 until Bill 7 was introduced in spring of 2017, consultation with the postsecondary sector around labour relations was held, and major changes were brought in to make sure that the unique nature of postsecondary was taken into account while the constitutionally protected rights for collective bargaining were brought up into Alberta's labour relations system. A new division of the Labour Relations Code for the postsecondary sector was created at that time, and a collective bargaining process that respects the rights of workers and employers was put into place to meet the needs of the Supreme Court ruling.

Now, one of the pieces of feedback that we heard was that because postsecondary had never had the right to strike or to be locked out, the system would need some time to adapt to this. From 2015, when we started consultation, to 2017, when the legislation was put in, certainly the sector, through consultation with the government, knew that a new strike-lockout regime was coming. The exact form of that was what the consultation was put in place for. To that end, one of the pieces of feedback we heard was that moving immediately to allowing the workers to choose bargaining agents could potentially be disruptive. So exclusive bargaining rights were provided to faculty associations for a time of I believe it was about five years, with that five years expiring June 1, 2022, this year. The change in Bill 17 is going to enshrine that exclusive right so that these workers are represented by their current faculty associations. Without the change in Bill 17, the workers would have the right to choose their bargaining agent.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Certainly, we've seen a big shift in Alberta. Our postsecondary system didn't have the right to strike or lockout. Then the Supreme Court ruling came, legislation was introduced through Bill 7 in 2017, and now we have seen, particularly with pressure on the postsecondary system by the UCP government through significant, significant funding cuts, that we have had a number of strike and lockout situations. I'm thinking about Lethbridge. I'm thinking about Concordia here in Edmonton. The faculty associations have shown themselves to be responding to the difficult negotiating circumstances, again because of the UCP government's funding cuts to postsecondary, and have been able to secure agreements that the workers have voted for and are pleased with. It has not been easy. Strikes and lockouts are incredibly difficult, but having our collective bargaining system in a place that respects the rights to bargain of the workers is incredibly important.

Now, we are currently consulting with the faculty associations across Alberta about the change in Bill 17, because we now have – our postsecondary system has been under the strike and lockout regime and has had those rights. We've now started to see those play out in collective bargaining situations across the province. Bill 17 purports to remove the right to choose your bargaining agent, something that was coming. For the Official Opposition and for myself, given that our original consultations were held in that time frame of 2015 to 2017 – here we are in 2022 – it's really important to me that we find out more about what the impacted workers and associations think about the change in Bill 17 to provide exclusive right.

Now, the mover of Bill 17 did acknowledge that there are other areas where exclusive bargaining rights are provided. Specifically, he mentioned the scenario with AUPE, and that's certainly the case. I would note that there's a significant size difference when we talk about the size of the bargaining units when you're comparing AUPE to faculty associations at smaller colleges, universities around the province. I'm very curious how that might impact workers' opinions about their bargaining rights and the right to choose their bargaining agent.

Interestingly, we've sent out some initial queries, and we're hearing back that these important stakeholders, that this directly impacts, were not consulted by the UCP government, so I'm very concerned to hear that. At this point, when it comes to the change to bargaining, I feel strongly that respecting all workers' rights to free, fair, collective bargaining is incredibly important. Removing the right to choose their bargaining agent could be of concern, but we are hoping to find out more from stakeholders, their perspectives so that we can bring that here into the Chamber during continued debate on Bill 17.

The government is correct that Bill 17 in its current form would essentially maintain the status quo. What has been happening for the past five years, whether that is a good thing or not, I want to find out more. I do want to acknowledge that certainly the faculty associations have proven themselves to be more than capable in the bargaining that they've had with their employers to date, again, given the pressure the UCP government has put on the postsecondary sector. I certainly would suggest that removing the exclusive right wouldn't necessarily mean that other bargaining agents would become involved given that scenario, but it would become a possibility.

These are my initial thoughts on the three main provisions of Bill 17. I'm certainly supportive of the changes to the reservists' leave, supportive of the changes to explicitly include miscarriage or stillbirth, and very, very glad to know that terminations for medical reason and abortion are covered by these sections. I'm concerned that that's not explicitly included and how misleading that could be for Albertans, how difficult it could be for Albertans to understand that the bereavement leave applies for their scenarios as well, and I would like to see that potentially changed as we go through debate.

Finally, on the labour relations changes, given what I know of the history of this and that my most recent consultation with the stakeholders impacted is a little bit out of date, we're reaching out to the stakeholders to find out more about their thoughts. I hope to have more to say about those sections of the bill further on in debate.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for this chance to respond.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to rise here this morning to provide some initial comments here around Bill 17, Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. You know, I guess, full disclosure, any time that I see labour legislation coming before the House, certainly the hair on the back of my neck stands up momentarily because, you know, we have seen some changes in the past that have not moved Alberta forward here. The good news is that I'm not seeing that here in Bill 17. I certainly have some questions that I will get to throughout my remarks about the bill. Obviously, we'll probably get a better opportunity later on in debate through Committee of the Whole to maybe get some answers to that and maybe even make some suggestions for some potential changes. I'll get to those also in my remarks here as well.

You know, I should point out, though, that it is interesting that as we debate this bill for the first time here today, coincidentally it also falls on the Day of Mourning, which, of course, is a day that we stop and recognize all the people who left us due to occupational hazards in the workplace. The loss of those members to their families is difficult. I think when we have the opportunity to talk about these kinds of things in regard to labour standards and things like that, we should always be keeping these things in mind. We always say that you should be able to go to work, put in a fair day's work there for a fair day's pay, and be able to go home to your family with, as my former president used to say, all 10 fingers and all 10 toes and be able to get up the next morning and do it all over again.

As my colleague from Edmonton-Mill Woods pointed out, we've got a couple of different changes here. I'll probably kind of go off some of her remarks here that she had brought forward. I will thank her for, you know, her time when she was labour minister and having to deal with some of the changes that occurred with that Supreme Court decision around the right for an individual to be able to strike. As we know, there were sectors, there were individuals that didn't have that. They should have. Personally, I believe that was a decision that was really a long time coming.

When you're looking at the workplace and collective bargaining and whatnot, really, the only thing that employees have to be able to try to convince the employer to, like I say, either improve working conditions, improve benefits, improve pay, or improve language, the only real tool they have in their tool box is to withdraw their labour. That's really the only avenue they have.

Now, as someone, again, who was very active during my time in labour with UFCW local 401, I visited many strike lines, I worked on a few strike lines, I've been on my own strike line. At the end of the day, you know, really, it doesn't matter whether it's a lockout or a strike, nobody wins out of that. It creates problems for the employees. It creates problems for the employer. Really, it comes down to just a failure to listen.

Out of that, obviously, as my colleague from Edmonton-Mill Woods was talking about, the changes in the postsecondary sector, one of those groups that, you know, back at a time when she had to try to navigate how to bring that forward to the Supreme Court, didn't have the ability to strike, and of course conversely, the employer didn't have the ability to lock them out either. Obviously, you don't normally see a lot of lockouts. You normally see a lot of strikes. Again, things have usually degraded pretty much when those start to become a reality.

You know, for myself, I guess I'm a little bit uncomfortable, would probably be the words I could use, around dictating the exclusive bargaining agent for the postsecondary sector. I know the example being used is that AUPE is the exclusive bargaining agent for the public sector, and, as everybody knows, AUPE is the largest public-sector union in the province and has been at it for a very, very long time, but when you're talking about basically a brand new sector having that ability, the reality is that that ability to potentially change your bargaining agent does, to some degree, provide a little bit of pressure on that bargaining agent to make sure that they do continue to do all the things that they should be doing.

I will be the first to admit that there are an example or two of what, I believe, are not very good unions. You know, UFCW has been very vocal about that with regard to how they treat their members, not necessarily bargaining in the best interests of their members. And when those kinds of situations happen, the only way the membership can resolve that is to potentially look for another bargaining agent.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Now, during my time participating with 401, I certainly heard stories – I've never been able to participate in the process – of members approaching 401 saying: "Our union isn't looking after us. Would you please represent us?" The first choice the 401 took was: let's talk to your bargaining agent and see how it is that they could improve. The reality of why they do that is because when you drop your bargaining agent, there is risk involved with that, especially if the bargaining agent has been around for a while and you've had a few successive contracts. I mean, any wins that you have had through the bargaining process, be it wage increases, benefit increases, stronger language around health and safety, some of the different leaves that are available – of course, I'll be talking about those shortly here – those are at risk because the employer can then turn around and start from ground zero. So it's not necessarily in the best interest to drop your bargaining agent, which is why 401 would always try to work with them to try to improve that relationship between their members and prevent any of those potential losses there.

I guess to kind of wrap up my comments a little bit around this section with the postsecondary units here, you know, when you're directing an exclusive bargaining agent, then, are there some checks and balances in place? In other words, if the membership is unhappy, they can't potentially go and look for another, so do they have the ability, then, to perhaps vote on changing the leadership? Sometimes that's what it is. I mean, not everybody gets into a position of leadership with others in mind. They're more interested in their own fortunes. That's the unfortunate part of that. So do members have opportunities with which to be able to change that leadership?

I know that for 401 there's always a cycle for that, where they get to choose the leadership of the union and even the vice-president, that are chosen from all over the province from different bargaining units and companies, so again kind of that check and balance that's in place. You still have the leadership from the bargaining agent, but then you have members that participate within those decision-makings. I'd like to know potentially what kind of checks and balances are in place.

The membership having the ability to have their say on any negotiations that take place. Again, if you have an exclusive bargaining agent, do they start going down that road where it's like, "This is the deal, and this is what you're going to take"? That, in my opinion, doesn't work out. I'll look forward to seeing some more discussions around that.

Certainly, as my colleague from Edmonton-Mill Woods had pointed out around the lack of consultation, that concerns me greatly. When you're starting to mess around with legislation and putting in exclusive rights, why didn't you connect with all sides, not only the potential exclusive bargaining agent but their membership as well to get that input to inform the best language possible? Like I said, at the end of the day – I've said this in other debates as well – when we're forming language here in this House, it's not for us. We know what was going on. We know what was said in the debate. You know, 20 years from now, when we're not around to answer questions or try to explain how things went, can somebody interpret clearly what's going on? We tend to miss that mark when it comes to that.

The other section here, around the changes to reservists. You know, Edmonton-Decore is in northeast Edmonton. Straight up 97th Street you head out to the Namao base. It's there. Not only do I have full-time members of the Canadian Armed Forces, but reservists live there as well. Any time that we can endeavour to be able to make things easier for them in terms of job protections and the commitment that they've made to service – as we know, there are always changes in technologies, things like that. Just like regular forces members, reservists have to stay on top of that as well. So if they find themselves being deployed simply for training but then they start, as I say, watching the clock because their employer is expecting them back on, say, Monday but they're not actually going to be done their training until Monday, for instance, now that pressure starts to come back in order for them to be able to keep their jobs. We certainly don't want to see that kind of thing occur, so I think the changes here that are being mentioned for reservists in Bill 17 are good.

That now brings us to bereavement and the changes being suggested here. As the Member for Sherwood Park brought the opening comments on behalf of the minister, I would like to recognize him for his time when he brought Bill 220 forward to the private members' bills committee. I did get the opportunity, of course, to review that bill as a member of that committee, and I was happy to see that he brought that conversation to the forefront. I do understand, again, that he was bringing forward comments on behalf of the minister of labour, but there would be one tiny, little thing I will challenge him on in his remarks, and that was where he was saying that pretty much most employers understand when it comes to different leaves.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to speak to Bill 17 in second reading? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today and speak in second reading of Bill 17. I actually am very pleased to be able to respond even to the Member for Sherwood Park, who introduced this bill as a private member's bill last session, or at least a portion of this bill, I should say, brought it forward as a private member's bill, Bill 220.

That was, I think, a rare opportunity in this House, where we saw absolute, unanimous consensus in this House around the need to offer some bereavement leave for those who have suffered pregnancy loss. It was very important to hear the perspectives of so many in this Chamber and to realize, you know, that we do actually have many things that we share values and views on, and one is supporting women and people who have suffered pregnancy loss and to recognize that there are things we can do to support those who have.

I know Bill 17 contains some other provisions that are very relevant. I don't take issue, particularly, with the provision around extending reservist leave and removing sort of that limit on how many leave days can be taken for reservists. I should note that that issue was also something that we had consensus in this House around when it was brought forward as a private member's bill from the Member for Leduc-Beaumont, which was that we do support, you know, encouraging those who participate as reservists and offering them the supports they need to be able to do that, because it's important to serve our communities. Lifting that 20-day limit is something that, again, we stand in support of in this House.

I do want to focus my comments primarily on the issue of the bereavement leave for those who've experienced pregnancy loss. I want to begin by acknowledging what many of us have in this House already; first of all, the work of those in our communities who provide supports to those who suffer pregnancy loss: doctors, medical practitioners, health care workers, and the important work of groups such as the Pregnancy and Infant Loss Centre in Calgary. I, too, as have many of my colleagues, have had the opportunity to meet with Aditi Loveridge. I know the great work and important work that she does.

As we've talked about in this House, it is true that in Alberta 1 in 4 pregnancies ends in miscarriage. That is a statistic. I just want to highlight that that means that even in this Chamber there are a number of women that likely, according to the statistics, have suffered pregnancy loss. I know some members of this House have shared their personal experiences, either about hopes of becoming pregnant as well as challenges, maybe friends and family. During the debate on concurrence on private member's Bill 220 I shared my own personal experience as somebody who has experienced pregnancy loss. In fact, I experienced two miscarriages prior to the birth of my son and then my daughter a couple of years later.

You know, when we talk about pregnancy loss, one of the reasons why we talk about that statistic, about how common and frequent it is, is because it's surprising to many Albertans and to many people to know that so many pregnancies result in loss. We talk about it because it is something that is still shrouded in secrecy. The Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods talked about it very eloquently.

Yes, for women who experience it, there's often guilt. There's shame. There's grief. There are physical symptoms. There are a lot of complications around the feelings. But it also can be incredibly isolating. You don't know that so many other women in your life may have also experienced pregnancy loss, so you do feel very alone when it happens and because there are often complicated emotions, not just around the loss but oftentimes around the pregnancy itself. Sometimes a woman might not even be aware that she was pregnant until she experiences a miscarriage. There are many, many complicated feelings. Of course, miscarriage is often unexpected and abrupt, so when it happens, a woman is not prepared for all of those emotions and feelings. It is easy, as I did myself, to remain isolated and to not really reach out and seek support and to not even name what's happening.

For myself, Madam Speaker, you know, my pregnancy loss occurred only after about a week to 10 days of me even knowing I was pregnant. At that time my husband and I had not informed family or friends yet that I was pregnant. We were very early on in the pregnancy. It is something that we had debated for many years, about whether we wanted to have children. We were married for six years before we decided that we were ready and that we wanted to have children, and then when we did, we felt all that rush of joy that parents who want to become parents experience: the excitement, the knowing that your life is going to be radically changed in ways you couldn't even begin to fathom. You start to think, as a woman, about the physical changes that are going to be happening. I mean, for those seven to 10 days it was actually like a wonderful secret that we were enjoying, sharing this thing between us that we knew was happening. Then abruptly it was gone.

Because we had not shared with family and friends that we were pregnant or that we were even trying to have a child, we didn't know how to communicate that we'd lost the pregnancy. In fact, my mother only found out that I was pregnant because I was on hour six at the emergency room at the hospital and my husband had to go do something urgently. He didn't want to leave me alone, so he called my mother. The first time my mother found out that I was pregnant was actually when I had lost the pregnancy.

It was, you know, very emotional and physically uncomfortable as well. I mean, it came with significant pain and bleeding. This happened on a Saturday morning. It began on a Saturday morning, and then I went home, and then I went to work on Monday. In the context of bereavement leave – now, I went to work on Monday because I was still not comfortable sharing that I had even been pregnant, so I certainly wasn't comfortable sharing that I'd lost the pregnancy.

In retrospect, of course, I knew – you know, at the time I told myself that I was fine, that I was okay, that I'll go to work. I can tell you I was not okay. I think back, and there were a couple of meetings that I had during that time where I recall now that I was incredibly emotional about something that should not have been emotional, and I realize now that, of course, I was experiencing a lot of complicated grief and emotions and guilt and still some physical symptoms of my miscarriage. I didn't even know, really, in my mind at that time that it was a possibility to even say: I'm not going to go to work because I've experienced pregnancy loss. It was too complicated, and I didn't know how to do that, so I did go to work.

I want to take this time – I made these comments during debate on concurrence for private member's Bill 220, but I want to make them again because I do think it's important. When we're talking about leave and employment for women when they're pregnant, have lost a pregnancy, are on maternity leave, parental leave, all of those things, we can't talk about it in the absence of acknowledging that there are still some barriers that women face in the workplace that are related to having children.

One of the reasons, Madam Speaker, that I did not even think to take leave from work that day or that week or even articulate to my boss at the time was that I was afraid for my employer to know. I shouldn't say "afraid"; that's a strong word. I was uncomfortable at that time with my employer knowing that I was even contemplating having children. I was afraid that that would have implications for my work. I was not prepared to tell them that I maybe was actively trying to get pregnant, because I thought that that could affect the likelihood that, you know, major projects, major work would come my way because I was going to be seen as somebody who might be leaving in the near future to take a leave. I also knew that that might affect the quality of work that I was given, because if I was pregnant and had a baby and went on parental leave, I could be absent for a large period of time.

When we're talking about employment leave, I think that's an important aspect, but I still want to highlight how important it is to talk about the broader implications that still affect women in the workforce. Let me be clear. I had that first miscarriage, and I had a second miscarriage seven weeks later. At that time I ended up taking a week off work, and I took that week as sick leave. Now, I was fortunate to work in an employment situation where not only did I have a good number of sick leave days, but they were paid sick leave days.

While I support job-protected leave – I think it's incredibly important – I do want to highlight that there are still incredible barriers, particularly for women in certain employment situations. If they don't make a lot of money, to take unpaid leave is not an easy thing, and many women – not even just women. When we're talking about leave of this kind, while they may appreciate knowing they have job-protected leave, if it's unpaid leave, they still may not take it. And while I know that there is a hesitancy to require paid leave in legislation here – that's often left to employers, and I won't dig into the debate we had around paid leave during COVID – I don't want to stand here and pretend that unpaid leave is a solution for all women in the workforce. It can still present a significant barrier to know that they will lose pay to take these leave days, and that will prevent many women from actually seeking this leave.

I wanted to talk about that because I think it is really important to consider the context. If we're trying to lower barriers and support women who have experienced pregnancy loss, we have to consider that whole slew of all the other challenges they face in the workplace related to working in – you know, I'm a lawyer by training. I was in legal work. Enormous privilege. I mean, my pay was above, obviously, the average pay of Albertans, and I still hesitated to talk to my employer about the reasons for my leave. So we can imagine that a woman making minimum wage, which – by the way, most of those who are earning minimum wage in this province are women, many of which are single mothers. They will have significant barriers still to seeking this kind of bereavement leave. I felt that that was important to point out.

My colleagues have mentioned, and I want to highlight as well, that I appreciate that there has been discussion publicly about what's in Bill 17 and whether or not the wording of Bill 17 leave extends to termination of pregnancy for medical reasons as well as abortion. I was very heartened when we had this discussion on private member's Bill 220 that there seemed to be consensus from all members of this House that any bereavement leave for pregnancy loss should include abortion and termination for medical reasons. I was very encouraged to hear that there was consensus. I think it's important, though, that that clarity be in the legislation. I understand that the minister has said publicly that it does not prevent taking bereavement leave for abortion or termination for medical reasons, but of course the language in the legislation is specific to miscarriage and stillbirth.

Again, we are talking about an unbalanced relationship where employees may feel hesitant and may not want to put forward that they've had an abortion or to make their case. My concern is that the way it's drafted right now, it may not be obvious to employers that that includes abortion and termination for medical reasons, and it puts, then, the onus on the employee to advocate for that. Let's be clear that this is already deeply personal. We've talked already about the shame and the guilt and the trauma, and that applies to women who have experienced abortion as well as termination for medical reasons. To put, then, that woman in the position of having to sort of educate their employer that this leave covers their circumstances as well, I think, is an unfair onus to put on women, again, especially if the goal is to support these women through these challenging times.

I do take this government at its word that they do intend to include abortion, they do intend to include termination for medical reasons in these provisions, but I think this is not just about providing assurance to us as the Official Opposition that this is included in the bill. I think it's incredibly important to provide that assurance to Albertans because, as we know, when legislation leaves this Chamber, it goes out into the world and into workplaces, and there are going to be employers and employees and Albertans who will be trying to understand and apply it in their day-to-day lives. It is our job, I believe, as responsible legislators to make it as clear as possible that we are including all these circumstances and not put that obligation on to employees, to try to inform their employers about that. You know, when we're talking about abortions, I mean, that's not a small portion of women. The average in Alberta – in 2020 12,000 women had abortions. And that's actually . . . [Ms Pancholi's speaking time expired]

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to speak to Bill 17 in second reading? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. In the few minutes that I have before we adjourn at 11:45 to pay our respects in various ways to a couple of situations that are ongoing, I want to extend my thoughts of appreciation both to people on this side and people on that side, the Member for Sherwood Park, who spoke to this issue on behalf of the Minister of Labour and Immigration. Bill 17: this is my first time debating this issue in the House. I wasn't here for the debate of private member's Bill 220, but I'm heartened to hear that there was so much consensus going forward with regard to the items, issues brought up in that bill and also this one.

I want to spend a few minutes speaking in support of various aspects of this bill, particularly as my colleague from Edmonton – where are you from?

Ms Gray: Mill Woods.

Member Ceci: Edmonton-Mill Woods. Well, there's a lot of Edmonton here.

Anyway, I just want to spend some time talking, as my colleague from Edmonton-Mill Woods did, on how the reservist leave, expanding that to the time necessary for the training for reservists to keep up their skills and abilities and serve our country, is a really positive thing. I learned, too, from my colleague that there are – and I think these are federal programs: the reservist assistance program and compensation for employers of reservists. There is a great deal of recognition both from the federal government and the provincial government now, that want to support reservists in their efforts and their training and their services. To know that there are 3,000 Albertans who will benefit from this change is a positive step in the right direction and one that we can all be proud that we've taken on behalf of that group of individuals.

The second thing I wanted to just recognize is, just as my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud was saying a few moments ago – and, certainly, not having the personal experiences that were just relayed to us in a sensitive and a passionate way by my colleague, I think and want to underline that being as inclusive as possible on this issue, particularly on the issue of termination of pregnancy for medical reasons and abortion, is important for the various reasons that were identified by my colleague. I think persons may not be aware that they are eligible for those three days of bereavement leave if it's not explicitly written down.

The fewer hoops a person has to undergo to take this leave, to be seen as entitled to this leave, is a good thing, is a positive thing. I know that on both sides of the aisle here there's a tacit understanding that that will take place, but as my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud and the previous speaker before that person spoke to this issue, if it's not clear, then it can be misinterpreted, and that's the last thing that a person in that situation needs. I would hope – I want to put on the record as well that I think that when we have the opportunity to be as clear as possible, we should be. The fact that it's left to a tacit understanding means it's not as good a bill as it could be.

The third thing that I wanted to put on the record, I guess, is that with regard to the exclusivity bargaining rights of the various faculty or postgraduate and graduate students' representatives, I too don't understand why that is being extended at this point. There was an extension or a burn-in period from 2017 to this period of time, or July 1, 2022, but I don't understand the bargain that's been made to continue to extend that. I haven't heard that answered either from the Member for Sherwood Park, who raised it or spoke to this bill at second reading, introduced it, or indeed people on this side who have spoken to this issue. I think that it is – I'm uncertain why. I know that it's easier for those current representatives who are bargaining on behalf of those groups to have it extended and to be in an exclusive situation, but I don't know why they're being granted it aside from it's easier, and it's kind of like a not rocking the boat kind of thing. If somebody could speak to that at some point, that would be helpful for me to kind of think about where my support is going to go for this bill.

I certainly want to support other aspects of this bill, as I said, that I think make great sense, and I'm glad they're here. I'm glad that it's an improvement, a further clarification on I think it was Bill 7 or 6, that we brought in years ago.

The other thing I'd like to briefly, briefly cover is the previous legislation, Bill 220, expanding bereavement leave. That was introduced in 2021. As I said, I wasn't part of that committee that reviewed that, but it was really great to hear that there was so much collegiality going on in that committee. I think, you know, if members of the public understood that that was the case, they would perhaps have a different understanding of the work of this House and the collective members, too often seen as too partisan, where good ideas on one side are rejected out of hand because they come from a side that you're not a part of. But when I heard that we in that committee and, it seems like, today are able to get along with the recommendations in a bill or a private member's bill, that's a positive thing.

With that said, under the understanding that it's about 11:45, I will adjourn.

The Deputy Speaker: You have one minute.

Member Ceci: One minute? Okay.

The Deputy Speaker: Happy to adjourn, too.

Member Ceci: You're not of the understanding that it's 11:45?

The Deputy Speaker: Oh, no. That looks about 45. Hon. members, the clock strikes 11:45. The House stands adjourned until 1:30 this afternoon.

[The Assembly adjourned at 11:45 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, April 28, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, we'll now be led in the singing of God Save the Queen by Ms Brooklyn Elhard. I invite you to participate in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

God save our gracious Queen,
Long live our noble Queen,
God save the Queen!
Send her victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us,
God save the Queen!

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Statement by the Speaker

Members' 10th Anniversary of Election

The Speaker: Hon. members, today marks a very auspicious occasion. April 23, 2022, marked the 10th anniversary of the first election of three of our hon. colleagues in this Assembly. It may interest you to know that there have only ever been 956 members who have served this Assembly, but perhaps more interestingly only 296 of them have ever survived to serve 10 years. I would like to invite the hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, and the hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat to join me here at the dais to receive their 10-year anniversary pins. [applause]

It's my great pleasure to congratulate each and every one of you for reaching this milestone. Thank you for your dedicated service on behalf of your constituents. In particular, today we've had the pleasure to have some of your family members joining us here, who I will introduce in just a moment, but a special thank you to each and every family member, who has also made sacrifices for these individuals to serve for the time that they have.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, joining us in the Speaker's gallery today are some very special guests of the hon. the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. I'm pleased to introduce his family to you all, beginning with his partner Traci Bednard, his daughters Ella Violet Hudson and Olive Helena Ann Bilous. It's very clear she has her mother's genes.

Also joining them in the gallery today are his parents Orest and Mary Ann Bilous and his father-in-law and mother-in-law Barb and Gene Bednard. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Equally as important, in particular, for this hon. member, the Deputy Government House Leader, joining us today are his mother-in-law – I'm sure he's going to be on his best behaviour as a result – and his sister-in-law, Caroline and Lauren Malner. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members, seated in the galleries today are several guests of the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford. I'd ask you to rise as I introduce you: Hazel Vicklund of the Peavine Métis settlement; Herb Lehr, president of the Metis Settlements General Council; Sherry Cunningham, vice-president of the Metis Settlements General Council; and the chairs and councils of the eight Métis settlements. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Last but certainly not least, we have guests of the hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge joining us today. Please welcome Devinder Gill and Dharminder Sanghera.

And last but certainly not least are the children of the chief of staff to the hon. Minister of Transportation and the Speaker: Henry and Sam Hastman. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods and Opposition House Leader.

National Day of Mourning

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Each year we set aside April 28 to remember those Albertans who died from workplace-related illness or injury. On the National Day of Mourning we remember those we lost and think of those they left behind. Last year there were 178 fatalities in Alberta, according to the Workers' Compensation Board, and thousands more who suffered work-related illness or injury. These are 178 Albertans who got up every day and worked hard to support themselves, their families, and their communities, and we must remember their sacrifice. A single death touches so many lives, leaving friends and families grieving, co-workers and communities heartbroken.

We must also think of those who were injured or suffered a disability as a result of a workplace incident. These incidents alter lives, often permanently. What makes them doubly tragic is that so many injuries are preventable.

Safe workplaces are not a luxury, they are not a nice-to-have, and despite what this government says, they are not red tape. They are a fundamental right. Every worker deserves to go to work knowing they will come home safely at the end of the day. Employers, workers, unions, industry organizations, and government all have the responsibility to make sure that happens.

Mr. Speaker, we should also reflect on what we have asked of front-line workers during this pandemic and what it has cost. Last year we lost 31 Albertans due to workplace-acquired COVID-19; 10 of those were health care workers who put their lives at risk to fight this deadly virus. We know it didn't have to be this way. New figures from the Canadian Institute for Health Information shows that Alberta health care workers contracted COVID-19 and died at rates higher than the national average. The irresponsibility of this government put our hospital systems under excruciating strain and put the heroes of this pandemic directly in harm's way. They deserved better. We must do better. Thank you to all Albertans who worked through the COVID-19 pandemic.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Teacher Disciplinary Process and Bill 15

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Alberta Teachers' Association released polling as part of their campaign against Bill 15. This is not the first poll the ATA has released that includes self-selected participation from their membership. The poll released yesterday polled 825 ATA members, which is less than 2 per cent of Alberta teachers. This polling concluded on February 17, yet this legislation wasn't tabled until March 31. Yes, that's right. They conducted polling on a bill that was not even tabled in this Assembly yet. Much like the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, who several weeks ago criticized the new curriculum in the media before she even read it, the ATA was polling their members and Albertans on a bill before it even existed.

As the Minister of Education has said many times, the majority of teachers and teacher leaders will never experience the discipline process. The same goes for the majority of Alberta families. I'm thankful for that. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, many of the individuals that have experienced the process have had negative experiences. Kelly Schneider, a former student at John Ware junior high school in Calgary, said, "The ATA's policy failed me as a student and, had it been changed, could have prevented many other victims of sexual assault." Todd Snow, a parent who experienced this process first-hand, said: "As parents we have been very disappointed in the current ATA disciplinary process. Students, parents and the public need to know we have an advocate separate from the teachers' union and that our voices will be heard."

The perceived bias of the union conducting hearings and recommending punishment in this process is not trusted by many victims, is not trusted by many parents, and has created serious problems within the disciplinary process. Mr. Speaker, Bill 15 aims to change that. Bill 15 will ensure that the entire teaching profession is protected by bringing all teachers and teacher leaders under one reformed disciplinary process no matter who they work for.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

National Day of Mourning

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've seen just about every kind of work our great province has to offer. I've worked the rigs, the sawmills, the construction sites, the farms, the ranches, even pulled 40-wheelers down our highways, and more. Through all my experience as an employee and an employer, I have learned that there's nothing more important than safety on the job site. Today is the National Day of Mourning, when we take time to recognize all those who did not make it home at the end of their workdays.

Last year 178 Albertans, tragically, died while at work. Right now our government is working on improving our occupational health and safety standards to reduce these tragic incidents from 178 to zero. We updated Alberta's occupational health and safety code to help workers and job creators secure the safety of their work sites and support Alberta's economic recovery, something that hadn't been done since 2009. We streamlined the occupational health and safety code following intensive engagement with businesses and health and safety professionals, and we are keeping up to date with changing trends, arranging updates to the occupational health and safety code on a three-year staggered basis to ensure that we are keeping up with the industry best practices as technology rapidly changes.

Mr. Speaker, one workplace death is too many. Alberta has realized a slow decline in workplace accidents, injuries, and deaths over the past several years, but we must remain vigilant. I can say from experience that there is nothing more satisfying than putting in a hard day's work on a safe and responsible job site. On this National Day of Mourning we pray for those who have lost their lives, their friends, their co-workers, and their families, and we vow to work towards improving safety standards for all. God bless all those we have lost. We will continue to do better for all Albertans.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford is next.

Métis Settlements Governance

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to be joined here today by many members of the Métis settlements of Alberta up in the public gallery. These are dedicated community leaders focused and working hard for the people and communities that they represent. I consider myself lucky to have been able to know and work with each and every member of this council and know them as friends and, more importantly, respect them as partners, something this government has refused to do.

There is no clearer evidence of the lack of basic respect for this group of exceptional public servants than Bill 57. This government passed Bill 57 without a second being spent on consulting with those who it would most impact. The UCP took away the basic democratic rights for the Métis settlements to determine how they want to be governed and, in fact, imposed a system designed to be dysfunctional. Lo and behold, they have created a system rife with dysfunction. The UCP requires unanimous consent of all eight settlements to access funding. This is a rule that no other organization is bound by but one that the UCP decided to impose without a word of consultation.

This means that there are unacceptable delays in their ability to access funding for basic services. This government has removed income sources from them, refused to provide adequate funding for the basic needs of the Metis Settlements General Council, and more. These concerns and worries are not new to the government. I have been raising them, the MSGC has been raising them, and community members have been raising them, but this government has steadfastly refused to listen or change course.

Mr. Speaker, to those in the gallery today, I want to thank them for their hard work and patience, and I want to apologize on behalf of this government, who doesn't value them enough to consult with them or to listen to them. They deserve better. They deserve a government that respects them and will treat them as the valuable partners that they are, and I want them to know that the Alberta NDP will always be there as full partners in reconciliation.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Hydrogen Week

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This week, April 25 to 29, is Hydrogen Week. Hydrogen represents the next great opportunity for Alberta's energy sector, with huge potential benefits for the economy and for the global effort to reduce emissions. Hydrogen is a low-cost carbon fuel. When it's burned for energy or used in a fuel cell, it only emits water. This means it has the potential to be a major source of clean energy to meet the world's needs. It can be used for powering vehicles, providing electricity, and generating heat.

Alberta already is the largest hydrogen producer in Canada. We have all the resources, expertise, and technology needed to quickly become a global supplier of clean hydrogen. Last fall our government released a hydrogen road map to outline a path to build on our existing strength and establish Alberta as a leader in the global hydrogen economy.

Hydrogen Week coincides with the first-ever Canadian Hydrogen Convention, which will wrap up today in Edmonton. This inaugural event has brought together some of the brightest minds and decision-makers from around the world. The convention is exploring the opportunities and challenges with hydrogen development and how we can raise awareness about this clean fuel.

It's all happening here in Alberta, just minutes away from the Legislature. Alberta is an energy powerhouse, and we have always been at the forefront of innovation. Our legacy in responsible energy development began with oil and gas, but we are leading the way in diversifying our energy mix to include solar, wind, geothermal, and, of course, hydrogen. The future of our hydrogen sector and our energy industry is bright, and our government is committed to bringing all Albertans along on this journey. I invite members of this House to join me in celebrating Hydrogen Week in Alberta.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Eid al-Fitr

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the holy month of Ramadan comes to an end, Muslims in Alberta and around the world are getting ready to celebrate Eid al-Fitr. During the month of Ramadan Muslims have strengthened their bonds with the Creator and His creation through prayers, by fasting from sunrise to sundown, and exercising self-restraint and self-reflection and through acts of charity and kindness.

Eid al-Fitr marks the end of month-long fasting and is a time of celebration. During Eid al-Fitr the community will gather to participate in a special prayer and celebrate with family and friends. During these celebrations games and gifts will be given to children and young people, and special meals will be prepared and enjoyed together. In preparation for Eid al-Fitr, many will offer fitrana, a prescribed sum of money, to ensure the celebration can be enjoyed by all regardless of income or opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, as we prepare to celebrate Eid al-Fitr, I also encourage all members of this House and all Albertans to take this opportunity to connect with and get to know your Muslim neighbours. That alone can lead to a better understanding of our diversity and helps remove and eliminate the barriers that can lead to Islamophobia and hate.

It is also fitting that on Monday during Eid al-Fitr this Assembly will have the opportunity to work with Muslim communities, along with Indigenous and other racialized Albertans, and vote to have Bill 204, Anti-Racism Act, proceed for debate in this Legislature. This can help us move away from the status quo and support racialized Albertans by collecting race-based data to identify inequalities, disparities, and discrimination, including Islamophobia, which may be negatively impacting their lives. That would certainly be something for all Albertans to celebrate.

Happy Eid, and Eid Mubarak to all who celebrate it.

Affordable Housing

Mr. Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, there's no surprise that once again the NDP are blurring the lines and not painting the whole picture when it comes to affordable housing. In short, they are misleading Albertans. In the latest episode of NDP hysteria they have accused our government of leaving $187 million of federal housing dollars on the table. Nothing could be further from the truth, and the Member for Edmonton-Riverview knows this.

Let's take a moment to paint an accurate reality that the NDP like to ignore. The agreement they're referencing is the 2019 national housing strategy. This strategy lays out how the federal and provincial governments will cost match new housing projects. It lays out the federal funding portion for the duration of those agreements. This includes the maximum every province would receive, including Alberta's portion of $561 million. Mr. Speaker, this member knows this. If she doesn't, she's clearly not reading the agreements before she signs them. To be clear, it was signed March 15, 2019, when she was the minister. Thankfully, a month later Albertans elected our government to ensure that every single dollar of the $561 million would be effectively used to provide Albertans a safe, stable place to call home.

It is this government that consulted with the housing sector to release stronger foundations, Alberta's 10-year affordable housing strategy, that maximizes every federal dollar while ensuring flexibility for made-in-Alberta housing solutions. Stronger foundations was designed to ensure that Alberta uses every federal dollar in the most effective and efficient way to build houses for Albertans. By focusing on innovative partnerships, our government will add an additional 25,000 households, an increase of 40 per cent. Those partnerships will be community driven and focused for better community results, meaning that Albertans in need have a home and a sense of community.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Glenora has question 1.

Health Care System

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, last year 178 Albertans died of workplace injuries. On the National Day of Mourning we remember them, and we pledge to do better. Thirty-one of those people died of COVID-19 contracted at their workplace, and 10 of those were health care workers. They were on the front lines of this deadly pandemic, and the government failed to keep them safe. Per capita more health care workers contracted COVID here than anywhere in Canada outside of Quebec. What does the Premier have to say to the health care workers who feel that he doesn't care about their health and safety?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the hon. member for the important question. Every worker's death is one death too many, and my heart goes out to every family who had people who died in the workplace and also people who died from COVID.

In regard to the study that the hon. member is stating, I can state that no employee of AHS passed away due to COVID. In fact, AHS – and I know our health care system puts in the highest standards to protect workers. Very few actually get it at the workplace, approximately 7 per cent.

Ms Hoffman: Minister, there were 10 health care workers who died in Alberta.

Public health care is a point of pride for all Canadians. The Premier ran on a public health care guarantee, yet photos emerged earlier this week of 14 ambulances with patients in them waiting outside the Red Deer hospital because they couldn't access the emergency room. It looked less like an emergency room and more like a drive-through. Premier, where was the public health guarantee for those patients, those patients in Red Deer that the government failed so badly?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As we indicated yesterday, it is a challenge right now in terms of provision of health care services. Our system is under strain in major hospitals in Edmonton and Calgary and in Red Deer. This is a problem that we are seeing not only here in Alberta but across the country, and this is not a new problem. Even under the previous government we had wait times that were far too high. You know, in terms of the amount of time that people were in emergency departments, it was actually higher under the previous government. The point is that this is a problem we need to fix, and we are investing to fix it by adding capacity.

Ms Hoffman: Parking lot medicine is not public health care, Minister. If the minister was doing his job, ambulances wouldn't be sitting in the parking lot.

This Premier told voters that he respected public health care in the lead-up to the last provincial election, but under his watch health care workers have contracted a deadly virus. Some of them have died. Patients even now are showing up at emergency rooms to be turned back to the parking lot. Will the minister admit that Albertans can't trust the Premier or the UCP to protect public health care because they're so focused on American-style privatization while Albertans are being left untreated in the parking lot?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, that is simply not the case. We are supporting public health care. We are making record investments to expand capacity in our health care system. We understand that there are issues in terms of being able to get access in certain areas and at certain times. This is not a new problem. This was even a worse problem under the previous government and governments before that. We know that the solution is to invest in capacity, and we are doing that: $600 million this year, $600 million next year, $600 million the year after that. We announced a record investment of $1.8 billion in Red Deer. We are going to deliver on expanding our coverage.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Health Care System Capacity

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In 20 towns across Alberta hospitals have closed some or all of their beds, over the last two years the number of doctors accepting patients through primary care networks has dropped in half, and earlier this week the people of Red Deer were left with parking lot medicine as 14 ambulances waited to enter the Red Deer hospital. This is health care chaos under the UCP, with Albertans uncertain if they can enter a hospital or see a doctor. This Premier promised a public health guarantee. It's clear he broke it. Does this Premier, this government really think that protecting public health care looks like closed beds, lost doctors, and parking lot medicine?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the member previously, we are investing in public health care. We are living up to our guarantee to be able to make our health care system stronger than it was before. We are at $1.8 billion over the next three years. That's in addition to the $900 million we already added. Our investment in health care is the highest that it's been ever in the history of this province. I recognize that there are challenges. These challenges are not new. They're not new to the province of Alberta – we're facing this across the country – and they're not new to all governments in the past, but we are going to fix them.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, not one health care worker in this province buys what this minister is selling. Indeed, the president of the Health Sciences Association of Alberta, Mike Parker, just said that the situation in Red Deer you can find spreading across the province. We've been hearing directly from health care workers in emergency rooms who are facing a breaking point as they're once again feeling abandoned by this minister, this government. Many can't take working with this combative government anymore and are leaving the province or leaving the profession. Does the Premier or does this minister even have a clue about the depths of the problems that are facing emergency care with the level of pressure and an exhausted, demoralized workforce his government attacked and undermined for years?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, we have increased capacity in our health care system. We have hired over the last two years an additional 1,800 nurses, over 230 paramedics. We have just under 100 new doctors in Q1 this year versus Q1 last year. We are investing in hiring 2,800 AHS employees to be able to expand capacity. We understand that the system is under strain right now, and this has been a challenging time over the last two years with COVID. I want to thank all of our health care workers for delivering phenomenal services. We hear them. We hear that there's a challenge, and that's why we're making the right decision and investing in capacity across our system to be able to ensure that it can respond to the needs of . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Shepherd: Respectfully, Mr. Speaker, with the health care workers I'm speaking with, this minister's thanks ring hollow.

Albertans don't trust the UCP with their health care, yet still the current government is focused on privatization, forcing more private profit into our public health care, and when they fail to get a deal done with doctors and attempt to cut the wages of other health professionals, they still feel the need to direct public dollars to private profit. Front-line public health care workers don't even get an audience with this Premier. Can the Premier or the minister tell the House the last time that he spoke with a front-line health care worker, toured an emergency room, frankly, the last time he spoke to someone who could let him know about the chaos his government is causing in health care?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as I've indicated before – and I want to set the record straight on a comment that I made yesterday in a response to the hon. member, but I ran out of time. I was talking about the emergency department, and I said yesterday that it was the U of A, but it was actually the Royal Alex.*

Under the previous government the percentage of people who left the emergency department because wait times were long was 12 per cent. Now it was 10 per cent, as noted by the hon. member earlier this week. Both of those are too high, but the fact is that this problem has been around for years. It's been around under the previous government and the government before that, but, Mr. Speaker, we are going to fix it. We are going to fix it because we're investing in capacity, $1.8 billion over three years, and we're not going to . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods and Opposition House Leader.

Cost of Living and Wage Growth

Ms Gray: Every day we hear from Albertans who are struggling to make ends meet during life under this government. Folks feel they're working harder and harder only to fall further behind as costs increase due to inflation and the policies of this UCP government, and new data shows that this isn't just perception; it is reality. According to Statistics Canada wages only increased by 1 per cent in February compared to last year while inflation ran at 5.5 per cent. That means Albertans fell 4.5 per cent behind. Why are Albertans seeing their quality of life eroded under this government, and when will the Premier finally do something to help workers pay their bills?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Affordability is a big priority. Opportunity for Albertans is a huge priority for this government. That's why we are bringing in the electricity rebate program. That's why we've suspended fuel taxes in this province. But, more importantly, that's why we prioritize investment attraction, economic growth, and job creation.

Mr. Speaker, as I travel across the province visiting with employers, almost all of them are looking for staff. Wages will be going up. We're going to continue to position this province for investment growth and job creation.

Ms Gray: A recent report found that workers in Alberta are struggling more than those in any other province since the start of the pandemic. While prices have increased about 7 per cent, average incomes have only increased by 3 per cent. There is the lowest wage growth in the country here in Alberta. As a result, many Albertans are finding it difficult to afford the basic necessities. Another report showed that over half of Alberta households are within $200 of not being able to pay all their bills at the end of the month, the highest level in Canada. Why is Alberta last in the country for wage growth? Why are so many working Albertans on the verge of . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, we recognize that we are in an inflationary period. That has also informed our fiscal policy in this province. As I observe the federal government, who's had a tax, borrow, and spend fiscal policy, it's exacerbated inflation across the country. That's the same fiscal policy the members opposite implemented year after year after year. That's why this government inherited a fiscal train wreck. We brought in responsible fiscal policy. We're working on affordability measures. We're working on opportunities for Albertans.

Ms Gray: Not only are Albertans taking a pay cut; this UCP government is making a bad situation worse by piling on additional costs. This government has hiked income taxes by over a billion dollars while lifting rate caps on insurance and electricity prices. Now Albertans are facing skyrocketing bills while insurance and utility companies rake in massive profits. Albertans are being forced to choose between putting food on the table or paying skyrocketing rates to keep their lights on. To the Premier: why does the government keep making choices that cost Albertans more? Why have you spent your time in power making decisions that leave families worse off?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I absolutely reject the notion of increased taxes. The members opposite raised taxes. The members opposite increased regulation. Under the members opposite's watch tens of billions of dollars of investment fled this province, tens of thousands of jobs were lost. We positioned this province for disproportionate investment attraction, economic growth, job creation. We're seeing tens of thousands of jobs created in this province, expanding fiscal capacity. This is the future for Alberta.

Insurance Premium Costs

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, Albertans know that this UCP government is to blame for the affordability crisis here in our province. The UCP lifted the cap on auto insurance, told Albertans facing 30 per cent increases to shop around for better rates, and declared mission accomplished because the Premier got a $200 rebate on the truck he doesn't drive or know how to put gas in. The Finance minister has been claiming that rates are coming down, but five of the seven filings by insurance companies this month were for rate increases. How many more rate increases will the Premier let happen before he realizes that he is failing Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The members opposite had four years to bring in automobile insurance reform. What did they do? They simply put a rate cap on, a Band-Aid solution, which was no solution at all. It resulted in insurers pulling back products. It resulted in Alberta motorists not being able to find appropriate insurance. We're dealing with the systemic issues that are pushing up the costs, that are pushing up premiums. I'm happy to say that seven insurers have applied for rate reductions. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order.

Mr. Carson: Seven of over 70, Mr. Speaker.

Aviva insurance requested a basic increase of 11 per cent. Dominion of Canada insurance requested a basic increase of 7 per cent. Sonnet Insurance, Security National Insurance, Premium Insurance all requested rate increases. People will be paying more for insurance because this government values the bottom line of insurance companies more than whether or not Alberta families can afford to buy groceries. Will the Premier really stand up and claim that rates are going down when consumers are facing an 11 per cent increase in basic auto insurance?

Mr. Toews: Well, Mr. Speaker, that 11 per cent is simply just not true. In fact, according to recent filings, on average – on average – rates will be declining by almost 1 per cent. That's on average. I have a list of seven insurers that are all . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: I have a list of seven insurers that are all applying for rate decreases. The members opposite simply punted the problem down the road. This government is working to fix it.

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, we know that the UCP lifted the cap on insurance increases likely because they owed a favour to their friend and key campaign adviser Nick Koolsbergen. The Premier has refused to release the information about who in his cabinet or staff met with the insurance lobby to take their instructions on lifting the cap. Doesn't the Premier think Albertans deserve to know who he is listening to? Because it's surely not them. Will the minister table in this House the names and dates of everyone in his staff or cabinet who met with the insurance lobby or Nick Koolsbergen? If not, what is he hiding?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, that is a ridiculous assertion. That is a completely ridiculous assertion. When the members opposite were in power, they brought in a rate cap. There's one outcome to a rate cap. Ultimately, insurers will pull back products, and that was beginning to happen. If left to its own, it would result in the complete collapse of the automobile insurance sector in the province, leading the government to have to nationalize it. The members opposite wanted to nationalize the automobile insurance industry. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Hydrogen Strategy

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This week Edmonton is playing host to investors, innovators, and international delegates from around the world for the first-ever Canadian Hydrogen Convention. With a global market estimated to be worth as much as $11 trillion, we know that hydrogen presents a massive opportunity in terms of investments, jobs, and decarbonization. What is this government's plan on how Alberta will harness this opportunity and set up our province for success in the hydrogen sector?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Alberta is already the number one hydrogen producer in the nation. With the hydrogen road map that the associate minister released last November, we have a clear plan for progress on hydrogen. We've already seen huge interest in the hydrogen industry by a number of players. There are four multibillion-dollar investment announcements that have already occurred, and there are more to come.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that on Tuesday at the hydrogen convention the Premier announced the clean hydrogen centre of excellence, an institution that is a keystone in the hydrogen road map, Albertans want to know exactly what the centre of excellence will accomplish and how it will help us excel in the clean hydrogen economy.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member. On Tuesday afternoon the Premier launched the clean hydrogen centre of excellence with a $50 million funding commitment over the next four years. The centre of excellence will help move forward made-in-Alberta solutions through research support, network building, and everything they could need to get Alberta ingenuity highlighted on the global stage. This government is committed to grabbing onto the hydrogen opportunity with both hands.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Minister of Finance for those fine answers. It is given that Alberta is in a race with the rest of the world to become one of the first to excel in the growing hydrogen economy. Alberta has every benefit and attribute it needs to be a global leader in clean hydrogen. To the minister: what are the next steps in the path forward as we invest and diversify our economy?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I mentioned, our hydrogen road map has laid the path for our success in this industry. A number of steps are already under way like enabling additional opportunities for carbon capture and storage, not to mention all the early-stage technologies that will soon have the backing of the centre of excellence, Alberta Innovates, and the ongoing work of forward-looking companies like ATCO, who are pursuing their own blending project in Fort Saskatchewan. I can assure you that Alberta is moving full steam ahead on hydrogen.

AgriStability Program and Avian Influenza

Ms Sweet: Mr. Speaker, when I've brought concerns about the uncertainty in agriculture due to the drought and the supply chain disruptions, the UCP have avoided answers. The minister is meeting with the federal and provincial counterparts next week, so I hope the UCP will finally sign on to the AgriStability deal, which producers have been united on for over a year. With the severe drought last season and the uncertainty of the avian flu now, the need for the money and stability could not be more clear. To the minister: can Albertans expect a deal to finally be done, or should we anticipate that available money from the federal government to support producers will be left on the table once again?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. It's a good question. There has been a lot of discussion over the past six months with our provincial counterparts. There are things being offered by the feds. There's a negotiation that will have to take place, and it's always made quite clear during these conversations that the different provinces have different needs and expectations out of the BRM suite. I had a conversation with the Saskatchewan ag minister just yesterday. I think we are well aligned with Saskatchewan and look forward to the conversations...

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the drought last season was so severe that municipalities across the province were declaring states of emergency and given that farmers are still feeling the impact of last season and are facing added pressures this year with increased fees to fertilizer, feed, seeds, and a huge insurance premium tacked on by the UCP, the need for stability and financial security is paramount. Will the minister of agriculture stand up in this Chamber and apologize to producers for not signing on to the AgriStability proposal last season and leaving necessary funding untouched, and how will he fill the gaps the UCP have created in their inaction?

Mr. Horner: I'm not apologizing to anybody, but I will make a pledge to Alberta's ag producers that we'll continue to have those conversations on their behalf. No one needs to educate me on the severity of the drought or the prolonged impacts that many are still feeling. Those conversations are going to be had, and they've been fruitful conversations to date. Great expectations for the next week.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the avian flu has now been detected in 18 poultry operations and that as of April 21, 340,000 birds have been infected, the most of any province – the UCP needs to address this – and given that when I asked for a plan previously, the minister deferred to the federal government, but Alberta chicken producers need answers, support, and stability now, will he meet with the agriculture ministers across the country? How will the minister of agriculture ensure that Alberta chicken producers are supported as the cases of the avian flu continue to grow?

Mr. Horner: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we're doing a lot to support the producers in turkey, poultry, laying hens, every aspect that's being impacted by avian influenza. It is on our agenda at the FPT meetings. Eighteen infected premises in the province: that number is probably closer to half a million birds that have been depopulated in Alberta. It's not nearly the most of any province. But what we are seeing is that the CFIA monies are initiated quickly and that depopulation is ongoing.

Public Transit User Safety

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, Albertans have been shocked at the news of violent acts occurring on Edmonton's LRT transit platforms. On Monday a 78-year-old woman was pushed onto the tracks. She's in hospital, and it's reported that she might have to have her leg amputated. Now, the city of Edmonton is worried that horrific acts like this will scare people away from transit. Albertans should be able to feel safe when travelling on public transit anywhere in this province, and this government's silence is not helping. Can the Justice minister tell this House what support he's offering the city of Edmonton to ensure that people can access public transportation safely . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and, through you to the member, thank you for the question. It's a thoughtful question. First and foremost, anyone who takes public transit should feel safe. As announced on the 13th, we are committing $79.5 million, which with federal government matching is almost $159 million, to support 26 different Alberta municipalities. Now, the member asked about Edmonton in particular. For Edmonton, that would be almost $67 million, and this is funding that will provide a top-up to assist municipalities that are feeling the financial pinch from low ridership over the last two years.

Mr. Dach: Given that the city is stepping up with more peace officers and outreach workers dedicated to transit security in February and given that the city of Edmonton's mayor has said that more needs to be done to address the root causes of crime around transit centres and given that this means investments in affordable housing, mental health, and support for people experiencing addictions, some things that the mayor says the provincial government needs to step up on, can the Minister of Seniors and Housing or the Community and Social Services minister rise and explain why they have not stepped up to support the city in tackling these very concerning issues? If the news this week isn't motivating them, what will it take?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Maybe, first, I'll say about the funding that I was mentioning in my previous answer that municipalities can direct those funds as they see fit. That includes increased security. Now, the member opposite was also asking about the ways in which we're investing through Community and Social Services or through Seniors and Housing. The increased funding that we are providing – and maybe let me mention in particular the CSS budget, I think $3.9 billion. That's a 7 per cent increase from last year, and we are going to continue to work in particular with the homelessness agencies to be able to help work with them and provide supports to . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Given that the mayor of Edmonton has stated that this government has not stepped up to provide this city with the necessary support to address the concerns of safety with public transit and given that the city is taking action – but with limited resources they've described the situation as, quote, Band-Aid solutions – and given that it should not take people being injured or attacked to get this government to step up to ensure that every single Albertan can feel safe on our transit platforms, will any minister over there commit to taking real action today, or are they content wasting time talking while Edmontonians are feeling threatened?

Mr. Shandro: Well, we have and we will continue to be able to provide these supports to municipalities, Mr. Speaker, and to work with agencies to be able to address some of the issues that we see in particular with our urbans and our major urbans like Calgary and Edmonton. It makes sense that those who are directly responsible for the safety of users, like the transit operators and the cities that they operate in, take the needed steps for that safety. Just as the province doesn't direct the day-to-day operations of police, the province doesn't direct the daily work of municipal peace officers who work for the municipalities.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Lethbridge Northern Irrigation District Water Supply

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week the Lethbridge Northern irrigation district was set to begin diverting water off the Oldman River to ratepayers in preparation for this year's planting season when the irrigation board was informed by Alberta Environment and Parks that water would not be delivered down the canal. I have been speaking to many producers who want to ensure that they will have the water they need for their livestock and crops. Can the Minister of Environment and Parks please update the House on the flow of water in the LNID?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, thank you to the hon. member as well as the members for Livingstone-Macleod, Lethbridge-East, and the Member for Taber-Warner for their tireless advocacy on getting water flowing inside the irrigation district for their constituents. I'm happy to report to the House today that two days ago the Piikani First Nation community has agreed to honour all of their water commitments and allow Alberta Environment and Parks to be able to access our headworks on Piikani land. I was on-site yesterday morning with our crews as they started up the headworks. I'm happy to report to you and to the whole House that there is water inside the canals and water on its way downstream to all the user groups.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for that answer. Given the importance of this government's relationship with First Nations and given that the Lethbridge Northern irrigation district's headworks are located on the Piikani reserve and given that the economic opportunity for the Piikani is important, just as it is for the producers in my area: can the minister explain to the House how the partnership with the Piikani nation is being advanced for the benefit of both the producers and the Piikani nation?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the Piikani nation is proud to have Alberta Environment and Parks' headworks on the reserve and proud of their relationship with Alberta Environment and Parks to be able to provide water to the irrigation district. That said, the Piikani have been asking for multiple governments to be able to have a bilateral process to address environmental, economic, and cultural concerns when it comes to the overall operation of the Oldman dam. I'm proud to report that two days ago Chief Grier and all of Piikani council and Alberta Environment and Parks came to an agreement on that bilateral process, that has the Piikani honouring their water commitments and making sure that we can move together in partnership to be able to provide that water.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again to the minister for the answer. Given that access to water this time of year is vitally important so farmers can begin planting and given that over 750 head of cattle also depend on water from the LNID to sustain them through the summer and given that agriculture is one of Alberta's most important industries, especially in the south: can the Minister of Environment and Parks tell this House just how important a partnership in long-term prosperity with the Piikani is for producers?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. This partnership provides water into an irrigation district that provides water for 750,000 cows, over 200,000 irrigated acres inside that portion of the province. It is the lifeblood of agriculture in southern Alberta, and we cannot do it without our strong partnership with the Piikani. It's unfortunate that former governments have not supported that partnership or built that partnership, but this government has been dedicated to a long-term relationship with the Piikani. It's working. It's why water is flowing downstream, and we're going to continue to be committed to making sure we can share our prosperity.

2:20 Métis Settlements Governance and Funding

Mr. Feehan: In 2021 this UCP government passed the Metis Settlements Amendment Act without consultation, imposing a requirement to obtain the unanimous consent of all eight settlements to access settlement money. Alberta doesn't require this extraordinary threshold of any other democratically elected body. Members of the Metis Settlements General Council are joining us here today in the gallery, so to the minister: why has this government chosen to hamstring the Métis settlements by effectively blocking their access to essential funding?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We did do changes to modernize the 30-year-old legislation to bring us to our shared goals of settlement autonomy and self-sufficiency while keeping the principles of the original act, preserving the land for the Métis people. There was a future fund set up, and it's coming to an end. There was $140 million in there at one time. The fund has now been drained to under $30 million. My changes remove the minister's veto power, giving more autonomy to the settlements. It also requires eight of the eight settlements to approve it, and this is going to increase the accountability and make sure that all the settlements have a say in any future expenditure. The NDP failed to make this change, and the result is a lack . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that we have seen the devastating impact of government neglect and lack of funding for essential services in many Indigenous communities and given that the Métis settlements require access to funding to provide basic services to families in their communities, is the minister willing to guarantee that he will ensure that the Métis settlements will be able to provide essential services such as the delivery of clean drinking water to their members?

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, the settlements, like, can apply for grants through the provincial government, as municipalities do, and I have a long list of grants I can go through that they have applied for for roads and water services. The intent is to leave the Métis settlements, put them in control of their own destiny. We want them to be independent, successful, and competitive. The changes will increase their council responsibilities to charge for services such as service and roads, reduce the cost and size of governments, reduce the role of the minister in the settlements, and put them in charge of their own destiny.

Mr. Feehan: Given that after hamstringing the Métis settlements' ability to access funds through this government's amendments to the Metis Settlements Act, the minister moved the Métis settlements land registry and the Metis Settlements Appeal Tribunal out of the MSGC's building, and given that this is depriving the MSGC of badly needed rental income, can the minister explain why he decided to strip the MSGC of these sources of rental income at a time when the MSGC is already suffering financial hardship at the hands of the UCP?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. What we've done is – we've always been asked the difference between a hand up and handouts. What we are allowing is: this is that hand up. [interjections] We made sure that when we set up the AIOC, the Alberta Indigenous Opportunities Corporation, the Métis settlements were included in that, and we have several large corporations that . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

I just want to provide caution. The standing orders and the House of Commons Procedure and Practice have much to say about bringing members of the gallery into the debate. I appreciate their presence here today, and I appreciate them being brought, but it's important that they're not brought into the debate.

The hon. member.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Unlike the members opposite, we want to empower the Métis settlements being in charge of their own destiny, not what they want to see, what's best for them, and that's why we've set up the AIOC to give them that opportunity to participate in these larger adventures out there, and there are several that are going to be coming their way.

Services for Transgender and Nonbinary Albertans Blood Donation Eligibility

Member Irwin: Canada has taken a step forward with how it collects census data, allowing all cisgender, transgender, and nonbinary individuals to report their gender for the first time, and last year more than 100,000 people identified as transgender or nonbinary, including more than 12,000 right here in Alberta. The collection of data is critical, but it's meaningless unless it's followed by substantial action. Can the government of Alberta provide any specific details or initiatives that it will launch as a direct result of having this census data available for the first time? We need specific actions, not empty platitudes.

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you very much, and thank you, through you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. It's important. We know that as public policy is designed, data is incredibly important to both understand the issues that you're looking at as you design policies but also to make sure that you can measure your policies after the fact. The data collection, we know, on many fronts is at a point where we can do much more. We have the technology to do much more, and certainly my department is looking at data collection carefully, as are others.

Member Irwin: Given that I hope that this associate minister's interest in data would also apply to race-based data and given that one of the major barriers that trans folks face is access to timely health care, including long wait-lists, lack of physicians, surgeons, psychiatrists, discrimination in the health care system, and blatant transphobia, to the Health minister: at a time when this UCP government is allowing parking lot medicine with ambulances lined up and huge delays in access to health care, how can we possibly trust that your government will do anything to address the significant barriers that queer and trans Albertans face when accessing health care?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for the question. We understand that there are going to be some challenges with access, and that's why we are investing in capacity in our health care system. We are putting our money where our mouths are, investing $600 million this year, $600 million next year, $1.8 billion over the entire three-year period, and that's in addition to $900 million in terms of investment. That includes surgeries for transgender individuals engaged in those surgeries. We are continuing to fund that, as the conversation that I've had with the hon. member in estimates – we are going to provide better access to our system and provide increased capacity for all Albertans.

Member Irwin: Given that we're happy on this side of the House to see the news that the federal government is finally lifting the discriminatory blood ban that denied men who have sex with men from donating blood and that the Alberta government has an important role in supporting Canadian Blood Services to ensure accountability, quality, and safety of the national blood system in Alberta, what specific steps will the Health minister take to ensure that all Albertans feel welcome and safe to donate blood? How does he plan to increase blood donations at a time when they're very much needed? Please be specific again, Minister.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is quite correct. It's critically important to be able to support the work of the Canadian Blood Services so that we can actually – you know, blood: as the saying goes, "It's in You to Give," and we need to support that. I'm happy to take suggestions from the hon. member in terms of how we can improve that and work with my colleagues on this side of the House because this is an important issue. We need to increase the ability of Albertans and support them in donating blood so we can use that to be able to support the health of Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East has the call.

Teacher Disciplinary Process and Bill 15

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The vast majority of teachers in this province are upstanding professionals who put the safety and well-being of their students first, but Alberta's current disciplinary system is an outlier compared to those in other provinces. Unsurprisingly, this union-overseeing disciplinary system with clear conflicts of interest has resulted in very few teachers being reprimanded for serious misconduct. To the Minister of Education: aside from the union's clear conflicts of interest, what other factors contributed to the decision to change the disciplinary body to an independent commissioner to handle misconduct complaints?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Alberta's government is reforming the teacher discipline process to make the education system safer for students, their families, and for teachers. This includes creating the Alberta teaching profession commission and appointing a commissioner to oversee conduct and competency complaints for all teachers and teacher leaders equally. Bill 15 will ensure that the entire teaching profession is protected by bringing all teachers and teacher leaders under one reformed disciplinary process, no matter who they work for. This will bring Alberta in line with other jurisdictions and regulated professions such as nurses.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for his answer. Given that there have been questions about how the new system will change the authority and powers of school districts, the union, and the ministry and given that regardless of the disciplinary body there is a need for a transparent correctional process when a teacher is found guilty of an offence, once again to the minister: how does Bill 15 change the abilities, process, and level of oversight by the ministry?

2:30

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks again to the member. The minister will retain current authorities under the Education Act, including the authority to appoint panel members, as is currently the case. The significant changes here are that rather than three different bodies overseeing discipline, the commissioner will oversee the process regardless of whether the teacher or teacher leader is an ATA member. The registrar will now be responsible for the intake of all complaints, and the commissioner will investigate them.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again to the minister. Given that this change came about due to concerns and complaints from parents and students about the union's leniency with teachers accused of misconduct and given that our government is committed to supporting children and parents, could the minister point out how the old system has failed parents and students through a real-life example?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thanks again, Mr. Speaker. The most significant example would be the case of Michael Gregory. Complaints of physical and emotional abuse were filed against Gregory in 2006. The ATA investigated, and his certificate was suspended for only two years. Then in 2021 over 20 former students came forward with allegations of physical and sexual abuse and misconduct. In December 2021 senior ATA staff claimed that the ATA had done nothing wrong in 2006 and reiterated their belief that the ATA should not have reported the evidence of child abuse to police. That is one of the examples that shows that change is needed, and we are making this happen.

Provincial Campground and Park Fees

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, families across Alberta are starting to plan their summer camping trips and are looking to book one of the beautiful sites in our province. Camping has always been an accessible activity for families, but with the job losses we saw over the pandemic plus the skyrocketing cost of living, it's now more important than ever that Alberta families have access to this affordable option. However, affordability for families does not seem to be a priority for this government, who raised fees once again. To the minister: why is the UCP gouging Alberta families who are simply looking to plan an affordable vacation?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A simple answer is that we're not, and we did not raise camping fees. The hon. member is wrong.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that I'm sure the people of Alberta will not believe anything the minister says and given that this government's proposed fee increases could add upwards of $150 to a family's two-week summer vacation and given that costs have shot up under this government, from taxes to school fees to insurance to utilities, and that all of these added expenses can mean the difference between a family enjoying a camping trip this summer or having to stay home, will the minister explain to the families deciding if they can afford the additional camping expenses here why the government felt it was appropriate to reach into their pockets to make up for government budgeting mistakes?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again the hon. member is incorrect, but that's never stopped him before. What I can tell you, though, is that our parks system is up and running this year. Reservation systems are up, and we're anticipating another very, very busy year, and I'm excited to see Albertans go out and enjoy their backyard all across this province, north to south, east to west, where there are a variety of experiences across the almost 500 provincial parks that we have inside this province as well as the 60 per cent of our landscape that is owned by Alberta Environment and Parks as public lands. We're here. We're ready to serve. I hope everybody has a great summer.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that this isn't the only attack that the UCP has made on Alberta's families looking to enjoy the great outdoors – we saw a $90 fee applied to Kananaskis, and users of the area have reported little improvement since the fee was implemented – and given that this government has already broken promises by allowing OHV users off the hook and given that the Alberta Wilderness Association cited these sorts of irresponsible backdoor deals the government put through with their Trails Act as a first step towards privatizing public lands that all Albertans should be able to enjoy, will the minister admit that raising fees on families and giving exemptions to others is a cash grab just to make up for the government's missteps?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's conspiracy theories never cease to amaze me. Given how far off he was in his first question, saying that there's a new fee when there is not, verifiable inside the budget, I don't see the point in even engaging with him on that anymore. That said, I do want to again, through you, let Albertans know that the parks system is up and running. We're expecting Kananaskis to be busy again this year all across the eastern slopes. There's going to be activity taking place. I hope Albertans get out and enjoy this backyard, but best of all, those from outside the province are going to be able to come and enjoy this beautiful backyard as well and be able to make our tourism industry money. I'm looking forward to all that.

Disabled Albertans' Access to Government Services

Ms Renaud: When the ministry of social services has ableist practices and policies identified, it's expected that they'll fix them. I have correspondence from CSS stating that a client, not my word, has three days to reply with the document request. If the deadline is missed, the file is closed and labelled abandoned, meaning the person must reapply. People needing help from social services face enormous barriers, from even getting calls, answering e-mails, let alone responding to requests. A delay frequently means that rent can't be paid, groceries can't be purchased as benefits will be impacted. To the minister, any minister: how will you correct these ableist policies?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General is rising.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and, through you to the member, thank you for the question. It's an important question. We do have a commitment to work with those who are disabled throughout the province, to be able to work with them, get their feedback so we can best make changes to our policies to, as the member said, do our best to be responsive to those who suffer from disabilities to make sure that our policies are continuing to make those – we as the government are making those changes and getting that feedback from the communities. Thank you to the member for raising this issue.

Ms Renaud: Given that the Minister for Community and Social Services acknowledged changes to AISH and income support appeal hearings last week, indicating that disabled Albertans would no longer be able to present new information to be considered during an appeal hearing, and given that disabled Albertans do not currently receive accommodation to navigate a very complex and ableist appeal process, to the minister, any minister: please explain how disabled Albertans are supported to receive the best hearing outcome possible when they aren't accommodated with even the basic things or allowed to give the panel new and current information.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We will always support the most vulnerable throughout the province. That $1.4 billion: this is the highest AISH in the history of the province. I appreciate the member's question about appeals. I think it is a good question, and I appreciate those questions. After reviewing the AISH program appeal process, the regulation was amended to help ensure that folks with additional information to support their case can continue to work with the department before making an appeal. These amendments open the door for the department to resolve the issues before they move to the appeal stage and avoid putting people through . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Renaud: Let's try that again. Given that we now know that disabled and low-income Albertans appealing AISH or income supports have not been offered and given accommodations to enable them to receive the fairest hearing possible and given that the time between application and appeal can be very long, with appeals now being booked well into August, will the minister explain how preventing disabled Albertans from presenting new information about themselves and their lives or providing accommodation for their disability during an appeal hearing makes life better for any of them?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. The two most important things are for us to make sure that there's a fair, transparent, and consistent process but, second, as well making it easier for AISH recipients. People who are eligible for benefits shouldn't have to use the appeal process to be able to get there. Under the NDP the appeals process was chaotic, and policy was rarely followed. We now have established clear roles, and every Albertan will get a fair appeal. We'll continue to be the social safety net for the vulnerable and support them in their lives.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright.

Postsecondary Tuition Fees and Student Financial Aid

Mr. Rowswell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta 2030: building skills for jobs strategy is a 10-year plan for the postsecondary sector and the first in over 15 years. The strategy aims to lead Canada in providing world-class postsecondary experiences and credentials. Our students have expressed concerns about the rising cost of tuition, especially throughout the pandemic, where jobs were less accessible than before. To the Minister of Advanced Education: what student aid supports exist, and how are students' debts being managed, considering students in Alberta are living on tight budgets?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. A good opportunity to inform the House, of course, of the variety of supports that exist and that are available for postsecondary students. In fact, in this budget alone there's $167 million allocated specifically for student aid. More specifically, it's about $108 million that's available in scholarships and awards and approximately $59 million that's available in nonrepayable grants and bursaries. I think Alberta's government firmly believes that all students should have access to the financial support that they need in order to access postsecondary education.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright.

Mr. Rowswell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that tuition and affordability affect accessibility to postsecondary education and given that the UCP government is keen on expanding access and strengthening student experience on campus, to the same minister: what do you say to students and parents who feel that budget cuts to the postsecondary institutions will engender tuition hikes, which only limit accessibility to postsecondary education, and what limitations have been put on raising tuition costs?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

2:40

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, one of the pieces that's available as it relates to tuition policy, of course, is a cap on tuition. A cap exists to ensure that tuition increases remain within a consistent level. That policy has ensured that tuition in Alberta remains incredibly competitive. Tuition in Alberta today remains below the national average. Any Albertan can look up that information on Stats Canada. As well, in other areas, as I mentioned a moment ago, we provide additional support in student financial assistance.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Rowswell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that one of the key goals of the Alberta 2030 strategy is to encourage postsecondary institutions to be financially self-sufficient and self-sustainable and given that students contribute to institutions' sustainability through their tuition and fees, to the same minister: what do you say to students and parents who are skeptical about investing additional funds to maintain sustainability of their institutions to help ensure the quality of their education and diversification of the Alberta economy?

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, Mr. Speaker, we're providing $171 million in funding to postsecondary institutions over the next three years. That's going under the banner of a targeted enrolment initiative. Those funds will go to expand spaces in very particular high-demand programs. We, in fact, have just received submissions back from our postsecondary institutions about how many spaces they can create and in what programs. We'll be scoring and evaluating those proposals over the coming weeks and be in a position to more publicly communicate which institutions will be the beneficiaries of the targeted enrolment funds in the coming months.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period.

In 30 seconds or less we will return to the remainder of Members' Statements.

Government Policies and Economic Recovery

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With a balanced budget, the lowest taxes, and the fastest growing economy in the country, it is safe to say that Alberta is back. Everywhere you look, optimism is abounding about Alberta's economic future, and United Conservatives have launched their new website, albertaisback.ca, to help share the good news with Albertans. Investors are choosing Alberta again, with companies like Amazon, Dow, Northern Petrochemical, Walmart, HBO, and more investing billions of dollars in landmark projects across our province. You can learn more about these exciting investments at albertaisback.ca.

We are keeping our promises: cutting taxes for job creators from 12 per cent to 8 per cent, scrapping the job-killing NDP carbon tax, and investing more than $20 billion in infrastructure to build roads, bridges, schools, and hospitals for Albertans. In fact, we made 374 promises to Albertans in the last election, and so far we have delivered on 88 per cent of them, with more exciting news to come. You can track our campaign promises at albertaisback.ca.

We are fighting for a fair deal for Albertans by holding a successful equalization referendum, creating an Alberta Parole Board, and establishing a provincial Chief Firearms Officer. You can learn more about what we are doing to stand up for Alberta's autonomy at albertaisback.ca.

We are protecting education choice, getting woke politics out of classrooms, creating a curriculum that will set our kids up for success, and ending the egregious conflict of interest that allows the ATA to investigate misconduct against its own members. You can find more about our education work at albertaisback.ca.

Here are some more highlights: 80,000 new businesses started in the last year, 145,000 jobs created since 2021, the highest farm cash receipts ever, the most oil and gas drilling ever, $1 billion in new film and television productions, and record venture capital investment. Mr. Speaker, Alberta is back, and Alberta's future is bright. Alberta is moving forward. We will not stop or go back to failed NDP policies that kill jobs and investment. Visit albertaisback.ca to find out more.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Government Record

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Under the UCP government the future of families living in Alberta is in jeopardy. Young families are thinking of leaving this province due to the horrible and racist curriculum. Others are tired of waiting for affordable and quality child care while their cost of living continues to soar. It's clear that this UCP government is more in touch with those who frequent sky palaces than families and young people who worry about what their next month's insurance bill will be. Families see clearly that this government has the wrong vision for Alberta.

Instead of promoting a province that is diverse and welcoming to all, we see the government attack LGBTQ2S-plus youth. Instead of promoting a province that would excel at innovation and research, the government attacks and defunds our advanced education. These attacks on health care workers, teachers, postsecondary students and staff, not to mention the public service more broadly, during a global pandemic nonetheless have made Albertans feel that they cannot trust and cannot support this UCP government.

This government isn't focused on jobs. They aren't focused on the soaring cost of living or real impacts to Alberta families. Instead, they're focused on their wealthy friends and donors. We need a government that will step up and stand up for those we serve. We need to create a province that has a diverse and green economy. We need to create a province with communities and supports that work for everybody. We need to create a province that attracts young people. We need a government focused on the priorities that matter to Albertans, not to wealthy friends and donors. It's time for the UCP to get out of the way so we can start building an Alberta that works for everybody, an Alberta that works for families, and an Alberta that works for the people that actually live in this province.

Thank you.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The current Ombudsman and Public Interest Commissioner, Marianne Ryan, who has served in these roles for almost five years, will be retiring in June. It is not anticipated that a successor will be in place by this time, and the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices has recommended to the Lieutenant Governor in Council that Peter Sherstan be appointed Acting Ombudsman and Acting Public Interest Commissioner until such time as a replacement is appointed. This recommendation is reflected in the committee's report that I am tabling today.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock.

Bill 206 Prohibiting Ownership of Agricultural Lands (Pension Plans and Trust Corporations) Act

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce a bill, Bill 206, Prohibiting Ownership of Agricultural Lands (Pension Plans and Trust Corporations) Act.

The availability and ownership of agricultural land for use by individual farmers and ranchers is important and is the foundation of our sustainable food production industry. As well, ownership of agricultural land by individuals is paramount in keeping our rural Alberta communities strong. Bill 206 aims to enable the long-term success and sustainability of our agriculture industry, preserve our food security, and, above all, protect the culture and well-being of our rural Alberta communities.

Mr. Speaker, with that, I move first reading of Bill 206.

[Motion carried; Bill 206 read a first time]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Bill 207 Traffic Safety (Tow Truck Warning Lamps) Amendment Act, 2022

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce Bill 207, the Traffic Safety (Tow Truck Warning Lamps) Amendment Act, 2022.

The purpose of this bill is to increase the visibility of tow trucks and to make it safer for those operating their tow trucks. They're often in dangerous weather conditions and road conditions, and this is simply, Mr. Speaker, to increase the level of safety and ensure that they can get home to their families at the end of the day.

With that, I move first reading of Bill 207.

[Motion carried; Bill 207 read a first time]

The Speaker: We are at points – correction; there were no points of order today, so you all get a gold star.

Orders of the Day Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 12 Trustee Act

[Debate adjourned April 27: Ms Ganley speaking]

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to be here today to speak to third reading of Bill 12, the Trustee Act, which will make it . . .

The Speaker: I'm sorry. The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General is the sponsor of the bill and it was moved on his behalf, which equates to the hon. minister providing a second reading speech. I'm sure he'll have much more opportunity to provide his remarks at Committee of the Whole or if the opposition . . .

Some Hon. Members: This is third.

The Speaker: Yeah. Correction: Mr. Rutherford, the hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont, moved . . .

Mr. McIver: Point of order.

The Speaker: I apologize and withdraw for the use of a name.

The hon. member moved it on behalf of the minister, and as such the conclusion is that your speech has been given at third on behalf. You are able to close debate, as you have identified, or – you never know – perhaps the opposition will move an amendment on which you could speak to then.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to the third reading of Bill 12. I do not have any amendment to move, just to clarify.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

I'm pleased to see that the government is bringing forward this important piece of legislation. This piece of legislation is largely based on the work of the Uniform Law Conference of Canada, their Uniform Trustee Act, and based on that, the Alberta Law Reform Institute initiated consultation, worked on that, proposed some variation. My understanding is, after reading the bill, attending the tech briefing, that this bill closely follows the recommendations made by the Alberta Law Reform Institute in their report of 2017. I think it's important that we have a trust legislation that is up to date. Although there were minor changes that have been made to trust legislation at different times, our legislation is still based largely on the 1893 English statutes. This one is the first comprehensive review of that act.

It makes some important changes. For instance, it clarifies the powers of trustee. It clarifies rules around investment of trust property. It also proposes a new standard of care for professional and institutional trustees, which is a really good thing because those corporations, those banks ought to be held to a higher standard because of their professional expertise. It also clarifies certain powers for the court to intervene where trust instrument is not clear and provides directions so that the trust instrument and the intention of the trust can be carried out as smoothly as possible. Then it contains rules around communication and reporting to the trustee also, very clear rules that will help trustees know what their responsibilities are, what their obligations are, and, again, help us with the smooth administration of the trust.

While this legislation closely follows the Alberta Law Reform Institute, there are certain exceptions, a certain few recommendations that were not included. I hope that when the minister gets up to close debate, he can share some rationale why those recommendations were not accepted.

Other than that, when we talk about giving courts more roles and power and authority to help with the administration of trusts, I think we also need to make sure that courts have all the resources they need for these additional roles and this additional authority. In the last three budgets the UCP government has made almost $200 million worth of cuts to the Justice department alone. We've been hearing that they will hire 50 prosecutors; still there are not enough prosecutors because of the pressure put on by COVID-19 and Jordan delays. We are seeing many cases at risk of being tossed out because of those statutory requirements that offences be prosecuted within a certain time. Those are, I guess, concerns that if we are asking courts to do more work, we should also be making sure that courts have all the resources that they need to carry out their functions so Albertans will be able to get justice and have access to the courts in a timely fashion.

In short, we are in support of this piece of legislation, and I thank the government and the minister for bringing forward this thoughtful piece of legislation. With that, I will cede my time.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on Bill 12 in third reading?

Seeing none, I will ask the hon. Minister of Justice to close debate.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to close debate on Bill 12, the Trustee Act, which will make it more efficient to manage trusts and lessen the need for Albertans to be able to or to have to go to court.

Now, as we've said before, it's the government's responsibility to continually revise and reform legislation to meet the needs of the modern world and the needs of Albertans. Let's remember that this is a process which started, as the hon. member had mentioned, beginning with the Uniform Law Conference of Canada almost a decade ago and then the work that the Alberta Law Reform Institute had done for years after that to be able to get their report to government, back in 2017, to provide their advice on how the uniform act that was provided by the Uniform Law Conference of Canada – to be able to make those suggestions into an Alberta-specific suggestion to the Legislature and to government at the time, because this was back in 2017, considering some of the very specific practices that professionals use in Alberta and what's in the current Trustee Act and how we can continue with some of those practices. They did provide that report in 2017, which leads us to the 87 of the 90 recommendations which have been accepted in this draft.

Now, before I continue, I'd like to just summarize what was presented at yesterday's third reading. If passed, the new Trustee Act would then replace the existing legislation, which is significantly outdated. We're talking about mid-Victorian legislation that is out of date and focused mostly on trusts in wills. The new Trustee Act, as proposed here in Bill 12, would clarify the roles of trustees and their administrative powers; outline specific processes so that in many instances trustees and beneficiaries don't have to go to court all the time; set out clear provisions as well to support and improve the day-to-day functioning of trusts; and, last, provide a basis for trusts that don't have extensive terms or that don't cover off all of the situations the provisions apply to while making sure that people can still set their own terms.

Madam Speaker, as was mentioned yesterday by colleagues, Bill 12 has nothing to do with a Henson trust. That was one of the questions that we had from members opposite. Bill 12 also does not affect a person's eligibility for government benefits such as the AISH program. As a reminder from yesterday, I would also like to make it clear that Bill 12 adopts, as I said, 87 of the 90 recommendations that we received from the Alberta Law Reform Institute. The three remaining, that weren't accepted, were not adopted because they were minor housekeeping provisions.

For example, one of the recommendations from ALRI, the Alberta Law Reform Institute – I'm talking about recommendation 11, in particular – was about the definition for "represented adult." The recommendation was not adopted as the term that's used here in Bill 12 because that term that's used in Bill 12 is "incapacitated person." Now, using the term "represented adult" would have been inconsistent with definitions that we already have in the Adult Guardianship and Trusteeship Act and the Public Trustee Act.

Another question was about exceptions with this legislation. Madam Speaker, it's important to understand the purpose of this legislation and how it operates. Bill 12 provides that the trust itself prevails over any contrary provision of the act except to the extent that the act provides otherwise. Now, the purpose of the legislation is to provide rules for when a trust instrument doesn't contain an applicable provision. Accordingly, with the exception of a limited number of specific provisions in the act, a trust instrument prevails over the act. When the act does prevail over a trust, it is because the mandatory provisions in the act embody a rule of such importance that it shouldn't be able to be displaced by the person setting up the trust, that there isn't an opportunity for that in particular very important rule to be – well, not contracted out, because it's a trust, but contracted out in the legislation. The mandatory provisions relate to such matters as the power of the court to appoint, to remove, or to reinstate a trustee.

Madam Speaker, Bill 12 replaces the existing Trustee Act and improves trust management as a whole, and it does this by setting clear provisions to support and improve day-to-day functioning of all trusts. All of the provisions apply to all forms of a trust. There are no specific provisions that apply to only certain types of trusts. Therefore, real estate investment trusts are generally a type of trust to which the act applies.

There was also a question about the public trustee and the impact on AISH. First, let's be clear: Bill 12 applies to trusts only. Second, Bill 12 does not apply to fees or to AISH. Third, the public trustee is governed by the Public Trustee Act. To that end, any question about the possible implementation of technology that might facilitate any changes as a result of Bill 12 is not relevant. Madam Speaker, that reference is about the public guardian and trustee office and has nothing to do with the Trustee Act.

Similarly, any questions about outstanding recommendations from the office of the Auditor General are also not relevant. The OAG's recommendations relate to the office of the public guardian and trustee and, again, don't have anything to do with Bill 12.

Also, during debate there was also a question regarding how much court time the government is estimating this act will either save or add. The Alberta Court of Queen's Bench hears matters that are related to trusts either as a civil court matter or as a Surrogate Court matter; that is to say, those related to estates of those who are deceased. While there are no specific stats that we have on trust matters alone, over the last six years there were, on average, 46,000 matters that started in civil court each year. Almost 46,500 matters started in the Surrogate Court each year. The Court of Queen's Bench supports initiatives that would divert matters from the court when other, more appropriate avenues are available. But make no mistake; Bill 12 will divert many trust matters out of the court system.

Madam Speaker, another question that was raised was about additional government consultation. There was widespread support for the report from interest groups, including the Society of Trust and Estate Planners, charities, the legal profession, and other professionals that are involved in or experts in trusts, and our proposed changes are consistent with what stakeholders like those have supported in the institute's report.

Madam Speaker, ultimately, Bill 12 would let trustees better serve beneficiaries and better manage trusts. We also believe that the experience of dealing with trusts, whether as a trustee, whether as a member of the legal community, a trusts and estates organization, the courts, an Albertan who's trying to set up a trust or as a beneficiary, should be as efficient as possible, should save money and reduce the need to have to go to court all the time.

This is exactly what these changes to the Trustee Act accomplish. They will improve all aspects of managing trusts and trust laws in our province. They also reflect our government's commitment to modernizing trust laws in our province, and I hope members on both sides of the House will support this legislation.

I ask that we move third reading of Bill 12. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 12 read a third time]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Madam Speaker. We've gotten a lot of great work done this week in the Chamber, and I move to adjourn the Assembly until 1:30 p.m. on Monday, May 2.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 3:08 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Monday, May 2, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interest and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Hon. members, please remain standing as we will be led in the singing of our national anthem by Ms Brooklyn Elhard. I invite you to join in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all of us command.
With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
The True North strong and free!
From far and wide, O Canada,
We stand on guard for thee.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Let's go Flames, I think, is appropriate here. Hon. members, please have a seat.

I feel like we almost needed a special prayer for the hon. the Minister of Health given such choices that he's making today.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have a number of guests who are joining us. I'll invite the members who are waiting to proceed to their chairs while I am speaking.

Joining us in the Speaker's gallery today, I'm pleased to introduce to all members Arnold Viersen. He is the Member of Parliament for Peace River-Westlock. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

I'm not sure that he was able to make it yet, but I do know that His Worship Greg Rathjen will be joining us here, the mayor of Bentley. If you are here, please feel free to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. I think he's coming in now, but don't all clap and make him feel embarrassed at this point. Welcome. Join us, Your Worship. It's not that we were waiting for you, but we were waiting for you.

Hon. members, also joining us today in the Speaker's gallery are some very special guests of the hon. the Minister of Finance. Please join me in welcoming Mel and Bernice Toews, his parents; and his wife, Kim Toews. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: We also have a school at the Legislature joining us today. They are from the constituency of Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland. Wabamun school, please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Now, hon. members, I ask that you hold your applause until the conclusion of the remainder of the introductions today. Joining us in the galleries, there are 14 members of the Professional Association of Resident Physicians of Alberta here today meeting with members for the Resident Physicians in the Legislature event.

Also seated in the gallery are guests of the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction – Darlene Rasmussen, Wayne Rasmussen, Kevin Kocher – and guests of the Member for Peace River: Ed Hoogerdyk and Will Faber.

Also joining us in the gallery: Allan Nielsen, a constituent and guest of the hon. the Minister of Children's Services; and Josiah Gurnsey, pastor of Thrive church in Calgary, a guest of the Minister of Infrastructure.

Also in the gallery: a guest of the Member for Calgary-Currie, United Conservative Party board member Maxwell DeGroat.

Finally, I'm pleased to introduce to you 10 ministerial interns who'll be working at a variety of ministries over the summer.

I invite you all to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Economic Recovery and Growth

Ms Lovely: Mr. Speaker, if you listen to the members of the opposition on any given day, you will hear them constantly beat down and drag out our province. The socialists and their friends will constantly tell us what an awful place they think Alberta is. They will attack our economy and job creators, and they will tell you all about the terrible future that they think lies ahead.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it's a good thing that these talking points from the NDP are nothing but a left-wing delusion. Let me tell you Alberta's real story. It is the opposite of the NDP story of decline and downfall. The story of Alberta today is one of renewal and growth. We all know that we have been through some tough times in recent years, but Albertans have done what they always do. We have faced down tough times and come through stronger than ever with a bright future ahead of us.

Mr. Speaker, the NDP claims that people are running from Alberta, but nothing could be further from the truth. In the last half of 2021 net migration to Alberta was nearly 30,000 people. That is more than any time during the NDP government. The Alberta family is growing. The NDP also claims every day that we have faced economic doom and gloom. They could not be more wrong. Every reputable projection has Alberta leading Canada in economic growth not just this year but next year as well. Our economy is forecasting to grow faster than at any time under the NDP. The Alberta economy is growing.

You know what is not growing, Mr. Speaker? Alberta's debt. That's right. After four years of the NDP fiscal train wreck, the budget is balanced, and we are no longer burdening our children and grandchildren with tens of billions of dollars to pay down.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta is growing, and our government will make sure that that continues for years to come. Thank you.

Economic Indicators

Mr. Bilous: For the past year the UCP has been claiming that Alberta would lead the country in economic growth, but preliminary data from Statistics Canada shows that that simply isn't true. In fact, figures released today show that Alberta was actually sixth in the country for economic growth in 2021, and to make matters worse, we still haven't recovered the losses from the pandemic. Our economy is actually smaller than when the UCP formed government.

But it isn't just GDP; Alberta is also lagging on investment, jobs, and wages. Capital investment is still well below levels seen under our government, and Alberta only attracted 4 per cent of venture capital investment in the country last year. Alberta's unemployment rate is still well above the national average, and Calgary continues to have the highest unemployment rate among major cities. A recent report found that wages aren't keeping up with inflation. While prices have increased approximately 7 per cent, incomes have increased by just 3 per cent on average since COVID, the lowest wage growth in the country. As a result, Albertans are struggling more than Canadians in any other province, and many have cancelled a major purchase or are finding it difficult to afford basic necessities.

So while the UCP tries to claim that jobs and the economy are doing great, the facts tell a much different story and are just one more reason Albertans cannot trust this government. The fact is that Albertans continue to struggle under the UCP government, and when they are presented with the facts, the UCP just blames Albertans and tells them to get a better job. The answer isn't to get a better job. Albertans need a better government, and soon enough they'll have it, with the NDP.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche.

1:40 Members of the Legislative Assembly's Role

Mr. Jean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is actually my first member's statement since returning. I've sat in the House of Commons in Ottawa, and I've sat in the front bench here. I'm now enjoying the view from the back, this back corner, which reminds me that every seat in this place is important and everyone here serves Albertans. That is very important.

Having been away for a while gave me a chance to look at this place and see it the way everyday Albertans see it, and Albertans sometimes, too often, don't like what they see. Colleagues, you are all leaders here. You were sent here to fight for the wants and the needs of the Albertans you represent, for all Albertans. You represent the diversity and the unity of Alberta, and you must all do your part to make Alberta better for today's Albertans and tomorrow's.

We need to improve how we do things around here, how we write laws, how we govern, and how we show Albertans that we care about the things that matter to them. We all have our roles. Cabinet runs the powerful ministries. The opposition tries to hold the cabinet to account. But the most important role is that of the government caucus. It is the government caucus's job to know Albertans the best. They talk to the people who feel the pain and live the hopes of Albertans. They understand when the government is getting it right and also when the government needs to improve. Caucus meetings should be where the Premier and ministers hold the government to account by their friends in caucus. Lougheed and Klein understood this. They understood that caucus matters more than cabinet. Cabinet does things; caucus makes them do them right.

Like I said, Mr. Speaker, we need to improve how things are done here. I'll be talking about that more in the coming weeks.

Thank you.

Government Policies and Cost of Living

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are struggling because of this UCP government. The UCP hiked taxes by a billion dollars using a tactic called bracket creep, a move the Premier himself once adamantly opposed, deeming it insidious. The government is taxing inflation and taking money away from families at a time when they need it most. The UCP lifted caps on insurance, utilities, tuition – you name it – then stood back and watched as costs skyrocketed.

Not only is this government making life harder for Albertans; they refuse to take any responsibility or show any compassion at all. The Finance minister heard stories about people seeing 30 per cent increases in their insurance bills and, instead of acting to help them, told them to just shop around for better prices. The Finance minister heard from a woman who told him that her utility bill was over $1,900, and in response he dismissed her concerns by telling her that his bill was also pretty high. Now, when told that inflation is outclimbing wages and families are finding it harder and harder to make ends meet, he told those struggling families that the solution to their problems was to get a better job.

Get a better job: Mr. Speaker, that's the solution that this government has to this crisis that they created. Only this government, with this Premier and this Finance minister, could hear the concerns of Alberta families and make the deliberate choice to blame them, blame the families who, because of the decisions by the UCP, are forced to choose between groceries and heat, between their work vehicle and keeping their lights on. This is just the latest evidence that this government is out of touch with the people they claim to represent.

Albertans deserve a government that cares about them and ensures that they can make ends meet. The UCP does not care about Albertans – we've long known this – but the Alberta NDP does care, and if we are elected to government, we will show the compassion that this UCP government so desperately lacks.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East has a statement to make.

Inflation and Provincial Cost-Reduction Programs

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. While the seasons are changing and spring brings with it new beginnings, Albertans continue to feel the lingering presence of high inflation. High inflation has forced Albertans to struggle with the continued rise in the cost of living. Even though Alberta remains the most affordable place to live of all the other provinces, Albertans are still affected by the rising global inflation caused by supply chain issues and high energy prices. With inflation hitting a staggering 6.7 per cent in March, Alberta remains slightly below the national pace of 6.5 per cent.

The Bank of Canada governor told the House of Commons' Standing Committee on Finance: "Inflation is too high. It is higher than we expected." The Bank of Canada governor has also noted that the federal carbon tax is aiding higher inflation, boosting it by nearly half a per cent. Our government is committed to doing what we can to counteract the insensitive federal carbon tax that is aiding in the rising cost of living for Albertans.

We introduced a pause in our provincial fuel tax. This will automatically save Alberta drivers 13 cents per litre while filling up at the pump starting on April 1. Our government will be providing a $150 rebate to over 1 million homes, farms, and small businesses. Albertans will begin to see rebates on their power bills as early as June.

Along with electricity many Albertans have also seen higher natural gas bills there. To begin to protect Albertans from spikes in heating costs next winter, a rebate program will run from October 2022 until March 2023. This rebate will kick in if regulated natural gas rates exceed $6.50 per gigajoule.

I am proud to be part of a government that recognizes our current reality and takes immediate action to provide support to Albertans. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Government Record

Member Ceci: Mr. Speaker, as we approach the next election, Albertans are getting a good look at the UCP. The UCP promised to work hard, stay humble, and earn every vote. They promised to be happy warriors and to raise the bar on decorum and more. They promised to be respectful and disciplined.

Instead, Albertans got a joke of a government, a government that, according to its own MLAs, rules by fear, is only looking out for number one, has only the Premier's personal political future in mind, has created a culture of fear and intimidation, engages in bullying tactics, is corrupt, is arrogant, is about cronyism, is not engaged, is not accountable, and is not focused on what's best for Albertans. And that's just from the UCP members in this room.

There is more that we hear day after day on this UCP soap opera. The Municipal Affairs minister's former EDA president said that "this government is not transparent and . . . not grassroots." He called out the UCP, who claims its own members are lunatics and compares them to clowns and says that they are sad and sour. This former long-time conservative activist told the media that he is worn out making excuses to people who ask why this government is doing what it's doing, and I know he's not alone.

This government and the UCP are a mess, fixated on drama, division, and infighting, ignoring the people they were sent here to serve. The Premier promised to restore a culture of discipline after his MLAs thumbed their noses at the health rules and jetted off to tropical vacations while the rest of Albertans stayed home and followed the rules. He failed just as he's failing on his promise to stand up for Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, I'm proud to be part of a team united around a strong, ethical, compassionate leader who is dedicated each and every day to delivering the best for Albertans and standing up for them. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Cold Lake Air Show

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, with the weather finally warming up and summer on the way, we can start planning to attend a very exciting event coming up in my constituency. The Cold Lake Air Show has been going on for many decades and will be taking place again this year from July 16 to 18.

What some of you may not know is that Cold Lake is home to 4 Wing, which is the busiest fighter base in Canada. This base not only hosts Canada's world-class tactical fighter force training but also deploys and supports fighter aircraft at a moment's notice to fulfill the domestic and international roles of Canada's air force, and the Cold Lake Air Show allows people to see these hard-working fighters do what they do best.

Both the wing commander, Colonel David Moar, and Mayor Craig Copeland have been working together to continue the tradition of showcasing these talents and to bring people together in this beautiful part of the province. The Cold Lake Air Show kicks off with Full Throttle Festival on Friday, which will have family activities, live entertainment, beer gardens, food trucks, a classic car show, and a flypast. On Saturday and Sunday you'll see the outstanding demonstrations from Canadian Armed Forces members such as the SkyHawks Parachute Team, CF-18 Demonstration Team, the RCAF Snowbirds, and more.

As the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul I'm proud to represent a riding that is home to 4 Wing, and I want more Albertans to experience the thrill of those CF-18s flying by, that I often get to experience just by living in this area. Tickets are free for kids 12 and under and around $25 a day for adults, so grab your tickets today from the Cold Lake Air Show website. Come join me in beautiful northern Alberta to witness the biggest military air show in Canada, and while travelling through the area, be sure to stop in and visit the many lakes, museums, and great restaurants the area has to offer.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Cost of Living and Economic Growth

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, I can think of few things more arrogant than this Finance minister telling families struggling with higher costs that the best cure is to get a better job. We have record inflation, 6.7 per cent, and at the same time wages are falling behind. Albertans working hard for their pay need help with that inflation, not job search advice from high-powered UCP ministers who make over 200 grand a year. Will the Premier stand today and apologize to all Albertans for his minister's elitist attitude and disdainful advice?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, he said no such thing. He did say that a good job with a high-paying salary is a good cure for inflation, and that's why this government is focused on a strong economy and on job creation. That's why we're leading Canada in job creation and in economic growth, with the highest incomes in Canada. The reality is that with investments from hydrogen to film and television, from high tech to agriculture, from forestry to manufacturing, with a record year in exports, with oil and gas back, Alberta is headed into an economic boom, and Albertans will be benefiting.

Ms Notley: Well, no question, Mr. Speaker, the Premier likes to say that things are looking up, and he's right. Inflation: up. Insurance premiums: up. Utility bills: up. School fees: up. Tuition: up. Income taxes: up. You know what's not up? Full-time jobs. In fact, they're down compared to this time three years ago. What is up is part-time jobs. Just how many so-called better jobs does the Premier think each Albertan needs to have at the same time just to afford this failed government?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, after the economic, job-killing catastrophe of the NDP and their tax-hiking government, I am pleased to report that Alberta now has the lowest unemployment rate since December 2018. We have the highest employment rate; that is to say, the percentage of our population that is in jobs is higher than all of the Canadian provinces and territories. The Conference Board, BMO, RBC, TD, and so on all predict that we are leading Canada in both economic and job creation now thanks to this government's policies.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, we had the highest number of people employed before this government got in and started ruining things.

Now, last year the Premier tried to claim, as he just did, that Alberta would lead the country in GDP growth, but where did we finish? Well, sixth, after B.C., Quebec, P.E.I., Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Yukon. Moreover, according to ATB, Alberta has not recovered from our pandemic losses. GDP is still $11 billion below what it was in 2019. Mr. Speaker, you know who does need a different job? This Premier. When will he realize that?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the NDP for leading question period today on the economy, and I want to encourage them to make that the key issue for the next 12 months as we go into the next election because what Albertans will see is: the fastest growing tech sector in North America is happening right here in Alberta, a 1,000 per cent increase in investment in our film and television industry, the best year ever in agriculture revenues last year, the best year ever in Alberta exports. Last year was the second-best year ever in Alberta manufacturing. We just hosted Canada's first hydrogen conference, with major companies from around the world investing billions of dollars in this economy.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition for her second set of questions.

Health Care System Capacity

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, this weekend Albertans learned that most major surgeries are being diverted from the Red Deer regional hospital due to staff shortages. Alberta's third-largest city: this impacts so many Albertans, including those waiting to see if they have bowel cancer or those managing pain from appendicitis. This government's failure to manage the pandemic has pushed health care workers to the brink, and now we are struggling to maintain care. What is the Premier doing today to address this crisis? Why has he failed Albertans so miserably?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, let me decode NDP talk for you. When the NDP leader says "a failure to manage COVID," what she means is that this government did not put Alberta in a hard, two-year lockdown. We know that the consequences of that to people's mental, emotional, spiritual, and financial well-being would have been catastrophic had the NDP been here to put us in a New Zealand-style deep freeze for the past two years. Now, this government is spending the highest amount ever on health care and investing $1.8 billion in a new Red Deer hospital.

Ms Notley: What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that Alberta's third-largest city is diverting surgeries to other hospitals. That is what I am saying.

Now, in the media statement from Alberta Health this government acknowledged some, quote, regret that the situation has come to this, but that was a little too vague for me and the people of Red Deer. Will the Premier stand today and state clearly what he regrets? Is it his best summer ever, his privatization agenda, his fight with doctors, his general level of chaos in our health care? Which is it, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, in fact, the baseline budget for Health in Alberta today is $2 billion higher than it was under the NDP. We continue to lead the country in health investments. We are leading in capital investments to increase capacity, a key learning from the COVID era. We've increased by 1,800 the number of nurses working in Alberta, by 230 more paramedics working now than was the case two years ago, and, of course, with more doctors working in our system as well. We expect AHS to ensure that these resources are properly deployed to address the urgent needs of Albertans.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, it isn't just the people of Red Deer; it's Albertans across this province who can't get the health care they need. Drumheller's operating room currently has a gap in coverage due to a lack of physicians. The Two Hills ER has no overnight physician coverage on weekdays. In Hanna seven out of 17 acute-care beds have been closed. Rocky Mountain House, Sundre, Rimbey, Drayton Valley: there are 21 communities with bed closures or space reductions or service loss across this province today. Can the Premier name a single community where health care has actually not gotten worse?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, there's no doubt that many of our hospitals continue to be under stress, both as a legacy of the last COVID wave but also we have had some increased pressure on the hospitals. That is particularly the case in central Alberta where there's been a disproportionate number of new cases and hospitalizations in that region. But what are we hearing from the NDP? What they did from day one of COVID, which is to seek to exploit politically a public health crisis. That alone, I think, disqualifies them from being Alberta's government.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition for question 3.

Homeless Supports and Affordable Housing

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, as the temperature goes up, we can expect to see more and more Albertans struggling with homelessness and camping outside. The city of Calgary is tracking around 150 people across 80 encampments right now, but they expect that number to increase significantly in the next few months. Now, recent studies show that more than half of Albertans using emergency shelters are in Calgary, higher than any other area in the province. What is this government doing to better address this issue in Calgary, and please could the Premier be specific and refrain from name-calling?

Mr. Kenney: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will refrain from doing what she does at every single opportunity in this place.

Alberta's government is maintaining funding for homeless shelters at nearly $49 million while ensuring that those who require emergency shelters have a safe place to stay. In fact, we invested $9 million in the new Herb Jamieson emergency shelter for the Hope Mission here in Edmonton. We announced a homelessness task force, co-chaired by Edmonton police chief Dale McFee, to look at the issue of minimum standards of care within the shelter system and a better co-ordinated community response.

Ms Notley: Maintaining shelter funding: according to Alpha House Society, who does outreach with these Calgarians, a big part of the problem is actually the lack of affordable and transitional housing. Outreach workers say that the wait-list is just too long. These Albertans often choose to live in camps instead of shelters, and that's why funding for shelters and detox spaces alone is not good enough. They need housing. Last year the UCP left $187 million for affordable housing on the table in Ottawa. Why is the UCP leaving so many vulnerable Albertans behind?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I should have mentioned as well the some $73 million provided by Alberta's government to homeless shelters through the COVID pandemic to deal with the surge in homelessness during that difficult time. We continue to maintain stable and generous funding to support the homeless populations. We want to thank those who work in this sector – the nonprofits and charities and the private donors – who make very important contributions to supporting those who live without homes.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, at a time when more and more Albertans are struggling, the Premier's policies are pushing them out the door of their homes and onto the street. The UCP cut $66 million from income support and kicked at least 2,600 people off their rental supplements. This government has put more focus on selling affordable housing than building it, and they were so late with their shelter money last fall that Albertans were already sleeping in the fall. Poverty is rising. So is homelessness. Will this Premier take any responsibility for the suffering he is causing at all?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, sadly, there have always been homeless people in Alberta, and sadly that continues to be a reality, but this government is taking action with our new housing strategy, with investments that are also being made together with the federal government and municipal governments. But, you know, for example, I know that when the Hope Mission went to the NDP to say that they needed to replace their 60-year-old emergency shelter in Edmonton, the NDP slammed the door in their face. This government helped them open a new emergency shelter, that I have been proud to visit, that's offering a bed and safe roof over the heads of well over 200 homeless Edmontonians. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Government Policies and Cost of Living

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, the UCP's culture of elitism was on full display last week as the Finance minister blamed hard-working Albertans for not making enough money to pay for skyrocketing tuition fees, soaring utility bills, and the government's billion-dollar bracket creep income tax hike. Get a better job: that's the arrogant and tone-deaf statement the Finance minister gives Albertans who are struggling with massive cost-of-living increases and stagnant wages. It's a sign the minister has lost touch with reality and the Albertans who are struggling to afford life under the UCP. Will the Premier condemn these remarks?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. That's absolutely ridiculous. We recognize there is an affordability challenge in the province of Alberta, and we're taking action. That's why we've come forward with the electricity rebate program. That's why we've created a consumer price protection mechanism for natural gas. That's why we've suspended the fuel tax, saving Albertans up to $1.3 billion. The members opposite raised taxes. We're reducing them.

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement was ridiculous. Families are struggling because of the increased costs that this government and this Finance minister have inflicted on them, and his only advice is that they should try harder and get a better job. The arrogance of this government knows no bounds. The government promised Albertans wages would rise. Families are falling further behind. Inflation is outpacing wage growth by six times. To the Premier: when will you stop layering extra costs on the average Alberta family? Will you get serious about helping Albertans make ends meet?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, we're taking real action on affordability, up to $2 billion of relief for the upcoming year. But, yes, the other responsibility of government is to position the economy for investment attraction, job creation so that Albertans can find their first job. Then Albertans can find a better job. Then Albertans can get a promotion. That is government's responsibility, something the NDP never understood.

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, they are responsible for fewer full-time jobs now than when they were elected. They are responsible for a billion-dollar income tax hike thanks to sneaky bracket creep. They are responsible for skyrocketing tuition, for high utility bills, for insurance costs, and Albertans struggling because of their policies. Half of Albertans are $200 away from being able to pay all their bills, but this Finance minister thinks the answer is to get a better job. Is the Premier really going to stand here and continue to pretend his economic plan is working when Albertans are living paycheque to paycheque?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to be crystal clear. The only members in here who've raised taxes are the members opposite when they were in government. They brought in the carbon tax. It increased the costs for every family, every senior, every homeowner. They're supporting their friend and ally Justin Trudeau in pushing the carbon tax up four times. [interjections]

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: They're supporting their friend and ally Justin Trudeau in pushing up the carbon tax four times by 2030. The members opposite have no grounds to complain about affordability. This government is taking action.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Technology Innovation and Industry Development

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We talk a lot about technology and the role it plays as a strong pillar for economic diversification. To that end, the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation recently released the Alberta technology and innovation strategy to help cement our province's reputation as a serious player in the tech and innovation sector. To the minister: can he please tell us why having this strategy is so important to the overall tech sector here in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are proud of the tech sector in the province of Alberta. They had a campaign: I Heart Alberta Tech. It's gone viral, and I encourage people to go check that out online. We're seeing rapid growth not only when it comes to the venture capital opportunities – we had 200-plus million dollars invested in venture capital in the first quarter of this year, another record in Alberta – but we're also seeing major institutional players like Rogers, and now it's an expansion of over 500 new jobs at its tech centre in the city of Calgary. It's bright times for the tech sector, and we're a hundred per cent behind them.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that, as the minister of Service Alberta has frequently said, tech is not just an industry; it is the future of every industry and given that the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation regularly talks about and promotes the incredible innovation we're seeing from Alberta-based entrepreneurs and given that we're seeing a lot of advances in the health care sector, can the same minister tell us how Alberta's government is supporting innovation with Alberta's health care?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Just today I had the opportunity to go to NAIT to announce $1.2 million of financing for training and commercialization. I encourage everybody to take a look at what NAIT has to offer. I had an opportunity to go check out a simulated surgery today. I also had a chance to drive an ambulance. I must say that you wouldn't necessarily want me driving that ambulance, but it's amazing to see the training opportunities for Albertans. NAIT is an amazing facility, and we're going to continue to make those strategic investments.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for his answer. Given the support of our government for advancing technology and innovation in our province and given the government's announcement this morning supporting health care innovations, partnerships with postsecondary institutions and small and medium organizations, can the minister please tell us how health care and the services that our residents require are changing and adapting to the challenges ahead and the role that technology plays moving forward?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. What we have going at NAIT – I'll use that as an example – is the training opportunities that are there for people that have new, innovative products. Trying to get them to commercialization, they have the opportunity to test it out on what that patient experience would be like as well as probably adding training opportunities for people for everything from an ambulance to a surgery when it comes to our hospital systems overall. It's amazing to see these training opportunities for people that need microcredentials, people that need all the skills training at the younger stages of their career. It's amazing to see this. It's going to help provide health resilience both for job opportunities but also for innovators that are creating companies.

Minimum Wage for Youth

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, each and every day thousands of Albertans go to work jobs earning minimum wage. During the pandemic many of these workers were on the front lines at stores, cafes, and restaurants. The Finance minister's comment to get a better job is completely condescending. It is yet another example of the UCP's lack of respect for the people of Alberta. Meanwhile this UCP government is looking to lower liquor servers' wages and has already lowered youth minimum wages, making their paycheques cover even less. Does the minister stand by his statement that the hard-working Albertans who serve our communities should find a better job?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, I'll absolutely stand by my statement that it's government's role to create the conditions that make us most competitive, that result in investment attraction, that result in economic growth, that result in job opportunities for Albertans, that result in career opportunities that maybe didn't even exist five years from now. That's what I'll stand by.

Mr. Carson: Well, given that this UCP government claimed that it relied on expert advice to slash the wages of youth workers but given that now we see massive hikes to inflation that are drastically outpacing wage growth for workers, even those who haven't taken a pay cut as a result of this government, and given that this government could take a small step to show it's listening, that it truly cares by restoring the youth minimum wage today, Minister, let's see some compassion. Let's see something to help with the cost-of-living crisis. Will the minister restore wage cuts earned by youth workers right here and right now?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

2:10

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. From day one of this government we have been working so hard to make sure that we create the environment to ensure prosperity in our province. In Budget 2022 alone we allocated a record $600 million that would help Albertans who are looking for work, who need to upskill their training and implement skills to make sure that the jobs are going to be there today and tomorrow. We are making those investments and much more.

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, given that youth workers are facing significant barriers to affordability and employment and given that some youth face substantial financial obligations like parenting and given that people like my own mother, who raised me as a single parent when she was only 14 years old, are being forced to drop out of school because of policies like the UCP's tiered minimum wage and given that under the UCP government youth retention in our province has plummeted, will the minister advise the House on why he doesn't care about our future leaders and why he stands behind policies that are actively driving them out of the province? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Madu: You know, Mr. Speaker, it is ironic that the members opposite now care about jobs and economic opportunities for everyone. Between 2015 and 2019, under the NDP, there were a record 170,000 Albertans that they drove out of employment, more than a hundred billion dollars, that would have created good-paying jobs right here in our province from region to region, that were driven away by those members opposite. We will take no lessons from them on economic policies.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This morning I was in Red Deer speaking about the growing health care crisis in Alberta's third-largest city: paramedics forced to provide parking lot medicine, Albertans who need surgery being forced to hit the highway to Calgary or Edmonton, expectant parents forced to travel hours from their homes to give birth, health care workers that are burning out. They want to give help but have literally nothing left to give. What is this Health minister doing right here today to put an end to this crisis, and what will it take to get real action? Serious injury? Death?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for raising the issue in Red Deer. Some general surgery patients are being diverted from Red Deer to other hospitals due to shortages of physician assistants and GP hospitalists who care for patients after surgery. There were seven patients who were diverted. I want to put this into perspective. Roughly 250 surgeries per week are performed in Red Deer; we had to move seven. But that's the strength of our system, to be able to move people around. Our system is under strain, but we are focusing on delivering more resources to our system, and I'll talk more about that in a moment.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that those hospitalists are under attack by this government and given that it's not just Red Deer – our inboxes are flooded with people who can't get the health care they need – and given that we've also heard of children being bumped from their beds in the children's hospital in Calgary and given that the South Health Campus in Calgary is also seeing surging emergency room wait times, can the minister advise where surgeries are going to be cancelled next? Where does he next expect to find an ambulance stuck in a parking lot, unable to transfer a patient? At what point do we have to simply conclude that this government just doesn't care?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as I've said before in this House, our system is under strain right at this point in time. It's been a challenging last couple of years, but we understand this, and we are reacting to this. We are investing in our health care system: $600 million this year, $600 million next year, a total of $1.8 billion over the next three years, the highest amount ever in terms of expenses for the health care system. In addition to that, we are investing in capital: $3.5 billion, including $1.8 billion over the next 20 years associated with the Red Deer hospital. We are increasing staff, and I'll talk more about that in a moment.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, this government is continuing to undermine and attack staff, and given that all we hear from this government is more platitudes about what's being done, promises for the future and given that, clearly, whatever strategy this government has had for health care has failed because doctors are leaving and half as many are accepting new patients as two years ago and given that this government attacks health care professionals online, attacks patients, removes internal voices that dissent against their failed approach – just ask Dr. Verna Yiu – will this minister stand in this House, apologize for his repeated failures risking the lives of Albertans? At what point do we have to question whether he should still have his job?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is indicating that we are attacking health care workers. It's simply incorrect. We are investing in our health system. We are investing in our health workers. We have 1,800 more nurses today than we had two years ago. We have 230 more paramedics than we had two years ago. We even have 99 more doctors Q1 this year compared to Q1 last year. AHS: we're investing more money, and we'll be hiring 2,800 more staff in AHS to deliver health care services this year over last year. We're investing in capacity. We're able to deliver . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Fair Deal Panel Recommendation

Mr. Barnes: Two years ago the Fair Deal Panel called for immediate creation of a provincial police service. Now, even with a two-year head start, we are falling behind other provinces, with an all-party committee of the B.C. Legislature calling for the creation of a provincial police service just April 28. On April 1 Saskatchewan launched a 450-member provincial protective services branch while Ontario, Quebec, and Newfoundland all already have their own provincial forces. To the Premier: after two long years of consultations, studies, and delays, when can Albertans finally expect concrete action?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. As I've said publicly, both at Rural Municipalities as well as Alberta Municipalities at their spring conferences this year, I've heard from many of our municipal leaders that they have further conversations they'd like to have with our ministry regarding some concerns that they have with the PricewaterhouseCoopers report that has been received after the consultations that the ministry has had with Albertans throughout the province. We're going to continue to have those conversations with our municipalities, be able to answer their questions, and be able to get their feedback.

Mr. Barnes: Given that last week this Assembly approved my private member's motion urging the government to deploy every legal, economic, and constitutional tool to fight for a fair deal, given that the Assembly previously approved a government motion to recognize the results of the equalization referendum, given that this referendum was approved with a clear majority, and given that both MLAs and the public have democratically expressed their desire to fight for a fair deal, when can Albertans expect this Premier to stop writing empty letters and start taking real action?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are taking real action. We've negotiated a much better deal, an excellent deal, with the feds around child care. We landed a billion dollars on well reclamation. We've made progress on fiscal stabilization – more work to do – and we have equivalency on methane and our TIER program. We're leading by example on wealth creation, and we're leading by example on fiscal responsibility.

Mr. Barnes: Given that I was proud to serve on the Fair Deal Panel – I can tell you that some of the most passionate testimony during the panel was relating to our own provincial police force – given the growing rates of crime, particularly rural crime, and given that the creation of a provincial police force is most strongly supported by rural Albertans while 58 per cent of Albertans use a tribal or municipal protection option anyway, again to the Premier: why does your government continue to ignore the will of rural Albertans and force them to contract with the RCMP?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, that's completely ridiculous, as probably most of what we hear from that member. But, look, here are the facts. We're going to continue to get advice on what is possible. The key, though, is that we have many problems with agreements that we have with the federal government. Regardless of what the solution is going to be, we have many important, key problems with police governance that we need to be able to fix either through that agreement that we have with the federal government – they provide contract policing to us and to our rural communities and 47 of our urbans. But we need to fix those governance issues one way or the other, and we will commit to Albertans that we will provide those . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Calgary's Economy

Member Ceci: Mr. Speaker, day after day we hear from the jobs minister about the fantastic job he's doing in Calgary, about how everyone is swaggering because of the UCP. However, while the minister is partying, Albertans and Calgarians are struggling with the aftermath of the UCP's decision to hike costs, kill successful programs, and fail to respond to the needs of Calgarians. Our caucus has proposed a downtown plan; the UCP has proposed doing nothing and hoping the problem solves itself. Can the minister of jobs please tell this House: how many head offices are in Calgary today versus when his government took office?

2:20

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, the unemployment rate is lower than it's been since December 2018, and we expect that it's going to continue to go down. Unlike the NDP, who told Albertans, "Go get a job in British Columbia; we've got no ideas in the NDP," we are diversifying Alberta's economy: the film industry, the tech sector, logistics and manufacturing, and – oh, yes, two words the NDP will never utter – the oil and gas industry. It's thriving again in the province of Alberta.

Member Ceci: Given that we've lost 15 head offices in Calgary – could the minister stop yelling rhetoric and just admit to Albertans how badly this government has failed to keep head offices in Calgary? – and given that Calgary still has the highest unemployment rate of any major Canadian city and given that you'd think this is something the jobs minister would be concerned about but is too busy boasting about his swagger and sticking up for the least trusted Premier in . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order.

I hesitate to interrupt the member – and I appreciate that he continued to raise his voice – but it was difficult to hear him with some of the interruptions. He still has about 10 seconds remaining if he wants to conclude his question in a manner in which I can hear.

Member Ceci: Thank you.

This minister is too busy boasting about his swagger and sticking up for the least trusted Premier in Canada. Can the minister tell us the unemployment rate in Calgary? Be specific. Show there's some capacity for research over there.

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, this government will never apologize for fighting for jobs for Albertans, unlike the NDP, who gave up on Albertans. You know what we've never heard from the NDP? Congratulations when it comes to bringing in new investment to this province. Amazon Web Services: crickets. Rogers Communications: crickets. When it came to RBC's innovation hub, crickets when it comes to the NDP. We know how to get investment into this province. We will not apologize for fighting every single day for jobs for Albertans.

Member Ceci: Given that Calgary's unemployment is 7.7 per cent and given that while everyone in this House enjoys hearing the joyous shouts of the jobs minister trying to deflect from his failures to revitalize the downtown of our largest city but given that I'm really concerned that he either doesn't know the unemployment rate in Calgary or refuses to tell this House and given that wages earned by Calgary workers haven't kept pace with inflation and that the economic failures of this government continue to pile up, is the reason the minister of jobs is doing such a bad job because he's badly informed, because he's ignorant of the reality, or both?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, you know what's interesting right now that's happening across Alberta? Canadians are moving to this province. And you know why? High-paying jobs and affordable big cities. You know what was extinct under the NDP? Licence plates from any other province. Nobody was moving here when the NDP were in office. Everybody was leaving. Now we have people coming to this province. You know why? There are opportunities in Alberta again. That's a record that we're proud of. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Utility Rebates and Small-business Supports in Morinville-St. Albert Constituency

Ms Renaud: Mr. Speaker, the people living in the constituency of Morinville-St. Albert deserve a real leader for their communities. The current MLA and associate minister of electricity promised a natural gas rebate but failed to deliver. Then he promised an electricity rebate. Still nothing. It's been more than 60 days and nothing. Can the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity explain to his own constituents and all Albertans, for that matter, why he continues to fail them so badly when they need help the most, right now?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Apparently, we have a front-row seat to a master class in absolute gaslighting, Mr. Speaker, because that is absolutely what they're doing. We signed royal assent on the rebate legislation last week, on Friday, but you know what's interesting? We could have had royal assent a week before. In fact, we could have had royal assent six business days before, but the NDP voted against doing it. Shame on them.

Ms Renaud: Given that I've spent a lot of time communicating with the residents of Morinville-St. Albert, who tell me that after three years of the UCP they are looking for change, and given that they're tired of a government that drinks and dines on the sky palace patio, flies their friends on private planes while the Finance minister insults everyday Albertans by telling them to get a better job, will the associate minister of electricity stand in this House, yell a little less, and apologize on behalf of the Finance minister for insulting them? Or, actually, does he agree with the insulting comments made?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, last week we had Canada's first hydrogen conference. We had 2,000 delegates. We had 20 international delegates. This was an incredible opportunity for us to put Alberta on the map in hydrogen. Well, guess what the NDP were doing at that time. They had an eight-page grade 11 book report on hydrogen, and they were standing in front of the conference giving it out to passersby. They reminded me of guerrilla marketers in Vegas. It was that moment when I realized how irrelevant they are.

Ms Renaud: Given that small businesses I've spoken to in the constituency of Morinville-St. Albert are still – still – waiting in some cases for funding they were promised in earlier waves of the pandemic and given that this government's support for these small-business owners has come up short time and again – the funding provided, when it does come, wasn't even enough to keep the lights on – and given that those businesses deserve representation in this House, that they deserve an MLA at the cabinet table who supports them and doesn't just do what he's told, does the associate minister of electricity have an answer for these businesses that are struggling in his riding? They're drowning in debt. They truly are struggling.

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, do you know what the residents of St. Albert deserve? They deserve an MLA that lives in their riding. That's right. They don't even have an MLA that lives in their riding. Well, let me tell you that despite that, we made a commitment that we are going to stand up and support Albertans. We did that with $2 billion worth of supports: the electricity rebate, the gas rebate, the 13 cents a litre that we paused at the pump. That is $2 billion worth of supports. We made a commitment to have Albertans' backs, and we will always do that for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Community Facilities and Live Events

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans have endured many challenges to their lives and livelihoods over the past two years, and it's now time to heal, revive, and support community-spirited activities that we hold close to our hearts. Arts, culture, history, and heritage are paramount to community well-being and reflect upon the vitality and diversity we share and the uniqueness each of us brings to this great province in forming a brighter and more inclusive future. To the Minister of Culture: what is being done by your ministry to assist our dedicated and passionate civil society organizers so that 2022 can be a banner year for our community recovery and celebration?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for his question. I, too, love the dragon boat festival, which is in my very riding. Live events are an important part of Alberta's economic, social, and emotional recovery. Our government has and will continue to provide grant funding to assist organizations in hosting live events. Funding available is both operational and project based and is provided by the Alberta Foundation for the Arts and through the community initiatives program. Alberta Culture Days funding is also available to community organizations to host events in 2022.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that community associations and facilities are important to the wellness of our citizens and given that varied sources of funding are imperative to operations and facility upkeep and further given that many facilities are aging and require considerable life cycle maintenance or upgrades, to the same minister: what supports are available from our government for community organizers and their facilities as they focus on rebuilding the strong sense of community we value and desire in our great province?

The Speaker: The chief government whip.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, public facilities like community associations, I think we can all agree, have an important part in building healthy, vibrant communities across Alberta. Just last week we announced another round of funding for CFEP, or the community facility enhancement program, to support these organizations. These spaces provide a place for people to connect and are an important part of the emotional and social recovery for Alberta. If community organizers would like to apply, there are multiple intakes during the year. The next annual intake for CFEP large is on June 15 and CFEP small on May 15.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister. Given that outdoor festivals and events are pivotal to a community's vibrancy and given that celebrating heritage and diversity, including my personal favourites, that you referenced, GlobalFest, Calgary folk fest, dragon boats, and the Chinatown Street Festival, to name a few, is crucial to Alberta's fabric – oh, and did I mention the Calgary Stampede? – to the same minister: what is the ministry doing to promote the importance of and participation in outdoor public festivities in a post-COVID world?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is so great, I think we can all agree, to see people coming together and participating in outdoor events, especially grassroots events put on by local communities.

Our government is supporting these events with the Alberta Culture Days grant. Alberta Culture Days is a great way to celebrate the talent, community spirit, and cultures that make Alberta so special. Applications this year are open until May 12, and I encourage any community not-for-profit organization to apply for a grant and become a part of the month-long celebration.

2:30 Employment Leave for Pregnancy Loss and Bill 17

Member Irwin: Pregnancy loss can be a deeply traumatic experience, impacting 1 in 4 pregnancies. Along with this come many complex emotions: grief, shame, guilt, self-loathing, feelings of isolation, to name a few. Pregnancy loss can include miscarriage, stillbirth, termination for medical reasons, or abortion. All of these forms of loss are distressing, and we must ensure to be inclusive and compassionate to all forms it may take. Will the labour minister make Bill 17 more appropriate and comprehensive by allowing bereavement leave to include pregnancy loss alone rather than legislating specific types of pregnancy loss?

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have worked with colleagues and those in the not-for-profit sector to bring forward Bill 17. There's nothing more heartbreaking than a loss of pregnancy, and we want to make sure that the supports are there for those of our fellow citizens to be able to grieve with their family members in peace and quiet. I look forward to debating Bill 17 and making it law in this province.

Member Irwin: Given that there are significant barriers for those experiencing pregnancy loss, particularly in employment situations where someone cannot afford to take on paid leave and someone who may not have access to sick leave, and given that some people may experience the pain of multiple pregnancy losses, often within several months of each other, experiencing both physical and emotional pain, to the labour minister: again, will you expand the definition of pregnancy loss in Bill 17, and how are you ensuring that your government will make sure that all Albertans are supported during their recovery?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for that question. Bill 17 has been crafted in a manner that ensures that you don't have to disclose to your employer the circumstances under which you are seeking the leave, and we're to make sure that anyone out there that has suffered a loss of pregnancy has the ability to benefit from Bill 17. I look forward, again, to additional debate on Bill 17 before this Assembly.

Member Irwin: Given that there's still a whole lot of lack of clarity here in terms of what types of pregnancy loss are covered and we know that this is an incredibly difficult topic to discuss with those closest to us, let alone our own employer, who may not realize that an employee does not need to provide medical details to access leave, does the minister think that it's appropriate for an employee to have to have a personal discussion or have to educate their employer on their own tragic circumstances to acquire bereavement leave? If so, how can you justify this to Albertans?

Mr. Madu: You know, Mr. Speaker, my thoughts of this nature are deeply personal to those of our fellow citizens going through these issues. That is why in Bill 17 there is no requirement anywhere in that particular bill to disclose the reasons for requesting bereavement leave under Bill 17. At the end of the day, we have faith in our fellow citizens and their employers to make sure that this leave is going to be there for anyone that needs it.

Education Funding

Ms Hoffman: Last month Rocky View schools asked the province for $1.6 million to help bring in 10 modular classrooms to accommodate new students who are choosing public education. On Thursday the UCP government said no. Actually, the minister gave the school district the classic UCP response. According to the board chair, quote: she's given us permission to use our own dollars. Can the Minister of Education tell her own UCP colleagues why she's refusing to help support the communities they represent in Airdrie, Cochrane, and Rocky View county who are choosing public schools?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. The school board from that area asked to utilize, move some modulars around, et cetera. What the member opposite didn't share was that they did this outside of the regular planning for capital. If they wanted to wait and allow for the capital expense to go through, that would've been a different conversation, but because of the fact that they have increasing reserves in their school authority, we certainly allowed them to go ahead and use the reserves.

Ms Hoffman: Given that there's no help from the UCP for public schools in Rocky View county or, really, most communities in Alberta and given that north Calgary itself has been shut out of school buildings by this UCP government and given that the UCP has found capital money for charter schools, why is the minister intentionally sabotaging the public, Catholic, and francophone schools that families rely on in north Calgary and its surrounding communities?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite continues to show that she doesn't do her homework. We are spending $2 billion to build schools, over 66 schools across this province. We are continuing – in the francophone community there are over, I believe, eight projects ongoing right now. The member opposite should do her homework, but she doesn't, and I'm not sure why.

Ms Hoffman: If the minister read her own budget instead of trying to take credit for projects announced under the NDP, we'd see better answers in this House, Mr. Speaker.

Given that in Edmonton public schools there are 1,700 new students headed to schools for the first time this fall but the government refuses to fund them and given that Rocky View schools are also expecting their student population to grow this year and in the years to come, can the minister tell the families sending their kids to kindergarten in overcrowded classes in Rocky View schools this September why the UCP refuses to fund their families' educational choice, why the minister won't properly fund public education?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can tell the members opposite that they did not support choice. When I went across this province, the one thing I heard over and over again: "Thank you. Thank you for supporting choice and funding it." We have increased the budget overall for education over three years by $1 billion. The members opposite need to recognize that and appreciate the fact that our schools are well funded, and the Edmonton public in particular is gaining an additional $11 million on their over $1 billion budget.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Opioid Addiction Treatment

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Justin Trudeau and the NDP are misguided when it comes to the issue of addiction. The belief that drug policy should be completely focused on decriminalizing drugs and that providing a free supply of narcotics and needles will result in better outcomes is questionable. Alberta's committee to examine this issue heard clearly from a range of experts that there is no evidence to support the distribution of public supply of addictive drugs. To the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions: how will this government address these different strategies?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, thank you very much. I'd like to thank the member for his work on the select special committee on safe supply. What concerns me the most is what the Liberal-NDP alliance is actually advocating for. Let me be clear. What they're advocating for is a public supply of addictive drugs for which there is no evidence to support that policy decision. In fact, the evidence clearly says that the more opioids there are in the community, the more harms are caused to the community. So let's be clear. Just because we brand something an opioid and make it safe does not actually make it safe.

Mr. Yao: It is given that one expert, Dr. Keith Humphreys, chair of the Stanford-Lancet Commission on the North American Opioid Crisis, said this about the OxyContin era: pharmaceutical opioids were legally produced and regulated, "public health would benefit by increased [opioid distribution]", and opioids would only be taken as prescribed by those it was prescribed to. Mr. Speaker, this may sound familiar because the same points that were used to sell OxyContin are being used by activists today to sell safe supply. My question to the minister is: will it be any different today than it was then?

The Speaker: The hon. the associate minister.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, thank you very much, and thank you to the member for the question. Let's be very clear. Dr. Keith Humphreys is one of the foremost experts in the field of addiction medicine not just in North America but on this entire planet. He led the Stanford-Lancet Commission on the North American Opioid Crisis. There is no greater expert than Dr. Humphreys. But let me be clear. Safe supply is not a medical term. It is a marketing term. Let's be very, very clear on this. I support the work of Dr. Keith Humphreys, and I support the work of the members of that committee.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. It is given that good governments should rely on data and evidence to make decisions, not just listen to the most vocal and aggressive advocates. There is no scientific data to suggest that facilitation and a public supply of addictive drugs is an effective way to manage an addiction crisis. Can the minister advise this House on the concrete actions this government has taken to address the addiction crisis and to help people get their lives back?

2:40

The Speaker: The associate minister.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, thank you very much. It is so important that we are trying to get people's lives back. The illness of addiction is something that has affected almost everyone, either directly or indirectly. We are committed to recovery coaches, the DORS program, the VODP program, which is an award-winning program. We created 8,000 spaces. We've eliminated user fees. Under the previous government only the rich were able to get treatment. We've eliminated those fees whereby everybody can get help. We are committed to a recovery-oriented system and care to help everyone.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds or less we will continue with the remainder of the daily Routine.

Ramadan

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, today Muslims in Alberta join over 1.6 billion people throughout the world celebrating Eid, which marks the end of the month-long fasting during Ramadan. The holy month of Ramadan highlights and shows the best of not just the Muslim community but all of our communities here in Alberta. Throughout Ramadan community members and many of my colleagues from outside the faith joined in the celebrations and iftars, the daily breaking of the fast. This is an important aspect of Ramadan. The iftar is a community event, allowing for people from other cultural backgrounds sometimes to join in the celebration, enjoy new friendships, and participate in the generosity that is the core of the Muslim faith. I saw this myself many times this year at the iftar events that I was honoured to join. I actually cosponsored an iftar with the Palestinian youth council and was able to join the Islamic Academy and the Muslim Association of Canada school iftar events as well. Fantastic community events, all of them.

Alberta is stronger as a whole for the Muslims that live with us and are fundamental to who we are as Albertans and Canadians. The first Canadian mosque, for example, was built in Edmonton more than 80 years ago. And all this time we've helped to build this province, building it together with our Muslim brothers and sisters. Throughout Ramadan Muslim communities have celebrated and recognized their connection to faith and all communities.

Today in this Assembly we have the opportunity to come together, celebrate, and support the Muslim communities by voting to move Bill 204, the Anti-Racism Act, through the debate in this Assembly. This legislation comes from what we have been hearing from racialized communities, including Muslims, and today all members of this Assembly should consider how listening could actually improve this community that is Alberta. This year's Ramadan celebration showed the very best of Alberta and showed the vital connections that Muslim communities have in every corner of the province.

Thank you so much.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

2022 Provincial Legislation

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As we start to approach the summer, I would like to recognize all the amazing legislation this government, our government, has been introducing. Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, makes steps towards protecting the continuing care system throughout the province. It closes gaps exposed by the COVID pandemic and will strengthen the effectiveness of the additional 1,500 continuing care spaces being added to the health care system.

As a teacher I feel that Bill 15 is long overdue. The Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022, will bring greater confidence to the teaching profession disciplinary process currently controlled by the Alberta Teachers' Association. By removing their control and the conflicts of interest that come with it, we are creating a transparent and reliable system that Albertans can have confidence in.

Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, aims to improve and support leave for families that lose a child through stillbirth or miscarriage. It's important that we support those who deal with these losses and give them the time they need and deserve to grieve. This is just some of the amazing legislation that has been introduced, and I can't wait to see what comes next as we continue to improve the lives of all current and future Albertans.

Even though I'm not surprised, I still find it reckless that the NDP continue to side with their union buddies that are fighting to keep their archaic conflicts of interest that only benefit themselves. They continue to oppose a better future for all who reside in Alberta and choose to promote division amongst us. Mr. Speaker, it's time the NDP wake up, take out their union-certified earplugs, and listen to Albertans for once.

I'm proud to be part of a government that continues to listen and improve the health, safety, livelihoods, and education of all Albertans. Thank you.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills I am pleased to present the committee's final report on Bill Pr. 1, Calgary Young Men's Christian Association Amendment Act, 2022, sponsored by the hon. Member for Calgary-South East, and Bill Pr. 2, Calgary Heritage Authority Amendment Act, 2022, sponsored by the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein. These bills were referred to the committee on March 22, 2022. The report recommends that Bill Pr. 1 proceed and that Bill Pr. 2 proceed with amendments. I request concurrence of the Assembly in the final report on bills Pr. 1 and Pr. 2.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the Member for Leduc-Beaumont, the chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills, has requested concurrence in the report on Bill Pr. 1 and Bill Pr. 2. This is a debatable motion pursuant to Standing Order 18. If anyone wishes to speak to the motion for concurrence, that ought to be done now.

Seeing none, the hon. chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills has requested concurrence in the report.

[Motion for concurrence carried]

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Bill 23
Professional Governance Act

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to request leave to introduce Bill 23, the Professional Governance Act.

The Alberta government delegates self-governing responsibilities for certain professions and occupations to professional regulatory organizations. Currently these organizations are governed by a confusing and inconsistent patchwork of nine separate acts and 28 supporting regulations. The proposed Professional Governance Act will consolidate, modernize, and streamline this patchwork into one umbrella act with one supporting regulation, making it easier for them to do their work of protecting the health, safety, and public interest of Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, I move first reading of Bill 23, the Professional Governance Act.

[Motion carried; Bill 23 read a first time]

The Speaker: Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Motions for Concurrence in Committee Reports on Public Bills Other than Government Bills

Bill 204
Anti-Racism Act

The Speaker: Hon. members, on April 25, 2022, the chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills presented the report of that committee on Bill 204, the Anti-Racism Act. The report recommended that the bill not proceed. As a member other than the mover rose to speak on April 22, 2022, debate on the motion will proceed today.

The motion to concur in the committee's report on Bill 204 has already been moved, and therefore I will now recognize any member wishing to speak. Are there members wishing to speak to concurrence? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am quite pleased to be able to have a brief moment to speak to this, because the government has done everything possible to ensure that the opposition has the least amount of chance to speak to these kinds of bills.

In fact, what's happening here is a continuation of the assault on democracy that's been consistent with the government ensuring that every private member's bill brought up by the opposition side has been prevented from even seeing the light of day in the House, which is an absolute attack on the Westminster democratic principles that have been established and have been maintained in this province for generations and, of course, in the Westminster system for centuries. It is completely repugnant that the government would continue to act in this way. They clearly do not appreciate democracy. They clearly do not understand the functions of democracy, and they are using their ridiculous ideology to prevent a discussion from happening in this House yet again, just as they have with every other private member's bill.

They should be fully ashamed of themselves, and they, you know, really need to go back and learn some basic facts about how democracy works and the fact that it is not about a single party governing at their own whim but a balance of views being presented, reasonably contested, and encouraging the best of ideas to rise to the surface after that kind of testing. This government has failed completely to do that in every single case, and they're continuing to do that here, and I think the government absolutely should be ashamed of itself.

Now, with regard to this particular piece of legislation they are piling on top of the antidemocratic with the imposition of, essentially, a systemic racist model of understanding. Again, how this government can do these things without complete shame is just appalling to me.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

You know, I had the opportunity two years ago to meet with some young students at the University of Calgary who had proposed a process of collecting race-based data to this government and had come forward and challenged the university and challenged this government to proceed. This government completely failed to heed this kind of request, not because there isn't good, scientific reason to pursue race-based data but because this government simply is taking the position that: if we don't see it, it doesn't exist. This is a complete lack of developmental growth by this government. We know that children under the age of six months act in this way, that if they can't see it, then it doesn't exist. But by the time they're one year of age, they understand that things exist even when you don't look at them, yet this government is continuing this really childish attitude that not collecting data is the way to move forward.

I absolutely cannot support this government's motion because of that. It is clear that people of the Black, Indigenous, and people of colour communities have said time and time again that they are experiencing a problem with inequality with regard to the services that they receive largely from public institutions such as the police, social services, health care, and education. All of these areas are areas over which the government has some ability to make some changes.

What they don't have is the data to support where the changes should occur. What they're doing here is that they're saying: well, if we never learn where the problem is, then we don't have to fix the problem. What kind of an appalling attitude is that for a government to take? You know, this is the government that handed out earplugs in this Legislature, very antidemocratic behaviour right from the very beginning.

Now they are actually using this legislative earplugs set by denying the right for opposition members to bring forward bills even for debate. They know that they're going to be able to defeat them when they're in the House, so it's not as if somehow legislation is going to be forced on them. They can defeat it because they have a majority, but they do it anyways because they actually do not appreciate democracy and what holds it together.

Now, getting back to this bill, there are a number of very strong reasons why this bill should be brought forward. We know that if we actually use race-based data to gain a greater understanding of the issues in our society, then we'll be able to act differently. The advantages of having a race-based data collection process is that you can monitor the discrimination, you can identify and remove systemic barriers, you can address historical disadvantages, and you can promote substantive equality. Those seem like some pretty solid reasons, to me, to have race-based data collected.

If the government actually thought that there were, you know, some problems in the way it was worded or how it was framed, they could have allowed this to come into the House, where they would shape it, change it, and perhaps even introduce a bill of their own with regard to this, but they have not done so. They clearly do not wish to do any of the things I just mentioned. They don't want to identify systemic barriers because then it would be requisite upon them to actually do something about it, and they don't want to do anything about racial discrimination. This is just an appalling position for this government to take. They could actually take the opportunity to really bring substantive equality into our public systems.

Now, we know that there are no rules written down any longer that say, “Blacks, do not enter” or “Do not serve Indians,” the kinds of things we saw in our history, and thank goodness we don’t have any of those things any longer in actual rules, but it doesn’t mean that the problem has gone away. The problem has shifted from some of the overt language that we used to see to a more subversive, systemic, and more difficult to see yet fully experienced by people of the Black, Indigenous, and people of colour communities. They can tell you that when they go in to receive services from places, they can see the difference between the services they receive and the services that people of the non-BIPOC community receive, and they can tell you, by demonstrating in terms of outcomes, how much they are suffering as a result.

In health care we see all the time that people in the Indigenous community actually have worse outcomes, and I’ve seen evidence on this with regard to people of the Black community as well. So it’s the reason why these communities are coming together and saying: it’s actually hurting us physically in terms of our actual outcomes in terms of our health, but it also violates our citizenship, our right to actually believe that we will have equality with our fellow citizens in terms of the nature and the substance and the direction of services provided to us. That’s what they’re telling us.

The only way to ensure that we are able to identify these insidious forms of racism is to spend some time actually analyzing the data to look for the situations in which it occurs so that we can build upon this good evidence a system that eliminates and removes this kind of racism. But a government that doesn’t understand democracy and prevents these things from coming to the House clearly doesn’t understand racism either. I think it is completely unacceptable that we find ourselves in this position, and I certainly encourage the government to reconsider this. For the members opposite not to vote for this bill is far too telling about who they are and why they are ill-equipped to run this province in this day and age.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The next member who caught my eye is the hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to my colleague. The debate of legislation in this place and the democracy that follows with that is one of the most important things we do. On that I can agree.

One thing I just wanted to say – and I’ll just speak quickly to this – is that race-based data requires a lot of consultation and a lot of work. I don’t disagree with the premise of what’s trying to be done here, but I think for any of us who have had the privilege – and especially as a person who is of Southeast Asian origin and Caucasian origin, it has been my privilege speaking with many of the communities across this province, either previously as a minister or now, and race-based data can be very, very nerve-racking for folks that don’t understand how and why it’s being used.

I don’t disagree with my colleague. I think it’s really important. I think the minister would also agree with that. But what we do need to do is make sure that it is collected appropriately and that it’s used appropriately. I think there will be an opportunity, as more legislation comes forward, to actually see that happen. I would hope that my colleague across the way from the loyal opposition – the character assassinations and the assumption around bigotry and around racism towards a very, very diverse caucus on this side I think are inappropriate.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I think that the proof is in the pudding of the legislation that comes forward in the future and the use of that legislation in order to do exactly what the member is asking to do. Having said that, though, I do believe, based on my very, very small part in this discussion, that there is really a tremendous amount of consultations and work that needs to be done to make sure – those of us who have dealt with racism in the past know how easy it is to use information that you give against you. Even being female has been used against women. It’s absolutely imperative that the data that we collect is used in an appropriate manner and that the legislation actually outlines that to make sure that the best version of that data is actually helping out exactly what the member was talking about, making sure that the data is fixing and helping to attain better policy that legitimizes the work that all of us are trying to do.

Also, the assumption, I would also say, Mr. Speaker, to not speak about the work that has been done: there’s been a lot of great work that’s been done not only by our government but by other governments as well. I think that to undermine that by suggesting that the decisions being made around this bill somehow undermine the antiracism work is going 10 steps backward. Whether or not we’re debating it in this Legislature, that democracy piece – I actually would prefer to be able to debate the legislation.

Having said that, I also believe that there’s a lot of work that needs to be done on a piece of legislation, where that debate can actually look at the work that we’ve done with consultation with multiple, multiple groups of multicultural groups and First Nations groups. Like I said, I will say this on the record here. I have had, oh, hundreds of conversations with various groups across the province, and I’m not saying this because it’s something I believe. This was information that was passed on to me by people who are truly concerned about what will be done with that data.

So while I very much appreciate the bill that was brought forward, I do believe that there is going to be an opportunity to debate that within the premise of a larger piece of legislation that will allow us to actually look at the data and how we’re going to present that data. I look forward to that day, and I’m very excited to be able to debate that in the future.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is indeed an honour for me to be able to speak on Bill 204. Let me begin by thanking the Member for Edmonton-City Centre for bringing forward this bill. No one on the floor of this Assembly would contest that racism, discrimination, and systemic racism are real and continue to negatively impact people from cultural and minority communities, including our First Nations people, so I appreciate the intention, the good intention, behind the tabling of Bill 204.

That said, Mr. Speaker, I have taken some good time to read through Bill 204. It essentially has 10 sections in this bill. The major sections of the bill: you will find that section 2 speaks to the purpose of the bill; section 3 speaks to the establishment of an antiracism office and the appointment of an antiracism commissioner, something no other province except for one or the federal government has done in this country; then section 4 talks about the duties of the commissioner; section 5 talks about consultation; and section 6 talks about impact assessment.

Mr. Speaker, as my colleague rightly noted, a bill of this nature requires a great deal of consultation, not just from the activist class or from the academic class but from a wide range of cultural communities. From the inception of this government, on day one of this government, we began the hard work of making sure that we build an inclusive Alberta. You know, beyond the work that we have done out there, you don't need to look for that anywhere other than the composition of the members of the government caucus to understand why this is a deeply important issue for us. I am part of a caucus that is more diverse than any government caucus in the history of our province. Not even the members opposite, the NDP, could come close when they were in office between 2015 and 2019.

Mr. Speaker, I have also stood before the floor of this Assembly to say on complex, important matters of race and racism and systemic discrimination that the last thing we want to do is to adopt tools or an approach that creates a wedge between fellow citizens. Instead, we should endeavour to build bridges, build relationships, so that collectively we can tackle the issues that we face as a society. One of those issues that we face as a society today is racism, discrimination, and systemic racism. That is why – you know, I have already talked about what led me to the Legislature. It was a protest that was taking place on the steps of the Legislature between 2016, '17, and '18 by members of the cultural minority community when the NDP were in office.

Members of the community where I come from called upon the NDP to ban the practice of carding. They did not lift a finger. They did not do that. Instead – I tuned into question period to listen to some of the debate on this particular issue – the then Justice minister, the Member for Calgary-Mountain View, dismissed the idea that carding was a problem. This was not 10, 20 years ago. This was just a few years back, in 2018. The Member for Edmonton-City Centre, who shares some cultural affinity with myself, stood before the floor of this Assembly and indeed in media interviews, saying at that point in time that he agreed with the then Justice minister that that was not a problem.

Mr. Speaker, when I brought forward the bill that would legislatively ban carding, the reason why we have so many young people, Indigenous people in our correctional facilities, the members opposite voted against that bill, the first of its kind in this country. Alberta is the first province to start to truly ban the illegal practice of carding. I have my own personal stories to tell about these issues. The members opposite: I would want them to walk the talk.

Mr. Speaker, we went on to institute, when I was Justice minister, the hate crime co-ordination unit within the Department of Justice. Never happened anywhere in this country before: Alberta will be the only province where you have a hate crime co-ordination unit within the Department of Justice. We went further to appoint a liaison on hate crime.

Mr. Speaker, in the dying months of the NDP they put together the Alberta Anti-racism Advisory Council, and I thank them for that. Even though it was a month before the election in 2019, I still thank them for that. When I have the recommendation coming out of that committee, that is working through cabinet, that includes – one of the recommendations is actually the collection of race-based data. That work is making its way through the government process. Then from nowhere and while the NDP knows that this government is working on the recommendations of that council – there are 48 of them; as of today 22 of them have been implemented – they brought a bill. Rather than taking into consultation different communities, they propose an unwieldy bill that would make it harder for government departments to function.

What we are going to do, in line with the work that has been going on since the inception of this government and with the report of the Anti-racism Advisory Council, is bring forward a bill, a workable, functional bill, that actually solves the problem and addresses the problem that we face, the gap in data, and how that impacts minority communities and First Nations people, not a political football.

You listen to the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford talking – I mean, calling names – about: this government didn't do that; this government didn't do that. Baseless. I will remind the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford – and I hate to say this, but I have to put it on the record – that between 2015 and 2019 the government that they led had only one Black member of the Legislature on their side. We may not agree philosophically with the Member for Edmonton-City Centre, but you will never deny that he's a brilliant, well-spoken member of this Assembly. In NDP's traditional fashion they appointed all kinds as members of cabinet, chairs of committees, associate ministers, yet nothing.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The next member to catch my eye is the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to the concurrence motion on Bill 204. I appreciate that members of the government have stood and spoken. Certainly, this is more engagement than we've had on this private member's bill than at any point in this process so far.

I think I've outlined my concerns with the committee process which this government has put in place, the incredibly weak, thin arguments that a sole two members of that committee brought forward. Others spent the entire committee meeting looking at their phones, Mr. Speaker. That belies the respect that this government has claimed they had.

That aside, I appreciate that we have had some members rise and offer some more substantive discussion on this particular bill. In response to some of what's been said, the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore talked about this kind of work, the collection of race-based data, needing wide-ranging consultation. The Minister of Labour and Immigration referred to the same. Indeed, that was a comment made in passing by the two members from the UCP on the committee that spoke. Mr. Speaker, this bill laid out a robust process that would have had to be fulfilled to develop the regulations which would govern what data was collected, how it was used. The bill laid out the requirement that that involve consultation with racialized communities across the province of Alberta. The bill does not mandate immediately stepping in and simply starting to collect. It puts out the process by which to undertake that which they say needs to be done.

Now, what I hear them saying is that they want to do that work first. They want to do it as a government before they bring out the legislation, but my question is: what would that look like? In Ontario, where they have brought forward legislation of this kind, indeed they brought forward the bill, set out the framework, and then embarked on extensive consultations to develop the regulations that oversaw the collection of that data. That is what I based this on. Now, admittedly, Mr. Speaker, I do not have the resources of government as a private member to go forward and speak with all of the racialized communities across the province of Alberta. Admittedly, I do not, and I did not claim that I did.

But those that the minister belittles as activists and academics and whose opinions he apparently thinks are not worthy have been doing this work, people from his community. Dr. Bukola Salami: extensive work and research benefiting our community. She is not to be dismissed as an activist, as a mere academic whose opinion does not matter. She is someone who has done the real work benefiting communities in the field, stood with me in support of this bill. Indeed, it seems that the government is saying: “We’ve got this. We’re good. Thank you; we’re working on our own process, our own legislation.”

The Minister of Labour and Immigration dares to say that I introduced this bill as a political football, that somehow I was disingenuous in bringing forward this legislation after months of consultation, conversations with hundreds of Albertans, reaching out to those experts I could speak with, speaking with the Information and Privacy Commissioner. Let’s be clear. They are not raising this, Mr. Speaker, to say that this bill should not be passed or that this bill needs to be amended. They said: it should not even bother being debated; it is not worth our time.

I recognize that indeed there are historically reasons for BIPOC communities, for racialized communities to distrust government – absolutely, Mr. Speaker – which is why we laid out the robust process in this bill, carefully thought that through.

The minister spoke about: there is no province in Canada that has an antiracism office and an antiracism commissioner. As far as I know, there’s not any other province that has a Chief Firearms Officer, but this government decided that that was a priority.

If you want to talk about politicization, we can certainly talk about many ways in which this government uses its relationships with these communities to look for political gain, but that is not why we’re here. We are here to talk about the actual bill. The Minister of Labour and Immigration suggested that this is a bill that could create wedges between fellow citizens. Mr. Speaker, let’s be clear that setting up a structure to allow us to collect the data to identify where real issues and inequities exist and then having someone in place to work with government departments to address those inequities is not driving a wedge. That is an assumption on the part of that minister. That is simply setting up an actual process of accountability to get this work done.

Now, in Nova Scotia I know they don’t have – the office is not called an antiracism office and an antiracism commissioner, but they do have an office and a commissioner for work with racialized communities. Again, that was part of what we brought into this bill as a means of accountability.

3:20

The minister talked about the Anti-Racism Advisory Council. Yes, our government established that. We put them in place. They came forward with some excellent recommendations, and indeed members of that advisory council spoke out in favour of Bill 204 and its realization of those objectives. I wonder: has the government reached out to speak to the members of that first committee who made that recommendation to talk to them about their thoughts on the legislation it’s apparently developing, which the minister said we should have known about? Mr. Speaker, any time we have asked about the progress of the work on the recommendations from the Anti-Racism Advisory Council, we’ve gotten a series of talking points and, on occasion, attacks, but the minister says that we should have known this; we should have assumed. He calls Bill 204 an unworthy bill.

Mr. Madu: That was not what I said. Unwelcome, not unworthy. I did not say that.

Mr. Shepherd: I apologize if I misheard the minister. I will withdraw that comment.

But they suggest that this bill is not worthy of going forward. I would note that Dr. Jared Wesley, professor of political science, six years of experience in the public service, including leading in developing policy development education within the public service here in the province of Alberta, said of Bill 204: “[It] is a great piece of legislation. Likely one of the most thoughtfully-crafted and publicly-engaged private member’s bills to come out of this legislature . . . It deserves a debate in the legislature.”

So the reasons I am hearing certainly are more substantive than the ones that were put forward at committee. But what I am hearing is that this government simply was not interested in working with me on this issue or having my bill be debated. They want to move forward with their own, and indeed, should that bill come forward, we will engage in debate on that bill, just as we engaged in debate on the minister’s bill on carding, which is more than he is willing to do here. The minister repeatedly criticizes, and I have stood in this place before and said that, yes, absolutely, I admit that we did not get that across the line. We did not take the action on carding that he brought forward.

But when he brought that bill forward, we debated the bill. We went out and we talked with community. We brought in amendments to the bill based on what we heard from people in the community and concerns that were brought forward, and we debated those amendments, and the minister stood and debated those amendments and gave his reasons for turning them down. Then, because we felt that there were loopholes within that bill and concerns that had not been addressed, yes, on principle we voted against that bill.

All of that, Mr. Speaker, is more than this government is willing to do on this private member’s bill. They are unwilling to actually do any work on this. They talk about the need for consultation, to hear from more people. Not one member of the government on that committee brought forward a stakeholder. Not one. I didn’t hear a single one of them come and say: “I went and I talked to my constituents. I reached out to folks, and here are the concerns they brought forward.” Indeed, what we got was a recitation of some weak talking points and key messages.

Now, again, I appreciate the contributions from the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore, who has actually looked at this.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. member for – I believe the individual who caught my eye, though, was the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. I’ll clear that up after.

Mrs. Aheer: Mr. Speaker, am I allowed to speak to it twice? I don’t know.

The Acting Speaker: I don’t think that you can speak to it twice. That’s why I saw the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, and then I was just going to clear it up.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, sir. I appreciate it. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Yeah.

Go ahead, sir.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 204. You know, it’s disappointing that, as opposed to rising to speak to the contents of this bill, we have less than half an hour to discuss the fate of this bill because a committee that has a majority of government members on it has once again decided to vote down this bill. I can tell you – you know, it’s extremely disappointing. I’ve spent 10 years in this Chamber, and it’s only recently that private members’ bills go to a committee that was quite frankly set up to kill bills and to do it in a way that was a little more discreet and private than through this Chamber. There is no other reason for it. It never existed in Alberta’s history.

One of my frustrations is that a government comes in and brings Ottawa to Alberta. A government that claims to be standing up for Albertans to Ottawa can't bring in enough of Ottawa's traditions to Alberta. Well, I'm proud of this place, of our traditions, and it's disappointing that this government – and later on today we're going to talk about another motion to amend the standing orders for, I don't know, the 10th time in the last three years – continues to dismantle the very processes and cultural fabric of this Chamber. I don't know if it's because their leader has spent too much time in Ottawa for whatever reason. I don't need to speculate. The point is that it's disappointing.

Here we have a bill that I know my colleague the hon. Member for Edmonton–City Centre has spent years working on. You know, a great point was raised when the member was answering questions by the government side, that this bill was written in a similar spirit to the previous bill that the Chamber voted down in that it left many of the details to regulations, because cabinet has the whole civil service to support them in writing regulations. Mr. Speaker, do you know how many staff work on a private member's bill? Three; actually, two and then Parliamentary Counsel, which, again, I give the utmost kudos to because those folks work extremely hard.

The point is that the Member for Edmonton–City Centre has gone out and consulted, unless my numbers are incorrect, with over 600 Albertans and groups of Albertans on this legislation. We've heard an acknowledgement from the government that collecting race-based data is necessary, yet the answer is: we'll get to it sometime.

To the Member for Edmonton–City Centre's point, if there is something missing or wrong from this bill, then let's amend it. I believe that my colleague would accept government amendments to improve the bill, which this place was actually set up to do, yet we have an example, another example, Mr. Speaker, where a private member's bill doesn't even get debated in the Chamber. Yes, for people at home to understand, we're debating concurrence, which is a 60-minute time limit on whether or not the Assembly should agree to kill the bill before it even gets to second reading. Yes, I agree with my colleagues that this act is shameful, and it looks of cowardice, cowardice to debate the issue and, for government members, to put forward actual reasons as to why this isn't needed.

Now, I do appreciate that the Member for Chestermere–Strathmore did raise her concern about privacy. That's a very real and relevant concern, so I appreciate that. My understanding of the bill is that that is a very important issue that is also being addressed in the bill and part of the reason why the government regulations will decide which data is collected and how it's collected to ensure that people's privacy is upheld, because we also agree that that is paramount. One hundred per cent I agree with that.

I disagree with the hon. minister's comments about using this as a political football. I mean, you know, frankly, my colleague is bringing forward a bill to allow government to be able to capture important data that will help fight systematic, systemic racism. There's nothing partisan about that. I'm not about to stand and say: you did this, and we did this, and we did this, and you did that. I think that's ridiculous. The point is driving toward outcomes.

I also think it's silly to bring up comments of: we should have done it in your four years. Okay. Well, you know, for those who believe in God, God didn't build the world in two days or six days or seven. Six days; seventh is rest. Six days, but you know what I mean. You can't do it all in one term, right? So to attack a party or the opposition for not getting everything done is ridiculous. I think it's also, you know, disingenuous that the minister is trying to say that our government did nothing, which I know is factually false, and it's misleading Albertans.

3:30

Mr. Speaker, I wish all members were bound to stick to the facts. There was a bunch of work that was started under the NDP on antiracism. I know this because I participated in cabinet discussions about this, in caucus meetings about this. The work was started.

Mr. Madu: Give me one example. Point to one. Point to one.

Mr. Bilous: I'd appreciate, Minister, if I can speak. You had your turn. I listened respectfully.

We started a bunch of work. I know that the current government has continued some of that work. Again, the world isn't black and white.

Here we have a bill that my colleague put forward which – you know, I mean, maybe it's naive optimism that this bill could lead to the eventual elimination of systemic racism. But you know what, Mr. Speaker? Even if it impacted one individual and one individual's experiences with the system, then it's doing good, and it's worth while. Every member in this Chamber: we represent an incredibly beautiful and diverse province. We all represent constituents who have suffered discrimination, who have suffered from systemic racism, and here is an opportunity to address that, and the best argument that the government can come up with is: we'll come up with something better at some point down the road.

We're missing an opportunity here, Mr. Speaker. Albertans elected all 87 of us to do a job and to bring forward legislation that will improve the lives of Albertans, and it's infuriating to Albertans that the message over and over again is that only one side of this Chamber has good ideas or that only one side of this Chamber has ideas that are worth putting into legislation.

I was hopeful, when my colleague brought forward this bill, because the government has talked about taking more actions to combat systemic racism, that the government would look to this bill as one potential vehicle, a potential vehicle, that would help get us closer to the goal, that I believe we all share, of ending systemic racism. But what's disheartening, Mr. Speaker, is that the government is using these new standing orders to shut down debate and not even discuss the merits of these ideas.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm grateful for this opportunity to stand in the Chamber today and to debate this motion for concurrence. You know, the other day I spoke in this very Chamber about the value of disaggregated data and how it can help us create good public policy and also help us evaluate the outcomes from that policy. It is important. I don't stand here today because I'm being partisan. I don't stand in support of this motion because I'm partisan. I stand in favour of this motion because it is so very important that we get this right.

You know, the Member for Edmonton–Highlands–Norwood spoke the other day about Statistics Canada publishing data on transgender Canadians, census data. This was the first time it was published, and I'd like to remind people that it wasn't so very long ago where, had you asked for that, had you asked transgender Canadians, had you asked 2SLGBTQIA Canadians questions to be recorded in the census, they would have been terrified.

We need to remember that why we are collecting this data is incredibly important, and also how we're collecting this data is incredibly important. A lot of thought and consultation needs to go into that process. We have very, very many communities in our province – BIPOC communities, Indigenous communities, First Nations, Métis communities – who all come from different places in terms of how they feel about privacy, how they feel about authority, where they might have come from in their past, where they might have been discriminated against or terrorized. We need to recognize that there is a need to make sure that we do this properly. How we collect the data is important. Privacy considerations are important.

I want to thank the member across for bringing this bill forward in the first place. It is important. It's important work, and it needs to be done. But as was mentioned, you know, there are two staff to help write a private member's bill. I would argue that this bill actually requires the full force of everybody we can bring to the table to get it done correctly, because it's so important that it's done correctly. We must not cause any harm while we are collecting the very data to help us address the issues that we're trying to solve.

This isn't partisan. This is about doing the best thing, doing the right thing for Albertans, to really address the issues of racism that we face in this province, to solve the problems, to help people live freely and equally in this province. I know this is difficult – I know this is, because a lot of work has gone into this – but I think we can all come together and work for a very good bill in the near future.

I can tell you that as the Associate Minister of Status of Women I'm not prepared to wait another 10 years for this. We need good outcomes; we need them now. And we can have them, but we need to do it properly.

Mr. Schmidt: If not now, when?

Ms Issik: In the very near future as we work together and bring more resources to do it properly, sir, through you, Speaker.

You know, the member across had said that if it helps even one individual, then it's worth doing. Agreed, but in the process we must not harm other individuals. That's why it's critical that we do it correctly. That's why I'm standing in favour of this motion. Again, I appreciate the work that's gone into this, and I really hope that we can spend some really good time with communities consulting and making sure that we've heard from everybody and how they feel about how the data should be collected and that we are in agreement as to all the reasons why we collect the data.

Anyways, I'll leave it at that, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview has risen.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to add my voice to the debate today on Bill 204, Anti-Racism Act. You know, like my colleagues on this side of the House previous to me speaking have said, we, of course, disagree with the report that's been presented by the UCP government. We believe that this bill does need to proceed, and we would like to debate it in this Assembly today.

3:40

Certainly, as a member of the private members' bills committee myself, it was extremely disheartening to see the UCP decide not to proceed with this bill. We know that certainly, here in Edmonton even, we've witnessed and learned of some very tragic events that were racially motivated. If there is not a time for this bill to be debated in the Legislature, I don't know when is. I mean, it is such an important concern currently in our society. Of course, any just society needs to make sure that all its citizens are respected, treated with dignity, and sadly that's just not the case.

This bill is, you know, one of many things the government should be moving forward on for all Albertans, regardless of whether they're like myself – you know, obviously, I'm a privileged white woman – or someone who is an Indigenous woman or a woman of colour or a man of colour or anyone in the BIPOC population. Certainly, we all deserve to be respected. Because of how we dress, how we speak, the faith that we follow, we must have the right to practise – it is a human right that we be able to follow our own convictions, what we believe is true, obviously as long as it's not hurting another, but sadly this is a serious concern in our society right now.

There's something that we can do about it, and one of these things is some of the information that is shared in Bill 204, where we are collecting race-based data. One of the things that the UCP did say and the reason that they thought, "Well, we don't need this bill because we can already collect information through FOIP legislation" – but the tragic thing about that is that it's not being collected. It says that they may collect it, but they are not collecting it. So it's very important that, you know, this is a must. This needs to be collected so that we can make evidence-based decisions.

We understand the populations that we're serving, we understand what their needs are, and if we are just perhaps making decisions – if I'm making decisions just based on my own personal experience as a woman who grew up in rural Alberta, then moved to Edmonton to go to university, who has lived here since, and as a woman of the dominant culture, I'm excluding so many people's different lived experiences than my own, whether that person has disabilities, whether that person is a newcomer to our province, a transgender person, you know, someone with different experiences. That's why who's sitting around the table at these decision-making times, when people are making decisions – we have to make sure that everyone is included, and this is kind of a way to do that.

Certainly, I know that when I was Minister of Seniors and Housing, a lot of times it was dominant-culture people sitting at those tables. That doesn't mean that they're excluded from them, but we need to make sure that the voices of all Albertans are heard. Certainly, our population is becoming much more diverse, so it's so important. I don't have the lived experience of an Indigenous woman, or I don't have the lived experience of a newcomer to our country, so how can I make a good decision without being well informed? That's why this bill is so important, that we make sure that all the voices of Albertans are heard and that we make policy based on that. That's why I certainly encourage all members of the House to pass this.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

That takes us to 55 minutes of debate. Under Standing Order 8(7)(a.1), which provides for up to five minutes for the mover to close debate, I would invite the chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills, the hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont, to close debate on the motion to concur in the committee report on Bill 204.

Mr. Rutherford: I'll waive.

The Acting Speaker: That is waived.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for concurrence carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 3:46 p.m.]

[Fifteen minutes having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

[Motion for concurrence carried]

Bill 205
Human Tissue and Organ Donation
(Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, on April 27, 2022, the chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills presented the report of that committee on Bill 205, Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022, and requested the concurrence of the Assembly in the report, which recommended that the bill proceed. As a member other than the mover rose to speak on April 27, 2022, in that debate on the motion, it will proceed today.

The motion to concur in the committee's report on Bill 205 has already been moved, and I will therefore now recognize any additional members who wish to speak. Are there any members who wish to speak to the bill? I see the hon. Member for Highwood has risen.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to first start by explaining why I was so passionate about introducing this bill and now look to the House for support on concurrence so that this bill can move forward to second reading and further debate. I've told this story many times in the past few months, but I think it's important that I share this story with the whole Assembly today. Only a couple of days after being drawn fifth for a private member's bill in this session, Cindy Krieger, a local area resident, contacted me to share her tragic but inspiring story about her daughter Morghan. Morghan was in her early 20s and had previously left to attend school in Nova Scotia. While attending school, she, regrettably, suffered multiple severe seizures. Her mother made the immediate trip to her side at a hospital, and prior to her passing Morghan expressed her intent to give the gift of life and donate her organs and tissues, which helped save and improve so many lives.

In addition to stories that exist like Morghan's, in 2018 the country went into mourning due to the tragedy of the Humboldt Broncos bus crash. One of the men who lost their lives, Logan Boulet, had just signed up to be an organ donor. His choice to be an organ donor inspired almost 200,000 people to follow his example. Countless stories like Morghan's and tragedies like the Humboldt crash brought forward important conversations on the need to improve our organ and tissue donation system.

Honestly, as legislators it is our responsibility to do all we can to make sure we have the best system possible. It is important to note that we have fallen behind most other Canadian and international jurisdictions here in Alberta. We are currently the second lowest provincially in deceased donation rates. Currently we have a seven-year wait for kidney transplant alone. My Bill 205, the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022, is a strong step in the right direction to build a system for the future, a system that will increase the number of lives saved.

The Alberta ORGANization Group, in line with many other foundations, has done immense work to identify gaps in current systems, and they have identified many recommendations that will improve the current system in Alberta. The most important recommendation that was identified was that of mandatory referral. Bill 205, if passed, will put in place three of the most vital recommendations to build a strong foundation for a much better human tissue and organ donation system here in Alberta. First, it will implement a mandatory referral process; secondly, it will improve agency guidelines; and lastly, it will improve education and awareness.

With regard to these changes first and most importantly is the implementation of that mandatory referral, a change from our current law of only mandatory consideration. Mandatory referral is a legal requirement that health care professionals report all patients who may become potential donors to their organ donation organization. This requirement is an essential building block of high-functioning organ and tissue donation and transplantation systems because it supports the timely identification, referral, and assessment of potential donors. Notifying the ODO reduces the effect of clinical bias or lack of knowledge regarding donation, which has been identified as the leading cause of nonreferral.

Mandatory referral is independent of the consent model and does not affect how families are approached to discuss the consent to donate. Registering as an organ donor or sharing your wishes with your family does not mean you will automatically become an organ donor. The pathway to becoming a deceased organ donor is complex because individuals need to die in special circumstances where donation is even possible. Contrary to common assumptions, those circumstances are very rare. As a proportion of total deaths in Canada approximately 1.2 per cent have the potential to become donors. Each patient who is a potential donor is rare, and identification and referral of those patients is the only way they will actually become a donor.

However, failure to identify possible donors is the largest factor in explaining differences in deceased donation rates nationally and internationally. Missed donor opportunities occur when potential donors are not identified and ODOs are not notified or referrals are received far too late. Missed donor opportunities also occur when potential donors are identified by the treating medical team but they choose not to notify the ODO. In cases of later nonreferral, life-sustaining therapy is withdrawn in a way that excludes the possibility of donation, preventing the wishes of the patient and their families towards donation to even be considered.

The benefits of mandatory referral ensure that every family and individual is given the opportunity to include donation in their end-of-life care if they so desire. The patient's medical suitability for donation is assessed earlier by clinicians who are experts in donation and transplantation. This may reduce delays for the hospital and ensure the availability of supporting infrastructure.

Assessment of donation suitability can occur in all instances, with the timely identification of potential organ donors helping to avoid missed donation opportunities. It ensures that a potential donor is maintained on life support, which is essential to the usability of organs. Family discussions can be planned when suitability for donation has been determined, which gives families the right information at the right time. This reduces uncertainty and disappointment on occasions when families are approached too soon and then later told their loved one is not actually eligible to be a donor.

4:10

Secondly, amendments within Bill 205 will be made to the Organ and Tissue Donation Agency that will pave the way for annual reviews, reports, and suggestions submitted directly to the minister. This will help improve our tissue and organ donation year over year. Mandatory referral is only effective if there is a way to review referrals. This is a critical part of the bill to verify that a stronger system of donation is continued.

Lastly, the education component will be expanded to ensure the most current and up-to-date information, education, and awareness is issued to Albertans.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the medical specialist foundations, business community members, Alberta Health Services, registered donors, and recipients for the constant back-and-forth discussions I've had with them over the past few months, and I want to express my gratitude to the many individuals who brought forward their very moving stories as well as to the nonprofits, transplant institutes, organ donation advocacy groups, foundations, and physicians who have been instrumental in helping me to draft a bill that will create the fundamental pillars that will reduce wait times and ultimately save lives. It is for these individuals and those waiting on the transplant list that I would urge this Chamber to allow this bill to proceed to second reading.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there other members looking to join? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the hon. Member for Highwood for bringing forward this private member's bill. I certainly see a lot of potential in regard to this private member's bill. We know that organ donation is, you know, sort of a work in progress here in this province and in many other jurisdictions around the world. We had to do a lot of education to allow people to understand exactly what it entails and just the value of it as well. Certainly, with the technology and the medical technology that we have available to us today, transplants have never been more effective, nor have they saved more lives, quite frankly.

The main problem is having timely dispensation of various organs when a donor is, unfortunately, in a position to do so. It's not to say that people have to be deceased or in imminent danger of being deceased in order to be a donor, right? I mean, kidneys are a good example of a donation system that involves people who are not dying and, in fact, are making a selfless choice to help someone else.

Again, it's very important for us to build an infrastructure for organ donation that is working within a public health system, right? We know that in other jurisdictions, places around the world, this can be a for-profit thing, and I don't think it's, Mr. Speaker, a better way to illustrate the absolute importance and paramountcy of having a public system to deliver health care for when you need it for you and your family than when we talk about organ donation, because you just couldn't imagine having anything that would resemble a private element of buying and selling body parts. Again, it's just a pretty good education moment for all of us to remind us about how important our public health system really is, especially delivering something at this level.

Yeah. I mean, I just had a chance to look at the bill here this afternoon, and I find the most intriguing part, certainly perhaps the biggest innovation, is this mandatory referral element – right? – so that we are using the health system and compelling people to be diagnosed and to be analyzed if they have signed their donor card to just make sure that there is a plan that is taking full advantage of that in a timely sort of way. You know, I think that that's very clever. I'm guessing that this is somehow based on other jurisdictions around the world. I'd be curious to see who else is doing it, this mandatory referral element to this bill, to see how it's working in other jurisdictions. I would expect that it would be a marked improvement for sure – right? – because, of course, time is of the essence always in health care generally and certainly in organ donation specifically. You have to make these decisions around, especially, you know, certain organs like your hearts and so forth, eyes and corneas and so forth. I mean, these things need to be accessed within hours or even minutes, so I think this whole mandatory referral element that the Member for Highwood was describing is intriguing, and certainly I would encourage all members to allow this bill to move forward around that.

Just another thing I wanted to mention: again, the mandatory referral element. I mean, again, I'm not an expert, but I can just see this is not a small thing to do. It's not just, like, written on a piece of paper, and away you go, right? You need considerable resources to be able to execute a mandatory referral, and, again, you know, making sure that our public health system is sufficiently resourced so that we can do these things is absolutely essential. Running our acute-health hospitals like we are now, at 95, 97, 110 per cent literally on a day-to-day basis, leaves us no room, quite frankly, for expanding into what would be required in a mandatory referral system. So in order to successfully have an organ transplant system that would be province-wide and so forth, we're talking about capacity, Mr. Speaker, and we're talking about making sure we buttress our public health system so that you can actually pull this off.

What's happening in our hospitals right now is nothing like that, right? The whole concept of triage is being used on a daily, hourly basis, people just trying to get by on what is an emergency type of situation. I don't know if any of you besides myself, a few of my colleagues had meetings with the Alberta resident physicians society, who were just talking about how critical the situation is in our hospitals, in our intensive cares especially, but all elements of acute-care units are running far too hot, at capacity or over capacity, right across this province. We see it in, you know, Red Deer. We saw the situation there in the last 72 hours or so. I mean, these kinds of things are being replicated, Mr. Speaker, all over the place in our province, with emergency shutdowns and people just trying to triage a situation where the capacity of the hospital is strained to the limit.

So we want to move and expand into human tissue and organ donation with mandatory referrals built into it. That's great. I am totally behind that. I would work hard to ensure that we build a legislative framework which would allow that. But, of course, foundationally, Mr. Speaker, you have to make sure – you can't do it for free, right? You need to invest and build and expand the public health system to be able to accommodate for that. I mean, that's an obvious thing, but it's always worth mentioning, because if we have these wonderful new ideas and new technologies and, you know, a system to expedite organ donation and to move on that in a timely way like you have to do, then we can't just write it down on a piece of paper and hope that someone will do it. We have to resource that concept here through this Legislature as well. Yeah.

The other element to this, again: I think it's ongoing, and it sort of waxes and wanes, I've kind of noticed. I mean, I use myself, Mr. Speaker, as a litmus test as to whether I am conscious of the importance of signing my organ donor card, right? At different times they have an education program, and you get all excited about it and away you go, and then it kind of somehow disappears over time as well. So for us to have a sensitive but emphatic education system for people to sign their organ donor cards and for families to understand what that means and building part of an end-of-life strategy or emergency contingency so the people know what's going to happen, what's going to come next, and what the mandatory referral thing means for someone who is a potential donor: that education all needs to be emphatic and it needs to be constant, right? You can't just say, "Oh, now we're done that," because people forget. That's the way we are; we need a refresher course on how these things work, and new people need to know that they can sign up, you know, as a choice for organ donation. I mean, it's not anything but a choice. That should be quite obvious but bears repeating as well. I mean, people have fear around these things, and we have to make sure that it's understood to be a life-giving choice and not anything but that.

4:20

With that, Mr. Speaker, I think I will conclude my comments. This is a great idea. I think I could totally support this bill as long as we support the bill with the resources it needs in order for it to be successful.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise in support of Bill 205, the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022, also known as the mandatory referral act. I want to thank my colleague the Member for Highwood for introducing it. Over the last three years I've met with constituents with loved ones who are waiting for organ transplants and, sadly, constituents whose loved ones are no longer with us because they weren't able to get the transplant they needed in time.

Mr. Speaker, organ transplantation is the most clinically cost-effective treatment for organ failure, but every year Albertans die while waiting for an organ donation. These are our family members, our relatives, our friends, and our neighbours and colleagues. Those who remain on the wait-list often experience poor quality of life, depression, and can require regular medical appointments. On the other hand, individuals who receive organ donations often live with few restrictions. They can travel, spend more time with friends and family, return to school and work, become involved in their communities, and lead very normal lives.

While organ and tissue donation and transplants are life-saving and life improving, Alberta continues to lag behind other provinces and other jurisdictions in this area. Today over 4,500 Canadians are waiting for a transplant that could save, extend, or improve their life. Over 700 of those people are Albertans. Thousands more are waiting for tissue transplants. The good news is that one donor can save up to eight lives and enhance the lives of 75 more.

According to Canadian Blood Services upwards of 90 per cent of Canadians support organ and tissue donation, yet less than 32 per cent have made formal plans to donate. The number of organ and tissue donations further diminishes when you factor in that only 1 to 2 per cent of deaths occur in a situation where a donation is possible. The goal of an improved organ donation system should be to ensure that no missed donor opportunities occur to help meet the demand for human tissue and organs in the province. That is precisely what Bill 205 works towards.

One of the most significant changes brought forward through this bill is the implementation of a mandatory referral process in place of the current mandatory consideration process. This change requires physicians to refer a patient to the appropriate organ donation organization when death is imminent, which will enhance and optimize our organ and tissue donation system. Mandatory referral increases the likelihood that sensitive discussions with families experiencing a tragedy about the potential to donate are conducted by specialists explicitly educated in this area. Professionally trained organ donation organizations are better positioned to engage with families. Streamlining the notification process will also ensure an adequate timeline for assessing the viability of potential donors and will decrease missed donation opportunities.

To emphasize the importance of mandatory referral, consider a recent survey of physicians on why they did not refer eligible organ donors. I should note the physicians surveyed could choose more than one of these options. Fifty-nine per cent of the respondents stated they did not make a referral because they deemed the patient not to be eligible, 45 per cent said the family was too upset, 39 per cent said they believed that the family had religious reasons not to, and, finally, 34 per cent said they did not due to their desire to leave the hospital unit. These are all understandable reasons, especially when you consider the stress and tragic circumstances, yet donation opportunities continue to be missed and lives continue to be lost. Mandatory referral will help to reduce missed donation opportunities.

This bill also seeks to advance education and awareness around the subject of organ donation. This includes improving the information provided to Albertans within our registries to better educate them on the organ and tissue donation process and its importance.

Finally, this bill will modify our agency guidelines. The changes to the Organ and Tissue Donation Agency will pave the way for annual reviews, reports, and suggestions directly to the Minister of Health to help minimize missed donor opportunities and build a more robust donation system.

Every so often we as legislators have an opportunity to make a meaningful, tangible difference in the lives of Albertans, to address issues that transcend partisanship and touch the very lives of the people we represent. That is what Bill 205 does by seeking to improve our organ and tissue donation process and practices, hopefully saving and improving lives. I hope that this bill will be a catalyst for further discussions and other changes that will also improve our system and bring government policy better in line with the supermajority of Albertans, who support organ and tissue donation.

I encourage all members to vote in favour of this bill. Again, a big thank you to my colleague the Member for Highwood for his work.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members looking to join? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and offer a few comments as well in the debate on concurrence around Bill 205. Let me just, first, start off by thanking the Member for Highwood for bringing forward this bill as a private member's bill, and I want to thank my colleagues from Edmonton-North West and Calgary-South East for their thoughtful comments on the bill and why we should vote in favour of allowing it to proceed to debate here in the Legislature.

I just think it's really interesting, Mr. Speaker, that we've heard, in discussion around the aspects of the bill, the fact that this is a piece of legislation that is trying to address a serious problem that we all acknowledge exists. The rates of donations of organs are far too low, and the private member is taking steps to try to solve a problem that exists. Is it a perfect solution? No. In fact, the member who presented this bill admits such, and my friend from Edmonton-North West raised some additional questions with regard to how effectively this piece of legislation, if it's passed, would be implemented. But we are voting in favour of allowing this bill to proceed to debate in the Chamber, recognizing that it is not a perfect solution.

It's incredibly interesting to me, Mr. Speaker, that we have admitted that even though this isn't a perfect solution, this is progress in the right direction, and therefore we are willing to entertain the possibility of debating this piece of legislation in the Legislature, but we weren't willing to extend that same consideration to my friend from Edmonton-City Centre's bill on collecting race-based data to combat racism. All we heard from the members opposite, when they engaged in that debate, was the fact that it wasn't a perfect solution so now is not the time to even consider making progress on that.

It's incredibly interesting to me, Mr. Speaker, the different thresholds for acceptability that we have when the government caucus members bring forward legislation for consideration by this House as opposed to opposition members when they bring forward private members' bills. It's incredibly distressing to see this double standard consistently at work. Not once have we seen an opposition member's private member's bill proceed past the committee stage and reach full debate here in the Legislature. Not once. You know, I wish the government members would hold every private member to a consistent standard of acceptability when it comes to whether or not the House should consider these things and not put on their partisan glasses, which they've said over and over again that they don't do. I guess it's just a coincidence that every single opposition private member's bill has been voted down by this House but that hasn't been the case for government members' bills.

Let it be said that even though I'm airing my grievances about the process, we, in practice, don't hold grudges here in the opposition, and we are in fact voting in favour of allowing this bill to proceed because we agree that it's progress. We're moving in the right direction on the issue of organ donation here with this legislation that's being brought forward.

So let's talk about it here, and let's allow other members to consider the issue and bring forward some thoughtful amendments, I guess, to address some of the shortcomings or weaknesses of the bill that will be exposed as debate proceeds. You know, one of the shortcomings that I think exists or has the potential to exist with this system that is being proposed to be set up here in this private member's bill is increasing education through the registry system. That's a good idea in theory, Mr. Speaker, but we've seen this government fail to make any meaningful changes to the registry system whatsoever, just simple promises that the government has failed to deliver on.

I'm thinking in particular about Alberta health care cards. It was there in black and white in the UCP's election platform that they would eliminate the system of issuing paper health care cards and move to a system of distributing durable health care cards made out of plastic or some kind of material that would last a lot longer than the paper that is currently used to make health care cards. They scrapped that idea. In fact, they kicked around the idea of maybe altering drivers' licences so that if you had an Alberta health care number and a driver's licence, that could be put together on the same driver's licence card, but that also went nowhere. This government will not make any meaningful changes on how Alberta health care numbers are presented to people.

So how can we trust the government to implement what is a significant change here through the registry system when they've failed to even demonstrate that they can make even a minor, simple change like issuing plastic health care cards or even changing drivers' licences to allow for the printing of a health care card on the driver's licence? They can't. I think that is a significant failing,

Mr. Speaker, that should be discussed at greater length as this bill proceeds to debate.

I want to pick up on another thing that my friend from Edmonton-North West touched upon in his comments regarding this bill, and that's the issue of public health care capacity. You know, right now no surgeries are being conducted at the Red Deer general hospital, as far as I understand. Everybody is being shipped up and down the highway to either Edmonton or Calgary to receive life-saving surgery. So it is good, in theory, to widen the accessibility of organs for donation, but in actual practice, if hundreds of thousands of people can't get access to life-saving medical treatments in the third-largest city in the province, all of these changes that the Member for Highwood is proposing are theoretical improvements. They won't lead to in-practice improvements.

So my friend from Edmonton-North West is quite right when he raises the issue about the ability of the health care system to be able to deliver these organ transplants in a timely matter. I'd submit to members of the House that if this piece of legislation were in effect right now, the people in dire need of organ transplants in central Alberta would still not be able to get the life-saving surgeries that are needed and that the Member for Highwood himself wants them to be able to get. Without some kind of meaningful changes to protect the health care system from collapse, all of this is just good intentions written down on paper with no meaningful follow-through.

You know, Mr. Speaker, in the last few minutes I want to just remind the House that COVID is still the top health care issue of the day here in the province of Alberta. The reason that the general hospital is no longer conducting surgeries is because the hospital is overwhelmed with COVID. By failing to address the underlying cause of the collapse of the health care system, all of these proposed changes that are intended to lead to better health care outcomes will lead to nothing, but we all just act as if COVID is done and hope that by creating other causes of problems in the health care system and maybe making some feeble attempts to address those, we will actually get to the root of the problem and make the system better, and that's not the case. I also worry about the suitability of people's organs because so many people have been infected. We know that COVID causes long-term organ damage.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East has risen.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to support the motion for concurrence on Bill 205, the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. This bill has the goal of raising awareness for organ and tissue donations as well as encouraging more Albertans to sign their donor cards.

For me, there is also a deep and profound Lethbridge connection to this bill. Mr. Speaker, our nation was heartbroken following the tragic crash in Saskatchewan that claimed the lives of 15 players and personnel of the Humboldt Broncos from the Saskatchewan Junior Hockey League. Many of us remember where we were when we first learned about the tragic crash on April 6, 2018. Lethbridge's own Logan Boulet was one of the 15 lives that were lost that day. Logan, a son, an athlete, and a defenceman, was 21 when he passed away, but a month before the crash he did something remarkable that saved lives. Logan signed his organ donor card. His gift of life benefited six people directly, which is remarkable. What it also did was start the Logan Boulet effect and inspired over 200,000 Canadians to do the same. In Lethbridge we remember Logan every time we drive by the Logan Boulet Arena and every year on Green Shirt Day, which takes place on April 7. Canada-wide it started a very important conversation.

One issue we have in Alberta is that we lag behind our fellow provinces when it comes to registered organ and tissue donors. As has already been stated, over 4,500 Canadians are waiting for life-saving transplants, including over 700 Albertans. Many more are waiting for tissue transplants that would vastly improve their lives. A major component of this bill is to improve the information provided to individuals within our Alberta registries to better educate Albertans on the process and on the importance of organ and tissue donation.

Mr. Speaker, another component of this bill I appreciate is the implementation of a mandatory referral process for physicians. This will require physicians to report all potential donors to the appropriate organ donation organization when death is deemed to be imminent. I can't even imagine how difficult those discussions might be. However, it's a conversation worth having and one that could have the potential to save lives.

This legislation also increases the chances to make sure that those discussions about a possible donation take place. It is so much easier to have those conversations with a trusted family physician well before a tragedy strikes instead of during a time of incredible grieving, anxiety, and stress. Losing a family member or a close friend is indescribable, so having the ability outlined for the highly trained individuals to have those conversations early and independently is prudent planning.

I want to reiterate that if a patient and his or her family does not want to be a donor, that decision will be respected. However, every donor decision made is a win and a legacy to the tragedy of Humboldt. What if someone was on the fence about this very sensitive topic? One signed organ donor card can save multiple lives.

Mr. Speaker, it's good to know this bill addresses improving agency guidelines. The changes to the Organ and Tissue Donation Agency will also pave the way for annual reviews, reports, and suggestions directly to the minister to help minimize missed donor opportunities and build a stronger system of donation in the future.

I'm also glad that education and awareness are an important aspect of this bill. It's intended to improve the information provided to individuals within Alberta's registries and better educate the population on the process and the importance of organ and tissue donation. Logan Boulet's decision directly resulted in six saved lives and, indirectly, thousands and growing.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I'm not here to tell any family what the right decision is for them – that is theirs to make – but to raise awareness of increased education and make the referral process for physicians mandatory to an organ donor organization are important steps to take. I wholeheartedly support this bill and the Member for Highwood in his work to, hopefully, save more lives. If one person's decision to donate his or her organs and tissue can save multiple lives, imagine what an increase of, say, 100 donors can accomplish. I see tremendous potential in this bill, and I commend the Member for Highwood for bringing this forward. As difficult as these conversations can be, they are necessary and should be continued, and this bill should continue into second reading.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 205, the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. I am going to begin my comments, as I always do on private members' day regardless of what the business is at hand, with providing some lament as to the state of democracy in this House and the abomination that it is that members of any type, whether it is backbenchers on the government side or Official Opposition members, have to somehow seek concurrence of the House. That we have to go through this exercise in the first place is an absolute aberration of the traditions of this Assembly.

Now, I can appreciate that our friend the acting Premier right now likes to take his traditions from elsewhere, but in this House private members' business gets debated by private members, not at the whim of Executive Council, and this is really too bad because this is a really good bill. I don't like having to rise when I like what's coming from the members across the way and having to preface my comments with my usual lament for the state of democracy, but I will do it because the fact of the matter is that that's in the public interest.

It is not okay that we have to go through this hoop-jumping exercise every single time so that government backbenchers can be heard. Not at all. It is completely offside the traditions of this Assembly. Therefore, it is with a heavy heart that I provide critical commentary on a bill that is probably required.

Now my commentary. I will point out that many of the shortcomings that the government found with the previous bill could potentially – we don't know – be applied to this one. That is to say, it is complex, for sure, likely requires more stakeholder consultation, potentially could require some horsepower within the civil service for appropriate implementation, but that does not stop us from wanting to pass this bill, just as it should not have stopped the government from allowing the other one to proceed to the House floor, but we see the double standard at play here, Mr. Speaker.

Now, there is no question that we require a better framework for ensuring more expeditious donation of organs and tissue. There is no question that public policy sometimes lags public urgency and public need and, in fact, even public appetite, which I think is the case with organ donation bills. Number one, they require for their implementation in the first instance public education, as my hon. colleague for Edmonton-North West pointed out. It requires a functional health care system in which we have hospitalists, anaesthesiologists, physicians' assistants, and others actually working in hospitals, which is not the case in the Red Deer hospital right now and has not been the case in a number of other rural places.

It is well and good to ensure that we have better processes in place, but there is no guarantee whatsoever that our health care will be there for us in time given the calamity that has been visited upon communities not just in central Alberta but certainly across the province as a result of the unrelenting and specific war on doctors, beginning with the tearing up of the agreement prior to the pandemic, persisting in the war on public health care through the pandemic, and now, as we exit it, doubling down on what Albertans do not want, which is more chaos in the system.

Having said that, there is no question that this bill likely is a thoughtful approach to public policy, and it is for that reason that the Official Opposition will support its expeditious passage. There is also no question, though, Mr. Speaker, that it is likely that the development of the regulations and so on will require more consultation with the public and with health care professionals, with Alberta health care services, which is, in fact, as it should be.

Now, when our government passed a ban on eviction of domestic violence survivors from the residential tenancy arrangements in I believe it was the fall of 2015 if I am not mistaken, there was a great deal of work on the regulations that had to be done as a result of that bill, that I believe passed with unanimous support through the House. Not that that unanimous support necessarily meant anything when it came to, for example, the deindexation of AISH and income support benefits, which, you know, the Official Opposition at the time made great fanfare about supporting and then at their first available opportunity reversed themselves on. That private member's bill, brought forward by Deb Drever, was in fact supported by the two opposition parties at the time, but it did require, complex as it was, a great deal of regulations that had to go through cabinet subsequent to that, and I have no doubt that this bill will be similar in nature.

You know, I think that that is fine, Mr. Speaker, but there is no question that you need leadership at the level of the operations of the Alberta health care system, which currently this province does not have because they saw fit to fire the CEO of Alberta Health Services simply because she had the temerity to express a fondness for public health care, which, in fact, Albertans have asked us to respect, and this government caucus has seen fit to disrespect that request on behalf of Albertans.

Now, I am pleased to see as the Member for Lethbridge-West – and, in fact, Toby and Bernie Boulet are constituents of mine – that this government has taken some of their advice. They have focused their advocacy effort since the loss of their son Logan on this matter of increasing organ and tissue donation given as it is that on Green Shirt Day, which is April 7, we redouble our efforts in public education, which, as I indicated at the very beginning, is the foundation of expanding our organ and tissue donations. Certainly, there are administrative processes and other health care processes that help, but in the first instance public education and public awareness are very important, especially in end-of-life planning. So I am pleased to see that this has happened and that the government has in fact consulted with and listened to advocates like Toby and Bernadine Boulet.

I would be remiss if I did not put a pretty fine point on the fact that Toby and Bernie have been very clear in all of their representations that a strong public health care system, a strong education system, strong support for communities, for infrastructure, for traffic safety, all of these things, also must follow if we are to appropriately recognize the life and the contribution and the legacy of Logan Boulet and all those who perished in the Humboldt bus crash. I believe that with this government – given the fact that they stubbornly refused to recognize the requests of that Humboldt family and those who perished in that crash when it came to appropriate amendments to driver safety and driver training.

I am pleased that April 7's legacy has actually resulted in more government action. I am looking forward to seeing that happen in other Legislatures across the country as well. There is no question that that advocacy by Toby and Bernie Boulet has actually been national in scope and in nature, and they have attempted and, I think, succeeded in taking their tremendous grief at the loss of their son and doing something positive with it. I think that there are not very many of us who can see in ourselves the strength to be able to do such a thing after such a devastating loss of a child.

There is more to be done; there is no question. Mandatory referral is yet another step in being able to address this issue of better uptake of organ and tissue donation, Mr. Speaker. The biggest thing is speed and having the right kinds of health care specialists on-site to be able to do those procedures, and that's what we don't see.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there other members looking to join? I see the hon. Member for Grande Prairie has risen.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a pleasure to rise this afternoon to speak to concurrence on Bill 205. I want to start by expressing my gratitude for the hard work of my colleague the hon. Member for Highwood. I want to take this opportunity to thank him for his dedication in bringing this important piece of legislation forward.

While the circumstances surrounding organ donation are typically tragic, Mr. Speaker, the decision to donate organs or tissue is a tremendous gift to give another person and their family. It's the gift of life. Bill 205 will improve the organ donation and transplant system, and for that I'm grateful. It will refine the organ and tissue donor registry. It will improve the education surrounding the option to register for organ donation and agency guidelines. Furthermore, the online registry will be improved by creating a clear path, making it easier to indicate one's consent.

As other speakers have mentioned, Mr. Speaker, while almost 90 per cent of Canadians say that they support organ donations, only 32 per cent have actually registered their intent to donate. Unfortunately, a very small number, approximately 1.2 per cent, of people that pass away are considered for organ donation in Alberta. Therefore, the more people who understand and choose to register and the better the notification system to the organ donation organizations, the more lives that will be saved. At this point in time, as others have said, there are over 4,500 Canadians waiting for a transplant that could save, extend, or improve their lives. Of those 4,500, 700 of them reside in Alberta. These numbers directly represent the urgency and the need for donors and a clear process here in Alberta. It is troublesome that Alberta has fallen behind other jurisdictions in terms of our rate of successful donation, which is costing Albertans on the transplant wait-list their lives.

Bill 205 is a major step forward, I would say, in modernizing Alberta's tissue and organ donation system. It's broken into four sections: first, breaking down how the tissue and donor registry will be improved; second, detailing the implementation of a mandatory referral process, which will decrease confusion for patients and ensure optimization of the process; further, agency guidelines will be refined, and as a result annual reviews, reports, and suggestions will be made to the minister to help minimize missed donor opportunities; lastly, this bill will enhance education efforts of organ donation and aims to elevate general awareness of organ donation for all Albertans. I think we could all agree that education is a big part of this, as many speakers this afternoon have mentioned, people understanding the importance of this.

Mr. Speaker, from what I can see, this bill will serve to facilitate a clear and simpler process to register for organ donation and ultimately to save lives. One organ donation can save up to eight lives, and a tissue donation can improve the quality of life for up to 75 other people. That is the intent of this bill, to do just that.

While I have the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to highlight a personal story about an inspiring Albertan, a retired nurse, actually, who has chosen to save a life through the donation of her kidney. She's a living donor. I first met Dianna Havin in a business setting over 20 years ago. We connected as businesswomen and even more so as businesswomen with young children at that time. Dianna has a very rare blood type, and as a retired nurse she understood how rare that would be and how critical it would be for somebody with that same blood type on a transplant waiting list. In a selfless act she chose last year to donate one of her kidneys. She's an inspiration to all of us. I just wanted to recognize my friend Dianna for what she's chosen to do, for her selfless act, to thank her and her family, her husband, Mark, and their children, for supporting her in that process.

Assisting others is always valuable, and it's notable that clinical studies have found that organ and tissue donation can help families and loved ones with their grieving process. At a time that can be very difficult to get through, many donor families take consolation in knowing their loved one helped save and/or drastically improve the life of another or multiple others. Donor families can also take great comfort in the fact that their loved one continues to live on through others as life-saving donors.

Many have spoken about Humboldt. I won't repeat what has been said for the sake of time, Mr. Speaker, but I, too, am inspired by the Logan Boulet story and want to thank that family for their advocacy on behalf of all Albertans. The actions of one young man ignited passionate individuals around the world and spurred them to action.

I'll close with this: it's because lives will be saved that I wholly support Bill 205. Once again I want to thank the Member for Highwood for introducing such a crucial bill, for all the work he did in the background, and also for the countless individuals who have already made an impact on the lives of others by signing up to be a donor. As I previously stated, I am pleased to support this bill, and I encourage all members of the Assembly to join me in supporting Bill 205 and ultimately seeing more lives saved in Alberta.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will cede my time. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Are there any other members looking to join? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview has risen, with about two and a half minutes.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to join the debate on Bill 205, the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. Like my colleagues who have spoken, we are certainly going to vote in support of concurrence for this bill. Really, this bill works to fix something that, you know, Canadians actually want fixed, so I commend the government for bringing this forward. It is, of course, what people have already spoken about, that missed donor opportunity. The bill would alleviate this difficulty. We know that about 33 per cent of Canadians have registered as organ donors. That's too low. We know that when Canadians are asked, surveys have said that 90 per cent would have said, "Oh, I'd happily donate my organs," yet there is a huge discrepancy there. Only 33 per cent have actually done that. So there is, really, a 57 per cent missed donor opportunity.

Here in Alberta we know that there are more than 700 people on the wait-list for organ transplants. Therefore, if the missed donor opportunity was eliminated, those 700 people would be well on their way to having a transplant and improving their lives. I think that this bill is an important bill that we recommend proceed, and it can make a significant difference, of course, for people's lives here in Alberta.

As I said, you know, for people who are on the wait-list, a significant number of Albertans, it would make a huge difference for themselves and their families. It makes it mandatory. A medical practitioner, having assessed that the organs are suitable for donation, then must refer the patient to an organ transplant and tissue donation agency. This is mandatory. It's not something that is going to happen if things all align. It's something that the health practitioner must do, so of course that is going to be very supportive of more people who have been assessed that their organs are useful for . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I hesitate to interrupt. However, under Standing Order 8(7)(a)(i), which provides for up to five minutes for the mover to close debate, I would invite the chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills to close debate on the motion to concur in the committee report on Bill 205.

Seeing that that is waived.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for concurrence carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 4:59 p.m.]

- (b) during the course of its review the committee continues despite prorogation of a session of the 30th Legislature and may, without leave of the Assembly, meet during a period when the Assembly is adjourned or prorogued and
- (c) no later than nine months after the beginning of the committee's review the committee must submit a report on its review to the Legislative Assembly that sets out the committee's recommendations, if any.

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In short, my motion tasks a legislative committee with the responsibility of studying the processes and procedures of other parliaments around the world to find the ways that we here in Alberta can work together more constructively, something that I've grown to be very passionate about over my course of three years in this institution.

Mr. Speaker, when I ran for public office, it was because I truly believed in the wonderful, beautiful concept of democracy, the idea that every individual could play an active role in creating the world which they lived in, the idea that every citizen, regardless of their status or socioeconomic position, deserved a voice and the ability to be the determiner of their own destiny and the idea that we, the 87 individuals bestowed with the unique privilege of being elected to this House, could bring the citizenry's vision of a better world to life by listening, engaging, and collaborating. Perhaps I was an idealist. Perhaps we all were once, but unfortunately it doesn't take many days of sitting in this place, this incredible marble palace that was once built to be the house of hope and faith in humanity, to realize that the idealistic system which most believe exists is much different. That which I will be highlighting today may come as a bit disheartening to some listening.

I want to be clear that much good does still happen within these walls. Collectively, we have worked with bipartisanship to establish the first-ever legal definition of human trafficking, to stand up for law-abiding firearms owners, and to support our agricultural producers.

Yet by and large, this institution, once established to guarantee representation of the people who elected it, has fallen prey to hyperpartisanship. In fact, if we break down the voting record from the past session, out of 158 pieces of legislation, only 33 per cent of the time did the opposition and the government vote together in support of government legislation. From the surface this suggests that two-thirds of the time the opposition was completely unwilling to work with the government to advance what had the potential to be positive policy initiatives.

Yet if we look further into the data, a second side of the story emerges. Throughout debate on those 158 pieces of legislation our opposition proposed 216 amendments to that legislation. Now, before I go any further, I do want to recognize that many of those proposed amendments were, honestly, partisan junk. They were amendments to kill bills entirely, delay processes by months, or defer our work outside of this Chamber. Not every one of those 216 amendments was put forward with any amount of good faith, but, Mr. Speaker, many were. Of those 216 amendments, only seven were supported by the government, 3 per cent. The remaining 97 per cent were voted down largely without honest consideration by the members of this House as to whether or not they might actually make our legislation better.

Now, with the full information presented, suddenly the conclusion can clearly be drawn that both sides of this House do have an honest intention of drafting and passing good legislation, but we are too blinded by blue and orange to make those efforts a reality and to work together to transform good legislation into great legislation or to consider ideas that might be positive but that lie outside the hypothetical box of our party lines and ideology.

Similarly, two years ago the Globe and Mail reported that Members of Parliament in Ottawa voted along party lines 99.6 per cent of the time. Objectively, these statistics wouldn't be so damning if an honest effort was made along the way to collaborate on creating good legislation and doing our best to represent the people that sent us here. After all, the party system in our Westminster democracy does play an incredibly important role in preserving the ability of governments to govern and allowing voters to vote for a mandate that they know can actually be achieved, contrary to the American system, in which Presidents can maintain office without the majority of seats in their House or Senate and often struggle to achieve key priorities.

A strong party system and honest debate should not be the antithesis of each other. We should be able to debate, question, and amend legislation to the best of our abilities, then vote with our parties on the finalized version. Unfortunately, the behaviour that is more commonly exercised in this place and similar places all across the world is that of shouting, hurling needless and outlandish insults across the aisle, fabricating unapologetic and undisciplined lies, spreading exaggerated misinformation for the sole purpose of furthering selfish party objectives, theatrically shredding up amendments for the cameras before even reading them, and entering into the debate with nothing more than phony, premeditated scripts and talking points to contribute.

Mr. Speaker, we all agree on the basics. Alberta is the greatest place on Earth, filled with the most brilliant entrepreneurial people, the most breathtaking landscapes, and the most ingenious businesses. I know we all agree on those fundamentals, so why can we not work together a little bit more to advance them? No individual, party, or leader has a monopoly on good ideas. The divulgence of democracy away from its idealistic roots may not be a reality that our broader society is ready to face, but we need to because democracy can continue to exist but only if we fight for it.

Now, I want to be clear that neither my motion nor my speech are intended to directly point a finger at the leadership of anyone in this Assembly. The hyperpartisanship of society is not a problem unique to Alberta; it's a crisis plaguing democracies all over the world. I also know that I'm not perfect, and I have certainly thrown my fair share of punches in this House, but honestly I do try to stay away from partisan rhetoric just for the sake of partisan rhetoric.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that democracy and our democratic institutions were established to truly serve the people, not just serve as a concept for people to believe exists somewhere off in a faraway land. The people of Alberta may not have the time nor the care to watch the televised proceedings of this House every day, but they deserve to have the confidence that they don't need to because whatever is going on in this faraway land is in their best interest.

I know that every member of this House was elected with honest intentions. As a member of the government caucus I can promise you that every piece of legislation put forward by this government has been thoughtfully constructed with the sole intention of building a thriving province where no dream is too big and no citizen is left behind. Similarly, I'm not a member of the opposition caucus, but I do believe that every member of the New Democrats shares a similar honest intention of making our province the best place to live, work, and build a future. Unfortunately, our democratic institution has become so that we are largely unable to share in those common goals that I know we all hold. The dysfunction is institutionally based, not intention based. I know this to be true, that deep down we all have pure intentions and that we can work together to accomplish so much good, because I've witnessed it.

There have been moments, and these moments have been the most rewarding and fulfilling of my political career. They haven't been the moments where I've made a splash on camera or received the loudest applause in the Assembly or gotten lots of likes on Facebook. The most fulfilling moments have been the ones that no one saw or witnessed, the moments when we worked together. To quote former President Harry Truman, "It is amazing what you can accomplish [when] you do not care who gets the credit."

Two of the moments that stand out to me were the time as deputy chair of the Public Health Act Review Committee where I and my colleagues whipped others to support several of our opposition's proposals that we believed to be reasonable and positive amendments. Similarly, just last month myself and several members of my caucus sat down with the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview to discuss his private member's bill. After our conversations we continued that dialogue with other experts in the field, many of our colleagues, and several ministries, and though we eventually came to our own conclusion, that the legislation in its current form would not work, and ended up voting against it, honest bipartisan conversations were had, and a pure willingness to collaborate and really go to bat for an opposition member who had a potentially really good idea existed.

Mr. Speaker, these moments where representatives come together across party lines in recognition that all of us here are duly elected by the people and have an obligation to work together on behalf of those people to ensure that those people have a voice in this place should not be so rare, and they shouldn't need to exist outside the ordinary confines of the institution that was once established to accomplish that very outcome. This institution called democracy should be constructed of procedures and practices that foster collaborative behaviour rather than hinder it.

Mr. Speaker, I don't have all the answers on what reforms are needed. Perhaps we should utilize the less politicized committee format more. Perhaps we need revisions to the standing orders. Heck, maybe we should get rid of these desks and replace them with cozy benches. All I know is that we can find ways to work together to further the interests of the people we represent if we put down our arms.

So, Mr. Speaker and to all members of the Assembly, I hope today that you will all join me in exploring other Westminster parliaments across the world to better understand what works, what doesn't, and what we can improve here at home. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I see there are a number of you wishing to join in the debate. We're going to go with the Opposition House Leader, followed by the Member for Calgary-Klein, the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore, and – holy cannoli. We're going to run out of time. Let's do that to start, and then we will see.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In debate on Motion 506 I bring to this discussion a great deal of frustration after three years in opposition working and attempting to work with this government in a number of ways. And in my role now as Official Opposition House Leader I have to be very, very blunt. Collaboration and co-operation have not been something that this government has sought. We have seen 11 changes to the standing orders of this place without working in collaboration or co-operation with the Official Opposition, and Motion 506, which proposes to send further changes to a committee that is dominated by government members, does not give me a sense of collaboration or co-operation going forward. I look forward to more debate on 506, but at this point I rise in opposition to this motion, and I do not plan to vote to support Motion 506, sending this to committee.

Changes to our standing orders began very early on in this Legislature, the 30th Legislature. On May 30, 2019, the first package of changes to the standing orders was brought forward. The government intended to bring a new tone and decorum, which, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, has not worked well, and we have not seen that in this place. But right from that very first start of changes to the standing orders the Official Opposition at that point said that we should send these changes to the exact committee that Motion 506 is referencing, and the government members, including the Member for Banff-Kananaskis, voted against that and were not willing.

For three years changes to the standing orders have been imposed on members of the Official Opposition, oftentimes with very little consultation and certainly not seeking to find compromise with us, and it's incredibly frustrating because that is not how the Alberta Legislature has operated in the past. Eleven changes in a single Legislature: my understanding is that it is historic, Mr. Speaker, and it shows, I think, a government intent on imposing their agenda and their opinions on the Official Opposition repeatedly as we've been sitting here trying to make life better for Alberta families.

I think that examples of collaboration or co-operation would have been the government perhaps supporting more of the amendments from the Official Opposition. I appreciate the Member for Banff-Kananaskis acknowledging that many of those amendments were voted down without honest consideration. That is my sense of it in many cases as well.

5:30

I will say to the Member for Banff-Kananaskis that 33 per cent voting with the government actually surprised me a little bit – that was a little higher than I thought it might be – but I have to disagree with the conclusion from the Member for Banff-Kananaskis because I don't think it shows that the opposition was unwilling to work with government. I believe strongly that government has very rarely reached out to the Official Opposition to find common ground.

Respectfully to the Member for Banff-Kananaskis, I don't believe that you've reached out to the Official Opposition to talk about this prior to the debate here in this Legislature. Certainly, in my role as Official Opposition House Leader I did not receive any overtures to discuss or to talk about this, which would have shown more interest in collaboration and co-operation.

The same day that we are discussing this and that the member is espousing the view that we should be able to work together more constructively feels very difficult after seeing the Member for Edmonton-City Centre's private member's bill defeated and knowing that we now operate in a Legislature where no opposition member's private member's bill has been able to proceed because this government chose to change the standing orders to impose a new committee process that no opposition member's bill can get through. Knowing that the private members' business, including private members' motions and private members' bills – it's a lottery system that few and far between get through.

The amount of time for private members' business is quite restricted, yet this government has chosen to essentially impede the ability. So now through these concurrence debates the government can vote down ideas rather than having to do it at second reading or at Committee of the Whole or to try and work with the opposition to amend things. I find that incredibly frustrating. Yes, we can look to other jurisdictions and other Westminster-style parliaments, but I suggest that we are better off to look within this House and to have conversations together about how we are functioning and what is happening in this Chamber, and there has been no willingness from this government to do that.

I think collaboration and co-operation would mean needing to perhaps consider not using the time allocation to limit debate on legislation as often as this government has, which I do not have the stats for but was very heavy handed and done a number of times. Co-operation and collaboration: perhaps having the Premier not handing out earplugs during early debates in this place, which set a real tone for this place. Collaboration and co-ordination would be supporting some of the emergency motions that the opposition has put forward under standing orders 30 and 42 as we went forward.

Now, the reality of what passing Motion 506 would mean for this place: it means a great deal of additional meetings, again, at a committee that is dominated and that government members have a majority on. I am very skeptical at how productive and nonpartisan that work could be, and that work would be taking place in the first summer that we have to connect with our constituents since the pandemic has really released its hold on restrictions and our ability to connect with people. So instead of connecting with constituents, to enter into a committee process that I do not believe is genuine, to analyze the standing order changes with members of a government caucus who have shown little to no willingness to collaborate and co-operate with members of the Official Opposition is quite frustrating.

Now, I believe that I have a reputation in this place as being someone who is collaborative. I've tried to work in a collaborative way with the ministers that I have been critic to. I was very, very pleased to have collaborated with the now Minister of Health but then minister of labour to pass job-protected paid leave for vaccination status. That was something we were able to accomplish together and I thought was incredibly valuable to the lives of Albertans. I have had several substantive amendments to pieces of legislation accepted by this government because of reaching out to the minister and having those conversations, but it's a bit of a one-way street, Mr. Speaker.

The government and the private members on the government side I do not believe have any genuine interest in collaborating or cooperating with the members of the Official Opposition based on my experience in this 30th Legislature. Even just how we've seen opposition members' voices drowned out through heckling and yelling when we are trying to debate legislation in this place has been very, very frustrating throughout my time here in this 30th Legislature.

Now, knowing that members of the government caucus, including the Member for Banff-Kananaskis, three years ago on May 30, so almost three years exactly in just a few weeks, voted against the opposition at that time, saying, "Let's work on this at committee," it's very disappointing to see it now coming back at the tail end of the Legislature, when we have very little time to even operate under any changed rules.

For these reasons, I will not be voting to support Motion 506, and I look forward to the debate.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have some prepared notes here, but I feel like I need to just address a little bit about what was said there. You know, understanding some of the frustration, of course, from members of the opposition, I think those frustrations actually speak to the importance of this motion and the need to review this. Some concerns are merited, some less so, but more to the point, we need to discuss this.

I don't at all question the sincerity of the private member that has put this forward, and I want to emphasize that this isn't government that's put this motion forward, that this is a private member who sincerely wants to address some of the concerns that she highlighted in her speech.

You know, I also want to note that I have seen – and the Official Opposition House Leader is correct – some really wonderful debate, constructive debate that has taken place here, and I've seen some less constructive debate, and most of the constructive debate that I have seen is when that Opposition House Leader is a part of it. I'm certainly all in favour of any efforts to improve decorum in this place and to improve constructive and collaborative debate because that's what my constituents sent me here to do, and that's what I'm hearing from them at the doors.

During my election night I addressed my volunteers and friends and family in a speech, and I closed my remarks to them that night talking about the division that I had seen that took place during the last election. The last election was very divisive, and we saw neighbours put against neighbours. In my own constituency I saw a house vandalized. A wonderful Filipino couple: written on their house was "Nazi" and "racist." Another house took a rock through the window. Another house: they just flat out refused to take my sign because they were worried about the reprimanding that they would take from their neighbours on this. All of this happened because they had my sign on their lawn. They were called racists, they were called Nazis, and I heard this over and over again at the door.

You've got to ask the question: how did we get here, and how are we going to fix this? We need to fix this, and I think the first step in fixing this is acknowledging a truth. Author, psychologist, and professor Jonathan Haidt addressed a crowd at the Colgate University in 2019, and he came up with three untruths that are being taught right now. One untruth that I think is particularly relevant to today's conversation:

The untruth of Us vs. Them, which views life as a battle between good and evil people. This is the mistaken notion of the righteous mind that treats ideological opponents as bad people and presumes that one's own side has a monopoly on virtue.

Based on some of the language and the tone that we have seen and heard both inside and outside of this Chamber and also on social media, I think that addressing this mistrust will be central in our ability to address the growing divide that we see within our communities and in this Chamber.

It starts with us. This divide is centred on politics and has been made worse as politicians have used rhetoric designed to create fear and anger to drive their base, ignoring the centre. The result has been a growing dissatisfaction of the ever-growing majority of voters that are out there.

I wanted to make some points abundantly clear in today's conversation. First of all, I believe that we all want an inclusive community. We are all wanting a welcoming community. We all want good for our children. We all value and care for the poor and those who are vulnerable in our community. We care and want to help those with disabilities in our communities. We want all people to have access to health care. We want to leave a legacy for our children.

This past weekend I had the pleasure of going out door-knocking in my neighbourhood, and I spoke with one of my constituents who had a deep concern for the growing discord that we're seeing in politics and the growing divide that she's seeing in her community. I hear this at door after door after door in Calgary-Klein. It's a common and growing concern. The result has led to more and more people feeling disconnected and disillusioned with their government and their representatives on both sides.

The urgency behind changing the tone of the political debate, especially in this Legislature, cannot be understated. We need debate, we need discussion, and when that debate and discussion is discouraged and replaced by condescending speech and name-calling, we get into the yelling and the heckling that the good Opposition House Leader talked about. I wholeheartedly support any review that will lead to more decorum, more constructive debate here so we can have more robust discussion and debates on proposed legislation and motions.

Let's be honest. Not a single member here was elected on the premise of heckling and yelling and name-calling. Certainly, we won't get re-elected on that. That is why I rise today in support of Motion 506 and want to thank the Member for Banff-Kananaskis for bringing it forward. I truly believe that we all, every member here, has our constituents' best interests at heart when we represent them in this Chamber. However, sometimes debate in this House can be tense, as we have witnessed from time to time. It can get personal.

Mr. Speaker, the traditions of our new Westminster political system have been etched into stone long before Alberta became a province, and they have evolved over time. However, rules need to be reviewed, debated upon, and updated based on the times that we are living in. The timing of this motion is not lost on me considering the tone of the debate that we just observed earlier here today. I think it's a great idea to have a discussion about the rules governing this Legislature, and I strongly believe it would be in everyone's best interest to have this discussion sooner than later.

I remember in a previous election I was door-knocking, and a wonderful lady opened the door. Her daughter was there working on her school work at the table, and we were having a great conversation about the future of education in our province and supports for students, more teachers in the classroom, the challenges that her daughter was facing, and how we help make sure her daughter has success. At that moment this woman's wife came up the stairs. She saw me, she saw my badge, and she started screaming: "Close the door. Close the door." And as that door was flying towards my face, I very quickly went: "Wait, wait, wait. Let me tell you what I used to do for a living or what I do for a living."

That door slowly opened up as I explained to her that I used to help homeless kids get off the street. I watched as her expression changed from complete anger to confusion because she had been told that Conservatives hated the LGBTQ community, that we wanted harm for her and her partner, that we wanted to take her child away from her. We got an opportunity to then – I spent at least 20 minutes at that door talking about what the truth was and what I wanted for her and her family. We were able to address some of those legitimate concerns.

I remember another door. I went up to the door. "I'm the Member for Calgary-Klein." He said, "I can't vote for you because your party is racist." At that moment my good friend and volunteer came up behind me, and he was born in South Sudan. We had the opportunity at that point to address what was going on there. I found out through that conversation that NDP door-knockers had just been through that community, and they were telling people that Conservatives were racist, that you couldn't vote for Conservatives. This is the type of politics that's going to destroy our democracy, and it's causing further division. The more we sit here and say, "They're bad" and the more the opposition sits and says that we're bad, the more people just come to recognize that this is all bad.

That's why I'm standing in support of Motion 506. Maybe it should have happened three years ago, but we are here now, and we have an opportunity to address the challenges that the opposition has brought forward, the challenges that Banff-Kananaskis has brought forward and discuss how we can improve decorum and improve collaboration and constructive debate. Our constituents are relying on us to do that, and our democracy is relying on us to do that.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore, followed by Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to speak in support of this motion. I think that there are a few things. I'm just going to speak for a small moment. One of the things that made me very proud when we had first entered into this House and had the privilege of being government was the changes to decorum. It seemed to be, you know, moving in the right direction, but I think we can all agree that that has declined immensely and that there have been moments in here where we can't hear anybody speaking, and it's not coming from one side or the other. It's everywhere, in fact.

There's equal frustration when members are doing members' statements or anything that happens to push the buttons of somebody who happens to be speaking and you can't hear people say these statements. I mean, there may be some rhetoric – there is – but a lot of times, you know, these members' statements are reflecting what's happening in our constituencies, people, really important issues, and things that people can actually really relate to.

It's one of those moments in the Legislature that's very much dedicated to our beautiful constituents, who put us here.

I think that the great thing – and I agree with my colleague from Calgary-Klein. Maybe this needed to come earlier. That's quite possible, but if I could add just to the debate on that, in doing a bit more research on this, I think it's something that as government we should probably try and do, like, every time a government comes in and look at it maybe six months before the next election to see how we've done so that concerns like standing orders and other things can be brought forward so that as we head into the next Legislature, we've had a chance to really revamp. The fact that this committee has met – what? – twice in 10 years I think really tells you that we've left an opportunity wide open to really, really look at the standing orders to see how we can improve. If we're not collaborating enough, if we haven't been thoughtful enough in our approach, then it's a really, really wonderful opportunity to take a look at that approach and see how we can do better versus, you know, the rhetorical attacks that seem to happen back and forth.

We all understand this is the theatre of the Legislature. That's going to happen, but this is one of those rare opportunities – I would like to thank the member – where we can actually look at the standing orders and see what we can do better. I'm very grateful that she's brought it forward.

I think, too, being able to look at other Legislatures to see where they've been successful and where they haven't is an important part of the expansion of what we do here because, at the end of the day, this is an evolving space. You always hope that you're moving towards and evolving and changing to understand. I think it was my colleague from Calgary-Klein who said, you know, that this is a different world that we're living in now than even when we first started. Very, very wise words from my friend. That wisdom is something that can be imparted into this work that we're going to be doing at this time.

I'll just finish with this. I have the utmost respect for all of my colleagues in this House. There have been many, many times where I've disagreed with multiple things, not just on the opposition side but even on my own side, but we do it with respect because there are bigger things at hand when we're talking about these decisions. We don't do any of these things lightly when we have these conversations, but we do it with respect and kindness and to hold each other in the highest regard. We're all serving the same cause here, for different reasons. In some form or another it's to keep Alberta prosperous and moving through, the purpose of ensuring what's in the best interests of Albertans. In my heart of hearts, I would love to see this Legislature reflect that respect, the respect that my colleagues have talked about, when you're at a door and you're trying to explain your side of things and you have a moment to show them your heart. That needs to be reflected here.

Again, I would just like to thank my colleague from Banff-Kananaskis for her excellent motion. Thank you so much for the opportunity to be able to debate this and to do better in the House.

Thank you.

5:50

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's great to see so many members are eager to speak to this motion. I'll thank the Member for Banff-Kananaskis for bringing this forward.

I wholeheartedly believe in the spirit of this motion. The frustration that I have with let's just call it the culture of the Assembly, with where we are today versus where we were – and I agree with other members saying that we have gone down a path that is much more divisive. Unfortunately, more debate on individuals has occurred at different points in time versus policy. Interestingly, I actually had a conversation with the Premier about this very issue on Saturday. I think, you know, there are a number of reasons why we are where we are, and I agree with members who have stated that no one side of the House is to blame. All parties have contributed to that, including myself. But when I look at the intention of this, I mean, yes, I wish this would have been brought in years ago.

I appreciate the member bringing it forward today. Again, the best time to plant a tree: 50 years ago. Second-best time: today. I appreciate that. I believe in the sincerity of the individual member; I struggle to believe in the sincerity of the government. I'll give some examples, Mr. Speaker.

A couple of hours ago, today, we debated concurrence on an antiracism bill, that wasn't even allowed to go to second reading. The bill was nonpartisan, yet the debate was shut down. And my bill from two weeks ago, the Technology Innovation and Alberta Venture Fund Act: the same thing happened. To the Member for Banff-Kananaskis, who mentioned that I did have an opportunity to sit down with a number of government private members – which I did appreciate; they took a genuine interest and, I believe, were sincere about the merits of the bill and wanted to see it move forward – the attitude toward the bill was a one-eighty from the first meeting to the second meeting. I appreciate that members have – and I'm not trying to relitigate the reasons that they gave of why the bill shouldn't proceed. I think they were a little light. Again, there was a willingness expressed to strengthen the bill, to accept amendments from the government side, to be able, for us as a Legislature, to have a shared victory, so to speak. There have been times that that's occurred.

You know, in my time in this Chamber one bill that I think of was the declaration of the Alberta Ukrainian-Canadian Heritage Day Act, that was passed in one day, all three readings, that required unanimous consent, to which all parties in the Chamber provided that consent. That's not the first time that's happened in Alberta's history. I think there have been about five. I will give a shout-out to the late Speaker Mr. Gene Zwozdesky, who brought forward the Holodomor bill back in I believe it was 2012 – it might have been 2011 – that also received unanimous consent to pass all three readings in a day. So there have been times in this Chamber where folks have shown an ability to be able to leave our party hats and partisan stripes at the door and work in the best interests of Albertans. Now, I completely agree that we need to do that much more, you know, in all parts of the day in this Chamber, and it will require an effort by everyone, a hundred per cent, Mr. Speaker.

The challenge that I have is that when we look at something like standing orders – standing orders in the past in this Chamber, for the majority of, like, decades and decades of us having an Alberta Legislature, were only ever changed when there was unanimous consent of all parties to change them. That has changed in the recent past. Now, I will admit, one hundred per cent, as someone, I'm sure, will point out, that under the NDP we changed the standing orders twice. For one of them, we had consent or agreement from the entire Chamber; for one of them, we did not. So I'm well aware that, with what I'm asking for, we committed that same fault. It is surprising, or was surprising to me, the number of times the standing orders have been amended in the past three years. It is a record. I believe we're up to 12 times in the three years that we're here.

Now, I'm not opposed to updating or refreshing or reviewing the rules of this place, but some of the rules have a history. I, for one, was opposed to getting rid of desk thumping. No, it doesn't exist in Ottawa. Why? They don't have desks. I mean, I guess they could thump their own thighs, but that probably wouldn't be as effective as clapping. I mean, this is just an example, Mr. Speaker. There are some changes that I know the Official Opposition didn't agree to, and we've seen the government make use of their majority on a number of examples, right? Introducing time allocation or closure: again, I recognize that the NDP government also invoked closure twice in our four-year term.

You know, the spirit of this motion, of getting all parties to come together to discuss standing orders, to look at best practices in other jurisdictions: I support the spirit of that. I just really struggle, as I've mentioned, Mr. Speaker, when there are tangible examples where both sides have decided not to pursue that path. I appreciate that in order to break that cycle, it's going to require all members to move this forward.

You know, there are times where members of the opposition have brought forward amendments, many different amendments, and I appreciate that – I will allocate some as being maybe more partisan in their nature, but there are and were and have been quite a few amendments that have been brought forward that have not been accepted.

Mr. Speaker, I don't know if I ever told you this story. In my first term, in 2012, the NDP had an amendment. We brought forward six or seven on one bill. We had one amendment, the final amendment, that was a completely nonpartisan amendment. In fact, during the division I was speaking with a number of ministers on the front bench, and they acknowledged that it's nonpartisan, and they said, "This is actually a pretty good idea." And I said: "Great. So will you vote in favour?" And I was told to my face: "No. We won't, because it's coming from the NDP. It's coming from you." And let me tell you: that was probably one of the most disheartening moments that I've had in my time in this Chamber.

I think that actions speak louder than words. When we were government, I know that there were multiple amendments on pieces of legislation that I brought forward from the opposition that were accepted. Again, I'm not looking for an attaboy. I'm just trying to demonstrate that there have been times, I believe the current government included – in the past three years have any amendments been accepted? I'm looking to our House leader to confirm or not. [interjections] Okay. Great. We have confirmation. There has been at least one amendment, maybe more. [interjection] Seven. Oh, okay. So there have been a few amendments that have been accepted . . .

The Speaker: Hon. members, I hesitate to interrupt; however, the time for debate for the item at hand has elapsed. There will be 14 minutes remaining in debate next week on this hotly contested motion other than a government motion.

Hon. members, the House stands adjourned until 7:30 p.m.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 19

Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate April 28: Member Irwin]

The Acting Speaker: I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, with about four minutes remaining post adjournment last time.

Member Irwin: Thank you. Thank you. You know, Mr. Speaker, I have to just share a little bit about this very auspicious occasion, and I'm certain that many people are watching, especially given the hockey game tonight. I'm positive that we have at least two or three people watching tonight.

Mr. Speaker informed me that this will be the first time that the person who adjourned debate was actually in the Chamber and able to start – well, not that that was a point of order, but you know what I mean. Yeah. This is a big deal. I wasn't planning to speak first, but I really wanted to maximize those four minutes. I wanted the Speaker to be able to share this tonight perhaps with his family and others.

Anyways. I'm sure I only have three minutes left now, and I didn't draw a point of order on that. Just before – I actually did speak a fair bit on this bill, I know, in previous days, and I may have a chance to speak again. I know in my comments on Bill 19, which is the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, I really wanted to just highlight the fact that, you know, we've seen multiple times already in this session with this government that they've had an opportunity to introduce transformative legislation on areas of concern to Albertans.

I think about continuing care, Bill 11. The Continuing Care Act is the name of the bill. You'd think: wow, what an opportunity to really listen to the dire concerns of stakeholders and patients when it comes to continuing care, but of course this government chose not to. I could name the same with multiple other pieces of legislation this session, including Bill 19.

I talked about the fact that we are not certain who, in fact, was consulted on this proposed piece of legislation. I talked about the fact that, you know, in some of the consultation that we did on this bill, we heard a lot of concerns, and we had stakeholders raise a lot of questions, particularly around the tribunal process and why there's no tribunal included in this bill. Condo insurance: wow. We could talk about and we have talked a lot about the rising costs on Albertans in so many areas: auto insurance, tuition, park fees, school fees. The list goes on.

You know, I know in the last time we debated this bill, like, a few of my colleagues shared some of the concerns that they've heard from condo owners in their ridings about rising condo insurance fees. Again, the point being here that this government had an opportunity to address some of the real concerns that we're hearing from our constituents around condominiums, and they chose not to.

What I ended on in my last speech on this bill was the fact that housing remains a huge concern, and that is an issue. I admitted that I haven't heard a lot about condos from my constituents, but I have heard a lot about housing, and it's one of the top issues I hear in my riding. Every day I witness unhoused folks, and I interact with unhoused folks. We know that the number of unhoused folks on the streets of Edmonton and across the province, as my colleague from Edmonton-Strathcona raised in question period – in fact, she asked the Premier about the lack of housing and housing supports in Calgary, and the answer was quite shameful. The answer talked about shelters, and the Premier did not talk about the need for investing in housing, particularly permanent supportive housing.

With that, I will end my remarks and hope that we will get some answers from this government on this bill. Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has risen to join debate.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to stand and speak to Bill 19, the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022. Edmonton-City Centre is, of course, home to a lot of condominiums. It is a big portion of the constituency I represent, and it certainly affords some unique challenges. It's much more challenging to do door-knocking in a good part of the constituency outside of election periods, and there are a number of other things that come with it. Certainly, with that also comes a high interest in government legislation around condominiums. Indeed, since we were in government in 2015 and inherited the condominium work that had been done by the previous PC government but not proclaimed, there was a lot of extensive work that had to be done to bring that forward. Some of that indeed went on long enough that it was inherited by this government and brought forward, but it's certainly something in that process that I've heard from a lot of constituents about.

Indeed, I have been a condominium owner. I have been on the condominium board. I have been the president of such boards. Certainly, I have seen that they are a dynamic form of democracy, Mr. Speaker. Folks may comment at times about the temperature in the Legislature and the kinds of disorder that they might see during question period. At times I would say that pales in comparison to some condominium board meetings.

Now, I think we all here do believe in grassroots democracy, but certainly it's a challenging one when it comes to condominium boards because so much of it is left to the boards themselves and the individuals involved to police. There is no Speaker, Mr. Speaker, at your average condominium board meeting. You have the chair, of course, but there is perhaps limited knowledge of Robert's Rules.

There are a number of factors involved. Certainly, condominium legislation can be complex. It can be difficult. Indeed, I've been in experiences, and not that long ago, where new ownership was coming in, buying a certain number of units, creating complications, and the board felt that we actually had to have a lawyer at several meetings to try to determine which way things were going to go.

So these things can be very complex, but certainly the objective of government in terms of governing this and trying to set out these processes should be to try to make it as easy and as smooth as possible for these meetings to take place and, secondly, to make it as easy and smooth as possible to try to resolve these disputes because, again, the complexities that can be involved in some of these questions and indeed the level of emotion and personality conflict that can be involved make these situations difficult.

If the only available resolution is to go to court, Mr. Speaker, that creates an even bigger challenge. It certainly does little to try to calm the situations. It certainly does little to make them smoother or easier. Indeed, it increases expense for everyone involved and can make it far more challenging. It can deeply disadvantage individuals who do not have the kinds of financial resources to be able to hire a lawyer and take these things to court.

We have to recognize that in certain situations a condo board themselves can have a lot of power. They have control over the purse strings. They have control over those resources, and if a condo board chooses to act in a way that perhaps is not quite ethical, it can be very challenging for an individual owner to push back against. Again, I can speak from experience in situations where I've seen presidents or other members of condo boards who worked with property managers who themselves were willing to look somewhat askance at what the actual rules and legislation might say to attempt to intimidate owners with fines that were not actually legal or take other steps that they did not actually have the authority to take.

Now, what we have in this bill are a few different changes. Certainly, I have no objection to the change that the minister is proposing here in terms of allowing certain votes to be done simply by one owner, one vote as opposed to unit factors. Indeed, I have spent my own time, Mr. Speaker, at times when we felt that we needed to take action to make changes on the condo board, going around, figuring out how many owners we need and how many unit factors that person has in order for us to be able to win this vote, et cetera. Certainly, that was one of the early things that first got me interested in a career in politics. But I recognize that when it comes to things like simply approving the agenda for the meeting, why not just have that be able to be just by a simple show of hands from the owners present? That seems reasonable.

Now, I'll look forward, of course, to the regulations, where we'll get further definition on some of these things, but on this piece I do not have a difficult time trusting the minister that there are going to be some of these sort of small adjustments to try to make for an easier flow.

However, I do have some concerns with the proposal that the minister is putting forward regarding chargebacks. Now, indeed, I have had folks on condo boards at condo buildings here in my constituency reach out to me on the issue of chargebacks. They have indeed said, you know, that they felt that the process that was in place made it too difficult for them to be able to recoup costs in situations where there is damage done to common property. That's reasonable. We want to be able to find a way, I guess, for those things to be achieved. Certainly, I recognize that costs can – when there is damage to common property, then that falls on everybody. Then it's all owners that have to pay that indeed.

As the minister himself said, these costs add up. The only way to pay for these costs is to increase condo fees. That means every condo owner, even if you're a good actor that's never caused any damage, had to bear the cost of those. Certainly, that's a reason to have concern, Mr. Speaker.

I would also note that I've heard from many people who were very concerned about the fact that this government removed the cap on insurance, which, in turn, has also had precisely that effect, driven up the costs for the building and therefore every single owner's condo fees. But that is not the subject of this bill.

It does concern me, Mr. Speaker, again, as I have seen and certainly as I have heard from other constituents, that it is possible for a board to be, shall we say, disingenuous, to choose to target a particular owner. What this change would do is that it would make it more difficult for an individual owner to be able to appeal that.

Again, the only option that they would currently have is to go back to the courts, and that, as I said, can be a very insurmountable obstacle for some. It's a very difficult position to be in when you have put your life savings, you have put a sizable investment into a condominium, particularly in a market right now, Mr. Speaker, where it is very difficult to resell and recoup your investment.

Now, I understand that the minister said that he is going to set some of these things out in regulation and that in regulations he's going to require that condo boards will need strong and compelling evidence for charging for damages as well as a fair way for owners to appeal decisions. On that, Mr. Speaker, I am a bit more hesitant about simply trusting this to the regulations, particularly because there has been work under way for a number of years that began and was first hinted at in the legislation that was passed by the PC government, was worked on by our government during the four years we put work towards it, and was indeed promised by this government and continued until now to create a condo tribunal.

Now, the existence of a condo tribunal would certainly make this an easier change to accept, that owners would have an option outside of having to go directly to the court system or depend potentially on the goodwill of the board as to having a fair appeals process.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, we can keep in mind what this government had attempted to put forward in terms of an appeals process when it came to traffic tickets and some other things in the courts here, where individuals would have indeed had to pay out of pocket and would have been judged more or less as guilty until they proved themselves innocent and had to pay for the privilege of doing so.

I think we have some reason to be a bit hesitant, a bit skeptical about what the government is going to put in place to ensure that owners who are put in this position, where they are judged to have done that damage and they are levelled these charges – that there will be a really, truly fair option of appeal. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that is one of the things I have heard about most. I said that I've heard from a few folks about the chargebacks. I've heard from many, many, many more about the need for the tribunal.

I can tell you that during the time that we were in government, I repeatedly was reaching out to our Minister of Service Alberta and asking about progress on that point. We saw other pieces move forward, other pieces of the regulation, but that was one that, you know, did stall out. It turned out to be perhaps complex. To be honest, I was never quite clear exactly on all the pieces that were involved there, but I do know that we are coming up now on potentially five, six years that this has been in process. This was something that this government said they were going to get done, and now they are effectively saying, "No, we are not," without a lot of clarity on why.

We know that this exists in other provinces. B.C. has a Civil Resolution Tribunal to resolve condo disputes of any amount. It handles other issues in B.C. that are under $5,000. It issues fees and fines, deals with condominium bylaws that are arbitrary or unfair. So it provides a much-needed check and balance, Mr. Speaker, on what is essentially an honour system, again, unless owners can afford to actually go to court and go through that process.

Mr. Speaker, we also know the state of our court system right now. It is under enormous pressure. We know that there are cases at risk of not being able to proceed for having exceeded the statutes that have been set out. We know that our Crown prosecutors – and I was thankful to hear today that they will not have to go on strike but that indeed they have the opportunity to sit down now and enter into a negotiation with the government to address their issues. Certainly, we are hearing from defence lawyers now, who are also asking questions about: okay; if there's going to be a change for them, is there going to be a change for us?

Overall, what we know is that our court system is already under enormous pressure, and indeed that was part of why the government was originally justifying the somewhat troubling and lopsided approach they were looking at taking with traffic courts and traffic tickets, which they have walked back. But the fact is that we still have enormous pressure in that system, and to say at this point, then, that we are still going to leave these kinds of disputes to our court system to resolve is just going to add more to that pressure.

So it would be my hope that a government that has said, you know, that they are dedicated to eliminating red tape, making processes flow more smoothly, giving Albertans more access to grassroots democracy would have prioritized a condominium tribunal, would have put real work and effort into achieving that. Unfortunately, we have not seen that, and that is not in this bill.

Ontario also has the Condominium Authority of Ontario, arm's length from government, which has tribunal authority, so a condominium authority tribunal. They have a $50 levy that goes for all condos and then fees for some of the services. It is administered online, and it offers opportunities for negotiation, mediation, and adjudication. Nova Scotia has a condominium dispute officer condominium arbitration process.

Mr. Speaker, there are clearly models that we could be looking at in other provinces. There are certainly opportunities for us to be bringing this forward. I would be interested to hear from the Minister of Service Alberta a bit more about what the obstacles have been to moving this forward in Alberta and why the decision has been made at this point that they are simply setting that aside, that that is not a priority.

I can say, again, that for folks in my constituency it continues to be a priority, and it continues to be a concern, particularly when we are talking about housing issues and challenges for people to own their homes. I think most municipalities are looking for opportunities to increase their density, certainly for urban living and more opportunities. We have seen a significant growth in the number of people that are living in Edmonton's downtown, and that then has economic benefits and also has good benefits for the city in helping to curb urban sprawl.

But the fact is that when we're increasing that kind of density, a lot of that ownership is going to be in condominiums, so we really need to be thinking very carefully about how we can make this a better system, with more accountability and more protection for individual owners as well as for condominium boards. Let me be clear, Mr. Speaker. I know I have spoken about boards that act badly or are disingenuous or may target owners – and those exist – but certainly I have also been in the position to work with a number of people who were very dedicated on their boards and dealing with very difficult situations like building-wide bedbug infestations or indeed folks doing damage to property or other things that can occur. I recognize that that can be very thankless work and that it is done by volunteers, for the large part.

By no means do I want to disrespect the folks that step forward or indeed the folks that have advocated for this particular change from the minister in regard to chargebacks. I think it is very important for us, particularly as legislators, that we are thinking carefully about the impacts this could have on individual owners.

That said, I think I'm nearing the end of my time. This is my first opportunity to debate the bill, and I imagine there will be more. I look forward to perhaps hearing from the minister on some of these questions.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has risen.

7:50

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have a great deal to say about this particular act, but to begin with, I am rising to move an amendment. I'll just wait for that to reach you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

This, for the purposes of debate, will be referred to as REF1. As is the normal course of the procedure, if you would like a copy of the amendment, please put up your hand, and one will be delivered. There will also be copies at the table. There will also be copies available in the peace lounge should you be looking for one there.

Hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View, please continue.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I move that the motion for second reading of Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

Mr. Speaker, this is an amendment which is commonly referred to as a referral because it refers the substance of the bill to a committee, and I actually think that that is a good thing to do with this particular bill. Now, I'm not suggesting that all of the changes in here are bad, but I think there are a few details left to be worked out.

Obviously, one of the things the bill doesn't do is establish a tribunal to deal with these matters. That's certainly something that I heard about an enormous amount in government. I've heard about it an enormous amount since we've been in opposition. Probably the main ask that I hear from anyone who wants to talk about this act is: when will the tribunal be established? The reason for that is that court processes take a very long time. They're extremely costly. The procedures can seem quite difficult and arcane. It can be difficult for people to understand what the steps are they have to take or how to argue it or how to move something forward or how to get it resolved. The idea would be to bring in this tribunal to help with that.

I think, of course, of the residential tenancies dispute board, which does handle matters, disputes under the Residential Tenancies Act significantly more quickly in a lot of cases. People find that incredibly helpful. Yeah, I would say that the primary ask I get from people representing condo boards, from people representing condo owners, from just people generally is about this sort of resolution mechanism. I think that it would be extremely helpful here because things are often more complicated than they appear.

I mean, the really nice part about alternate dispute resolution is that if you're doing it right, it's not just sort of two parties who go in and fight and one wins and one loses. If you're doing it right, what happens is that everyone comes together, and they sort of explain what their feelings are around the situation, what they think happened, and kind of what they would like to have resolved going forward. It can actually result in better resolutions. Rather than one side or the other side, rather than, like, very sort of clunky orders that can be provided from the court, it can often be the case that people will sort of negotiate to a resolution that isn't something that ever would have come out of a court decision but is something that is better for all of the participants involved. It can happen faster, with a lot less sort of stress and turmoil and cost for everyone involved.

I really think that that is something that should be moved forward to. I know this government had committed to that in the last election. I'm sad to see they didn't move forward with that. They moved forward with a lot of commitments I don't agree with, and it just so happens I guess the one that I did agree with they didn't, so there we go.

The other, I think, concern here – and my hon. colleague who spoke before me raised it as well – is the chargeback system without an obvious mechanism to create that accountability. I think it's worth sort of starting with a story, because, you know, these situations can be incredibly complicated when you come right down to it, right? A lot of condos, for instance, are rented out, so it can sort of create a complicated scenario. In this scenario you have a tenant, and the tenant has received notice that there's some sort of leak from the washer. It's believed that the pipe is backing up or something like that. They ought not use the washer in the interim. That's fine.

Now, the property manager will only speak to the owner of the unit, because, well, some property managers are very good and others are not very good, and the one in this story is pretty abysmal. So the property manager sends a plumber. The plumber comes. The plumber talks to the tenant, says: "The pipe is backed up. It's full of built-up laundry detergent gunk, just a bunch of gunk. It needs to be snaked. It can't work until it's snaked." Okay. Fine. Then the property manager, because they know that it is a condo which is inhabited by a tenant, just really doesn't bother to getting around to having the plumber come back. They don't have to deal with the tenant, so of course not their problem.

Roughly somewhere between five and six weeks elapse, and the landlord, feeling a sense of obligation because he's a decent fellow, comes and does it himself, snakes the pipe himself, and says to the tenant: "Okay. Great. The problem that the plumber identified has been solved. You may now run the washing machine," which the tenant does. Well, it turns out that that never was the problem. It's not really clear what happened. Perhaps the plumber was mistaken. Who knows? Anyway, that's what happens. The result is that the thing leaks again. It turns out that the actual problem is that there's a hole in the pipe, but the pipe is behind a wall.

Considering this an emergency, the condo manager person, who, of course, will not talk to the tenant who now inhabits the property, sends someone in who drills a giant hole in the wall and leaves a big mess and doesn't check for asbestos, and it's just generally extremely problematic. The tenant, obviously, reaches out to the landlord and says, "I would like some assurances that this, like, giant pile of mess that's been left for me to clean up is not, in fact, full of asbestos," and no one is able to provide that assurance, so it goes round and round and round and round.

This has never been resolved, to the best of my knowledge – I guess I haven't been involved in the situation in a while – but the point is that if the condo corporation, on the word of this manager, chooses to charge back the unit owner, or the tenant in that case, there is very little ability for those people to defend themselves despite the fact that I think that from the story it's fairly clear who is in the wrong, and it is the manager. But the manager isn't going to tell the condo board that they're in the wrong, is he? It just creates a situation where potentially people are being charged with something and now they have to pay an enormous amount to defend themselves in court, which can be a lengthy process, and the money can be in dispute for a long time.

This is, in my view, not an ideal situation, and this could apply to any situation. The way this legislation is drafted – this is amending legislation. It repeals and replaces section 39. Subsection (2) allows the chargeback to be levied for damage. Subsection (3) says that it must be "actual costs." Sub (4) says: costs or the deductible from the insurance. That is a whole different issue. Subsection (5) says: can dispute "in accordance with the regulations." Well, I don't really think that's good enough.

If you're that tenant – you know, this is the other thing. A lot of people who are tenants in condo buildings, who are potentially subject to this, who are potentially being charged with this by these condo corporations, may be young, right? They may be students. They don't have a lot of money. They don't necessarily know how to seek legal advice. They could be people who are new to the country, with English as a second language. It just puts them at a disadvantage. It puts them in a position where they are essentially guilty by way of charge from the condo owner until they prove themselves innocent. I think that that is a problematic way to go about it.

Now, I certainly have heard that there are concerns around the process now. It is very hard. If someone is wilfully causing damage or wilfully being problematic, it's incredibly hard to go after that person for a condo board, and that's problematic. It's difficult to get people to serve on condo boards for a number of reasons. It's not compensated, and it's a lot of headache if you have some finicky people who are disagreeable, which, you know, is sometimes the case. It can be an unpaid, sort of headachy problem.

Certainly, this is a problem that needs a solution. I'm just not sure that this solution is the best solution. The reason is that instead of putting a condo board in a position where it has this real big problem, where it has to, like, go after someone and it's procedurally onerous, now you have either the owner or the tenant in that position, where they're charged until such time as they can prove it wasn't them, and now they're having to go through a procedurally onerous situation.

Now, this government says: don't worry; there'll be lots of protections in the regulation. I mean, it's worrisome, right? It's worrisome, obviously, because we've heard this a lot, you know – "Don't worry; public health care guarantee: don't worry" – and it often isn't the case. It's very easy to promise up front and not follow through. This government has a long and demonstrated history, I would say, of promising things up front and not following through.

This amendment gives us the opportunity to take the time to do the due diligence and the due consideration, because I think, you know, "They can dispute it in accordance with the regulations" isn't quite enough. It's not enough protection to make clear what's going to happen. Again, yes, these changes needed to be made because currently the system is unfair to the condo board. I feel that this solution, rather than balancing things, just shifts that unfairness to the other party, and that's not the right way forward either.

What could happen at a committee like this is that, you know, people who have been through these situations could come forward. Lawyers who are familiar with the area, people who are familiar with condo governance could come forward, and everyone could sort of explain what problem we're trying to solve and come up with a better solution, because I think there are better solutions than this. Yes, I guess I would say that this is a problem. It needs a solution. I don't particularly like this solution. I think we ought to go to a committee and sort of discuss what a better solution might be. I think, Mr. Speaker, that a better solution might itself hang on the tribunal that has not been implemented because I think that that is the system that could make everything a lot faster. It could adjudicate rights and interests.

We have this concept in administrative law that the sort of level of procedure to which you are entitled is proportionate to your interest in the matter. I actually think this is a really good principle. I think it should flow throughout the entire court system. You know, the idea that oftentimes, functionally, someone who is fired from their job has basically sort of – I mean, they can go to employment centres, but that only gets you the minimum, which is quite low in many cases. Functionally, there isn't much they can do through the court system, so functionally they can't challenge that. Meanwhile if you get a $75 speeding ticket, you get sort of the full-court press for that.

I don't know if that's the best way to do those things. I think a tribunal might solve some of those problems. It might make it the case that we can kind of deal with these issues faster and with the amount of procedure that is necessary to handle what it is that is coming forward, so what the particular dispute is in this particular instance. That is why I think it should be referred to a committee. I think that the committee can do the difficult work of assessing exactly what a better solution to this – you know, genuinely giving the government credit here – problem that needs solving is.

I guess the other thing I would say about this bill is that it really does need that tribunal attached to it. I think that, yeah, that's probably the number one ask. Yeah. I don't think I've ever heard a different number one ask from anyone involved in condos in any sort of position or in any way. That would definitely be a good thing. Potentially the two things are linked, you know? Potentially the one thing goes with the other.

It would be interesting if the minister could tell us a little bit more about the regulation. You know, they're saying: don't worry; it'll be in the regulations. That's fine. I feel like I could use a little more information about what would be in the regulations, a little more information here in this place on the record so that there would be sort of a record and an accountability there, an accountability to ensure that those things were followed through and to reassure the concerns of the opposition.

Yeah. I mean, I think it's pretty normal in this place for people to ask these sorts of questions, to ask for more details, to ask for that sort of thing, and I think it's not unreasonable for a minister to come forward and provide those additional details to make sure that everyone is understanding, I guess, where we are and how we're going to proceed forward. You know, it certainly has been the case, at least in a few instances . . . [Ms Ganley's speaking time expired]

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

We are on REF1 if there is another. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has risen to debate.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise this evening to speak about REF1, the referral amendment, to the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022. I'm always interested in delving into real estate matters in this House when questions of changes to legislation regarding the sale or regulations around the ownership of real estate are considered, and of course this piece of legislation is no exception.

I do agree wholeheartedly, Mr. Speaker, with my colleague the Member for Calgary-Mountain View, who just spoke now about the reasonableness of having this piece of legislation referred to committee so that many unanswered questions can be addressed by committee members and perhaps those who the committee could call before it. I know the Member for Calgary-Mountain View was quite detailed in her approach to the legislation and the need for having a committee consider it.

I hope to add to some of her arguments with a few observations of my own, Mr. Speaker, some of them coming from numerous years selling real estate and also acting as a real estate broker and sales manager, having to face the ire of buyers and sellers who would be phoning me to help resolve disputes that they may be having with their unit after the fact or upon inspection and finding out that there were issues of concern that they were now being stuck with that they didn't feel they should be held responsible for.

Of course, I speak about the concern that many condo owners have had and some continue to have regarding the windows and doors and the weatherproofness of them. We've gone through a period of time within the last decade and two decades, perhaps, where there was a problem with the so-called leaky condos, Mr. Speaker. It wasn't something that was limited to British Columbia, where indeed they have more rainfall on the coast – and it was a widespread concern and costly issue that arose there – but it was right across the country and, for that matter, throughout North America.

It arose because of faulty workmanship and/or design in the condominium doors and windows in particular; not so much the roof, but sometimes that roof cap was also the culprit as well. I'll refer specifically to the condominium windows and doors for my comments on this topic because what the legislation does, Mr. Speaker, is move the definition of windows and doors from regulations into legislation.

I understand, I think, the motivation of the minister for doing this. It is an extremely contentious thing to a condominium owner who is faced with the prospect of a major bill to repair damage in their own unit or a unit that happens to be directly below them as a result of water leaking from their unit to the next unit but also between a condo unit owner and perhaps the tenant of that condo unit owner and the condo corporation itself because common property may have been damaged.

Mr. Speaker, one may think that perhaps fire is the worst cause of damage claims to property and the worst threat to property, but realistically water is by far a more insidious and sometimes silent destroyer of property. It can happen slowly and over time and be imperceptible for months, in fact for years, until, for some reason, mould is discovered or a weakness in the structure is discovered. It's an insidious invader of property, particularly where wood is involved but in any case where water can penetrate the surface of the building material, stay for a while in proper temperatures and proper conditions, and grow into a mouldy condition. It can be unbelievably expensive to fix, requiring, in some cases, near total reconstruction. In some cases we've heard about, particularly houses on acreages recently just west of town, around the Spruce Grove-Stony Plain area, the houses were condemned as a result of mould. That can happen if it's not addressed. It's a really difficult issue and a really difficult problem.

I'm concerned that the legislation requires that – the definition of responsibility for windows and doors has been relegated to legislation from regulations. I'd like to hear more in committee, should the referral amendment be successful, about the reasoning why the minister thought that this would be a good methodology to correct any lack of clarity around responsibility for damages caused by leaking windows and doors.

It is a rather rigid tool to have the definition of something as minute as the door trims and casings versus the window trim on a constructed opening embedded in legislation rather than in regulations, which would be, by and large, more flexible should things change or should there be developments in case law, which suggests an alteration in the regulations would be wise to do. Yet here, of course, should that case law arise, it would require opening up the act to start playing around with definitions of, you know, windowsills and window doors and balcony trims versus fascia versus the casing.

I just don't quite understand the need to embed all of that definition, that minutiae, into legislation when, in fact, it probably would have been a bit more nimble to have altered the regulations and made it clear that, you know, notwithstanding what a condominium corporation may have said, if indeed they're undefined, then the regulations would define the openings or the windows and doors, what responsibility was whose in any particular case. That question, I think, we deserve a satisfactory answer to in committee, should the referral amendment be successful, because the issue is not tiny.

We have had millions and millions and millions of dollars of claims and counterclaims because of leaky windows and doors in condominiums in Alberta and throughout the country. They're very, very difficult situations to be in, where you would have had, in some cases, condominium corporations do a cash call; in other words, a charge to every unitholder to rectify faulty windows and doors that were either a design flaw or perhaps workmanship issues when the building was constructed. Of course, they usually weren't discovered until the responsibility of the builder and the designer and the architect was long since expired, so it became part of the responsibility of the owners to combine their resources and fix them themselves. In many cases the condominium corporation itself was responsible because there would have been common-area doors and common-area windows that would've suffered the same design flaws or shoddy workmanship and had to have been repaired as well.

The idea of embedding the minute definitions of windows and doors into legislation rather than allowing them to stand within regulation is something that I still don't quite see the need for. I'd love to hear more from those individuals who have been directly affected by a situation where they had to face the onerous cost of replacing or repairing windows and doors in their unit or in a common area of a condo. They could come before the committee and explain exactly why they think it would be beneficial to have this definition embedded in the legislation versus maintaining it in regulations.

I know that you'll have quite often, Mr. Speaker, a contiguous line of people suing each other when it comes to a rented property and the tenant is perhaps responsible for damage. Particularly, as I said, water is the number one, but there could be a number of different damages. The insurance industry is replete with circumstances that would be beyond belief unless they actually happened to you. There are any number of circumstances that can happen when an individual is living in a condominium and they have a pet or they have a child's science experiment go wrong, or it can simply be water damage or perhaps a small fire. I know that there are situations where even in some of our public-owned housing the tenants are being evicted for having caused a fire. That is something that concerns me.

In this particular case a tenant responsible for damage quite often in the rental agreement will be required to provide proof of a policy of insurance to a certain amount for certain insurable losses. I'm not sure if the legislation before us contemplates that requirement. Of course, mortgage companies require that a property be insured so that, of course, the mortgage company insists that it be in first place to receive the payout of that insurance, and that's part of the mortgage contract. That's something that we can also discuss in committee, Mr. Speaker, that in the event of losses from an unintentional but insurable loss or consequence the tenant, in fact, could be required by their landlord to have insurance which would protect against as much of a potential liability as possible.

Not only that, of course. You'd look at that being in the condo bylaws, but the owners would, hopefully, also be required by the condominium corporation bylaws to protect themselves with adequate insurance against chargebacks that might happen as a result of their liabilities towards a condominium corporation in the event of water damage or something that the condo claims is damage caused by the condominium owner in that particular complex. In that particular case, of course, that there's a tenant involved, there may be a suit back through to the tenant from the condominium association.

It can be a true minefield of pain and agony if indeed it gets to a situation where individuals are suing one another and attacking one another in court to recover their perceived damages. That's all the more reason, Mr. Speaker, why it's important to consider having this legislation considered in committee, because of the responsibility, I think, of this Legislature to make sure we avoid the courts, the onerous costs and time liabilities imposed upon condominium owners in this case if they have to go to court to resolve disputes.

The other big, big issue that we've heard many members comment on from our side of the House, especially – the issue that we have with this legislation is the dispute resolution void, let's say. There's no opportunity for an owner to actually avoid the courts because their tribunal wasn't brought forward. It was contemplated in the regulations that we brought forward when we were government, when we had the act open, and the UCP, current government, did not follow through with it and, unfortunately, in this version of their attempt at changing the legislation for the better has not seen fit to bring forward a tribunal that would allow condo owners, tenants to avoid going to the courts to seek redress.

What it does, in my view, is empower a condo corporation who will have more resources and therefore more power to pursue their interest in court. It gives them an advantage versus the individual owner of a particular condo unit, and, as a result, you will see perhaps unitholders not wanting to engage in court action and just simply suffering a loss or perhaps claiming bankruptcy. That's one option that a person doesn't see as a far-fetched thing to pursue when you're owning a condominium and it may be $200,000 or $300,000 or $400,000 and you're ending up facing a claim from your condo association in the same amount. It may be pretty unreasonable to proceed with anything other than a tribunal.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. On the referral motion I do wish to join debate and follow my colleague from Edmonton-McClung and, similarly, agree that I believe that we should not read this bill a second time but refer it to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

You know, standing up and following my colleague from Edmonton-McClung, I think from earlier debates I understood that he's worked in the real estate industry for 30 years now and seen his fair share of both positive experiences – no doubt more positive experiences than negative – but certainly can't have a 30-year tenure in real estate and serving Albertans with their sale and resale and the challenges that some of those have with regard to their purchases or tenure in their properties that they bought through this individual being a real estate agent. With lots of experience on his side in previous debates he's talked about some of the challenges that we have before us as a result of this bill coming forward and the way it has come forward.

My colleague from Calgary-Mountain View is proposing that we refer to a committee for the opportunity to hear more from people who have seen this bill and perhaps judge it in a wanting way. I know the Member for Grande Prairie, I think, in introducing this bill for the second time, perhaps on behalf of the Minister of Service Alberta, talked about how there were regular meetings with groups of dedicated representatives throughout 2020 and 2021 that Service Alberta held. Just thinking of some of those individuals, whether they be representatives from community groups, representing condo owners or boards or managers of condos, lawyers: all of that would be a really useful group of individuals to hear more from and to kind of understand their views with regard to what came forward in Bill 19 and what is left up to regulation.

Just thinking about the growth of condominium ownership also in Alberta, one of the documents I was looking at from CMHC said that from 2011 to 2016 there was a significant growth in condo ownership in Alberta at that time. I'm just thinking back to what those years were like. It was prior to the world crash and the price of oil in late 2014, 2015. There was a lot of positive growth, positive feelings, positive GDP.

An Hon. Member: Vibes.

Member Irwin: Good vibes.

Member Ceci: Good vibes in the province.

There was a huge percentage of homes built in those days that were condos. If I think back in terms of a story, though I have owned two principal residences in my time, currently in the second one for about 36 years, there was a time when my spouse and I owned a condo just not very far from here as she was working up here at the U of A and wasn't comfortable renting somewhere, wanted to be in a place that we could call our own and lock the door. It was a nice place. Some of the challenges that we had as condo owners were around the common property. Though she felt totally fine being in the place, you know, from time to time the elevator didn't work, and she didn't feel comfortable in some of the hallways that she had to go through to get to the unit.

Mr. Dach: Did you use a realtor?

Member Ceci: Did we use a realtor?

The other thing that I just wanted to say with regard to all of that is that there were challenges with the ownership. Particularly, we weren't there that much. She wasn't there that much, but there were disputes.

I recognize that what we're dealing with and hoping for is that it'll go to committee and there'll be an opportunity to talk more about why the tribunals did not get into this bill, though it was very much the plan back in 2015 to 2019 when we were government and we were working and opened up the condo act twice when we were government. There won't be a million different times to open up this act, and hopefully, you know, together we can get it right and it can service condominium owners for many years in the future, but it means that we need to get this right, and that's another reason to consider going to, hopefully, a referral to this committee that I'm talking about.

I just wanted to talk about a few other things. In terms of the referral to this committee, you know, as I said, it was very much the NDP government's plan to make sure this act worked for the long term, and the tribunal was something we heard about. Unfortunately, when the new government came in, like many things, there was a desire not to move forward with some of the common-sense approaches that we as the NDP were trying to put into legislation.

For example – and it's just a quick example – the two investor tax credits that we brought in as a result of chambers of commerce throughout the province, notably Calgary, making that recommendation and saying that it would attract capital from Alberta investors, and it did. It was a really good thing, and it was unfortunately killed by this UCP government when they became government, but they saw the wisdom of changing that, about two years after it was killed, to bring in their own. It's very much the same thing that was in place, so delaying for two years the ability of Alberta investors to get credits for their investments and continue to drive forward the economy in this province at a time when we were in the COVID times seems like a bad thing to have happened in Alberta.

Just another example of what I think needs to happen is that we need to take good ideas from wherever they come and work together to make them happen for Albertans.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I understand that I should be looking towards adjourning in a second, and I'll take my place but hope that members of this House will give good thought to and consideration to the referral that we're talking about here.

With that said, Mr. Speaker, I would like to adjourn debate on the referral amendment that's been brought forward by the Member for Calgary-Mountain View. Thank you.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 11 Continuing Care Act

Ms Gray moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the government has not carried out sufficient consultations on the contents of the bill with families whose loved ones lost their lives from COVID-19 while in continuing care.

[Debate adjourned on the amendment April 27: Mr. Williams speaking]

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. members. Are there any members looking to join debate on Bill 11, Continuing Care Act? We are on REF1. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to my colleagues for the debate so far this evening. Interesting, respectful, good questions posed, I think, so far, so I'll do my best to continue in that thread. The bill that we are considering at this point is Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act. I have to start by saying that I am quite familiar with the legislation that governed continuing care and presently still governs continuing care in this province, and I know that there are a number of different pieces and that this bill appears to be bringing it all under the same umbrella.

What I want to say is that not all care is equal in this province and for good reason. There is a differentiation in terms of the needs of patients. Often we're thinking about seniors, but it's not just seniors. There are certainly many folks with significant illnesses who can no longer stay safely independently living at a certain point. I can't help but think of the number of young people in this province, many who live in congregated sites and in some type of continuing care, and the fact that one of the things when we were in government that I was proud to bring forward was a bill to ensure resident and family councils at all facilities that were providing health care services of some sort.

It really came from feedback from many folks throughout the province that there were some exceptional operators that were doing a very good job of making sure that the residents' voices were heard, that family members had an opportunity to engage and to give feedback and to be advisory to the operators of the facilities that their loved ones were living in. The operators that were engaging in that space were doing so out of probably a reading of evidence that showed that people have a higher quality of satisfaction in life when they feel like they are involved in making decisions about their home and also out of the goodness of their hearts, really.

There was no legal requirement for them to ensure that – sometimes these people were incredibly young, young adults, and sometimes they were quite elderly, but everyone deserves an opportunity to give feedback on their home, to make sure that their home is a place where they can feel a sense of pride and comfort and belonging. So I was proud that that bill came forward, and I believe that it ended up with support from – at that time there were multiple parties in this place, I think four, and I believe all parties did indeed support that bill. Of course, this is one of the questions that we continue to have: with the alignment of all these pieces that presently govern continuing care, are we actually going to see an erosion of some of those additional pieces that were put in place to ensure that the voices of folks who live in congregated care have an opportunity to give timely, ongoing feedback to the operators of their facility?

Some examples I'll share from my lived experience as a granddaughter of somebody who was in long-term care not far from here, the Edmonton General hospital. When my grandma moved into the General, it was a very, very difficult time for her and in turn for our family, because she was one of the toughest women you could ever meet. She was widowed in her 50s and continued to live on the farm independently. When my gido, my grandfather, went into hospital and was clearly palliative, that's when she said: "Well, I better get a driver's licence because I'm going to need to get in and out of Westlock to go visit him. I'm going to need to be able to continue to live on the farm." She wasn't going to let the fact of her life circumstances and that his life was coming to an end hamper her independence. You know, that, at that time, was not common for a lot of women, to have their driver's licence and be able to have that level of independence.

Then he did pass, and she continued to live on the farm and run the business of farming for many, many years. In fact, I believe she lived there for more years as a widow than she did as a wife, and to move from the farm into the city was a big adjustment for her. Thank goodness she had some time to adjust to condo living – I'm thinking about the last bill – but still was living independently. Then, of course, at a point she wasn't able to cook for herself in the way that she once did, and we needed to rely on the community supports of things like Meals on Wheels to ensure that she could have regular, timely meals, because not all of us were able to check in on her as frequently as she should have.

But there hit a point where both her body – it was really her body. She had Parkinson's, and she wasn't able to live independently in her own condo, so she moved into a lodge, right? This is sort of a natural step that – for those of us who are lucky enough to live well into our 90s, which my baba did, this is often the progression of care. But there hit a point even in the lodge – there was cleaning; there was cooking; home care came in to make sure she was taking her medication and to help her with morning and evening routines – where she couldn't get up on her own. She couldn't actually transition from bed to the walker to the dining room. I think there was one week where the ambulance was there every day and multiple times one day. It was very clear that it wasn't something that could be sustained because, of course, in lodges there aren't people who can provide that medical assessment and make sure that you haven't injured yourself.

She spent months in the hospital, and this, again, was when I was quite a bit younger. Well, I was an adult, but I was not the Health minister at the time. She spent time in hospital and eventually transitioned to transitional housing through Norwood and then eventually to the General, a difficult journey for a woman who spent most of her life living alone, continuing to farm, and caring for others, a very humbling experience.

When she did move to the General – and I want to say that the staff there, I think, worked very hard to, number one, care for the people and make sure that they're safe and that they're not being put at risk and also to make sure that they have an opportunity to continue to live there. I remember my grandmother saying to one of the care workers: I'm not here to die; I'm here to live. That was a really difficult day, I think, for all of us because so often when people end up in that highest level of care, highest level of continuing care, their time in those facilities isn't very long. But my baba persevered, and she continued to fight and lived quite many years. I think she was there five years at the end.

One of the things that I think helped her keep going is the fact that she knew that my mom and I were going to the resident and family council meetings, and this, again, was one of those facilities that was an exception, that didn't follow a rule but had set this up because they have hundreds of residents, and it was a way to help streamline feedback and shared processes.

There were simple things that she wanted us to communicate, like she didn't want them to bleach her blouses – right? – like simple things about laundry, something that she'd done for her whole life and taken pride in. She wanted to make sure that less harsh chemicals were used on her nicer pieces of clothing. She didn't want to have to downgrade her wardrobe because of the laundry provisions there. These are the kinds of things that – right now under the Resident and Family Councils Act we have an obligation for people to receive that feedback. In turn, we came up with a system where we'd have two different laundry hampers, and there was one that my mom and I would take home and the other one that the facility would deal with. We could problem solve some of these situations.

Also, there were many residents who lived there on the fifth floor who were Chinese and had Chinese news, Chinese television, and they wanted quality Chinese food in their long-term care, in the residence for the long term. They wanted to have good-quality Chinese food that was prepared locally. So giving feedback on the congee, giving feedback on the other dietary options that were available or not available was incredibly important to them.

Not everyone was a family member who would go. There were some people who were quite young, who had conditions like MS and weren't able to live independently anymore, who would go and talk about the types of quality social activities they wanted to have. Bingo wasn't high on their list of desirable activities, but there were other fun, more youth-focused socializing activities that they wanted to have available. So they were able to communicate that collectively through these spaces.

Some of my nervousness around this provision, one act to govern all care facilities, exists because of the severe needs that we see in long-term care and in dementia care specifically as well, that we are going to be governing under this blanket legislation that will probably bring things to one standard as opposed to differentiated care.

One of the things that – right now long-term care is essentially a hospital. It's governed by the Hospitals Act in a large way, and there are provisions for hospital care that the residents of long-term care are entitled to. For example, you do not pay for your medication.

It's part of the Canada Health Act umbrella of services that's available to you when you're in a hospital. So those who are living in long-term care have their medications fully covered while they are living there. That's not the case in other levels of care. Even if you're a senior and you're on the seniors drug plan, you pay $25 per prescription to receive the medication that you need to stay alive and to stay well.

Another big difference is that in long-term care there's a requirement for a registered nurse, essentially a charge nurse who must be a registered nurse, to be in charge of the provision of care. In large centres like the General there might only be one for hundreds of patients, but there is at least one because of how they are governed and how they are legally required to provide that level of professionalism and care, but it is not the requirement in other lower levels of care necessarily, Mr. Speaker.

Making sure that – I get that we want to have one bill to govern them all, but the challenge is that not everyone's needs are the same. Somebody who is in a level 3 facility technically needs to have a lower level of care and lower level of supervision and guidance. Making sure that we have legislation that differentiates for patient needs and those who are living in a higher level of care being entitled to the provision of medication and the provision of a registered nurse, I think, is important.

I fear, because most of this detail, the minister and others might say, will be ironed out, the fine details will be created through regulation, which means the government is saying: just trust us; trust us that we will make decisions on all the details that relate to this bill behind closed doors. I have to say that there is an incredibly low level of trust right now between Albertans and their Premier, between Albertans and the governing party, and this request to trust just isn't there. As members of Her Majesty's Loyal Official Opposition we have a responsibility to push for verification, because we do want to be able to trust, but it has been so significantly damaged by many decisions that the current government has made over the last three years.

Of course, health care has highlighted the lack of respect the current government has shown to health care workers as well as to those patients who rely so significantly on daily care, especially towards the end of life. I think about the number of people who have died in Alberta directly because of COVID-19, not even to think about all the indirect fatalities but directly because they had COVID-19, knowing that about half of those lived in buildings that will be governed by this legislation. About 1,600 continuing care residents, tragically, passed away from COVID-19.

At the very beginning you saw a significant call to action, and the government even did make some slight changes. For example, it took months, but eventually they said: yes, you should only be working in one facility; you shouldn't be working in multiple facilities. Of course, anyone who understands disease infection and how airborne diseases that are highly contagious spread – of course staff should only be working with one group of patients. They shouldn't be moving from facility to facility to facility. But because of the way so much privatization has taken place under Conservative governments, we saw that there were many staff, the vast majority of staff, working in multiple facilities.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I am looking for anybody to join debate on RA1. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre. Thank you for that.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to stand and speak to RA1 on Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act. I'm going to pull up that reasoned amendment here just to give myself a bit of a refresher on the specifics to which I am speaking. That the bill be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the government has not carried out sufficient consultations on the contents of the bill with families whose loved ones lost their lives from COVID-19 while in continuing care.

Now, certainly, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that Bill 11, as has been presented, is largely an administrative piece of legislation focused on consolidating bills and regulations, making a few administrative updates, taking what's been spread across a number of different acts and combining it into one. My colleague from Edmonton-Glenora spoke to that, raised a few concerns potentially with what could impact from that. Certainly, I would agree with her that we need to be careful that in consolidating legislation, we are not making assumptions that all kinds of care that are captured here under this act, this new act that's being created, should it pass this Assembly – indeed, we recognize that there are very significant differences between the different levels of care and certainly the needs of the individuals in between each.

Now, certainly, I recognize the importance, Mr. Speaker, of laying out a framework, making sure you get that framework right, laying your foundation before you begin to build. An excellent quote that I ran across just recently appealed to me very much, from a guy that's very much a systems thinker, author James Clear, from his book Atomic Habits: “You do not rise to the level of your goals. You fall to the level of your systems.” It is really important to get frameworks right, to get your systems right if you want to achieve your end goals. That is one of the things we have continued to hear, I think, from a number of Albertans and, in particular, in referring to RA1 here, where we're talking about the impacts on families who lost loved ones during COVID-19. Certainly, we need to think very carefully about the results we are getting and, based on those results, what the concerns are with the systems that are bringing us there.

Certainly, that was the focus of the review that went into this and the work that was done by government and the report that has come forward, making a number of recommendations on changes that need to happen within our continuing care system, the facility-based continuing care review report that came forward. Certainly, when we are specifically talking about families who lost loved ones during COVID-19, there are some very specific recommendations that came forward as part of the FBCC review that indeed are not represented in this legislation but that I think have a significant impact on the work we need to do to improve these systems.

Many of those, as my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora was speaking about towards the end of her remarks, have to do with staffing. Amongst the opportunities for improvement that were listed in the FBCC review was increasing the direct hours of care for nurses, health care aides, HCAs, therapy staff. Certainly, something I have heard from many, many people who have come to me with concerns about the care that their loved ones have received or situations that have arisen within the continuing care system are concerns about the number of hours of actual care that are going to individual residents and that in numerous situations, due to short-staffing for various reasons, whether that's due to some facilities that were looking to cut corners or save dollars or just whether that was due to pressures with, unfortunately, staff being ill and not being able to keep a full staffing complement, they found there were situations where indeed proper care was not being provided. There were not enough hours being provided for people to be toileted, for them to be helped with getting their meals, being helped with eating their meals, and that led to concerning situations for their loved ones.

Some of the other opportunities for improvement that are listed: improving mental health and wellness supports for staffing; increasing the level of full-time employment opportunities for some positions; enhancing the working conditions for staff, wages, benefits, workplace supports, training opportunities, and empowerment. That speaks directly, Mr. Speaker, to the topic of this referral amendment, which is saying that what we have learned from the COVID-19 pandemic and the effect it has had on the loved ones of many families in Alberta is that these have been some of the most significant factors and were exacerbated, highlighted during the COVID-19 pandemic.

Increasing the level of full-time employment opportunities for some positions. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we know that during the COVID-19 pandemic one of the biggest issues was that staff, as we've talked about many times in this House, who work in continuing care facilities often are unable to get enough hours or earn enough at a single job due to low wages, due to an unwillingness of some of the facilities to offer full-time hours. Then you're able to save money because you don't have to pay benefits. But that creates, in a situation like a pandemic, a problem because you do not want people working in multiple facilities when you have a virulent infection spreading in the populace. That's a very quick way for it to hopscotch, jump its way, between one facility and another, and indeed we saw that happen.

So steps had to be taken by the government. Certainly, it was an issue that we raised as an opposition a while before the government took action. It took some time for that to be implemented and put in place, but eventually that was one of the things that was arrived at, and as part of that, there was work that had to be done, then, to try to determine: well, how do we make these workers whole? If they have someone who has been working three part-time jobs and now they're going to be restricted to a single facility, how do we ensure that, in fact, they are going to continue to have the hours they need to be able to earn a living? Certainly, I think that is a very real concern, something that deserves to be considered, something that deserves action but something of which we see no mention in Bill 11. Indeed, at this time we have no indication of what the government intends to do in that regard or what steps they might take.

Now, the minister says that those are things that would take place in the regulations, and indeed the former Minister of Health talked about that being a process that would take place over the summer and would be coming back in the fall. We don't have much information on what the plan is there, Mr. Speaker, which is one of the reasons for the referral, to take the opportunity to better get a sense of what action the government intends to take on that particular point as it impacts very directly the experiences of families who lost loved ones during the COVID-19 pandemic and who are very invested now in seeing real improvements to the system so that others do not find themselves in the same position.

Improving mental health and wellness supports for the staff and enhancing their working conditions: two pieces that are very closely related, Mr. Speaker. Now, certainly, we know that these are very real and pressing concerns throughout our health care system, which continues to be under enormous pressure. Health care workers in general in our hospitals, emergency rooms, and ICUs across the system and our nurses, our doctors, our various care providers are exhausted after multiple waves of the pandemic and, unfortunately, many decisions by this government which pushed them to their absolute limits, the continual choice to act last and act least and the very real impact that has had on their mental health, their physical health, indeed leading to the critical staffing shortages we continue to experience across the system, including at times in continuing care.

Again, we're talking about this referral, saying that we believe that this should be set aside for a time and not proceed through second reading because there is missing here that consideration of these impacts for the families who have lost loved ones due to COVID-19 and indeed their advocacy for improvements in the system so that we can achieve the goals that we say we have set. Certainly, amongst them needs to be looking very closely at increasing the level of full-time employment opportunities, improving the mental health and wellness supports for those staff and indeed their access more broadly to benefits, which is closely related to the level of full-time employment opportunities and indeed wages.

Mr. Speaker, I recognize, of course, that this government has, you know, made great efforts to try to grind down wages for many health care workers. Certainly, we saw that with nurses going into the fourth wave, where the government was demanding 5 per cent wage rollbacks. Certainly, we've seen their position now with HSAA – respiratory therapists, paramedics, a number of others – demanding wage rollbacks of up to 11 per cent, but a failure to understand what is, in fact, here in their own FBCC review. I think it, again, pertains to this referral amendment. The fact is that if we are lowballing the wages of health care workers while at the same time grinding them down with the conditions, that is going to have a direct impact on the quality of care provided.

These are definitely, I think, serious considerations, and I think Albertans deserve an opportunity to have some discussion of that as we have Bill 11 here in the Legislature. Despite the fact that it is largely an administrative piece of legislation, I think Albertans are looking for a little more meat on the bone.

Again, we have promises of what's going to take place during the regulation, but I think that, as I and my colleagues have noted on many occasions, this is a government that has burned an awful lot of trust, particularly when it comes to the health care system. Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that when I'm knocking on doors, when I'm making phone calls, both here in my constituency and in many in Calgary and other parts of the province, this is a top concern for folks. When they tell me they do not have trust or faith in this Premier or this government, health care is at the top of the list.

I think we are simply doing our due diligence as an opposition here in putting forward this referral amendment and noting that there is work that needs to be done to earn the trust of Albertans, that the actions this government intends to take on, ostensibly improving the continuing care system, are indeed going to be substantive and are going to address these very real concerns that go to the heart of the issues in the system.

In general I would say that the treatment of health care workers in this province over the last three years under this government has been absolutely shameful. From doctors, who certainly are able to earn a reasonably good living and are in a position to be able to advocate for themselves – and they certainly have; they've spoken up loud and clear, you know, in terms of their concerns with this government – through nurses and other assistants down to these folks who in many respects, Mr. Speaker, are at the bottom of the system, have the least strength in terms of advocacy, have been the ones who have been least likely to have their voices heard. Indeed, many of them come from marginalized communities, many of them racialized workers, indeed, many of them of the sort who were misunderstood at times and blamed for the spread of COVID-19 amongst their communities when the fact is that they were put in a far more vulnerable position because of these many exact factors that were listed in the FBCC review report: the fact that they were precariously employed, that they were low waged, they had no benefits, were unable to get full-time hours.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, if we had a collection of race-based data here in the province of Alberta, we would have more evidence on that front about what those impacts were, as they have had from Ontario, for example, where they have passed such legislation. But the fact is that even without that concrete data, we are well aware, from speaking with those individuals, from speaking with the folks who are elected to represent them in labour, about what these impacts have been and what the need is. Indeed, it's right here in this report, but it is not anywhere to be seen in Bill 11.

I think what Albertans are looking for is the government to be very clear, as it pretended to be with the Premier's public health guarantee, as it pretended to be in a number of very bold promises but has utterly failed to follow through on in terms of being truly accountable and truly invested in actual work to support the entirety of our public health care system.

With that said, I think there will be much more opportunity for debate on Bill 11, and I look forward to more opportunities to rise.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members looking to join on RA1? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity. Just to remind, I guess, myself and other members of the Legislature, RA1 reads:

Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the government has not carried out sufficient consultations on the contents of the bill with families whose loved ones lost their lives from COVID-19 while in continuing care.

I certainly support this RA1, this referral, for that purpose, because it's important that we learn from those who have lost their loved ones, those who saw early on. We know that there's coming up to about 1,700 Albertans have lost their lives, have passed in continuing care, and the first and second waves of that pandemic in this province, not unlike its effect in other provinces, were devastating to those many individuals in continuing care. Mr. Speaker, that should be reason alone for learning more about what loved ones or residents believe should go into the Continuing Care Act, Bill 11, and to make sure that it has the agency and efficacy to ensure that the lives of people who are in those facilities are as good as possible and protected as much as possible.

In Alberta right now, Mr. Speaker, there are more than 33,000 supportive living spaces, more than 15,000 long-term care spaces, and there are more than 127,000 Albertans receiving home care each year. We know the ripple effects of lives impacted in Alberta and elsewhere by the act that's before us, that it will be bringing together several other acts and putting them in one place. We know that the lives impacted across Alberta of those 127,000 Albertans receiving home care, 33,000 in supportive living spaces and more than 15,000 in long-term care spaces – you know, it spreads out from there. Those individuals, I think we are arguing, would have a great deal to say about this act at this time and why they should be included in a further review of the results of the government pulling together and trying to modernize, to some extent, and trying to streamline and improve what's currently in several very dated acts.

The facility-based review of continuing care final report, we know, came forward on May 31, 2021, so approximately 11 months ago, Mr. Speaker. That review included – it, of course, had consultation as a step in the process to completing its report, but it also had 42 recommendations that would, as I said, transform and modernize Alberta's facility-based continuing care facilities. It would be useful to not only ask Albertans who have experienced first-hand the devastation of COVID-19 on their loved ones, but it would be useful to ask Albertans, now that the bill is before us: does it have the appropriate transparency, and does it have the appropriate legislation identified in it that will address the needs that Albertans know too well from their experiences with their loved ones?

You know, the impact of COVID on this province and the people of this province: some medical practitioners and others are saying that there's going to be a significant portion of Albertans who now experience long COVID as a result of their contracting COVID and having it in the first place. What will be the impact on our continuing care system? What will be the impact on our supportive living spaces and, of course, receiving home-care needs going forward? My suspicion is that there'll be more Albertans who go to those facilities or are treated at home for long COVID. That's another reason I think, Mr. Speaker, that we should have the opportunity to allow Albertans to come together to look at this bill in greater depth with legislators to make sure that we're getting this right the first time, because Albertans' health is too important to leave continually to updates or amendments or changes to the act.

We can deal with it – one of the challenges, of course, with the current bill before us is that much of it will be addressed in regulations down the road. I think that's a problem, as my colleagues have talked about already, that saying, "We're going to get this right" is not a transparent way of governing, Mr. Speaker. Saying, "Trust us; we'll go into the backroom, essentially work with bureaucrats and others to develop regulations that'll then come to the minister for sign-off or go through cabinet committee to get sign-off" is not an upfront way of dealing with probably the most significant issue that has hit this province on a health perspective ever.

9:10

I can't remember – well, you know I'm not old enough to know about the Spanish flu. That was in the early 1910s . . .

Member Irwin: You're not old enough?

Member Ceci: Yeah. Okay. You don't need to chime in about that one.

I've been in this province for 42 years, and there's not been a pandemic before in this province, so to kind of point out that we can't leave this to the backroom and decisions being made is, you know, just reality, Mr. Speaker. We need the opportunity for Albertans who have suffered greatly to talk about it, to work through it in terms of this bill and what it will do for future pandemics.

I don't know any province that has taken the opportunity to listen to their citizens around the impact of the pandemic on their loved ones and the ones who were lost. I think that's an oversight that needs to be rectified and can be rectified with this RA1 referral before us, Mr. Speaker, because "trust us; we'll get it right and everything will be better going down the road and we'll head off future pandemics by the new regulations that get put in place" is too much an ask for Albertans who, frankly, are concerned with some of the actions of this government. We know that, you know, steps were taken by this government to ensure that moving forward on a privatized agenda could take place.

A really critical person in the health care of Albertans was the CEO of AHS, and that person is no longer here. Right in the middle of a massive health issue that all Albertans and Canadians have dealt with and indeed, go farther, you know, a person who helped guide and address the needs of a significant area of our government, of over $22 billion, $23 billion expenditure, is no longer there to guide that ship. The government saying, “We’ll create the regulations about continuing care” and all those other things while Albertans have seen people like that kind of be shown the door is something that undermines trust, Mr. Speaker.

I think that Albertans are right to say that people need to be held accountable for these things, particularly in the long-term continuing care situation. What we saw was that residents and the families of residents aren’t able to take steps to do that as a result of actions of this government in terms of a previous bill that was brought in. To say the least, I think the government has failed residents of continuing care. We have brought up many reasons why we think this should be looked at in greater detail, but there’s been no interest, I would argue, from the other side of looking more deeply into that.

You know, the home-care situation is a very good one as well. Not only will there likely be greater home-care needs as a result of long COVID going into the future, but this government more than a year ago talked about putting more time and expenditures towards that. I certainly think that that’s the low-hanging fruit, Mr. Speaker, in terms of health care for Albertans. Well, prevention is obviously the lowest hanging fruit, making sure that Albertans know that they should look after their health care, go to see primary care doctors on a regular basis, take care of their dental, their other . . . [interjection] Yeah. Yeah. Just in kind of a holistic way look after their own health – that’s the best thing that can happen – and then follow that up when home care is required, that there be adequate home care to cover the needs of Albertans so they don’t have to go into more acute care. That’s something I think Albertans should have the opportunity to weigh in on as well and why this should go to a committee to have more sufficient consultation.

The number of hours residents receive in continuing care facilities and supportive living facilities is another thing the government talked about which I’m not aware, in this bill, actually takes place. We have to wait till regulations again. My colleague from Edmonton-City Centre talked a great deal about the situation with regard to staff working in continuing care or indeed across the health care spectrum and how the proportion of staff working full-time was, is, has been dismal in terms of continuing care, and it’s not only here; it’s across the system. I think you could probably say it’s systemic, and that needs to change, Mr. Speaker. The federal government provided some support to help that to take place.

I will, I think, get ready to take my seat and listen to other debate on this referral amendment.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members looking to join debate on RA1? I see the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has risen.

Mr. McIver: I’ll be brief, Mr. Speaker. I just was listening to the last speech and am a little bit dumbfounded. The folks across the aisle through the whole time of COVID argued against essentially every single decision that the government made, like everything that was done in the health care system was wrong. Then we just heard one of them stand up and talk about the former chair of AHS, who is a fine person, like they never did anything wrong in their life. I don’t know if that person did ever do anything wrong with their life, but the fact is that the same folks that complained about every single health care action and decision for two straight years now stand up, incredibly hypocritical, and talk about the person leading the effort on the health care side like they were perfect.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Well, Mr. Speaker, no one’s perfect, and the person leading Alberta health care at the time is a fine, good, and decent human being, and we should all thank her for her service, and we do. I just had to point out the incredible hypocrisy we just heard here after two years of complaining about everything that AHS did and then standing up here and complaining that the person leading that effort isn’t there any more. The hypocrisy is just way too obvious to ignore.

The Speaker: Are there others on amendment RA1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: I’m not certain I can follow the Minister of Municipal Affairs’ eloquent, lengthy comments on that bill, you know, but I do have to say that it is – I believe this is the second or third time that I’ve spoken to Bill 11, and my colleagues have raised some very thoughtful questions in this Chamber.

9:20

I recall, actually, the Member for Calgary-Mountain View: her introductory comments on this were quite thoughtful, and she’d actually done a very thorough analysis of the bill. You know, it’s possible that I missed the responses, but I don’t think we’ve gotten to hear from the members opposite on this bill, and I don’t think we’ve heard much in the way of answers to the many thoughtful questions that have been posed. Always the optimist; hopefully, we will get some more government members rising in this Chamber and sharing their thoughts, because as I said in my previous remarks on Bill 11, continuing care and the health care system more broadly continue to be one of the top issues that I hear about.

You know, I know we’ve said this many times in this Chamber, and we will continue to say it, but we pride ourselves on talking to our constituents and voter contacting and connecting with our constituents at their doors and on the phones and, as my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre pointed out, not just from our own ridings, although we all are spending a whole lot of time in our own ridings, but around the province as well.

I’ve spoken about how I’ve had the chance to knock on doors in Calgary quite a bit, and I’ll be back there on Saturday as well, talking to the fine folks of Calgary-East, I believe, and I’m certain that health care will be a top concern of folks there. It’s quite interesting. While our riding demographics might differ – I think of the time I spent door-knocking in Strathcona-Sherwood Park not that long ago or Morinville-St. Albert as well. You know, quite different demographics than much of my riding in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, yet the common issues transcend our ridings. Health care is certainly one, and I can absolutely say that continuing care has been something that’s come up at the doors, not as much as health care broadly or education, particularly curriculum, as I look at the Member for Edmonton-Glenora – I know we’ve heard that one a lot – but continuing care has come up.

As I talked about in my previous remarks on this bill, I’ve not had the opportunity as much lately, you know, given the pandemic and wanting to be safe with my constituents – I haven’t visited as many seniors homes as I would like, and I do miss that. I really do. I’ve always really loved connecting with seniors, and just some of – yeah. I just can recall, from not long after being elected, some of the great folks that I met in seniors homes, in particular seniors residents that I represent.

I shared, you know, quite recently that there have been continuing care facilities in my own riding of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, gosh, where the impacts of COVID have been really, really stark, including in the Chinatown care centre in my riding. I was actually just in the area not too long ago. I was at the Chinese Elders Mansion. If you’ve been in the area in Chinatown, the area I’m so proud to represent, there’re a few facilities there. They’re not all run by the same organization, but they're all in close proximity. I was there not long ago and just chatting – I actually just dropped off an Alberta flag because their old Alberta flag was quite tattered, so I was happy to do that – with them about how things were going there, and they said: yeah, it's been tough, right? It's been hard on residents not being able to see family as much and just the loss in the Chinatown care centre, in particular significant loss of residents. They have a lot of quite older folks, in their 80s and 90s, who we lost to COVID.

I can share similar stories from some of the other folks that I've chatted with throughout my riding. You know, the people that we lost in the area that I represent are just some of the over 1,600 continuing care residents that have passed from COVID-19. I've got those numbers from the end of March, so I would hazard a guess that those numbers are even higher now. This is why – I should mention, before I forget, to make it clear to the Speaker – we're calling on this government to take our advice and accept our amendment on Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, which will ask for Bill 11 not to be read a second time.

Our biggest concern about this bill, as has been well delineated by my colleagues in the Chamber tonight, is the lack of consultation on this bill and particularly the lack of consultation on the contents of the bill with families whose loved ones lost their lives. I would urge this government to go to some of the continuing care facilities in my riding in particular, you know, perhaps the Minister of Seniors and Housing. She was in Chinatown just – oh, gosh, time is confusing. When was that?

Mr. Shepherd: Yesterday.

Member Irwin: That was yesterday. Thanks, Edmonton-City Centre. Thanks for that. That was yesterday. My brain.

It was great to host her in my riding. We were at Dynasty Century Palace, and she was there from the UCP, and myself and my colleagues from Edmonton-City Centre and Edmonton-Whitemud were there from the NDP. You know, there were quite a few elderly Chinese members of our community there. I can imagine that many of them do live in some of the housing that I mentioned earlier, particularly the elders mansion, the Chinatown care centre, as a few examples.

As I said, again, we're always so happy to support Chinatown and to listen to our constituents. I've said this in the House a few times. A lot of the folks who own businesses and whatnot in Chinatown might live in other areas, but some of them do have elderly parents and whatnot who are in some of those facilities. I was mentioning not too long ago that I chatted with someone who'd lost her grandfather in the Chinatown care centre. She'd pointed out that, you know, yeah, he was old – I need to remember how old he was; I believe she said in his 90s – but he was healthy, and he didn't need to die. But COVID really swept through the care centre. I say all that context because I don't think she was consulted, and I don't think a whole lot of family members who lost loved ones to COVID were consulted.

We can see that in a few other pieces of this bill, and that's why we're urging this government to truly heed our advice. I've said this, you know, in my previous comments, that this government had an opportunity. I was talking with someone, actually, earlier who works with health care in this province, Friends of Medicare, in fact. I'm sure he won't mind me mentioning that I was chatting with him about a few health care issues.

Ms Hoffman: Say his name.

Member Irwin: His name is Chris Gallaway. He's the new executive director of Friends of Medicare, and he's doing a great job in that role. He's got a lot on his plate, I must tell you. He truly does. He came into that job with a whole lot to deal with. We were just chatting – important stakeholder meeting, of course – about some of the legislation in front of us today, and I pointed out that, you know, there are so many things that this government could be doing. They could be taking very much transformative action to improve our health care system, to address the funding gaps in education, to improve the continuing care system. Sadly, instead of doing that with this piece of legislation, it's very much a lot of administrative work that's been done. Oh, I just had the bill with me. But, you know, even just the title of the bill, the Continuing Care Act: someone might think that a lot is being done, but it's certainly not.

We're disappointed that when presented with the opportunity to bring about substantial change and to really, you know, transform a system that countless Albertans are telling this government needs improvement, they've chosen not to. That's incredibly disheartening. It's disheartening to us as the opposition, who've heard from families who've lost loved ones in continuing care. It's disheartening to health care workers in continuing care facilities.

I really appreciated – I always appreciate his comments because they're always so thoughtful – the Member for Edmonton-City Centre's point that, you know, many of these workers do come from marginalized communities. There's a large percentage of continuing care workers who are racialized women, many of whom would tell you, if they had the opportunity without fear of reprisal, that their working conditions are just dreadful in a lot of these facilities.

You know, this bill doesn't even – it doesn't even – fulfill the UCP's own promises from a year ago, which were quite a few, among which were increasing home care, increasing the amount of hours of care that residents receive, and increasing the proportion of full-time staff. It fails – it fails – to make substantive and meaningful changes when it could have done so.

The other big concern – we've touched on this a lot. As I've said many times in this Chamber, trust and lack thereof is becoming a consistent theme with this government. What this government is doing with Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, is that they're going to leave a whole heck of a lot to regulations, and they're asking Albertans – they're asking us, the opposition, but I'm more worried about Albertans – to just trust them that, you know, the changes that they want to make are going to be happening in the spring of '23 and that they're going to make the right decisions through regulations. We've heard that on countless bills already. I mean, I've only been an MLA since 2019, but the number of times where we've been told that things will be settled, figured out in regulations is quite troubling. So we cannot – we cannot – trust this government to just leave things to regulations.

Now, I know I don't have a lot of time here left, but I just want to quickly, you know, touch on the fact that there was – again, I remember my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View digging into this quite deeply, so for those of you watching at home, again, of which I know there are many, especially with that Oilers game raging on, do look back in Hansard and read some of the comments.

One of the big concerns was around the fact that this government has not acted on the recommendations in the facility-based continuing care review. We've asked multiple times – again, we've not heard answers, or at least I've not heard answers when I've been here in the Chamber – why they're not acting on those recommendations such as increasing the amount of home care provided; improving the working conditions, as we talked about, the often quite challenging working conditions, particularly in the midst of a pandemic, that those working in continuing care are experiencing; and increasing the amount of full-time staff. Hiring more people isn't necessarily going to fix all those working conditions, but it sure would help, especially for those continuing care workers who we are hearing from, who are just beyond exhausted – right? – and working unbelievable hours and, you know, multiple shifts.

We're asking this government. Will they – and this is why we'd suggest that they very much delay this piece of legislation. We're asking them to share the consultation report. What specifically is being supported by stakeholders? We've got a lot of questions, but we're not getting a lot of answers.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With that, I would like to adjourn debate.

The Speaker: Oh.

Member Irwin: That's fine.

The Speaker: We'll say the tie goes to the runner in this case.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 16 Insurance Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate April 27: Member Irwin]

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to rise and speak to Bill 16, which is the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022. I think it is worth specifying because we've had actually quite a lot of insurance-related amendment acts in this last little while.

What is this bill about? It solves a problem, according to the government, that actually does exist, and I think they are correct in this. I am not in any way challenging this proposition. The government says that it's challenging for certain companies in Alberta to obtain reinsurance, and this is due in part, I think, to oil sands companies being unable to obtain this type of insurance because of climate change. Now, this sounds a bit odd, but actually reinsurance – companies will buy insurance for a loss. They'll buy potentially excess insurance for losses over a certain point, and then they will buy reinsurance. The reinsurance is kind of the third level. Something really, really vague, really, really bad, really very expensive has to happen to get to the point where you're dealing with reinsurance. The challenge, as I understand it, is essentially that because potential damages arising from climate change could be so large, depending on sort of which way things fall out, it's difficult for these companies to obtain the insurance that they need. It is a real problem, and I am glad to see the government moving forward to solve it. I think that this is overall a good bill insofar as it goes. I don't think there are any major concerns.

Essentially, what the bill does is three things. It allows Alberta-based companies who have a captive insurance company outside of Canada to bring them home. So if a company that resides here has a subsidiary that does insurance but it's located elsewhere for various reasons, they can bring them home with no interruption in coverage, which I believe is called redomestication. So far riveting. Riveting.

It also allows Alberta to license stand-alone reinsurance companies. I don't think anybody really knows if this is going to work, but it is actually what I would say is sort of a genuine good-faith attempt to do this on the part of the government. I don't give them a lot of credit for good faith, so I guess I'll take the opportunity where it presents itself and list it here. Essentially, what it would do is allow a stand-alone reinsurance company to be created in Alberta, I think the hope there being that because it is primarily oil and gas companies that are having difficulty obtaining this insurance, that because there's a lot of capital floating around, they might bring that together and create a company. I would need to do a lot more research to say whether or not I would even want to hazard a guess about whether it'll work, but I think it is a genuine attempt to solve a real problem on behalf of the government, so good for them.

The third thing it does: it allows Alberta companies to access unlicensed insurance. The reason certain insurance is not licensed in Alberta is essentially because, depending on where the insurance company is located, if the insured were to have to sue the company because they decided just not to pay out even though they were liable for whatever reason, it would be very, very difficult to obtain such a judgment. Essentially, it's just sort of highlighting that an unlicensed insurer is unlicensed because the body here in Alberta doesn't believe there's sort of a really good way to force the company to pay out. It's not ideal insurance, but when you cannot obtain anything else in the market, it is something at least.

Previously the tax rate paid on premiums for that sort of insurance was 50 per cent, which is pretty high. This would reduce it to 10 per cent. So the idea behind charging taxes on those premiums is to sort of disincentivize the behaviour, to incentivize companies to use a normal insurance company if they can manage to do that. I think the 10 per cent is probably still sufficient to disincentivize taking unlicensed insurance over licensed insurance, so it's probably a good move again.

Again, most of what's in this bill itself, I would say, is a good move. It solves a genuine problem. I anticipate supporting it, but I would love to see the government approach the struggles of everyday Albertans with the same sense of urgency that they approach the struggles of large, profitable corporations. You know, this isn't the first bill we've had that deals with this sort of insurance. It's not that anything in the bill is bad; it's just that it's a really interesting signal of priorities. We have this coming through after previous bills that were sort of aimed at similar problems.

Meanwhile, you know, we have the government wanting to act on or claiming – claiming – that it wants to act on skyrocketing utility rates for consumers. The government announced a rebate on natural gas. As it turns out, that rebate wasn't coming forward for – well, at the time it was announced, it was months. It doesn't come in until this coming fall, so October. At the time it was announced, it didn't appear that the prices were going to actually reach the level that had been set. As it turns out, world events have intervened, and in fact gas prices have come up. There was some musing on behalf of one – it might have been the Premier; it might have been one of the ministers – about having that come sooner, and then someone else contradicted the musing, so apparently we're not going to see it until fall. It's a very slow approach.

Then we have the electricity rebate. The government announced it was going to do this, and then crickets; for weeks and weeks and weeks crickets. After those weeks and weeks and weeks of crickets we finally had an announcement. A bill was brought before the House, and as the bill was dropped, the minister said that Albertans wouldn't see the money in their pockets until June or July. The Official Opposition acted quickly. We drafted amendments to put a timeline in there to make sure that that money was getting to Albertans in a timely fashion, because it was an urgent situation for them. The government not only rejected our amendments, but the minister now likes to claim the fact that six days' – he said it today in the House, "six business days" – worth of delay is what caused the months and months and months of delay. I think that's pretty transparently absurd, but it is a little funny side note.

I guess my point here is that I would love to see this government approach the concerns of the voters in this province with the speed with which it addresses the concerns of large and profitable corporations. We also saw the government sort of race out the door right in its first term a tax cut to large, profitable corporations, and then it rushed that. In the first year, which was pre-pandemic, Alberta lost net jobs in that time frame. Not only did the proposed solution fail to solve the problem; things, in fact, got considerably worse. Having demonstrated that their initiative failed entirely, the government rushed to speed it up and did a 3 per cent drop in one year, which also failed to create any jobs.

In the meantime they cut a series of programs under the NDP that had sort of demonstrated histories of helping: the Alberta investor tax credit, some specific tax credits around the tech sector. Now, subsequently they actually brought some of those back while not having actually verbally admitted that it was wrong. I would consider that an admission that the strategy was incorrect.

But the point is that while all of this rush happened, we have them rushing to move tax rates for regular people but not in the same direction, so they will see an additional billion dollars from bracket creep, which is something the current Premier actually used to rail against in opposition in the federal government. I guess – well, that's some comment on what principles are worth to him. I think the general problem here, again, is not with the bill. The bill itself doesn't do anything wrong. I've said this about a number of bills. The problem is that it just sort of signals a set of priorities that I just don't think are the priorities of Albertans. I think that this government has a really big hurry to help those who have a lot of money, and they need to be in a bigger hurry to help those who don't.

With that, I think I will take my seat. I will say that we'll be generally supporting this bill.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has the call.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to my colleagues for the opportunity to engage in debate regarding Bill 16, Insurance Amendment Act, 2022. I want to take a second here. I'm going to directly connect this to debate, celebrate that we're tied up at 3-3 right now, and just say how grateful I am that Darnell Nurse was well enough to be back in the game tonight and, of course, has already got at least one assist.

How it connects to insurance, Mr. Speaker . . .

The Speaker: He had injury insurance.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you for that.

Yesterday's media coverage says, quote, as insurance the Oilers recalled Broberg from the AHL. But, of course, tonight he doesn't need to play because Darnell Nurse is back in. This is one of the reasons why it's so important to have insurance. It's not that you're planning on needing Broberg, but there are times where you might have to lean on a junior from the AHL to step up and fill that backlog.

I'm going to take a minute just to also share a story about insurance. We were talking about this with – of course, financial literacy is something I've been advocating for greater improvement in the curriculum for many, many years, Mr. Speaker, including the time when I was on the Edmonton public school board, so I try to take opportunities with the young people in my life to talk about components that relate back to financial literacy.

Mr. McIver: This just in.

Ms Hoffman: Pardon me?

Mr. McIver: This just in.

Ms Hoffman: Hmm. I'll look at it later.

I have to say that the conversation I was having with my niece and nephew – this was probably a year ago – around insurance: we talked about how you want to buy insurance for things that you can't afford to replace like your house, usually the biggest investment that most people make, your vehicle. Of course, related to that is injury insurance and the fact that you might be in an accident with another vehicle. Then we talked about life insurance, and immediately my niece said: "What does that mean? If my dad dies, I get another dad?" Of course, if your house burns down, you get another house; if your vehicle gets totalled, you get another vehicle. Then we talked about how, of course, no, she wouldn't get another dad, but we talked about the earning potential that he would have to contribute to his family over his working years and how that was something that they would need to ensure was there for them and their family to provide for their future if something bad happened to one of her parents.

I have to say that I think, as the colleague who spoke just prior to me has mentioned, there aren't a significant number of red flags in this bill, and that, for a change, makes us inclined to probably support it.

The government has taken many opportunities to – I think the only piece of legislation, which I will refer to it as, that's been changed more than insurance: well, for sure the standing orders have been changed far more times than insurance. They've been changed more in this sitting of the Legislature than, I imagine, probably the last five or 10 combined, so it's interesting that we continue to see additional changes to the standing orders and proposals around that.

Now, here tonight we are considering additional changes to insurance. I would say that one of the big things when people talk to me about insurance that they want to see, though, is that their bills become more affordable and more predictable. I can't help but be reminded of a conversation – actually, I think he just spoke earlier today. But prior to that the last time the now Member for Fort McMurray-Conklin – is that the name of the riding now?

The Speaker: Lac La Biche.

9:50

Ms Hoffman: Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The last time prior to this recent iteration of re-election that the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche spoke in this place, I believe his final exchange in question period was related to insurance and the fact that the policies weren't consistent for residents in Fort McMurray, but there were many different types of insurance packages, and sometimes neighbours living side by side who both lost their homes had very different coverage, and they weren't aware of the fact that their policies were that divergent.

What I would love to see in terms of insurance in this place – and I imagine the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche and others would probably agree – is more focus on affordability, more focus on comprehension and having consistent packages of services available for those who might need them as it relates to automobile, home, life insurance, and other major insurance products. Those are some of the things I would love for this Assembly to focus its time on, things that actually directly impact affordability and ways to make life better for everyday Albertans.

I don't think that this bill is problematic, but it definitely doesn't give me the kind of enthusiasm that I would have if we were actually addressing some of those significant root problems that people regularly talk to me about throughout the province of Alberta when it comes to what can be done to address insurance as we move forward.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The hon. Official Opposition House Leader.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to Bill 16, Insurance Amendment Act, 2022, in second reading, my first opportunity to address this piece of legislation. The bill primarily does three things: making changes to captive insurance companies, building off the changes that the government passed last year; it makes changes to allow Alberta to license stand-alone reinsurance companies; and it makes it easier for Alberta companies to access unlicensed insurance. Based off the debate that we've had so far, based off the support from the energy sector that we've seen for this piece of legislation, and based off the remarks and the research I've had the opportunity to do, it's my intention to support Bill 16 at second reading because of the three things that it is doing and the need for that given that Alberta is in a hard insurance market and that this change will bring Alberta more in line with other provinces and make sure that we can get viable insurance products easier for industry.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, I cannot rise in this place and speak about insurance in Alberta without talking a little bit about what I'm hearing from my constituents in Mill Woods, who are more and more struggling with the rising cost of living and the rising cost of their own personal insurance items. Now, in seeing the Insurance Amendment Act introduced and in considering it at second reading, which is looking at kind of the high level of this piece of legislation, I'm very disappointed that this bill does not do more to address what have been some very serious and expensive to Alberta families changes that have come about since the UCP removed the rate cap. We have talked about the cost of insurance rising and the impact on families in this place a number of times. In fact, it comes up during question period quite frequently, and it's certainly not something that the government is unaware of. When the Insurance Amendment Act for 2022 was introduced, I genuinely hoped that we would see more support for Albertans, and unfortunately it does not exist in this piece of legislation. What is missing – that support for drivers, that support for homeowners on their home insurance policies – is really incredibly important.

Now, we know that the government just recently released the superintendent of insurance 2020 annual report. It found that the car insurance industry was charging Alberta drivers $385 million more in premiums in 2022 than they did in 2019 during a time period where drivers were actually spending less time on the road. I would have liked to have seen in Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, something to address this – across Canada other jurisdictions were actually providing rebates to drivers – and to Albertans to help offset potential costs and to acknowledge that during a pandemic people in many cases used their vehicles less. Certainly, that wasn't universal to all experiences during the pandemic, but for many, many people it was true.

Here in Alberta, rather than providing rebates, we saw Alberta companies collect $1.3 billion more in premiums than they paid out in claims, boosting their profit margins and expanding their gross margins. Not surprisingly, this report was delayed, delayed, not released. We were told it was unimportant, that the information was available elsewhere. It was not. Then the report was dropped late on a Thursday before a four-day long weekend, which is a sure sign that the government is not that interested in Albertans noticing it. Unfortunately for the government, Albertans did notice that report. In fact, I was door-knocking just the week after – that weekend, actually – the report was dropped, and people were bringing it up to me on the doors, that they had seen this was happening.

Certainly, when I'm out talking to constituents and talking to Albertans in other parts of this province, affordability issues are absolutely the number one concern that is impacting their pocketbooks. We have talked about this as well, Mr. Speaker, in this House, but just recently we saw a report that said that Albertans say they're $200 away from being unable to meet their monthly financial obligations, one of the highest rates in the country. I think we need to think about that incredibly seriously, so the Official Opposition has called for a one-year freeze on car insurance premiums, something that would save Albertans $360 million on their insurance bills and take action to help fight rising cost of living. The government disagrees as we do not see that type of policy in Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, where it would have certainly been most welcome.

In fact, instead, we see last year's rates skyrocketing, in some cases up by 30 per cent. Even just this month alone, Mr. Speaker, we've seen five rate hikes, with Premier Insurance company going up by 5 per cent, the Dominion of Canada General Insurance Company going up by 5 per cent, Aviva Insurance Company of Canada going up by 5 per cent – that's just this month – on top of the previous increases that we've seen. While Bill 16 does not address rising car insurance costs – I wish it did – costs are going up for Alberta families as we speak in this very Chamber. So I'm disappointed that Bill 16 doesn't do more to address the very real concerns that Albertans are talking about at the doorstep and that the concerns of large companies, to my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View, seem to rate as a higher priority than the concerns of average, everyday Albertans, that the profits of insurance companies are ahead of the budgets of everyday working families.

We've recently seen numbers even in the budget documents, where based on the projections for revenue growth on the Alberta government's tax on car insurance premiums, Budget 2020 projects that Albertans are going to pay $891 million more over the next three years. That's accounting for inflation and population growth. That's a lot, Mr. Speaker, and that's on top of an Alberta public that – already so many of them say that they're $200 away from being unable to meet their monthly financial obligations.

These are serious topics, Mr. Speaker, and while I support Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, for the three things that it does do, I am incredibly disappointed for all of the things that it does not do. It does not support Alberta families. It does not address the problem that the UCP themselves introduced when they raised the cap on insurance prices that was put in to protect consumers. They say that insurance companies were leaving, except none had. They were about to leave, except none did.

Instead, we have Alberta families that are paying more and more and more each and every day, on top of, of course, the affordability crisis that we have with electricity and utility costs going up, food and gas prices with the inflation that we've seen, tuition – oh, my gosh; tuition is going up hugely – school fees, over and over and over, park fees. Each and every one of these things that I've named is a policy that the UCP government has changed that is making life more expensive for Alberta families. I haven't even talked about the insidious bracket creep tax changes that they've put in or Friends of Medicare and the important work that they are doing to advocate for Alberta families, because, of course, our health care system is being underfunded in so many ways, and our health care workers are stressed and have been carrying so much weight throughout the pandemic.

On this important Bill 16 piece I will be voting in support of the Insurance Amendment Act, but I had to use my brief time at second reading to express my disappointment in all of the things that the Insurance Amendment Act does not do. Again, to be entirely clear, Mr. Speaker, because this is what I'm hearing when I talk to families when I knock on their doors, it's a very real concern each and every day, and while Bill 16 is doing three very good things and it has the support of the energy sector and the voluntary reinsurance task force, it doesn't take action on what's most important to Alberta families. As a member of the Official Opposition I really just needed to make sure that I represented the voices that I've been hearing and the constituents that I represent.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this time to address Bill 16.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to join in the debate?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call the question.

[Motion carried; Bill 16 read a second time]

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, I move that the Assembly be adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, May 3, at 10 a.m.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

10 a.m.

Tuesday, May 3, 2022

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Good morning, hon. members.

Prayers

The Deputy Speaker: Let us pray. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideals but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 22

Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to move second reading of Bill 22, Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022.

This is part of our ongoing efforts to modernize the electricity grid and keep our system safe and reliable. It is also another piece in the suite of measures we are taking to ensure our system remains stable. If passed, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022, will help address the changing ways that electricity producers and consumers interact with and use Alberta's power grid.

It will encourage new investment in technologies and support the establishment of a planning framework while maintaining our overarching requirement that infrastructure costs borne by Alberta ratepayers be reasonable and fair. This legislation builds on some previous work that the AUC has been doing.

Madam Speaker, the reason that this work is necessary now is because Albertans have come through a period of high pricing on electricity. You know, it's at this point in second reading where I insert a trigger warning because we're going to talk about how we got here. Albertans have gone through four years of having the NDP use the electricity grid as ground zero for their inappropriate meddling in pursuit of their progressive goals, and that's what they did. The first thing that they did was that they got rid of coal. Don't get me wrong; please don't misinterpret. There is a need to decarbonize – we recognize that – but you can't swing the pendulum so hard that you harm Albertans. We need to find that right balance. Unfortunately, they didn't explore clean-coal technology. They didn't explore carbon capture. They just got rid of coal.

Then they ran the victory lap with their extremist environment friends, but they forgot to tell Albertans that they were going to be paying more for electricity. That was the net result of what they did. Before we started to see the effects of getting out of coal, we would see the price go up because we got rid of the cheapest form of electricity. We believe that we have to decarbonize methodically, responsibly, and that means moving at a balanced approach. We also know that the NDP spent 7 and a half billion dollars on infrastructure when they were in government.

Now, Madam Speaker, as you know, I am the first one that will be fair with the NDP. I will be the first one to admit that the NDP did not start the overbuild on the transmission grid. They are guilty of not stopping it. I am proud to say that our government has been doing the hard work that will bring forward long-term price reductions for Albertans.

One of the first things that we did was that we stopped the overbuild from happening. We put a stop to it, and I'm proud to say that in 2020 we only spent a hundred million dollars on infrastructure in this province. In 2021 we spent zero dollars on transmission infrastructure, Madam Speaker. Compare that to the 7 and a half billion dollars that was spent under the NDP. We brought significant changes.

The Alberta Electric System Operator actually released their long-term forecast. When you read that forecast – and I encourage everyone to read it if you're concerned about the price of electricity – they actually deferred a billion dollars' worth of infrastructure investment, Madam Speaker. I mean, I wish the NDP had deferred some of that infrastructure investment.

Now, in addition to delaying that, they also forecast that we will build between $150 million to $200 million a year in new infrastructure investment. Build-outs will have to be made. There must be current investments, but you must invest at the appropriate level that is sustainable for Albertans. You can't overbuild the system. AESO is forecasting $150 million to $200 million a year in infrastructure investments compared to the $7.5 billion that was spent under the NDP.

Yes, Madam Speaker, we are bringing forward long-term changes that will bring relief to Albertans. We'll be winding down the Balancing Pool as well, because, as we know, the Balancing Pool was allowed to be used to pursue the progressive policies of the previous administration, and they hung $1.3 billion on the ratepayer. Everybody can go to their electricity bill, look at the Balancing Pool rate rider, and we still have $700 million that has to be paid off by the ratepayer. That will take upwards to 2030.

The problem is that the Balancing Pool used to be a profitable organization. Since its inception the Balancing Pool has refunded $4 billion back to the ratepayer. For the NDP to lose $1.3 billion in four years is just incredible, Madam Speaker, so we must do a couple of things. We must NDP-proof the electricity grid, and that means taking organizations like the Balancing Pool and creating environments where they cannot be used to drive ideological, politically driven agendas to the harm and detriment of ratepayers in this province.

Madam Speaker, we are bringing forward meaningful changes that will help us modernize the electricity grid. One of the first things that this bill is going to do is bring forward self-supply with export. See, we know that the path forward for lower prices is through increased choice and more competition, so we need to create environments where we encourage more generation coming online, and that's exactly what self-supply with export will do. It will allow companies to generate electricity for themselves and then sell that electricity into the grid, and that, of course, will increase the supply that is available to all Albertans and then bring down the prices over time.

We are excited. Self-supply with export is not something that is currently allowed under current electricity legislation, Madam Speaker. This will not just help us bring down prices for Albertans, but it will also be an investment attraction tool. It will be one more thing – I apologize to the hon. member. Was that standing for an intervention?

Ms Phillips: No.

Mr. Nally: Okay. I thought it was.

Madam Speaker, this will be an investment attraction tool because companies will look to this as one more reason, not just our reduced red tape and our lowest corporate taxes in Canada, cheaper than in 44 U.S. states. They will also look at the investment attraction tool of being able to provide self-supply with export.

This has a number of benefits to the electricity system, Madam Speaker. We are also going to allow energy storage to come online. See, right now energy storage is not something that exists in our legislation. The AUC has been approving projects. I believe they've approved upwards of 14 projects. They are at various stages of approval or construction right now, but there isn't the legislative framework to support it, so they've been approved on a one-off basis. We need to provide a legislative framework that will not just enable and support those project but bring online new projects.

This is very exciting. As you know, the Canada Energy Regulator said that Alberta is a Canadian destination for renewable energy, and having a legislation framework that supports energy storage supports our leading as a clean energy provider, Madam Speaker.

Energy storage does a couple of things. One, it deals with the intermittency of renewable energy. As you know, there are some efficiency issues because the sun doesn't always shine, the wind doesn't always blow, so renewable is at times not the most efficient form of electricity. Storage will help us deal with that intermittency issue. That, of course, will help us have more generation that is going to be part of the supply mix that is available to Albertans, bringing down prices in the future. So we're very excited to be able to provide that.

Storage also is a nonwires alternative, and this is something that was not explored under the previous administration. We wish it had been. Had they used energy storage, Madam Speaker, as a lower cost alternative to wires, we could have spent less money on infrastructure build-out and not gold-plating it like the NDP did.

We're very excited about having the opportunity to have storage as a nonwires alternative. It may not be a 100 per cent replacement for transmission wires, Madam Speaker – in fact, we know that it won't be – but there will be cases where energy storage will be a cheaper alternative to costly wires. So we're very excited about having an opportunity to make that available to companies in Alberta.

In addition to those advantages, Madam Speaker, energy storage will also provide some arbitrage opportunities, and it will be an opportunity for entrepreneurial individuals to buy electricity during the periods of the day when prices are cheaper and resell it later on in the day, when prices are higher, helping provide more supply at that that peak time, which then, of course, is not just an arbitrage opportunity but will actually help bring down prices for consumers as well. So we're very excited about enabling energy storage in our electricity grid.

We will also be winding down the Balancing Pool, Madam Speaker. As I mentioned, the Balancing Pool is something that the NDP do not like to talk about. The Balancing Pool is, obviously, a conversation they feel uncomfortable having, and that's because they lost $1.34 billion on the Balancing Pool driving Alberta towards their progressive, ideological agenda, that just gave us one result, which is reduced reliability and higher costs. We see that through the $1.34 billion that they hung on the Alberta ratepayer, using the Balancing Pool to do it.

We know that we must NDP-proof the electricity grid, and that means winding down the Balancing Pool. The PPAs have expired, so there really is an opportunity, now that the PPAs have expired, to reassign many of those responsibilities and to come up with a strategy to wind down the Balancing Pool.

Now, as you're aware, the Balancing Pool still owes $700 million, and in addition to that, there are other liabilities and other companies that have signalled they may or may not sue because of what transpired under the NDP. Of course, we need to keep a shell of a corporation or a shell of an organization in place to manage those liabilities. You might want to refer to this as the hangover from the NDP. I certainly view it that way, Madam Speaker. If we hadn't lost that $1.34 billion, if we hadn't created liability opportunities, then we wouldn't have to keep it open through 2030, but we do have to keep a shell of an organization there to deal with those liability opportunities.

I couldn't help but glance over at the NDP, and they're all looking down at their shoes. Of course they are. They should be. They should be embarrassed, Madam Speaker, because they brought two things to Albertans. [interjections]

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader on a point of order.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise under 23(h), (i), and (j), specifically language to cause disruption. While the hon. Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity said that the NDP should be embarrassed, they responded, in turn, by saying: you are an embarrassment. I believe I heard it from the member from – there are so many constituencies over there. Just ramble off your constituencies. Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview certainly was one of them, and the former Minister of Education and current critic of postsecondary was another. I would ask that both of those members apologize. That is certainly language that is not parliamentary in this Chamber, calling someone else an embarrassment. Certainly, policies of a government or the previous government could be considered embarrassing. That is a matter of debate, but personal attacks are not welcome in this Chamber. They should apologize and withdraw.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. This is not a point of order. For the last little while, while I was listening to the minister, he has not said one thing that was relating to the bill or factually correct. It's not a point of order.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, I didn't hear the comments that were made in the accusation by the Deputy Government House Leader. However, if those were to be comments that were used in this House, it's certainly most inappropriate. Comments are to be directed through the chair. Speaking directly to a member using words like "you" is not welcome language in this Chamber. So I ask all members, whether they're heckling or speaking, to keep their comments directed through the chair and on topic.

The hon. associate minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you for that ruling, Madam Speaker. It's not even 10:30 in the morning, and they're already lighting their hair on fire.

The truth hurts, and facts are inconvenient, and it's unfortunate that this is going to be an awkward conversation. Make no mistake. We will debate this bill, and we will hear about the progressive government that preceded us that used the Balancing Pool to drive their ideological agenda and hung $1.34 billion – it's unbelievable that we have to have this conversation. It's going to be uncomfortable for them.

You know, there was a member of that caucus that was actually defending that $1.34 billion in the media. If you can believe it, Madam Speaker, that member was actually justifying it, saying that it was the right thing to do. [interjection] I think I just heard more defence of that.

I mean, talk about doubling down on something, Madam Speaker. To hang $1.34 billion on Albertans and then double down and saying that it was the right thing to do: I've got to tell you that there are 4.3 million Albertans that think otherwise. Not only that; that's probably why they got tossed aside in April of 2019. I would encourage the members opposite to participate in this conversation and to keep an open mind. But it is going to be difficult for them, to be able to listen to these accusations, because they did not do a single thing on the electricity grid that didn't result in either higher costs or reduced reliability.

Yeah, we're going to be having some awkward conversations. It's not even 10:30 in the morning, and this is only second reading, Madam Speaker. I'm sorry about that, but we were elected on a campaign to stand up and fight for Albertans, and putting in electricity legislation that will modernize the electricity grid: that is what Albertans asked us to do, and that's what we're going to proceed with.

Those are the three areas that I talked about: self-supply with export, energy storage, and the Balancing Pool wind-down strategy. We will also be putting forward a distribution planning framework, Madam Speaker, because planning and co-ordination are critical to ensuring the retirement of existing assets and that the addition of new technologies happens in an orderly, efficient, and cost-effective way. Competitive market forces will continue to be relied upon to develop many of the distributed energy resources, including residential, solar battery storage, and electrical vehicle charging. They are transforming the electricity sector on a global scale.

To ensure that Alberta's distribution system can effectively accommodate these changes, Bill 22 will require distributional system owners to prepare electric distribution system plans in accordance with future regulations. The act would also give the Minister of Energy regulation-making authority, which ensures government can provide further guidance around the planning framework as needed. Proactive planning of grid modernization will provide for better cost management to ensure ratepayer dollars are used as efficiently as possible and provide long-term savings. It is essential to ensure the system continues to meet the evolving needs of consumers in an orderly and efficient manner.

While the amendments are not expected to have an immediate impact on utility costs in the short term, Madam Speaker, they do set the stage for longer term benefits for all ratepayers and a more robust system. I'm happy to say that while we are doing the heavy lifting that's going to require us to bring down the cost of electricity long term, we are providing short-term supports for Albertans, like the electricity rebate, the gas rebate, and, of course, the 13 cents a litre that we paused at the pump. That's $2 billion worth of short-term supports to provide relief to Albertans.

A number of consequential amendments to existing acts are also required to support implementation, specifically the Hydro and Electric Energy Act, Electric Utilities Act, and Alberta Utilities Commission Act. Our approach to strengthening the electricity grid is measured, responsible, and pragmatic. It opens doors for new investment and limits the risk of overregulation and unnecessary red tape while ensuring that the regulatory regime remains responsive and appropriate.

Alberta is on the cusp of the greatest economic recovery that our province has ever seen, Madam Speaker, and it will need a modern and innovative electricity system to power that recovery. The Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act represents a step forward in creating that system. It builds on recommendations gained through extensive consultation with consumer groups, industry stakeholders, agencies, and investors, and it makes the long-term changes needed to create a stronger electricity system that keeps energy affordable and reliable for Albertans for years to come.

We've always said that the path to affordability is through increased competition and consumer choice. That is exactly what this legislation will do. I hope that all members support me in moving forward with Bill 22. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to be able to rise to speak at second reading to Bill 22, the guiding legislation framework for the regulatory treatment of energy storage. I'm going to begin my comments with – in any discussion of electricity anyone who purports to be part of a government that is full of adults in the 21st century begins their conversations about electricity with the statement that is very straightforward, which is that climate change is real. Decarbonization has as its anchor electrification in our current industrial, residential, and building processes and systems. This is the key and the foundation to how we become more resilient and adapt to the reality of the climate change that is already baked in to the atmosphere and how we mitigate our greenhouse gas emissions such that we mitigate further catastrophic climate change.

10:20

Let's start with first principles, Madam Speaker, because I believe that a responsible government starts with the reason why we might undertake a particular piece of legislative action. It is not to stand up and yell or to engage in unnecessary disorderly speech in a Legislature for one's own personal satisfaction. It is not, in fact – you don't even introduce legislation in order to, you know, get up and use inappropriate phrases, such as the minister just did, like "trigger warning," which is entirely inappropriate, and he should refrain from continuing to do it.

Mr. Schow: Explain why.

Ms Phillips: Rather, a government that knows how to govern itself and to regulate its own emotional reactions, which is a course of action that I would recommend to the other side seeing as emotional self-regulation seems to be a little bit difficult on the other side this morning.

Mr. Schow: Explain why it's a trigger warning, why it's bad.

Ms Phillips: We ground our conversations in electricity particularly in storage because this is a reaction to decarbonization, to the incredible amount of private capital that is working around the globe to, in fact, decarbonize our electricity system, being our lowest cost emissions.

Mr. Schow: You can't even explain why it's inappropriate. If you're going to say something, back it up.

Ms Phillips: If the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika would like the floor, he is welcome to it, Madam Speaker. I'm happy to sit down if he would like to provide his extemporaneous thoughts on electricity storage, but right now I have the floor. Thank you.

Climate change is real. This is the way that we ground our conversations in electricity. The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change released their Sixth Assessment Report, which was quite alarming, to the world in the summer of 2021. It stated – and scientists are not given, especially atmospheric scientists and these sorts of scientific experts, to unequivocal statements. Yet in the IPCC Sixth Assessment Report the first line is:

It is unequivocal that human influence has warmed the atmosphere, ocean and land. Widespread and rapid changes in the atmosphere, ocean, cryosphere and biosphere have occurred.

In terms of climate futures:

Global warming of 1.5°C and 2°C will be exceeded during the 21st century unless deep reductions in carbon dioxide . . . and other greenhouse gas emissions occur in the coming decades . . . Continued global warming is projected to further intensify the global water cycle, including its variability, global monsoon precipitation and the severity of wet and dry events . . . the ocean and land carbon sinks are projected to be less effective at slowing the accumulation of CO₂ in the atmosphere . . . ice sheet collapse, abrupt ocean circulation changes, some compound extreme events and warming substantially larger than the assessed very likely range of future warming cannot be ruled out and are part of risk assessment.

The risks are massive to our food supply, to our biodiversity, to our ability to be resilient to extreme weather events, to our infrastructure. We already have around the world millions of climate refugees, and there will be more. This indeed does present an existential risk to our children and our grandchildren.

Decarbonization, though, does have a great deal of promise and hope. There is opportunity as well. I'll read now from Wood Mackenzie, one of the world's largest consulting firms to the private sector on these matters. They say that electrification "enables demand flexibility." It indeed incents new economic activity in terms of "ecosystems of software companies [that] have developed to leverage . . . capabilities, connecting loads to wholesale and retail energy markets." It notes the great economic potential of energy efficiency, both in grid management but also in industrial processes, and it notes that building and transportation sectors account for 33% of global CO₂ emissions, making the electrification of those sectors key to decarbonisation.

In countries with sufficiently decarbonised power sectors, electrification not only directly reduces emissions through reduced fuel carbon-intensity but offers an array of benefits that contribute to emissions-reduction, [indeed] public health, and equity.

There is no question that fossil fuels will continue to play a role in the global economy. However, what we are seeing is that our lowest cost emissions are often in electrification of industrial processes, in buildings, and in transportation and that over time fossil fuels will become less of a combustion-related activity and more of a durables-related activity and CCUS will be undertaken in order to deal with the emissions associated with extraction.

Now, I have read from the overall scientific assessment and from some of the global economic assessment. I'll refer now to the American Securities and Exchange Commission, who just put out the proposed rules to enhance and standardize climate-related disclosures for investors. This came out of the American SEC a couple of weeks ago on March 21. These rules would provide investors with "consistent, comparable, and decision-useful information for making their investment decisions and . . . provide consistent and clear reporting obligations for issuers."

The SEC chair says, in a very key phrase, that our core bargain from the 1930s is that investors get to decide which risks to take, as long as public companies provide full and fair disclosure and are truthful in those disclosures . . . Today, investors representing literally tens of trillions of dollars support climate-related disclosures because they recognize that climate risks . . . pose significant financial risks to companies.

Assets managers representing hundreds of trillions of dollars have asked securities regulators for these rules.

Why is this important to Alberta, and why is it important to this bill? Well, there are trillions of dollars in the capital markets looking for a home and looking for investments that they can justify to their investors according to a climate-related disclosure risk that makes economic sense, and oftentimes those folks are looking for a home in Alberta. This is why Alberta attracted the lowest cost renewables in the price discovery exercise that we undertook through a contract for different procurement framework in 2017 and 2018.

Now, it remains to be seen whether that price discovery is required anymore. What is definitely required is regulatory overhaul at the AUC given the thousands of megawatts that are stuck in the regulatory queue of renewables projects looking to move forward. What is certainly required is the regulatory certainty provided under this bill, and it's too bad that when it was first introduced six months ago, that regulatory clarity could not have been provided to the private sector.

The other piece that power markets need most certainly is regulatory certainty around industrial pricing, and it is not helpful that the Minister of Environment and Parks will not sign the ministerial order and signal to markets on the industrial price of the output-based allocation framework until the last possible moment. But, finally, of course, he did in March, signalling the industrial price moving to $50 per tonne and the associated movement in the offsets markets. But there's no need for this kind of investment uncertainty, Madam Speaker.

I have made a case for why we are doing this: because climate change is real. Why else are we doing this? Because electrification is a big part of decarbonization. In fact, electrification forms our lowest cost emission reductions. Indeed, the coal phase-out begun under Stephen Harper, 12 of the 16 plants, and then with some community transition funding completed between 2015 and 2019: certainly, those costs per tonne of phase-out were approximately $10 per tonne whereas nearby, in Saskatchewan, the Boundary Dam CCUS project that has still not moved forward under its original promised parameters has cost taxpayers there in excess of $100 per tonne in abatement for abating the GST cost per tonne.

There is no question that electrification remains the nearest term, the quickest, and the measure that we can take often when we are doing things like retiring old coal plants, as Mr. Harper did in 2012 when 12 of our 16 plants were phased out. As the Harper government justified in their associated documents, there were hundreds of millions of dollars in avoided health care costs for people with various forms of pulmonary complications, heart disease, COPD, asthma, and so on. There's no question that there are also public health benefits to some of these electrification efforts as we move away from combustion and towards durables for the role of our fossil fuel resources.

That is how a government comprised of folks who understand what the problem is in front of them and what the lowest cost solutions for best economic growth are to address them – that is how a government capable of emotional self-regulation talks about a bill on energy storage and frames the challenges for the regulatory environment, for the way that distribution facility owners actually interact with the regulatory system, how, certainly, self-supply with export is handled in the regulatory system and the regulatory treatment for energy storage.

Now, energy storage can take a number of forms and is complementary to a number of different types of power generation. It is not just wind and solar although it is helpful with those particular sources of power generation. It can also very nicely complement natural gas plants, who don't necessarily, too, run all of the time. Certainly, large facilities are not as able to turn on and off as quickly. They are large plants, although they are faster than coal, certainly, and they can respond to peak in demand. But energy storage can also take the form of pump storage in hydro facilities as well. It can also potentially take the form of repurposing some of our oil wells for geothermal. There are all kinds of interesting projects out there, some of whom are attempting to get to scale, and lots of ways that Alberta can innovate and create jobs and use our natural strengths as an energy province to meet the challenges of the future.

There is no question that we have a number of challenges before us as a province. A report by climate scientist Katharine Hayhoe, that was commissioned in 2018 and that the current government attempted to bury upon its publication, indicates that Alberta very likely will experience "a 2°C [rise] in average winter [temperatures] and 1.5°C increase in average summer temperature." That is some time ago now, and climate models certainly out of the University of Lethbridge and elsewhere are actually now modelling higher summer temperature rises as a result of climate change. This is not something that we can just summarily dismiss as, "Oh, it would be nice to have a warmer wintertime," as I have sometimes heard the members, various people say, Facebook uncles, elected and otherwise.

You know, the fact of the matter is that this is very, very serious for precipitation, for food supply, for crop yields, for feed supply, for our livestock industries. You name it, Madam Speaker. It is deadly serious for those of us who will be on the receiving end of more extreme and severe weather events given Alberta's particular vulnerability to those and the vulnerability of our infrastructure.

Also, it's really important to ensure we have the right investment climate. So standing up and saying, "Oh, you know, the phase-out of coal," which was not reversed by this government – it was in fact introduced by the Harper government, which ought to be something that the House should look favourably upon given that the companies that it affected also supported it and have used the slight early retirement of those plants to invest in renewables. I'm thinking here of Capital Power and TransAlta, who have not only retired the remaining plants that were supposed to go beyond 2030 early but also made massive investments and enjoyed significant growth since those 2017 decisions – it's been a while now – in not only renewables here but elsewhere as well but certainly here in Alberta. Both companies have created jobs, they have created more shareholder value, and they have been able to meet the challenges of the 21st century.

In Alberta's deregulated electricity market we should be welcoming new investment in renewables and in storage and in grid upgrades and in better grid management for efficiency and so on. We should have an eye to the sophistication of what the capital markets and investors are looking for, not giving them, essentially, uncertainty when people come into this place, that is supposed to be a place of serious debate, and undermine the case for investor certainty in renewable storage, new natural gas, whatever the case may be, new innovations in hydro. Certainly, it does nothing to instill confidence in the offsets market, a significant measure of asset value on a company's balance sheet, as the TIER price goes up in accordance with schedule 2 of the federal Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, which was upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Madam Speaker, I am going to leave it to my colleagues to describe the various elements of this bill for the public and engage with some of the questions that we may have for government to reflect some of the conversations that certainly I have had with folks in the power sector, with industrial interests, with prospective investors in this province. I am going to leave those serious elements of the bill to my colleagues on this side of the House, who, in fact, are very serious about grappling with questions of electrification and decarbonization; so serious, in fact, that we have indicated a goal to move towards a net-zero grid and a goal towards working with people in the power sector, investors from all over the world and those here in Alberta, to get to that goal because we understand that it is urgent. It is necessary. Above all, it's real. We understand that on this side of the House as well.

We also understand that there are tremendous opportunities: economic opportunities, opportunities in the construction sector, engineering sector, software, data, artificial intelligence. All of those areas are captured by attracting new investment in decarbonization, energy efficiency, and the build-out of new renewables.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on the second reading of Bill 22? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to join the debate on Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022. Certainly, you know, on this side of the House we certainly think that this is an important bill, and we do support it. We know that there are four main areas that it covers. The first is about defining energy storage; second is self-supply and export; third is requiring distribution facility owners to prepare long-term distribution system plans; and the fourth is dissolving of the Balancing Pool. We take no concern with these aspects of the bill.

I guess, Madam Speaker, the key issue for us on this side of the House is just, first of all, that something quite similar was introduced about six months ago by the associate minister, and it was, for some reason, not followed through on, and now this similar bill is being brought forward. There's been a, you know, significant delay, over six months.

We know that this is a key, imminent issue in our society, on our planet, as was well articulated by the Member for Lethbridge-West. Climate change is real. We need to be working hard to make sure that we are caring for our planet and making sure that we are doing everything we can as a provincial government to make sure that we're being responsible regarding the environment.

You know, I just really ask, I think, a pretty straightforward question of the associate minister: what happened previously? What was wrong? How come that bill was never actually voted for and passed? And then: why was there such a long delay? As I said, this is a time-sensitive issue, and the quicker we move on it, the better.

I guess one of the things that we certainly do support is that we think that it's really important to add more energy to the grid, energy storage. We've been consulting about this extensively with people in industry, other stakeholders. Certainly, there are ways that we can achieve a net-zero grid by 2035 while creating 60,000 jobs, and if Albertans are interested in more details on that, they can go to albertasfuture.ca, because it does have our extensive paper regarding that and gives extensive details about that. You know, certainly, the NDP caucus is completely in support of this aspect of the bill and certainly know the importance of that.

But I guess the questions come with the delay, as I've articulated already, and also, frankly, Madam Speaker, just the competence of this government. Will they be able to fulfill on what they are proposing? Sadly, so many things, it seems, that the UCP does touch sort of end in disarray and confusion and back and forth-ing, so Albertans are left feeling that we don't have a competent government. Certainly, there are many questions about the leadership of the government, and I guess we'll know in a few weeks exactly who will be the leader of the government and by default the Premier of our province.

Certainly, Albertans have been loud and clear. I mean, I hear it, you know, every time I'm at the doors, when I'm talking to people on the phones, which I do extensively: Albertans don't trust this government, and they don't feel like they're stewarding the province in the best interests of Albertans. Certainly, there are some people who are benefiting, sort of a more elite population, but not the average Albertan. As I said, I hear this all the time, and I certainly can give many examples of policy concerns that I have and that my constituents have about a government that doesn't really care about the average Albertan.

This bill: while, you know, it looks good on paper, we just really want to make sure that what it says it will do, the UCP will be able to implement and fulfill on.

You know, we've had a pretty tough last few months through the winter of really skyrocketing utility costs, and that's really created so much chaos for many Albertans. Certainly, as the critic for seniors, many seniors are on fixed incomes, so if they're living in their own home, which most seniors are – the vast, vast majority live in private homes – that means that they've had these extremely high-cost utility prices. Of course, what did the associate minister say about that, the very real concern of Albertans? "The market is working. We don't need to do anything. Everything is fine." Certainly, for the seniors I've talked to, it made it impossible for them to make ends meet, going into debt, and when you're on a fixed income, of course, that can be very difficult.

The affordability issue. It's like the UCP don't really understand or seem to have any compassion for Albertans who are challenged by – you know, this is something beyond the individual control. That's the thing about government. Government is meant to actually support the collective of whatever jurisdiction they're responsible for. Of course, here we are in Alberta. We're a provincial government.

The price of oil is nothing that can be controlled. I mean, certainly when we were government and we had rock bottom – I think it was $26 a barrel at one point when we were government. The UCP at that time liked to say that it was our fault that the price of oil was that low, but, you know, we know that's not true. Certainly, now that they've been government – and, of course, they have quite a buoyant market right now for oil, but it is definitely nothing that they can control themselves. Certainly, individuals can't control that, so it's really important for government to mitigate, you know, to try to have the best interests of the population in mind so that they can help them manage that. That is a really significant role of government, to make sure that everyone is supported.

Unfortunately, the UCP perhaps – we could say that it's incompetence, unwillingness, disregard. I'm not quite sure how we want to call it. But it seems like for certain people in our province, certain groups, they are vastly supported, and others are forgotten. I mean, I could happily list so many examples of the incompetence of this government. We know, I think, this fiasco with the high cost of utility bills and them saying, "We're not going to do anything; the market is working; don't worry about it" and then deciding, "Okay; yes, it is so concerning; we will do something," but then it's like a minuscule response, $50 rebates to a maximum $150, when people's bills are $400, $500, $600, even more. That's, you know, really a drop in the bucket, Madam Speaker. It's not much help for people.

Then there's always the question of when. When is it going to come into Albertans' pockets? We still don't know that. Albertans need support now. It seems like the UCP is really dragging their feet on this issue. Then that is a question of whether the government is competent, whether they can manage this, and really, you know, support the best interests of Alberta.

I mean, I did bring up seniors just a moment ago because I think that they're a particularly vulnerable population in this regard. Oftentimes being retired, they're on fixed incomes. So this extraordinary increase – and perhaps it's not going to be extraordinary anymore; it might be the way it's going to be going forward – makes it very difficult for them to be able to manage that. We know that the affordability of so many things has gone up, and a lot of it has directly to do with the policies, the decisions of the UCP government. You know, we could identify insurance. Certainly, the removal of the cap means that individual Albertans are paying much, much more, and we know the price of groceries is skyrocketing.

Guess what else is happening, in turn, when that goes on? This is directly the policies of the UCP government. They deindexed the Alberta seniors' benefit. This is for low-income seniors. This is a little bit of income support for them on a monthly basis, especially with the skyrocketing inflation rates. They don't get that bump. That helps them have the same earning power they did the previous year. Things cost more, you know, inflation, so it should be indexed to inflation. But the UCP have wilfully decided that, no, seniors shouldn't have that money, and that means that sometimes they get pushed further behind. They may not be able to pay their bills. They may go into debt. It could really diminish their quality of life. They're able to connect less.

That was definitely a policy of the UCP government that is beside sort of these extraordinary situations on the global front. There are some real policies the UCP could do things differently on, so they're accountable for that. They're really ignoring this population in Alberta, seniors, for sure. We know that one of the first things they did, too, was cut the Alberta Seniors Advocate office, which was an office that supported seniors to navigate public programs, help them overcome issues that they might be having. You know, let's face it, our government system is complex, and it made a big difference. Certainly, that's one of the major issues that I hear about, that seniors feel abandoned by the UCP, that they're not focusing on their particular interests or supporting them.

Another thing, too, is that they've cut grants to nonprofits which, you know, seniors need in order to be connected. We know that's all really very important for the mental health of people. We need to be connected. Oftentimes we do that through our workplace, but when you're retired, there need to be other mechanisms in society to connect. But those grants have been cut by over $1 million.

These are just further examples of the UCP not caring about affordability and some concerns about, certainly, the incompetence of this government before us. Bill 22: we certainly hope that it will be implemented in an appropriate manner and that we can count on this to be sustained and that it will support our system here in Alberta and make a big difference for us over many, many years to come. We want to make sure that, you know, we have a stable system so that we can be confident we'll have the energy when we need it, and if we can store energy, that can mitigate times when we won't have perhaps as much access.

These are good steps forward, but we want to make sure that it's done well, of course. You know, there are just some things that we don't know what's happening behind the scenes on, so that question that I mentioned already about – a similar bill was introduced six months ago. How come that bill didn't go forward, and why was there that delay? I mean, it would be great if the associate minister could explain that to us, and that would make a big difference to sort of understanding where this has come from.

We certainly want to make sure that the UCP is going to be able to, you know, fulfill on what the vision is for this bill. As I've said already, certainly we in the NDP feel that we can achieve a net-zero grid by 2035, and if Albertans chose us in the next election, we would certainly work very hard to make that happen and fulfill that commitment because we know how important it is and we know how essential it is for us in the long term.

With that, Madam Speaker, I will end my comments.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Yes. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to be here today and talk about Bill 22. Before I get started, I just want to talk about that amazing sports battle that is happening, that I know everyone in the province is paying attention to this week. I'm happy to say that the Spruce Grove Saints are tied with the Brooks Bandits for the AJHL championship. I know they're playing tonight. I just want to recognize them real quick.

As my colleagues know, I'm the parliamentary secretary for Energy, so when this bill came across my desk, I knew I had the opportunity to share just how beneficial it would be for all Albertans. Energy is a topic very close to my heart and something I'm very passionate about, and I wouldn't be standing here speaking on Bill 22 if it wasn't. You know, as I've mentioned many times in the House before, one of my first jobs out of high school was in energy and oil exploration. I spent many years working out at the power plants west of Spruce Grove, both at the K3 expansion in 2007 and the G3 expansion in 2004, so a long history working at power plants and in the energy industry here in Alberta.

The electricity statutes amendment act is going to make long-term changes to help keep electricity safe, reliable, and affordable for Albertans in the years to come. As we all know, many have voiced concerns, starting with the costs of electricity prices over the winter months, and like every Albertan, we know just how high those bills can get when the temperature dips below zero. But electricity is more than heat in our homes. It's a necessity that we use every day, from the moment we wake up to when we go to sleep at night, when we use it to drive our cars or sit at home and watch TV with our families. It's such a key item in the modern world that most of us don't even consider how reliant we are on it. We all need to do everything we can to make sure that this resource is available for use in the long term.

That's why Bill 22 is needed. It'll encourage the adoption of new technologies and create a planning framework to improve distribution while making sure the infrastructure costs for Alberta ratepayers are reasonable and fair. These proposed amendments would enable energy storage, allow more self-supply and export, improve future distribution and system planning, and begin winding down the Balancing Pool by redistributing its remaining responsibilities and laying the groundwork for its dissolution in the coming years.

These changes will help Alberta's electricity system meet the evolving needs of consumers and create a low-carbon future through investment from industry rather than costly subsidies from taxpayers. How are we going to do that, Madam Speaker? I know you're wondering. Well, the electricity statutes act includes four key initiatives to meet those goals. As mentioned, they include energy storage, self-supply with export, distribution policy, and Balancing Pool distribution.

Energy storage gives consumers the ability to retain surplus energy for later use. We've seen a massive rise in these types of projects in the province as more Albertans try to understand the importance of using electricity responsibly and efficiently. Energy storage is an evolving technology, with potential benefits for all aspects of Alberta's electric energy system. Energy storage has many different attributes and, depending on the application, may look like generation, load, transmission, or distribution.

Another aspect of this amendment is self-supply with export. If enabled, any developer who gets approval from the Alberta Utilities Commission could generate electricity for their own use and then export it to the grid. Now, this would help make sure that transmission system costs are balanced, and I know that's what all Albertans are wanting.

Alberta's current policy framework does not require distribution companies to proactively plan for the adoption of distributed energy resources, but proactive planning and co-ordination of grid modernization could provide for better cost management and long-term savings for taxpayers. When it comes to distribution policy, Bill 22 will require owners to prepare plans for the Minister of Energy, where the ministry will be able to provide some guidance on the initiative and its planning process.

Proposed changes to the Balancing Pool dissolution mean the administration of the small-scale generation program would be assigned to the Alberta Electric System Operator. It would also mean that admin for the pilot program and any revenues would be transferred to Treasury Board and Finance, with funding of the Utilities Consumer Advocate facilitated by the AUC. The Balancing Pool would also wind down once it has completed its remaining responsibilities.

Madam Speaker, the proposed legislative amendments will help build investor confidence in Alberta's electric grid and support a modern and innovative system. This legislation was developed with input from a wide range of stakeholders, including consumer groups, and builds off legislation tabled last fall. After the legislation was tabled, this government received questions from some stakeholders on the implementation of the bill. Now, instead of rushing the process, the ministry took the time to speak with stakeholders and come up with a better plan when it comes to Alberta's energy future. This choice was made to balance the needs of job-creating industries and the well-being of the Alberta ratepayers nearby.

Now, this bill does the right balance of protecting Alberta ratepayers and the job-creating industries they rely on, and I thank the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity for bringing it forward. Bill 22 will allow new technologies to modernize our grid and keep electricity affordable in the long run.

With that, Madam Speaker, I'd like to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 21

Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to move second reading of Bill 21, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

Bill 21 continues to build upon the significant progress this government has made in reducing red tape for Albertans and Alberta businesses. In 2019 we committed to reducing red tape by one-third by 2023. Since that time we've removed thousands of burdensome regulatory requirements and saved Albertans, Alberta businesses, and other organizations millions of dollars. We've also removed or streamlined administration and processes that were outdated or duplicative while improving access to government services through digitization and innovation. Meanwhile we've helped speed up regulatory approvals to help businesses do what they do best: innovate, create jobs, and grow the economy.

This important work has been guided by specific recommendations of everyday, hard-working Albertans and the province's businesses and industries. Through the work of our nine industry panels we've benefited from the knowledge of experts in the province's key economic sectors, including agriculture, forestry, construction, oil and gas, industrial manufacturing, chemical manufacturing, tourism, nonprofit, and small business. We've also heard from hundreds of Albertans who shared their ideas through our cut red tape website on specific areas where improvements can be made. As a result, Bill 21 focuses on key legislative amendments that help enable common-sense change.

This is our government's sixth red tape reduction bill and the most comprehensive to date. Bill 21 proposes amendments to 15 pieces of legislation across nine different government ministries. This includes supporting small business by enabling the creation of intermunicipal business licences, making it easier for, say, a food truck operator in Blackfalds to serve customers in Lacombe or for a photographer in Calgary to shoot pictures in Okotoks, all without the administrative burden of obtaining licences from all of the municipalities in which they want to do business. Of course, I use these place names as examples; municipalities will have the freedom to choose to offer these licences.

We're also helping municipalities move forward with economic development and revitalization. By speeding up the review and approval processes for municipal community revitalization levy bylaws, freeway designations, and new freeway access locations, communities can get on the road to economic growth sooner.

Bill 21 offers even more support to rural Albertans and rural businesses by increasing the sustainability of rural utilities. Proposed changes would allow rural electrification associations, or REAs, to purchase one another and allow rural utilities to add new lines of potential business, all of which helps to support the long-term sustainability of REAs while enabling economic opportunity and diversification in Alberta's rural communities.

We are also modernizing land surveying, saving time and money for surveyors and their clients, and we are encouraging investment by updating legislation around governing co-operatives. Changes would allow co-operatives to choose the most qualified people for boards of directors and support modern approaches to communications and operations.

Other changes in the bill will remove onerous requirements that Albertans, Alberta businesses, or other organizations must follow and replace them with more flexible and common-sense ways of regulating. For instance, is it common sense to require the Fort Edmonton Park heritage railway to operate under the same set of rules as industrial railways that interline with CN? Of course not. That's why we're allowing Alberta's heritage railways to operate under alternative rules that are better tailored to the needs of each operator while still ensuring railway safety.

We are also allowing for more tailored regulations relating to recreational activities on Crown land by enabling the development of area-specific rules and regulations that reflect local needs and conditions. These changes replace the current one-size-fits-all approach while protecting these important areas for future generations.

These amendments are about looking to the future and making changes to support growth and adapt to a changing world. That's why we're proposing changes that would allow pharmacy operators to be more responsive to evolving needs and circumstances by enabling the Alberta College of Pharmacy to create and enforce standards of practice addressing specific areas of pharmacy operations. These new standards could be readily adapted to meet the changing needs of patients and to respond to major issues and events such as natural disasters, pandemics, and drug shortages.

We continue to recover from the pandemic. We are applying learnings to support Albertans and Alberta businesses. For instance, we know that electronic and virtual options for doing business worked well when we had to work from home and practise physical distancing, so livestock owners and veterinarians will now be able to report animal diseases to government by e-mail while Alberta's landlords will be able to use e-transfers to return security deposits to tenants. These may seem like small changes, but they make a big difference in the lives of everyday Albertans.

Additionally, we are clarifying some areas where we do need to regulate by making our legislation clearer and easier for Albertans to understand and follow. This includes ensuring that municipalities and school boards have a clear set of rules and legislation that ensures the protection of personal information of local election candidates and campaign donors, and we are making it clear that Alberta foster parents can exercise their right to appeal government decisions affecting their foster home licence.

We are also making legislative changes to enable regulations to help our accredited publicly funded private schools and private early childhood services operators by eliminating one specific additional schedule that independent schools submit. Going ahead, parents and government will receive reporting of a school's public and private dollars through audited financial statements, and we are extending the Minister of Education's authority to improve spending of reserve funds by school boards from September 1, 2022, to September 1, 2023.

Madam Speaker, these are significant amendments we are proposing that will reduce red tape in the province even further, continuing to make life better for Albertans and Alberta businesses.

I hereby move second reading of Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on second reading of Bill 21? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's an honour to rise on Bill 21, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. As we just heard in comments from the associate minister of red tape, we are dealing with a bill touching on many different issues, about 16 sections in this legislation amending 16 different acts. I would begin, I suppose, by stating that while there are certain pieces within this legislation, certain amendments to acts, that I see myself very likely being able to support, unfortunately there are other pieces contained in this legislation that I feel the complete opposite on.

It takes me back to a point, which has been raised time and time again in this Legislature, that when we are seeing such consequential changes or amendments to legislation, it's unfortunate that we see time and time again from this government a willingness where, instead of seeing the appropriate minister responsible for these amendments coming forward to put them forward to the Legislature, we are seeing omnibus legislation being put forward by the associate minister of red tape. It truly is unfortunate because many of the consequential amendments that we see in this legislation should have an opportunity for fulsome debate in this Legislature one by one, and we should have the opportunity to vote on each of those pieces one by one. Instead, we are being asked by this associate minister and this government to accept them as a whole, which is a deeply flawed system, in my opinion.

You know, when we look at the 16 sections that are being amended in here, just in terms of the differences in ministries and how they might affect our community, a few examples: from the Animal Health Act amendments to the Municipal Government Act to the Education Act to the Public Lands Act to the Rural Utilities Act. I mean, these are issues that are in no way connected, for the most part, Madam Speaker, and again it's truly unfortunate that instead of having the opportunity to debate each of these amendments or each of these acts by themselves, we are being asked to accept them wholesale.

Again, many of these amendments are administrative. In some respects I see myself being able to accept some of the amendments that are being proposed, and in some cases they are good amendments. But, on the other hand, again, when we look at changes to the Education Act that are being put forward in here, which has been a truly interesting debate to follow in itself, with the amendments that are being proposed to the Education Act in this legislation, it seems that the associate minister of red tape and the Education minister are on quite different pages in terms of their messaging, in terms of how they believe it's going to affect the Education Act and the reporting of tuition specifically for private schools in our province. For that point alone it raises red flags, and it raises many concerns because we find ourselves with a government that is unable to even co-ordinate between the associate minister of red tape and the Education minister to be able to explain to Albertans truly what these changes are going to mean.

Again, specifically when we're looking at the Education Act, I would say that many Albertans are confused because the Minister of Education is claiming again and again that audited statements, including tuition fees, would be required and that they would be reported to the public whereas the opposite was said by the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction. I think that we've raised this concern in the Legislature previously or maybe in the public that we need to be able to fully understand the changes that are being proposed and that we need to, I guess, have certainty that these reporting requirements as well as the ability of Albertans to see this information are still available to them. If that's not the case, I'm not sure how this government can try to claim that this is about accountability when it comes to changes to the Education Act because it certainly doesn't seem to be the case from what we can see.

I think that there is a piece regarding amendments to the Rural Utilities Act which I find very interesting as the critic for Service Alberta. Obviously, there have been many conversations about the need for expanding broadband Internet across the province. That has been a very important topic for Albertans over the last many years, so I think it's interesting to see the amendments that are being proposed through Bill 21 regarding, first of all, the ability of rural electrification associations to purchase other REAs. I would be interested to find out what consultation the government has done on that and what they heard, what feedback they gathered that made them believe that this was, first of all, an issue that needed to be addressed as well as that this was the right path forward for addressing that issue.

There is another point on this specific issue in subsection (5) regarding rural utility associations being able to expand their scope to include other lines of business such as fibre optic. I think that this is a very interesting conversation as we have been consulting on Internet connectivity and bridging that digital divide. This is an opportunity, Madam Speaker, that has come up again and again, that associations, specifically regarding rural utilities, have come forward saying that, you know, these are the associations that helped power this province in the first place and that they feel they have the opportunity or the right people and understandings in place to be able to expand that to support bridging that digital divide.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I think this is a very interesting point, and I would hope, again, to hear the conversations that the government has had on this issue and how they expect that to be moved forward, if they do see a vision for including these associations in the expansion of rural connectivity or Internet connectivity across the province, if they are in discussions to ensure that those associations have an opportunity to be a part of the expansion of those services. I think that is a great idea and a great opportunity, so I would be very hopeful that those consultations are ongoing and would want to find out exactly what that consultation process looked like as well as when we can expect the regulations regarding this specific topic to be released.

Now, when it comes to the issues that we are seeing regarding the opportunities that are being provided to expand ministerial power for the environment minister specifically on amendments to parks, again and again we've heard in this House and from the public that Albertans do not trust this government and, specifically, this minister when it comes to changes to public lands and the management of them. We've seen this minister, first of all, tell Albertans one thing and make decisions that are contrary to what those initial comments were from the minister. We know this specifically on the K pass decision, charging Albertans to access our beautiful province, which has been a completely unfortunate turn of events from what the environment minister originally told Albertans and proposed. Unfortunately, Albertans, again, cannot trust this minister on issues of public lands and protecting our parks across the province, so as we see this legislation proposing to expand the powers of the minister to provide exemptions on these public lands, I am deeply concerned about this.

The associate minister of red tape made it sound like it was a good decision, that it was going to make things easier, but unfortunately it seems that, you know, based on the conversations that the environment minister has put forward regarding the issue at hand, the powers that are being proposed through this legislation are expanding much more than what is necessary. Whenever the government, whether it be this one or any other government, proposes that the minister should have expanded power, I think that Albertans should be deeply concerned. I think that we in the opposition have seen this happen already, and in many cases it is consequential to the accountability of that minister as well as to the transparency to all Albertans, so that will continue to be a concern for us.

On the other hand, we heard the associate minister name a couple pieces of amendments within the legislation that very well could be beneficial. I think we see changes to the Municipal Government Act that are positive in many cases, making it easier to license across municipal boundaries if desired. I think that we in the opposition are likely to support changes like that as well as some of the other administrative changes that we see regarding the MGA in this legislation.

But again, Mr. Speaker, we have this government come forward to the Legislature with massive omnibus pieces of legislation that in this case affect 16 different pieces of legislation, in many cases moving things that are currently legislated into regulations and being asked by the government to just trust them. But whether it's on provincial parks or public lands, whether it's on consequential amendments to the Education Act, we simply cannot trust this government when they're asking us to give them more power to make decisions to make things like tuition for private schools less transparent, to provide the opportunity to the environment minister to make specific exemptions without coming to this Legislature. There are many reasons to be deeply concerned about this legislation, to believe that it is truly flawed simply on the fact that it is reducing transparency in many cases.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I do not see myself being able to support this legislation. There are too many questions that are left, which is exactly why the ministers themselves should be bringing this forward. We should be able to have debates on each of these changes that are being proposed, especially when some of these changes are so significant. Again, while there are some administrative changes that are within this legislation that I could see myself supporting, unfortunately overall I will not be able to support Bill 21, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others on Bill 21? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 21, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, a very comprehensive bill in that it does amend a significant number of pieces of legislation. I will walk my way through it. I have some questions that I hope the minister or ministers can answer regarding some of these changes that are being made, of course, fair questions as far as who's been asking specifically for certain changes and who's been consulted.

I appreciate that the minister in her opening comments had talked about speaking with many different business leaders and industry experts. My hope is that the Chamber and Albertans can get a little more detail as far as: who are some of those groups who are asking for the changes, and what are the proposed benefits?

Broadly, when I look at this bill, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of changes being made to pieces of legislation where different laws or rules are being pulled out of the legislation and put into regulation. I don't see a significant red tape reduction in moving it. I guess if you consider democracy red tape, then, of course, cabinet can much more efficiently and quickly make decisions without having to bring it through the Chamber.

My comments will make a little more sense as I go through the individual pieces of this. Again, you know, I would love to see – and I don't know if the minister or her ministry or working with the Ministry of JEI can do some modelling or has the figures on some of the proposed job numbers from some of these changes. How many jobs will be created? I appreciate that for some of this there may be some savings for businesses, but I, again, would love to hear more of the specifics, which, I would imagine, the ministries would have brought forward to the associate minister when they brought it.

Now, you know, critics or skeptics of this government could make the comment that possibly the UCP is moving a number of important pieces of legislation into regulation to avoid accountability. It's possible. Again, it's possible, and I know that that has been a comment that we've heard from some stakeholders on this legislation.

We'll go through it. You know, at first, the Animal Health Act questions that I have really just go around – I mean, I don't have a problem with this first change per se. I'm not sure why there's no form of accountability or there's no way to ensure that the 24-hour time limit has to remain in regulations and it can't be increased. Sorry, Mr. Speaker. I'm talking about the need to report the presence of notifiable disease within 24 hours. That's being moved from legislation to regulation. Again, that 24-hour time period: will that ever be increased? Is that being changed at all? Again, that move out of legislation to regulations: at the outset I don't see – oh, I guess the 24 hours is removed, so there's no length of time whatsoever. I'm not sure, then, what the government will do to ensure accountability. I mean, it's possible that the 24 hours, for some, might have been onerous. I would think that if electronic communication was permitted, 24 hours is not that onerous.

The challenge with this change without any time limits being attached to it is that – my understanding of that 24 hours is to ensure that the proper authorities are notified so that measures can be taken so that we don't have animal diseases spreading and spreading quickly. If there is no time limit on that, how does the government ensure that they're going to be learning about challenges quickly enough that it will not spread through multiple farms? So that's one question that I have. If there isn't a time limit, what is the government and the minister thinking in terms of through regulations? What are farmers asking for?

When it comes to the child and family enhancement act, the challenge that I have with this one is that we know, Mr. Speaker, that it's been an extremely sad year in that more young people have died in care this year than they have in previous years, so there is much more work that needs to be done and quickly. I mean, you know, I appreciate the minister and others saying: well, this is a call to action. Well, quite frankly, the call, in my opinion, was years ago. The fact that these numbers continue to climb isn't a call to action; it should be a call that the system is broken and needs to be fixed.

Now, the change in this piece of legislation: my understanding is that it's going to remove the one-year maximum on all licences, both new and renewals, for residential facilities in the child intervention system, which includes foster homes, group homes, et cetera, and move those limits to the regulations. Now, yes, that may result in a more expedient system, but the danger is that you're taking away what is in legislation, which is discussed and debated in this Chamber and put in the window for all to see and to be aware so that there's a significant amount of transparency and accountability, and moving it into regulations. Again, of course, the challenge with regulations is that regulations are done by cabinet behind closed doors, so Albertans have to trust cabinet, trust the Premier, trust that the decisions that are being made behind closed doors are, in fact, the best decisions.

The challenge that I have is example after example, month after month this government has proven to Albertans that they are untrustworthy. So moving something of this significance and importance from legislation, which is the most transparent way to discuss laws, to regulation, which is probably the least transparent way, is sounding the alarm bells for me. So this piece of Bill 21 I struggle with. I haven't had time to contact many operators. I know in my riding there are quite a number of group homes, and I'd be curious to hear what they have to say about this and if they have concerns that renewals are moving from legislation to regulation.

Now, the one piece of this section that I do think is positive is the amendment to add in that a foster parent is able to appeal the renewal or alteration of an existing licence. At the outset, or my first blush through this, I think that that is a positive change, but, again, you know, Mr. Speaker, I'm glad that we're just in second reading so that we have time to engage with stakeholders to ensure that they have in fact asked for some of these changes and are behind them.

I'll try to move – I'm going a little slower than I meant to, to be honest.

Questions that I have. I know the opposition has asked the ministers both of red tape and of Education, but there's been some – we need clarity. There's been quite a bit of confusion because the Education minister said one thing and the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction said another. The issue is around that private schools no longer have to produce financial data, like how much it collects in tuition fees.

Now, the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction has claimed that they no longer have to report that, that that was red tape, which – I mean, the irony is that we're really expanding the definition of red tape, because I don't believe that accountability is red tape. I think that's just smart business practice, and it's what Albertans deserve to know as the government spends their tax dollars. Again, you know, government programs and services are not nor should ever be considered the government's money. It comes from Albertans, so Albertans deserve to know where their money is going. The fact of the matter, Mr. Speaker, is that 70 per cent of dollars that private schools have to operate are provincial dollars. Now, I'm not trying to argue – and I know that there are arguments. There are some that want that changed, some that feel it's not enough, some that feel that it's too much. For me, that oversight that Albertans have, I think, is important. If an entity is receiving tax dollars, then Albertans have the right to know how it's being spent and where it's going.

What's confusing with this is that the Minister of Education has claimed that the audited statements, including tuition fees, are still going to be required, but the government produced some kind of media release or handout stating that tuition fee data would not be collected. This obviously needs clarity as far as: you know, will this be reported, or will it not be reported? I know that other changes include how private schools can be regulated and, as well, how boards can spend their noncapital reserves, which I also recognize requires ministerial approval and that it's being extended out for another year.

I want to jump briefly to some other changes. The Highways Development and Protection Act: it moves the power from cabinet to the minister to designate new freeways or the approval of freeway access locations. I don't know if that was overly burdensome for cabinet to deal with, but again the challenge: when you move something from cabinet to the minister, you take away the oversight that cabinet has for each other to get input from a variety of cabinet ministers through a decision as opposed to one person doing it unilaterally.

The one piece of the bill that I have to say is my favourite is enabling municipalities to provide a single business licence for a company operating in multiple municipalities. That is good news. I think that's positive for all parts of the province, especially for the Edmonton metro region, knowing businesses operate in – I mean, we have, you know, more than 12 municipalities in our direct surrounding areas, so that's positive.

There are other parts of this bill that I do want to comment on – but I believe I will have to wait for Committee of the Whole – including the public lands. There are some concerns with changes to the Public Lands Act that I will get into more detail the next time I speak to this bill.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to join in the debate this morning? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has the call.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank my friend from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview for setting up the comments that I am about to make on Bill 21, the red tape reduction act, because he said that he had some further comments on some changes to the provincial Public Lands Act as well as the Provincial Parks Act that he had concerns about but, unfortunately, didn't have the time to get to. That's what I'd like to focus my comments on today because we see that within this bill the legislation is being altered to give the minister the power to adopt any policy, position paper, anything as a regulation affecting parks or public lands. This is extremely worrisome because we've already seen the Minister of Environment and Parks break trust with the people of Alberta on a couple of key policy decisions that this government has tried to make.

The first was his stated policy goal, established in February 2020, to close down or sell off hundreds of provincial parks. As soon as he issued that press release, he said that the thing that he was going to do is not the thing that he was going to do, and for the rest of the year he was in a pitched battle with the people of Alberta over his plans to sell off and close parks. Even though the press release was quite clear that the plan was to sell off or close parks, he spent the rest of the year saying that he wasn't doing the thing that he said he was going to do. And then in December 2020, just before other members of his family jetted off to Hawaii in the middle of a pandemic, he said that he was backing away from the thing that he never intended to do. So the people of Alberta, rightfully, from that one instance, have lost trust in the minister, in his ability and intention of protecting parks and public lands in the province of Alberta.

At the same time he and his cabinet colleague the Minister of Energy were moving to expand the mining of coal in the province of Alberta. Of course, again all along, once they released the press release saying that they were rescinding the coal policy to enable further coal development in the eastern slopes, they started backing away from it, saying: "No; the policy was redundant. It doesn't do the thing that it says it does. There's no need to be alarmed." But the people of Alberta kept pushing back against this government's terrible plans, and at least now we have a temporary reprieve in the form of a ministerial order curtailing the activities of coal-mining companies in the eastern slopes for the time being. But just a reminder that a ministerial order can be changed or revoked at any moment without consultation or even without notice. I don't think the people of Alberta should rest easy in the belief that the eastern slopes are protected from the depredations of coal miners. This is a precarious protection that can be rolled back at any time.

When we've seen the behaviour of the Minister of Environment and Parks and the Minister of Energy with respect to allowing the privatization and the further industrialization of our public lands and our parks, they should be rightfully concerned when they see clauses like those that are included in amendments to the Provincial Parks Act and the Public Lands Act.

One of the things that I think is again worrisome, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that the minister is centralizing a lot of this power for himself. Not only is he centralizing power for himself with respect to the management of provincial parks and public lands, but he's also throwing out the normal process by which regulations impacting provincial parks and public lands are drafted. Now, right now there is a standard process of drafting regulations, ministerial regulations, regulations passed by orders in council, and with these changes to the Provincial Parks Act and the Public Lands Act those processes are being completely thrown out the window, saying that almost any document can be adopted by the minister as a regulation applying to provincial parks and public lands. There's no consultation required. There's no standard drafting required. This is not the way that regulations regarding any matter of public policy should be drafted but certainly not for provincial parks and public lands.

What I'm concerned about also is the loss of oversight over these documents. Once the minister signs the order that adopts whatever policy document that he's adopted as a regulation in a provincial park or public land, that document can be updated or thrown out at any time, and the minister doesn't even have to be notified. That begs the question, Mr. Speaker, as to who will actually be in charge of setting the regulations that are applying to provincial parks and public lands in these cases. Is it the minister himself, or is it the people who are bringing forward these policy documents that will be adopted as regulations? How will the people of Alberta know that the regulations that are being adopted are in the public interest and not in the interest of a particular user group that the minister seeks to favour over the interests of others? There's no assurance that that will be the case if these changes are adopted.

I think one of the concerns that we've heard from people who are interested in the management of parks and public lands is the fact that there seems to be no formal structure for conducting consultations or for allowing Albertans to provide feedback for the adoption of any of these policy documents as regulations are completed. I think one thing that, if the minister is intent on forcing through these changes, they should at least consider is structuring some formal policy on incorporating feedback from the people of Alberta, broadly speaking, before adopting these regulations, because right now, as the bill is structured, the people of Alberta don't have confidence that the minister will make regulations that reflect the wishes of a broad cross-section of people who are interested in management of parks and public lands. I would urge members of the Executive Council to consider formalizing a consultation process if they want to adopt these changes.

Also, they need to be clear about the process that people will have to go through in order to even write any of these policy documents. That part is not even clear. How will the minister and the ministry working on his behalf evaluate whether a policy document that is going to be considered to be adopted as a regulation is suitable, even meets any sort of criteria or standard for adoption as a regulation? I would like to have seen something in this legislation that would at least set out a framework for a policy document to comply with in order to even be considered to be adopted as a regulation. Right now potentially anything could be considered to be adopted as a regulation under these changes, and I don't think that that's right. The people of Alberta don't trust this government to engage properly with the people of Alberta with respect to these changes or potential changes to regulations regarding parks and public lands, and they have a right to know. They have a right to know how these things will be adopted, how the people of Alberta will be consulted before the adoption of these things. That's really what I think people are looking for in this bill.

I'm going to listen intently to the debate to hear if the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction or any of her colleagues on the Executive Council can provide any more clarity or assurances to the people of Alberta that this process won't be misused to curry favour with particular groups that the minister is interested in favouring and that this process will be above board and conducted fairly and transparently.

You know, there are a lot of other pieces of this bill, but I think I will leave it to my colleagues to address the other pieces of the bill that are of concern to them. I look forward to listening to the other contributions that will be made on debate in this stage.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, second reading of Bill 21. Is there anyone else wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 21. This is the type of bill, of course, that is very concerning for the opposition because it's a bill where the ministers responsible for the various items are not held accountable because they are not introducing the bill and not speaking to the bill. Instead, we have a minister who is not focused on any of these particular amendments or the activities that these amendments will reflect on here in the House. We clearly know that there have been examples already of confusion between the minister properly responsible for the item and the ministers presenting the bill, having seen a document come out of the minister presenting this bill fundamentally contradicting information that the minister responsible for the area says to be true. So we see some confusion right from the very beginning with this bill.

That's, of course, the reason why we're very concerned about these kinds of bills. It means that it's not being presented in a holistic way, in the context in which the information should be presented, and debated with regard to other aspects of the ministry which will be affected. That always leads to confusion and doubt. We certainly have plenty of doubt with regard to this government already, so to provide us a bill that exacerbates that doubt is somewhat problematic.

Of course, I'm also concerned that what happens with these types of bills is that the government puts together a whole variety of different things, some of which, of course, we can simply support: some of the changes to the municipalities act, some of the changes for foster parents. You know, some of those kinds of things we're more than happy to support, but they put that in the same bill with things that we absolutely cannot support, so they create a poison pill effect where when we vote against the things we do not like, they then go out into the public and tell the public we voted against the things that we, in fact, do like, which is a devious thing to be doing.

We've seen it happen repeatedly in this government, where the public is told we voted against something when, in fact, it was not the part we voted against, but because you can only vote for the bill either all or none, when we have these kinds of unfair omnibus bills, then we end up in a situation where the public ends up having to be informed about the nuances, which is not something that is very easy to do, for the most part. You know, clearly, this government is doing these kinds of things not because they care for the public to be fully informed; rather, they wish to push something through that they don't really want the public to pay attention to.

What I do when I look at these bills is that I look at the variety of different things that are being changed, some of which, as I had mentioned, I already will dismiss quickly because I just simply accept them. On other ones, which I, you know, might have a question about, for example with co-ops, the decision to reduce Canadian ownership from 50 per cent to 25 per cent, why would that be done? Why would that be just slipped into a bill that deals with wildlife and education and child and youth and family enhancement? Like, why would you slip that in there when it, actually, is probably going to have very significant consequences for public ownership and private ownership in this province and reduces the conditions under which Canadians can actually be owners?

Why would you slip that into the middle of this bill? Is there some relationship with some foreign entities that this government is trying to enhance? Should I be concerned about which foreign entities the government is in a relationship with? Why would you not want to support Alberta owner-operators? Those kinds of questions come up, and I think that we should be making sure that those kinds of things are addressed appropriately and properly, and the government should not be using an omnibus bill to hide activities, as they clearly are here in this particular case.

I simply, you know, can't support a bill that isn't transparent to the citizens of the province, and that is certainly what we have in this particular case. The decisions seem to be minor that are addressed in simple lines like the reduction of Canadian ownership from 50 per cent to 25 per cent in the co-ops. Actually, they have very significant consequences and will really affect things moving forward in this province in terms of Albertans having governance over their own lives.

We know that this government has often made deals with corporations that have caused problems later on. They slip a poison pill into a bill that says that if the government changes its mind on anything, then we will pay you out. What kind of a ridiculous line is that to put into a bill? And here we are. We're back into the situation now where we're taking power and control away from Albertans and handing it off to others.

We've learned already in this province that correcting Conservative mistakes is a very expensive proposition, and here we are. The government is setting up another situation where if another government wants to come along and say, "No; we should be having Canadian ownership," we're going to be on the hook, because there's now been a contract that's allowed foreign ownership to be doubled in this circumstance. These are the kinds of things that I absolutely find unacceptable with a bill of this nature. Something that we should be talking about at great length is not being spoken about at all here.

In the few minutes that I have left, I want to speak about one of the biggest poison pills for me here, and that is a change with regard to the ministerial powers in Environment and Parks to make decisions with regard to, well, essentially everything. The nature of the bill widens the minister's regulation-making powers to actually literally encompass all aspects: to set standards, to set directives, to set practices, to identify codes, to write guidelines or objectives or any other rule. Any other rule. I'm very concerned about this because I see that in that same section there are also changes in the regulation-making power from "controlling domestic or other animals not defined as wildlife under the Wildlife Act" to "respecting domestic or other animals not defined as wildlife under the Wildlife Act." I want to know what that's about. I want to know what's going on here.

The reason why I'm concerned is because I know that the First Nations people are very interested in expanding the presence of bison, buffalo, depending on who you're talking to, even in the Indigenous community. They are very interested in expanding these kinds of wildlife in the parks areas and beyond the parks areas. This doesn't tell me anything about how the changes will affect that kind of decision-making. We have a minister who can just go in and randomly make any kind of decision they want.

I know that right now we have, for example, a Buffalo treaty, that's been signed by many First Nations, that is working toward the expansion of this wildlife in the parks, yet we have a minister here who can just make a decision to do anything they want with those bison. Should we allow that to happen, or should there be in here a clause that says that the minister cannot make those decisions unless they have consultations with First Nations first?

There's no limit put on the minister here. How can you give ministers the power to make every possible change? What's the point of having regulations and laws at all if the ministers can do whatever they want? What would happen if a minister, looking at the park, said: "Oh, look. We have all these wild horses that are running around the park. Why don't we just eliminate them all?" What would happen if we had a minister that decided to make the decision just to shoot all the wild horses in the parks? That would be completely ridiculous, yet this bill allows that to happen.

The Speaker: It would also be equally as ridiculous for a member to assert that a minister would suggest or do such a thing.

Mr. Feehan: I'm sorry. I have to disagree. The bill is . . .

Speaker's Ruling Accusations against a Member

The Speaker: You can't make an accusation that a minister would go and commit crimes in provincial parks. You can make an assertion about all sorts of things, but making the accusation that someone is going to commit a crime . . .

Mr. Feehan: I didn't say that.

The Speaker: What you said was that it's reasonable or it's possible, inside this legislation, that a minister would go and shoot all the wild horses in a provincial park. I'm not going to debate with you what the Hansard says or doesn't say, as neither of us has the benefit of the Blues, but I just think that continuing down this line of conversation is quite likely to create disorder.

Debate Continued

Mr. Feehan: The point is that a minister, under these regulations, can make regulations to do things. I'm not saying that they would break the law, but they would establish a law to allow them to do things. For example, if First Nations people want to expand the buffalo, what happens if the minister decides that they want to eliminate and do some kind of buffalo cull? If they did that kind of buffalo cull, would they have to consult with the First Nations first or not? How does this fit into the Buffalo treaty, signed by so many First Nations in this province?

You know, I can understand the Speaker's sensitivity because I used the example of horses, but they're also very important to the Indigenous people, and many of the horses run wild in the parks in this province. This bill allows the minister to make decisions about those wild horses. That's my point. I cannot tell you that I trust this minister or any minister of the government to make decisions like that without proper and due consultation, yet we have a bill that allows the minister to make all kinds of regulation decisions over standards, directives, practice codes, all of these kinds of things. It's completely unnecessary to write a bill this wide to achieve something as narrow as the environment minister suggests that this is all about.

There have been serious concerns by groups such as CPAWS saying that you have designed a tool that is far too extensive for the actual activities that are being intended here. I think that's just unacceptable. If the minister needs some specific ability to do something within a particular area, then that can be written in for the minister to have the discretion, but simply just to open the door up and say that the minister has the widest of all possible discretions in all kinds of areas is not acceptable. We just certainly haven't seen, under this minister, any reason to trust them. We saw that when we saw the minister's attempt to sell parks in this province. We saw that when we saw this minister's attempt to mine the Rockies in this province.

You know, we have just seen this minister consistently go after the environment, which is pretty ironic for an environment minister. They have certainly not gotten the support of people who devote their lives to the environment, and it certainly should give us all pause to not want to give this minister, who has attempted to do these things that have been completely and ultimately resisted by people who are the most knowledgeable in this area, the power to do whatever they wish to do. This is the biggest poison pill in this bill.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I hesitate to interrupt. However, pursuant to Standing Order 4(2.1) the House stands adjourned until this afternoon at 1:30.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, May 3, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, joining us in the Speaker's gallery today are some very special guests. They are friends of mine and the parents of Char Bergen. Char works in the office of the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction. I hope that you will join me in welcoming Pat and Nick Barnay to the Assembly. During COVID last year they reached several very important milestones, including their 90th and 80th birthdays as well as their 60th wedding anniversary. Earlier today I was speaking with Mr. Barnay, who is a retired barber, and he was telling me that on his very busiest day of being a barber, he actually did 101 haircuts. It looks like some members over here could use the services of the member. Last but not least, it's actually his 91st birthday today. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. [Standing ovation]

Also, hon. members, joining us in the gallery today are Heather Prendergast and Blair Nielsen of Leading Influence. They are guests of the hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Also, guests of the Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville: Babs Ajayi and Jummy Ajayi. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Women's Health Care and Reproductive Rights

Ms Hoffman: Yesterday a draft opinion of the United States Supreme Court to overturn Roe versus Wade, the decision which legalized abortion across the United States, was released. This news has shocked many, and it has brought up deep concerns for women about the threats to their health. Hearing this made me think about advancements in women's health that we made while in government. I am proud to have been Alberta's first NDP Health minister. That legacy includes expanding women's health care. This includes expanding midwifery services, public coverage of Mifegymiso, the abortion pill, and creating a bubble zone around women's health clinics so that the staff who work there and the patients accessing the health care in those buildings could do so without harassment, intimidation, and violent images being forced upon them.

This issue hits close to home for many Alberta women. It's why the NDP wanted to create safe spaces. Four years ago UCP members ran from this Chamber 13 times when our NDP government brought forward that bill to create bubble zones to stop the harassment. What was the UCP scared of? Why did every member of their caucus turn tail and run? Well, members across the aisle have voted against women's health care, against women's choice, and have been endorsed by groups who believe in restricting access to abortions. Abortion is health care, and we need a government that defends health care, all health care.

Today our leader gave Albertans our guarantee that an NDP government will protect reproductive rights here in Alberta and across the country. The Premier must reaffirm Alberta's commitment to a woman's fundamental right to choose, guaranteeing that he will do nothing further to restrict access to reproductive health services, and join us in condemning this attack against women's health.

Women across North America, including women here in Alberta, need to know that their health is protected, that it matters, and that it will get better. Alberta women can't trust this UCP to do that, but they can trust the NDP because we know that women's health is public health. An attack on women's rights is an attack on us all.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Stanley Cup Playoffs

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The good old hockey game is the best game you can name. The NHL playoffs have begun, and for the first time in a long time both of Alberta's teams, the Calgary Flames and the Edmonton Oilers, have a very good chance to hoist Lord Stanley's Cup.

This isn't just great news for hockey fans; it's great news for Alberta's economy. Alberta's tourism and hospitality industry was hit hard during the pandemic, but now our hotels, bars, and restaurants are bursting at the seams with hockey fans. Alberta's tourism and hospitality industry is vital, contributing approximately $8.2 billion per year to our economy. Sixty-nine thousand jobs and 20,000 businesses are impacted by this. Our government is working to reduce red tape for businesses, and we are working with municipalities to establish entertainment districts where people can gather responsibly and enjoy events like the Stanley Cup playoffs.

Tonight I will join thousands of Albertans in rooting for the Calgary Flames, the number one team in the Pacific division, with a whopping 111 points. But Flames fans aren't celebrating yet. We know that there's a lot of hard work to do to recapture the cup and bring it home to Calgary. From the Red Mile to Whyte Avenue, Flames fans will pack the bars and restaurants to cheer on Johnny Hockey, Matthew Tkachuk, Jacob Markstrom, and more.

There's nothing like playoff hockey, Mr. Speaker, and Alberta is hockey country. In fact, many of the players in the Stanley Cup playoffs hail from our province such as Lightning's Brayden Point, a two-time Stanley Cup champion; the Edmonton Oilers' Brett Kulack; and the Bruins' Jake DeBrusk, just to name a few. From the frozen ponds to junior rinks to the NHL arenas, hockey is alive and well in Alberta.

I want to wish the Flames and the Oilers good luck, and I look forward to the battle of Alberta in round 2.

The Speaker: I'm just wondering where the hon. Member for Calgary-Acadia will be this evening, whether he'll be cheering for the Flames or not.

The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Forest Industries

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was raised in a family that depended on Alberta forests to help us earn a living and put food on the table. In my constituency of Lesser Slave Lake forestry is one of the leading employment areas.

Every year during this first week of May we celebrate Alberta Forest Week. The week is a chance for people across the province to celebrate everything our forests and forest industry do for us. Alberta forests cover about 87 million acres, an area larger than Japan. Alberta forests give us so much, from recreational areas and environmental habitats to building materials and good-paying jobs.

As our province's third-largest resource sector and the fourth-largest of its kind in Canada, forestry directly supports 722 small businesses and 51 medium to large businesses while providing good jobs for more than 18,000 Albertans. There are about 17 municipalities across Alberta that derive between 10 and 27 per cent of their employment income from forestry. Thanks to work like the forest jobs action plan we're home to the country's most competitive forest sector, and this industry will be an important contributor to Alberta's economic recovery.

This week thousands of grade 1 students across Alberta will be planting seedlings of white spruce and lodgepole pine, Alberta's provincial tree. As their seedlings grow into strong, sturdy trees, I look forward to seeing our forest sector continue to be a strong and sustainable contributor to Alberta's economy and culture.

Albertans can be proud of the many technologically advanced pulp mills, sawmills, oriented strandboard plants, and laminated veneer mills in operation across Alberta today along with advancements in cogen and biofuels. We also have a stringent, global-leading reforestation program, ensuring the viability of our forests for many generations to come.

I would like to give a shout-out to all the forestry businesses and their workers for doing an amazing job in preserving the longevity of this amazing resource.

Thank you.

The Speaker: It would probably be inappropriate of me to point out the fact that the Minister of Health's phone rang during the member's statement, but I'm sure he'll be making a donation to the hon. member's charity of choice.

Government Record

Ms Goehring: Well, Mr. Speaker, it was bound to happen eventually, but this government's inherent elitism and selfishness finally got the best of them. Albertans are struggling, dealing with the cost-of-living crisis created by the UCP, and when asked about it, the Finance minister had the audacity to blame them. "Get a better job," says the Finance minister, who spent his summer sipping whisky on the sky palace with the Premier. "Get a better job," lectured the Finance minister, who is personally hiking Albertans' income tax by a billion dollars using a sneaky trick the Premier once opposed. The Finance minister, whose record is slashing benefits for seniors and disabled Albertans, hiking insurance costs, hiking utility rates, hiking income taxes, making life unaffordable for students, has zero credibility to tell people to get a better job when their lives could be improved simply with a competent Finance minister.

1:40

But this goes to the heart of this UCP government. The UCP since day one of taking office has taken from Albertans to reward themselves. They cut the minimum wage of young Albertans but then used taxpayer dollars for a private jet ride for their friends. When asked about it, the Premier said that he planned to do it again.

They cut the supports that disabled Albertans use to survive but then defended the Premier's friend who spent tens of thousands of dollars travelling to London's fanciest hotels. They refused to fund schools, leaving nearly 2,000 students in Edmonton without support, and then kicked back with Hawaiian vacations that the rest of Albertans were told to cancel.

This government could charitably be described as out of touch, but in reality it's much worse. This government is so entitled that it would make the Redford-era PCs blush. Albertans deserve better than a government that lives large while telling working families to do more with less. After the next election they'll have a chance to vote for a government that values them.

Thank you.

Legislature Building and Government

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, back in my office in Taber I have three pictures proudly displayed on the wall. These pictures show the purposeful and meticulous construction of Alberta's first Legislature Building. I've been coming to work here for seven years, and I have to admit that I have sometimes lost my appreciation of the beauty and grandeur that surround us.

In August 1907, just two years after becoming a fledgling province, hard-working Albertans put their shoulder to the wheel and got to work. Within just four years, in 1911, lawmakers were able to hold their first session as the paint dried on the newly constructed walls. Pioneers of the past knew full well that the foundation, in fact all parts of the Legislature, needed to be built with the best material and crafted with the greatest of care. In fact, Mr. Speaker, we have this great edifice today because of that purposeful work of our forefathers. Renewal of older buildings is a given as it faces the harsh winters and summer storms of Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, building a province, a great province, follows similar principles. Our province continues to be built with great care and great vision. For the past three years our government has purposefully renewed the foundation of our province. That made it the greatest place to raise a family, start a business, or get a well-paying job. That foundation is called the Alberta advantage.

Achieving prosperity is not a fluke. Instead, it is achieved through purposeful, hard work. In the past three years our government has reduced the corporate tax rate by one-third, reduced red tape by one-quarter, and flattened the curve on government spending, which has allowed us to table the first balanced budget in many years. People from all over the world are coming here again to benefit from the Alberta advantage because, Mr. Speaker, Alberta has its swagger back.

AISH and Income Support Shelter Benefit

Ms Renaud: Politics are personal, and decisions made by government impact people's lives. The UCP made cuts to AISH and income support. Cutting by deindexing wasn't enough for the UCP, so they systematically cut income support supplementals through a variety of policy changes.

Let me tell you a couple of true stories. The first one. We'll call him John. John has many issues, both physical and mental. As a result, he is unable to support himself. He receives income support to survive, and that means that as a single person he receives just over $900 a month. A person can't live on that. He used to receive an additional shelter allowance of $300, and that small amount was often the difference between being homeless or not.

In January 2022 John was notified that he lost that $300, so he appealed. At that point he had a three-month reduction in his income. Now, if he's lucky, he can hang on for three months without getting evicted, and if successful, he'll receive over $900 for those three months. The problem is that in appeal he found out he's only eligible to receive an additional three months of shelter benefits. Once again he's at risk of acute homelessness, and the cycle begins. Here's the kicker: he has to maintain his residence throughout.

Another one. Let's call him Steven. Steven has had a difficult, painful life and now relies on income support to live. He's trying to make changes. He lives at a sober living facility, and he's trying to stay there and heal, but CSS is telling him they don't do additional shelter benefits anymore. The UCP have systematically attacked low-income and disabled Albertans by cutting poverty-level benefits, introducing ableist policies while boasting that AISH and income support are the most generous in Canada. That is not true.

I urge this government again to reindex benefits and stop this speeding train of ableist policies that are inflicting harm all over this province.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park is next.

Energy Industry Environmental, Social, and Governance Standards

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In March of this year the federal government finally did something I agree with. I know. Shocking, right? They banned the import of Russian conflict oil. That was the right thing to do. That being said, I was surprised to see the federal Liberals ban Russian conflict oil. Buying and using foreign conflict oil from corrupt and oppressive countries is straight out of the Liberal playbook.

Countries such as Saudi Arabia and Venezuela provide Canada with billions of dollars' worth of conflict oil while everyday Albertans are shoved into the corner and told that our oil is dirty. What a complete slap in the face, Mr. Speaker. It has been proven that Alberta oil development follows the strictest environmental guidelines. Furthermore, Alberta and its energy sector engage in meaningful dialogue with Indigenous communities to ensure minimal disturbance to their lands, and their communities can prosper from the wealth gained from selling clean Alberta oil.

Do you think that Saudi Arabia, a country that does not respect human rights, follows strict environmental guidelines for their oil development? Do you think that authoritarian Venezuela considers the rights of Indigenous people when extracting oil? The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. The double standard is disrespectful to what this province has done for this nation. I, like so many other Albertans, am angry. Now that Russia is beginning to shut off energy flow to Europe, Alberta must be allowed to step up to the plate to ensure that clean, ethical oil is allowed market access.

Alberta's destiny, Mr. Speaker, is to be the arsenal of energy security globally this century. Unfortunately, I am afraid that the Trudeau Liberal-NDP alliance with their delusional green, left agenda won't see or support this vision. Here's to hoping that I'm wrong.

Agriculture and Agricultural Land Ownership

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, agriculture is an important part of Alberta. It is a key industry that contributes significantly to the economy of our province. But beyond the economy, Alberta's agricultural industry is reflective of a way of life. We speak of industry as a concept, identifying it through measurements, including how much product it yields and how much it contributes to the economy, but often we overlook the people who are at the centre of this production.

For the men and women who choose the agriculture industry, they are choosing a way of life. They are choosing to be farmers and ranchers, caretakers of crops and livestock. They are choosing to get up before sunrise and work late past the sunset. Mr. Speaker, as a farmer I can attest that these individuals do not have a typical 9 to 5 job. They do not have the luxury of saving work for another day or keeping their livestock and crops uncared for as they are responsible and subject to the life cycle of something beyond themselves.

It is farmers that understand first-hand the necessary conditions to ensure food security for our nation. As stewards of over 31 per cent of our nation's total farmland, Alberta farmers and ranchers are entrusted to protect this arable land. Mr. Speaker, it is the shared realities of the demands of caring for crops and livestock as well as the responsibility to the population to ensure food security and preservation of our agricultural land that brings people together and forms rural communities and culture. It is the Alberta rural community and culture Bill 206 seeks to protect.

Ownership of agricultural land by individuals is paramount in keeping our rural communities strong. For farmers and ranchers, ownership of agricultural land is more than an investment opportunity. For over 100 years families have come and settled in Alberta, put down roots, helped to further develop rural Alberta, and are the foundation and strength of our rural Alberta communities. Mr. Speaker, by defending the ownership of agricultural land by individuals, we will keep our rural communities and culture strong.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Federal-provincial Relations

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Many are concerned we are sleepwalking towards disaster. Canada is acting like a hostile, $1 trillion plus fiscal train wreck, attacking Alberta, threatening to drag us down with it. Yet in spite of Ottawa, Alberta still succeeds. But they are a growing danger. There is a gathering storm. We need to protect ourselves.

Mr. Speaker, if Alberta was not part of Canada and was invited to join this rigged partnership under the current terms, would we join? No. Does loyalty compel us to remain host in a parasitic relationship? No. Alberta is not compelled to suffer constant harassment and attack. But what about national unity? For the sake of unity, are we forced to allow ourselves to suffer attacks from politicians seeking power? No. Albertans do not need to unite with political corruption. Unity without integrity is fake.

1:50

Trust is earned as one's actions are consistent with one's words. There is too much overpromising and underdelivering. The concept of a fair deal needs to be more than a political slogan. Mr. Speaker, Alberta has the potential to be the most free and prosperous nation on Earth. What is holding us back? If one is not fair, how does one insist on fairness? If one is not accountable, then how does one insist on accountability? Alberta is a land of freedom and prosperity. We must be vigilant to keep it that way.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Economic Recovery

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, in the last election the UCP made big promises about jobs and economic growth, but even before the pandemic investment dropped, our economy shrank, and 50,000 full-time jobs were lost. Then the pandemic hit, and Alberta had the worst performing economy in Canada. Desperate for some kind of spin, the Premier then promised us that we would lead the country in 2021, only for us to discover yesterday that we actually finished sixth, ninth if you include the territories. Can the Premier explain how it is that he got it so wrong?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's the NDP that got it so wrong. When they raised income taxes on Albertans, when they raised taxes on Alberta employers, when they imposed the job-killing carbon tax, when they attacked our energy industry, when they asked Justin Trudeau to cancel Northern Gateway, when they cheered on the death of Energy East, when they opposed Keystone XL, tens of billions of dollars of investment fled Alberta. We ended up with a jobs crisis, an $8 billion structural deficit. This government has turned that around, leading this year Canada in economic growth, a balanced budget, and tens of billions of dollars of job-creating investment.

Ms Notley: He promised that we'd be first; we came in sixth.

Now, yesterday the Premier also claimed that Alberta's tech sector was the fastest growing in North America. Let's check that:

venture capital investment in Ontario, $7.9 billion, up 295 per cent; B.C., $2.9 billion, up 224 per cent; Quebec, $2.8 billion, up 180 per cent; but Alberta, $500 million, up just 23 per cent. The Premier's definition of "fastest" appears to be much slower than Merriam-Webster's. Why is that, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, in the last three years the number of tech companies in Alberta has more than doubled. The amount of venture capital has tripled. And according to LinkedIn, in a study that they did, Alberta has the fastest growing employment in the tech sector, not in Canada but in all of North America, thanks to policies like the innovation employment grant, part of Alberta's recovery plan. You know what that is? It's a long-term plan to build, to diversify, and to create new jobs, and it's working.

Ms Notley: Even when we give him the facts, he denies them, you know?

It's important because when it comes to our economy, Albertans actually deserve the facts, Mr. Speaker. You can't make things better if you don't admit how they are right now. We are not leading Canada in recovery; we're sixth. Real GDP is slower than most other provinces, and we are billions shy on tech investment. But the Premier shamelessly throws himself victory parties just to prop up his leadership. Why won't this Premier put his head down, pause the party, tell the truth, and start doing the work?

Mr. Kenney: Well, here's the truth, Mr. Speaker. As I said yesterday, I want to ask the Leader of the Opposition to please continue to focus on this government's economic performance for the next 13 months because Albertans will render judgment on the economic catastrophe of her job-killing, tax-hiking, overregulating, fiscally irresponsible policies. They drove us into a deep jobs crisis. People were leaving Alberta. They're now coming to Alberta. Investment was fleeing. It's now coming to Alberta. They were raising taxes. This government is cutting taxes. Our economy shrank under the NDP. Finally, we've caught up to where they were when they took office.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition.

Women's Reproductive Rights

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, Albertans woke up today deeply concerned over the news that the U.S. Supreme Court may overturn Roe versus Wade. I'm one of those people, as are all of my colleagues. The landmark decision to legalize abortion was a victory for all women. Now it's under threat. Our bodies, our rights, our choice must be protected. I am hoping that the Premier can stand today and reaffirm to those concerned Albertans our commitment to a woman's right to choose. Will he join me in condemning this attack on reproductive rights in North America?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is asking about a potential decision in a foreign court in another country. That is for the American legal and political system. There has been no change in policy with respect to that procedure in Alberta, and none has been proposed.

Ms Notley: For the many Albertans who are very worried, that answer did not make them feel any better.

Now, as Premier I was proud to introduce legislation to better prevent the harassment of women seeking this health procedure. We created a safer environment for both staff and patients, women making a very difficult choice, often in very difficult circumstances, but we know that we need to do more. Access is still restricted to the major cities, and we still don't have a complete picture of available resources or other barriers at play. Will the Premier agree today to debate our motion so members can discuss these important issues today and reaffirm their commitment to human rights?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, again, the member wants to debate a potential decision of a court in a foreign country on a matter that is under the jurisdiction of Canada's federal Parliament. If you want to seek a Canadian application of this issue, it's under the federal Parliament. The member is trying to create controversy where there is none in Alberta. There is no precedent in this place for us to get involved in a running commentary on decisions of foreign courts.

Ms Notley: Well, this Premier claimed he was the economic puppet master of the U.S. last week. That was the most hypocritical answer I've ever heard.

You can understand why Albertans are nervous about this government's intentions when you google their record on these matters. Setting that aside, this draft decision could fundamentally undermine the equality rights of millions of women and gender-diverse people. At times like these, leaders must stand up and declare their clear support for the right to choose and for reproductive health rights. That means reassuring Albertans. Can the Premier commit that the UCP will never act to reduce access to abortion in this province? Yes or no?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I don't understand the preamble. Of course, the government of Alberta has a responsibility to engage foreign trading partners on economic issues that affect jobs in Alberta. With respect to the potential decision of a foreign court on a matter that would be under federal jurisdiction, individuals can have individual views about that, but what the leader is trying to do is to invent a political controversy that does not and has not existed in Alberta politics.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Women's Reproductive Health Care and Bill 17

Member Irwin: With the threat to reproductive rights across the border, we have an opportunity in this House to say loudly and clearly where we stand as legislators. Bill 17 gives Albertans time off to grieve or process pregnancy loss – very important – but missing from it is an explicit mention of the word "abortion." We can make amendments to be explicit about where we stand, leaving no room for interpretation and better protecting Albertans from discrimination in the workplace. Will the Premier support this amendment to Bill 17, and if so, will the government introduce it?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There will be an amendment to Bill 17.

Member Irwin: It's clear that Albertans cannot trust this UCP government when it comes to matters impacting women and gender-diverse folks and their health care. For instance, the Ernst & Young report, that the minister holds up as the blueprint for the UCP's agenda of cuts to health care, includes delisting both tubal ligations and breast reductions. They call these procedures elective when, in fact, they are critical. To the Premier: why is a vasectomy considered essential, but getting tubes tied is considered elective? Aren't both of them critical health procedures?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

2:00

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In regard to the statement made that we're delisting services, that is simply not the case. We are investing in our health care system. We are spending $600 million this year, $600 million next year, $600 million the year after that, you know, $1.8 billion over three years. We're investing in capacity across our entire system, EMS, within our acute-care system. Also, we're investing in more spaces in our continuing care. We're focused on delivering health services for Alberta, and that's exactly what we'll do.

Member Irwin: Fascinating that this minister talks about increasing capacity and expanding services for rural communities when there are eight Alberta communities right now where obstetric care has been seriously impacted, including Whitecourt, Rimbey, Lac La Biche, to name a few. That's a serious problem stemming from the UCP's mismanagement of the pandemic and their ongoing fight with doctors. Simple question to the Premier: does he know how much further someone from Rocky Mountain House now has to drive in order to give birth, and if he doesn't, should he maybe go and find out and fix it?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I've spoken in this House many times in regard to the challenges in rural Alberta that we're facing in regard to health care professionals. We've spoken in regard to obstetrics. It's incredibly important. We are addressing those. We are investing in building health care capacity across our entire province, and particularly we're investing $90 million last year, another $90 million this year to be able to get more doctors to be able to offer these services. Unfortunately, certain services in obstetrics have been shut down in a few areas for a few days, but we are actually getting more services there. We're hiring more individuals, and we're going to deliver for Albertans.

Collection of Race-based Data

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, yesterday 34 members of the UCP voted to kill Bill 204, the Anti-Racism Act, legislation to establish a framework for the collection of race-based data to address inequities in provincial programs and services. Now, Bill 204 was introduced on March 24, but it was only yesterday, six weeks later, that government members stated that they're working on their own bill to get this done. Yet currently there's nothing publicly available about that, not even a footnote on the Anti-Racism Advisory Council web page or any information about consultations. Can the Premier please tell this Assembly where Albertans can find information on these consultations and how racialized communities and the public can participate before decisions are made?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta Anti-Racism Advisory Council concluded their report, sent it to government. Out of 48 recommendations about 22 have so far been implemented. That's because the rest of that particular report also includes race-based data collection. That whole process is working through a cabinet committee, and I look forward to coming back to this Assembly at a future date.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, Bill 204 was voted down as similar legislation was introduced in B.C., a bill rooted in a consultation process started over a year ago that requires robust consultation with Indigenous and other racialized communities before establishing data standards, just like Bill 204. Now, to date this government has made no public mention of holding consultations on this issue, not in the Assembly or at a news conference or even on social media, not until Bill 204 was introduced. If indeed the government has already begun this work, can the Premier please provide some details. How many consultations have taken place? How many more are planned? How can members of racialized communities take part?

Mr. Madu: You know, Mr. Speaker, this is what is so disappointing about the members opposite. They had office for four years. They lifted no finger on any of these issues that they're talking about. This government has done so much to ensure fairness, respect, and equity for minority cultural communities, including our First Nations people. From banning carding to instituting the hate crimes co-ordination unit within the Department of Justice, to including the First Nations police in the Police Act, we are doing much when so much work still needs to be done.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, these are simple questions and they are not partisan, because addressing racism is not a partisan issue. In fact, yesterday multiple members of this government stood, stated that their caucus decision was not motivated by partisanship, and spoke of a need to work together collaboratively to ensure all communities were heard and the legislation made as strong and effective as possible. My colleagues and I agree. Let's come together to address this. Will the Premier today commit to a consultation process on the collection of race-based data that includes all parties of this Assembly in hearing from communities and making decisions, and when can we expect such a process to be announced?

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. We would consult, and we are consulting. I am proud of the consultation that the Associate Minister of Immigration and Multiculturalism continues to do in all of our communities in every region of this province, and I look forward to all that particular work so that we can come together to put forward a bill that actually speaks to the needs of the community, not a partisan tone.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Technology Industry Development

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We keep hearing about growth in Alberta's tech sector, and rightfully so. Earlier this year Neo Financial and EY in Calgary and HCL Technologies in Edmonton announced plans to grow in Alberta. Last week Rogers and Shaw announced that their think lab was coming to Calgary. To the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation: how do these recent announcements fit into the larger tech ecosystem in Calgary and Alberta-wide and our work to diversify our economy?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Two years ago we set out to put Alberta on the map, and the private sector, our tech sector, has delivered. Recently LinkedIn forecasted that Calgary had the highest growth in labour in the tech sector. That is a true testament to the innovators here in our province. Not only is it the local ecosystem; it's the national attention that Alberta is garnering. We have Rogers, that just announced 500 new tech jobs in the city of Calgary, RBC's innovation hub with over 300 jobs. The tech sector in Alberta is truly diversifying our economy, and it's an amazing story.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given the importance of diversifying our economy and the role that tech and innovation are playing in that diversification and given that Calgary especially is building a strong reputation as a hub for innovators and entrepreneurs, to the same minister: what are we doing to help ensure that investors and job creators know that our province is a strong place for tech companies to grow?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, our government has recognized that one of the only issues that can hold back growth in Alberta is making sure we have the right talent here and the right skill sets here in Alberta. That's why we've invested over $600 million in our most recent budget, to make sure that we can help Albertans get the right skill sets, attract the right talent into Alberta to make sure that we can grow Alberta's economy. And, yes, for everybody in this House, BMO is still forecasting Alberta to lead the country in growth this year and next year. Alberta has an amazing economic story happening.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hear, hear to the minister. Given that people looking for tech jobs want to have options when it comes to the companies that they work for and given that we have seen impressive growth in the tech sector through venture capital investment and, of course, increased tech talent, to the same minister: investors, job seekers, and entrepreneurs all want to know whether or not the recent growth in the tech industry has been a fluke, or whether you believe that it will continue.

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we've talked about diversification in this province for decades, and arguably over the last three years more has been done to diversify Alberta's economy than at any time in recent memory, and those job opportunities are real. Calgary and Edmonton: high-paying jobs, affordable living, recognized as major cities as the most affordable in all of Canada, top 10 in the world. But those job opportunities aren't just in the major cities; we're also seeing them in our mid-sized centres, rural communities. Alberta's economy is booming. We've got our swagger back in Alberta.

Provincial Park Administration and Bill 21

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, last week this government introduced Bill 21, and in that bill there were some changes to the Provincial Parks Act and Public Lands Act. The changes give the minister broad powers without specific indications on intent, which the minister claims already exist, and the minister also claims that it's simply being changed so that park partners are able to put up signs or allow dogs off leash, but these changes could create a set of legal puzzles that could make park protections worse and a nightmare to detangle and understand. Will the minister promise in this House today that these changes won't inhibit protections and allow industry in our parks?

Mr. Jason Nixon: I see that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar is still struggling to read legislation. That's not what the legislation does. He should take some time to read it.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that that was a simple question that the minister refused to answer and given that this wouldn't be the first time that this government has tried to sneak changes to our natural areas by Albertans, with the removal of a decades-old coal policy on the Friday of a long weekend, as one example, and given that another example, of course, included their plan to sell off and close down parks and given that this government claims they make these moves in the interest of removing red tape when this bill directly allows the creation of messy regionalized pseudo-regulations, will the minister explain to Albertans why he is trying to hide the truth from them once again on how he manages our natural spaces?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, only the NDP and, in particular, the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar would say that legislation to make it easier for park rangers to put up signs to keep people safe inside parks is somehow some great conspiracy. That's an important piece of legislation. It's going to allow individual managers within our 458 parks to be able to adjust signs, keep people safe, and make some local decisions inside their parks. I know the member doesn't leave Edmonton very much, but the fact is that our parks are very, very different across the province, and local decision-makers are the best to make the decisions for parks.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that this bill would give the ability for regulations to be amended without involvement from the minister, which seems odd to me that the minister would want to allow a free-for-all in our park protection systems, and given that this could be due to the minister's affinity for allowing OHVs in more parks, as this government has cleared the way for the use of exemption of popular ATV areas from the absurd $90 Kananaskis fee, is the minister intending to use the changes in this bill as a runway to allow more destructive ATV use in areas of Alberta where they aren't presently allowed?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, there it is right there. In point of fact, the NDP at the end of the day just can't help moving forward constantly with their desire to shut Alberta's public spaces to Albertans. At the end of the day that is their primary goal. It always comes out, and even with a simple piece of legislation that helps local park managers to be able to put up signs without having to call into Edmonton and have regulatory and cabinet decisions about safety signs and those types of things, they would be against that out of their desperation to ban Albertans from the backyard.

Workplace Fatalities

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, the Ministry of Labour and Immigration has reported the occupational disease fatalities, the workplace incident fatalities, and the workplace incident fatalities investigated. These reports, which summarize information provided by the Workers' Compensation Board, are different from the investigation reports, and they're published on the Alberta government website and the open government portal, except that no reports have been published since the UCP took office. A simple question to the minister: where are these reports for the past three years?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for that question. My department, the Department of Labour and Immigration, conducts investigations in respect to workplace incidents and makes those publications public. I am happy to look into the specific concern that the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods might have on this particular issue, but as far as I can tell, the department routinely publishes all of those incidents and data across the province.

Ms Gray: Given that last week Albertans paused to remember the lives lost in workplace incidents and illness on National Day of Mourning and given that in 2021 178 Albertans were killed because of their work, including 31 due to COVID-19, and given that this is the highest year for workplace fatalities in Alberta since 2013, to the minister. I appreciate you looking into this. Fatality investigation reports have been published, but the summary reports have not been published in the past three years. I would certainly like his insight as to why they have not been published.

Mr. Madu: You know, Mr. Speaker, it is always tragic to see the loss or the death of fellow citizens in the workplace, and that is why the focus of this government from day one has been to ensure that our various workplaces are safe for Albertans so that they can go to work and come back to their families in peace and quiet. I am looking forward to continuing the good work that my predecessors have done to ensure that Alberta's workplaces are safe for all Albertans.

Ms Gray: Given that workplace fatalities are preventable and given that this UCP government has made substantial amendments to labour and workplace safety regulations that do not improve worker safety and given that the 2021 report on workplace fatalities and injuries from the University of Regina found that Alberta has one of the highest rates of workplace fatalities in Canada, to the minister: what actions is this government going to take to prevent the deaths of workers in Alberta? Be specific, because this is a matter of life and death.

Mr. Madu: You know, Mr. Speaker, this province has a world-renowned program called the certificate of recognition, by which the government works with employers and occupational health and safety partners to make sure that modern practices around safety are there in the workplace. I am proud of the work that the department has done with health and safety partners, especially when it comes to the certificate of recognition.

Alberta Death Rate and Health Care System Capacity

Mr. Loewen: The data shows that Alberta experienced higher than average mortality in 2021. Sadly, approximately 3,600 people, more than the expected average, passed away. Of that total, approximately 2,100 of those were attributed to COVID. Therefore, we have at least 1,500 that are not yet explained. We saw rates of young and middle-aged people dying that far exceeded normal rates. Albertans are extremely concerned that this Premier has presided over such a rise in mortality. Can the minister explain the cause of these 1,500 non-COVID deaths?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. My heart goes out to anyone who's lost a loved one. It's been a very challenging time over the last two years. As the hon. member mentioned, the number of deaths attributed to COVID: this is something that we're not only dealing with as a province but we're dealing with as an entire country, as an entire world. We continue to focus on providing protections to Albertans through vaccines, through adding capacity into our health care system to be able to provide Albertans with the health care that they need, and also through education.

Mr. Loewen: Given that this Premier has failed on the mental health and addictions file, with substance abuse death rates twice as high as before restrictions, and given that thousands of Albertans, primarily young people and working-age males, have died during the past two years, with the last 20 months having been the deadliest for substance abuse, and given that Albertans are very aware of COVID statistics but most remain wilfully unaware of rising addiction and mental health mortality numbers, how exactly can the Premier be in power for three years, claim that 90 per cent of the platform commitments have been upheld but every failing is still someone else's fault?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Yes, COVID-19, amongst other variables, has had a huge impact on mental health and addiction throughout Alberta and not just Alberta but throughout Canada and, in fact, North America. That's why we are committed to the 8,000 spaces that we've created to help people with addiction and mental health issues. We're committed to five world-class therapeutic communities. We're committed to the virtual opioid dependency program, an award-winning program that provides same-day treatment to anybody who wants evidence-based medication.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Loewen: Given that AHS measures show that as the Premier was celebrating the best summer ever, the health care system was performing worse than ever and given that even with COVID hospitalizations at a seasonal low last summer, wait times across the board were worse than when this government started for everything from emergency departments to most benchmark surgeries and children's mental health access and given that billions more were spent on health care with no discernible result or increase in capacity, at what point will the Premier stop blaming COVID for his own failures to manage and actually improve the health care system?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As said many times in the Chamber, we are investing record levels into our health care system, and we're actually getting some results. I was pleased a couple of weeks ago to announce the chartered surgical facility contracts in ophthalmology, cataract surgeries. We've made tremendous progress over the last year. By using CSFs during the worst part of COVID, we were able to catch up on surgeries. We dropped median wait times from 18 weeks to 10 weeks. That's still too long, and we still need to get them down, but we're continuing to work on it. We took the number of surgeries from roughly 19,000 to 9,000. That's just the beginning, and we're going to get caught up on surgeries.

Addiction Harm Reduction Strategies

Ms Sigurdson: In March researchers at the University of Calgary published their findings on the economic impact of supervised consumption services in Calgary. Over the two years they studied, they found that Safeworks saved the Alberta health system $2.3 million by intervening in overdoses without the use of an ambulance or a trip to an emergency room more than 700 times. That's 700 times when an ambulance or an ER bed was available for another Albertan. Did the associate minister read this report, and does he conclude that we must urgently expand supervised consumption services in our province?

Mr. Ellis: You know, I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the member opposite is aware that in the east side of Vancouver in a three-block radius there are 15 to 20 supervised consumption sites, and it has not reduced at all any of the deaths that are occurring, any of the issues that they have in the east side of Vancouver. We are committed to helping people. Supervised consumption sites are part of our continuum of care, and we do support them. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that the UCP commissioned another report last month to set the table for the fake committee to study safe supply and given that 50 leading researchers and scientists from across Canada cosigned a letter denouncing the report for cherry-picking studies and data to support a predetermined conclusion and given that these Canadian experts said that the report is of, quote, critical low quality and cannot be used as a basis for policy-making, will the associate minister finally admit what everyone already knows, that his fake committee is nothing more than a bad-faith political stunt?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for the NDP quitters' club for asking that question. They are, I would say, consistent with the BCCSU, which is also part of the quitters' club, who was not willing to provide evidence to support their position. Let me be crystal clear. Are we going to call into question Dr. Keith Humphreys, the head of the Stanford-Lancet Commission on the North American Opioid Crisis? Dr. Humphreys wrote a report consistent with that of the Simon Fraser University report. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview is the only one with the call.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that six Albertans die every single day of a preventable drug poisoning and given that there are proven medical interventions that would have spared thousands of Alberta families a lifetime of grief and loss but given that this associate minister and the UCP have refused to get past their own personal prejudices and take action, does the associate minister have any compassion at all, any regrets for the families of Albertans who have died on his watch because of his decisions? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I challenge that member and any member over there to go to the east side of Vancouver, where they have 15 to 20 supervised consumption sites, where they have de facto decriminalization, where they have safe supply . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: The associate minister.

Mr. Ellis: . . . and, quite frankly, they have a state of lawlessness in that zone. Those are the policies that the NDP wants to bring to Alberta. Those are the policies that have caused more harm than any good of anything that they are bringing over to this province. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Foster and Kinship Care Provider Funding

Ms Pancholi: Mr. Speaker, when the safety of a child is threatened and child intervention is involved, thousands of Albertans across the province support these children as foster parents, kinship care providers, or group care providers. These Albertans provide the care for children and youth that the government is legally responsible for, and government provides funding to these caregivers to do so. To the Minister of Children's Services: as cost pressures on all Alberta households rise rapidly, how is the UCP supporting these providers in addressing increasing costs to care for the children in your government's care?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This is very important work, and I am so grateful for the foster and kinship care providers right across the province that open their homes and their families to support some of the most vulnerable children at times of great need. As the member opposite is aware, we did increase our funding specifically to address caseload growth in this area. We know that this is an important area. We have continued to increase the child intervention budget, unlike the members opposite, and we'll continue to listen to what we hear in pilots like we're doing on kinship care.

Ms Pancholi: Given that, like for all other Albertans, the cost of groceries, heating, electricity, insurance has skyrocketed for foster, kinship, and group care homes and given that the maintenance fees for these providers have not been increased for more than three years, putting more pressure on these Albertans who support children and youth in government care, and given that the UCP has denied a request from providers in December for one-time funding of $200 per child to help pay for groceries and heating costs, can the Minister of Children's Services please answer why the UCP's balanced budget has no help in it for the children in their care?

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite is again mistaken. The child intervention budget does continue to increase every single year under this government, unlike the members opposite, who left child intervention underfunded even after an all-party panel on child intervention. We continue to take the feedback that we receive . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. It would be much more helpful for the overall decorum in the Assembly if members kept their conversations across the bow to a minimum.

The hon. minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We'll continue to listen to the feedback that we receive. One good example is, like, kinship families. These are very unique situations. We know that when a child is placed in a family in an emergency situation, they need additional supports, and we're providing those.

Ms Pancholi: That is not what providers have been told. Given that these cost pressures are not going away any time soon and given that these same providers have been told that there will be no increases in maintenance fees now or in the foreseeable future and given that it is appalling that the government, who is legally responsible for these children, refuses to ensure there are adequate funds to pay for the groceries, can the Minister of Children's Services please explain to this Assembly how she expects these foster, kinship, and group homes to feed children in their care? Will they be expected to go to food banks or ask for donations from their neighbours?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Sorry. With all of that, I wasn't able to finish my last answer, so I do want to go back and just explain some of the areas where we do make changes based on the feedback that we receive. One example is in kinship care. We know that these are emergency placements, and one of the things that we heard is that families do struggle to access basic supports that they need. We, in fact, moved up the payments that we provide to kinship care providers, $900 immediately, so families can buy whatever they need to support the child in their care.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Financial Innovation Act

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week this Assembly passed Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act. It's essential for our government to create an investment-friendly environment to position Alberta as a place for growth, delivering jobs, and renewing our economy, and we remain committed to that goal. Given that Bill 13 provides the government the ability to establish a regulatory sandbox for industry to explore innovation and financial products and services here in Alberta, to the Minister of Finance: how will Bill 13 assist in attracting investment to Alberta, and, further, can you explain the types of financial services and products Albertans can expect to see as a result?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. With the passage of Bill 13 Alberta would be the first province in Canada to establish a regulatory sandbox for financial services products. This will attract fintech companies as they will be enabled to offer new, innovative, novel products to Alberta consumers in a time-limited fashion, in a safe fashion. Alberta already employs over 63,000 folks who work in the financial services sector. This will expand that sector.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and, through you, to the minister for his answer. Given that the Financial Innovation Act is set to be the first of its kind in Canada in the fintech space and further given that this act would enable innovators to be exempted for up to two years from select rules and regulations but would still limit them to the guardrails provided by the regulatory sandbox, to the same minister: what safeguards are being put in place to protect consumers while fostering innovation and investment, and how will the privacy and safety of Albertan citizens be ensured throughout the exemption period?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Each applicant would have to meet specific criteria to qualify for the regulatory sandbox. Additional terms, conditions, and restrictions will be imposed, depending on the product, to ensure that these companies are testing their products in a safe and sound manner. We're confident that our approach is the right balance between providing additional flexibility for companies to offer new and novel products and services and ensuring the safety and protection of Alberta consumers.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again, through you, to the minister for that answer. Understanding that Bill 13, now passed, will create this regulatory sandbox for fintech industry players as soon as July 1 of this year and given that one of the criteria for applicants to participate in the sandbox is proof of physical presence in Alberta to maintain eligibility, again to the Minister of Finance: are there companies expected to relocate to Alberta this summer as a result of this provision, and if so, how long will they have to establish residency, and how many jobs are expected to be created as these companies relocate here?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes. We've already received great interest around Bill 13, enabling a regulatory sandbox for financial services and fintech products. Last year we engaged the industry broadly. Fintech companies that were players already in the province of Alberta were very supportive of this initiative. We know that this will spur on activity within the province. We know that this will also attract other companies from outside the province of Alberta into Alberta. This will expand financial services, further diversify the economy, further offer new job opportunities.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

2:30 Athabasca University and Postsecondary Education

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last year the town of Athabasca hired long-term UCP insider Hal Danchilla to help them with their campaign to keep Athabasca University in Athabasca. Danchilla was a co-chair of the Premier's election campaign. This is just another example of pay-to-play politics. If you want help from this government, you need to pay their friends, handsomely sometimes. To the minister: can he tell us why he didn't take any action to help the town of Athabasca until they hired the government's close friend to take up their cause?

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. Of course, the issue with Athabasca University is one that stems from a number of years and, of course, requires a very thoughtful response. That's why we've been working very closely with the university and the town and other interested parties to make sure that we develop a solution that is unique to the environment, one that will enable and allow Athabasca University to succeed as Canada's online university while at the same time creating job opportunities and bringing in employment to the town.

Mr. Eggen: Well, given, Mr. Speaker, that the Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock is a member of this government caucus and theoretically has access to the Minister of Advanced Education and given that Alberta's NDP understands the community desire for a physical campus to stay in Athabasca – we understand that because we were there to listen – and given that the Athabasca county has no faith in their MLA or the minister, otherwise they wouldn't have bothered to hire a lobbyist to do the job, Minister: really, is this how the UCP operates, pay-for-play politics and the only ones benefiting are the rich friends of the members on that side of the House?

Mr. Nicolaides: Mr. Speaker, that's so ridiculous. I don't even know where to start. I mean, the town is free to do what they want and hire who they want. I can't understand. I guess the NDP would put restrictions on what municipalities can do and who they can hire and what businesses they can engage in. As it relates to the Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock, let me just say that the member is a fierce advocate for the community, a strong proponent for the region, more so than the NDP member was for that region when they were in government.

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, given that it's clear this government doesn't even listen to government backbenchers, meaning that their members don't have the ability to actively advocate for their own constituents, and given that clearly this government only listens once money finds its way into the pockets of good friends and allies – it was clearly established that the insurance lobbyists were the ones who successfully removed the annual cap on auto insurance, for example – will someone, anyone, from across the way let us know how much it will actually take to improve postsecondary education? How much money does someone have to spend?

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'd happily take the opportunity to talk about the incredible things that we're doing to advance postsecondary education in the province. We're investing $235 million over the next three years to create 7,000 additional spaces at our postsecondary institutions, expand supports and access for low-income students, expand access and supports for apprenticeship education. On the question of Athabasca I know the members opposite are just annoyed that they didn't have the opportunity to be this courageous and to develop these types of solutions. I know the members opposite agree with my position. That's what they stated in 2016. I'm happy to have their support as well.

Local Government Concerns and Government Caucus

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, for the last seven years I have had the honour of representing the people of Edmonton-West Henday in this Legislature, taking the concerns of my constituents, the organizations and local businesses, and stakeholders here so that I can advocate for them. The county of Lac La Biche has hired a team to lobby the Minister of Health to help them attract and retain physicians. Can the Health minister explain if the MLA for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche raised this issue with him, and if he did, can he explain why his constituents felt the need to hire somebody to do his job for him?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche, as many members of our caucus, has raised issues regarding the delivery of health care services in Alberta. We have listened. We are focused on expanding capacity across our entire province. As I've indicated in this House before, we are investing $600 million this year, $600 million next year, $600 million the year after that; $1.8 billion. We recognize that there are challenges in terms of retaining and attracting health professionals, but we are hiring more. We have almost 2,000 more nurses than two years ago. We have 230 more paramedics, more doctors . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, given that Northern Sunrise county has likewise hired a team of lobbyists to lobby this government to raise awareness of safety issues on highway 744 and given that highway 744 and the concerns have not been brought to this Chamber by the representative of Northern Sunrise county and given that that member was sent to this Chamber to raise these very issues on behalf of his constituents and since that member has not raised these issues here, can the Minister of Transportation please confirm on what dates and times the Member for Peace River raised them with her?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Transportation.

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you for the question, Mr. Speaker. I can tell you that I've had many conversations with many members across the province of Alberta on these transportation topics. Certainly, I have an open-door policy, so if anybody has any specific questions that they would like to bring to me, I'd be happy to hear them out, and I'd be happy to provide more information.

Mr. Carson: Well, given that this government has shown no interest in really investing in or working with municipalities to build affordable housing and given that the town of Gibbons, supposedly represented by the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity, has hired lobbyists to work with the province on the affordable housing projects and given that this clearly means that the concerns of the town of Gibbons are not being heard in the government caucus or at the cabinet table, can the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity explain why his constituency has to pay lobbyists to do his job for him?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, I guess that member should explain why he knows so many lobbyists. Quite frankly, it's not clear to me what the member is talking about. I'm the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity. If he has any questions on that, I'm happy to answer them. If he wants to speak to any lobbyists, he should call them.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Hydrogen Industry

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government is preparing for a lower emission future, and increased hydrogen production will play a big part in our path to economic recovery. To this end, our government released the hydrogen road map in November 2021. This road map outlines a plan for our province to build a provincial hydrogen economy by becoming a major supplier of clean hydrogen to global markets. Can the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity please advise this House on how increased hydrogen production can help Alberta reduce emissions?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Hydrogen is the most abundant element in the universe. In fact, three-quarters of all matter is made up of hydrogen, and the best part is that at combustion hydrogen releases zero emissions. So when you capture the carbon and you have clean hydrogen and you incorporate it into things like mobility and heat and power, industrial uses such as we're proposing in the hydrogen road map, it gives you the opportunity to significantly reduce emissions. In fact, we're forecasting that we're going to reduce emissions by 14 million tonnes by 2030.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that hydrogen represents the next great opportunity for Alberta's energy sector and that Alberta is already the largest hydrogen producer in Canada and given that we already have all the resources, expertise, and technology needed to quickly become a global supplier of clean, low-cost hydrogen, can the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity please advise on the potential economic impact of the hydrogen industry on Alberta's economy?

The Speaker: The hon. the associate minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Hydrogen has the potential to be a 2 and a half to 11 trillion dollar industry; 360,000 jobs by 2050 in Canada. We're going to get as many of those jobs and as much of that investment into Alberta as we possibly can.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again to the minister. Given that Alberta has all the tools to be a global leader in the hydrogen industry, including a skilled workforce, reduced red tape, and low corporate tax rate, and given that Alberta's Industrial Heartland already plays an important role in our energy industry and given that we have many carbon capture and storage facilities in my riding of Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville, can the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity advise what impact the emerging hydrogen industry will have on the Industrial Heartland?

The Speaker: The hon. the associate minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Industrial Heartland is poised to be a huge player in our hydrogen economy. In fact, we've seen four billion-dollar investment announcements in hydrogen in the Industrial Heartland alone. It's going to mean jobs. It's going to mean investments. We're proud of the work that we're doing in hydrogen, and we're going to keep doing that.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Child Care

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you. As many in this House know, child care is essential for the lives of everyday Albertans, including my residents of Spruce Grove and Stony Plain. So many families use these services daily, and thanks to the agreement with the federal government, families will start to see a reduction in costs this year, continuing to $10 a day by 2026. As we come out of the pandemic and more parents return to work, families will be needing access to affordable daycare solutions. To the Minister of Children's Services: where is this government when it comes to making child care more affordable for families who will need it more than ever?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. The great news is that nearly 83,000 kids and their families have been seeing their fees go down by an average of 50 per cent for child care in this province. Families that make less than $120,000 a year are in fact paying an average of about $10 a day. I just received an e-mail from Kaitlyn, a Grande Prairie parent, who said this. "This difference has enabled my family to be able to pay our bills each month." Fees will continue to drop every single year over the next five years.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for her answer. Given that private daycare homes play a big role in helping families receive quality, affordable, and convenient child care and given that these facilities have a long and costly process in order to open and operate their daycare and given that the province is the one who determines if and when new private daycare applications can be accepted, what is the Minister of Children's Services doing to help eliminate some of the hurdles individuals face when trying to create daycare facilities in their communities?

The Speaker: The Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. We did fight to include the entrepreneurs who run private programs and represent around 67 per cent of all Alberta child care spaces. We're investing an additional $300 million to help child care operators recruit and retain staff. As we speak, we have round-tables happening with operators and the child care sector to fine-tune our investments in this area. We're supporting operators to create more child care spaces in all settings right across the province.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given the government's focus on ensuring every child can access affordable and accessible child care and given that it can be especially difficult for families of children with complex or unique needs to find proper child care and further given that last week the minister announced additional funding to support inclusive child care, can the Minister of Children's Services please tell us more about how the inclusive child care program will support these children and their families?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you so much. Last week's announcement of $7 million to support inclusive child care is great news for parents, especially those who have children with special, unique, or diverse needs, Mr. Speaker. This funding will be provided to five agencies who then provide on-site training and support for both operators and educators. This investment is through our agreement with the government of Canada. It will double the number of programs that can now access that support from about 270 to 600 programs. I sure wish that the opposition was as excited about this child care plan as Alberta parents are.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will continue to the remainder of the daily Routine.

Notices of Motions

Member Irwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise to give notice that at the appropriate time under Standing Order 42 I intend to move the following motion:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly acknowledge that on May 2, 2022, a leaked draft decision of the Supreme Court of the United States indicates that the court intends to overturn its decisions in Roe versus Wade and Planned Parenthood versus Casey and that the reversal of these landmark judicial decisions would fundamentally erode reproductive rights and access to health services for women in North America. Be it further resolved that the Legislative Assembly condemn any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that would limit reproductive rights and affirm that access to reproductive health services, including abortion services, is a fundamental right and freedom of all women in Alberta.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in just a couple of seconds here we'll proceed to the Standing Order 42, but I want to allow the pages some time to distribute some copies of the motion to the members in the Assembly prior to asking the member to move it.

Motions under Standing Order 42

The Speaker: Hon. members, there were no points of order today, so we will immediately proceed. At the appropriate time, during Notices of Motions, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood gave notice of her desire to move a Standing Order 42. As such, she has up to five minutes to do that now and speak to the urgency of this matter.

Women's Reproductive Rights

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise pursuant to Standing Order 42 to request that the ordinary business of the Legislature be adjourned to debate a motion that is quite urgent and pressing and which I read out just earlier under Notices of Motions. I would like to acknowledge that pursuant to SO 42 I have provided the members of this Assembly with the appropriate number of copies, and I provided your office notice of my intention to move this motion as well as notified the government.

Mr. Speaker, it is our duty as representatives in this Assembly to stand up for the rights of women and gender-diverse folks in our society, and that includes the legal right to seek an abortion. As the motion indicates, for one of the world's largest democracies to roll back women's rights by two generations, it would truly have ripple effects throughout the world. It would embolden those who seek to roll back our rights in Canada. Let me be clear: autonomy over our own bodies is being threatened. This is why this debate is so very important and so very pressing.

While access to abortion is currently decriminalized in Canada, there are still barriers to services and barriers to support. While I won't get into a debate on this matter, I must note there is currently a bill before this House allowing bereavement leave for pregnancy loss, but this bill only provides leave when a woman has a miscarriage or stillbirth. It discriminates in terms of the kinds of pregnancy loss that one might experience. Pregnancy loss through either an abortion or termination for medical reasons is a right in Alberta and in this country, but it's a right that we must fight for each and every day. It is these rights that are under threat, as we see in the United States, where they are about to take a massive step backwards and undermine decades of progress.

On this side of the House we stand with women. We stand with gender-diverse folks here in our province and around the world. We will continue to fight for reproductive freedom, and we will defend abortion rights. I know it's a dark day for many. It's a hard day. The landmark decisions in Roe v. Wade and Planned Parenthood v. Casey were historic victories for all. We do not want to see these victories rolled back. News of the Supreme Court's impending decision makes it clear that the fight for equality may never be truly over. It is a stark reminder that elections have consequences and that our most basic right, to control our own bodies, is very much under threat.

We cannot be complacent. We cannot ever take these rights for granted, and the fight for our rights has suddenly just taken on new urgency. That is why I'm bringing forward this motion. This Legislature should speak with one united voice that we respect women's rights and that we won't equivocate on matters as fundamental as reproductive rights. This Legislature must affirm access to reproductive health services, including abortion services, because it truly is a fundamental right and freedom for all Albertans. This Legislature must condemn any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that would limit reproductive rights. We must be steadfast. We must be unshakable in our commitment to women's rights and to the rights of the 2SLGBTQ-plus community.

This is why I'm standing here in the Chamber today encouraging, urging members of this Assembly to take this matter seriously, to not dismiss it as something happening somewhere else, to accept and to acknowledge that an attack on women's health care, an attack on the health care for trans and queer Albertans is an attack on all of us. That is why I'm urging this Assembly to take this seriously, to put aside the ordinary business of the day in order to debate this critically important motion. Nothing could be more serious.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, pursuant to Standing Order 42 this is a request for unanimous consent but allows a member of Executive Council to respond for up to five minutes. I see the Associate Minister of Status of Women has risen to do that.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, I must say that I reject the premise of most of this motion. I'm going to start with "a leaked draft decision of the Supreme Court of the United States." First of all, it's unverified; number two, it's a foreign country; number three, it doesn't affect Canadian law; and, number four, this area of law actually exists under purely federal jurisdiction.

"The reversal of these landmark judicial decisions would fundamentally erode reproductive rights and access to health services for women in North America." I'd like to remind the members opposite that we live in Canada. The Supreme Court of the United States is the court for the United States, not for North America, not for Mexico, and certainly not for Canada. We are not in America.

The next assertion: "condemn any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that would limit reproductive rights." Condemning a decision of a foreign court: it's pretty normal for governments to condemn the decisions of other governments; condemning the decisions of other countries' courts is not acceptable. It's not acceptable for the United States to condemn decisions from our courts, and we don't condemn decisions from their courts. If you want to condemn the United States government, you can do that, but not their courts.

Finally: "affirm that access to reproductive health services, including abortion services, is a fundamental right and freedom of all women in Alberta." I'd like to talk about reproductive health for women in Alberta for a moment, and I'm going to remind the folks in this Assembly that we have a number of women MLAs in this Assembly, and certainly women's health issues affect female MLAs, like they do every other woman in Alberta. In addition to reproductive health issues around terminating pregnancies, I'd like to raise a couple more issues such as endometriosis: painful, sometimes debilitating, and – guess what? – often misdiagnosed. In this Chamber there are probably four of us female MLAs who'll be affected by it. Ten per cent of Alberta women will be affected by fertility issues, and the list goes on.

When we talk about women's health issues, the members opposite have raised over and over again access to women's health services in rural versus urban Alberta. Well, I'm going to remind the opposition of something else. While they were in government, they actually diverted capital from rural areas into urban centres. That's what they did while they were in government.

There's lots to talk about on women's health issues, and we're going to talk about them more and more as time goes on, because my department is working very hard on them. In fact, next week I'm going to be participating in a women's reproductive health activity, and I'd sure like the members opposite to participate with me. I'll look forward to that.

In the meantime I don't see this as anywhere near an emergency debate. Again, the premise of it, with respect to dealing with foreign courts, does not at all indicate we should have an emergency debate about it.

On that, Mr. Speaker, I'll take my seat.

[Unanimous consent denied]

The Speaker: Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 15
Education (Reforming Teacher
Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022

The Chair: This is the bill's first time in Committee of the Whole. Are there any members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to rise today to speak and to address Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022. Many in this Legislature know that prior to serving as an MLA, I was a public high school teacher for 30 years and therefore a member of the Alberta Teachers' Association. Over my 30 years of teaching I, like many teachers, served as a school rep on my ATA local and at various times attended local meetings and various assemblies of the ATA. While I'm no longer a member of the ATA, I am fairly conversant with many of the issues that surround the ATA and, in particular, Bill 15. They are serious and important issues that will need careful and, I believe, nuanced consideration.

Throughout my tenure as a member of the ATA one of the largest concerns expressed by the ATA executive and many of my fellow ATA members revolved around the issue of whether the functions or the professional duties of the ATA should be separated from the mandate of the ATA to represent teachers at the bargaining table. Both are important functions. Bill 15 impacts both of these functions as it separates the professional disciplinary function from the oversight of the ATA to an independent commissioner. Many, many times I have listened to ATA executives and representatives and members argue that the ATA must remain as the organization in control of both the professional and the union functions of its membership. There was and still is, I believe, a firm belief within the teaching profession that to separate these two functions will impact the collegiality within the school community.

There is some merit in this argument, but it is not the only consideration when looking at Bill 15 and whether or not it should be passed. In my experience, schools are not the same as businesses. It is critical for the administration and the teachers to be working collaboratively together. By overseeing both the professional and union functions within the ATA, teachers and administrators are held to the same professional code of conduct. And to the credit of the teaching profession, rarely do the bargaining conditions, wages, and job descriptions negatively impact professional relationships within the school community. Teaching is, first and foremost, about fostering good relationships, because only then will there be the trust necessary to make a meaningful and positive impact on education and the school community.

Yet after a great deal of thought I will be supporting Bill 15 for two very specific reasons. One, because there appears to be a significant problem with the discipline process as it now stands, and secondly, because I believe that Bill 15 will bring forward benefits to teachers, students, and our system of education.

I want to start by addressing what Bill 15 actually does and what it actually changes. When addressing the professional side of education, it must be understood that the teaching profession has not been organized like other professions. In fact, every profession organizes itself and its discipline process in unique and different ways. Doctors organize, set professional standards, and discipline their membership differently than do lawyers or engineers or nurses or teachers. In the case of teachers, there have always been multiple players working co-operatively within the profession, impacting professional credentialing, setting up professional standards and the discipline of teachers.

Presently in Alberta there is a role for the Minister of Education, for the registrar, and for the ATA to play within the profession, and this has made the profession different from many of the other professions in how they set and address credentialing, professional standards, and discipline. Bill 15 is going to significantly change how the discipline process will function in the province of Alberta. Bill 15 will change how the government and the teaching profession address the competence of teachers and the professional conduct of teachers. Bill 15 will create a new office to help address the issues of teacher and teacher leader professional conduct and teacher and teacher leader competence.

Alberta has a long history of independent commissioners, like the Privacy Commissioner or the Ethics Commissioner, and Bill 15 will create a new Alberta teaching profession commissioner to oversee the discipline process, for the most part supplanting the role the ATA played in that discipline process. Bill 15 will allow the Minister of Education to appoint a panel to address professional conduct and competency, and this panel can appoint a hearing committee and an appeal committee within the discipline process. Under Bill 15 any person may make a complaint in writing to the registrar, and the registrar may refer the matter to the commissioner for investigation. A hearing panel can be formed to adjudicate the complaint as long as the issue of professional competence occurred within two years of lodging a complaint. This time limit, however, does not apply to an issue of professional conduct.

Upon receiving the complaint, the commissioner will make preliminary inquiries, upon which the commissioner may decide to take no further action, refer the complaint to a mediator, to dispute resolution, or appoint an investigator for further investigation. If, upon completing preliminary investigations, the commissioner believes further action is necessary, the commissioner will inform the teacher or teacher leader and the registrar and create a hearing panel. Once the panel arrives at a decision, the complainant may appeal the decision through the creation of an appeal panel. All decisions will be forwarded to the commissioner, the registrar, and the Minister of Education, and the Minister of Education will continue to have the responsibility of removing or suspending the teaching certificate or certificates or credentials of a teacher or a teacher leader.

This is a significant change to the present system of addressing teacher and teacher leader competence and professional conduct, and as I have read through Bill 15, I believe that it is a reasonable way to handle these two issues of competence and professional conduct and will address some of the problems that presently exist and will provide some added benefits to the profession.

So what problems need to be fixed? Over my years as a teacher and subsequently as an MLA I've heard the following arguments for why the discipline process needs to change. There's a perception by many outside of the teaching profession that there is a conflict of interest within the discipline process because the ATA oversees both union and professional discipline functions within itself. I find this, to a certain degree, to be a fairly subjective argument.

It is true that the ATA often has to try and accomplish the two purposes of both protecting its members while also disciplining them. The ATA mission statement in 1993 reads:

The Alberta Teachers' Association, as the professional organization of teachers, promotes and advances public education, safeguards standards of professional practice and serves as the advocate for its members.

The Teaching Profession Act states that the objectives of the Alberta Teachers' Association are "to improve the teaching profession . . . by advising, assisting, protecting and disciplining members in the discharge of their professional duties and relationships." Protecting and disciplining: in both cases we see that the ATA, like a good parent, has the responsibility of advocating for its members while at the same time protecting the professional practice of the profession through its disciplinary practice.

While I will not go into case studies, there are times when complaints have come forward to the minister or to the registrar that appear to highlight the problem of a conflict of interest. While anecdotal and, I believe, relatively rare, these cases speak to the times when an investigation into a complaint has done a disservice to the student or to a family, when the teacher is protected rather than moving forward through the discipline process.

Even more rarely do we see problems occur at the hearing level of the discipline process, but they have occurred. I do believe that the Michael Gregory case speaks to a problem within the system. In this case, it was not a breakdown at the investigatory phase of the discipline process but at the hearing phase. Upon being found guilty of unprofessional conduct due to the sexual abuse of many students and rightfully having his teaching certificate suspended, the ATA did not, in turn, pass on to the police this criminal abuse. Now, it must be noted that neither did the registrar, nor did the Minister of Education of the day.

As shocking as this is, I am very disturbed that the present leadership of the ATA, which oversees the present discipline process, believes that they are not required to report to the police a finding by the ATA disciplinary body that a member has been suspended due to what is clearly a criminal offence involving children. This speaks to a breakdown of the process, and it is my opinion that the ATA position to not report is clearly not in the best interests of either students or parents or the teachers within the profession.

Bill 15 will address this with a duty to report findings to the minister and to the registrar. Any suspension of a teaching certificate or certificates will be published in an online registry that the public can access, and there will be a duty to report to the police. This duty to report unprofessional conduct, especially of a criminal nature, is clearly in the best interests of the students, the parents, and the profession in its entirety, and in its entirety it has my complete support.

The disciplinary process also addresses teacher and teacher leader competence, not just unprofessional conduct. There appear to be problems with how the profession addresses this under the present system. Over my 30 years as a teacher the vast majority of the teachers I interacted with were hard working and highly professional. The children I taught were always individuals who brought those strengths and weaknesses and learnings into my classroom. It was my job to assess where those students were at and to try, through a wide range of pedagogical methods, to help each student to engage with the curriculum, assimilate the skills and knowledge, and interact with that knowledge to bring about a higher understanding of the material under study.

The standard for doing this was never perfection. I was not a perfect teacher; neither did I teach perfect students or have perfect parents or perfect administrators to support both myself and the students. At the same time, the profession must be prepared to address those very few teachers who over time do not meet the teacher qualification standards and are therefore not professionally competent.

There are over 40,000 teachers in the province of Alberta, yet under the present system over the past 10 years there has not been a single hearing for teacher incompetence. This should be concerning. Admittedly, our postsecondary system of education prepares our education graduates, and they do an amazing job. We prepare some of the best educators in the world to teach within our schools in Alberta, but there are also teachers who struggle, and we seem to have a problem identifying them and then addressing the issue of teacher competence when it arises. This seems to point to a problem of a conflict of interest within the discipline process, a process overseen by the ATA, where the professional responsibility for identifying and addressing teacher competence appears to be subservient to job protection.

So I conclude that Bill 15 addresses a problem in the discipline process in a reasonable fashion by introducing a process that will be headed by a familiar and a successful practice of appointing an independent commissioner to oversee the discipline process. At the end of the day, this is not solely about the ATA and its capacity to oversee both the functions of a union and a professional association; Bill 15 is primarily about ensuring that our students are safe and that the discipline process that addresses teacher competence and professional conduct is transparent and accountable. I believe that Bill 15 moves us in that direction, and I also believe that there are some benefits that will come with the passage of Bill 15.

Bill 15 will create a single, effective, consistent, and efficient discipline process that will oversee every teacher, principal, superintendent across the system regardless of where they're employed or if they are a member of the Alberta Teachers' Association. What many people don't realize is that presently teachers employed in independent schools or charter schools are not members of the ATA, and therefore they actually fall under a separate discipline process in the province of Alberta. Bill 15 will ensure that all teachers and all teacher leaders, regardless of where they are employed, will fall under one discipline process overseen by the commissioner. Placing all teachers under one process ensures that consistency and transparency and accountability will be applied to all teachers and to all teacher leaders, and therefore it raises the bar for every teacher and ensures that all students in the province of Alberta will benefit.

While this should not be necessary, Bill 15 will reinforce requirements for education system stakeholders – stakeholders like the Alberta Education registrar, the commissioner, the ATA, the College of Alberta School Superintendents, and employers – to report to police when there may have been serious harm or a threat to student safety. Why we should have to put that in legislation I am not sure, but it needs to be there, obviously.

It makes sense to me that the registrar at Alberta Education be responsible for the intake of all complaints in the province, and this will help avoid duplication of complaints. The Alberta teaching profession commissioner will have the authority to address and to investigate a complaint and determine the most appropriate course of action to take regarding that complaint. By making the discipline process more transparent, both student safety and the teaching profession are actually enhanced.

By further expanding the online teacher registry established under the students first act, the following will be made publicly available: all hearing, appeal, and minister's decisions where there is a finding of unprofessional conduct or professional incompetence will be publicly available to all Albertans; any consent resolution agreements initiated by the new Alberta teaching profession commissioner where there is a finding of unprofessional incompetence or unprofessional conduct will be publicly available to Albertans; all hearings and appeal dates will be publicly posted and available. This raises the bar, and this is in the best interests of the profession.

My decision to support Bill 15 is not based on a desire to weaken the profession or to weaken the public system of education but the exact opposite: to enhance it, to strengthen it, to protect. My support for Bill 15 is not so that the government can distract from decisions on the curriculum or funding that the ATA has not agreed with, as some have charged. That is a red herring argument brought forward by those who seem to be unwilling to address the serious issue of professional discipline. Rather, I believe Bill 15 could lead to greater accountability, greater public assurance, and consistency in addressing complaints under one legislated governance structure by the commissioner's office, which in the long run, I believe, will be best for students and for the profession as a whole.

Madam Chair, Bill 15, I believe, is a step forward in the teaching profession. It addresses some of the issues that have obviously come to fruition as we've looked at the discipline process, and finally it does make some positive changes. It will therefore have my support.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there others wishing to speak to Bill 15? The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Mr. Stephan: Madam Chair, thank you. I would like to stand in support of Bill 15, the Education Amendment Act, 2022. I want to share an experience with the Legislature. Shortly after my election as the MLA for Red Deer-South central Alberta representatives of the Alberta Teachers' Association asked to meet with me. I said yes. In the course of our meeting I asked the ATA union two questions. First, I asked them what the ATA union could do better to serve children, who are the heart of our education system, not the ATA union. Second, I asked the union: how many teachers last year were let go for incompetence? The ATA union said that they would get back to me with answers to those questions. I never heard back from them.

Madam Chair, since that time I have learned the answer to one of those questions. As mentioned, there are over 45,000 teachers under the ATA union, yet over the past 10 years with the ATA union in charge there was not a single hearing for teacher incompetence. Nobody believes that in the past 10 years there was not a single incompetent teacher in Alberta. This is proof positive that the ATA union was not diligent in its trust to protect higher standards for the teaching profession. The ATA union has lost its moral authority to be entrusted with this stewardship.

Madam Chair, by way of contrast, I am a member of the Law Society of Alberta, and if I am incompetent, I get sued. In some cases a grossly incompetent lawyer can also be disciplined and even disbarred. The Law Society posts notifications of these actions. Now, providing legal advice and teaching children have differences, but both are important. There need to be mechanisms to address incompetence.

The ATA union failed to do so. Albertans may conclude that either the ATA union is incompetent in identifying and addressing incompetence or they were influenced by a conflict of interest as the union being a discipline body. Madam Chair, which is it? I do not know. Maybe it was some of both. The ATA union certainly is in a conflict of interest running teacher discipline. As it relates, though, to conflicts of interest, it is not only important to avoid an actual conflict but to avoid the perception of conflict.

Bill 15 takes teacher discipline away from the union. The ATA union does not like Bill 15. It reduces their power. It is interesting to see the ATA union arguing against Bill 15. They did not do a good job. Does that matter? They are in a conflict of interest. Does it matter? The union argues that they should regulate themselves, that they should be immune from government accountability. But, Madam Chair, just as a lawyer is accountable to a client who pays their bills, so should teachers have some accountability to those who pay their bills, in large part the parents of children, who pay taxes to government, who fund, through them, public education.

Teachers and the ATA union are not the same thing. The ATA union should not conflate teachers with the union. The ATA is a public-sector union. Sometimes the ATA union will represent themselves not only as teachers but also as students and parents, but, Madam Chair, what happens when the interests of the ATA union are not aligned with children, parents, or Albertans, who fund our education system? When push comes to shove, the ATA union is in a conflict of interest to put interests of teachers, even if it is contrary to the interests of children, parents, or Albertans – they may not wish to admit it, but that is the truth.

Yet using proxies and their own communications, they will sometimes seek to frame a self-serving position as in the interests of parents and children. Often there is alignment, but sometimes there is not. We see this when a union will strike near the end of a school year and claim they are acting in the interests of students. Madam Chair, that is not in the interests of students. This makes Alberta cynical and less trustful, when unions distort the truth.

Now, the majority of teachers are competent, seeking to be excellent, to teach and serve children. I have experienced that myself both as a student, and I have seen it as a parent. To those teachers: thank you. Teaching is a rewarding and wonderful opportunity to serve. But, Madam Chair, it is so important that we ensure that there is an accountability and standard of excellence. While it is the exception rather than the rule, let's confront reality to strengthen the profession for the majority of teachers. Let's nurture an increased culture of excellence. Removing conflicts of interest furthers this overarching objective.

Madam Chair, children are the heart of our education system, not the ATA union. Teaching our children is a privilege and serious responsibility. Done well, it can be rewarding and fulfilling. I want a culture of excellence in our teaching profession. It is too important to do otherwise. Bill 15 seeks to put the best interests of children first in the teacher discipline process. By so doing, Bill 15 not only increases student safety but will strengthen the standard and reputation of the teaching profession. That is something that I hope that we can all agree on. It is in the public interest.

With that, Madam Chair, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 16 Insurance Amendment Act, 2022

The Chair: Are there speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. It's an honour to rise this afternoon to speak to the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022. I thank the minister for bringing it forward. Just spending some time reviewing exactly what this legislation is doing. Of course, last year the UCP government passed the Captive Insurance Companies Act, which allowed captive insurance companies to set up, get licensed, and operate in Alberta. What we're seeing in this legislation is making one substantive change, that was recently passed through that previous act, regarding redomestication provisions, ensuring that Alberta-based companies who have captive insurance companies operating outside of Canada are able to bring those operations home. I guess this is finalizing or adding onto some of that previous legislation regarding the Captive Insurance Companies Act, which we saw previously.

It's an interesting topic that we have before us, where we see insurance companies across the world less and less likely to insure oil and gas projects, specifically energy projects within the fossil fuel industry or sector, so we find ourselves in a position where we need to look within our own jurisdiction and our own regulatory opportunities to provide that insurance. I think that it's a reasonable ask, to try and bring some of that insurance back in-house or offered by organizations within the province when it comes to insuring our own liabilities.

But it's also important, I think, to reflect on how or why exactly we have come to this point in the first place. Obviously, there are many external pressures, one being that the returns for these insurance companies are increasingly being affected by things like extreme weather events and climate change concerns, both what the environment is doing to projects and what that is costing these energy companies as well as the insurers of those projects but also, I would say, external pressures around people's perspective on these types of projects as well. That's not just, you know, regular people across North America or across the world but also how investors are looking at these projects. I again appreciate where the minister is coming from regarding this Insurance Amendment Act and the idea of captive insurance across the province, ensuring that we are able to properly insure the energy sector here where in some cases it's becoming increasingly hard to provide or get that insurance elsewhere.

Now, with that being said, Madam Chair, I think it's also important to reflect on the fact that the UCP is as a government moving towards making it easier for large companies to receive insurance or become insured, but on the other hand, when it comes to regular Albertans, we've seen this government do the exact opposite. Take, for example, at the beginning of this government's term, their decision to let the 5 per cent cap on personal auto insurance lapse. Since then we have seen skyrocketing insurance costs for Alberta families, upwards of 30 per cent, if not higher in some instances. Again and again, as we see these inflationary pressures and as we see so many Albertans struggling to have to make decisions between keeping their lights on or putting food on their table, unfortunately, this government has done nothing to support them.

We continue on those calls. I believe just recently we called for a further cap on personal auto insurance, to the point of calling for a zero per cent increase over the next year, recognizing that so many Albertans are still struggling with the ongoing pandemic and the increasing costs that they're seeing across this province because of decisions that the UCP has made. Again, I think it's an important contrast, Madam Chair, to recognize that on one hand we have this government willing to do anything possible to ensure that these companies are able to hold onto insurance, going as far as creating new opportunities to provide this insurance and create new companies, potentially, that may have otherwise not been possible and changing regulations on that matter, but, on the other hand, making decisions to reduce coverage for Albertans who find themselves in potentially life-altering collisions, reducing the amount of payout that Albertans are getting, and still letting those insurance premiums get out of hand and skyrocket upwards of 30 per cent for many Albertans. And we continue down that path with no assurances that that is going to change by any means.

3:30

Again, as we reflect on the Insurance Amendment Act before us, I think that it's reasonable to expect these types of regulatory changes to allow these companies to provide this captive insurance opportunity and to potentially bring home some of the companies who are currently operating outside of Canadian jurisdictions, to ensure that, whether we're talking about potentially insuring tailings ponds or insuring wells, there are going to be opportunities for those companies to get insurance.

I think that there's also another important discussion that we need to have in terms of the support and the costs that we are incurring as a province based on things like orphaned oil wells. Unfortunately, there are many conversations that still need to take place regarding insurance for these companies and regarding often the liabilities that are being put back on municipalities when we aren't properly assessing the costs and potentially aren't expecting the right type of insurance for such energy projects.

I do look forward to hearing more from the minister. Potentially some questions that I would be interested in finding out: how many companies we believe across the province are going to benefit from this idea of reinsurance or captive insurance; how many companies, insurance companies specifically, working outside of Canadian jurisdictions that are potentially offering insurance even for energy companies outside of North America we expect to come home; what type of capital we expect to be brought back into our provincial jurisdiction with some of these changes. Again, I look forward to seeing how this legislation rolls out and what type of economic opportunities there are here.

Finally, I would say that, again, while we have the Insurance Act open before us, we've had many opportunities in this House not only today but previously to ensure that we are supporting Albertans to the best of our abilities. Why are we seeing decisions like this made but, on the other hand, leaving consumers, specifically around personal auto insurance, behind? We do have a real opportunity here with these changes that we see before us to support, in many cases, medium-sized and large energy companies. I think it's an important move, but I think it's just as important to ensure that the Albertans who are depending on us to get their kids to school in the morning, get themselves to work so that they can put food on the table and keep the lights on in their house – I think we have a responsibility to them as well to do everything we can in this House to support them with their household budgets and, in this instance, the skyrocketing rate of premium increases that we are seeing under this UCP government.

With that, Madam Chair, I will take my seat, but I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this legislation. I think that it's a reasonable request of the minister. I think that there are likely to be more questions as we see this industry start to take place here in the province, and at that point we will continue this conversation.

Thank you. [interjections]

The Chair: Hon. members, just a reminder that while Committee of the Whole is certainly a more casual and lenient time of debate and light conversation, there still needs to be the opportunity for members to be heard despite the activities you have going on. Just a reminder that the lounge is available for all that wish to have louder chats in the Chamber.

At this time I am seeking speakers to Bill 16. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022. I'm happy to see that so many members of the Chamber are in jovial moods as we debate this piece of legislation. Well, most members, anyway. No; with that, I jest as I'm looking at members smiling back.

I'm happy to talk to this bill. You know, the long of the short is that I support this bill in how it's amending the Insurance Act and recognize that likely when the Minister of Finance brought forward the Insurance Act in our last session, that brought in captive insurance as a solution to a niche problem. I respect the fact that it's easy sometimes even for government to miss some nuances. In this,

I suspect that members from our energy sector came forward and approached the minister and government with the challenge that they face.

Obviously, the energy sector, critical to Alberta's economy and critical, quite frankly, to the Canadian economy, requires a great deal of insurance. They have very expensive assets. This bill – and I'll talk through it a little bit – will provide an opportunity and a potential solution. I mean, it'll be interesting to see what companies do with the changes in this bill. And then, Madam Chair, in my time I will circle back to the fact that here we have an amendment to a bill that was done last year, and I'm not criticizing the government or anyone for doing that. That happened under our term as well, where bills had to be reopened.

But the disappointment I have in the bill in its current form, Madam Chair, is that we've missed an opportunity, an opportunity to provide relief for drivers. We know that drivers have experienced significant jumps in their premiums, myself included, over the past couple of years. You know, it's an interesting discourse in that under our government we put in a rate cap of 5 per cent, which is nothing to sneeze at. I mean, the fact that companies could increase the fees by 5 per cent per year for most years: that outpaces inflation. Again, we're at a period in our time where we're seeing record-high inflation. Well, record in the past 30 years. Drivers have seen their costs shoot up, yet there has been very little relief for drivers.

Now, I will admit, Madam Chair, that the insurance cap was not meant to be a permanent, long-term solution. It was meant to be an interim solution to work with industry to come up with what would be a reasonable amount for them to charge drivers, recognizing, quite frankly, that costs for insurance companies have gone up significantly. Quite frankly, I recently had a conversation with folks in this space, and although we have – you know, cars are being built with all of these sensors and safety mechanisms that, in theory, should help reduce the number of accidents that people get into. The challenge is that, when you think about how many sensors are in your bumpers, what used to be a small fender-bender, that could be fixed for a few hundred dollars, is now costing thousands and thousands of dollars because of the sensors that are in them.

I say this, Madam Chair, to acknowledge the reality that insurance companies are facing and why rates and costs are going up, but at the same time we also need to recognize that wages have not gone up concurrently with cost of living, so Albertans have fewer and fewer dollars at the end of the month. We've heard a number of stories where Albertans have to choose between, you know, paying their bills and having enough money for groceries, or that Albertans are also deferring – I won't even call them luxuries but just certain purchases that they have to put off. In this bill there was an opportunity to address the challenges that Albertans are facing, again, providing some kind of relief for drivers.

The other thing that's missing – and then I'll go back to the meat and potatoes of this bill – is that the government is no longer producing a report that they used to. The Minister of Finance used to prepare the superintendent of insurance annual report every year. That was done for many, many years. I don't have the date of when it started in front of me, but I know that this was customary for many years, including when we served in government, our term, to long before. You know, the fact that the report was produced right before a long weekend, on a Thursday beforehand: I can tell you, Madam Chair, that what that does is that it makes Albertans question why it's being made public late in the week ahead of a long weekend. Is it trying to be buried, or what is the reason if not that? It definitely raises questions for folks.

Here are the different opportunities that were missed in this bill. Legislating that report to be produced and shared with the public would be one thing that we would have liked to have seen in this bill, the other being relief for drivers that's missing.

I'll get into some of the changes in this bill. Again, as I mentioned, the one substantive change that is now in this bill: when we talk about the Captive Insurance Companies Act, that was passed last year, it creates redomestication provisions, which in my understanding – and I have a limited understanding in this. It basically allows Alberta companies who have a captive insurance company located outside of the province and internationally, so somewhere in the U.S. or elsewhere – they can bring them back home here to Alberta without any disruption to the services that it's providing.

Again, there are reasons that companies will want to do this. In fact, I have learned, for example, that Suncor has a number of companies that they will now redomesticate back here in Alberta. I think that's great news. We want our companies to be here at home. Obviously, there are additional benefits for the province such as, you know, greater tax revenues from that. I appreciate the conversations that took place between ministry officials and the Official Opposition where they indicated that they were pleasantly surprised at the amount of interest companies have in this part of the bill and how many have indicated that they will be redomesticated. So that's good news, Madam Chair, and I definitely support that.

The second thing that this bill is doing is making changes to allow Alberta to license stand-alone reinsurance companies in Alberta. Again, here, essentially, my understanding of reinsurance is that it's insurance for insurance companies. There are a small number of large global players that do this, that provide this type of insurance, so here we're ensuring that Alberta's oil and gas companies can have that type of insurance. Obviously, it's critical for them, as I mentioned earlier. What this may do is – I mean, it provides the ability or the opportunity for the energy sector to look at potentially creating a reinsurance company or several companies here at home. It doesn't guarantee it, but it provides that provision or is an enabling piece of legislation.

You know, my understanding of this is that it's a good-faith attempt. It's something that the government is hoping companies will take advantage of. It provides that opportunity for them for a solution that is not a risk to the province. What I appreciate about this is that it's not the province backstopping or being the reinsurer; this is about providing the private sector with the ability to do that. When I first read that, Madam Chair, I thought: well, this seems like an innovative solution to a challenge that industry is facing. Hats off to industry for coming up with this potential solution. I would imagine it came from industry. But either way, another reason for me to support this bill.

The third, Madam Chair, is making it easier for Alberta companies to access unlicensed insurance. Now, companies can only access insurance from unlicensed insurance companies – in other words, insurers that are not licensed in Canada – only in circumstances where there are no domestic insurers that will underwrite a policy for a particular risk. I appreciate that this is going way into the weeds, but I recognize that the challenge with how it's currently structured is that if you have an unlicensed insurance company operating in another country and, for example, they decided that they aren't going to pay out a policy – or, say, they go under – there's no recourse. Again, if we're talking about our energy sector companies, these are companies that have assets in the billions, so if there is a major disruption or need for them to call in their policy, they may not be able to, and that is an incredible risk that they shouldn't have to bear.

There are other details in my notes that really go even further down into the weeds, so really the thrust of my comments here today, Madam Chair, are that I support this bill, the three different parts of it and what it's going to do and what it potentially could do, again, you know, fixing a problem that I'm sure was recently discovered after last year's legislation.

But I'd be remiss if I didn't point out the fact that there was a missed opportunity here to provide some real relief for Alberta drivers. I know that between insurance costs and the high cost of gasoline many folks are taking the bus, are leaving their vehicles parked at home. I appreciate the fact that the government brought in some relief to drivers at the pumps, but, again, when you look at the costs and how they've compounded, it's a real struggle for Albertans. Again, it's not just insurance and gas; it's also the cost of utilities for folks.

You know, at least when I was watching BNN this morning, it sounds like there's going to be another rate hike on insurance, which may have already happened as I've been in this Chamber. That's going to impact Albertans who have a substantial amount of debt. That's going to impact mortgage rates. That's going to impact lines of credit. Again, I appreciate the fact that the lenders are looking at trying to get a grip on the rising pace of inflation, yet at the same time that's going to have a very real effect on individual Albertans and Alberta families. In this bill I wish the minister would have brought forward some tangible measures and ideas to be able to provide relief for drivers when it comes to rising insurance rates.

Now, my final comment as I wrap up, Madam Chair, is that I appreciate that the minister has said that his advice has been that rates should start coming down – and maybe that's the case; I'll wait with my fingers crossed – but I can tell you, from talking to individual Albertans and constituents, that they have not seen their rates start to drop yet. Again, relief was needed months ago, it's needed now, and it's unfortunate that this bill doesn't address that.

But for all the reasons I laid out, Madam Chair, I will be supporting this bill. Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to Bill 16? The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Jones: Very good, Madam Chair. It's great to hear the supportive comments on Bill 16 from the members opposite. I think it's a good bill that everybody can support. The Insurance Amendment Act, 2022, further advances our efforts to modernize and grow Alberta's insurance and financial services sector. The proposed amendments in this bill amend the recently passed Captive Insurance Companies Act. Specifically, they would add reinsurance provisions to the Insurance Act, allowing provincially licensed insurance companies to solely focus on reinsurance and to enter into limited partnerships to do so. Reinsurance is essentially insurance for insurance companies.

Many people are not aware, but the reinsurance industry in Canada is limited, comprised mostly of foreign-based enterprises, many of them operating through subsidiaries and engaging in businesses in Canada through a branch. In fact, most of the reinsurance capacity right now is located in Europe, the United States, and places like Bermuda. As you can appreciate, Madam Chair, this can make it challenging at times for Canadian and Alberta-based insurers to access reinsurance. It's important that we do everything we can to attract additional insurance capacity to Alberta and to diversify insurance offerings. Diversifying Alberta's insurance sector will have both short-term and long-term benefits for the province's economy, our businesses, and Albertans broadly.

This bill also proposes new redomestication provisions for the recently passed Captive Insurance Companies Act to specifically address the relocation of foreign captives to Alberta. The new provisions will help companies understand how they should bring their foreign captives to Alberta.

Lastly, Bill 16 makes a number of administrative amendments to the Insurance Act, which should help to ensure a clear and efficient regulatory framework for the conduct of insurance businesses in the province.

Again, I'm pleased to hear that the members opposite support this bill. It's a good bill and another step forward, and I encourage all members to vote in support of it. Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to speak to this bill, Bill 16, Insurance Amendment Act, 2022. It's my first opportunity to speak to this bill, and it's an important piece of legislation. In fact, insurance is important. It's the way people manage their risks, and these policies are used to hedge against the losses, whether they are personal injury kinds of losses, whether they're financial losses, property losses. These products, this new concept, are critically important to managing the risk in our society.

For the constituency I represent, it's more important for many reasons as well. Part of the area I represent was hit by the fourth-costliest natural disaster in Canadian history – the fourth-costliest natural disaster in Canadian history – and I do live in my riding as well and personally was impacted by that. You know, I also saw the destruction that hailstorm levelled across my constituency, across northeast Calgary. People's homes were destroyed, their sidings were shredded, and their cars were destroyed.

There were many losses that were not covered by insurance policies, and there were many reasons for that. One of the reasons was that it was during the pandemic. For instance, in the case of vehicle insurance, many people parked their vehicles because they were not driving as much, and they only had parked insurance on those. That's why they didn't have the comprehensive: they didn't need it, they were not driving as much, they were trying to get by because of the global pandemic, because of the loss in business revenues, because of job losses, and all those things. People were certainly impacted. Their bottom lines were impacted by that.

I do hear from my constituents directly to this date about that hailstorm and how there was no help from the government. Just to be clear, nobody was asking this government to act as an insurance company for northeast Calgary. All they were asking was that at least the government work with these insurance companies and for the government to make sure that people are treated fairly, that their claims are processed in a timely fashion, and that their roofs, their homes are repaired in a timely fashion. And the government didn't lift a finger.

Every time I've raised this issue, this government, this Premier have even ridiculed it, as if northeast Calgary was looking for a handout and somehow these people in northeast Calgary didn't have insurance at all and whatnot, but that was not the case. People were asking this government to at least advocate on their behalf so that they are treated fairly, their homes are repaired timely, their claims are processed in a reasonable time. Even after two years, when you drive on the streets of northeast Calgary, you can still see homes damaged. You can still see vehicles that are damaged. So these policies and how government approached these policies, insurance, this industry, are important to my constituents.

The second reason it's important to my constituents is that there are many in northeast Calgary and in my constituency who drive cabs, who drive for delivery companies, who drive ride-share vehicles, and they do that to earn a living. Certainly, in order to drive, you need insurance, so, again, any changes that the government makes to this industry, to these products are important to my constituents, people in northeast Calgary, and, of course, all Albertans.

Another thing, specifically, I guess, that has been brought up by many people in my riding and across Calgary with respect to insurance is insurance for the trucking industry. They also drive for a living and provide valuable services across this province, across this country, and changes that are made by this government certainly impact them as well. So every time the government opens up the Insurance Act, every time some changes are suggested, I think my hope is that the government will actually also look at issues facing my constituents, facing people in northeast Calgary, facing everyday Albertans across this province.

For instance, this bill makes, broadly, three changes to the Insurance Act. One relates to captive insurance, a kind of niche area. The second helps to license stand-alone reinsurance companies, something that will benefit insurance companies. And, third, it will make it easier for Alberta companies to access unlicensed insurance when there is no licensed product available in Alberta. Nothing in this bill addresses skyrocketing insurance costs for everyday Albertans. While I have no major concerns with the content of this legislation, I'm more concerned about what I hear from my constituents, from people in northeast Calgary, from everyday Albertans across this province.

Yet again the UCP is refusing to take any action whatsoever to reduce auto insurance bills that are punishing Alberta families and businesses since this government took over. We have tried to work with this government to address that issue. We have suggested that a legislative committee be established to look into why insurance premiums are so high, but this government, in the interest of insurance companies, has refused that.

When we were in government, there was a cap, a 5 per cent cap, on insurance premiums. As soon as the UCP became government, they were lobbied by their friends and they removed that cap. We were told and Albertans were told that unless they do so, insurance companies won't be able to survive. We were told that they might leave the province.

Every day we heard that they were removing products from the market, which, by the way, did not happen during our term when there was a 5 per cent cap. We knew that was not true. We knew that whatever the government was telling us on behalf of insurance companies was garbage. In order to hide that, they even tried to not publish a report that was published continuously for a hundred years. They just decided not to publish that so that the people of Alberta would not know what they were telling Albertans to believe, that insurance companies are broke and we all need to chip in to help them out.

Finally, when under pressure, they were made to publish that report, they released it quietly on a Thursday, and Albertans were able to see that whatever the government was telling us about insurance companies and how they are not viable and how they won't be profitable without removing that cap – they charged Albertans $385 million more in premiums in 2020 than they did in 2019. While Albertans were struggling to make ends meet during the pandemic, these companies were making huge profits with the help of this UCP government. They collected more money from Albertans at a time when they were able to afford it the least. And then they tried to hide that information. That's exactly the reason that Albertans don't trust this UCP government.

Plus, they were saying things that were not true. Then they were hiding the report that Alberta has published for 100-plus years. And when the report came out, it was written in black and white that insurance companies were not broke. They charged Albertans more at a time when they were not able to afford it. They raised auto insurance, for instance, anywhere from 20 to 30 per cent. If somebody was paying $100, they're now paying $300 thanks to this UCP government.

And still, when the UCP opens up the insurance bill, they turn a blind eye to the real issues facing Albertans across this province, that we hear every single day. Madam Chair, we do know that the government hears the same as well because we are sometimes CCed on those e-mails. But what the government does is that it ignores those Albertans. It doesn't listen to those concerns. They're completely – and they're just listening to what their lobbyist friends in the insurance industry tell them.

So one has to ask: while you're opening the Insurance Act, making these changes, that we have no concerns with, why is it that the government is not taking any action on skyrocketing insurance premiums? I don't think that answer is enough that the government tries to give to Albertans, that there are five, six companies that have asked for a rate reduction. Guess what? They increased the rate by 30 per cent; now they're asking for a rate reduction of 1 per cent or 2 per cent, 1.5 per cent. That's not enough. Why is it that the government is not willing to do anything or willing to take any action to address those skyrocketing insurance premiums?

And since the government works very closely with the insurance industry – they have close friends, the Premier's former staff, who are on insurance lobbyist teams – is there any rough idea how many more millions or billions Albertans have to chip in to make this insurance industry viable? Any rough estimate will help. I urge government members to share that information if they have that available. If not, the government should ask their friends in that industry how much more Albertans need to pay.

Also, with respect to the report that the government earlier tried to hide, while this act is open, why is it that the Minister of Finance is not bringing forward changes to make sure that we have that in legislation, that that report is published every year and that report is tabled in this Legislature? Why is that? Is there anybody who is willing to talk to the Minister of Finance and provide that answer for Albertans? Albertans would like to see how insurance companies are doing.

These are the concerns that we hear every single day in our constituencies. These are the concerns that we hear from Albertans every single day. They are worried about their insurance bills. They are worried about their utility bills. They are worried about costs being piled onto them by this government. Insurance costs are such that if you have to drive to get to school, if you have to go and do groceries, if you have to drive kids to soccer games, you need to have a vehicle. You will have that cost. And government policies are punishing Albertans just to insure their vehicle. It's getting harder and more difficult for Albertans to afford this UCP government anymore.

So while these changes to captive insurance, these changes to get unlicensed insurance for companies, and these changes for stand-alone reinsurance companies are good, the Minister of Finance and this government also need to make changes to make sure that Albertans can also afford insurance products, that they're able to afford to insure their vehicle. It is not enough, these talking points are not enough, that there are companies that are applying now for rate reductions after increasing that 25 to 35 per cent.

The government represents, first and foremost, Albertans, not the insurance industry and not their lobbyists. The government should step up and work for Albertans, and this is something that Albertans need action from this government on. They are hurting. They are unable to afford insurance products. And if anyone from this government wants to hear how these changes made by the UCP have impacted Albertans, they can come to my riding, and I am happy to take them on a tour.

The Chair: Are there others to speak to Bill 16 in Committee of the Whole? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise this afternoon to speak to Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022. I want to just start by acknowledging the importance of the previous member's speech, when he was talking about the residents of northeast Calgary and the devastation that so many experienced because of the hailstorms and then, unfortunately, the lack of support that this government provided. The Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall has been a fierce advocate when it comes to advocating on behalf of the residents of northeast Calgary and the impacts of this devastating storm.

You know, I think it sets a tone for how we're discussing what the needs of Albertans are versus the legislation that we see put before us, and today is no exception to that pattern that we continue to see. When we're advised that the Insurance Amendment Act is coming forward, there's always a bit of hope that perhaps now this government will do something that actually has an impact and supports what Albertans are asking for.

Unfortunately, the pattern and the trend that we've seen are that the government will introduce something, and then, unfortunately, it actually does nothing to support what Albertans actually need, which is lower insurance rates. While there's not a lot in this piece of legislation that supports Albertans, it's not necessarily something that I would vote against. What's glaringly obvious in this legislation is the lack of actual tangible pieces that will actually support Albertans.

I know that many across the province have experienced insurance increases, around 20 to 30 per cent on average. I know the members opposite know this because we as opposition are CCed in most of the correspondence because there's not an actual response or action that comes from the government. I just think of the ongoing pleas that I hear as the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs from my constituents about how difficult times are right now. Financially people are struggling. We have seen a government bring forward legislation that has potential to actually make a difference in the lives of Albertans.

However, again, we see in Bill 16 nothing that actually helps drivers in Alberta. We know that driving is something that is quite essential for many across the province. I would say that this government has arguably made that even a higher requirement, because if you live in rural Alberta right now and you need to access a doctor, you have to drive. You can't simply just walk down the street or ask a neighbour for a quick ride to go see your physician, because there aren't any.

In order to access something as essential as health care, unfortunately, many residents of the province are required to drive. You know, as someone who grew up in Whitecourt, Alberta – and my little brother was born in Whitecourt – I just don't understand how the bad decisions around supporting health care or the lack thereof from this government are putting so many people from my hometown in a place where they can't have their children in a hospital in their community. They have to drive who knows how far to be able to access that.

As a mother of three I can tell you that when a baby wants to come, they're coming now. Part of your prep is planning on what that looks like, and not knowing where your baby is going to be delivered, not knowing how far it's going to be is quite a big stress and not needed at that time in this expectant parent's life.

I think that when we're looking at what this government could have done, we've seen a history of what they have done. I would like to just take a walk down memory lane when it comes to insurance and what this government has done. Previously in this sitting we've seen, again, insurance legislation opened, and unfortunately what the UCP thought was important at that time was to decrease the status of a concussion through an accident. They reduced it from being a serious injury. I don't understand how something as serious as concussions, something where we know there's so much research that has gone into the impacts of concussions and the extreme seriousness of that injury, with potential life-long impacts, was determined by this government to not be serious.

4:20

When we had the legislation open under insurance previously with this government, another thing that they did was reduce the number of physicians that were able to actually talk to an accident claim. You know, having been in conversations with people that have been in accidents, unfortunately, there are potentially several physicians that need to weigh in on insurance and the outcome of this individual that experienced an accident. You could have mental health, you could have surgeons regarding any of your bones, and you could have brain injury. There are so many things that happen. To be able to decide arbitrarily which physician gets the right to deliver the report, because this government reduced it to one physician, is a major, major impact on Albertans that have been in a motor vehicle accident.

That's the history that we've seen so far with some of the things that this government has chosen to do when they open up legislation.

Now, one of the things that we're seeing, definitely, with this government is that if you are a friend of theirs, you will have impact. I would argue that insurance companies have definitely had an impact when it comes to the decisions that this government is making, specifically their lobbyists, their friends, because we've seen in the province an incredible increase to the profits that insurance companies have and not an increase in Albertans' pocketbooks. We've seen decisions that actually are costing a lot more to the average Albertan's household.

We've seen insurance rates go up, like I mentioned previously, a 20 to 30 per cent increase on average. We've seen tuition rates skyrocket for students in the province. We've seen utility bills absolutely astronomical in this province. Those are the things that I'm hearing from Albertans, things that are impacting their income, their ability to make decisions on how to spend their money, whether it's their unfortunate $400 electricity bill or their skyrocketing insurance to drive their car or food to feed their families.

We know that the food banks are up substantially in the number of individuals that are accessing them, and it's because people are being forced to pay rates that they shouldn't have to pay. They are being forced to pay for things that this government could easily come in and support. However, that's not what we're seeing. When we have bills presented on legislation that make changes but don't actually do what Albertans are asking for, there is a big disconnect between what Albertans are saying that they need and what this government is proposing as legislation.

I know that we had asked for a report – it is something that has been done in the province of Alberta by the Finance minister for over a hundred years – and unfortunately it took pressure from Albertans for them to produce this report. They did, reluctantly, and they put it out on a Thursday before a four-day long weekend, Madam Chair. Now, when you hear that, you know it's not going to be good news. You know that Albertans are not going to be benefiting from the details of that report. I just wonder why the favour is with highly profitable insurance companies as opposed to Albertans that are paying for insurance.

I have two young drivers in my family, and the cost for their insurance is absolutely ridiculous, what they're being asked to pay for insurance. Now, I understand that as young drivers their insurance is naturally higher. One of my children is a male; therefore, I know that it's higher. But when you put in the cost of a 20 per cent to 30 per cent increase, they can't afford it.

One of my children is currently enrolled at the University of Alberta. She is pursuing a career in education, and a lot of her time is spent on her studies. She doesn't have a lot of extra time to work. She was laid off – she worked in the service industry for most of the pandemic – and she just doesn't have a whole lot of savings that she can access. She needs her car. She has the capacity to pay the insurance, but there are a lot of struggles that are impacting there. When you look at the cost of her tuition, when you look at her lack of access to employment over the pandemic, she's in a position where she's literally living paycheque to paycheque, and I can tell you, Madam Chair, that she's not alone.

There are so many young people in this province that are currently deciding whether or not they can afford postsecondary. Some of them are in their second, third year. Some of them are just deciding whether or not they should enter at all, if they can afford it. Those are conversations that absolutely should not be happening in the province of Alberta. We have a government that's made horrible decisions throughout the pandemic. They put an attack on the health care profession. We've watched decisions being made that did not reduce skyrocketing utility bills, and now we have this piece of legislation before us that really could have made an impact. Bill 16 could have been an opportunity for this government to show that they have actually heard Albertans talking about what their needs are. We don't see it in this. We see a piece of legislation that does nothing for Alberta drivers. It does not decrease their insurance.

I can tell you that there has been a lot of discussion from so many in Edmonton-Castle Downs about just the affordability right now in the province. I'm hearing from people that I'm shocked are considering leaving the province: educators that just feel completely defeated and unheard, unrespected in their profession, based on so many things that this government is doing with legislation, whether it's curriculum – it just doesn't end. When the cost of living comes up, it's not something that this government should be ignoring. People are struggling in the province. People have come to the government expecting that their needs are being met. They should be able to have access to health care providers in their community. They shouldn't have to drive to see a doctor.

These are things that we know they're asking for, yet this government isn't doing anything. They propose a piece of legislation like the Insurance Amendment Act and do nothing to actually support Alberta drivers. It's really concerning when over and over and over we're watching pieces of legislation that have potential to actually make a difference do nothing of the sort. I have had countless conversations with individuals about ideas that are just not being listened to, pleas for help when it comes to the cost of living in the province, some sort of support when it comes to utilities, their insurance, but this government instead chooses to put forward legislation that doesn't actually support them. It's very confusing when there are no changes in this legislation that would actually benefit drivers. We know that the insurance companies have billions in profits – billions – yet we don't see any support to the average Albertan and drivers.

We have many questions that just continue to go unanswered, and unfortunately I can tell you that that isn't unique to this piece of legislation. It's been an ongoing theme from this government to put in pieces of legislation that don't actually have an impact on the day-to-day lives of Albertans. If there is an opportunity to have an impact, we hear: don't worry; it'll be done in regulations.

We have a clear message that we're hearing from people all across the province. They need support with insurance. They need reductions. This doesn't do that, Madam Chair. I question: why would you take an opportunity to open the legislation, to create an Insurance Amendment Act, and then not actually do what Albertans are asking for? It's a question that continues to go unanswered. It's something that we've watched over and over, where they favour their friends in decision-making. We watch them make pieces of legislation that keep their friends and insiders happy, yet it doesn't actually support Albertans.

So with that, Madam Chair, I will end my comments, and I look forward to further debate. Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to rise this afternoon and make a few comments with respect to Bill 16. I appreciate the debate in the House during Committee of the Whole. The Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs has made a number of assertions around Bill 16 and, more broadly, around insurance in general. There are certainly a number of points that I have to agree with her on. Insurance costs are high, and we certainly recognize that. We are in an inflationary environment right now globally, certainly within the North American context, and I would agree with that. Affordability is a concern for Albertans, and I would agree with that. What I don't agree with is the assertion that this government is taking no action. That I simply can't agree on because we are taking action. Again, we're certainly taking action through Bill 16.

I'll talk about some of those details, but I do want to again just respond to the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs around utilities. We are taking action with utilities. We are providing an electricity rebate, and that's a tangible, measurable affordability piece that will provide relief to every Alberta household. We're also taking action by suspending the fuel tax, saving every Albertan, every Alberta business, every Alberta nonprofit every time they go and fuel up their vehicle at the pumps. So, Madam Chair, we are taking action.

We're taking action on the insurance front as well. We're taking action in Bill 16. We have a hard insurance market in this province, in this nation, really in this continent. What that means is that there have been losses in the insurance industry, large claims over time in recent times, that have caused insurance providers to raise their premiums. They raised their premiums to recapitalize. They raised their premiums to reflect what they may believe are additional risks going forward. We're seeing that not only in Alberta; we're seeing that across the country, and in fact, to some degree, it's a global phenomenon. But we're taking action.

That's, in fact, why we brought forward to this House Bill 41. Bill 41 clarified, amongst other things, the definition of a minor injury with respect to automobile accidents. Certainly, our actuaries as well as industry actuaries all agreed that by providing that additional clarity, a similar definition to that used in Atlantic Canada and elsewhere, we would expect to see approximately $120 of premium relief for every Albertan in terms of vehicle insurance. At the same time we added additional care in Bill 41 so that Albertans who had the misfortune of being injured in an automobile accident would in fact be able to access more care. So, Madam Chair, we are taking action.

You know, we hear from members on the opposite side, time after time, their reference to massive profitability in the insurance industry, and there's no doubt that insurance companies are profitable. Madam Chair, I've had a real interest in that question myself. I believe fundamentally that it's government's role to create a very, very competitive business environment, an environment that encourages more players to be active in a marketplace. Right now we have approximately 45 insurers in Alberta offering automobile insurance to consumers. We want to see that number go up because I believe that with increased competition we'll see better value for Albertans.

I have inquired with my department, who inquired with the body who is ultimately responsible for gathering statistics... [interjections] Madam Chair, the members opposite are heckling. They should listen because they're going to learn something right now. I have inquired with the statistical agency that gathers statistics with respect to premiums, losses, and profitability for Alberta insurers, in fact for insurers across this country. What I have found is that in 2020 – and this is statistical information that's available, I believe, to the public, certainly to the department, and I'm happy to provide it – on average insurers had a profit in the automobile insurance industry market. They made on average net $11.59 per vehicle insured, and that's a profit. I was interested, you know: are they making $300, $400 a vehicle? Are they in a loss position like they have been in some years? No, they were in a profitable position in 2020, netting $11.59 per vehicle.

Madam Chair, I'm not suggesting that automobile insurance premiums are low. They're not. But what that tells me is that we need to deal with the systemic issues that are driving up costs in the sector. That's how we'll ultimately provide better value for Alberta automobile insurance consumers, and that's why we brought in Bill 41. The good news is that at this point in time we're seeing automobile insurance premiums flatten out, level out, which is very encouraging because even under the NDP rate cap they were going up, at a minimum, 5 per cent per year. They're levelling out right now, and we're continuing to monitor that. It's our role to ensure that we have a regulatory framework that provides an efficient, effective automobile insurance experience for insurance companies but, more importantly, for Alberta consumers. We continue to monitor our progress.

With respect to Bill 16 we're taking action. Last fall we passed I believe it was Bill 76, the captive insurance corporations act, which effectively enabled captive insurance companies to exist and operate here in the province of Alberta. That was tangible action to deal with an insurance challenge. In Bill 16 we are further enhancing that captive insurance corporations act to provide clarification around redomestication if an Alberta company has a captive insurance subsidiary domiciled outside of the nation.

This additional clarity will make it easier for these Alberta parent companies to redomesticate their captives into the province, with a goal of expanding the insurance industry in Alberta, expanding solutions and options for, ultimately, insurance consumers and for growing our financial services sector right here in Alberta. I have to say that when we enabled captive insurance in the province, it was very well received by Alberta parent companies who have captives domiciled elsewhere, but also it was very well received by other entities within the province who were considering a captive insurance company as an insurance solution.

Bill 16 also enables reinsurance and, maybe more importantly, offers a well-understood corporate structure that has served Alberta businesses, companies, entities very well in other applications, and that's the use of a limited partnership. We've taken advice from an expert committee around insurance. Certainly, this was a recommendation that they believed would be important, would move the meter in terms of attracting attention and investment in the reinsurance space. That's what Bill 16 is all about.

I have to say, Madam Chair, that we recognize that insurance costs are high, but we're taking action. We're working to ensure we have the most favourable regulatory environment in this province so that businesses can set up shop here in Alberta and offer Albertans the most cost-effective insurance products available, possible.

Madam Chair, I could contrast that to the efforts of the NDP when they were in office. Their ultimate move was simply to put a rate cap in place. I think we all recognize that if a rate cap is put in place – if we as a government legislate what businesses can charge but don't deal with the systemic issues that are driving up their costs, what happens? Companies that work in that space just start to pull out, start to pull back. We were starting to see that. Had we left that rate cap in place, I am very confident that we would have had massive capacity by this point in time pull out of the insurance industry in Alberta, leaving fewer players, fewer choices for Albertans. Ultimately, if left in place without dealing with the systemic issues driving up costs, it would have led to a collapse in the insurance industry, and that would have been unacceptable to Albertans.

Madam Chair, I appreciate the chance to rise and debate Bill 16 in Committee of the Whole, and I'll cede the rest of my time.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 11 Continuing Care Act

Ms Gray moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the government has not carried out sufficient consultations on the contents of the bill with families whose loved ones lost their lives from COVID-19 while in continuing care.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment May 2: Member Irwin]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, we are on amendment RA1. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Before I begin speaking about Bill 11 – I know it's not customary under current standing orders, but I think in this instance you'll make an exception – I just want to recognize that our previous Sergeant-at-Arms, Mr. Brian Hodgson, is here visiting. Perhaps he became a little nostalgic and wanted to be back inside the House. I just wanted to say that it's wonderful to see you, sir. I hope that you're doing well, and I'm wishing you and your family the very best.

Of course, we are discussing Bill 11, Continuing Care Act. We have before us a reasoned amendment, and of course this is so that the proposed piece of legislation just not carry forward. I think that on this side of the House we've been able to demonstrate significantly that although this bill is an administrative piece of legislation, there are so many other things that the Minister of Health has failed to address when it actually comes to continuing care here in the province of Alberta.

Now, of course, continuing care legislation and rules are split between many different acts and regulation, including the Nursing Homes Act, the Hospitals Act, the Supportive Living Accommodation Licensing Act, and the co-ordinated home and community care regulation. Bill 11 consolidates various acts so that different parts of continuing care, both home care and facility-based care, have similar processes, governing legislation. Notably, the bill does not make much significant change since most of the substantial aspects of care, which are, of course, the fees, the standards, and the staffing, are all going to be decided through regulation, Madam Speaker. I think that I along with my colleagues have been able to demonstrate significantly that these are the things that most Albertans are truly concerned about when it comes to this particular bill. It's disheartening to see that they're not being addressed in legislation.

Of course, so many Albertans, those particularly who have family in care, are really concerned about staffing and the ratios. It's been proposed before, and I don't know why it's something that the Minister of Health couldn't potentially actually put forward in the legislation here today, but staffing ratios in relation to the amount of people in continuing care are a serious situation that could have been dealt with within this piece of legislation. Of course, staffing and the issues that people who work in this particular line of work experience are a considerable issue that could have been addressed in Bill 11 as well, and unfortunately we just didn't see it.

I mean, it's not just coming from us on this side of the House. The facility-based continuing care review highlighted so many of these issues that we're currently bringing up. I mean, just fees alone: it's quite incredible the amount that people have to pay in order to keep a loved one in continuing care here in the province of Alberta.

You know, we just finished hearing this diatribe from the Minister of Finance saying that in relation to insurance – of course, he was debating another bill. He was saying that you welcome privatization in and costs are supposed to go down. The Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar on this side was, like: well, how many companies have to come in in order to bring that price down, to bring that cost down here in the province of Alberta when it came to insurance? The minister said that there are currently 45, so how many do we need? Do we need 100? Do we need 200? How many? Then again, when it comes to continuing care facilities, is that the type of thing that we want to be bringing into the province of Alberta? How many continuing care companies are we going to need in order to drive down the price for continuing care here in the province of Alberta, which in essence is the service of caring for loved ones with dignity?

Because the staffing ratios aren't there, that's not what Albertans are getting, and you have this paradox because, you know, the company is trying to obtain the greatest amount of profit through this process as possible. What are your two major expenses in any business? Well, it's going to be your rent or the mortgage you're paying on the business in order to conduct that business and then labour. Of course, in the continuing care industry you have these private operators trying to do their very best to lower their costs, because that's how private business works when they're trying to achieve greater and greater and greater profits.

That's why this is so important. Yes, we are leaving this industry or opening up this industry to the free market, but at the same time there need to be certain regulations in place because, number one, we're talking about the service of caring for people in continuing care with dignity and respect. You can't just leave that entirely up to the market. You cannot leave that entirely up to the market and for operators to basically just come up with their own rules and hope for the best. So, yes, we do need regulation when it comes to people in care to make sure that they are treated with dignity and respect. The bare minimum that the government could do is actually provide in legislation ratios for staffing to people in care. I think that this would be the bare minimum that the government could provide, yet the Minister of Health has omitted that very suggestion that has come from a number of advocates and stakeholders in this particular industry.

It's saddening, really, because I honestly believe that a lot of seniors especially are not being treated with dignity and care inside of these facilities. We've all heard the horror stories, so why can't we agree on this? Okay. I'll give it to the members on the other side. You know, I'll let them have – certain things, yes, should be just left to the free market, but this is not one of them, especially our seniors in this province, that have dedicated their entire lives contributing to our society. This is definitely not one of them.

As I've explained time and again in this House, when it comes to the free market and the laws of supply and demand, you're going to have people that are going to be able to access – you're just not going to be able to get people that will access the level and quality of care that they deserve in a free-market system. This is what's so disheartening, that we see this government pushing us more and more and more when it comes to not only this industry but almost everything in the province of Alberta, pushing us more and more towards a free market, to free-market principles, right?

We have the Minister of Infrastructure and the fact that, you know, he's completely open to P3s even though we've seen in jurisdiction after jurisdiction the horrible application of P3s. You know, essentially, it's a way that governments can actually hide costs when they're balancing the books, but those costs are still there in the long run, never mind, Madam Speaker, when you're talking about the externalities, as I've mentioned several times in this House. It's almost like you're trying to save a buck today, but you're going to end up having to pay exponentially later. That's why I don't understand why the members on the other side can't see that, right? It's disheartening to see that even though you have statistical studies out there, that we could reference, where it's not always the answer – and this is definitely not one of them.

For that reason, I would really hope – and I know it's a long shot – that all members in this House will actually vote in favour of this amendment. Now, we've had the opportunity to debate, and I'm really happy that the Minister of Health has actually gotten up, especially in Committee of the Whole, and has addressed some of the issues that we've brought up in debate, but of course he hasn't talked about all of them. He hasn't addressed them all when it comes to this particular piece of legislation.

As I already mentioned, the government has not acted on several recommendations from the facility-based continuing care review, and you can't help but ask: well, what are they waiting for? They've been in government for three years now. For three years they've been in government, and I get it. When you're in government, you have certain priorities, and you want to get certain things done. Sometimes you can get to everything, but on this one, on treating especially our seniors with the dignity and respect that they deserve, you'd think that this would be one that's important, the one that they would move on when it comes to the facility-based continuing care review. Of course, that review stated that there needs to be an increase in the amount of home care provided, just that alone; then, again, improving work conditions for continuing care staff.

I've already highlighted it in debate, but I believe that it bears repetition here once again, and that is the fact that the majority of the people that actually work in this industry are new Canadians, racialized people. Because of the fact that we have private continuing care operators that, again, are seeking the greatest amount of profit by providing this service, these staff are paid the lowest wages and then, on top of that, don't have benefits. Why? It tends to be racialized Canadians. When you're a racialized individual and you look at this scenario and you see that whenever it comes to the private sector – and the only job that you can get is within that private sector – you're treated with no benefits and lower wages, you start asking yourself: well, why is this? Why am I being treated as a second-class citizen?

Ultimately, you know, there are a number of issues of fairness that need to be dealt with here as well, and that's another reason why the Minister of Health could have come forward with a proposed piece of legislation that could actually address these issues, because racialized individuals within this province are feeling discriminated against. You know, I remember my mother, of course, coming to this country, having to learn English, and I remember having many a discussion with her and her feeling the very same way, that . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to speak to amendment RA1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to offer some comments on this amendment. Let me just follow up on some of the things that my friend from Edmonton-Ellerslie was talking about during his speech. You know, he was talking about his opinion that the continuing care sector is not one that should be dominated by market forces, if I could summarize it succinctly like that. Let me just build on that and say that I firmly and strongly believe that for-profit continuing care service is immoral. It is not right that people should profit off caring for the sick and the elderly and people who are not able to look after themselves. That's not to say that I don't think people should make a living being able to look after that. I think that people who work in the health care field should absolutely be able to look after themselves while they're looking after others who need it, but I do not believe that investors, shareholders should profit off people's pain and suffering.

5:00

I'm not the only one who believes that, Madam Speaker. In doing a little bit of research around the history of continuing care in the province of Alberta, it was astounding to me that the Social Credit government of this province also agreed that it was immoral to profit off caring for people who needed it in the long term. They made it illegal to profit off caring for people who were in long-term care facilities. I think that that is something that the province of Alberta would have been wise to continue.

I can see that my friend the Minister of Infrastructure is again audibly sighing listening to my speeches. I would encourage the minister that if he takes issue with the things that I have to say, either he can get up and respond to them, or he can remove himself from the Chamber. But interjecting in this way is not helpful and only serves to lower the tone of the debate in this House.

On this particular amendment, though, the amendment is worded such that this bill – if the amendment is passed, this bill would not be read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the minister didn't adequately consult with the families whose loved ones lost their lives from COVID-19 while in continuing care. As we've said over and over again in this House, hundreds of people lost their lives to COVID while in continuing care. This bill does absolutely nothing to address the circumstances that led to that happening or make any attempt to try to fix it.

In fact, the minister is so closed off to the idea of addressing the problems that led to the deaths of so many people in continuing care due to COVID that he refuses to even open up public consultations on the matter. When I asked the minister the last time that we had a chance to talk about this a few days ago – I asked him directly if he would allow some forum, some public forum, for the families who have lost their loved ones to COVID to at least have their stories heard, to at least be able to tell the minister and the people in the Health department who are responsible for continuing care what happened to their loved ones who died from COVID. What did the minister say? He brushed it off. He said: "No, we don't need any more consultation. We've done enough consultation on this matter." He's not interested in listening to people share their stories about this anymore. That's completely offensive.

There's been no public consultation whatsoever on how government has managed the COVID crisis in continuing care or anywhere else. I know of no forum where the families and friends of people who died of COVID in continuing care can even submit their stories for consideration.

Mr. Carson: No Seniors Advocate.

Mr. Schmidt: There's no Seniors Advocate anymore.

People are left to carry this grief, mourn their loss on their own, with no hope of any improvement for people who are still living in the continuing care system and at risk of dying of COVID. I don't think that that's fair. I don't think that that's responsible government. At the very least, give people an opportunity to share their stories so that their loved ones didn't die completely in vain. I mean, it's too late now to take actions that could have prevented the deaths of the people who we've already lost, but it's not too late to take preventative measures to make sure that it doesn't happen to anyone else.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

COVID certainly hasn't gone anywhere, as much as the government refuses to admit that it's a problem anymore, won't talk about it anymore. COVID hospitalizations are as high as they've ever been, with the exception of a few days in January of 2022. So the risks of residents of long-term care dying from COVID, I would suggest, are as high now as they've ever been at any point during the pandemic, and the minister doesn't want to hear a word about it.

That's why I'm encouraging all of my colleagues here in the House to vote in favour of this amendment. Give the government time to construct a meaningful consultation process with the families and loved ones of those who died of COVID in continuing care. Hear what they have to say. I'm sure they'll offer some suggestions on how continuing care facilities could be safer. We could also make sure that we bring in experts or people from other jurisdictions who've done a better job of managing COVID. Now is not the time to be passing this piece of legislation. We need to give the families of the people who died a voice. We need to validate their experiences and show that we've learned from our mistakes and are doing better.

So for those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I urge all of my colleagues here in the House to vote in favour of this amendment and give the families of those who we've lost to COVID hope for justice of some kind.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate on RA1? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has risen.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to this reasoned amendment. I offer a few thoughts that I will begin with by recognizing the tremendous number of front-line workers in the long-term care and assisted living sector in Lethbridge. We have a large number of seniors and folks over 65 in varying levels of congregate care and a great deal of home-care workers as well as a result of the demographics of the city.

Indeed, people have worked through tremendously challenging conditions through the pandemic. Certainly, long-term care and assisted living in particular and home care, I would argue, are areas where folks are just managing at the best of times. During the pandemic people were asked to go over and above, oftentimes without, especially in the early days, appropriate PPE, without having any explicit rules around working in one site, often without those full-time hours and that full-time employment, which we know leads to better outcomes both for the staff and folks who continue to see themselves in these personal care professions but also over time in terms of the outcomes and health care outcomes for people even absent a pandemic but certainly during it.

There is no question that we owe these front-line workers a great debt of gratitude. In fact, when I was reading through the Royal Society paper on COVID-19 and its effect on long-term care, the Royal Society of Canada indicates that this is an area where the workforce is prone to a great deal of burnout and leaving this line of work. Even still, people in these areas of work report a great deal of satisfaction with their jobs.

Mr. Speaker, oftentimes people working in these areas are providing a voice to the voiceless. The frail elderly have shockingly few advocates, and oftentimes in assisted living there is more family interaction because the family is taking up a great deal of the care work with respect to getting their elderly parent often to appointments and so on. But in long-term care the isolation became even more pronounced during the pandemic, and it was oftentimes the workers that filled in those gaps, certainly, during the pandemic.

We had 1,600 Albertans perish of COVID-19 in congregate living facilities, seniors, during the pandemic. By contrast, in Quebec there has been a coroner's inquiry when 4,000 people died, and it's quite a larger province. That coroner's inquiry called 220 witnesses, including a couple of ministers. In Ontario, which also saw a great deal of deaths in long-term care and assisted living, they had a commission that just recently submitted its final report to government.

In Alberta we have an Auditor General who has looked into the issue but was blocked, specifically blocked, from making his findings on his investigation into the COVID-19 response in long-term care and assisted living in Alberta by UCP MLAs who blocked his request, refused it, voted it down a couple of times, for him to make those findings public and answer questions about those findings at the June meeting of the Public Accounts Committee.

I believe that families, front-line workers, and the residents themselves deserve better. I believe that the isolation and the stress of the pandemic and the separation from family and loved ones was quite likely exacerbated by understaffing and had a great deal of effect on people in their final days. I believe this because I saw it up close. I shared with this House watching someone in the final year of her life move from assisted living into long-term care and back to acute care and back to long-term care during the context of the pandemic. People didn't get what they deserved, certainly, or even what they needed in terms of their health care needs at that time.

We see a workforce, Mr. Speaker, that is disproportionately women, immigrants, and racial minorities. We see a workforce that in Alberta, by the government's own figures, is short approximately 6,000 FTEs. We see a long-term care and assisted living system whereby private, for-profit care settings fared worse through the pandemic, where we see lower ratios, potentially lower investments in building maintenance, in PPE, and lower pay.

We certainly see a situation in Alberta where creativity for quality of life was not at all – not at all – something that we were able to see our way through to providing for people. People were reduced to waving at each other through windows rather than having the appropriate staff ratios and enough personal care aides to get elderly people outside so that they could engage with their family members, sometimes at the end of their lives. We haven't seen any level of accountability, not even allowing the Auditor General to speak to the public about his findings on this.

We have seen the minister get up and be very proud of his legislation because it provides a better administrative and statutory framework. Well, I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. That does not exactly rouse the enthusiasm of families and those living in long-term care and assisted living through the pandemic. That's not what leads to quality of life, a better administrative framework. This sort of bureaucratise is no salve for what people actually need. What people actually need is a commitment from government that "the fractures in our nursing home system," as they are referred to in the Royal Society of Canada report on the matter, resulted in "high levels of physical, mental and emotional suffering for our older adults."

I'll quote directly from this Royal Society report because it actually hit home for me.

Those lives lost unnecessarily . . .

They're referring to the COVID-19 pandemic.

. . . had value. Those older adults deserved a good closing phase of their lives and a good death. We failed them. We have a duty to care and to fix this – not just to fix the current communicable disease crisis, but to fix the sector that enabled that crisis to wreak such avoidable and tragic havoc. We have the capacity, the knowledge and the resources to take immediate steps toward restoring the trust we have broken. This is our choice.

That's directly from the Royal Society of Canada working paper on long-term care, that came out by June 2020. Canadian researchers got straight to work on the extremely important public policy conversations that needed to come out of COVID-19 and the level of accountability and what we needed to learn and how we needed to measure it as a result of this crisis in long-term care and assisted living.

That is what we have been asking for as an Official Opposition as an approach to this issue. There is nothing in this legislation in terms of measurement, metrics, data gathering, any kind of evaluation, any kind of guarantee of better outcomes. One can put those things in legislation. One can give those statutory expression. There's nothing stopping us from doing it except that this government will not. It won't even have the conversation about better quality of life for elderly people, let alone learn anything from what we've just been through over the last two years.

Now, the government's own facility-based review exercise, unimplemented, indicates, as I shared with the House, 6,000 FTEs required. Other organizations have also studied this matter of learning from the COVID-19 pandemic in long-term care. Again, the Royal Society's executive summary indicates that provincial and territorial governments must make available full-time employment with benefits to all unregulated staff and regulated nursing staff. They should also evaluate the impact on nursing homes of "one workplace" policies," as I discussed. By the way, parenthetically, Mr. Speaker, this is something that was happening all across the country. Alberta was months behind other jurisdictions on the one-workplace policy. I remember the government providing various excuses for this monumentally unsafe approach to our nursing homes, our long-term care and assisted living facilities. They tried to blame the unions or something, but it was completely ridiculous. All they needed to do was make it happen and appropriately fund it, which they did not do, which put people's lives at risk.

We also need better continuing education for the unregulated and regulated direct care workforce and, really important to a conversation we've been having recently in this House, around data collection in all appropriate spheres. One of the recommendations of the Royal Society indicates that data collected must include resident quality of care . . . quality of life, resident and family experiences, and quality of work life for staff.

It sure would be easier to collect that sort of data if we still had an office of the independent seniors' advocate, Mr. Speaker, which we do not, that this bill could have restored.

I'm back to the Royal Society report now.

Data must be collected using validated, appropriate tools . . . must address disparities and compounding vulnerabilities among both residents and staff, such as race, ethnicity, language, gender identity, guardianship status, socioeconomic status, religion, physical or intellectual disability status, and trauma history screening;

in other words, making sure that our care for our elderly people appropriately fits in ways that we now make sure and understand that we need to deliver all of our provincial services, whether it's health care, education, social services, housing, justice services, and so on. The extent to which we care about this issue is the extent to which I believe we care about our whole human family, from beginning to end.

5:20

I'm going to conclude with a quote from Carole Estabrooks, who is a U of A researcher and professor. She's quoted here in a University of Alberta Folio piece on some of the national standards and other investments and recommendations that the Royal Society made in the wake of the first wave of the pandemic. This quote really stood out to me.

In the end, Estabrooks said she is hopeful that change is coming, but worries about those who suggest the cost will be too high.

"It is going to cost more, and the federal government is going to have to help," she said. "At the end of the day, it's as simple as, "What can you expect when you live in Canada and get old? Will you be cared for in such a way that you not only have good quality care, but you also have a good quality of life, even in advanced dementia?"

"What is that life – that life that raised us, that built the economy, that paid taxes – what is it really worth to us?"

These are Carole Estabrooks' words, but I think this, too.

I think it is worth a lot, that the value we place on a life lived should be no less than that which we place on one about to be lived.

This is health care by yet another name, Mr. Speaker, but it extends into an area of our lives that we have allowed to wither, believing that we can have some people pay for it and other people just be isolated away with very small levels of care delivered by workers who are not honoured in the appropriate way for their time and their talent.

That is why this bill just is not good enough. It does not reflect the level of urgency, the social and economic need for a real reckoning with how we approach long-term care and assisted living. It is for that reason that I speak in favour of this reasoned amendment, and I exhort the members of this House to recommit ourselves to do better by our most frail, elderly people, who are often, too often, left voiceless.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Are there other members looking to join on RA1? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill. As I had an opportunity to speak to the body of it before, I just will take a moment to reiterate sort of the central theme, and that is that I certainly am supportive of the ongoing work to improve continuing care, and I certainly agree with the expansion of home care that is intended by this bill.

[Mrs. Frey in the chair]

I was, you know, quite clear when I first spoke to this that there are a number of parts of the bill that I really support. I mentioned section 20, section 49, section 48, and many others. I took the time at that time to talk about the pieces that I appreciate because I really, certainly, want members of the government to understand that any of my criticisms are about improving the bill and moving it forward and doing good work, good work based on some work done by members of the government side.

I mean, the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek was involved in the facility-based continuing care review as the chair of the committee and spoke quite well about the amount of work that went in, the number of people that were consulted with, which, you know, became the basis of this act. At the time I commended that member – and I continue to – and, of course, all of the people that participated in that review, putting the time in to ensure that there was deep consideration for the issues that are at hand here.

The thing that I am concerned about and the reason why I'm standing now to agree to this amendment is because I think that work that was done by the facility-based continuing care review is not adequately reflected in this bill. There's no reason for it not to be. Certainly, many of the recommendations from that review could be brought forward, and I would like to see the government actually take the time to do exactly that. You've done the hard work; just finish it off. Don't get two steps before the finish line and then stop and pause. You know, that's the old fable of the rabbit and the tortoise. The tortoise ends up winning only because the rabbit actually stops in mid-motion. It doesn't continue at the pace that it was initially headed out in. What I would like to see, for once, is the rabbit to win. Just continue the work that was started quite well by this facility-based continuing care review. That's the most important piece.

But I want to take my time to talk about something a little different than what has been talked about by others up until this point, and that is my deep desire to see a serious amount of attention being put on home care and the expansion of home-care services so that things are available for citizens in this province that are actually already available in many other jurisdictions around the world.

I happened to have the opportunity, while I was vice-president of family services at Catholic Social Services, to be responsible for a program that was examining the role that Catholic Social Services may take in expanding home care. I had an opportunity to work for a few years on a pretty extensive review of what's possible in home care, where it is conducted. It is now some almost 20 years ago – I'm too old – that we took the time to actually look at what is possible in home care. Unfortunately, it has not moved forward very well in this province at this time. People are still in the position where unless they have a family member who is able to surrender their employment and provide for them, they're most likely going to end up in some kind of continuing care if their health requires it.

Now, thankfully, medicine has also moved us to a point where many people are able to stay in their own homes throughout the duration of their life, with very little time in any kind of a care facility and many even with no time in care facilities. Thank you to all the great health care practitioners that have made sure that that is now a reality for many people in society. I certainly wish this government would spend as much time celebrating that kind of success as they spend fighting with doctors and nurses and trying to take the money away from respiratory therapists and so on.

The thing I want to talk about most as absent in this bill and the reason why we need the amendment is because there really has been a lack of effort in moving home care along. I understand partly why, because it is indeed a complex issue. The issue isn't simply an issue of health. It's also an issue of social demography and responsibility and employment and pensions and benefits and all those other things that come up, and that is that when someone is in the state of having ill health, we have a medical system that often can deal with the issues of health in terms of pain management or of slowing down at least, if not reversing, actual health conditions and trauma to the body.

But often the reason why people move into continuing care is not their health itself but their ability to respond to daily needs. Those daily needs are often not health needs but, rather, the other kinds of needs that someone has. You can be at home and have your health maintained, but if you can't get out the door to go buy groceries, you've got a problem. If you can't, you know, clean your floors, if you can't clean your bathrooms, if you can't do your laundry, if you can't make your bed, these are all issues that come to the place where you start to say: I can no longer live alone. It's not because the medical system isn't able to help you manage the health problems that you have, but the complexity of managing those in a solitary situation is very problematic.

5:30

I remember my mother used to joke that she wished she had a little drawer with a man inside that she could just open up maybe once a day and have them do one or two tasks and then put them back in the drawer and close the drawer again. The reason why is because she needed help with specific tasks, and although, you know – lots of children in our family – we all came by regularly to see her until COVID made that very difficult, we clearly were not there full time every single day. That meant that while tasks would get done, they would get done at the convenience of people who were not resident in the home. Therefore, whenever we happened to come by, there would be the jars on the counter: "While you're here, could you open these jars and put them in the fridge for me? Can you move these boxes of things? Can you put some more things into my fridge from the storage room?" You know, a variety of small tasks like that.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

It is a very complex area, and we need to take the time to look at: what is it that helps an individual to stay in their own home beyond the issues of health management? If we continue to neglect those kinds of problems, we are never going to be able to ensure that people are able to stay in their own home. At some point they are going to give up because they simply can't do all the tasks.

Now, one of the things I know is that people in society are very kind and generous. They certainly do things like volunteer to shovel walks, and often a neighbour is great at helping to pick up groceries and so on. But the problem with charity is that it is always at the whim of the charity giver. It is not consistent. It is not organized around the needs of the recipient; it's organized around the availability and the desires of the giver of charity, which is why we have systematically moved away from a charity model to a more structural model of care in our society to ensure that people are well taken care of.

In other areas in our lives it would be considered absurd if we said: "Well, let's not teach children how to read. Let's just depend on the charity of others to teach the children in their lives how to read." You would say that's silly. We send them to school and make sure that a hundred per cent of the children have the opportunity, not just the ones who happen to have someone around who happens to have the time and so on.

So we can't depend on charity because it is by its nature unreliable and, by its nature, is not focused on the needs of the individual receiving it. You know, charity as a moral imperative is wonderful because it impels people to actually do some things about it, but very few people say the ultimate: I am going to give up all of my own needs in terms of employment and earning an income and the benefits and pensions that come with that in order to take care of somebody else because they have a greater need than me. I certainly know people that have done that, and I have deep, deep respect for that, but that is so rare that it is ridiculous for us as a society to depend on that kind of thing.

Then there's also the question about who it is that inevitably ends up giving up all of their own personal benefits – their job, their benefits, their pension plans, and so on – and the vast majority of time that falls on women and is not equally distributed with men. So we have a systemic problem here. We have a problem that if we do not provide adequate home care in the way that it should be provided, we are essentially asking women to do what we would never ask men to do, and that is to give up their employment to take care of another.

Now, I know that's not the intention. We say, "Well, anybody can do that," but we know statistically that doesn't happen. Statistically it's women that end up losing their income, losing their choice, and losing their own mechanisms of well-being in order to provide care. It is therefore important that as a society we not allow that to happen, not allow a systemic discrimination to continue to occur, and we should establish a structure that provides for the well-being of all citizens that does not depend on discriminating against one group over another. That's just something that's no longer acceptable in our society. As such, we need to make sure that we have a systemic, well-organized, universally accessible, and publicly paid for service that helps to provide expanded home care services so that we can keep people out of continuing care.
