Everyone that we have spoken to and consulted said that they want their rights, they want their freedoms to be honoured. The changes put in by the then NDP government in response to Supreme Court of Canada rulings were never intended to be permanent, full stop, because a permanent change would be in violation of these rights. I think that this amendment could be an important compromise. The minister spoke about stability. This would provide an additional year and, following that, allow these workers to have the freedom of association that, as I read into the record earlier, the Supreme Court of Canada said is critically important for employee choice and is an important "form of exercise of freedom of association... essential to the existence of employee organizations and to the maintenance of the confidence of members in them."

This amendment I put forward in good faith for debate with all members of this Legislature. I will repeat the request to the minister to disclose more about who he consulted with, with the particular focus on the graduate student associations and the postdoctoral fellow associations. If the answer is that he did not speak to these 5,000 workers impacted by this change, I think that is a shame. I think that's potentially a dereliction of his responsibility as the minister, but I also think that that would be a good reason to seriously consider this amendment and to allow the exclusive bargaining rights to remain in place for only a single year rather than indefinitely.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Chair. Once again, I think the point that I want to express here is somewhat similar to the point I expressed on the previous amendment. Effectively, this would defeat the purpose of Bill 17 with respect to postsecondary faculty associations' bargaining. This proposed amendment, as I look at it, would extend agent exclusivity until July 1, 2023, again providing a level of uncertainty that has existed for the last four years. This provision that we are seeking to amend now was put in place in 2017. These faculty associations have had to deal with this instability since 2017. Between 2017 and now we have not heard from anyone out there that they are concerned about the current arrangement. Have not heard.

As I said before, I have letters from some of the faculty associations thanking the department for putting Bill 17 forward.

The faculty associations: my department has been consulting and speaking and meeting with all of the relevant parties involved. I don't have a single letter or e-mail from anyone other than what the members opposite are saying.

It's important that we understand that this is customary of the NDP. I heard the Member for Calgary-Buffalo trying to compare the consultation with respect to the inquiry into whether or not a provincial police would be ideal at this point in time to this one. That member forgot to mention to this Assembly that their counterparts in B.C., in fact an all-party committee that is made up of the NDP and other political parties in B.C., have made the same recommendation to transition to a B.C. provincial police.

That really is the level of hyperpartisanship that we face with the NDP. Rather than focusing on the substance of the issue, they are more interested in pursuing their ideological pursuits. That's really what this amendment is all about. It's not about whether or not this Bill 17 will serve the best interests of our universities and postsecondary institutions. Those postdoctoral students, those graduate students are represented by their own associations, by themselves. They are the ones representing themselves. That is their own association. There is not a third-party association. There is not an external association. That is themselves representing their own interests.

This may be news to the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, but I have not heard, if that's what you're looking for, any concern, not one single letter, not one single e-mail. You know, Madam Chair, that amendment, again, is very ill conceived. While I thank the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods and I accept that she is passionate about these issues and I am looking forward to working with her on this file, I am more interested in amendments that deal with the substance of the issues before us rather than ideological pursuits.

The current arrangement is working. It's been four years and not one single complaint, not one single concern other than the pursuit to have this opened up to create instability in our postsecondary institutions, something that our universities do not want. Listen, I know a lot of postsecondary, postgraduate, graduate students. A lot of them. I come from a community where many of us have two or three postgraduate degrees, a lot of them, one of the highest ratios in the world. I know so many of them: personal friends, family members, colleagues of mine, people with whom I interact on a daily basis in this city, in this province. I oftentimes would pass off ideas. I check in with them on some of the policy work that the government is doing to tell me how they feel about some of these things. I did not hear a single complaint. Not one.

Madam Chair, if we accept this amendment, it means that it will come to an end July 1, 2023, and after that time bargaining agent exclusivity would end and other unions could then seek the bargaining rights for the academic staff, postgraduate students, and postdoctoral fellows, contrary to the intention behind Bill 17. It would not permit postsecondary institutions to have employer organizations until July 1, 2023. A reminder that what they're seeking to extend right now is also part of the current changes that they brought in in 2017, that we are now seeking to make permanent. On that basis, you can tell that this amendment is only seeking to prevent this bill from proceeding, and therefore I would urge members of this Assembly to vote against it.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Madam Chair. My question, through you, to the minister. You have mentioned talking to faculty associations, and you've mentioned talking to personal family, friends, and connections who happen to be graduate students. Did you talk to any graduate student associations or any postdoctoral fellow associations who are today responsible for managing the labour relations environment and who, when I speak with them, say that they do not support Bill 17? Did you talk to any graduate student associations or postdoctoral fellow associations in bringing forward this change, which impacts them and roughly 5,000 students that they represent?

The Chair: Any other members to join the debate on amendment A3? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. The silence is deafening from the minister in response to that question. In all probability the response was what we've heard from grad students' associations and postdoctoral fellows' associations and most of the faculty associations, that the minister, in fact, did not consult with them, and that's the reason that the minister was unable to rise and name the individuals or the faculty associations, GSAs, or postdoctoral fellows' associations that he, in fact, claims to have met with in his consultations for Bill 17.

What we are attempting to do, Madam Chair, with the amendments we're bringing forward this afternoon are a number of things, but one in particular is that we're trying to offer the government an opportunity to save face. They have a horrific record in this province of labour relations; failures and disasters, starting off with the tearing up of a contract, a bona fide, legitimate contract, with the doctors in this province. That, in fact, began the demise of the relationship between this government and labour that didn't have to be that way, yet that was what they chose to do. They chose to go to battle with labour and attack labour.

In fact, this is what Bill 17 is attempting to do here by limiting the rights of the workers, in this case the academic workers, to choose their bargaining agent. That's the fundamental question that we're debating here this afternoon. Does the government believe that a union, a faculty association, or workers have the right to choose their own bargaining agent or not? In other words, do they support what is constitutionally guaranteed to workers in this country, or do they not? Are they seeking ways to oppose it?

It's a very simple question that the debate is revolving around, Madam Chair. The minister claims indeed that he is attempting to salvage the rights of workers when, in fact, what the bill will do is permanently limit their ability to choose their bargaining agent, which we, of course, claim, I think with strong legal opinion behind it, will be ultimately found to be unconstitutional if indeed the bill passes without being amended to strike that element of it.

I think the government would be well served if indeed they accepted this opportunity to really save face and to try to re-establish trust in some small ways, at least with the workers in this province, by showing a level of respect for basic, fundamental workers' rights such as the right to choose who your own bargaining agent might be. That's a very simple and clear element of labour relations and labour law, and our Charter of Rights in this country, Madam Chair, is something that shouldn't be a matter of dancing around by the government on labour legislation that they bring forward, this Labour Statutes Amendment Act.

The amendment we're bringing forward gives the government a chance to reset the clock on its actual consultations and come back in a year from now, perhaps, and say that they've actually done the consultations. Give another year for this status quo to remain, and then perhaps the grad students' associations, the postdoctoral fellows' associations, more of the faculty associations will actually be able to properly be consulted and express their distaste and displeasure for the minister's desire to permanently lock them into the agents that they have right now bargaining for them, the self-representation, rather than giving them the opportunity to choose their own bargaining agent, as is a right guaranteed under our Charter.

Madam Chair, I think that, fundamentally, the minister knows in his heart that this is the right thing to do, and perhaps he may feel that the opportunity to perhaps move forward with this amendment by moving the date to July 2023 for the expiration of the status quo would be a way to perhaps heal some wounds that the minister is creating, I feel, by claiming that adequate consultation or any consultation at all took place with significant members of the 5,000 student workers who, in most cases, disagree that the government should be moving forward with making this bargaining agent permanent, the self-agency situation permanent.

The minister is saying that this is what the association has wanted. In fact, they are saying very clearly that, no, this is not what they want. They are saying very clearly: no. The opposition was the first to actually consult with them, save for some of the faculty associations that the minister says that he spoke with. It's a clear case, Madam Chair, of the minister claiming to have made consultations, but we have evidence, names of people willing to come forward and willing to publicly state that they were not consulted.

Be that as it may, I wish the minister would maybe take this opportunity to perhaps reload and talk to folks in a way that one would expect a minister would speak to the representation of over 5,000 students, academic student workers, in the province of Alberta, who are astonished that indeed the government is trying to move forward with legislation that would cement their agency to one choice – that is, the existing status quo, the self-representation – and deny them the right that the Charter actually guarantees them, to choose their own agents.

In fact, I believe that it's a worthwhile opportunity for the minister to relent on his plunging forward with this measure, that is not supported by the academic students who he claims to have met with, and it's something that will offer an opportunity for the government to take at least one small step in bringing forward a renewed relationship between groups of workers in this province and their organized labour representatives.

Hopefully, in an effort to re-establish trust and begin to build some relationships that are healthy in this province between government and organized labour and labour that is looking to seek to be represented, the minister will reset the clock on this element of the legislation so that in 2023, perhaps in the fullness of time, the government of the day will be able to sit down and properly speak with the grad students' associations and with the faculty associations and the postdoctoral fellows' associations and understand completely what their wishes are.

They're certainly expressing to us, Madam Chair, that they do not want to be force-fed what the minister is feeding. They do not want to be limited to the representation that they have right now, and the original intention, of course, when the former NDP government brought this legislation in, was to make it a temporary solution to allow the academic workers to sort out the various options that existed for them, and it took some time to do that. Not only that; many of these students are transitory. They're here for a short time, and the population changes over time very quickly. It's incumbent upon us to recognize that we're asking these academic workers to involve themselves in choosing very complex representation options and to hear out the various different parties that may wish to be competing to represent them.

It's a process that, you know, over the course of the five years prior to the expiration that was initially contemplated in July of this year, one would have hoped could have occurred and that the grad students, these academic workers, would have been in a position in July of this year to actually choose their bargaining agent and allow the government to meet the Charter right compliance that one would expect a labour minister to hope to achieve. Instead, what the government is doing is looking to cement in the one status quo option as if it had been intended to be a permanent solution, where it was not, and deny these workers their Charter right to actually choose the agent who would represent them in ongoing labour negotiations.

The amendment that we brought forward I believe is a reasonable one, and I encourage all members to support it. It allows the government to begin building some bridges with labour in this province, with workers, to show that indeed they respect the fundamental elements of the Charter rights that workers have, of course the right to strike and this right to associate freely with whom they choose. That would be allowing them to choose the bargaining agent of their choice.

The amendment before us gives a bit more time for the government to reset and rethink and perhaps re-establish a relationship with the workers that are involved in this legislation, that being the academic student workers in various institutions right throughout the province. It's a message that the minister of labour should hope to be sending to all Alberta workers and the general population, that Albertans who are engaged in work, which all of us hope to be, are respected by this government. Indeed, it's not reflected in the legislation that's been brought forward by this government with respect to Bill 17.

Certainly, the first move that they made right out of the gate after being elected in 2019 was to tear up a contract with the doctors, a legitimate, bona fide contract with the doctors of this province. One would hope that they have seen the folly of that move and that Alberta's workers and the whole population were shocked with that move. Hopefully, the government has learned from that that there is a respect amongst the population of Alberta workers and in general that workers have rights and that we respect them and that we respect those rights that are enshrined in the Constitution and in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We really will be demanding of our government, no matter what stripe, that they stand up for those rights and protect them and respect them and not bring forward legislation that denies or attempts to chisel away at those rights by creating elements of legislation that will certainly trigger a challenge to the Charter.

The minister does not believe that it may be triggered, but he also claims that he would win such a challenge. I respectfully disagree with the minister on that point. Don't take my opinion for it, but there are certainly legal minds that have advised us that indeed a challenge of this element of the legislation would be one that would not survive in the Supreme Court of Canada.

I hope that indeed the minister takes the opportunity. I think that there have been some opportunities afforded to the minister in the past where he's decided to alter his thinking in certain ways, and this perhaps will be one of them. I believe that he's got an open mind to a good argument, and I think that we're making one on this side of the House. There is an opportunity for the minister to say: yup, indeed, let's reset the clock on this, and let's do all the talking we need to do with the academic grad students who are affected by this and make sure that we're not offending 5,000 people and not diminishing their rights as workers. That's, I think, the bare minimum that we should be able to ask of the minister of labour in setting labour legislation, particularly as it surrounds the fundamental rights of workers and their ability to associate and choose their own bargaining agent.

That precedent that's being set by the minister's wish to not allow the academic students to make their own choice once the expiration date happens in July 31 of this year, if indeed this amendment doesn't pass, is really very regrettable, and it's not something that would be taken very lightly by organized and regular workers in the province because it's a threat. It's an open threat to organized labour when the minister decides that he will implement pieces of legislation that were perhaps purposely designed to be subject to a Charter challenge and make an effort to chisel away at rights that are sacrosanct in this country to working people and ones that won't be abridged without a large, large amount of anger in the labour movement. It's so unnecessary, absolutely unnecessary.

The minister can circumvent all of that acrimony and build some bridges by accepting this amendment and moving the date forward to July 1, 2023, and reset the clock with his consultations and make sure that all of the academic students and the associations are satisfied with the discussions they've had with the minister, and I think after that consultation it'll be absolutely clear to the minister that the position that should be taken by the government is to go forward and allow the academic workers who are students to choose their own bargaining agents. We hope the minister takes this opportunity to re-establish trust or attempt to re-establish a small measure of trust with working people in this province, build some bridges and allow them to look at the past at some of the things that they've done such as tearing up doctors' contracts and perhaps realize that that was a huge mistake and maybe move in the other direction.

Having an opportunity to gain the respect of workers in some small measure by adopting this amendment is something that would go a long ways to perhaps turning the corner in the reputation this government has with working people. So, with that, I think I'll conclude my remarks and allow others to add to the debate.

The Chair: Are there others? The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Madam Chair, I just wanted to quickly respond to the comment made by the Member for Edmonton-McClung. Let me begin, obviously, by thanking him for his contributions to this debate. You know, other than the period that I left the provincial government to establish my law firm, I have spent my entire life working. I have been a worker all of my life, and I had the privilege of working for the very department that I now lead as the Minister of Labour and Immigration years ago, the department that I am acutely aware, profoundly aware of the work that they do. In fact, many of the folks that still work in that department continue to be personal friends of mine.

I spent my entire life in public service advocating for the rights of workers. I began with the provincial government as an employment standards officer. To the members opposite: sometimes you guys think that those of us over here, you know, came from some alien country. We are grounded. We know what it feels like to be employees and workers because many of us here have spent our entire lives either as workers or employers or creating employment opportunities for workers, making sure that we build an environment for everyone. I went on to a senior policy role that oversaw many of the policies in this department that I now lead. So to the Member for Edmonton-McClung: rest assured that I am fully aware of the need to make sure that we have a legislative environment that serves the interests of workers and, yes, employers because we can't separate those two. Employees need employers. Employers need employees. We have to carry that along at all times. We have to think about them at all times.

But coming back to the amendment before us, as I said before, I know a lot of postgraduate students. I know a lot of postdoctoral fellows. A lot of them. And we have not received – again, I want to put that on the record. This bill was introduced a couple of weeks ago. I have read it. I have searched online content to see the reporting on this particular issue. I am yet to see any reporting that reflects the argument that the members opposite are making on this amendment. I have not received a single – let me confirm that again: a single – e-mail or letter on this particular issue. We are here to solve problems; we are not here to create problems where there are no problems. That is what our constituents expect of us. There is no need to upset something that is working or create more uncertainty in the system. That's why we are here.

So again to the Member for Edmonton-McClung: I thank you for your contributions, but again I urge you, I urge members opposite to focus on the problems, where there is one, so that we can see an amendment – and, yes, I am open to amendment where I see that there are real concerns. I am not interested in an ideological fight. Not interested. I am interested in solving problems . . .

Ms Hoffman: This is a problem.

Mr. Madu: . . . and there is no problem here because the people that – you are making up a problem that doesn't exist, to the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, and that's what, you know, is so disappointing about some of this debate on this amendment.

When you guys make complaints that you want to work in a collaborative manner, guess what? It is a two-way relationship. I call it a symbiotic kind of relationship. It has to make sense. It has to be substantive. It can't just be ideological politics on your part all the time. There is no problem. I have not heard from those faculty associations or those postdocs. If you have any letter to that effect, I want to see it, and I bet you don't have any. I bet you don't have any because I have not heard. It has been more than two weeks that it's been out there. Not one letter. Not one e-mail. Not one negative report on this bill. Why oppose it for the sake of opposing it? Did the faculty association – this association represents the same members that you are talking about. The same members that you're talking about. That is what is so disappointing about this.

So, again, Madam Chair, I urge all members to vote against this amendment.

The Chair: Hon. members, I'll take this opportunity to remind all members to speak through the chair. Using words like "you" is probably not helpful in the debate.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Chair. It is my pleasure to rise and speak to the amendment to Bill 17. I was certainly hopeful when the minister stood up that he would answer some of the questions, the actual questions, that we asked, as opposed to, you know, the job history. The question was: who was consulted other than – you know, the minister noted that he has a number of friends and colleagues that are postdoctoral students, or postdocs, as we are calling them, but that wasn't the question, "How many people do you know that are postdocs?" The question was: who was consulted? Put it on the record. Table it. If indeed the work was done and the consultation was transparent and it was done in a way that you can guarantee that you have talked to all of the folks that this legislation would impact and you know how they feel about this and you're crystal clear, then table it for this House.

The Chair: Hon. member – sorry – I hesitate to interrupt. I just reminded all members that using words like "you" in this Chamber is not helpful and definitely not directing comments through the chair.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Chair.

In any event, I think that probably there are many of us that do know postdoctoral students, but that doesn't mean that we've consulted. In fact, it is not our job, Madam Chair, to consult on this legislation and to make sure that it is, you know, done correctly or is drafted correctly or it's actually solving the problem it sets out to solve. That is the job of the drafter of the legislation. The problem is, the concern is, that we've said over and over again, that we don't see that, and the people that we have contacted don't agree with the government. So I would suggest that this amendment would allow additional time.

Strangely enough, my son, who – I don't know if he's watching right now; it's past midnight in the U.K. He's a postdoctoral fellow. Hi, honey, if you're watching. Consulting him, my texting with him or chatting with him thanks to technology, doesn't mean that I consulted. It just means that I chatted with him. It does not mean consultation. But, you know, the minister does know how to pick up the phone, apparently. Why not pick up the phone and consult with these associations? They have some concerns.

What I do know about this small group is that this is a group – and it is a small group now. It's 5,000 for all of the associations. But I want to talk specifically about – sorry. I've lost my notes here. I'm getting a little disorganized.

This particular group of postdocs is a very transient group, as the Member for Edmonton-McClung noted. Typically this group – and I'm sure the minister knows this. They don't stick around for more than a couple of years. Weirdly enough, my son has been a postdoctoral fellow twice and a postdoctoral student once. I won't get into that. This is a group that doesn't earn a lot. I'm sure the minister knows this. Universities set some minimum standards, I believe. I think that the University of Alberta is probably somewhere around – like, $35,000 is the minimum. It's difficult. It's a rough life. You know, there's a lot of confusion. Are they staff? Are they researchers? Are they students? There's a lot of confusion there. It is difficult. They're very often trying to make ends meet, often having to get their parents to help them out, but that is the life of a postdoctoral fellow or student. In any event, this is a group that should be consulted. This is a group that doesn't have a lot of power – let's just agree on that – and should be consulted.

Given that confusion, I want to go back to why we're saying that adding some time via this amendment is a good idea. We know that in July 2022 it will expire, and there is a reason that we want this to continue. I am not a lawyer obviously, so I actually went and looked at the – well, it's actually the summary of the lawsuit that we were talking about. I would have liked to hear from the minister, who is a lawyer – he gave us some of his job history – to tell us that he can pretty much assure this House that there won't be a challenge to this legislation, that it won't be a problem, because the people that we have spoken to have said: yes, it will be a problem.

Anyway, I want to summarize a little bit, and here are some of the facts. The Mounted Police Association of Ontario versus Canada (Attorney General): the Supreme Court of Canada made a major pronouncement on the scope of the section of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, section 2(d), freedom of association. Now, the RCMP had previously been excluded from unionizing and collective bargaining rights available to other public service employees. And then there was a piece of federal legislation that was referenced, but we don't need to get into that.

Instead, the RCMP members, very much like the association for postdoctoral students or other student associations, have a staff relations representative program for employee representation to voice concerns, things like that. Now, this forum does not provide a forum to raise some issues such as wage issues. It lacked independence, and it was the only employee association recognized by management. Now, they did note that it somewhat resembled a union in form as there were membership dues. They had the ability to lobby government, and of course they had the ability to assist and support members if there were disciplinary issues. However, it ended there. It was not a forum for collective bargaining with the employer. Some of the members opposing it went on to say that they weren't elected.

Now, the problem is that it infringes on the freedom of association and can't be justified under section 1 of the Charter. It seems to me that that's a problem, so if the minister is so confident that not endorsing this amendment or letting the legislation proceed as it is won't be challenged, that it won't be a problem, then perhaps he should reassure this House, maybe table some evidence, table some opinion from other lawyers other than just giving us an opinion or assuring us that he's called some friends and everything's cool, because I don't think that's good enough.

I do think that these changes will effectively stop the work – scratch that. Let me back up a little bit. I'm sorry, Madam Chair. I've lost my place.

I did not do any consultation other than texting with one person, which is absolutely in no way any form of consultation, but some of my colleagues have. What we have heard from the workers is that no one with a major university graduate students' association or postdoctoral association, including their labour relations committees, was consulted. Now, it seems to me that that is a problem given that they represent 5,000 student workers. Part of the reason I talked about some of the things that I'd heard from one postdoctoral fellow is that I think that these are folks with not a lot of power and not a lot of agency and not a big voice, particularly given the number. I mean, 5,000 is a big number, but it's not a big number when you look at the scope of the fields that they represent, so I think this is a group that needs to be consulted.

Associations are being put in a precarious position when the decisions being made on behalf of the workers are not done by the workers, and this bill suggests, as it is, that the government knows best who should represent academically employed workers. As usual, one of the concerns that we have – and we heard this repeatedly. This was a theme this morning, that it's unnecessary oversight by a government that undermines the autonomy of a sector. Obviously, this bill removes the right of workers to choose who represents them. By not allowing this to expire and then giving these groups other choices, this government is dictating what they have to do.

Major faculty associations in the province do not support the changes in Bill 17. Now, if the minister has proof that this is not the case and if he's done more than pick up the phone and call a few friends and if there is documentation that there are faculty associations in Alberta that do support the changes in Bill 17, then he should table those with this House. Demonstrate the consultation. Earlier this morning we talked about: what is consultation? Consultation is not picking up the phone and talking to a friendly. Consultation is not talking to a lobbyist. Consultation is not just talking to someone who you're fairly confident is going to agree with you. Consultation is about being very clear and objective. What are you consulting? What problem are you trying to address? Who are the stakeholders? Did you speak to people that, you know, may disagree with you in addition to people that agree with you? It's about transparency and about being very clear about the work that you've done.

You know, Madam Chair, why I do support this amendment is that I don't believe, once again, that the UCP government has done that particularly with Bill 17. I think that by supporting this amendment, we would allow more time and perhaps the government to do their job and consult.

With that, I will take my seat.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Chair. I just wanted to quickly rise because I was intrigued by one of the comments from the minister around just solving a problem. Great. Let's solve a problem. Hopefully, through you, Madam Chair, to the minister, maybe I can get some confirmation around some language in Bill 17 – a head nod will suffice, very much so – that the language as currently written in Bill 17 locks in the bargaining agent for all of these individuals and associations. You can't change it. They can't go anywhere else. These are who they get, and that's the end of it. Am I on the right track with that? Hopefully. The bargaining agent that currently exists right now: that's locked in; that's the way it is. Not really getting a response.

Hopefully, the minister will take that for what it's actually worth, because as we know, everything started around this in January 2015 due to a decision by the Supreme Court to affirm the constitutional rights of all workers in Canada to join a union of their own choosing and engage in meaningful collective bargaining, which is all fine and dandy.

Now, here's the part. Because the bargaining agent is locked in and they can no longer choose to go somewhere else – if that was the case, here's the problem, Minister. In a 6 to 1 decision the court expressly states that the right to freedom of association, section 2(d) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, includes a right to meaningful collective bargaining. The judges write:

We conclude that the [section] 2(d) guarantee of freedom of association protects [the] meaningful process of collective bargaining that provides employees with a degree of choice and independence sufficient to enable them to determine and pursue their collective interests.

If you're locking in the bargaining agent, that is not a degree of choice and independence. You've just violated that, hence why I said that this will get challenged and you'll end up losing.

Again, here I'm trying to say that supporting the amendment buys you some time – confirm all of this; check with the associations, all that jazz – and potentially saves you a whole bunch of headaches. Hopefully, the minister will reconsider after hearing that and save himself a lot of headaches, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there others on amendment A3?

Seeing none, I will call the question on amendment A3.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment A3 lost]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 5:13 p.m.]

[Motion on amendment A3 lost]

The Chair: Back on the main bill, Bill 17, in Committee of the Whole, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I appreciate that. It's unfortunate that the previous amendment was not successful.

Ms Hoffman: We're getting closer, though.

Ms Gray: I can hear that my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Glenora is quite hopeful. The third time is the charm, perhaps. With that in mind, I will just begin my remarks by saying that I will introduce a third amendment, and then I will continue from there.

The Chair: Hon. members, this will be known as amendment A4. Hon. member, please proceed.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 17, Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be amended in section 2(2) in the proposed section 58.2 by striking out "Divisions 5 to 9" and substituting "Divisions 4 to 9."

Now, in response to the second amendment that I've introduced so far on the labour statutes amendment portion of Bill 17, the minister suggested that rather than changing what he considers the intent of the bill – I disagree. I think the previous amendments were an attempt to make something that is unconstitutional constitutional, to respect the rights of workers to be able to have choice and that fundamental freedom of association.

This amendment perhaps will be able to secure his support. Although we've heard from labour relations committee members and executives who have opposed Bill 17, what this amendment serves to do is ensure that if the government is insisting on preventing workers from exercising their rights for freedom of choice and assembly, balance is maintained in the system by preventing employers from joining together to bargain collectively against small worker associations that do not have the same rights.

Now, there are some worker associations as small as 40. This becomes very much about balance of power. You may recall from debate on some of the previous amendments that I've spoken at length about the graduate student associations and the postdoctoral fellow associations, who are operating under an extreme power imbalance, the dynamics there.

Keep in mind that these are academically employed students. They are workers, they have rights, but they are also studying, some for one to two to maybe four years. The membership of the graduate student associations, postdoctoral fellow associations can be small, depending on who their employer is, and it can be frequently changing. What this speaks to, specifically, is one of the questions that I asked earlier in the debate, which I have not heard the minister respond to, which has to do with this Bill 17 allowing the employers to form employer organizations, yet there is no option for that for the workers.

This particular amendment won't fix everything in section 2 – that's something that we would have to do upon change of government – but it does at least make the section a little less bad. For the record even faculty associations who like the idea of having exclusive bargaining agent status have said to us that this section is something that they do not support, employers being able to form large employer organizations whereas the workers' associations will be only able to bargain for themselves and not to collaborate.

There is a serious disparity, and they wonder why the minister, from their perspective, is seeking to take power away from the workers and give more power to the employers. That is why this amendment has been put forward in consultation with graduate student associations and postdoctoral fellow associations. I think it's been fairly clear from the debate this afternoon that the minister has not consulted with the graduate student associations, the postdoctoral fellow associations. We've asked that question a number of times, trying to tease that out. While he has talked to some academic staff, some faculty associations, it certainly wouldn't have been all of them given the number who've reached out to us with concerns.

I've put forward this amendment, the fourth amendment to Bill 17, the third amendment to the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, seeking to prevent the balance of power from really tilting fully out of whack, and I look forward to debate on this particular amendment and our attempt to improve Bill 17 just a little bit.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

Mr. Madu: Madam Chair, I think that if you are looking for a good example of a pursuit that is purely based on philosophical underpinnings, this is one of those classical examples. I mean, I fully understand where you are coming from, but you are saying that . . .

The Chair: Hon. minister, I hesitate to interrupt, but please speak through the chair. Thank you.

Mr. Madu: Absolutely, Madam Chair.

You know, we are talking about how this amendment would effectively prevent the establishment of employer organizations, and you ask yourself: why would the members opposite be interested in preventing employers from establishing an organization? There is an association that is representing the interests of employees. What is it about that? Obviously, I would not support this because the members opposite have not advanced any substantive reasons, under the context of bargaining and the relationship between employers and employees and in the context of Bill 17 and in the context of the labour environment, why it is a bad thing to have employer organizations.

To be clear, division 4, which is really what this amendment is all about, deals with capacity of employers' organizations. Section 30 of the Labour Relations Code reads as follows:

- 30(1) For the purposes of this Act, an employers' organization is capable of
- (a) prosecuting and being prosecuted, and
 - (b) suing and being sued.
- (2) An employers' organization and its acts are not unlawful by reason only that one or more of its objects are in restraint of trade to the extent that those objects are necessary for carrying out its duties under this Act.

Then you have section 31. You have section 30 and section 31, that make up division 4, that is the subject of this amendment.

Section 31 deals with suspension or expulsion from employers' organizations.

Again, the essence of this amendment: it would allow, obviously, academic staff, postgraduate student, and postdoctoral fellow associations to maintain the bargaining agent exclusivity. That's not an issue. This amendment preserves that. But then it would not permit postsecondary institutions to have employer organizations. That is the crux of this amendment, and I don't think that it is appropriate under the circumstances. I would urge members to vote against the amendment.

The Chair: Are there others to amendment A4? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I just want to be crystal clear in reading this bill and now in addressing the amendment to Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. What the government is in the process of creating through their movement of this bill is an uneven playing field. They are creating conditions upon which they can determine who employees are represented by, and they have, through this bill, created a mechanism for employers to choose to band together, if they so choose, so that employers have the ability to become one large bargaining association, essentially, on the other side of the table, but employees don't.

Simply, what we're trying to do here through this amendment is create more balance. Having been on both sides of the bargaining table – I had to think about that for a second – most recently on the employer side but also having experienced bargaining as an employee, I can tell you that when you actually have balance in terms of the kind of resources you can bring to the table, the number of people you can bring to the table, and the ability to hire outside counsel to support you in your negotiations, you get the best agreements when both sides of the table are relatively in balance.

One of the biggest concerns that has been brought forward to us – and I'm not shocked. I will take the minister at his word, through you, Madam Chair, when he says: I haven't received correspondence about this. I am not shocked when a bill introduced in the final days of the session for most instructors and right before spring session starts for most instructors – this is a busy time of transition for a lot of people working who are graduate students or postdoctoral fellowship students. This is a busy time of year. I'm not surprised that the bill doesn't even mention postsecondary in the title. It's referring to the Labour Statutes Amendment Act. Of course, it touches on a number of different pieces that relate to a number of different types of employee organizations. But I will take the minister at his word, and if what he said isn't accurate, then I certainly would appreciate it if he could correct the record in this House at the earliest possible convenience.

He says that he has received no correspondence at all as it relates to this bill and the questions that have been raised. I will tell you, through you, Madam Chair, that when we have picked up the phone – and I know the minister knows how to pick up the phone. It is well documented; it is in the news. When the minister wants to, he can pick up the phone, he can make a call, and he can talk to somebody about an issue that he wants to give feedback on or get feedback on. That is very well documented in the news. So when we picked up the phone and reached out to graduate student associations, postdoctoral fellowship associations – thank you to my colleague the MLA for Edmonton-Mill Woods and the fantastic staff in the NDP who support her. When we picked up the phone, universally the employee side of the table said that they had grave concerns about this section, that they wanted it out, that they didn't think that it was fair, it wasn't going to create balance, and that they wanted some – you know, if they could only make one change, this would be the one. They would like to make other changes, too, but the biggest issue is the innate embedding of imbalance between the two sides of the table.

So we are calling upon the government – and I've been there, when an amendment comes forward and you think: oh, it actually sounds like this might be helpful. There was a time where we actually voted against an amendment, and then later that night I was, like, "I don't know if we did the right thing," and we actually brought the legislation back to committee so that we could amend the amendment. We brought the bill back to committee so that we could bring forward a very similar amendment.

Don't do that. That's too much work. If you're not sure if you're doing the right thing on this, I'd say that you can absolutely move that we adjourn at this section. You can think about it tonight. You can come back and accept the amendment, because I will say that this is about creating fairness and balance in the legislation. That's the intent.

This is the biggest issue that, when we did pick up the phone and speak to a number of different graduate associations, postdoctoral fellowship associations, they highlighted as their number one concern. We think there are other issues in the Labour Statutes Amendment Act as well. You know, clearly, the government doesn't want to address those. After the next election we'll see how things roll, but I imagine we will be in a position in this Legislature that folks can maybe come to the table and bring forward some solutions to the issues that have been seen, Madam Chair, through you, in this piece of legislation.

The biggest one today that I would urge the government to, honestly, like, pull out the earplugs on, pick up the phone, talk to people and make sure that the righteousness that we've heard is actually reflective of the reality that employees, who are incredibly busy during this time of the year – I am confident that they will answer the minister's call if the minister or political staff from the minister's office reaches out and wants genuine feedback about this section.

I have heard the minister say that, you know, he's been an employee and a worker, and I appreciate that. I am confident that he, then, understands the importance of having balance on both sides of the table. To actually be able to bring forward problems and get to the point of resolution, both sides need to show respect and have balance in terms of the power dynamic. Because the government has decided that they're going to determine who it is that represents employees, this is one way to say: well, at least employers will have to represent themselves on a smaller scale. They won't be able to all band together because employees won't have that option in the way the bill is being presented currently. So it really is an intention to create balance. Again, you know, a number of people, everyone we reached out to, all said that this was probably the area of the bill that was so heavy handed in favour of one side of the table over the other. This is one way to create a little bit of balance.

I honestly and sincerely call upon the government. If they're not willing to make a decision on this right now – the easiest decision one can make is to say no. But if you actually think, "You know what? Maybe we should make a couple of calls, and we should see where they stand," and you come back to this place and stand by the statements that were made earlier, that nobody has a problem with this and the only people who have a problem are the NDP – well, first of all, that's not what the actual people this bill is going to impact have told us. There are probably staff watching this debate right now who, if the minister passes a note or, you know, sends a message, could absolutely make these calls while this bill is still up for debate in committee rather than making a decision that will be very difficult to undo later on.

It can still be undone. Certainly, whatever government happens to be here after the next election can bring forward a variety of pieces of bills, as the current Premier highlighted through his first session. When we were all here that first summer, he definitely brought forward a number of omnibus bills and a number of bills to undo work that previous governments had done, and that can absolutely be done again. I suspect many pieces will be in short order, but this is one that I don't think the government needs to move forward on. I don't think that it actually gets them any significant benefit as it relates to this section. I don't think that there is any benefit in this section other than the heavy-handedness that is moving forward with creating a significant imbalance between the employee and employer sides.

Again, through you, Madam Chair – I appreciate that you've cautioned folks to keep the debate through the chair, and certainly that's my intention – I urge the political staff to the minister to actually pick up the phone. We know they can do it. Give these organizations some calls, and then come back to this place and accept this amendment. It's not a big one, but it is something that universally we were told would create better balance between the two sides of the table, and it's something that I think the minister would be wise to accept. It really is something that I think will address some of the biggest issues that have been highlighted for us as they relate to this bill.

There is a significant trust issue between a lot of these stakeholders and the current government. I know that this is only one minister that these stakeholders work with, but this minister has a chance to set the path on a better direction. This is one of the interesting things. When there's a change in who the minister is, you can re-examine some of the past decisions and undo it. For example, the current Minister of Justice has worked very quickly to undo some decisions that the previous Minister of Justice brought in around traffic court – right? – and was very proud to stand in this place and say: we're undoing that; we're not going to move forward with charging people a hundred bucks to be able to argue their traffic tickets. And I will say that the minister of labour also has an opportunity to say: "You know what? Some of the direction that the last minister took didn't serve Albertans well." It's a new minister. It's a new day. Let's try to repair the relationship. That's definitely what the Minister of Justice has signalled on a number of fronts that he's trying to do as the new Minister of Justice. There's certainly an opportunity for the minister of labour to follow the lead of the minister that is so closely aligned with the Premier and is clearly doing that.

I hope that the current minister of labour takes this amendment and the feedback that we gathered through consultation, picking up the phone and talking to stakeholders, and carries it out in a way that I think would benefit democracy and make this part of the bill a little bit less bad. Thank you so much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there others to debate? The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Chair. I just wanted to quickly respond to the comments made by the Member for Edmonton-Glenora. You know, I am absolutely committed to the well-being of our postgraduate and postdoctoral fellows that work in our great postsecondary institutions – absolutely committed – because I very much relate with those students who work in those environments. When my wife was doing her master's in law at the U of A, she was the vice-president of academics of one of those grad student associations, and as I said before, I have so many personal friends of mine, relatives who are in this country, in this province pursuing their graduate and postdoctoral studies. This is a group of individuals that I would want to do everything I can to make sure that there is fairness in their work environment, in their academic pursuits, and in their relationship with their universities. I think that is a shared goal of all of us.

What I reject, Madam Chair, is to impute imaginary problems where there is no problem. As I said before, we are called upon to solve real problems, not to imagine problems that do not exist. The Member for Edmonton-Glenora talks about fairness and levelling the ground and power imbalance. I don't see that in this bill. We are talking about a group of individuals that have an association that would negotiate and bargain on their behalf that is made up of themselves. The problem here, I suspect, that the members opposite have with this bill and the reason for that particular amendment – and don't get me wrong. The Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods: I have enormous respect for her. You know, I quarrel with the members opposite, but where I can find an opportunity to work together, we will – I can assure you that – because it is the right thing to do. My one appeal is – I understand that oftentimes there are ideological differences; I get that – that we must choose our battle in a way that serves the best interests of the people that we are advocating for.

On this one – on this one – I am acutely aware of the implications of Bill 17 on those folks. I don't see how having an employer organization – and I've read division 4. I've read sections 30 and 31 into the record. I don't see how that would all of a sudden create this massive power imbalance that the Member for Edmonton-Glenora is talking about. It doesn't exist. We are not here to pursue imaginary problems that do not exist; we are here to solve real problems. I just wanted to put that on the record, Madam Chair.

I think, you know, we see this, and I was one of those who were watching carefully between 2015 and 2019 in this province, where we saw a lot of disruptions in our economy, in the largest sector of our economy, where there was so much confusion and antibusiness culture, an environment that led investors to withhold billions, hundreds of billions of dollars in investment, because they did not have faith that the government of the day had created a steady environment for businesses to do what they know how to do best. You know, the law firm I used to manage not too far away from here: we had so many start-up companies disappear between 2015 and 2019 that were doing so well prior to the members opposite forming government in 2015; one of the reasons that led me into politics, because as a business lawyer I was having conversations with my clients, taking a look at their financials, and they were closing shops after shops. Why? They would tell you one thing: we don't trust that the government of the day understands what it means to build an environment and society for everyone to do well.

So I urge members opposite, you know, to think hard about how our policies – they may be well intentioned. I'm not going to impute bad faith here. They may be well intentioned, but we must have the capacity to think them through on the other side. Those disruptions between 2015 and '19 that led hundreds of billions of dollars to flee our province prevented employers from making investments in our country, had real-life consequences on the economy of this province and, by extension, on the financials of our small businesses and the bank accounts of ordinary citizens. They do have ripple effects, and unless you're able to track those ripple effects, you ignore them.

When it comes to employees and employers, these are people that we must think about every single day as we do our work. We must think about employers and small businesses. We must think about employees and how we can make sure that they do well in the workplace, keep them safe so they can go back to their families and loved ones at the end of the day. You can't adopt an approach that sees one as an enemy or sees one as a problem.

[Mrs. Frey in the chair]

You know, I have sat here for some time now. I have been keeping track of some of the adjectives that the members opposite use to describe employers and businesses. If you are a small business like myself that used to run a small law firm, I was pretty much disappointed between 2015 and 2019 any time I tuned into the Assembly and listened to how they refer to, describe small businesses and employers. You would think that these people must have come from somewhere.

That is a problem that I have with the submissions of the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, not so much the amendment that's been put forward. It's well intentioned. But the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, you know, is trying to impute problems that do not exist, and on that particular basis, Madam Chair, I will call on members of this Assembly to vote down this amendment.

The Acting Chair: Are there any other hon. members wishing to speak?

Seeing none, I shall call the question.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Wednesday, May 11, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Statement by the Speaker

Division

The Speaker: Hon. members, prior to calling the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West, I would just like to draw the Assembly's attention. As I understand, there was some confusion this afternoon, and that is the last thing I would want here in the Assembly, confusion for anyone. Standing Order 32, I'm sure you're all very well aware, is the standing order that applies specifically to divisions. Standing Order 32(4): "When Members have been called in for a division there shall be no further debate, and despite Standing Order 13(7), a Member must remain at the Member's seat during the division." I know that during committee there was some to and fro about possibly voting from other locations. It is important that all members remain in their seat for the division.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

Mr. Sabir moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment May 10: Ms Phillips]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, I concluded my remarks yesterday talking a little bit about the parks pieces of this legislation that I think are broadly not supported by the public certainly given what we know from public opinion polling, from just the very presence of thousands of lawn signs still on people's lawns, particularly in Calgary, and the level of trust this government enjoys, that is to say zero.

Having said that, there are other pieces that are also problematic for managing public lands. There is no question that expanding the power of the minister to set out standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines, objectives, or other rules on public land can certainly lead to situations where in that delicate balance of managing public land, there is a thumb put on the scale by a minister's personal proclivities. Certainly, we have seen over the years a certain amount of distrust with the PCs around this, which is what led to quite a bit of lightning in the sky, Mr. Speaker, around the development of the South Saskatchewan regional plan.

Certainly, there was a great deal of worry among, you know, grazing lease holders and others in terms of the balance between access to public land for leaseholders – that is to say, in particular the grazing leases – and access for guide outfitters, for various hunting enterprises, and indeed even for the heretofore third rail in wildlife management and fish and wildlife policy, which is, of course, paid hunting.

There is no question that when the minister can only set standards for an existing regulation under Bill 21, the minister can use those tools for anything the minister can set regulations for. That expands their powers in public lands, and you know not only will I say that this is problematic from a consultation perspective given, as I referenced, the very delicate balance. In particular, the biggest balances are usually having to be struck between grazing lease holder access – certainly, road allowance access is always an issue. Access for hunting is always an issue, and then access to public Crown leases for gravel pits and how that interacts with grazing lease holders and others is almost always – there are almost always three or four files burning that are of a great deal of concern to rural MDs, municipal districts, or even towns. Oftentimes smaller towns will have concerns about how these issues are being handled as well.

I want to issue a caution here for the House that if a minister was to take this too far, as certainly it was back in the day the Wildrose's perception of the PCs taking some of these powers too far with the development of the South Saskatchewan regional plan and elsewhere, it can cause quite a bit of a public firestorm and public debate. It can also interfere in a very delicate balance of people trying to make a living – right? – with recreational pursuits. In my mind, the right to make a living and that lease have to take precedence. You know, if there are too many folks calling you up to get access to your land for hunting, then the right to graze your animals has to come first. So it's for that reason that I would issue a caution on this Bill 21, Mr. Speaker.

I mean, the other pieces of this bill are, you know, so anodyne as to be soporific, quite frankly. We have some changing of language around the Railway (Alberta) Act and some of the fairly straightforward changes for the Rural Utilities Act in terms of how rural electrification associations can purchase other REAs, which my only question on that would be: what was the scale and scope of the negotiations with the REAs? But I suspect this was something that they do not mind.

With that, I will conclude my comments.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on amendment REF1 are there others? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise and speak to this bill. I believe it's my first time even though it may have been in the House for a while. Of course, we are speaking to the referral. You know, I would like to support this amendment in the sense that once again we see a piece of legislation that has been introduced into the House that makes changes, substantial changes, to a variety of different pieces of legislation without what I would say is appropriate consultation with many of the stakeholders that are being impacted by these pieces.

Obviously, there are some major concerns that I see even just quickly looking at these pieces of legislation and specifically to the changes that are being made through the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act. Now, any changes that are done within the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act really should not be done segregated from the act itself. To do this in a piece of legislation that speaks to a variety of other pieces of legislation and not specifically to this act I think is a concern, especially when we look at the fact that there are significant changes being made in removing the maximum licensing requirements when it comes to our residential group homes and foster homes.

Now, again, coming from the fact that I've worked in this field – and, in fact, I used to do licensing – I am concerned with a watering down of what I see as being a legislative requirement when it comes to the services and supports that are provided to children intervention services. There's a reason why there's a one-year maximum on licences. The reason that those are done is because, of course, we want to ensure that whenever a child is placed in a placement, whether it be a group home or a foster home or even a kinship home, those licences, that are being reviewed on an annual basis, are being done to ensure the most safety for and utmost safety of the children that are in those facilities. To see that there is now going to be a change that would put that in regulation removes the accountability of the director, who, ultimately, is the government, in ensuring that those legislative requirements are being followed.

Now, this has been a very scary year for children in care in the fact that we have seen an increase in the amount of children that have passed away in care, that have died in care. When we see such an increase at a time when the government is watering down the requirements of safety and the basics, I guess, of providing care to children that are in intervention services, I think that there is a serious disconnect, that this government doesn't seem to understand that the very reason that these licences are legislated, that there is a one-year renewal requirement is because of the very fact that we have to ensure that every foster home and every group home that a child is placed in is safe and that every staff that works in those group homes is certified to work in those facilities, that their training is up to date, that medication is locked away appropriately, that all of the safety pieces are put in place, that we don't have too many children in a group home when there shouldn't be more than the licensed requirement.

Even when we try to place siblings in many of these licensed facilities and they have, let's say, already three children in their home and they're only licensed for four, the director has to approve an additional child to come into that foster home because of the fact that they may have to share a bedroom. They need to ensure that there's appropriate space, that there are enough bathrooms, that the backyard is fenced in. All of those things need to be in place to keep our children safe. It's pretty simple.

When I see section 2 of the act being amended to remove the one-year maximum requirement, it's concerning. I haven't heard from the government how they're going to ensure the safety of these children that are in these placements if they're not going to ensure that this is a legislative requirement. Ultimately, it holds the government to account to ensure that they're doing what they're supposed to do to make sure kids are safe. That's why it's legislated.

To see this put into a piece of legislation that encompasses – I think we're looking at something like 16 different sections and 16 different acts, so 16 other pieces of legislation are being amended while the government is trying to sneak in an amendment to the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, a pretty serious piece of legislation. I have a really hard time believing that somehow ensuring children are safe in group home facilities, in services like PSECA – they have to abide by these – looking at specialized foster homes where we have medically fragile children is somehow cutting red tape.

Keeping children safe, making sure that foster parents and staff are trained appropriately to understand the medical needs of a child who may have specialized needs is not red tape, yet it's being stuck in a piece of legislation that has 16 other pieces of legislation in it, pieces of legislation that are dealing with things like parks and looking at pieces of legislation that are dealing with public transportation, pieces of legislation that are looking at whether or not people should report whether or not an animal has an infection. How does that even correlate to the very, very important piece of legislation that keeps our kids safe? Why would the government choose to slide this into a bill that's hundreds of pages? It doesn't make any sense.

The other part about this, too, is that it also adds in that a foster parent as a person can appeal a decision on a renewal or alter a residential facility licence. I'm not sure I understand where this is coming from. I would love the government to explain to me why we would be making sure that foster parents have the ability to appeal a decision on a licence. There is a process that already exists within Children's Services, but I can tell you that through the licensing process it's pretty clear when someone doesn't pass their licensing, and there are pretty serious reasons as to why that would happen. To be able to enable somehow now within this legislation a foster parent to be able to have an appeal process: I'm curious who the government spoke to that made that decision a priority for the government.

The one thing that we do know is that when children are with temporary guardians and they have been in foster homes for a very, very long time, they go to permanent guardianship orders, and if foster parents want to adopt and for some reason they can't – there is a reason as to why they're not being approved for adoption – children's ability to be adopted gets held up for a long time when foster parents have the ability to appeal. I have stories where this has happened. Yes, there's a court process and, yes, there are things that can be done, but sometimes foster parents may not like a decision and will do this to hold up the permanency plan for a child because they want to be that permanency plan. For some reason, the government has decided that that is not in the best interest of the child. This is a very, very dangerous thing to have.

There are ways that this can happen without it being legislated that will support foster parents in going through the appeal process, through a clear and already established process that has existed for a very long time, but does not allow them to somehow start influencing the residential facility licensing process. There are some pretty significant and serious concerns not only around the safety of children in care but also the long-term permanency planning when it comes to whether or not children can be adopted by these two simple changes that are being made within this piece of legislation, this piece of legislation that isn't even talking to the whole act.

I can tell you, given my experience working with the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, that the minute you start moving one piece of that act, it creates a waterfall of effects throughout whole pieces of legislation. Like I've said, it will have on-the-ground, real, practical impacts about the ability to keep our kids safe. The government needs to take this seriously, and if they're not going to take it seriously, let's refer it to a committee. Let the committee evaluate what the outcomes are going to be, whether or not this is actually in the best interest of the child or if someone just happened to have the ear of somebody in the government and decided: hey, I had a really bad situation, and I'd like you to change this. I'm curious. I've never heard this before, I've never seen this before, and I don't understand why the government would even do this.

Like, this government needs to take the safety of our children seriously. I cannot believe – and, I mean, I just looked at this – that the government would even consider removing the one-year maximum on licences. What is it going to be, then? It's going to be stuffed in regulation, that the government can just arbitrarily change their mind and decide? You get a three-month licence? You can have a two-year licence? It can be whatever you want it to be? That doesn't make any sense. There are different levels of licensing.

You know what I do know about licensing, Mr. Speaker? It is that licensing also relates back to the support that is provided to foster parents and residential service providers. What I mean by that is that the more experience you have as a foster parent, the more ability you have to, let's say, take on a child with medical needs, the more financial assistance the government will give you to provide that. You need to have that expertise, you need to have that understanding to be able to do that. You need to be able to pay for classes and to be able to go do those things. You could be a level 1 foster parent, a level 2 foster parent, a level 3 foster parent, and a specialized foster parent, and where you are on the scale is how much support you get from the government. That's based on your licence.

If you remove the licensing requirement, is that going to remove the financial assistance that is provided to our foster parents? Is that going to arbitrarily change the supports that this government decides to give foster parents because they will just arbitrarily change the licensing requirements? There is a direct financial correlation to this. I'd love the government to help me understand that piece.

I know they're great about their fiscal management and cutting supports when they possibly can in any way they possibly can. And you know what? A really sneaky way of being able to do that would be to mess around with the licensing requirements in foster care, right? Just make everyone a level 1 foster parent, then. You don't need to be specialized. You don't need to understand medical needs. We're not going to compensate you for your expertise and for the fact that these children need extra support. We're going to pay you all the same so that you can't access the education that you need, so that you can't get the medical support you need, pay for maybe the diapers that you need or all the medical formula that you need. Let's be honest; most foster parents pay out of pocket for most of the stuff that they provide to the children that live in their homes. They're not making money off being foster parents. But they deserve to have the support in place.

If you're a level 3 foster parent or a specialized foster parent that takes children in that need that extra support, you need that financial assistance to pay for their needs. So why change it? If it's in regulation, can't you just change the financial formula as well? Will the supports being provided to children in care change with this piece? I can see that happening. I mean, we've seen it happen everywhere else. People with developmental disabilities, people who are on AISH, seniors, all of the people that rely on this government to ensure that they have some financial support have been impacted by the decisions made by this government, and this change can do that. It can take away the ability for licensing and the level of licensing that these foster parents have. It's a real concern.

I'll be honest. I don't trust this government, so I could see them doing this as a really easy, quiet way of messing around with the licensing requirements, which then would be the financial supports to kids in care, without anybody noticing because, of course, now it won't be legislated. It will just be slid in through regulation. People should be concerned. I want skilled, educated foster parents supporting children in care. I want people working in group homes to have that knowledge and that expertise, and I want to know that every child that is placed is placed in a licensed facility that has met the requirements that the government has set and is accountable to holding in place. This government needs to ensure that happens, and if they're not, they better explain why it's not happening.

The Speaker: On amendment REF1 are there others?

[Motion on amendment REF1 lost]

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are on second reading of Bill 21. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie. Let me just double-check my debate sheet. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has the call.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thanks for double-checking. I appreciate that. You know, I imagine that you hear me speak so many times in this House that you were doubting there for a second: oh, I thought he already spoke to this. But, of course, I have not, so thank you very much for recognizing me and giving me the opportunity to now speak to Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, on the main bill.

One of the things that I left off saying while I was commenting on the bill during referral was that the associate minister of red tape and the Minister of Education seem to be at odds on what this particular bill was actually doing. It was quite interesting. It's like the left hand didn't know what the right hand was doing, and they were quite confused. On the one hand, the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction was claiming that private schools will no longer have to produce financial data on what it collects in tuition fees, for example. The Minister of Education was claiming loudly that this wasn't at all true, that audited statements, including tuition fees, would still be required. It was confusing for a lot of people and all the more confusing for all Albertans.

Then the government produced a media handout stating that tuition fee data would not be collected, but the amendments through this omnibus legislation and the associated private school regulation make it quite clear that financial data will be reported. We need to really know what's going on here when it comes to this. How does the minister responsible for the legislation not know what is in it, right? It is precisely this diametrically opposed message from the government that causes Albertans to lose trust in the UCP.

Fundamentally, this bill makes two changes to the Education Act. As opposed to broad enabling regulatory powers on private schools, it lays out extensive details on how private schools can be regulated. Because the list of areas covered here is so extensive, there is no real net impact on the private schools. Their confusion arises because the government told the media in a handout something that turned out to be completely untrue when you read the legislation. It extends the timeline that school boards can spend noncapital reserves with ministerial approval from September 1, 2022, to September 1, 2023. This allows more time to hit the government's noncapital reserve balance limits.

This was one of the issues that, as far as I know, we still don't have clarity on. We have had the Minister of Education get up and say, "Well, no, it's not going to do that," but we still don't know in terms of the media handout that was given out and what the Minister of Education was saying. I have yet to hear concrete information on which way it is, one or the other.

Of course, the bill amends a number of pieces of legislation. As I was stating during the debate on referral, it's 16 different sections of 16 different acts. One of those is section 5 in the Health Statutes Amendment Act. It makes a small amendment to the Health Statutes Amendment Act, 2021, to include "and standards" after "regulations" in one section of the act. This is yet another example, Mr. Speaker, of how this government is taking legislation, moving it into regulation, where they will not be held accountable for that inside of this Legislature. That was one of the main issues, I think, that a number of us on this side of the House have. But as I was explaining last night, even, in debate on referral, to me it's perplexing. To me, it's perplexing because this is a way that we weaken our democracy instead of strengthening it.

I can understand that there need to be regulations on certain pieces of legislation. That is not the issue; that's not the debate here. The issue is that so many pieces of legislation that we've had presented in this House by the UCP have this dominant trait, I would say, that most of what actually needs to be decided, most of how it will impact Albertans' lives, most of the decision-making that will actually end up not only impacting people now but well into the future, for generations to come, is being put into regulation, and it's not even being debated inside of this House. That's the real issue.

I mean, the reason why we have this entity, this body, is so that these issues can be debated. Again, this is yet another example of this type of situation, where this government puts more and more into regulation so that it can't be debated in the House, and with a simple stroke of a pen they can simply just make regulations on certain pieces of legislation as they move forward.

Another example of what is being changed is section 6 of the Highways Development and Protection Act. Of course, there's no particular issue with this. But while these changes are exceedingly minor, if they save a few minutes of cabinet time and, in the view of the government, it makes the system more efficient, then we can support that kind of change. But, again, it gives power to the minister instead of cabinet to designate new freeways and the approval of freeway access locations. So it's not even going to be a cabinet decision; it's going to be simply left up to the minister.

It begs the question, you know: how does the minister actually see this power being used? What measures will be in place to ensure that approvals will still go through a proper process? Let's not forget, Mr. Speaker, that there are processes for these.

I understand that what the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction is trying to do is save time, for the most part. There are, like I said, some of the changes that we agree with, and we find them to be, you know, quite reasonable. But then others, as has been debated by members on this side of this House, are quite substantial and that we just don't agree with. To be quite honest, I think that it's characteristic of this type of omnibus piece of legislation, that they would do that.

I remember that, you know, private members of the government caucus, when they were on this side, would be pulling their hair out or setting their hair on fire, whichever they would prefer, when it came to this type of thing when we were in government, yet now that those same members are on that side of the House, they're perfectly fine with the associate minister of red tape bringing forward this omnibus piece of legislation. Of course, as I was stating last night in debate as well, Mr. Speaker, a lot of those same members were, I would say, staunch advocates of accountability while they were on this side of the House.

You know, I made the argument last night, but I'll make it again, Mr. Speaker. With moving more and more decision-making power into regulations and giving all of that power to the minister, you're creating less accountability. You're creating less accountability to this Legislature and, especially, creating less accountability to the people of Alberta. That is quite concerning. Again, I find it quite hypocritical that while members were on this side of the House, they were screaming so much about accountability, and now that they're on that side of the House, private members of the government caucus don't seem to be quite as concerned about this issue of accountability at all and more and more power going into the hands of ministers and therefore the front bench and the cabinet.

The Municipal Government Act: in section 9 there are a number of positive amendments to the Municipal Government Act, which we support. We support the administrative changes and tweaks to the bill. There's the – while the changes to the MGA make a nontrivial portion of the red tape reduction, they are mostly administrative; for example, specifying how electronic records can be used or how public meetings are called or how many councillors a municipality must have or that the minister may approve changes to CRL bylaws, which would have to be approved by the city as opposed to cabinet.

As a practical matter the most substantive matter here takes up the least amount of legislative space. Amendments would enable municipalities to co-operate and establish one business licence for multiple municipalities. This is actually a really good change. I've heard from a number of business owners that this is an issue that, for them, they found concerning, so I'm glad that the government was actually able to make that change.

Another section is section 10, changes to the Pharmacy and Drug Act. Subsection (4) gives the Alberta College of Pharmacy the power to develop their own standards and enforce them on matters related to pharmacies instead of being addressed through government regulation. Some of these matters include the storage of drugs and blood products, health care products, and devices in pharmacies as well as information management systems and records. Subsection (3) downgrades regulation authority-making ability from cabinet to the minister on matters relating to regulations and bylaws created by the council. Subsections (5) and (6) proclaim sections of previous health statutes amendment acts which dealt with pharmacies.

Section 11: this is where we get into the Provincial Parks Act, Mr. Speaker. This is perhaps one of the most concerning issues that we have within this bill. We agree that there are some things that, hey, are pretty self-explanatory. There are no problems. We have no problems supporting them. But when it comes to parks, the power that the minister of environment has been given is quite substantial. Just to be clear, I'm going to quote directly from the bill, under minister's directives and codes. It says that "the Minister may set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines . . . or other rules relating to any matter in respect of which a regulation may be made under this Act." Any matter. And that is standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines or other rules to any matter. One could easily interpret this as, basically, the minister can do anything that the minister wants to do when it comes to this particular piece of legislation, and that's a lot of power to put into the hands of just one individual, I would say. Is there going to be a check and balance for this in any way?

Now, especially when it comes to the environment and parks, this government has had a horrible track record when it comes to coal mining in the eastern slopes, and the Alberta public – the Alberta public – had an incredible outcry when it came to what this government wanted to do. It was quite astonishing, because essentially the government wanted to open up the parks to coal mining.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to this omnibus bill . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, my apologies. You actually moved amendment REF1, which means that you have already spoken once at second reading.

Are there others wishing to join in the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yeah. I don't think I've had, actually, an opportunity to speak to Bill 21 in any of the readings, so I'm excited to stand up and speak about what, again, as I was earlier saying to the referral amendment, seems to be a bill that just keeps going and going and going on a variety of different things.

The one thing that I – and I'm sure my colleagues have mentioned this in the past through this debate. Even on page 1 of this bill, when it comes to the Animal Health Act, there are some changes that are being made when it comes to the reporting of potential diseases in livestock. Now, I'm not quite sure – and maybe I missed this.

Maybe the minister did speak to this at some point. Why is it moving into regulation? I think that when we look at animal welfare, we want to ensure that there is confidence in our food supply and that there is an ability to react quickly when it comes to potential infections or diseases in livestock, and you would want to make sure that it's in legislation.

Again, when we've heard this government speak to red tape reduction, they've always implied it as a mechanism or a tool that this government is using to make life simpler. And I don't know why, when we're talking about the notification of diseases, we want to make it simpler. It seems pretty important, I would think, to the whole agricultural industry that the notification of diseases happens within legislation and happens within those 24 hours. We've had examples with bovine infections. We have a current issue in Alberta right now with the avian flu, and we see how quickly it's spreading across Alberta. To not have something within the Animal Health Act that has a legislated requirement with a specific length of time in legislation is a real concern.

I wouldn't know of anybody in the agriculture industry that would have looked at this and thought: yeah, I mean, we should remove that out of the legislation. It gives certainty to our producers so that they know, when there is a potential disease within whether it be a flock or a livestock area, that that notification is happening immediately, CFIA is being deployed as soon as it needs to happen, and there is a protection in place not only for the producers but for the community as a whole. I mean, we know that when we hear about potential diseases, the best thing that Alberta does well is respond quickly so that we can continue to have that certainty and so that people who are looking at importing and exporting our products know that we have everything in place in legislation to ensure that we're responding the way that we need to respond.

I think that by removing this out of legislation and turning it into a regulation, it could give an opportunity for individuals that don't want to import our product to use it as an excuse to say that we're not actually protecting our agriculture industry the way that we should be. We're weakening the protection. Now, I don't think the government would ever want to do that. We know that we are a primary exporter of pork, beef, chicken, all the things, and to have any opportunity to weaken that, I just wouldn't understand why the government would make that choice.

I'm curious, again, hoping that at some point the minister will stand up and explain why we would remove something that's so clearly in legislation, that's so easy to point to our trading partners and say: "No. This is in legislation. This is a requirement. Notification must happen within 24 hours, and these are the steps that are followed if anything were to ever happen. You can trust our food safety." Pretty simple.

I think that's the question, and I won't dwell on it too much because I do think that, I mean, I've said what I have to say. I don't know if I'm going to get a response to any of the questions that I've asked this evening, so I'll put it on the record, and hopefully at another point we can have those conversations. Again, I think that this just speaks to – I'm not totally sure that the government, really, looking at the red tape reduction, has a clear understanding of what the intention of red tape reduction is. My understanding is that it was supposed to make things easier and better, yet this has an opportunity to create some uncertainty.

Again, going back to: when you change one piece, there tends to be a waterfall effect in other areas. I think this might be an example where, if this ever has to be tested and people want to be able to speak to our partners in our trading industries, there might be some explaining to do, that would have been quite easy to do had we just kept it in legislation.

With that, I think I will close my remarks and sit back down.

The Speaker: Are there others? I am prepared to call on the minister to close debate.

[Motion carried; Bill 21 read a second time]

Bill 23

Professional Governance Act

[Debate adjourned May 11: Ms Renaud speaking]

The Speaker: Hon. members, before the Assembly is Bill 23. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill, my first chance to do so. I must say that on review of this bill I'm concerned that the bill has even arrived at the House. I don't think it was ready for prime time, and I think that I'm very concerned about what I'm seeing here.

The first thing that I will mention sort of briefly before I go on to my major concern about the bill is the fact that the bill doesn't seem to completely understand the rest of the legislation that is going to be implicated in this bill. I guess my primary example is that there are a number of different pieces of legislation that will affect these PROs, the professional regulatory organizations, and each of those pieces of legislation have different requirements around reporting of disciplinary or other kinds of decisions that are made within the organization with regard to their own members. This bill just complicates the issue and does not provide clarity to the PROs, those organizations, to know what they have to do in the end because the bill doesn't explicitly say it.

It is eliminating rules from some of the other regulations. For example, in this particular bill it indicates that for decisions that are made by the organizations with regard to their members, there is 120 days for the decision to be made and for the participants to be informed of the decision, which is, you know, fine, I guess. I might want to go back and talk to the organizations to find out if that is an appropriate amount of time, because I understand that the government did not go back to those organizations to have that conversation.

But it also is problematic because many of these organizations will be responsible to other acts. For example, the Labour Mobility Act, which we just passed in this House not that long ago, had in it a number of very explicit rules around some of the decisions that are made, and I remember talking about that in the House at that time, about whether or not the length of time for these decisions was appropriate.

In the Labour Mobility Act, for example, it indicates that the organization has 10 days to acknowledge an application. That already is one that is not explicitly mentioned in this act but, I guess, could fit within that act without a conflict at that point. However, the second piece is that a decision needs to be made 20 days after that fact. That is in direct contradiction to the 120 days that's in this act. So we know right away that a PRO, professional regulatory organization, will be responsible under two different acts to make a reporting decision on two different dates, one of them being on 120 days, the other one being on 20 days, a huge difference of more than three months.

I just really don't think that we can pass this, in all fairness. It provides complications and is impossible for an organization to meet both. You know, I guess they'll have to make the decision to meet the limits put in under the Labour Mobility Act and just ignore the section in this act as being irrelevant to the actual decisions. But that's ridiculous. Why are we passing a bill that actually has a section we know now to be irrelevant? That's not a good way to move forward.

As well, under the Labour Mobility Act, besides the 10 days for the acknowledgement of the application, 20 days for a decision, then there's another 10 days for a written decision, so at maximum the whole thing is 40 days long as opposed to this bill, which is 120 days. I guess reading that kind of thing just makes me very concerned that the kind of discussions have not been held with the organizations and there's not been the time taken to compare this act to the other acts that will also be governing the decisions of various organizations, and it's unfair to put them in these kinds of positions.

Just one other example, just to put the polish on my point, and that is that the Fair Registration Practices Act actually says that an interim decision can be made in six months, but the final decision is at some reasonable time thereafter. So automatically we have a contradiction, because under the Fair Registration Practices Act we have what is actually an almost unlimited amount of time, just something that's supposed to be reasonable, with an interim decision in six months, yet this bill comes in at about three months, at 120 days. I just really don't think we should be moving forward on a bill that has that kind of glaring contradiction or has not appropriately had the work done to ensure that the contents of this bill are appropriate.

I'm concerned because what this also reveals is that the government has failed to go to the organizations involved, that will be governed by this act, and failed to have those kind of explicit and deep, detailed conversations about the particulars of the act that will allow the government to ensure that they're not actually creating complications and difficulties for members of the public. I certainly think that we should not be moving a bill forward that has not had substantive consultation. In fact, it appears that they've had almost zero consultation on this one.

Most of the people that we spoke to in the various organizations, the PROs, here are suggesting that they really had no idea that this was moving forward and have not had a chance to voice their concerns. I think this is a problem, and I'm not sure why the government is making a decision to move ahead without the appropriate consultation. There are a number of very significant organizations on our list; I think we have 16, 17 organizations, and they govern literally thousands of Albertans in very significant professions. I think that we should be taking the time, so I'm very disappointed to see the government has brought this one forward.

Using the rest of my time now, I want to speak about the fact that there is a very big problem in this bill and one that I think that we really need to go back and have a conversation about. As with many of the UCP bills that have been brought into this House, we see a pulling in of power – and I've had this conversation before in this House – from the citizens of the province of Alberta back into the minister's office and decisions being made behind closed doors, where we do not have a record of conversation and the advice that happens in cabinet. So we have literally a situation where instead of being governed by your peers in these various organizations, you're being governed with no transparency by somebody with no accountability to the decisions that they're making. I think that that's really problematic.

We've seen this time and time again with this government, and I don't know why they would want to put all this power in the minister's hands every single time. We had this conversation about the environment minister earlier today, getting powers to just make decisions that previously were made in a more transparent, public-oriented way. You know, again we have the same thing happening. It isn't like the powers that the minister is making are sort of somehow supportive powers or powers that would be minimal or related only to legislative aspects; they're actually to the very details of the running of the everyday functioning of these organizations.

In fact, this bill allows the minister the power to determine everything, from the scope of the organization to the explicit details of the bylaws of how this organization will function and how it will govern and influence the behaviours and practices of the members of the organization. In fact, this bill will allow the minister, without due transparency, without consultation with the members, to actually either create or dissolve these organizations. Why the government would want the minister to have that explicit power without any kind of conversation about why and how this should be happening in a public forum is very disconcerting to me. I'm not sure what has happened in the past that has made the government feel that this is a necessary stealing of power from the citizens of this province and moving it into the hands of one single individual in the government.

Now, many of these organizations have been around in this province for dozens of years and decades and have functioned extremely well and have governed their organizations and have been supported by their members with elected members to the boards, who then vote on bylaws, that are then brought back to the membership and get the yea or nay from the membership before they move forward, and if they don't like the bylaws that are made, then the membership can choose to not elect those members to the board again. So there was a democratic process in place for the construction of all of the aspects of these organizations, these PROs, and that democratic process is one that we know in our society is the best way for us to move forward. We certainly in this House believe in a democratic process and believe that we should be moving forward in that manner, yet this government has just subverted that kind of democracy.

It worries me when a government is so willing to subvert democracy for its own power. I am very concerned that that is the direction that they're going. We literally have it written into this bill, the ability of the government to determine the bylaws, and that is therefore the functioning and the scope – that is, the purpose – of these organizations. And I think that's dangerous, to put that in the hands of one person instead of in the hands of the profession that is being governed. You know, I can't imagine that the accountants in this province are thrilled to have no voice now in how their organization will run and who will sit on the board to make these kind of decisions, or at least have the potential to have the minister make those kind of decisions, at all. [interjection] Oh, I'm sorry. Are you wishing to intervene? Sure. I'll take it.

Mr. Schow: Yes, please. I appreciate the comments made by the member. I do disagree, specifically on those based around consultation. I can throw out Bill 6 immediately, and farmers will agree with me that there was very little consultation there.

But sticking to this bill specifically, the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford just mentioned the accountants, and Rachel Miller, the chief executive officer of Chartered Professional Accountants of Alberta, said that “based on [her] understanding of the bill, CPA Alberta is confident the new legislation will provide a robust and transparent regulatory framework for the affected professions.” Mr. Speaker, consultation was done on this bill. I keep hearing this talking point from members opposite as if there was no consultation done. It's here in black and white. It's on the Alberta government website. If they care to have a look at that beyond the talking points sitting in front of them, they might recognize that this bill did have robust consultation, and I take issue with the fact that that member would stand up here and use information that's incorrect.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The existence of one individual speaking to a bill, regardless of their position, does not speak to whether or not there was robust consultation. It's a ridiculous argument. You know, we certainly have one person who is willing to line up with the Conservatives for various reasons. Who knows why? But the point is that when we talk to these organizations, we certainly see that there has not been a substantive use of consultation. And the main point here is that the minister is being given powers that really should not be in the hands of the minister because it subverts democracy, and I notice that the intervention did not speak to that point because, I gather, they concede that point, that that is, in fact, true, that the subversion of democracy occurs.

I think one of the things, in my brief time that I have left, which I think is only a minute or so – two minutes; thank you. I want to point out one piece which I will speak to later on, and that is that the minister is actually being given the power to make decisions about the regulatory model being used by these organizations. Field Law identifies that there are five different areas of possible regulatory models, but for my short time I only want to speak to two, and that is that there is a choice between whether it's a voluntary registration or a mandatory registration for these organizations.

Right now if you are a member of some of these organizations, you must be registered if you are practising in that area. I know that when I was a member of the social work association, if as a trained social worker I was practising in an area that is deemed to be a social work practice, I must be a member or must be registered, so therefore it gave the association the ability to oversee the practice of people in the profession who are using the title and who have the appropriate training. If, however, you moved that to voluntary, then, of course, what happens is that you lose a significant number of your participants because they no longer are required to participate. That can be a very concerning thing.

We are now in this bill actually giving the minister the ability to undermine the power of these organizations to go from being mandatory to being voluntary. I can tell you that I'm sure I know the reason for that, because when it is mandatory, more people participate, more money in the organizations, they have more power to influence civic democracy, and they speak to the issues of government. If you move an organization from mandatory registration to voluntary registration, you are taking power away from them and the power to speak to government.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise this evening and speak to Bill 23, the Professional Governance Act. I appreciated the comments from the member before me, the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, and likely will have some similar comments on this legislation. As I'm trying to think back on my time in this House with the particular member, I'm not sure if I've ever voted differently than that member has, so I'm not necessarily seeing that to be the case this time around either. A very insightful and passionate and knowledgeable member.

A few things that I want to touch on. First of all, it's interesting, the – I would say lack of consultation – consultation process that this government undertook. From what I can tell, even when the technical discussions happened between the department and the opposition caucus, there was an acknowledgement that there wasn't a broad consultation process that took place to have discussions about this legislation regarding PROs. It's interesting that the member across the aisle, you know, stood for an intervention and said that that wasn't the case considering their own department said that it was indeed.

I'm looking back at a document that was e-mailed out to all the members of the Alberta institute of agrology back on February 28. It tells a different story, and it's very interesting. I'm hopeful that the government can maybe provide clarity to the process that took place from the beginning of this proposed legislation to where we are now, because at that time they sent out an e-mail to their hundreds if not thousands of members. Just a few quotes from what they sent out: "This legislation has been drafted in secret without any consultation. No PRO knows how it will affect their operations. The Minister has advised the AIA to prepare to manage major changes while continuing to operate under the current law until the new law is in force."

Now, as you may know, Mr. Speaker, obviously, something changed through that process, and I would appreciate clarification, because when the government announced and likely threw a press release, the AIA was actually one of their stakeholders that was willing to come forward and support this. Great. At some point they went from having no consultation and drafting this legislation without them to showing them the legislation and them being very concerned. There are other comments that I may or may not get to from that document that was e-mailed out to all the members of the AIA.

I would be interested to find out what took place, what consultation or conversations happened to get them from saying that this legislation was drafted in secret without any consultation to, from what I remember, being a validator for this government. Good on the government, I suppose, for getting one of these PROs to go from "There was no consultation process; this was done in secret" to potentially being a validator. But, again, I would like to know the process that took place, exactly how they came so far from their initial comments, because I think it's an important question. Again, is it the case that the only people or, in this instance, the only PROs that get to have a voice at the table are ones that are willing to come out and attack the government? I don't think that is a fair consultation by any means.

You know, I spoke to this on previous bills this week, the lack of clarity from this government and the lack of transparency when they are providing opportunities, or lack thereof, for consultation and how organizations have to be as loud as they can to actually have their voices heard. It's unfortunate, because I think that whenever we are drafting legislation, there should be equal opportunity for everyone. No organization or president of an association or other example should have to necessarily put their name on the line or put their organizations out in the firing line, I guess for lack of better terms, just to have their voice heard, but that seems far too often what happens under this government.

I hear that again and again from organizations that are affected by legislation that this government puts forward, that either there are multiple changes that this government is proposing and potentially they don't have time to necessarily identify all of the problems with one issue or one piece of legislation because they have bigger problems with another piece of legislation, or they're simply afraid to come out against this government because they have seen a pattern of vindictiveness from this government.

It's truly unfortunate because, whether it's on the changes that we're seeing here in Bill 23, the Professional Governance Act, or any other piece of legislation, every Albertan and every organization that is being affected by legislative changes that are being proposed by the government and by this House should have equal opportunity. It shouldn't matter necessarily how much money their organization has or how close of a friendship they have with the Premier or how many memberships they were able to help the Premier sell; it should be that everyone has an equal voice in the consultation when we're talking about proposing changes to legislation.

That is one of my biggest concerns with this legislation. It is quite clear from organizations that we've consulted with, from organizations that have reached out to their members that there is a pattern and a lack of consultation, and at the end of the day not only does it leave people feeling like they weren't heard or weren't consulted; it also doesn't give them adequate time to prepare for the changes that are being proposed, which is another huge issue with what is being offered in Bill 23 not only with the timeline changes but the absolute power that the minister is proposing be given to themselves and to the government to make changes to, as the previous member said, just a few of the things, bylaws, being able to create or dissolve these organizations, being able to amalgamate them potentially arbitrarily.

We truly don't know. I guess it just depends how the minister is feeling that day and maybe what kind of relationship the minister has with one of these PROs or another. That is truly not how we should be governing. I said that on Bill 21, where the environment minister is proposing that they give themselves massive powers to be able to designate and change essentially any law that pertains to parks. That is deeply unfortunate, and we see this pattern.

I would be interested to find out how many pieces of legislation this government has brought forward that have given such increased powers to the minister, because I remember it truly didn't happen nearly as much under our government. It was for different circumstances, no doubt, but any time that we had put forward changes to legislation where even there was a tiny bit of power being given to the minister from previously, the at that time Wildrose opposition would be incredibly upset. Yet now we have a government who has members from the then Wildrose opposition and many other members in this government that would identify, I'm sure, as closer to Wildrose than they are to UCP – and we'll see how that plays out – but they have been absolutely silent on the many changes that this government has proposed to give ministers more power. That's fine. Well, it's not fine, Mr. Speaker. It's fine for those members now as they sit in government, but I imagine that in the future, if the government changes, they are going to be concerned with the amount of power that they have given ministers under their own watch, because we are allowing those ministers to make changes without coming to this Legislature.

I raised the point, and I will raise it again, regarding Bill 10 and the changes that the Health minister, I believe, at the time, a minister, was proposing to give the government the ability to change laws without coming before this House. They came back to the Legislature and changed those laws because there was such an outcry from the public, but they haven't seemed to learn anything at all, Mr. Speaker. Here we are again this evening debating Bill 23, Professional Governance Act, and they are proposing the exact same thing, to give the minister absolute power over these PROs, who for so long have, as far as I can tell, done a reasonable, done a good job at self-governance and adhering to the laws that had previously been put in place.

As the previous member asked, I would also ask: why are we here? Are there certain organizations that we are considering putting under this umbrella legislation that the government or the associations are having issues with? You know, we see 22 professions here that are listed, just a few – for instance, the Alberta Association of Architects is quite different from the Alberta Institute of Agrologists, quite different from the Alberta Society of Professional Biologists. I mean, there are a lot of associations that are going to be affected by this legislation, and again we have a government and a minister that are talking about potentially giving themselves the power to amalgamate some of these associations. I imagine that's the last thing that these organizations want to see. They have quite different roles within the industry, so I'm sure they are concerned about that.

I again would ask: what is the minister trying to address here? What issues have arisen in terms of potentially lack of adherence to bylaws, concerns around timelines for reporting, some of the other changes that are being proposed here around board governance and membership? I mean, there is so much being changed and proposed in this legislation that it's hard to understand what the issue is that the government is trying to tackle and potentially what has taken place within these PROs that has the government so concerned. I would appreciate if a minister or a member that might have some insight into that was willing to stand up.

Again, from the letter that the AIA sent out back on February 28, this legislation was drafted in secret. You know, this isn't a direct quote, but it's quite clear that there are major concerns about the lack of inclusion during the consultation process, the lack of clarity around what the bylaws might look like after the fact. We see this again and again from this government, that they put forward sweeping changes to legislation and not only are they providing information that the minister is going to have so much more power through the legislation, but they're also asking Albertans and asking these associations and organizations to trust them that they are going to get the regulations right.

I would also ask, I suppose, at this point, what consultation process – hopefully, a formal one that is going to be open to the public or at least open to the stakeholders. First of all, who is going to be involved in those consultation processes? Have they already taken place? And is it going to be made available to the general public to have their say on that? Hopefully, we can get some answers on that.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, if I might ask how much time I have left.

The Speaker: A minute and 52 seconds.

Mr. Carson: Perfect. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The idea of mandatory versus voluntary registration, which the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford brought up, is another important issue, specifically around the idea of the money that these organizations receive from these registration processes. Do we expect to see a complete and fundamental change to how much money is being provided to these organizations from these registrations, from these memberships? How is that going to affect them and affect their ability to effectively advocate for their associations, effectively ensure that they have the bandwidth to provide bylaws and reporting requirements that are going to meet the standards that are being put forward by Bill 23? There are so many questions. It seems that the government is putting a lot of pressure on these organizations to adhere to regulations that they haven't even seen and at the same time potentially clawing back thousands and thousands of dollars from these organizations, so I think that they might expect to have answers about how they are going to afford the changes that they are being asked to make.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I have major concerns with Bill 23. I think that this needs to go back to the drawing board because it's quite clear that this government has not done the proper amount of consultation and that very likely many of these organizations are going to be concerned about the amount of power that this minister and this government are trying to give themselves through this legislation.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 23. Well, we support consistency, we support transparency, we support accountability for the professional bodies, for the professional statutory organizations, and, in fact, in all areas of the government, but this bill goes far beyond that. If the government was really serious about transparency and accountability, they would not get the code of silence award from the Canadian Association of Journalists in 2020. The reason for that was that this government is not transparent. This government refuses to be accountable.

For example, they set up an entity, the war room, a $120 million entity, and they exempted it from FOIP. What that means: the public will pay for that entity, for them stealing logos and doing all kinds of things, but the public will be shut down. The public will not be able to access their records, the details, how they are spending public money. So if the government is really serious about accountability, that's where they will start. For instance, then there was an inquiry, the Allan inquiry, that was delayed or given multiple extensions in terms of time, in terms of money, and the public was not given access to the details. No transparency again.

And it's the same with accountability. This government doesn't want to be accountable to the people of Alberta. What they are doing in the name of transparency and accountability in this piece of legislation goes far beyond that. If we agree to these changes, then self-regulatory organizations will be self-regulatory in name only. This bill is giving the minister power to determine the scope, their bylaws, and even their existence. Knowing the history of the current minister, what could go wrong? If the minister is allowed to determine the scope, their bylaws, and even their existence, I do not believe that the minister will have or the minister's department will have the kind of expertise that a self-governing profession will have, those professionals will have.

For instance, I'm a lawyer, and it's governed by the Law Society of Alberta. It's a self-governing organization, and I do not believe for a second that any minister in this government or, for that matter, any government will know more about the legal profession or its governance than the professionals themselves, than the law society. There is a democratic process. They elect benchers. They are in regular contact with lawyers that provide them support, that provide them guidance, and they regulate the profession in a way where it maintains public trust and confidence and it remains arm's length from the government.

Similarly, social work. I do know a lot of social workers. I do have a background in that as well. Again, it's a self-governing body. Not for a second would I trust that any minister will have more expertise or is more qualified to govern the profession than social workers themselves.

As my colleague earlier mentioned, we are seeing a trend with this government, that they are trying to strip citizens of their powers and consolidate that power in government so that they can decide whatever they think suits their political needs. That's unacceptable. That is unacceptable. For instance, in this case the minister of labour, previously the Minister of Justice, was caught interfering in the administration of justice. Why should Albertans trust this minister in particular, that he has any credibility or has more expertise to manage any of these self-governing professions, their bylaws, their scope, or even their existence? I do not believe that Albertans will trust this government, this minister to do any of those functions.

This legislation is unnecessarily confusing and leaves many substantial details to the regulations. We know that when details are within the legislation, then any changes that need to be made have to come through this Legislature. But, no, that's not what this government is doing. Like with every other bill, they're bringing forward a piece of skeleton legislation and giving themselves power to regulate through regulations, schedules, and orders. Mr. Speaker, this is a government which is the least trusted across Canada. The least trusted government. They shouldn't be even asking for more powers. Albertans can't wait to strip them of the power they already have.

Here the government is asking for powers to manage and regulate self-regulating professions. For instance, one of the requirements contained here is that these organizations will now have three timelines to adhere to in approving applications for registration. Why on earth does this government think that they are better positioned to determine the timeline for registration than the professionals? These are the kinds of arbitrary powers, arbitrary measures that they're putting in this legislation, and it's completely unacceptable.

They talk about reducing red tape, and now this bill is piling red tape onto self-governing professions, creating more work without thinking through what the unintended consequences could be.

They did not consult all the professions that are impacted by this piece of legislation. They did not consult them. They can read one quote, but they did not consult all the professions and professionals who are impacted by that. They're just using their majority to ram through these changes so that they can exert control on these self-governing professions. They can control the membership. They can have a hammer to get their way when they need these organizations onside. This is undemocratic, this is unnecessary, and that's why Albertans don't trust this government.

Also, as I said, the government is giving wide powers to the minister with respect to the minister determining the scope of some governing body. I think it would be nice if the minister would get up, list all the organizations that are impacted, and talk about the consultation that the minister or this government had with every single one of the organizations that are impacted by this piece of legislation. It would be nice to know if government has reached out to any of these professions who are impacted by these changes.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Clearly, the government did not consult on this legislation. Reading one quote from a validator does not amount to consultation. It does not give the government authority to dismantle all of these self-governing organizations, to determine their scope, to determine their bylaws, to determine their existence. That's way too broad. That's not something that government is doing to make them accountable, and we do know government's record on accountability.

So this bill, one, is overreaching into areas where government should not. Two, I do not believe that government has expertise, capacity to determine the scope, bylaws, and existence of these self-governing organizations. Three, government did not consult with these organizations and members of these organizations or Albertans at large. As drafted, this bill is unacceptable.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on Bill 23?

[Motion carried; Bill 23 read a second time]

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 22 Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Madam Speaker. On behalf of the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity it is my honour to rise today to move that Bill 22, Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022, be read a third time.

I want to start by acknowledging the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity. I know that he and his office went to great lengths to receive input on the best path forward for this legislation. I thank him and his office for their efforts.

Seeing how the current minister has received input from stakeholders has caused me to reflect on what has happened previously. You see, Madam Speaker, I'm a power engineer; I have been for a number of years. Prior to being elected to represent West Yellowhead, I had the opportunity to run a power plant and also run one of the largest industrial consumers of electricity in the province. For me, through this lived experience I've been afforded an opportunity that few people have. I have personally witnessed both how the generation side and the industrial consumer side of the electricity market works. I've learned how decisions around the electricity market can impact people personally, impact industry, lead to whether companies move forward with investment decisions, and even lead to job gains or losses in our communities.

After I became the candidate for the UCP, I was at an event one evening in a community and met an organization travelling the province to talk about electricity. I asked about their organization, and they told me they were part of a, quote, unquote, think tank that was going into communities telling them why the path forward with the electricity market made sense. Madam Speaker, this was before the election in 2019. It was during a time where, as someone working in industry, I was painfully aware of the changes that were happening under the previous government. I was very much aware of the devastation that was being caused, that would lead to job losses, higher electricity prices, and the electricity grid being subjected to massive instability, you know, like we hear about in certain states that are subjected to brownouts and blackouts.

My response to the young lady who told me that the path forward made sense was simply: oh, you get paid to go around the province and lie to people. We then did have a great discussion about electricity and the market and what the best path forward would and should be, including the need for industry to succeed so they can help other consumers pay for the infrastructure necessary, electricity storage for renewable energies, and an open, competitive market that is driven by investor confidence rather than massive subsidies to companies who otherwise wouldn't be viable. Our discussion also covered the importance of electricity to be reliable and affordable. In fact, I believe that we got to a point where we both agreed that an ideologically driven electricity market was less important than a reliable and affordable market.

After the election I took a keen interest in what our path forward for the electricity market would be. Along with consumers and industries around the province I was relieved that we stayed with an energy-only market. I was thankful that we started having conversations about the massive costs for consumers relative to building infrastructure to transmit electricity from one side of the province to the other. I was grateful that the minister was focused on weighing out all decisions to ensure that the potential impacts are realized, weighed out, and mitigated prior to making massive changes. If only that approach had been taken previously, perhaps our ratepayers wouldn't be on the hook for 7 and a half billion dollars of transmission line, over a billion dollars of repayment to the Balancing Pool, hundreds of millions of dollars of subsidies and corporate welfare for coal-fired plants to retrofit to natural gas based on an ideological agenda rather than advancing technology around carbon capture and fly ash mitigation.

Oddly enough, the same government that was creating such a mess of the electricity market came to a realization that their decisions were having a massive negative impact, with great instability and drastically increasing costs, and decided to, rather than stopping their agenda or actually stopping to ask for advice or even listen to concerns, slap a price cap on electricity.

Now, I know we have heard from the opposition members that this price cap was the right thing to do, but I want to highlight a couple of things about the price cap. First and foremost, the price cap was not indefinite. It was set to expire at the end of December 2022. That's right, Madam Speaker. They set the cap to expire as Alberta entered an election year. They didn't reverse course on horrible, uneducated, ideological decisions that they knew would increase costs exponentially for Alberta households and industries. No, they decided to instead cap the price and then try to use it for political gain down the road.

Secondly, the price cap wasn't real. You see, even after the price cap was instituted in the first year, the price was above the cap, so the former government stole money out of the taxpayer pocket to pay corporations for the price above the cap. This sort of magic trick to fool the ratepayer and increase taxation for the taxpayer, for me, Madam Speaker, is not only disingenuous; it's downright disgusting. All they had to do was change course.

Nevertheless, Madam Speaker, I'm thankful that our government and our associate minister of electricity have chosen to engage with the public, to engage with industry, to engage with the groups that run our electricity market. I'm grateful that the government is considering the impact of decisions being made now on how it impacts the province now and for the future. I can go on and on about the benefits of modernizing Alberta's electricity grid, but at the end of the day the fact remains that our government listened to what Albertans wanted and is now implementing initiatives to meet the growing needs of consumers, create a low-carbon future through investment from industry, and reduce the harm done by costly subsidies from Alberta taxpayers.

Given recent events this was not a decision that came lightly. This legislation was developed with input from a wide range of stakeholders and consumer groups. It builds off legislation tabled last year. Bill 22 will enable electricity generation for unlimited self-supply with export, an incentive for new investment in the province. It will establish a distribution planning framework. This framework will help Alberta plan for the growing and changing consumer demands of tomorrow, including electric vehicles, renewable power sources, emerging technologies, and other distributed energy resources. We need to act now to make long-term changes central to our province's prosperous future.

With that, Madam Speaker, I'm proud to support this legislation and look forward to continuing to hear how the associate minister will move our province forward to correct the damage that was done previously and make Alberta a place where affordable, reliable energy is expected for households, communities, and industries moving forward.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others that want to join the debate on Bill 22? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and provide some additional comments at this stage of debate on Bill 22. I think it's fair to say that we've had a chance to review this legislation because we had a chance to review it last fall as well, when it was initially introduced. To the previous number of points that my hon. colleagues, anyway, made around consultations with professional organizations in the area of labour relations, in the area of regulations governing child and youth care, in just simply a number of areas, consultation just simply was not done.

I think, pointing to the fact that the government has been seized with other priorities – that is to say, focusing on themselves and not the rather boring work of focusing on Albertans – it's almost as if we are not important enough, that this matter of making good legislation for Albertans and talking to them and making sure that, you know, the legislation is solving problems that Albertans understand that they have is not as interesting to the governing party as the palace intrigue that seems to grip much of their attention. So we came to a spot where the consultation was not completed, and the government, rightfully, understood that last fall, when this bill was first introduced. We are glad to see that that piece of work finally has, albeit late, been completed, and here we are at third stage.

Now, I think it's fair to say that based on the fact that this bill is designed, is a specific response to the electrification that comes as a result of decarbonization – that is real and is required. It is urgent, as I have noted in my comments on this bill, because climate change is real. Now, these are not words that the province says very often. In fact, it is that avoidance that oftentimes does create a climate of investor uncertainty. Certainly, oftentimes, as I have my conversations with renewables developers, power market participants of various kinds, and investors of various kinds, both institutional and not, it certainly is increasingly seen as something that does hold back investor certainty and investor confidence given that there seems to be a fundamental misunderstanding of the coal phase-out, the fact that 12 of the 18 plants were phased out by Mr. Harper. The Premier was at the table at that time, in fact, a couple of members of caucus now, the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche as well.

There seems to be a fundamental misunderstanding about what a contract for difference is. Characterizing it as a subsidy I don't think inspires confidence in anyone given that it's not, and it just makes people look ridiculous in the House.

Given the failure to commit to transparency on the industrial price, as is mandated by section 2 of the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, that certainly is – that failure of, essentially, courage to stand up to, you know, a climate-denying base within the party just doesn't inspire investor confidence or investor certainty given that the industrial price is so intimately linked to the value of the offsets and the appropriate governing of the offsets market.

It also does not inspire confidence or certainty when there still seem to be elements within the party – we just had it last week, a set of questions around, essentially, what the government was going to do to tell private landowners what to do with their land with respect to solar and wind projects, which was an extraordinary position for a UCP MLA to take, you know, saying that private property owners don't have the right to execute agreements with those companies or shouldn't have the right, and then there should be all kinds of other regulatory red tape and delays within the AUC process and a frivolous blocking of the AUC regulatory process, frustrating new investment for developers and others.

Certainly, it does not help in terms of investor certainty and investor confidence when a government won't even say the words "climate change," such that industry folks will then observe out loud to me that these folks have no idea what they're leaving on the table when they do that. These are folks that just want to have a regularized, predictable climate for certainty so they can confidently make investments in now, thankfully, electricity storage that can complement in a number of different ways other forms of generation, whether it's in the hydro space or in some of the wind and solar spaces.

Certainly, we do see that even thermal generation, you know, goes down for maintenance and so on quite often. This is the time of year when that happens. There is no such thing as an always-on system of generation, so this piece helps, I think. I think there's no question that it also may work in really interesting ways in our energy-only market, and that's a good thing.

I think that there's also no question that this bill is at least a tacit understanding by some elements of the cabinet that we do need to grapple with the fact that climate change is real even though I understand that that causes a great deal of consternation and division within the caucus. I suppose the folks who are on the other side of that debate are just going to have to come to terms with that, that we're in the 21st century. At least there's the odd person on the front bench and maybe in the policy co-ordination office and elsewhere that actually understands that to be a real thing.

You know, I think there's no question that the Official Opposition will support this bill, and we're glad that the extra consultation happened, but it's really important to point out here that this is the very bare minimum of the job description. Going further to make this legislation and other legislation that we've had before us on the topic of utilities more relevant would be to do something about the extraordinarily high prices that people are paying right now, and there are any number of ways that that can be accomplished.

There's no question that there can be more funding available to and resources available to the Utilities Consumer Advocate to help people navigate contracts and so on to insulate them from some of these price spikes. There's no question about that. There's no question that a cap or some other form of rebate to consumers could and should have been made real, and that policy work should have been done last fall, when anyone who was looking at the electricity futures could tell. Even last summer, when the heat wave came, it was very clear to me that we were going to be having this conversation around affordability by this time, and indeed we were, but the government was just happy to whistle past the graveyard and just, you know, do absolutely nothing to help people.

There's no question that overhauling some of the more, I guess, intricate yet not exactly top-of-mind regulatory aspects of the electricity system is a really important drumbeat of government work. You know, a gold star for showing up in the morning, I guess. But this is the absolute bare minimum, both on the climate change file but also on the overall ensuring that utilities remain affordable. And the energy-only market, which does deliver a number of advantages for welcoming new investment, whether it's foreign direct investment or Canadian investors – there's no question that it does that, but it also subjects the consumer to volatility, and that's where the government's regulatory function has to come in.

The final piece I will say on this is that it has come to my attention more recently that the AUC is quite backed up in many of its processes, in some part due to some of the sort of vexatious and frivolous activity around trying to frustrate development of projects in some municipalities who don't want people to do what they're going to do with their private land and make those choices in a free-market economy. Apparently, that's not a real thing for Conservatives anymore. They're not really interested. You know, I guess it's left to me to make a spirited defence of the free market.

You know, I think that there's a lot of stuff that needs to be cleaned up at the AUC, because you can't have these thousands and thousands of megawatts sitting in a regulatory queue and having just, like, vexatious nonsense getting in the way of new investment, new generation, new jobs, and, ultimately, new economic activity in the province. There is no question as well that landowners benefit tremendously from these projects if they are appropriately sited and if they negotiate a good deal with the developer. There's no question, too, that municipalities also benefit in the form of tax revenues.

One of the biggest things that happens, especially for rural landowners when they choose to develop their private land in this way, is that it can oftentimes provide, again, a counterweight to the volatility of another commodity, which is whatever they happen to be growing or raising on their farm, but also it can mean that there is succession planning on farms so that communities remain places where people can raise families. That income is really, really important, and it should not be discounted, and it should not be sacrificed at the altar of some kind of Facebook rant that masquerades as a question period question on the relative value of frustrating private land development of wind and solar, as I heard one of the questions come from a government backbencher last week.

I will conclude my comments there. I am pleased to support this legislation, Madam Speaker. You know, it's possible that some observers might think I took a roundabout way to get there, but it is not in my DNA to be overly complimentary to a Conservative, so I will not be in this instance. However, this is an important step forward for the overall management and regulatory framework for Alberta's electricity system.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and offer a few comments as well on Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022, at third reading. I want to thank my friend from Lethbridge-West for her comments. I just want to say that I know that she is not particularly complimentary about Conservatives. I have yet to see the group of people about whom she is particularly complimentary. We live in hope, and I'm sure that one day we'll see some compliments come from the Member for Lethbridge-West. I suspect that I won't be receiving any from her any time soon, though.

You know, I do want to thank her for raising some particularly important issues about what has driven the cost of electricity here in the province of Alberta, because I think she has given a much more honest analysis of what has driven the cost of electricity than the previous speaker, the Member for West Yellowhead. I was shocked listening to the Member for West Yellowhead stand up, start off his comments about saying that he was a power engineer and that he had all of this lived experience working in the electricity industry, and then he continued to spout all of the misinformation that the associate minister for electricity has been giving about the cost of electricity and what has driven that up over the last couple of years.

As my friend from Lethbridge-West has pointed out, all of those things that the Member for West Yellowhead raised as issues are minor in comparison to what is really driving the cost of electricity right now, and that is market power being exercised by the few electricity generators who are in the market. That's not me saying that; that is the result of an independent analysis done by respected electricity grid policy experts at the University of Calgary's School of Public Policy, particularly Blake Shaffer. The market power that is being exercised right now by the few electricity generators is what is causing the bulk of the increase in electricity prices.

What's incredibly frustrating, Madam Speaker, is that this exercise of market power, or economic withholding, as we used to call it in the good old days, is legal. Our government made an attempt through the Alberta Utilities Commission to crack down on the use of economic withholding to try to make sure that generators couldn't just raise the price of power because they had the power to do so, that they had to demonstrate clearly to the utility regulator that they had a financial need to raise electricity prices. This government has scrapped that. The AUC has walked away from this crackdown on economic withholding. It's now perfectly legal, the way it was before our government was elected. And what is the government doing about it? Nothing.

My friend from Lethbridge-West raises the point about the fact that the Alberta Utilities Commission is overwhelmed with work because we know that an important role that they play is to make sure that the market is functioning properly and fairly and in the interests of electricity consumers. They have the mandate and the power, if they choose to use it, to investigate the behaviour of electricity generators to see if they're charging fair prices, and they don't have the capacity to do that right now even though they should be doing it.

You know, I watched with great interest earlier this year the proceedings of the Alberta Utilities Commission with respect to ATCO generation and their dirty tricks trying to hide inflated costs to contractors and subcontractors by shifting that onto ratepayers. They ended up paying – what? – I think it was a $30 million fine to the Alberta Utilities Commission for their shenanigans. The only reason we know that that happened, Madam Speaker, was because a whistle-blower at ATCO came forward with all of the information, laid out the case, had all of the e-mails. The paper trail was there, as easy to follow as anything else, so it was an open-and-shut case. When the Alberta Utilities Commission looked at it, it was quite clear that ATCO was up to no good. They issued them a fine, and hopefully that will repair some of the costs that were illegally transferred onto ratepayers because of what went on there.

My question is: what other things are these electricity generators getting away with that we don't know about? The Alberta Utilities Commission should be conducting much more in the way of proactive investigations to understand whether or not the rate increases that electricity generators are foisting upon the people of Alberta are actually legal and warranted. That's what's going on here.

Moreover, let's entertain the hypothetical world where the excuses that the associate minister of natural gas continues to trot out when it comes to the cost of raising electricity – well, he has the power to fix it. He refuses to do so, saying that we spent a billion dollars on power purchase arrangements and 7 and a half billion dollars on upgrading the transmission system. Well, that doesn't actually reduce the cost of electricity for people today. It's very easy to lay blame for what's going on. Trust me. I know; we've been doing that for the last three years. It's the easiest thing I've ever done in my life. Coming up with solutions that will make a positive difference in the lives of Albertans is much harder, and this government is completely unwilling to engage in that work. They can't even get a simple $50 cheque out the door.

I was talking to some residents in Edmonton-Gold Bar earlier today. They're at risk of losing their home because they cannot afford the cost of utilities going up in addition to the cost of everything else that's going up: their rent is going up, the cost of groceries is going up, the cost of fuel is going up. Even though the government scrapped the gas tax, somehow gas companies found a way to charge us just as much for gas as the day that the government announced that they were scrapping the tax. The government promised people relief on their utility bills, and now we find out that we have to wait until December and people are giving up hope that they'll ever see any help at all. In one moment the Finance minister and the associate minister of electricity talk about the rebates that are coming, and in the next moment the Finance minister stands up and says: well, we can't give more money to people in this inflationary environment. People are left on their own, I guess, in the view of the Finance minister and the associate minister of electricity. They're certainly not getting the help that they were promised.

I just want to wrap up my comments here by saying that the opportunity for electrification is one of the greatest opportunities that faces the province of Alberta right now as we transition to a low-carbon economy. I believe that this bill starts the work, but there is much more that needs to be done much more quickly. What will happen if we rapidly move to electrify everything in Alberta, transfer everything that's powered by fossil fuels right now onto electrical appliances, electrical vehicles? The end result would be massive savings for consumers.

An analysis by an organization called Rewiring America found that if the average household switched all of its appliances, all of its machines to things powered by renewable electricity, the average consumer would save $3,000 a year in utility costs and fuel costs. Those are big savings that people need right now. Moreover, it will create hundreds of thousands of jobs and not just in the electricity sector; in all of the spinoffs as well, the commercial sector – we need to manufacture more of these electric machines – in the transportation sector, even in sectors that you wouldn't think of as being traditionally associated with electrification, things like finance, right? People need to be able to pay for the transition to an electrified home. I think that there are some opportunities for some financial instruments that would be suitable to helping families do that.

Mr. Hunter: Why would we need to do that if it saves them so much money?

Mr. Schmidt: Yeah. The Member for Taber-Warner just – I'll be happy to explain that to him if he doesn't understand the point that I'm making now afterwards.

Mr. Hunter: Well, you could do it now.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, we have an agenda to stick to, and I'd like to honour every member's time and stick to that agenda. Thank you very much.

Anyway, this is important work. People will save thousands of dollars. We'll put hundreds of thousands of people to work. We will significantly reduce the amount of greenhouse gas emissions, which is urgently, urgently required. Let's get on with it.

So for that reason, Madam Speaker, I'm voting in favour of this bill. Thank you very much.

Oh, I'm sorry. No, no, no. Sorry. I still have some time left, Madam Speaker. With that time, I would like to move to adjourn debate on Bill 22.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise this evening to move on behalf of the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General third reading of Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

This bill proposes a handful of housekeeping amendments meant to keep our province's legislation up to date for Albertans, nothing more. To repeat what was said when the bill was introduced originally, it's the government's responsibility to keep legislation relevant with the times to meet the needs of our province.

Before I continue, I'd like to summarize what was presented at Bill 20's second reading. If passed, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act would amend five pieces of legislation. The amendments would complete the following changes. First, it would change the Corrections Act to make Alberta Parole Board remuneration consistent with other government agencies, boards, and commissions. Secondly, it would alter the Justice of the Peace Act to streamline the process for making JPs part-time or full-time. Thirdly, it would update the Missing Persons Act so that police can complete associated tasks with minimal delay. Fourth, it would change the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act to clean up outdated wording and make language more sensitive to grieving families. Finally, it would update the Youth Justice Act to keep the wording of the legislation in line with changes that the federal government made to Canada's Criminal Code.

Madam Speaker, during debate a number of questions were raised about the victims of crime. As previously discussed, our government is committed to ensuring victims of crime have access to the help they need and when they need it. Bill 20 does not impact this commitment whatsoever. In our work to serve Albertans victimized by crime, we heard first-hand that the previous financial benefits program could take too long to access and didn't always provide enough urgent assistance for those coping with trauma. Albertans told us about gaps in services and supports for victims of crime, and that's why we are developing a new model to make sure victims are supported throughout their involvement in the justice system.

With the closure of the financial benefits program the Criminal Injuries Review Board, which reviewed decisions made under that program, is no longer needed. The changes proposed in Bill 20 align provincial legislation with the closure of this board, nothing more. To be clear, we are finalizing plans to improve programs and services to continue to support victims of crime well into the future. At this time the emergency-based programs have a 45-day limitation to apply, but a victim under extenuating circumstances may apply for an extension.

All victims of crime continue to have access to the many resources offered by local victim service units such as the following, Madam Speaker: information on the criminal justice process and court-related updates, assistance in understanding the rights of victims of crime, and help accessing referrals for specialized supports and community resources. The minister expects to share more information on this new model that will enhance victims' services later this year.

Madam Speaker, with these points in mind and with no concerns noted on the other portions of this legislation, I would like to underscore that Bill 20 would help update and take care of the noteworthy details of several important pieces of provincial law. Part of providing Albertans with consistent, effective access to justice is looking after the small things, doing the housekeeping work that's necessary to keep things in good working order.

I hope that members on both sides of the House will join me in supporting this legislation. With that, Madam Speaker, I'm pleased to move third reading of Bill 20.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there members to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise to speak to third reading of the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. I was listening to the hon. member while she was making her comments in regard to the government's perception of how this is just simply housekeeping. Now, I'm a little concerned that once again we see a piece of legislation that's being introduced in the House that the government just perceives as being housekeeping but, really, is finalizing the decisions that the government made under Bill 16, which was to, basically, abolish the current victims of crime fund and any types of supports that individuals across Alberta could access or need supports if they're ever in a situation where they are a victim of crime.

Now, the obvious issue with this is that we know that since Bill 16 was introduced in 2020, so two years ago, a big percentage of the funding that was allocated through fines and penalties that were leveraged by the courts – of those fines that were paid, that money was then transferred into a victims of crime fund. Now, that's long standing. We know that there's about – there was an expected $40 million annually that was to be raised and put into that fund, and we know that in 2020, when this was changed, there was about $74 million of surplus that was in that fund. We know that since that time, that money is now being used to pay for more prosecutors and police officers. That money that was allocated to provide supports to individuals that were victims of crime is no longer available.

Now, the member opposite mentioned that: you know, stay tuned. The government is finalizing a plan about what they're going to do to provide supports for people that have had to access the victims of crime fund. Well, I find that disappointing given that the legislation that was introduced, Bill 16, that made sweeping changes to the victims of crime fund was written and introduced into this House in 2020, two years ago. We still are in a: "Wait and see. We have an announcement coming soon at some point. There will be a new model that will be developed, and the government is finalizing the plans."

Well, why, then, do we have Bill 20? This current piece of legislation that we are debating this evening that is solidifying the changes that Bill 16 introduced two years ago is now being brought into this House with, once again, no finalized plan, no new model, no vision by this government about how they're going to support individuals that are victims of crime, but: "Hey, let's legislate everything. Let's change it all. Let's solidify the regulations and the changes that we've made under Bill 16 even though we know as a government that they're not ready." Clearly, you just said that. There's no plan yet. It's not ready to roll out, but let's introduce Bill

20. Let's solidify those changes. Let's impact individuals that are currently in need of supports. Let's use this fund to pay for prosecutors and police officers, not counselling services for the very people that need it. And, oh, on top of that, let's not have a plan to replace that so that the opposition can look at it and go: hey, maybe this makes some reasonable sense.

Again, you're putting the cart before the horse. It is an ongoing theme by this government to introduce legislation, to change red tape, as they so call it, to make sweeping changes to programs that support Albertans in their time of need and then have absolutely no vision or plan to fall back on: "We'll make the changes. We'll figure out the consequences later. We'll create a plan, and maybe before the next election there will be something in place." Why would the government introduce these pieces of legislation if they weren't ready? Why do Albertans continuously have to face the consequences of poor planning by this government? That's what it is. It's poor planning.

Someone drafted legislation and said, "Hey, it's ready to go." I'm sure somebody else in the background said: "Okay; but we don't actually have the tools in place yet. Hold on. We shouldn't do this." And cabinet looked at it and said: "No, no, no. It's on the agenda. We've got to push it forward, so we're just going to do it. It doesn't matter if it impacts Albertans. It doesn't matter if it's going to mess up the system. It doesn't matter if people aren't going to get the supports that they need. None of that matters because at some point we'll just keep telling Albertans we have a plan. There's a plan coming. Stay tuned. We're developing a new model. There's another plan. Stay tuned. At some point we'll let you know what it is." Instead of coming out and saying: "Here's our plan. Here's the new model. Oh, and by the way, Bill 20 is going to reinforce the changes that we're making."

That's what good governance is. That's how you make sure that Albertans have supports and the resources that they need when they need them. You don't liquidate a fund and use what is intended to support Albertans to access mental health supports and be able to address the trauma that they've experienced and then go back and go: well, because it's underfunded, we can't actually do that support. Well, no wonder. The money is being taken out to be used for purposes it was not intended for. People aren't being able to access the supports that they need, or they're giving limitations, or there aren't enough services around.

I appreciate that we're in third reading and the government is going to make the choices that they're going to make, but I will again remind the government that at some point it would be great for Albertans to actually have a plan before they legislate so that they know where this government is going, so that they feel confident that the choices that this government is making actually help Albertans, but it doesn't. This is a continuous theme, and this is why Albertans are continuously frustrated with the fact that this government doesn't have a vision, that they can't be trusted in making decisions because they never validate or demonstrate the work and where they're headed. They just expect Albertans to have blind faith: "Trust us. A plan is coming. We're developing a new model. Just trust us."

Well, the reality of it is that when people are in crisis, when they depend on supports, when they know there's a budget assigned, Albertans don't trust it because they know that the government will try to use that fund for something else; a prime example, prosecutors and police officers, not counselling services. Maybe we'll see some supports, but for now we won't.

So I will not be supporting this piece of legislation, because, once again, until I see a plan from this government, until the finalized plan can be presented to Albertans and I can do good consultation and talk to Albertans about whether or not they think that those services are going to do what this government is implying is going to happen, this piece of legislation is not genuine in the support that needs to be provided to Albertans.

With that, I will close my remarks.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on Bill 20? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak to this Bill 20. As was mentioned by the mover of the bill, it changes five pieces of legislation. I want to say that out of those five, we take no issue with changes to four of them, absolutely no issue with those changes. They are housekeeping. They are positive changes, and we support these changes.

At the same time, as my colleague from Edmonton-Manning said, this bill is also legislating on the victims of crime fund, the dismantling of that victims of crime fund, that started under the previous, previous, previous Justice minister. So far no efforts have been made to fix those changes, and the reason that the government raided the victims of crime fund was that the government has been slashing the Justice department budget every single year. So far they have cut $200 million from the Justice department budget, and now they are taking money away from the victims of crime to backfill their reckless cuts.

I think that with the corporate handout, $4.7 billion, the government even expedited the rollout of that, and instead of over four years, they rolled out that money in two years. But now for victims it's the third year. They are still waiting for the new model. They're being denied support that they need to recover and heal. They've been waiting for over three years. The changes that the government made to the victims of crime fund: not only did they take money away from the victims of crime, diverted it to other initiatives to backfill their reckless cuts; they also reduced the existing supports while they're consulting. They also put in stringent timelines, reducing them from two years to 45 days for victims to get their stuff together and apply for the benefit. Otherwise, you're out of luck.

It's the third year now, and they are even solidifying the changes that they made to dismantle this fund, but they are still not able to come up with the replacement model. We are talking about victims of serious crimes: those who have been assaulted physically, sexually, those who have witnessed murders, those who have witnessed horrible crimes. Now they are getting less support because of this government's incompetence and this government's indifference. They think it's more important for them to solidify their changes, but victims can still wait. That is unfair. That is unconscionable. Victims should not have to wait for this government to get their act together to put together a replacement plan.

As was earlier mentioned, there is a kind of pattern of behaviour with this government where they are trying to strip citizens of their powers and consolidating power in government. Before the UCP became government, for decades there was a Criminal Injuries Review Board, that was an arm's-length board where victims of crime can go and seek redress. They could talk about the benefits they are getting, what else they can get. They could appeal those decisions and actually get the supports that they need to recover and heal. The government is now disestablishing the Criminal Injuries Review Board altogether. If anybody suggests that it's, say, housekeeping, please do talk to some victims of crime; do talk to organizations supporting victims of crime. Not one organization across this province is onside with the government.

The government did not consult anyone on these changes, and since then we have heard from many victims directly that they are being denied supports. We are hearing from the victims' service organizations how adversely and negatively these changes are impacting them, how adversely these changes are impacting those organizations' ability to help the victims of crime. Not one of them was consulted on these changes. Not one organization across this province stood with the government to support these changes, because these changes should not be supported.

These changes were not made in the best interests of those who benefit from this fund. These changes were made to backfill this government's reckless cuts. This fund was raided to provide for the cuts that this government made to the Justice department. These changes were not made keeping in mind the victims of crime. Instead of stripping the victims of crime of supports that they need to heal, there are many other things that this government could have done.

We have tens of thousands of cases in our court system that are being delayed, one, because of the Jordan decision; two, because of the pandemic; and, three, because of this government's incompetence. They're at risk of being thrown out because of the timeline set in the Jordan decision, thousands of those cases. Many victims of crime may not see a day in the court. They may see their alleged perpetrators walk free because the government did not prioritize issues facing our justice system. They were busy taking supports away from the victims of crime.

Those who were victimized: not only are they not getting supports from this government; they may now also have to cope with delays within the justice system that will further impact their recovery, that will further impact their healing, that will impact their mental health, that will shake their faith and trust in our justice system. They deserve justice in a timely fashion. Instead of taking supports away from them, I think the government should focus on and prioritize the processing of cases in our justice system. That should be the priority for the government instead of disestablishing the Criminal Injuries Review Board. That was an important board where a citizen could go to a fellow citizen and talk about their needs, talk about what they need for their recovery, talk about what they need for healing. They didn't have to come to this government, who doesn't listen.

Madam Speaker, I want to say categorically that the changes relating to the Corrections Act, the Justice of the Peace Act, the Missing Persons Act, the Youth Justice Act: we support these changes. But we cannot support the changes that are contained in this piece of legislation that relate to the victims of crime fund because these changes are adversely impacting the victims of crime. These changes are negatively impacting their recovery and healing, and victims of crime deserve far better from this government. Supports should not be taken away from them. They should be provided all the support they need for recovery and healing. This bill takes those supports away from victims of crime.

That's the part of the bill that we are opposed to, and we will certainly be opposing it. I will be voting against it, and I urge all members of this House to vote against these changes. Government should have . . . [Mr. Sabir's speaking time expired]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others?

Mr. Sabir: I want to adjourn the debate.

The Deputy Speaker: Perhaps there's another member that has time left that could move to adjourn debate. The hon. associate minister of mental health.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to adjourn debate. Thank you.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Private Bills Second Reading

Bill Pr. 2

Calgary Heritage Authority Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise tonight to move second reading of Bill Pr. 2, the Calgary Heritage Authority Amendment Act, 2022.

For those unfamiliar with this organization, I just wanted to share a little bit about their mandate. Their role is to advise city council on all matters relating to Calgary heritage, evaluate potential historical sites, maintain Calgary's inventory of evaluated historic resources, and promote public awareness of shared heritage.

Madam Speaker, the greatest thing about preserving history is our ability to reflect and learn. Heritage Calgary has over 800 evaluated historic resources. The language that's in this bill reflects that term, an inventory of evaluated resources. Think about that for a second: over 800 evaluated resources.

I actually had the opportunity to explore a little bit on the map earlier today, and actually I had the privilege of working in a number of these heritage sites over my career and also grew up in one of these sites. First of all, First Baptist church, actually, which was built in 1911, was the location where the Mustard Seed was founded. It also happens to be the church I grew up in, was dedicated in, baptized in, and was eventually married in. That's one of the heritage sites they protect.

Then the Mustard Seed moved from the First Baptist church over, actually, to the Northern Electric Co. Warehouse, and there it continues to operate in that heritage site. At about 12 years old is when we moved into that building. I remember running around exploring the unique hallways and crevices at that unique building. After I left the Mustard Seed, I ended up at the Boys & Girls Clubs of Calgary. They operate out of the Rutledge Hangar in Renfrew, which was built in 1929.

So for most of my career I've actually had the opportunity of working in heritage sites, so I can speak first-hand about the need to be able to preserve these great locations. I encourage all members, especially those from Calgary, to go and check out the website and take a look at it. Even in Calgary-Klein I was able to see a number of great heritage sites, including the Tuxedo Park school, which was built in 1920, and the Canadian Martyrs Catholic parish in Collingwood, which was built in 1967 and which is where my kids actually go to do all of their band and choir activities from their school.

Anyway, just a neat thing and an opportunity for us, I think, all members of this House, to go and explore Calgary's heritage and give a big thanks to Heritage Calgary for the work that they do to be able to preserve that. Obviously, that's a lot of sites to keep track of and to preserve for future generations. Heritage Calgary CEO, Josh Traptow, and his team and the board of directors all deserve our gratitude for their work in preserving our history and making these resources user friendly for all Albertans.

You can visit the organization's website and see a map of the over 800 historical resources I was mentioning. They are all plotted on a very user-friendly map, so check it out. Learning more about Calgary's heritage is right at your fingertips, Madam Speaker, so check it out.

Heritage Calgary also offers walking tours to some historic sites. It has annual awards and has a historian in residence program. Its work cannot be overstated. We also need to work to make sure that this not-for-profit organization is fully empowered to fulfill its mandate. I believe that's what this bill is doing. The language in this bill is updated so that Heritage Calgary can continue to run its organization to the best of its abilities.

The instrumental work of Heritage Calgary and the educational value of this organization is another part of its work that I need to highlight. Anyone who takes part in a tour or spends hours getting lost in Calgary's rich history will come away with a bigger appreciation for our beautiful city. If you're ever inclined, head to www.heritagecalgary.ca and check out the interactive map and see which one of the 800 sites you want to learn more about. Take the walking tour and be sure to ask lots of questions.

That's why I support this bill and, more importantly, am a big supporter of Josh Traptow and his team and what they are doing in Calgary to preserve our history. It's my honour to be able to support this organization, and I would like to extend an invitation to this House, all members, anybody interested, to explore Heritage Calgary; a rich history, a storied history is waiting for you to explore. That's why, again, I'm supporting this bill. I encourage all members of this House to vote in favour of this bill.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this evening to speak to Bill Pr. 2, the Calgary Heritage Authority Amendment Act, 2022. I want to thank the Member for Calgary-Klein for bringing this forward on behalf of Josh Traptow, on behalf of the Calgary Heritage Authority. I appreciate the passion that you bring forward when you talk about the heritage that Calgary has. I know that something as important as our history and our heritage needs to be talked about and supported. So I fully support this piece of legislation, and I would hope that all members of this Chamber do as well.

I know that it's something that was being asked for, and I'm happy to see a response and to show support for that. I know that over the years I have worked with Heritage Calgary – hopefully, when this bill is passed – and Edmonton Heritage Council in my role as the military liaison for the government. We did quite a few partnership things through the Edmonton Heritage Council, and I have to say that the work that's done through these organizations is absolutely incredible. They really want to continue to raise awareness and tell the story of Alberta. I think that having it in the hands of these organizations makes sense. To be able to show them respect and to provide support to them is something that is so important.

I really appreciate the member for outlining some of the great things that are happening in Calgary and some of the great ways that not just Calgarians but perhaps all Albertans can get involved and explore their city and really look at that storytelling.

The heritage councils, you know, really, really understand the diversity that's brought our province to where it is today, and they're able to tell that story. I would hope that investing in and supporting Heritage Calgary doesn't stop here. I know that there have been significant cuts over the years to our heritage within the budgets, and I think that in order to give it true support and meaning, we need to see continued support and resources. They're incredible storytellers for our province. They want to make sure that our history is preserved and captured and then available for all to explore.

I think some of the great ideas that are coming out of Calgary and Edmonton really need to be looked at. I know when we talk about the government's vision for this province and being able to tell Alberta's story, I would say that we should look to those that talk about our heritage first. They carry that knowledge, and they share it.

With that, Madam Speaker, I would just say that I am fully in support of this piece of legislation, and I hope that all members of the Chamber are. With that, I will take my seat.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate?

Seeing none, would the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein like to close?

[Motion carried; Bill Pr. 2 read a second time]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Speaker. A wonderful evening of debate. I'm grateful for everyone's participation. But at this time I do move that the Assembly be adjourned until 9 a.m. tomorrow.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 10:11 p.m.]

Private Bills Second Reading

Bill Pr. 1

Calgary Young Men's Christian Association Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to move second reading of Bill Pr. 1, Calgary Young Men's Christian Association Amendment Act, 2022. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the hon. Member for Calgary-South East has moved Bill Pr. 1, Calgary Young Men's Christian Association Amendment Act, 2022. Are there any others wishing to add comment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is, as always, an honour to rise in this Chamber, and I won't speak too long on this private bill. I do have the honour of serving on the private members' bills committee along with a few of my esteemed colleagues, so we did get the chance to hear from the YMCA and the stellar leader of the YMCA, the president and CEO, Shannon Doram, who does incredible work.

Fun fact: I grew up in Barrhead, Alberta, and when I was about – that's not the fun fact, Mr. Speaker; just wait. That's old news, but it is a fact.

Ms Hoffman: Let us decide if it's fun.

Member Irwin: Okay. Good point.

The fun fact is that when I was around eight or nine years old – wait for it – a family had moved to the area, and that was the Dorams. Shannon Doram was my best friend for about one or two years, and then she and her family – her dad worked at the Distance Learning Centre in Barrhead – moved to Calgary, where she lives now. So, you know, I haven't gotten to see her in many, many years, and then not long ago I saw that she had that role, and I was able to connect with her again. She is an incredible leader of the YMCA.

We are quite proud to support the Member for Calgary-South East's private bill. Basically, what the YMCA wants to do through this private bill is to just sort of modernize their objectives and their operations. You know, I know that many folks in this Chamber – especially in Calgary, there are huge recreational centres, and child care is one aspect that the YMCA does. They do a lot of really important work in the community, and from what we heard from the committee meeting, this legislation will bring the Calgary YMCA incorporating legislation in line with other areas of the province. For example, the Edmonton area branches have had the ability to own land anywhere in the province for approximately seven years. If you know anything about the YMCA in the Edmonton area, it's the YMCA of northern Alberta, right? They've had a little bit of a different model, so the Calgary YMCA is hoping to do the same.

Like I said, I didn't want to speak too long. I just really wanted to get on the record our support of the great work that the YMCA does.

Ms Hoffman: And the fun fact.

Member Irwin: And the fun fact, which might not have been all that fun in retrospect, but I wanted to share it.

I hope that all members will support the Member for Calgary-South East's bill and support YMCA in modernizing their operations.

Mr. Jones: I'm coming over there.

Member Irwin: We'll handshake it out.

With that, Mr. Speaker, thank you for the time this morning.

The Speaker: My sense is that it would have been much more fun if you had told us just how long, long, long ago it was or if we were to be led by the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo in the singing of YMCA.

Are there other members?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call on the Member for Calgary-South East to close debate should he choose to do so.

Mr. Jones: Thank you for supporting this important bill, and I encourage everybody in the Chamber to also vote in favour. I close debate.

[Motion carried; Bill Pr. 1 read a second time]

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate May 11: Mr. Ellis]

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions has some time remaining should he choose to use it.

Are there others wishing to join in the debate for third reading of Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022? Seeing the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise this morning and hopefully not be asked to sing. I wouldn't be up to that challenge this morning, and I don't think it would be a rewarding experience for anybody in the House.

I know that Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, that we are considering this morning, proposes to be just making a few small changes to the justice act. There seem to be some larger issues that could have been affected or could have been attempted to be resolved by the government with this legislation. We're seeing lots of challenges in the justice system, Mr. Speaker, that are not addressed by this legislation; for example, legislating on the victims of crime fund. It's not fixing the messes that have been made by the UCP government on the victims of crime fund, and it had many negative effects on the victims.

I know that if indeed one has been involved in the criminal justice system as a worker or somehow involved as a lawyer or in the process of supplying services to the criminal justice system, it's been self-evident for some time now that it always seems as though the criminal justice system is the last one on the totem pole to get funding. It's probably a result of who, in fact, the criminal justice system serves, and that is those who are most vulnerable, those with the smallest voice, those who are least heard in our society, and more so when, of course, they become convicted in our criminal justice system, their voice is even more muted, Mr. Speaker.

That's a tragedy because indeed anybody who ends up in the criminal justice system is a failure of our society to provide the proper means. There is certainly responsibility on the individual's part, but I think that if we roll back the clock, roll back the movie of the person's life who's involved in the criminal justice system, one will find a litany of repeated stories such as the scourge of mental illness coupled with drug addiction and a cyclical nature of intergenerational abuse. It's also coupled, in many instances, with a pattern of Indigenous suffering, which has been thrust upon that population by things such as the '60s scoop and, of course, the residential schools.

The Justice Statutes Amendment Act certainly has a lot of scope, but it really didn't go all that far. Instead of supporting the victims, the UCP did the opposite thing, and that's not right. We really would love to see the reversal of the changes to the victims of crime fund that are hurting victims and hindering their healing, and that didn't happen. Albertans can't trust the UCP to look after the most vulnerable, and this is another example of that.

Now, the bill amends a total of five acts, of course: the Corrections Act, the Justice of the Peace Act, the Missing Persons Act, the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, and the Youth Justice Act. Now, on the Corrections Act the compensation rates for the Alberta Parole Board members can now be set by order in council instead of regulation, and it does bring it in line with other ABCs. So that's not a bone of contention, but I know that many other things that could have been done would have been welcomed by this side of the House.

Now, the Criminal Injuries Review Board was winding down since 2016, and the Victims of Crime (Strengthening Public Safety) Amendment Act cut injury and witness-to-homicide benefits, which the board was responsible for. There was a class-action lawsuit, and it was concluded on January 13, 2022. Previously the UCP reduced victims of crime benefits such as injury benefits, so it would be ideal, Mr. Speaker, if indeed the victims of crime fund was used exclusively to benefit the victims of crime. But that's not what the fund is being used for, and the UCP has been, let's say, a little creative with how that fund actually gets used.

In every case, Mr. Speaker, you want to hope that the criminal justice system is one that seeks to minimize recidivism not by necessarily seeing punishment as the priority but by seeing the historical evidence that is so often repeated when a prosecutor or a defence lawyer is talking about the presentence report. I've had the opportunity to be privy to listening to many of those presentence reports as a volunteer intake worker for the provincial Solicitor General's office, and in that capacity, as I mentioned earlier, there was a constant repetition of similar stories that were heard.

Unfortunately, when these stories were being told, they were really rapid-fire tales told by the prosecutor or the defence counsel in arguing for one sentence or another. They were so rapid because the lawyers and the benches are so absolutely smacked with a heavy load of cases, so the files that the lawyers would be reading from were very cursorily looked over briefly before the case would be heard in courtrooms 65 and 68 and momentarily briefed in front of the judge. The judge would be making a significant decision in a person's life, as far as sentencing, based on probably a lot of research that had gone into the report but very little that actually was able to be transmitted to the judge.

That speaks to the underfunding of the criminal justice system, Mr. Speaker, and that's one of the things that I think we need to pay attention to in this Legislature going forward and starting right now. It's well known by those who are involved in the system, maybe not as much by the public, that the system is chronically underfunded, and this results in poor representation of the accused and a difficulty in having cases heard in a timely manner. That's something that has been ongoing for a long time. I mean, it was in the 1980s that I worked as a volunteer court intake worker for the Solicitor General's department. The same difficulties are being evidenced here today, and there is an attempt by the government to alter the justice system by using Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, to make some changes.

However, there's so much more to do. I hope that the government has under consideration a lot of the reasons for the difficulty in the criminal justice system and is seriously looking at properly listening to those who are bending under the crushing weight of the caseloads they carry and looking to fund more properly and more aggressively particularly the prosecutors' offices as well as taking into mind the environment which those who are facing the system who have not yet been convicted who are particularly in remand in this province are having to face.

I know there's extra time credit given to inmates who are subsequently convicted for time spent in remand, but that is a calculation based on the extra suffering that people in this province are deemed to undergo by simply being in remand. That really speaks to the question of inadequacy in the remand system.

Now, we did finally replace the remand centre in Edmonton and built the centre that's north of the Yellowhead. It is still fraught with difficulties, Mr. Speaker. This morning on the news there was an indication that there are problems with drugs getting into that facility. A judge actually, very uncharacteristically, suggested that the staff there should be checked periodically for drugs. That was a serious condemnation of the environment that we have our particularly young offenders but all those on remand awaiting their trials – the environment that they face.

There are simple explanations and there are complex explanations for that. The underlying problem is that we don't give it the priority as a government or as a society that it deserves. It's a pretty devastating thing to be incarcerated, Mr. Speaker. I've had the opportunity to visit some of the institutions in Alberta. That was offered to me as a matter of my volunteer work. In fact, I remember going to the old Fort Saskatchewan jail, which is no longer functioning.

There were, of course, solitary confinement quarters there, and it was a devastating thing to see. Individuals were two or three stories below ground with a single light bulb overhead, maybe 12 feet high, on a bunk with no mattress, wearing something that resembled a barbecue mitt, and they had a paperback novel to read. That was it. That was life for those who were in solitary.

I'll never forget that day of visitation, knowing that the inmates there, when they first arrived, were double-bunked and perhaps terrified for their life because they didn't know who else they were going to be bunked with, and there were, I'm told by the individuals who worked there, nothing but screams and yelling all night long in those situations where people are first incarcerated.

There are lots and lots of improvements that can be made to our criminal justice system, and this act really nibbles around the edges at it and doesn't go to the heart of the matter. I know that indeed, you know, crime is a big issue all over. Nobody likes to become a victim of crime, but we have to look at the root causes of that and the social causes and the social determinants of a healthy society.

Part of that becomes evident when we look at the number of folks who are increasingly living homeless or houseless in our cities and not only that; in rural areas as well. The rural areas are not seen, historically, to be sources of homeless people, but you'll find in places like Edson, I believe it was, it was looking at using small modular accommodations to house those who were homeless. They were local people. The funding ran out for that. I mean, that should cause people to really think and wonder what as a society we are prioritizing when more and more people are left on the street. What's the alternative? Having them jailed for petty crimes? I don't think that's a solution that most Albertans think is acceptable, and I certainly don't.

The solution, of course, is embedded in some of the comments made recently by the mayor of Edmonton, who called upon the province to step up and bear its responsibility when it comes to funding housing to prevent the homelessness and the encampments that are about to occur in this city. An increasing number of people will end up in jail with the criminal justice system being their only source.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak for the second time on Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. Of course, let me preface my comments by saying that, you know, some of the changes in this legislation do seem positive. As the government has claimed repeatedly that they are just housekeeping – and that's fine. However, there are some very large challenges in the justice system, and I would like to address some of those.

Yesterday I talked a little bit about, touched on a couple of the acts that are amended in this piece of legislation, one of those being the Justice of the Peace Act. The other one I spoke to was the Missing Persons Act. I'd like to touch on again today the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act. As I said yesterday, one of the things that I was very concerned about were the changes around the cuts to witnesses of crime.

I spoke yesterday about – I'm sure that people in this Chamber will remember – the tragedy that happened in 2015 in St. Albert. At 3 o'clock in the morning there were two RCMP officers, Constable Wynn and then an auxiliary RCMP officer, Constable Derek Walter Bond. They were investigating the possibility of a stolen vehicle in the parking lot of the Apex Casino. You know, I'm not entirely sure what happened, but they went into the casino. The end result was, tragically, that Constable Wynn was killed, was murdered, and the other auxiliary RCMP officer was injured. There was a fatality inquiry, and that fatality inquiry really sort of paints a picture of what it must have been like for the people that were there at 3 o'clock in the morning at the Apex Casino witnessing that horrific tragedy, that horrific crime.

The reason that I bring this up is that I did have an opportunity to meet a couple that were witnesses to that crime. They were there at 3 o'clock in the morning at a casino and described what they saw, and their lives were forever changed. Now, I don't presume to know sort of what the diagnosis was, but I imagine that there was some trauma in their lives after witnessing something so horrific. In any event, I did meet them a couple of years after the crime in MP Cooper's office. He's the Member of Parliament for St. Albert-Edmonton.

They had actually gone to their federal representative to see if there was anything that they could access in terms of financial supports so they could get the counselling that they needed and the financial support that they were – I believe that the husband was no longer able to work. I'm sure you can imagine what that must have been like. Their lives were forever changed. Anyway, there was a lot of difficulty accessing beyond just minimal counselling. Counselling is very expensive, and they needed quite a bit more than just five sessions. They did end up getting a little bit of support but certainly not what they needed.

The reason I'm telling this story is that just a few weeks ago, when I was at a trade show in St. Albert, I actually met this couple again. They came to where I was, and they introduced themselves and said, you know: we met this many years ago after this crime. They told me what life had been like between that time. Sadly, things had gotten much worse. Neither one of them were working. The husband, I believe, was able to finally access AISH benefits as he had a disability – well, actually, a terminal illness as it were. But they talked about how life had just been so tough for them. A lot of things had happened.

Why I bring this up again today is that not only victims of crime but witnesses of crime need our support. So while we're opening up this piece of legislation, I'm incredibly disappointed to see that some of the changes to the legislation previously introduced by the UCP have not been fixed. We've not addressed some of the serious holes that we've identified, that not just victims of crime but witnesses of crime also need support. It is in our best interest as legislators and as – you know, we're concerned about the finances of the province, that we know that this is a long-term investment.

When we invest in the mental health and the health of people, it is a long-term investment. Imagine that we're able to support victims or witnesses as they go through a really traumatic period of their lives. They will not need long-term support from government if we allow them to get the support that they need to heal, to get back their lives or some semblance of their lives or a new direction. Why I'm bringing this up is that it's incredibly disappointing that this piece of legislation that opens up, you know, quite a few pieces of other legislation doesn't deal with some gaping holes. That is one example of the problems.

I want to go back to 2020 a little bit and talk about when we were first debating Bill 16. I was hoping that this government would address some of the problems that we brought up, but instead this legislation is really sort of making those errors – I think they're errors – permanent. I would like to remind this House of some of the comments from Alberta Municipalities at the time that the legislation was proposed. I think that they were right on. They had their finger on the pulse of what needed to happen. Unfortunately, this government didn't listen. They were very organized. I'm sure many offices received the e-mails that were part of that campaign that I know I received. They were very specific about what their concerns were and what they wanted to see. So I'd like to remind members what those were.

They were very clear about wanting the UCP government to reverse the changes to the victims of crime fund and provide ongoing, sustainable funding to victims' services programs. Now, in this legislation I don't see that enshrined, that victims' services programs will be funded permanently and securely. Now, I think that the victims of crime programs, or some of them are victims' services units, are the only ones, I believe, in Canada that are not permanently funded. So they receive grants. They receive annual grants. Some of them may receive, you know, a couple of years at a time, but that's enormous pressure.

For those of you that haven't worked in the nonprofit sector or have relied on government grants, it's incredibly stressful, and it's very draining in terms of human resources to constantly have to be applying for grants, to have to create sort of new metrics to measure success instead of just focusing on the ongoing work and building on your success year to year. It's incredibly stressful, and I think it's actually a waste of human resources.

Alberta municipalities also wanted to shine a light on the fact that these victims' service units or programs really do rely on fundraising. Actually, some of them in the province – and I'm sorry; I don't have the statistics of which jurisdictions – actually have to fund raise up to 50 per cent of their annual budget. Now, for those of you that haven't worked in the nonprofit sector, fundraising takes an enormous toll in terms of human resources. It detracts from the work that the nonprofit sets out to do.

Imagine you're a victims' service program or a victims' service unit and part of your time is spent just trying to think of: "How are we going to fund raise? How are we going to fund raise hundreds of thousands of dollars? Well, maybe we'll do a golf tournament. Maybe we'll do a lottery. Maybe we'll do a bingo, or maybe we'll sell something." It takes a lot of time and a lot of effort to fund raise, and every time we force organizations to do that, we're detracting from the very important work that they are there to do.

That's our loss. That's a loss of time, a loss of human resources, and I think it's a sad use of – once again, it's just an investment in our future, and I think that, sadly, this government has demonstrated time and again that they don't think long term and long-term investment. Instead, they're thinking in terms of election cycles and what looks good, the bottom line, what it looks like, what looks good on a campaign slogan instead of what is best for the province of Alberta and what is best for Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, again, this is not my point of view. This is from Alberta municipalities. I will remind you that this is from their campaign from 2020. They talked about, highlighted the fact that there was an increase in the surcharge and that, you know, the pot of money grew substantially. That would have given, I think, the government, you know, the ability to get creative in terms of investing in victims, witnesses of victims, and organizations that support victims, but unfortunately that was not the case.

We all know how that worked out. Bill 16 was pushed through, and as a result I think there was an enormous loss. What they did point out and what I'd like to point out again for this House is that this Bill 16 actually took from a fund that was otherwise protected since its inception 30 years ago. What a legacy for this UCP government, that they raided a victims of crime fund that had been stable and doing its job for 30 years. Why they think they know best, Mr. Speaker, I really don't know when communities – Alberta municipalities, certainly – were saying very clearly that they were opposed to this change. Sadly, this government did not use their opportunity with Bill 20 to correct that error and make things better. They did not do that.

Victims' service programs, victims' service units, or however they are called, are incredibly important. As I mentioned, as Alberta municipalities pointed out, they don't have stable funding. As a result, they're forced to do fundraising. They're forced to have the stress of reapplying for grants or, you know, hoping that things go well with the government and that they get another grant. But they do incredibly vital work that otherwise would cost the government, I think, quite a bit more than victims' service programs.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the vast majority of them are heavily reliant on volunteer hours, and these volunteers are very well trained and provide an incredible service to Albertans. I know that I've said this before: many years ago – probably, like, over 20 years ago; I don't even recall – I did volunteer in Edmonton for victims' services. I went through their training, which is extensive. You know, you have to commit to a certain number of hours every week to work in their program, and I did that for some time. But I actually could not do it because of the stress of that work. It was not something that I was cut out to do, and as a result I stopped doing that.

The service that they provide is absolutely incredible. One of the things they do is court preparation and accompaniment. That was pretty straightforward. It's understanding the court process and sort of demystifying that for people that are going through that, preparing them, you know, telling them it really doesn't look like it does on television: here is the role of defence; here is the role of the judge, you know, all of those things; here is the door you're going to go in; here is where you're going to sit. All of that is incredibly helpful, particularly if it's young people, just being there with them. Sometimes it was giving them a new stuffie, it was holding their hand, and those things are pretty straightforward.

Helping people with victim impact statements: if anyone has ever had to assist someone or write a victim impact statement, that can be pretty traumatic for people. To provide some support for them as they do that and as they have to relive some of that trauma and talk about how that impacts their lives: that's tough, and it's a lot of work. So there is that and helping them with financial benefits, accessing, knowing where to go, also accessing forms around restitution, understanding what that's about.

But what I found the most difficult was responding to incidents if there was an accident or after the police had left. Let's say that there was a robbery at a 7-Eleven. You'd go in after, when everybody is gone, to support people that were perhaps witnesses or were victims of a crime and using all of the skills that you've learned through the training as a volunteer to support people through that and then explain what that process is.

That's a lot of work, and it's a lot of work for volunteers. Why I'm spending the time I am today explaining all of the services from victims' service programs and units is that these are volunteers. Investing in these programs, the small investment the government makes, provides an incredible service and is an incredible cost saving to the government. But this government's failure to see that and failure to invest long term is just a missed opportunity and just another example of the short-sightedness that we have seen time and again in this place. It's unfortunate. It's a missed opportunity, and I think Albertans are the ones that will suffer as a result.

You know, there is a thing called – I don't know that everybody knows it; I actually didn't realize it until quite recently and had a chance to look at it – the Canadian Victim Bill of Rights Act. I think that this needs to be top of mind when we make decisions around the justice system, to look at it from the point of view of the victim, to ensure that when we are amending legislation or when we are introducing legislation, everything that we do supports victims' rights.

I hope that most of us in this place have not been a victim of crime – that's my sincere hope, that we never are if we've not been – but if we are, to know that our government supports us through every single stage: through the investigation stage, through the trial stage, through the sentencing stage, and then through, obviously, dealing with corrections and conditional release and all of those things.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to my colleagues from Edmonton-McClung and St. Albert for their remarks prior to me speaking this morning. I was speaking to this in committee previously and ran out of time. In the middle of my remarks, what appeared to be the end of my remarks, I was revisiting a recent experience where I was with family members who were absolutely the victims of a crime because their son had been horrifically murdered. I was with the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods. The Member for Edmonton-Meadows definitely knows the family very closely, and then also the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar was present at the funeral.

What really touched me – I hadn't been to many Sikh funerals before, to be very honest. Most funerals that I've attended in my life, although it seems like I know more and more young people who are dying these days, have been for people at the end of their life – I guess everyone is at the end of their life – after a long life, rather, people who have generally been at least over the age of 60, for the vast majority.

But this was a very young man who was a high school student. The way that the female members of the community vocalized the grief that I think everyone in the room was feeling: they were the ones powerful and vulnerable enough to, I think, really bring about sound through their sharing of emotion, through their weeping, through their vocalization of their grief when the young man left the funeral home. It was incredibly powerful, Mr. Speaker.

Part of why I talk about this experience is because when people are the victims of a crime, in coming to terms with what's happened in their lives, they should be allowed to grieve in whatever way they need to grieve. I want to say that up front. I want to say that not having to worry about things like timelines and statutes and trying to receive some compensation, some recognition for what you and your family have gone through should be the minimum that the government provides to families and to individuals who are the victims of crime. Some survive, and certainly some don't.

I was able to hear very clearly the minister responsible, the present Minister of Justice – I think he's our third Minister of Justice in three years. I had to stop and count for a second. Everyone is still on the front bench, but the chairs have definitely changed. The current Minister of Justice, the present one, talked about how the changes to the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act shouldn't be concerning for folks because the UCP already largely made these changes in practice, and this was about actually enshrining them in law.

What I will say is that the changes in practice have not been good. They have not benefited the community. They have not benefited survivors and victims. To say, "Oh, don't worry; this isn't significant" when it's actually taking practices that have been broadly critiqued by advocacy organizations and individuals who have to live through these processes and then putting it into law and saying, "Don't worry about it; it's just taking bad policies and actually enshrining them in the law" doesn't give me a lot of solace. It actually implicates all of us because we're being asked to endorse that, right? We're being asked to actually substantiate the bad decisions that the front bench has made through our vote and through our recorded vote in this place.

Some of the sections that relate to the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act that are being changed: there's a section, of course, that I did touch on previously where it talks about replacing "death benefit" with "funeral expense reimbursement." Again, who are we to tell victims' family members who are grieving how they should spend their compensation, that it needs to be tied to a funeral expense specifically? Not everybody grieves through those more traditional forms.

Then the other piece I want to highlight is that it actually strikes out transitional sections 19 through 23, and this is the bulk of where the controversial changes were. I'm going to go through a couple of them and read some sections where I think we should all in this place be well aware of what we are being asked to endorse by the government in bringing this forward.

On page 17 of the hard copy – it's subsection (18) of the bill, which is removing sections 20 and 21 from the law – section 20(1) says:

A person entitled to submit a request for reconsideration under the former Act and the regulations under that Act concerning a member of the class described in the Class Action Settlement Agreement may submit the application under this section and the application must be dealt with in accordance with this Act and the regulations under this act.

So a person entitled to submit a request for reconsideration, so an appeal process under the former act, and then it explains how you do that. We're saying that we're getting rid of that opportunity for people to ask for reconsideration and for people to appeal.

This is 21(1). I'll skip over to it. It's very housekeeping in terms of the way the language is written. Section 21(1) says:

If a person has applied to the Review Board for a review of a decision of the Director and the review has not been concluded or dismissed before the coming into force of this section, the review must continue to be dealt with in accordance with this Act.

Again, people asking for an appeal, people asking for reconsideration. We're taking out of the legislation that if that is still in the middle of the process and it hasn't been concluded – we're taking away their ability to actually appeal. We're taking away their ability to have the decision reviewed and to have an opportunity to continue to advocate for what they feel is appropriate compensation under the former act.

Again, when I think about all of the things that members on both sides of this House have said while advocating to be in this place and to be in the position to make decisions, I would say that telling Albertans that we're going to make it harder for you to file appeals and to try to get compensation when you have been the survivor of a crime or the victim of a crime or somebody you love has been horrifically killed, for example, saying that we're going to make it harder for you to file an appeal: I don't remember anyone in this House saying that that was one of the things that they wanted to do as it related to justice and the treatment of survivors or victims in law.

Where a person has applied to the Review Board for a review of a decision of the Director [and] the review has not [yet] been dismissed nor a decision rendered under section 14.01 before the coming into force of this section and the benefit under review is not referred to in subsection (1), the review is terminated and the Review Board, chair or member designated by the chair, as the case may be, must refer the review to the Director.

Right now there is very definitive "must" language. I know that some people who are in this place have read reports by people who don't like the word "must" because it actually is a directive, that if somebody has applied for a review, applied for an opportunity to have their case reconsidered, it must be elevated to the director. The reason why we say "must" in laws is because we're not coming to this place to say, "You should do this" or "You might do that," and I know sometimes that works its way into bills. I don't love that kind of language. I think that bills, laws should be clear and definitive. I think that people should know what the rules are so that we can follow them. If a person applies for an appeal and it hasn't been heard properly, it must be elevated to the director. I think that's very clear. I think that's very black and white, and to take that away I think could be an impediment to justice.

[Mrs. Frey in the chair]

Let's go on to subsection (4).

- (4) Where the Director receives a referral under subsection (3), the Director may, as the Director considers appropriate,
 - (a) reconsider the matter, or
 - (b) notify the applicant in writing that the applicant may, within 30 days from the date of notice, apply for judicial review of the decision.

This has the provision of "may" because it's giving a choice, right? You can either reconsider the matter, the director can either review it, or they can notify the person who has applied for the review of an alternate process, a judicial review, expediting or elevating the decision of that to a judicial review rather than it being heard by the director.

These are all things about how people can seek some kind of remuneration and some kind of compensation for the harms that have been inflicted on them as the victims of crime or as the survivors of crime or as the family members of somebody who did not survive a crime, and we're taking away – we're being asked to take away; we haven't done it yet. We're still in third, but we're being asked to take away their rights to have appeals and their rights to have reconsiderations.

The minister might say, "This isn't significant; this is just enshrining what we've already done," but we are asked to enshrine it. We are asked to validate this. We are asked to say: "Yeah, we're good with that. What the past, past Justice minister did is fine." You know, here we are on Justice minister three in three years, and we've seen that this Justice minister has, at least in one situation that's been made public, taken a decision by a former Justice minister – not the former, former Justice minister; just one minister before – to undo one of the bad, bad decisions that were made.

Member Ceci: Who could be next?

Ms Hoffman: Who knows who will be next? Yeah. There are certainly a lot of rumours circulating about who might be best suited to be making these decisions.

The current Justice minister in some regards, or at least in one that's been very publicly referred to even in this House, took the decision by the former Justice minister to bring in fear, attacks for people wanting to appeal a traffic violation, that they'd have to pay – I think it was about $100 – and they'd have to file within a very short period of time. For a lot of people in Alberta – we know right now that many Alberta households are within $200 of not being able to make ends meet, so for many families that additional application fee of $100 to be able to challenge a traffic violation would be the brink of financial instability for them, right? I don't want to go as far as to say "ruin," but I think that for many they would feel a sense of dread and ruin and not being able to pay their bills. We've seen how over and over again over the last few years life under the UCP in Alberta has become more and more expensive.

I do have to say to the current Justice minister that I'm really glad that that decision was overturned. I think it was the right thing. I think that there shouldn't be barriers to people getting their day to have an appeal heard when it comes to a traffic violation, having the opportunity to ask for the decision to be reconsidered, for the evidence to be reviewed. That's what these families and victims had under the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act. The victims of crime compensation fund had appeal mechanisms for people to have an opportunity to make a case about the types of supports that would benefit them in trying to recover from the impacts of the crime that was inflicted upon them.

So the current Justice minister has, at least on one occasion, very publicly in this place overturned a decision by a former Justice minister. These decisions that were made by our former, former Justice minister: they're wrong. I certainly don't want to be on record having endorsed the decisions of the former, former Justice minister because I think that they are moving in the wrong direction. I don't think that they reflect the values that virtually all of us campaigned on when it comes to safety and fairness for citizens in the community. I don't think that this bill furthers that call to action for a more just and fair society when it comes to fair and appropriate compensation for victims of crime.

I know that many people in this room, statistically, have probably been a victim of crime. I know that many of us, many more probably, do know other people who have been victims of crime. I think that they deserve to have people on the record in their government, in the Legislature, no matter what party or whether independent, stand up and stand with victims and survivors. Those are the sections that probably, as it relates to the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, have had the broadest criticism publicly, and I think for good reason.

I know I focused the vast majority of my remarks both in committee and now in third on one piece of the bill, the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, and probably because that's the piece . . .

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, we are on Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. Are there any other members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Madam Speaker. There have been a lot of really thoughtful remarks from my colleagues and some important questions raised. You know, I know it certainly feels like déjà vu every time we're in this Chamber and we don't hear from the members opposite, from the governing party, particularly on a bill as arguably, to them, critical as Bill 20. So I hope – and I appreciated the comments. Well, I appreciated all the comments today, but the Member for Edmonton-Glenora basically called on this government to think about whether they really want to – I'm putting words in her mouth a little bit here, but my interpretation is whether or not the members in this Chamber would really want to support a bill that brings our justice system backwards and potentially hurts a lot of our constituents.

I hear members in this Chamber talking, as they often do, but not choosing to join debate. I'd love to hear some of those members join debate, particularly on this bill because, as I said, you know, we've asked a lot of what I would call thoughtful questions. We did get – time is confusing. St. Albert, you might be able to help me on this. Was it yesterday we did get the minister responding a little bit . . .

Ms Renaud: Yup.

Member Irwin: . . . on some of our questions around victims of crime in particular? But then I asked some clarifying questions and did not get any follow-up. I got a few heckles but did not get any follow-up and did not get anyone else from that government side joining debate to answer some of our questions and to try to explain how they could possibly justify what we see in Bill 20. Always the optimist I am, I am hopeful that we will hear again from the minister or perhaps somebody else on that side. I know there are some members on that side who have connections to the justice system. You know, there is at least one lawyer on that side, probably more, who could join debate. So I'm hopeful.

All right. One of the other themes that I see in Bill 20, that aligns with a number of the pieces that we've pointed out in other bills presented to us this session, you know – this was an opportunity in Bill 20. If this government really wants to improve the justice system, improve the remand system, improve supports for survivors, for victims, then they could have done that in legislation. They could have righted some of the wrongs of the past, including the raiding of the victims of crime fund. They could have taken tangible steps to improve the remand system, improve incarceration in this province, but they've chosen not to. They've chosen instead, for the most part, with a few exceptions in this bill, to really just make some housekeeping changes. That's what we've seen in multiple bills this session from this government.

This is a government that's so focused on just trying to save their own seats that instead of putting forth robust, transformative legislation, they're doing a whole heck of a lot of housekeeping. That's frustrating for many of us. Why is that frustrating? Let me tell you a story of what I see in my riding of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Yesterday morning, as is often the case – I pretty much always take the same route to work every day. That route takes me – well, I don't need to tell you the entire route. That could get – it could be too much for you. Plus, I probably shouldn't exactly identify where I live. But long story short: from my house I head over to 96th Street; 96th Street, if you don't know, is also called Church Street. It goes through the, well, Alberta Ave, McCauley and Boyle Street neighbourhoods. Yeah. My colleague from St. Albert knows because she lived not far from 96th Street when she lived in the Alberta Avenue area many, many years ago. So she knows 96th Street; she knows Church Street. It's called Church Street because there was at one point – and I forget the year. I'm bringing you all more fun facts today. That's a lot of fun facts for one morning. It's called Church Street because at one point – and I believe it was in the '70s, maybe the '80s; I will find out the details – it was in the Guinness book of world records for the most places of worship in a small area. Just countless churches and places of worship along Church Street.

[The Speaker in the chair]

There are still, actually, a number of churches on Church Street, including Sacred Heart, which, if you haven't been before, is an incredible building, a part of the Catholic church, but they really focus on Indigenous supports and reconciliation. It's a really fantastic building although they were hit with a fire, I believe just last year.

Anyways, I digress. But it is – you know, any time if anybody would love to come and visit 96th Street, Church Street, with me, I would love to have you. We have also seen some of the old churches that had been repurposed. There is Rhema chapel, which are Nigerian folks who've taken on a church which was, I believe – oh, gosh. No, I won't speculate. But it was a church that was repurposed, and they took it on. It's kind of really cool just to see the diversity still in a very small stretch.

Also interesting, coming back to Barrhead and my fun facts earlier today, Barrhead, Alberta, was actually also once in the Guinness book of world records for the most churches per capita. They don't have quite as many anymore. I know a few of them have shut down, but kind of interesting. I believe that was 1979. But, again, my memory is terrible, so please do not quote me on that one either.

Anyways, let me get back to some seriousness here. Every day I do take 96th Street to work, to the Legislature. I purposely take that route because it gives me an opportunity to interact with unhoused folks and to see just the real struggles that people I represent face every day. While they may not have homes and while they may be unhoused, they're still my constituents, right? They matter. It's harder when you drive because you don't get to interact quite the same way that I used to, especially when I would run to work every day and I was car free. That was my life for years. I really got to, you know, better hear people's stories. But I still do bike a lot as well. Again, that gives you a little bit more perspective.

As I was driving to work yesterday, just in front of the Bissell Centre, which is on 96th and about 105th, there were a whole heck of a lot of police cars and, I believe, a couple of fire trucks and ambulances. I thought: "Oh, gosh. What the heck is going on? There's a whole lot of resources." My heart kind of just jumped because I didn't know what was happening. I soon realized, as I was paused there for a bit, that they were clearing out encampments. They were removing all of the tents that had sprung up there. Anybody who spends time in my riding and in my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre's riding as well: you see encampments, and particularly you see a rise in them when the weather gets better.

I understand completely that there are people who are concerned. A lot of times the residents, particularly in Boyle Street and McCauley, who reach out to me concerned about encampments are coming from a perspective that they want to support people. They want people to have housing. They want people to have access to harm reduction supports. Simply clearing out actual humans' belongings, in some cases all they have, clearing them, throwing them into bags, treating them as if their belongings don't matter – there has to be a better way, and we're not seeing it from this government.

We've asked so many times in this Chamber for this government to take permanent supportive housing seriously, to acknowledge that permanent supportive housing can actually save lives. I've talked many times in this House about Ambrose Place as an example of permanent supportive housing that works. To bring it back to 96th Street, not too far from 96th Street in the McCauley neighbourhood, Ambrose Place takes in some of the hardest to house folks, folks who've been on the streets, some people for years, offers them a roof over their head.

I know the Minister of Indigenous Relations has visited. I know there are government members who've seen the great work that Ambrose Place does, the incorporation of Indigenous cultural perspectives so that folks feel like they're safe and they won't be discriminated against in housing, which we know is a very real issue for a lot of folks. We know Indigenous people are incredibly overrepresented on the streets, and you don't have to walk too far along 96th Street to see that.

What an opportunity this government has to invest in permanent supportive housing. Guess what? We're not asking for billions of dollars. The city of Edmonton in their last budget asked for the provincial government to chip in, I believe it was – was it $6 million or $9 million? Edmonton-City Centre, you'll probably know. Was it $9 million?

Mr. Shepherd: Nine.

Member Irwin: Nine million dollars. An absolute drop in the bucket. They refused.

The city is committed. We heard the mayor's address to the chamber of commerce I believe on Tuesday. We heard him talk about the desperate need for support from this provincial government. It's not about pitting Calgary against Edmonton. It's not about the mayor just wanting to get more funds for pet projects. No; this is about investing in people. This is about not only saving lives but money, too, and the research on permanent supportive housing shows that. But that's evidence, and we know how this government feels about evidence-based decision-making.

Anyways, I now only have three minutes left, and I've only talked about one aspect of housing. I haven't even really tied it back to Bill 20, but I'll do that, Mr. Speaker. We see the impacts of choosing not to house people and choosing not to invest in harm reduction. We see the impacts of that in the justice system. We see that in the overrepresentation of Indigenous folks in the justice system. We see that in federal prisons. Half of the women are Indigenous. The Elizabeth Fry Society, which does amazing work here in Edmonton and sure could use more support from this government, has highlighted some of the real challenges, the need for supports for Indigenous women in particular. But again – why? – this government chooses not to.

You can point to countless examples of this government making short-sighted decisions, making cuts that will have huge, long-term costs. You're not saving money, and you're not saving lives. That comes with permanent supportive housing, with affordable housing. Something recent is cuts to insulin pumps. The long-term costs of people having to seek health care, having to be hospitalized potentially: why continue to make these short-sighted cuts that are going to cost us all so much more in the long term? It's unbelievable, and it's unacceptable.

The remand system: I haven't even touched on some of the concerns there, another area where this government could have made transformative change. We can talk about the absolutely terrible conditions that we heard about in the remand centre when COVID was at its peak, with people getting so, so sick and not feeling like they were having support. Or we could talk about the fact that overdose deaths are happening in the remand centre. Just recently a young person passed away, and he wasn't supported. A judge is calling on this government to take significant action to ensure that no other person dies while in remand, and I haven't heard . . . [Member Irwin's speaking time expired]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise in the House to add comments to Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. What we are hearing in our communities and what we're hearing from our constituency members and what we are hearing from the ethnic communities, racialized communities and what – I got a chance to meet with Indigenous community members two years ago in Calgary. The community had just lost their member the day before I met them. What these communities are feeling, what they're going through, and what they're asking for: none of that, I see, is being discussed or considered to be debated in this House under this bill. We don't even see, like, that in the last three years the government really cared about this, to discuss those issues. I don't see any other bill before us where the government could answer that. If this bill is not for those questions, areas of concern that people are sharing, do they have another piece of legislation to debate on or to support those people?

This bill does nothing, just taking the very valuable time of this House, using this time for not doing anything for those folks. What we need to do in the justice system right now: it badly needs to expand in some areas that are badly lacking, specifically when it comes to the accessibility of the justice system for racialized folks, the people who do not speak English or do not speak fluent English. When it comes to justice, it's not even easy for an ordinary person to interpret all the legal language or understand all the legal steps and legal processes, but once it is not in your first language, there is a bigger challenge.

The justice system lacks the number of translators it needs. It lacks the diversity of professionals it needs. That is the area that my constituents in Edmonton-Meadows, one of the diverse ridings in this province, and the racialized folks – there is even an issue, like I was discussing, that I participated on. I was trying to help the family even after leaving the House yesterday at 6 p.m. Those vulnerable people, specifically the people living on very limited income if they're at the age of retirement, don't really have lots of money to spend to seek the justice that they deserve, and there's not much help on this.

That always has been in the public discourse, the public debate. That's in the media, that's in newspapers, and that's what I have heard the government House members talking about, too. They recognize that there is more that needs to be done. We need more correctional officers. We need more prosecutors. We need more judges. We need more staff. Particularly what I didn't hear was anything from the government caucus members – and they're probably not aware of it – about how we need support in the justice system for racialized communities, racialized folks.

I'm very sad to say this and to have this on the record. I met with the family of Karanveer Sahota, and with my colleague the MLA for Edmonton-City Centre we also met the family of Latjor Tuel. What those family members have been demanding – they are trying to reach government members in Calgary. They couldn't. They came all the way to Edmonton to protest their frustration and communicate with the government members. They came to the Legislature. I don't think any of the government caucus members had the courage or have the courage to go out and even speak to those families who have lost precious family members: the family of Karanveer Sahota, the only child of the family, at the age of 16 – they have a lot of questions – and similarly the family of Latjor Tuel.

On top of that, what the experts and researchers and the community leaders and the members have been asking for, this government continuously keeps ignoring. The family I spoke with in Calgary, an Indigenous family, said: "Our lives, the lives of our family members for them is just a file token. It's just a file number for them. We lost a family member yesterday. We got a file number, and that's it. This is how they value us."

The opposition called for it, the experts called for it: the improvement of law enforcement services and the improvement of the justice system. None of this is part of Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. This is very frustrating.

The community members have called many times on the NDP to echo their voice that we need to improve our law enforcement system, specifically when it comes to dealing with racialized communities, racialized folks. The law enforcement needs to have continued, ongoing antiracism, cultural knowledge, and sensitivity education training, trauma-informed training. That was the concern of the Indigenous family I met with in Calgary. This is sad to see, that for the past three years this government had time and they were privileged and they knew the issues and they talked about these issues, too, they recognized some of them, and they did not even take one step to address any of those issues.

On top of this, the government voted down my colleague's antiracism bill, the very first step, that was not going to do a lot but had been the first step in the right direction. They voted it down without having their alternate plan. If they had another plan to tackle racism, they could bring it forward; they didn't. They just demonstrated that they're not serious about it. That is true.

That's what these families are telling us. All these three families I'm referring to have concerns that none of the government caucus members or the representatives of this government reached out to their families even though thousands of people showed up at McNally high school to attend the vigil in memory of that young man. Not even a single member. Not even a single member of this caucus had the courage to get out and speak to the family and show some respect for this young man who lost his life.

I know the Minister of Labour and Immigration talks a lot about ideology. This is about ideology. This is about that sort of ideology. If you don't have that much sensitivity, that is what you talk about, when he was speaking about ideology yesterday.

On top of this budget, what did this government do in the last three years? They raided the victims of crime fund, and they were there to support the victims of heinous crimes. I wanted to speak to the 45-day limit. It's not a car accident. I don't know what word I should use for you. None of the government caucus members stood up and spoke to this and answered this question. Victims of heinous crimes could be as young as a child or at different stages of their lives in different circumstances and suffering for their lifetime, and they added the limit of 45 days to come out to seek support. Where are you going with this?

I wanted to share the story that in 2016 one of the, I would say, world powers, India, with a population of 1 billion people – the Chief Justice of India was addressing the premiers' convention in the presence of the Prime Minister. There were so many questions to the Chief Justice around justice being delayed and people suffering. The justice just broke down while addressing the convention. He cried. He said, "Let's see, like, it's not our fault; we wanted to help people; we wanted this country to move ahead," but what had happened was that there were law commission recommendations. They were there from '87 to 2016, 19 years ago. Every single standing committee of the Parliament supported that. Parliament supported that. Law commissions recommended it. What happened? No implementation.

The 15 judges to 1 million people: how can we address this issue? The law commission said that you need minimum 50 judges. Minimum. Minimum. To do the bare minimum. Nineteen years after, they did not even have one more extra judge to implement the report.

I'm not saying this government is purposely doing this or knowingly doing this, but this is the direction this government is moving to or moving in, and that is dangerous. That is pretty sad for Albertans. Whether it's intended or unintended – we don't want to get into this debate – we know what the outcomes are of not taking actions.

I hoped that I would have something better to say about Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, but unfortunately I cannot support this bill, Mr. Speaker.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Happy to rise here this morning and provide some final, closing comments on Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. I know I had quite a lot to say around one section of the bill. Not much to say around the other four, around corrections, justice of the peace, missing persons, and the Youth Justice Act. As we can tell, mostly just housekeeping items with regard to changes there, which, of course – again I'll reiterate that I'm wondering why perhaps, maybe, the Justice minister didn't just hand this down to the associate red tape minister to present in the big omnibus bill that's still before us here in Bill 21, because that's usually what I seem to see ministries doing. They'll take rather innocuous bills and just kind of hand that down to the ministry, trying to call it red tape.

Then, of course, we do see some changes that seem to come through the red tape ministry that, quite frankly, should have stayed within the host ministry itself. I specifically remember one bill and the minister being asked a bunch of questions about it, and all we kept seeing was fingers being pointed in other directions saying, "Well, go ask that minister and ask that minister," and we didn't really get any answers there. Sometimes that's dismaying, especially considering that Albertans are on the hook between $10 million and $15 million over the course of this term for that ministry.

Again, I guess I'll focus some of my last comments here around the key piece that I have considerable concerns about, and that's around the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act. You know, we've seen changes around the victims of crime fund that – quite frankly, it seems like it was a little bit of a honey pot sitting over there that was just too tempting for the government to leave alone, and they had to get in there and grab some of that money that's actually meant to try to help victims of crime.

I had mentioned that one organization that could've greatly benefited from some funding out of that was the Victims of Homicide. The founder of that organization, Jane Orydzuk: we've had many conversations over the years that I've been her MLA and trying to bring that organization to the forefront rather than simply trying to scramble to find help for their members. You know, I've attended some of those meetings. Some of the stories, their trips through the justice system, the barriers that they face are quite heartbreaking, to say the least. When you have an organization like that, why don't we help them out? In terms of funding it could be mental health supports for some of their members. It could be funding so that they're able to let others know that they're out there to be able to provide supports when families are devastated due to a homicide.

But, you know, over the course of this government's term we've seen many different choices being made: spending tens of millions of dollars to do things like chase down Bigfoot; we see commissions made to develop reports to find out nothing wrong was happening; we look to try to save money by doing things like cancelling insulin pump programs. The feedback that I've recently received on that has been quite profound, actually. As I said, my very own daughter is one of those individuals that are affected by that program. She's worked incredibly hard to try to get that under control, and it was actually potentially in sight for her to be able to gain an insulin pump. Because she doesn't have a company that has that kind of insurance, that change may very well likely put that out of her reach now financially. But, hey, like I said, let's fund pet projects like chasing a cartoon character.

It's unfortunate that we see a bill like this. It kind of hearkens me back to the days in the 29th Legislature when my friend from Edmonton-Mill Woods brought in the changes to the labour bill and members, the opposition at the time, losing their minds, calling it an omnibus bill and, you know: "This is ridiculous. How can you do this kind of thing?" When I look at this, technically, according to those definitions back then, this would've been an omnibus bill. I would of course disagree because all of the changes here do reside under the Justice ministry, just like all the changes back then to the labour bill resided under the labour ministry. It's always interesting once you see the shoe on the other foot and how people react to these things, but I guess we'll continue to try to point these things out, perhaps maybe urge members of the government to stay true to their beliefs, their concerns going forward about the things they held back then and seem to be pushing to the wayside now.

Currently the way that one section here in Bill 20 and the changes around victims of crime – with that alone, I just simply can't support those changes. You know, perhaps if things were done a little bit differently, if maybe members of the government, members of the government caucus would've taken suggestions by the Official Opposition to try to make the bill a little bit better, I would've found myself in a position to support it. Since they've chosen not to, like they've chosen not to on just about every other occasion that the opposition has brought forward some suggestions to make those a little bit stronger – who knows? Maybe one of these days we'll actually get a few more of these through. I would of course urge members of the House to not support Bill 20. At this point, I guess, I'll take my seat.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call the question.

I see the hon. Member for Grande Prairie could be called upon to close debate as she was the mover.

Mrs. Allard: Sure. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll be very brief. I just wanted to thank everyone for the great debate. I appreciate the comments from the members opposite with respect to the victims of crime act, and I want to assure you that we are taking that feedback. With respect to Bill 20, though, it is truly an administrative bill, and as members opposite have alluded to, it's primarily housekeeping on those five acts.

With that, I will close debate and hope that everyone will support the bill. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 20 read a third time]

Bill 22

Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate May 11: Mr. Schmidt]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to give an opportunity for any government member to rise to speak to Bill 22, but it didn't seem to happen. I am pleased to offer my comments today on Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022. This is my second time speaking to this bill and having the opportunity to speak to it.

I want to mention that I believe the last time I spoke to it, I made a number of terrible electricity puns and electrical puns. To be fair, I wasn't the only one in the House that night, Mr. Speaker, who was making those puns. There was a hockey game going on, so we were feeling quite electrified that night. Might I add that there is a hockey game happening again tonight, of course, many hours from now, a critical one, so perhaps we're getting that electrical charge a little early today. [interjection] Oh, I'm getting some groaning from my colleague the Member for Calgary-Buffalo, but ultimately . . .

Member Ceci: Go Flames.

Ms Pancholi: Oh. Yeah. Well.

A slight digression, Mr. Speaker, if I may. I had a conversation with my son last night, who is, of course, as he should be, a hardcore

Edmonton Oilers fan. I said to my son: what happens if – knock on wood – the Oilers, unfortunately, do not win? I said that we have to cheer for Calgary because it's still an Alberta team. I'm sorry to say that my son was adamant. I'm apologizing to the Member for Calgary-Buffalo. He adamantly said that he would never cheer for the Calgary Flames.

But I said to him, I was like: we are Albertans, so we cheer for an Alberta team. I regaled him with the story of me living in South Africa in Cape Town when the Calgary Flames were in the Stanley Cup finals in 2004. Although being an Edmonton Oilers fan, I got up in the middle of the night in South Africa with a couple of other Canadians to watch the Calgary Flames in the Stanley Cup finals that year. We are Edmontonians first in my household but Albertans second.

I will work on my husband – not my husband, on my son. I'll work on my husband, too. I'll work on my son, but ultimately I don't need to worry about it because the Oilers are going to win tonight. Anyways. A brief digression. I appreciate you allowing me to do that, Mr. Speaker.

Okay. On to Bill 22. We have spoken quite a bit on this side about this and actually expressing that overall there are a number of pieces of this legislation that we, at least myself and I think a number of my colleagues, do support. Certainly, there are objectives that are being served here that are going to serve us well in Alberta in the long term despite the fact that, you know, this is a little bit – as I said last time, better late than never. We had seen essentially this legislation come before this House more than six months ago. Of course, it was not given priority by this government, and therefore it did not pass.

That being said, you know, there are certainly some objectives here which we do support and think are important for our electricity grid, and I want to walk through a little bit because we are in third reading of this bill. Just to summarize, we have not seen amendments. We haven't had a lot of fulsome discussion from the other side about their thoughts on this bill. To summarize for those Albertans who are riveted and watching this debate right now, it's important to kind of outline the elements of this bill and why it is important and is going to serve our purposes in the long run.

Bill 22 essentially does have four main areas that it addresses. First of all, I want to address the fact that it really provides a definition for the concept of energy storage in our electricity market. This is important because this is something that has been undefined up until this point. Largely that was because energy storage has not been a big factor within the electricity grid. I spoke about this last time, about how electricity storage is something that we are more and more cognizant of as we know that our electrical demands are going to increase. We see that in terms of – there's obviously a large movement towards electrification of vehicles. I talked about last time how we're seeing that incredible rise in the demand for electric vehicles. That demand is going to need to be met not only in the production of those vehicles but also being able to service those vehicles on the roads.

That's something I know my family has considered as we just purchased a plug-in hybrid vehicle, so we operate it in EV mode quite a bit, you know, because we can. We don't drive the long distances with it. I actually recently just saw an article that talked about how Mercedes-Benz just actually apparently came up with an EV vehicle that will be able to travel a thousand kilometres on a single charge, which is outstanding although it also is going to change our demand on our electricity system. That is promising, being able to travel that far of a distance on a single charge, but we're not there yet, Mr. Speaker. We know that many vehicles still can't quite do that.

Many more Albertans and Canadians are seeking electric vehicles. We know many car companies – I was trying to search for it, and I couldn't find it in my research. I saw an announcement recently of one major car company that said they're planning on going to all EV vehicles by a set timeline, so that's happening. It is happening. There is the demand there. It's been very difficult, I know, for many Canadians to actually get an electric vehicle right now. The demand is so high. Wait-lists are quite high. Because of that, we need to be prepared, and there are a lot of things that are going to create some challenges for us.

As we shift that way, it challenges, of course, our oil and gas sector here in Alberta. What does that mean for us in terms of our production but also the infrastructure required to accommodate the further electrification of vehicles? It's going to require charging stations at certain places. We're going to require more energy storage. We may have philosophical or ideological or value differences around whether or not we want this to happen or not, although I will say that a low-carbon market is – you know, for climate change we need to address it.

Moving towards addressing that through more low-carbon emissions is important. We have to take those steps. We recognize the impact of climate change, so there's definitely some significant value moving away from high-carbon transmission. At the same time, you know, we have to be cognizant about whether or not we're ready to do that, the implications, because there are certainly environmental implications of moving to further electrification as well. Nobody is denying that. So managing all of those. Again, the global market and the way the demand is going, we will see further demands on our electricity system. Moving towards energy storage and talking about that as a key part of our electrical grid is important.

This bill, as I understand it, essentially does allow for, you know, more companies to be able to – sorry. I should just say it goes back a bit. It addresses the regulatory issues around energy storage projects and actually makes it clearer that, for example, the Alberta Utilities Commission will bring energy storage under their processes and clarifies how storage has to follow the rules and mandates of the electricity market. So that's a little bit different than what was happening before because it wasn't defined or regulated. Essentially, it recognizes that this is going to support more energy storage projects going into the future. A number of pieces of legislation are amended by this bill to allow for that.

The other piece, of course, that Bill 22 does is that it allows for unlimited self-supply with export. You know, what that means, Mr. Speaker, is that self-supply is the electricity that is produced and consumed on-site and then hence not usually supplied through the grid. So somebody is generating that electricity on their own property, and they're not necessarily buying it from the grid. Usually that's treated differently because of the fact that they aren't accessing the grid, but there may be times where they do access the grid. Even if you're a self-supplier – for example, somebody might think about a solar panel on their home. They're able to generate some electricity, but there may be times where they need to still access the grid.

Now this is going to allow for more of that happening for industrial suppliers. This is not meant to address that instance I just described over residential solar panels. That's already kind of allowed, for residences to be able to sell their excess electricity back into the grid, but this is going to allow for larger industrial companies to be able to do that. Again, more and more of, I think, a realization that the grid is going to be supplied in different ways as we move to different types of electricity generation as well as different types of electricity use.

You know, the bill has a number of other changes. It requires distribution facility owners to prepare long-term distribution system plans which will have to receive regulatory approval. This model is in place for transmission right now, and this can help with planning for the transition to increase electrification as more use electric vehicles, as I just described.

These are all things – you know, when I talk about that these are good ideas, these are good things we support doing, this will definitely address some longer term challenges and opportunities that we face in Alberta, as I described, but I think we also have to continue to be cognizant of the fact that there are pressing needs facing Albertans right now when it comes to electricity rates and natural gas rebates in particular. Yet – let's be clear – Bill 22 does not address any of those, nor has anything coming forward from this government significantly addressed what average Alberta families are facing right now with respect to their electricity costs. This is not going to make a difference for that, and nothing this government has put forward so far is substantially going to make a difference for Alberta families.

We've spoken at length, Mr. Speaker, and I will do it again, about the failure of this government to respond both quickly and effectively to the needs of Alberta families and the rising costs that they're facing. Not only have they failed to respond, but of course they've exacerbated and caused some of the huge increases that families are facing, whether it be in their property taxes, the increased tuition, the increase in their car insurance. In fact, we know that was directly as a result of this government caring more about the lobbyists who within basically a month of this government being elected were knocking on their door saying: lift that rate cap on insurance rates. Sure enough, this government was quick to respond to them and to allow for Albertans' car insurance rates to go through the roof, yet they are not quick to respond at all to the needs of Alberta families.

[Mr. Reid in the chair]

We know that the regulations that have now been released around the electricity and natural gas rebates – first of all, there is no clear timeline for the natural gas rebates. We don't even know if that's ever going to happen. Even the electricity rebates, well, that's not going to happen: December, Mr. Speaker. If you're an Alberta family who has been paying hundreds of dollars more every month, yeah, it's no big deal, right? You can wait till December. December is not really, I mean, an expensive month for anybody. It's, like, that's not expensive or anything. So go ahead; wait until December. They hope – they hope – it will come out by December.

As a reminder, Mr. Speaker, you know, we stood in this House and demanded that there be action and rebates issued to Albertans by the end of the month we are currently in, by May. But no, this government couldn't respond that quickly to Albertans. But, as a reminder again, it was only a month before they could respond . . .

Ms Hoffman: They announced it in March.

Ms Pancholi: Yeah. Oh, that's true. The Member for Edmonton-Glenora indicated, of course, that they announced it in March. I don't know how much more time they need to do it.

There are certain things they have that they do do with amazing speed: firing an Election Commissioner, firing 20,000 educational assistants during a pandemic by tweet . . .

Member Irwin: Cutting off people on insulin pumps.

Ms Pancholi: . . . cutting people off insulin pumps. I mean, the list . . . [interjections] I know.

We could go through – I mean, those things can happen just like that, but rebates to average Albertans who are facing rising electricity costs: oh, well, you’re just going to have to wait for that. Oh, and let’s be clear that even if they do get those rebates by the end of December, it’s $50 for three months, so $150, which I don’t even think covers the increases that many families have faced in one month, let alone what they’ll be facing by the end of December. Even though we’ve talked about the delay in delivering it, we should also be clear about how paltry a rebate this is and how it’s not really going to be much assistance to Alberta families. Those are some things to highlight, Mr. Speaker.

Overall, this bill is fine. We’ve talked about it. It’s good. There are going to be some good outcomes long term for our electricity grid. It allows for some, you know, more flexibility in addressing the realities of the challenges and opportunities facing our electrical system. But right now if you ask most Albertans – and I did this last time, Mr. Speaker. I can’t remember the bill number now which was the insurance bill that came forward this session; 16, I think it was. I said that my test would be that if I go to a constituent’s door – and it inevitably comes up that the cost of living is hitting them hard. I say: “You know what? There is an insurance bill before the Legislature right now. What do you think it’s about?” They’d be like, “Oh, you’re going to make insurance more affordable for me.” But, no, that’s not what that insurance bill was about. It had nothing to do with that.

I think the same is true of Bill 22. If I went before my constituents and I said, “Oh, I know you’ve been facing really high electricity bills; guess what; there is a bill before this House right now on electricity,” they would think: “Oh, good. There’s going to be that relief that I need to manage.” And then we’ll say, “No, actually, that’s not what this bill is about.”

I think that throughout this session we have seen that this government is not actually responding at all to what Albertans are saying, and it seems like they are not committed to actually helping out the very people that they’re supposed to represent. Luckily for Albertans, Mr. Speaker, the Official Opposition and the Alberta NDP are prepared to do that, and we will continue to do that.

Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has risen.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 22, Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta’s Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022, at third reading. I can see that, you know, for all members in the House this is a very riveting and scintillating debate. One might say that the atmosphere is electric in the House as we continue this debate. [interjection] Thank you. Thank you. I will not be here all week, but please try the veal.

Mr. Speaker, what we have in front of us today is a bill that is looking to address issues that the government sees within the electricity market. When this bill was introduced, the associate minister for natural gas, also responsible for electricity, said that this bill would be a step towards eventually, at some point, seeing a reduction in costs for average Albertans for electricity. One of the ways this bill does that is by allowing unlimited self-supply – that is, allowing more industries, more companies, others to create and use their own electricity and then sell it back onto the grid – in this way looking to create additional capacity in the system that isn’t dependent on the major power providers, then, to my understanding, looking to increase competition in the market, the hope being that that will bring prices down.

What we have in fact seen, as noted by economist Blake Shaffer and others in Calgary in a report they released, is that the largest portion, the biggest reason that electricity prices have gone up is simply because the major power companies have decided to put them up because they decided they needed more profit. Now, to be clear, Mr. Shaffer is not necessarily saying that this was gouging on the part of these companies. What he notes is that there was perhaps some calculation on their part that their costs would be increasing or that they had other expenses. But the fact is that over the last few years power companies in Alberta have reaped much higher profits by raising the price of electricity, and they have the ability to do that due to a lack of competition in the market and a decision by this government to remove the cap that existed on electricity prices, thus allowing those companies to simply freely raise those rates as they saw fit.

That has brought us to the situation we have here. Now, of course, this is a government that came in with a very distinct agenda, Mr. Speaker. I don’t think anyone would argue that this government did not come in saying that they had a lot of things that they wanted to do. Indeed, they had a very large, exhaustive, and lengthy platform laying out many things. Now, to the best of my recollection, that platform didn’t say a lot about what they intended to do in terms of the electricity market. I could be wrong on that point. Maybe these actions here were actually listed in that platform. I don’t recall that being there. But certainly this is a government that has been almost slavish in its focus on the things that it said it was going to do, and it is a government that has shown itself very reluctant, in fact, at times absolutely incapable of pivoting when circumstances change.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Unfortunately, that’s what we have seen in so many respects, and that is what has led, in many respects, to soaring costs for Albertans in so many areas. This government decided it was going to remove the cap on insurance rates regardless of what the impact might be. What is the impact, then? It has been soaring insurance rates for Albertans, Albertans paying much higher prices. The government has offered no solution for this so far. They’ve focused on that thing they said they were going to do. It has been the same with the removal of the cap on electricity and natural gas. As we have seen these prices soar, the government has remained steadfast that they would not take action on that. Instead, what they do is that they say: well, eventually we will do something that may make a difference somewhere down the line.

Certainly, as the critic for health care I have seen that that has been a major issue there, where this government has utterly cratered the health care system. We’re in a crisis, Mr. Speaker. The government says: well, this is not unprecedented. Front-line health care workers absolutely disagree. I can’t even count now the number of doctors, nurses, others who are the front-line people in the system who are standing up and saying: this is absolutely unprecedented, the level of chaos and disruption that has been introduced by this government. When they are questioned about this, the minister stands in this House and says: well, we’re investing in eventual capacity somewhere down the line. No action to meet the current crisis. No action to address the damage that they have done with their multiple attacks on front-line health care workers, utter mismanagement of the COVID-19 pandemic, that has brought us to this point of crisis.

The relevance, Mr. Speaker, is that that is what we have here in Bill 22. Now, of course, we support the kinds of things the government is putting forward. We are going to vote – at least I am personally going to vote in support of this bill, but it is a textbook example of a government that says, “You know what? Albertans are dealing with problems now. Too bad. The solutions we’ll bring to the table will eventually maybe increase capacity somewhere down the line,” refuses to acknowledge the mistakes that it’s made that have brought us here, the damage that is done, and slow to take actual action to fix that problem.

Certainly, I agree that offering folks the opportunity to store more electricity, put that back out onto the market, sell that into the market, make use of it themselves indeed is likely to relieve some pressure on the system somewhere down the line. But, you know, the thing is, Mr. Speaker, that the associate minister of natural gas said that the government has no timelines or targets for adding capacity to the grid. They have no sense of when any of these benefits might actually accrue to the system.

That is, again, something that we repeatedly see with this government. Their investments in health care: they like to brag and try to deflect from the fact that they have driven doctors out of the Red Deer regional hospital, utterly cratered their ability to provide service, diverting surgeries, ambulances lined up outside the door because they can’t get into the emergency room. The government says: but, ah, we have put the money in to expand the Red Deer regional hospital in four or five years. Of course, they have not provided any details – no timelines, no specifics – which is what I hear from the health care workers and the folks at the hospital as well as from municipal leaders and others there. They really want to see.

But here we have a bill which indeed may be successful but for which the government can provide no timelines or targets for when it will add capacity to the grid, much like this government was unable to and still is somewhat unable to tell Albertans when they will actually receive the rebate, which is the sole step this government has taken to address the soaring rates of electricity. Today marks 100 days, Mr. Speaker, since the Premier and this government first promised a rebate on natural gas. One hundred days. It was sometime after that that they eventually got around to saying: oh, yes, and electricity, too. At this point Albertans certainly have no idea if and when they might actually receive a rebate on natural gas. Certainly, it won’t be any earlier than October because the government introduced a rebate that does not actually kick in until then.

For anything Albertans have faced over the past winter, this government says, “Too bad,” because, again, it’s not a government that’s interested, apparently, in helping Albertans now. They’re interested in talking about the things they might someday do sometime down the road. As my colleagues have also noted, this is a payment, the electricity rebate, of $150, $50 a month for three months, when Albertans have seen their bills double, some triple in size. Fifty dollars per month for three months. Of course, again, that’s par for the course with this government.

In so many areas of policy this is a government that takes a lot away and then wants to pat itself on the back for giving a little bit back. We’ve seen this repeatedly with the Minister of Advanced Education: massive, sweeping cuts to postsecondaries like the U of A, huge cuts that are driving up tuition, cutting staff, gutting that university. But then the minister shows up and wants to be applauded for giving dribs and drabs of little bits of investment back. All this week, Mr. Speaker, every single day there was an announcement from this government of another little trickle of money that they are putting into something after everything they have taken away.

No better example, Mr. Speaker, than one that’s very relevant to the minds of people in Alberta right now, and I can tell you that every member of this House is receiving hundreds if not thousands of e-mails about the ending of the insulin pump therapy program. Now, when the government made the announcement they were cancelling this program, they were patting themselves on the back, saying: hey, we are going to give people access to far better technology, newer insulin pumps. No details on how that actually is intended to work. No details at all on any of this, really, other than that they intend to force Albertans to move on to external insurance plans, private health insurance, to pay for something that up until now had been covered by government.

Now that they are going to be facing, likely, increased costs – how much exactly we don’t know because, again, the government will not release those details or speak to that. They simply repeat the same talking points over and over and over. Here we have the government taking something major away and then trying to spin that as if they are giving something good back and again, as we have here in this situation, unable to provide an actual timeline or any information on it. No detail on something that is causing very real fear and anxiety and potentially real damage to the health and the income of Albertans and, frankly, to our health care system.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I do not have a problem with the provisions of this bill. These are likely prudent steps to take. Indeed, I will give this government credit. At times it does manage to do that. We have an awful lot of administrative legislation that comes in front of this House. It seems there are some folks in this government that love to spend time consolidating bills and pulling things together and doing that administrative work. As much as that’s not generally my interest, Mr. Speaker, admittedly, yeah, perhaps at times that needs to be done.

So I’ll give this government credit that it has done some reasonable systemic work and some reasonable groundwork, but oftentimes, as, say, for example, with Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act that we have in front of this House, which is one of those kinds of bills, we have a lot of consolidation, a lot of housekeeping and everything but again absolutely no details. Many big promises about what the government intends to do and the potential benefits down the road but absolutely no detail in getting there. I think in so many aspects this is a government that has utterly lost the trust of Albertans. As I say, it has proven itself unable or unwilling to pivot to changing circumstances around us to the great detriment of Albertans and, I think, damage to a number of our systems here.

So it’s my hope that, you know, Bill 22, these provisions, will indeed have the effect that the government hopes they will have. Indeed, as I said, they are likely to have some effect. I can’t speak to how great an effect they are likely to have in terms of addressing the kinds of costs we have in Alberta’s electricity system, to be clear, a system that has been largely constructed and is still largely functioning as it was set up by previous Conservative governments in the province of Alberta. But I recognize there is indeed work that needs to be done, and I see no reason not to support these particular provisions as one step in moving towards that goal.

Certainly, we’ll be watching closely to see when this government might actually get that rebate out to Albertans. It is only $150, which is a small drop in the bucket of the costs that this government has raised on Albertans. But, hey, I think Albertan families will welcome any dollar they can get given the number of costs that this government has raised on them. We’ll be watching closely to see when those rebates might get out. Hopefully, it will be earlier than the end date this government has set of October, November, December. I guess we will see. The government said that it likes to move at the speed of business. In this case business does not seem to be moving particularly speedily.

That said, I will be supporting Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes Amendment Act, and watching closely to hopefully see it eventually provide some benefits for Albertans. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the chance to also add some final thoughts here on Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022. Again, some of my colleagues have mentioned – I'm not opposed to Bill 22. There are a lot of changes that need to be done in terms of modernizing the language around the electricity grid, specifically for things such as defining energy storage.

It reminds me a little bit of, you know, over the course of time how we've had to adapt to new things. At the risk of maybe dating myself just a little bit, I remember, say, for instance, when the Internet started to become a thing and having to change some of the language to incorporate that. I can almost go as far back as, say, cellphones and things like that, too. That might date me just a little bit too far on that although I still remember buying my very first cellphone in my vehicle for the whopping price tag of $1,500. It was crazy, but it was very cool driving around with a full-sized . . . [interjection] Oh, the brick phones. Yes. I remember those. You'd try to talk to somebody. We would be, like, literally as far across the aisle as we are now and, you know, you'd be like, "Hello." "What?" Anyway.

Mr. Dach: You weren't driving.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, back then you were allowed to drive, though, with your cellphones. Again, see, things have changed, and we have to update the language to show those things, like we've recently done that you don't talk holding your phone while you're driving your vehicle. It doesn't work out. Usually you'll get a ticket for such things. So, obviously, we always have to be mindful of those changes.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

I remember a discussion I had participating in one of the Council of State Governments conferences down in the U.S. and the whole topic around autonomous vehicles and some of the things that legislators were going to have to start thinking about going forward in terms of: how do you legislate these types of things in terms of if indeed something does tend to go wrong? I can tell you that some of the conversation was actually quite frightening, Madam Speaker, the level of responsibility in terms of, you know: how do you come up with that language to deal with the situation? I have to say that by the time I was at the end of that discussion around autonomous vehicles, I was hoping that with any kind of legislation that would need to come forward with that in terms of new technology changes, hopefully I would be retired at that point, and I would leave that to the younger generation to try to work through.

Other than that, I mean, again, you know, requiring distribution facility owners to prepare long-term distribution plans and have them go through a regulatory approval process and sections, of course, dealing with dissolving the Balancing Pool: as I'd mentioned, not really any problems with some of those changes.

But I have to mention my friend from Edmonton-City Centre, who had mentioned some of the opening comments from the minister of gas saying that a step towards reducing on costs for Albertans – it was interesting because I actually forgot that during his opening comments. It kind of reminds me of, you know, when this government was first elected, came in and wanted to stop the direction of the type of market that Alberta had with that.

Of course, the only other jurisdiction in all of North America that shared that same type of market was Texas. We all know the saying that everything is bigger down in Texas, and that was including their electricity bills, which was part of the reason why we had been looking at going in another direction like just about every other jurisdiction. But, of course, that was halted, and sure enough, you know, just like Texas and their big electricity bills, now Alberta shares that same problem. So perhaps the minister probably should have maybe paused for a moment and taken a look around as to what was going on.

Nonetheless, that does bring us to the point, as some of my colleagues had mentioned, that Albertans' energy bills have spiked dramatically. I'd even mentioned in the House one of my constituents that came to my office with a bill for $500, and he said that was, you know, the second one that he's seen. I'm assuming he's probably seeing two or three more, and he's still of course waiting for a paltry rebate of $150 that for some reason the minister can't seem to get out the door.

I don't buy the whole argument that he made at the time that, you know, the opposition was simply slowing things down. As we know, that debate has concluded. That bill was passed. Why hasn't that rebate gotten out the door yet? What's holding it up now? It can't be me. The government controls the purse strings. I certainly don't. You know, why are people still waiting for this to be able to help them out?

You know, in the situation of my one constituent, who has now, I'm going to guess, gotten at least three months' worth of bills totalling $1,500, you're going to help him out with a mere 10 per cent of that, on top of all of the other costs that we've seen Albertans have to face because of the decisions by the UCP government. Rising insurance costs: I've mentioned some of the numbers that I've seen from constituents who have contacted my office over that. Rising school fees that people are facing. Then with all that stress of that and trying to make ends meet, they try to get away, you know, going camping or something. Now all of a sudden they're facing fees for that as well.

It's actually not even to the point where people are getting nickelled and dimed, because it's much worse than that. You know, I guess with my friend from Edmonton-City Centre talking about a step towards reducing, I would suggest that the minister maybe speed up and take several steps quickly in terms of helping out Albertans, and the first one is: get the 150 bucks out the door already. What is the holdup?

But, again, as I've mentioned, changes around energy storage: we have to keep up with that, and I know that my friend from Edmonton-Whitemud had gone through that section quite effectively around that.

Also talking about allowing unlimited self-supply with export. Now, it's unfortunate, because of the number that was set here of I believe it was five megawatts – if I'm wrong on that, I'm happy to stand corrected. Likely, that's only going to be able to affect industrial producers with that number. It's not really going to allow anybody smaller than that to be able to participate in that. I don't know if that was, you know, maybe just an unintended consequence or why potentially the minister had looked at sort of locking out anybody smaller than that from potentially being able to get energy back onto the grid that they're not using or overproducing on. Unfortunately, we've never really heard any of the answers to these questions. It just would have been nice to have heard a little bit from that.

Also, one of the other comments that I know my friend from Edmonton-Whitemud had brought up was around the delay of this bill coming forward initially, because we did of course see one iteration of this bill earlier. I believe it was Bill 86. I could be wrong on that. In any case, very similar to what we're seeing here in Bill 22 with a few slight changes. Again, simply asking the minister why that was the case. You know, why the delay in bringing that original bill forward only to then later, six months later, bring forward pretty much almost the same bill? I could almost say that I'm starting to see a habit of delays here with things: delays in legislation, delays in getting rebates out the door, delays in getting Albertans to be able to qualify even for a rebate, as we've seen with natural gas, because those expenses have gone up as well.

It's unfortunate that, you know, we can't seem to get just some of these simple answers so that we can go back to our constituents and explain to them why these kinds of things are happening rather than just, unfortunately, having to shrug our shoulders and say: well, the government won't tell us why; they won't provide an explanation. Unless, of course – the only other thing I can think of is that the answers that they would actually give they know Albertans aren't going to like, which we've certainly seen over the course of the 30th Legislature here. My friend from Edmonton-City Centre and myself in just the previous debate on this bill around the changes, like I said, to insulin pumps: they probably didn't talk to anybody because they knew they would get some significant push-back on that.

Again, I guess when it comes to updating the language, I don't necessarily have any issues. I don't see why this bill can't go through. I guess it's just one more example of a missed opportunity with which to be able to improve the situation for Albertans.

We'll just have to keep waiting, hoping that some of these changes, which will be the step towards reducing the costs, will come a little bit sooner rather than later because, as my colleagues have said, Albertans need that help right now. Well, they actually needed it several months ago, but I guess, for the purposes of the discussion today, they need it right now.

So I would highly encourage the associate minister of gas to, well, step on the gas. You know, you're saving 13 cents a litre now, so let's get that truck moving quickly, get it to the bank, deposit that money, and get it out to Albertans immediately. I guess something is better than nothing.

But, as I said, I don't have, really, any problems with Bill 22. We do need to update things as situations change and new technologies come onboard, new ways of thinking that have just never ever happened before in the past.

I look forward to supporting it, and hopefully, maybe at some point here in the later stages of third reading, we might get a chance to hear from the minister, and in his final comments he'll be able to at least quickly answer some questions that have come up throughout debate so that we can go back to our constituents and provide them with fulsome answers rather than simply shoulder shrugging, saying: well, the government never tells us anything.

Thanks very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise this morning to join in debate on Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022, at third reading. From second reading through Committee of the Whole and now at third reading we've had the opportunity to consider Bill 22. Now, we did also have the ability to essentially consider Bill 86 in the fall, when it was first introduced and then not passed at that time. My understanding was that the government needed to do a significant amount of additional consultation and development on this piece of legislation prior to bringing it back here for our consideration in the spring.

I'm pleased that the government has been able to go and do that additional consultation. Inadequate consultation is certainly a recurring theme when it comes to legislation introduced by this government. It's something I have spoken about a number of times in this place as we have debated a number of different bills this particular session.

As some of my colleagues have noted, in many of the pieces of legislation this session there does tend to be a bit of an administrative nature to them. Here with Bill 22, electricity statutes, as in the title, modernizing is absolutely the name of the game. Let me say early in my remarks, Madam Speaker, that I will be pleased to support Bill 22, but I'm glad I have the opportunity to offer some comments.

Bill 22 is going to modernize by defining energy storage, something that's currently lacking in our current legislation. It's going to make sure that we've got the rules around self-supply and export and allowing unlimited self-supply and export. Self-supply, of course, Madam Speaker, being electricity that's produced and consumed on-site and not supplied through the grid. Bill 22 is going to require distribution facility owners to prepare long-term distribution system plans, that will need to get approval, and will deal with the dissolving of the Balancing Pool.

Now, during debate on Bill 22 certainly much has been said about the cost of utilities on Alberta consumers. I would like to note, as I prepared to respond to this bill in third reading, that during the committee process there was an amendment introduced, amendment A1, that would have stopped the UCP government from adding more fees onto Alberta families. The amendment essentially suggested that administrative fees would, rather, be charged to the utility companies, to the electricity generators within the system. Now, the fees are coming as a result of the dissolution of the Balancing Pool. The Official Opposition was seeking to limit the costs to Alberta families, given the high costs that have been piled on not only in the utility sector but in a number of other ways. Certainly, this is something I hear about a great deal with my constituents in Edmonton-Mill Woods.

But, Madam Speaker, as I reviewed the debate – because we do not always have the opportunity to be in the Chamber for every stage of debate and for every speaker. I am more than happy to be corrected, but it appears that the government and the associate minister of natural gas and no member of Executive Council chose to respond to that amendment and to explain to the Official Opposition or to the public why they were rejecting an amendment that would have saved costs from going to Alberta families. Now, that amendment was discussed across different sittings. There were different people speaking to it, yet the government never chose to respond to that, and I . . . [interjection] Oh, please. Thank you very much.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to briefly intervene. I appreciate my colleague from Edmonton-Mill Woods raising this issue. Of course, in my debate I noted that I did not have significant concerns with the aspects of this bill, but certainly the one she is raising is one that was of concern. I do appreciate that you brought this amendment forward or that our caucus did. I was just wondering if she could outline a bit of the detail about the kinds of potential costs Albertans could face due to the government's lack of consideration on that.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much to the hon. member. The amendment was brought forward by the Member for Calgary-

Bhullar-McCall, and that specific amendment, which, again, based on my reading of all of the debate through Hansard – and for those watching at home: Hansard is an excellent source where we can find out more about the debate on individual pieces of bills and who has said what – it was amending section 1(6) specifically to ensure that the administrative fees of the Alberta utilities advocate would not be charged to anyone but the utilities. Now, my understanding from this amendment is that the administrative fees are resulting from the dissolution of the Balancing Pool. At the time the MLA for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall put forward a very reasonable argument that it would not be fair or reasonable for Albertans to be charged with those additional fees.

He and others who spoke to this amendment went on to outline the number of ways in which Alberta families have been hit with additional fees because of the UCP government, starting with, if we just speak about the electricity and energy world, the UCP government removing the rate cap on electricity prices, and now Albertans are paying more. That removal of that rate cap has directly led to the spike in utility prices that Albertans pay. Now, much has been said as to why those prices are spiking, but we know from research by some very learned colleagues, economists, like University of Calgary economist Blake Shaffer, in recent reports that have been widely reported in the media, that the largest factor in the record-high power prices is profits at this moment because, of course, market power is being exercised by the few electricity generators we have in the system and power companies have pulled in nearly five times the profit during winter rate spikes, according to this. The economist Mr. Shaffer was quoted as saying, “Simply put, they have more control of the supply in the market, and they’re charging more.” That is one additional cost that I have certainly heard about when talking to my constituents.

At the same time, the UCP government removed the rate cap and is now, through Bill 22, putting in an ability to continue to put additional charges onto the Alberta public rather than accepting an amendment from the Official Opposition. At the same time as we’re seeing that, we’re seeing natural gas prices increase, we are seeing the UCP government updating the tax code to essentially create a tax on inflation, something that the Premier, when he was a member of the Canadian Taxpayers Federation and for much of his time in federal government, spoke against, something he referred to as sneaky bracket creep, and those increases are costing families roughly $500 more.

At the same time as we’ve seen these electricity and utility prices increasing, we are seeing tuition increasing at universities, and we are seeing inflation impact food prices as well as other costs for families. Certainly, we’ve seen gas prices rising to a huge extent, park fees, school fees, on and on and on. These costs continue to go up. I may be repeating myself, but I have to make the point that it’s insurance costs as well. Again, similar to removing the rate cap on electricity, the UCP government chose to remove the cap on insurance prices that was keeping insurance to reasonable increases for Alberta families rather than 30 per cent or higher increases on insurance.

So we’re in this environment of increased costs, and the Official Opposition brings forward an amendment to stop the government from piling on more fees to Alberta families, and again, reviewing Hansard – prepared to be corrected and happy to be corrected – it appears that the government did not deign to rise to explain why they did not support the amendment or how they would be managing costs for families. So in third reading, as we make our final comments on Bill 22 and reflect on the debate that has happened so far, the question I have is certainly: is the government not concerned about the additional costs that they’re layering onto families? This bill, which I support, which is going to modernize the system, may also add costs to families.

Now, in its introduction the minister certainly said that the bill would be a step towards reducing costs and should eventually bring costs down through the modernization pieces we were talking about around self-supply and export, being able to define energy storage, all some very long-term, laudable goals. Unfortunately, not a lot of detail on timelines for when Albertans will have that relief and not a lot of support for Albertans today. We’ve talked in this place about the importance for this government to provide support for Alberta families, and certainly back in March the government did announce natural gas rebates and, following that, announced there would be electricity rebates as well. But here we are 100 days after that announcement, and the government has not provided the support to Alberta families who are experiencing high costs over the past several months and instead have passed legislation that will allow for a very small rebate, $50 per month – $150 total – that might be delivered by December. In the case of the natural gas rebate: October, at the earliest.

We’re in a situation where the government keeps layering on costs, and even during the debate on Bill 22, the electricity statutes amendment act, not only did they not accept an amendment that would have ensured additional costs were not layered onto Alberta families; very specifically, they did not speak to that amendment and are proceeding apace with this piece of legislation. Now, that does not change my support for it, but it certainly adds to my disappointment when it comes to dealing with this UCP government. The associate minister of natural gas is certainly known as a colourful individual, very passionate about what he does in this place, and he has certainly been very direct in why he believes costs have increased. But it differs significantly from what the experts have said and from what researchers at the universities have said.

Now, to be clear, in the articles that have been published around profits being the largest factor on record for high power prices, there’s certainly an acknowledgement that there were lower power prices across the last few years, but today for the families, when I’m knocking on doors in Mill Woods, it’s an incredibly stressful time and an incredibly expensive time. We know that there are hundreds of thousands of Albertans who are within $200 of not been able to make their bills. We know that there are families that are being forced into very tough decisions because it is so difficult to make ends meet and to stretch every dollar.

Today we are talking about the importance of modernizing our electricity grid, but at the same time, when we’re looking at an electricity statute here at third reading, I have to reflect that it’s unfortunate that it does not do more to support Alberta families. In fact, although the minister says it should eventually bring down electricity costs in the short term, it could also add administrative fees to Alberta families. The government chose not to respond to the Official Opposition’s amendment and to speak to how that would be managed. If our amendment was not necessary, they did not describe why, so I’m left with concerns that this will, even in the short term, add additional costs to Alberta families at a time when they can least afford it.

Now, a big part of why this legislation is necessary is, of course, the decarbonization that is happening in our utilities right now. In response to what we’re seeing when it comes to climate change and its impacts, the ability to really take full advantage of renewable electricity, both in the cost savings that it will provide, not only to individual families but to companies and to Alberta as a whole, as well as the opportunity for job creation, I think, is really important to reflect on in the debate. I had the chance to review some of the comments from the Member for Lethbridge-West and the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, who really spoke to some of those opportunities and those benefits that this bill is helping us to take advantage of. So I'm very pleased to be able to rise and reflect again on . . . [Ms Gray's speaking time expired]

Oh, thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on Bill 22? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm really pleased to rise and debate this afternoon, actually nearing noon, on Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022. In the spirit of the bill one would have expected to see a real recognition of the transition period that we're in with respect to energy, not only in Alberta but globally.

Of course, in the lifetime that I've lived and, of course, in the lifetime of the perhaps parents or grandparents of hon. members throughout this Legislature, we've seen a historic transition from different energy sources from one to another which have been phased in over time but certainly resulted in massive changes to how we operate our society and how industry operates. I'm speaking, of course, about the transition originally from wood-burning sources of fuel to, ultimately, coal. I know that my own baba had a wood-burning stove. That was her source of heat and cooking in the house. I visited that house as a child, and that was it, a wood-burning stove. That was her source of heat, using wood.

Coal, of course, was something that came afterwards. We had an abundance of coal in this province. We still do, but we recognize there are health concerns with continuing to burn it. Those deposits were found close to the village of Thorhild, actually, where I spent some of my early years. I remember making sure that the coal never got wet because, of course, wet coal will heat and perhaps burn your house down. When the coal delivery happened and I helped my grandfather shovel that coal, because they had a coal-burning furnace, we made certain that there was no water coming in the chute that we shovelled the coal to.

It was a major shift in transition from coal to natural gas when that furnace was converted to natural gas – actually, no; to propane, Madam Speaker. The propane tanks proliferated throughout the province of Alberta. People transitioned away from coal for home heating to propane, and then that succession, of course, became natural gas afterwards to replace the propane in most instances when gas lines were brought throughout the province.

So in our lifetime, Madam Speaker, we have seen – in my lifetime and in the lifetimes of the grandparents and parents of members who are younger in this House, we've seen a major, major transition, and we're undergoing another transition now in terms of our energy sources. There are many new sources of energy being contemplated to move away from the petroleum-based sources of energy production that we have relied upon for over a hundred years, and that's, of course, due to global warming and greenhouse gas production that results from burning fossil fuels.

Now, in bringing forward a piece of legislation, Madam Speaker, that is purportedly modernizing Alberta's electricity grid, as is postulated in the title of the legislation, one would have expected that we would have seen some recognition of this transition and some realization that there are some risks that we are facing with respect to the electricity grid, where we have brought in changes with this bill to assist the grid to accommodate battery power or battery storage, whether it be hydro pumping or other means of battery storage of power. That's certainly one element of the recognition that needs to be made of the new technology and the new movement away from fossil fuel consumption, but it also has a total silence – and this is a shocking silence to me – on the risk of a cyberattack to our grid.

There's nothing in this legislation. I scanned the bill itself. I couldn't find anything that speaks to the risks that electricity grids, not only in Alberta, Madam Speaker, but globally, face as a result of cyberattack. It was not long ago that in the United States, in the infrastructure which moved gasoline from Texas to New York state, a major pipeline was shut down by a malware attack, a cyberattack that caused a shortage of gasoline in the United States. It was a huge, huge issue of concern, and it really exposed the vulnerability that major infrastructure has to the Internet and cyberattacks that might be sourced from there.

I don't believe, based on this legislation that's before us, Madam Speaker, that the government is paying enough attention to the risk of cyberattack, and it can come from not only a malware attack or an Internet attack from a criminal element or a country that has got bad intentions, but it also may come from what's called the Internet of Things. That is something that we are all more and more aware of because everything from your fridge to your stove to, of course, your vehicles are becoming smart. They, of course, require components that are produced around the world; namely, chips, computer chips that don't necessarily have the manufacturing oversight that one would hope they would have and can be potentially embedded with malware software that will trigger on command from the vehicles or the appliances that they are part of, that they're components within.

I did attend an Internet webinar about this topic, and it was hosted by some eminent scientists in the field. They were bringing forward their concerns about this risk, and I think it's something we have to be aware of, Madam Speaker, that when we're considering the modernization of our electricity grid, we really, really pay attention to the risk from cyberattack that might exist and not only that; the risk from components that may be mass-produced in other countries that are not friendly, necessarily, and pose a risk to the electricity grid in, for example, electric vehicles. That's something that we need to be aware of because they do draw a fair bit of electricity, much more than your, you know, television or your fridge might do at home. If indeed a co-ordinated attack could be made to trigger the components, the software that's embedded in some of the chips in electric vehicles, it could potentially cause a surge in demand, a false surge in demand, or perhaps a shutdown of elements of the grid. That was a very, very informative webinar that I attended.

I wanted to bring it to the attention of the House and the public to have people investigate a bit more fully on their own, to ensure that they put pressure on the government to be very aware of and take steps, when modernizing the electricity grid, when changing the legislation and regulations around the governance of the electricity grid and taking into account the responsibilities that we want the generators of electricity and the transmitters of electricity to have in protecting that grid from cyberattack, that it be recognized in the legislation. It's not, and I was pretty disappointed and startled to see that, Madam Speaker.

There's no mention of protecting the grid against a cyberattack, and there's evidence around us all over the place that this is something that we have to be cognizant of. The transition that we've gone through is more and more technologically advanced, you know, from the burning of wood to coal to petroleum, now to green energy, electrical solar panels. All of these things are more vulnerable to cyberattack because they are actually exposed to the Internet, and that potential meltdown of our grid is something that even the Auditor General mentioned in 2017 in a report saying that more attention had to be paid to cybersecurity in our electrical grid. So I think it's incumbent upon us to make sure that we do pay attention to this risk and make sure that our grid isn't vulnerable to that threat.

Another element that I wanted to mention. In debate a day or two ago in this House, Madam Speaker, I spoke about and made comments about the phase-out of coal for electrical generation in this province. I commented that, of course, it was something that was done to actually save lives, and it actually did save lives. As early as 2013 there were reports talking about the health impact of the burning of coal in Alberta. It's a report that was put out by I believe it was the Pembina Institute, and it estimated back then, in 2013, that the health impact costs associated with burning coal for electricity in Alberta are close to $300 million annually. It was actually a report released by a coalition of Canadian health and environmental groups, not the Pembina Institute.

Now, I'll table this later on, but it's a major source of information for those members opposite who were laughing and guffawing when I mentioned that phasing out coal was a health issue and was going to save lives. That is something that they should read. It goes on to say in this report:

"Pollution from coal power contributes to thousands of asthma episodes every year," says Dr. Robert Oliphant, President and CEO of the Asthma Society of Canada. "On average in Alberta, a child visits an emergency department for asthma every 34 minutes, with pollution from coal power being a major contributor to these episodes."

Madam Speaker, when I speak about phasing out coal as a positive for the health of Albertans, I wasn't doing so to elicit laughter from the other side of the House; I was doing so to bring forward facts that are hard and true. We are seeing and we have seen a reduction in health impacts in Alberta, particularly to those asthma sufferers, and also a reduction in deaths since the reduction and phase-out of coal. It was pretty disappointing for me to hear the smirks and laughter of members of the government caucus when I talked about coal being something that is a health danger. It's well recognized, so I think we should be cognizant of that.

When we're looking at transforming our grid and modernizing our electricity grid, the phasing out of coal in a way where workers are protected and we transition to natural gas, which has at least a 50 per cent less harmful impact in terms of production of greenhouse gases and particulate matter, is a good thing for the health of Albertans as well as modernizing the grid to be less reliant on coal, that is creating a global problem, with greenhouse gases producing global warming.

Those two things are elements I wanted to bring to the debate that I haven't heard people speak about before. The risk to the electricity grid from cyberattack, that this piece of legislation is absolutely silent on, is a very unfortunate and perhaps ill-conceived omission by the government, that I'm hoping we don't regret.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

[Motion carried; Bill 22 read a third time]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to all members of the House for their robust debate. At this point in time I'd like to move that the House be adjourned until 1:30 p.m. today.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:49 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, May 12, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, we will be led in the singing of God Save the Queen by Nicole Williams.

Hon. Members:

God save our gracious Queen,
Long live our noble Queen,
God save the Queen!
Send her victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us,
God save the Queen!

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, we do have a number of guests, as you can well see. I hope to be able to get through the introductions in a prompt and reasonable manner.

Members, seated in the Speaker's gallery today is one of the families of our retiring pages, Grace Hlibka, who's in grade 11. She's a student hoping to pursue a career in medicine. Seated in the Speaker's gallery are her parents, Laura Hlibka and James Hlibka, along with her grandparents, aunts, and cousins. I would invite you all to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Hon. members, today, as you know, it's a great pleasure of mine to introduce to the Assembly an important group of individuals who play a key role in our democratic process in the province of Alberta. Our constituency staff are often the first point of contact for the people and the communities that we serve. Their jobs can be very rewarding, but they can also be very demanding and difficult depending on if you're the MLA for Calgary-Currie. It didn't really say that, but I thought I would take the opportunity to encourage my friend the Member for Calgary-Currie.

They are here participating in the spring constituency employee learning and development seminar, which is developed each year to help them with their unique roles and requirements in their service. The seminar provides them with an opportunity to network with each other, obtain an overview of numerous programs and services available through the Legislative Assembly Office, and over the lunch hour we had the opportunity to recognize the contributions of these individuals and sincerely thank them for their service to the province of Alberta.

I would like to point out specifically two constituency staff who are here celebrating 25 years of front-line service to this province. I would ask Darlynn Linn from Calgary-Lougheed and Angela Wolgen-Strojwas from Taber-Warner to rise along with the remainder of the 60 constituency office employees to receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. [Standing ovation]

Members, we have a number of other guests in our galleries today that I would like to welcome, but I ask that you hold your applause until the end of the introductions, and I would invite all guests that I introduce to feel free to rise as I introduce you.

First off, seated in the galleries today are special guests of the Member for Livingstone-Macleod. Please welcome Jay, Brady, and Brianna Maull.

Also joining us today is the cousin of the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung, Ron Goble.

We also have 20 guests of the Member for Peace River who are attending the March for Life rally today.

Finally, I'm pleased to introduce students and staff of Spring Glen junior high school from the Cardston-Siksika constituency. If you haven't already done so, I invite you to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Nurses

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, as we celebrate National Nursing Week and we take time to stop and show our appreciation for the nurses in our province and in our country, I want to acknowledge that today is a particularly special day as International Nurses Day. The Canadian Nurses Association's theme for this year is We Answer the Call to showcase the many roles that nurses play in patient health care journeys.

Alberta nurses have gone above and beyond answering the call during the last few years while this government has thrown our health care system into chaos with their war on health care workers and the mishandling of the pandemic. But nurses kept showing up to take care of us despite the burnout, despite the exhaustion, despite the workload, despite this government's choices. Even when this government attacked their wages, their unions, even their overtime and paid sick days, nurses kept showing up. I'm in awe of the dedication of Alberta nurses and know that myself and my colleagues will continue to work hard towards a fair deal for some of our hardest working people.

United Nurses of Alberta's 30,000 members have made it clear that the UCP government must acknowledge that there is a crisis, a shortage of nurses, that requires real action, that requires measures to retain the nurses we have now and to recruit and educate new ones. An NDP government would ensure that nurses and health care workers have fair wages, paid sick days, mental health supports, and, more importantly, nurses and health care workers will be able to trust that an NDP government will support them and won't attack their basic working rights.

Nurses have been answering the call over the last three years, and I know that they're tired of the working environment this government continuously tries to make worse for them. I'm tired of it, too. So to all the nurses today and this week: we hear you, we see you, we thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat has a statement to make.

Federal Firearms Policies

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Justin Trudeau is at it again. Yesterday his Liberals introduced new rules on the sale and transfer of nonrestricted firearms. We know that this will do absolutely nothing to reduce gun crime and simply represents another intrusion into the lives of law-abiding citizens. This is nothing more than a backdoor gun registry that they did not campaign on and nobody voted for, a registry that Stephen Harper and the Conservative government proudly abolished. On May 18 the Justin-Jagmeet bromance will impose new rules on the sale of otherwise legal firearms that require businesses and individual sellers to wade through countless red tape and needless regulation.

Let's be clear. Sufficient rules already exist to govern the sale of nonrestricted firearms. They already require a seller to verify that a buyer is legally authorized to own a gun by checking that the recipient has a PAL.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta's government has repeatedly called on the federal government to abandon their nonsensical backdoor firearms registry. Justin Trudeau should be focused on implementing stronger border measures to cut off illegal gun smuggling at the source. He should bring back mandatory minimums for offences related to firearms trafficking and crime with a firearm, but what is he doing? He is making criminals out of law-abiding families: hunters, ranchers, sport shooters, and collectors. That's what.

Alberta's government will ensure a practical and balanced approach when it comes to firearms ownership that protects our communities from criminals, smugglers, and gangsters while upholding the rights of law-abiding Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, Justin Trudeau's rules have been implemented with almost zero consultation of law-abiding firearms owners. I repeat: instead of targeting real offenders like gun smugglers and gangsters, Justin Trudeau will be making criminals out of otherwise upstanding, responsible people. Conservatives and common-sense Albertans know that law-abiding farmers, ranchers, families, hunters, and sport shooters are not the problem; Justin Trudeau and his Liberal government are.

Social Supports and Assisted Dying

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, ask yourself: how should we in government respond to men, women, and now increasingly children who live in destitution? Do we offer choices that only end in despair or worse?

During the pandemic a Maclean's article reported on an Ontarian woman with multiple nonterminal disabilities who lived on the edge of poverty. Frequenting food banks to be fed, Susan's story is one that should make every heart in our Chamber sink: "I have no other reason to want to apply for assisted suicide, other than I simply cannot afford to keep on living." Susan was poor, Mr. Speaker, and for that she died.

In another CTV article from April this year we hear from Sophia, with a sensitivity disability: "The government sees me as expendable trash, [as] a complainer, [as a] useless . . . pain in the ass." Eight days later Sophia died, her life taken in large part because she was poor and had a sensitivity to cigarette smoke and chemical cleaners.

An Ontario man named Chris with a serious, nonterminal disability also committed suicide. Here his brother is describing his care home: "There was urine on the floor, there were spots where there was feces on the floor . . . if you stood at his bedside and when you went to walk away, your foot . . . literally stuck." When Chris was 35, he took his own life with the help of the government. His brother believes he died because of the squalor in which he lived.

Assisted suicide and euthanasia are on the rise in Canada. The Parliamentary Budget Officer has reported that Canada has found a net savings of $87 million due to our state-sponsored suicide program before Trudeau's Bill C-7. After that bill, when death need not be reasonably foreseeable, savings increased another $62 million. Parliamentarians are now looking at expanding our suicide program to include mature minors, Mr. Speaker. I'm sure the savings will increase.

Mr. Speaker, ask yourself again: how should we in government respond to men and women and increasingly, unfortunately, now children who live in destitution? Do we offer choices that only end in despair or worse?

Diabetes Management Coverage

Mr. Nielsen: It is estimated that there are over 200,000 Albertans living with diabetes right now. One of them is my daughter. She was diagnosed at the age of six, so I understand the challenges that people with diabetes face. Many of these can be managed with the use of a simple piece of technology: the insulin pump.

I've heard from countless diabetic Albertans about how this revolutionary piece of technology has given them their lives back. Students are able to go to school with confidence that they don't need to worry about insulin or needing to take a shot. The insulin pump has become for many a fact of life, something that they depend on, so naturally when this government imposed a change with no warning, no details, no consultation, and no regard for the lives of diabetics and their families, there was great concern. Albertans have come to expect this from this government. There is no concern for what this might do to them.

Our caucus has received messages from all corners of the province scared about this change and what it might mean for them or their loved one. The government isn't interested in getting them answers, though. In fact, as we learned this week, at least one member of the UCP cabinet thinks the concerns of Albertans are laugh-out-loud funny. Shameful, Mr. Speaker, but this is typical behaviour from this government, who is better at picking fights than they are at delivering services.

This government went to war with doctors, and it resulted in the health care crisis we are seeing in our emergency rooms and communities around Alberta. This government tried to sell parks from underneath Albertans without any warning. This government tried to tear down the eastern slopes in secret, and this government should never have messed with the essential medical supplies that thousands upon thousands of Albertans rely upon to live their lives.

Albertans need a government that works for them, not who works against them, who picks fights with them, who tries to hide from them. Mr. Speaker, the Alberta NDP is ready to be that government.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein is next.

Civil Society Social Service Providers

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Sandwiches are beautiful,

Sandwiches are fine.

I like sandwiches, I eat them all the time.

Recently I had the privilege of taking a tour of Sonshine Community Services. They provide a safe zone for women and their children to escape abusive relationships, and its mission statement says in part: "help women and children transform their lives." Their emphasis on keeping families together during this difficult time is so important, and their intentional inclusion of the broader community in the solution is what will be needed to tackle the challenge of domestic violence.

I thoroughly enjoyed meeting with some of the children and singing one of my favourite songs about sandwiches. After seeing one of the suites, their child care facilities, and meeting with the staff, I came away impressed. Sonshine also offers child care and community counselling.

Mr. Speaker, in March I had the privilege of meeting with representatives of Ruth's House as well. Ruth's House is a safe haven for people in the African community needing to escape domestic violence. This organization focuses on educating other civil society groups as well as prevention and intervention. It warms my heart to see various groups working together to make our communities a safer and happier place for everyone, regardless of someone's background.

Another great civil society organization I've had the chance to meet with recently is Sagesse Domestic Violence Prevention Society. Its goal is to create a space for connections, creativity, and ideas regardless of our individual beliefs and ideals. It's about showing up and saying what needs to be said even when it's uncomfortable.

Mr. Speaker, something these not-for-profits I mentioned have in common is the acknowledgement that the answers to these complex issues are found in engaging society to build awareness and mobilize resources and that only through broader community involvement can we address complicated and challenging issues like domestic violence. We all have a role. I want all civil society organizations to know that you have my constant admiration and support. I will advocate on your behalf in this government.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Education Funding and Curriculum Redesign

Mr. Deol: Mr. Speaker, for the past three years I have had the distinct privilege of representing the people of Edmonton-Meadows in this Assembly. I have the honour of attending the grand opening of Thelma Chalifoux school tonight. This school will serve 900 students and was funded and built by the NDP government, that put value in public education and invested to ensure that no matter where in the province you live, quality education would be available. The NDP funded and built hundreds of schools and ensured students and teachers were supported, but sadly while the NDP government lived up to its commitments to public education, the UCP has not.

The UCP has failed to fund new schools that Edmonton needs, leaving one of the largest boards with no schools despite badly needing them. UCP cuts to education funding mean that in Edmonton this year alone there will be 1,700 public school students who are not funded. The UCP plans have meant that there will be a thousand fewer teachers in classrooms since they have taken office. The Education minister fired 20,000 Edmonton workers and made the claim that they weren't working. Despite universal opposition the UCP insisted on forcing its discredited, garbage-pile curriculum into classrooms. Teachers, principals, school boards, parents, the francophone communities, and racialized Albertans oppose it, but still the Premier and the minister proceed, ignoring the feedback they hear. Members of the government even attacked teachers by claiming that their input was not needed to develop a good curriculum.

As I join my community in celebrating a new school that the NDP delivered, I will celebrate as part of a team that defends and stands up for public education. Albertans know which party they can trust with protecting public education in Alberta. It is not the UCP.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Surgical Wait Time Initiative

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Surgical wait times are an extreme concern for all Albertans. I'm sure that all of us can agree that the thought of having to wait months for a surgery is chilling. Alberta has had some of the highest surgical wait times in Canada, which increased every year from 2014 to 2020. During the past two years these wait times have continued to be a problem, which is worrisome for so many Albertans, but unlike the opposition across the aisle, this government has been committed to making changes that will actually reduce these wait times.

The Alberta surgical wait time initiative is a plan to lower wait times so that all Albertans receive surgeries within clinically appropriate timelines. To do this, we are investing $133 million over three years to upgrade and expand surgical operating rooms. As Alberta has done since the 1990s, we're going to continue to work with chartered surgical facilities to increase access to these much-needed surgeries. So far, Mr. Speaker, this has been working. For cataracts we expanded our capacity by working with chartered surgical facilities to provide 10,000 cataract surgeries in Edmonton, and in Calgary we will have 15,000. By utilizing these clinics, we are reducing wait times and making sure that Albertans get the care they deserve. In the first three quarters of the fiscal year we had an average wait time of 10 weeks for cataract surgeries, the shortest it's been since 2015.

So, Mr. Speaker, don't let the NDP fool you. They keep claiming their number one priority is Albertans, but when they were in power, wait times for the same procedures were extremely high at 17 weeks. Let's face it. Their union friends would have never allowed them to find solutions that actually work for Albertans because they only find solutions that work for their union bosses. I'm proud to be a part of a government that is taking real action to ensure Albertans get the surgeries they need when they need them.

The Speaker: Hon. members, if I could beg the indulgence of the Assembly for just one brief moment. I just realized and noticed that former member Scott Cyr and his mother have joined us in the gallery today, and I neglected to introduce them. I hope that you'll rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has question 1.

Utility Rebate Timeline

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, Albertans facing sky-high natural gas bills are waiting for help from this Premier, waiting and waiting and waiting. The Premier announced this rebate for Albertans on February 1. It's been a hundred days, and Albertans still have no idea when it will arrive. Albertans don't want spin. They don't want UCP rhetoric. They don't want excuses. They want a cheque, and they want to know when it's coming. Will the Premier rise in this House today and tell Albertans what date the rebate is finally coming?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, thankfully, despite NDP obstruction and delays, we got the legislation passed. It is now law, and the minister is working with the utility companies, some 40 electricity retailers, to get that rebate on to people's bills as soon as possible; we hope in the weeks to come. Let's be clear about this. The NDP tried to stop that bill. They refused to allow us to fast-track it. The real issue is that they are cheering on Justin Trudeau's effort to quadruple the carbon tax to make life even more expensive for Albertans.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, Albertans have gotten no answer from this government for a hundred days and counting. A recent survey shows half of Alberta households are just $200 away from not being able to make ends meet. Instead of rushing to help, the UCP are ragging the puck on these rebates. In April the Premier suggested that he would speed it up and get these to families sooner than the fall, but he must've changed his mind because the regulations still say October. Why did the Premier flip-flop? Why is he so slow?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, Alberta's government has taken unprecedented action to help Albertans cope with the rising cost of living, a cost of living that is rising in large part because of the NDP-Liberal carbon tax grab. Through our immediate April 1 pause of the Alberta fuel tax, that represents a $1.3 billion annual savings. The electricity rebate plus the forthcoming natural gas cap: all of that together represents $2 billion in consumer relief, more than any other government by a country mile.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, when the insurance lobby wants to jack up their fees, the Premier says, "No problem," and he rushes to make it happen. In fact, it took the Premier only two days to put $4.7 billion into the bank accounts of large profitable corporations – two days – but Albertans get a hundred days of excuses when it comes to their bank accounts. Is the Premier beginning to understand why Albertans can't trust him?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, do you hear the sound of socialism from the other side? A tax cut they characterize as putting money into someone's bank account, when what we're doing is not taking it away from them. They crushed employers, job creators, and Albertans with a huge increase in the business tax rate, in the personal income tax rate, with their carbon tax hike. They drove us into four years of an economic tailspin from which we are only now recovering as we lead Canada in economic growth and job creation.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora for the second set of questions.

Private School Financial Reporting

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, every day it becomes more clear that Albertans cannot trust the UCP with public education. Just look at the confusion among the cabinet when it comes to Bill 21. The associate minister responsible for the bill and the Education minister can't even agree on what the bill does. Will the Premier, the guy who's ultimately responsible, tell Albertans why his associate minister of red tape thinks that private schools should be allowed to charge whatever they want for tuition and not even tell the Alberta public?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. The items that are in the red tape reduction bill – that is, Bill 21 – really just simplify the process. The information is going to be provided to us, has always been provided to us through the audited financial statements. The member opposite is just trying to confuse the public.

Ms Hoffman: I'm just telling the minister what her colleague the other minister told everybody in Alberta. The Education minister, I guess, says that the associate minister of red tape is wrong.

Mr. Speaker, because public education and private education are all funded by the taxpayers of Alberta, we will be proposing an amendment to ensure that the UCP can't hide how much money private schools are charging. The minister says that they'll still have to tell her; they should have to tell the public. Will the Premier take a stand for transparency and accountability for once and promise Albertans that this information will be disclosed?

Mr. Kenney: Yes. Mr. Speaker, as the minister just said, of course, this information is available through the audited financial statements. But the real reason the NDP is upset is because they hate Alberta's tradition of school choice. They believe that bureaucrats and politicians should make decisions about kids' education rather than parents and families. We fundamentally disagree. The NDP voted against the Choice in Education Act, 2020, that recognized for the first time in Canadian law that parents have a human right to decide how best to educate their kids.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, every child in Alberta deserves a high-quality education, reasonable class sizes, and a quality curriculum. This is important because right now the UCP is cutting public education, hiking school fees, and forcing a backwards curriculum on Alberta students. At the same time they want to hide how much taxpayers are forced to subsidize some wealthy private schools, some that are already flush with cash. Will the Premier stand up to the red tape minister and admit that Alberta taxpayers have a right to know how much schools are charging in tuition?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, again the member opposite shows that she does not understand independent schools. They only get 70 per cent funding. They get zero per cent for capital. While they have over 6 per cent of the population, they only get 4 per cent of the funding. In fact, the average taxpayer is saving money because students are in independent schools.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Diabetes Management Coverage

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, only moments ago we heard the Health minister announce that the UCP will be suspending their changes to the insulin pump therapy program. This comes after days of the UCP ignoring the voices of Albertans who spoke out against this policy. We stood with Albertans like six-year-old Conor, who was worried about losing the pump that allows him to go safely to school without worrying about his diabetes. Albertans like Conor deserve an apology for the chaos and fear this government created. Will the Premier offer a full, unreserved apology to the thousands of Albertans with diabetes, like six-year-old Conor, who were belittled and ignored by his government?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'd like to thank the hon. member for the question. As I indicated to the media earlier today, we are doing a pause on our program. I want to apologize to Albertans due to the confusion, because there are a lot of questions that we actually hadn't answered yet. We're stopping the changes to the program right now. We're going to reach out to Albertans and do a series of town halls and reach out to all individuals involved in the insulin program. There are 4,000. We're going to make sure no one is going to be left behind. The intent behind this was to be able to expand access, and we're going to make sure that we're going to live up to the intent.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for the apology. You know, this government clearly did not consult as they plowed ahead with this plan that would seriously impact the lives of diabetics. It does not seem that a single diabetic was consulted, not a single organization. This government tried to move fast, and they got caught when Albertans got furious. Now they need to do better. While this policy is suspended, Albertans are understandably wary and want to be sure that government is not going to try to do the same thing again. Will the minister lay out today the details of what consultations he's going to hold? Will he commit that this policy won't move forward until every concern from the community is addressed?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, we did do consultations beforehand. There was a clinical advisory committee in regard to the insulin pump program, but, evidently, given the concerns that were raised by some of my caucus colleagues, by the members across the aisle, and that I heard directly from Albertans who rely on the program themselves, we didn't do enough. Again I would like to apologize for that. We actually are going to be reaching out. We're going to be holding a town hall. We're going to be reaching out to each and every individual person in the program to understand what impact this has on them. Again, we'll make changes as necessary to ensure that no one gets left behind.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, the minister said that they had details they hadn't released yet. I can't understand why this government keeps creating chaos in our health care system since they took office, with these lines outside of children's hospitals, thousands in southern Alberta with no family doctor. This simply does not help. But Diabetes Canada had also put out a letter today calling on the minister, noting that this program could put people in the position of having to choose between an insulin pump, rent, or food. To the minister: will he commit that his rewrite of this program will not put a single person in a position where they are unable to afford an insulin pump?

2:00

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, yes, we are going to ensure that we can protect those who need this, because there shouldn't be a choice between being able to manage this chronic disease and then putting food on the table. We are going to ensure, as we work through this policy program and the changes, that we understand where people have – you know, the vast majority already are in plans that actually can cover some of this, but there are some who are not. We need to identify those and make sure that no one is left behind. I did speak with Diabetes Canada earlier today to be involved in the ongoing consultation. I invited them, and I'm looking forward to speaking with them.

Homeless Supports and Affordable Housing

Ms Sigurdson: The city of Edmonton expects the number of people sleeping outside without support will continue to increase. Currently there are an estimated 800 people sleeping outside on any given night. This number will skyrocket once the pandemic emergency shelters close at the end of this month. The Premier has cut housing supports by more than 15 per cent and callously forced more Albertans onto the streets. To the Premier. We're in the middle of a cost-of-living crisis. There are more people facing homelessness because of this crisis. Why is the UCP cutting critical housing supports when so many Albertans have nowhere to go?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Of course, this government is committed to a recovery-oriented system of care to help all Albertans and to work with multiple ministries. The Alberta government is maintaining funding for homeless shelters, nearly $49 million, ensuring that those who require emergency shelter have a safe place to stay. We provide nearly $90 million to community-based organizations in Alberta, seven major cities, to fund a range of supports, including supportive housing, intensive care management, and rapid rehousing. This government is committed to that recovery-oriented system of care in helping Albertans.

Ms Sigurdson: This Premier failed to help Alberta's most vulnerable. As a result, the city of Edmonton is forced to spend $860,000 to hire seven more park rangers, 14 more cleanup crew, and nine more housing and outreach workers to address the anticipated surge in homeless camps due to the emergency shelter bed closures. This is not a solution. Tearing down their tent and breaking up an encampment doesn't create a bed for them to sleep in. Does the Premier understand that forcing the city of Edmonton to clear out the homeless encampments from around the sky palace is not a feasible housing strategy?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, of course, housing is an integral part of the recovery-oriented system of care. Ensuring that people have access to housing is extremely important but also ensuring that people have access to mental health and addictions support. That's why we've created the 8,000 spaces; 8,000 people are getting help that didn't get help under the previous government. That is so important to understand, and we're committing to helping people who are vulnerable on the streets of Edmonton.

Ms Sigurdson: Addressing homelessness is not only a social issue but an economic one. Chambers of commerce are calling on the UCP to take action. When addressing the Edmonton Chamber, Mayor Sohi stated: "Edmonton deserves a fair deal. [Please] work with us... Please stop holding Edmonton's economy back." Instead of working with the city of Edmonton, the Premier ignored their funding requests for permanent supportive housing and left hundreds of millions of dollars from the federal government on the table. To the Premier. Economic recovery needs to be for everyone. Will he commit here and now to work with the city of Edmonton to prevent the surge of homeless camps?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, thank you to the member for the question. You know, over COVID this government had committed to over $100 million during that particular time. Shelters, especially in Edmonton, are at 52 per cent. This government is committed, again, to helping people with mental health and addictions problems. We are committing to helping the most vulnerable, and I am proud of the work that our Premier has done. I am proud of the work that the minister of social services has done and that he continues to do.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross is next.

Technology Industry Development

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Technology and innovation continue to be a key focus in Alberta as the sector gains momentum and expands in record numbers. Recently we heard about Calgary-based Neo Financial, who raised $185 million in their most recent fundraising round and are now part of the one-billion-dollar-valuation club. But we know it's not just companies in the big cities who are developing innovation to help solve provincial, national, and international problems. To the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation: what supports are available for tech companies and start-ups outside of Edmonton and Calgary?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, Alberta's economy is firing on all cylinders. Our unemployment rate is at 5.9 per cent, a level we haven't seen in this province since 2015. That being said, we can't stop there. We're going to support entrepreneurs around the province, corner to corner. Our regional innovation networks in partnership with Alberta Innovates are going to be there as a pipeline of mentorship to help innovators take their ideas and make sure that they can have the tangible supports they need to turn it into a business plan and commercialize those opportunities.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given the importance of supporting Alberta's tech sector throughout the province in all industries, from agriculture to health care and everything in between, and given that there have been numerous investments made by this government through Alberta Innovates to support innovators and entrepreneurs through regional innovation networks, to the minister: what services do these networks provide, and how can Albertans benefit from them?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, right now in Alberta we're seeing a tech renaissance that's happening. Just a few years ago we only had 1,200 tech companies. Now we have over 3,000 tech companies in this province, and the amount of capital that they're raising is growing exponentially. We've broken our record each of the last three years. Now, we're going to support entrepreneurs in every corner of this province by making sure we're there at the early stage, mid-stage, and the later stage of mentorship. These companies can grow from a handful of employees one day to making sure that they're a billion-dollar company with 500-plus employees to a thousand employees. That's the support that we're going to be there with. We're going to have a bright future in this province and a more diversified economy.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given the growth that we are seeing in Alberta's tech and innovation sector, especially in our big cities but also growing in communities thanks to our investments like the one just spoken about, and given the need to find more talent to fill a growing number of these tech positions, can the minister tell us what work is being done to develop and attract more individuals to fill these roles?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, do you remember those years under the NDP, when Albertans fled and their Energy minister told Albertans to go to another province to get a job? It's bright times in Alberta. We're seeing migration of thousands and thousands of Canadians moving to Alberta for high-paying jobs and an affordable way of life. [interjections] The NDP are heckling because they don't like that. They don't like the fact that Alberta is back and stronger than ever. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Disability Service Provider Funding

Ms Renaud: The Alberta Council of Disability Services launched a campaign called the Perfect Storm. Disability workers are the people that support developmentally disabled Albertans to live in their communities and take advantage of inclusive employment. Alberta's disability workers are chronically underpaid. With inflation at a 30-year high and the average hourly wage at $18.76 an hour disability workers are leaving the sector in droves or having to get multiple jobs to feed their families. There is a documented crisis in this sector right now. They need an increase to their wages. Will the Minister of Finance deliver this increase?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Certainly, on behalf of the minister of social services this government values the dedication that disability service workers have and have shown throughout the pandemic in caring for the most vulnerable Albertans. Last year Community and Social Services expanded the critical worker benefit to all community disability service workers, the funding through the family support for children with disabilities and persons with developmental disabilities. To date we have distributed over $16 million to over 13,000 workers.

Ms Renaud: Given that the majority of responding community disability organizations are reporting increased costs related to insurance, utilities, employee benefits, IT, accounting, auditing, fees, staff training and recruitment, maintenance, property tax, rent, and more and given that 61 per cent of reporting organizations are facing these financial pressures and given that the increasing financial pressure on these organizations may result in the rationing of supports or increased costs for disabled Albertans, does the Premier prefer that disabled Albertans face even higher costs or fewer services? Will he respond to the crisis or let someone just spew written notes?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, thank you. The ministry is working with the disability services sector and the partnering ministries, of course, to improve attraction and retention within the sector. We've provided a grant to the Alberta Council of Disability Services to collect and analyze data. The ministry is committing to helping people in this sector. [interjections]

Thank you.

The Speaker: Order.

2:10

Ms Renaud: Given that this side needs way better notes and given that the Alberta Council of Disability Services has unequivocally stated that Alberta's community disability service sector is in an untenable situation right now as a result of consecutive years of stagnant funding, soaring inflation, and extreme pandemic pressure and given that community disability workers are leaving the sector due to fatigue or the inability to support . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. The hon. Member for St. Albert has the opportunity to ask the question without conversations happening around her.

You can go back a couple of seconds if you want. You have about 10 seconds remaining.

Ms Renaud: Given that I'm incredibly disappointed that this government is unable to put someone up that actually has some information to offer the community disability sector, will the Premier or the Finance minister answer the question that these service providers are asking?

Mr. Ellis: Well, Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for the question. You know, it's a little rich here for the NDP to especially talk about notes when they are in fact reading notes. I will ensure that the member from the ministry of social services is certainly aware of this issue. He is working very hard to rectify any of the issues within this department. I'm proud of the work that he's doing and that he's going to continue to do.

Ambulance Response Times

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, EMS is in crisis in this province, and the government is not listening to workers. Last month we sat down with Canmore-based advanced care paramedic Kristin Buck, who said that the town has gone from having to shut down an ambulance three times in 2019 to 32 times in 2021. There were 133 Albertans who saw a delayed response within the town of Canmore last year, and yesterday, when asked about these issues, the acting minister claimed this was all normal. To the minister: do 32 ambulance shutdowns in one Alberta town sound normal to him?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. This is an important issue. Our system, our health care system, is facing pressures, including our EMS system. This problem has come to light. There's an increase of 30 per cent in calls, but we are taking action to address this. In Budget 2022 we put in an additional $64 million. That's to add new ambulances, to hire new staff. AHS announced a 10-point plan to address some of these issues. We recognize there's an issue. We are solving it.

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, paramedics and first responders are telling us clearly that this is not normal, and given that Kristin had to file a freedom of information request to get the real facts instead of government spin and given that what she found was that response times are climbing, with more responses over 20 minutes, and given that in March a patient with a heart condition waited 33 minutes for an ambulance, why doesn't the minister stop the excuses, look at the data, listen to Kristin, and take immediate action?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, we are taking action. Earlier this week I was pleased to tour the new integrated operating centre in Calgary. The purpose of this is to be able to smooth out the calls and to direct paramedics to different hospitals within Calgary and the surrounding area. I know this is just one of multiple actions that we need to do to address this issue. A big part of it is hiring more paramedics. We are doing that. We have actually hired several hundred, and we're actually going to hire more. We understand it's an issue, and we are going to correct it.

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, it used to be that Canmore EMS responded to most of their calls inside of Canmore, their own community, but given that last year Canmore EMS responded to more calls outside of Canmore than inside of it and that by not addressing pressures in Calgary, this government is causing stress and suffering in every single community around it and given that this week I talked to a Canmore firefighter who said that when they're first on the scene, they now have to ask from which community the ambulance is coming so they know how long they'll be waiting, will the minister listen to front-line workers, offer casuals full-time contracts, as front-line workers have asked for? We clearly need them. What is the holdup?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, we are listening to front-line workers. We are adding resources and adding more people. We understand that there is an issue. That is the reason why we appointed an advisory committee. My colleagues in this Chamber are actually leading the charge in terms of doing that. They have reached out to do surveys of front-line workers as part of that. I am very much looking forward to hearing their report, which will be coming in the next couple of weeks. We've also asked for some quick hits so that we can address these issues. I'm looking forward to being able to make an announcement of that in the next coming days. We understand there's an issue. We are addressing it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Rural Health Care Professional Recruitment and Retention

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. During the pandemic, understandably, the focus of our health care – doctors, nurses, and specialists – was on the pandemic response and those in critical care. Resources were focused, and the most urgent issues were prioritized. The pandemic highlighted critical system issues and put strain on health care and health workers right across the province. Rural areas in particular continue facing a shortage of physicians, which has left rural Albertans in a vulnerable position. To the Minister of Health: what's being done to attract nurses, doctors, and specialists to rural areas, and what's the plan to ensure they remain working in these areas rather than relocating, leaving these communities short once again?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Staffing outside the two major cities has been an issue for a number of decades. We've been through a global health crisis that has strained health care in every province. We continue to add doctors, nurses, paramedics, and other health care professionals in spite of the pandemic, and we are going to do more. Budget 2022 maintains the most generous incentives for rural doctors in Canada and funds new initiatives to attract doctors and nurses to smaller communities. We know there's added strain on smaller communities, and we're addressing it as we add capacity right across our health care system.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and, through you, to the minister for that answer. Given that a shortage of doctors and nurses has both immediate and long-term effects on families and communities and staff shortages can snowball, exacerbating the problem further, and given that hospitals in many rural areas are currently understaffed, adding additional pressure on those doctors and nurses that choose to remain to carry that additional load, to the same minister: what strategies are being implemented to ensure the retention of new hires, and how will unexpected staff vacancies be avoided in the future? For example, will there be sufficient flex capacity to bridge vacancies without further service reduction to rural Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks again to the hon. member for these important questions. Budget 2022 includes $90 million for rural physician recruitment and retention. It also includes two new initiatives. The RESIDE program will support 60 new doctors in rural or remote communities, and the new rural capacity investment fund will provide $50 million for rural nurses and another $7.5 million for relocation assistance. But we know that we need to do more. We're working with the AMA and with the rural practitioners program to do an assessment of our programs to help make them more effective and working with my colleague in Advanced Education to be able to train more . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again, through you, to the minister. Given that the issue of service in rural communities is not unique to Alberta, with more than 20 per cent of the Canadian population residing in rural areas but only 9.3 per cent of physicians practising in these same areas, and further given that rural communities experience the largest deficit of health care workers consistently and that this is a decades-old problem, again to the Minister of Health: what strategies are being enacted to guarantee improved health care for those working in rural areas, and what's the plan to stabilize the flux of physician supply in these areas, including in the rural hubs like my community of Grande Prairie?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member mentioned, this is an issue not only being faced in Alberta and in rural areas but across the entire country. We are fortunate to see a net gain of 99 physicians in the first quarter of this year compared to last year, but we understand that those gains are not where we necessarily need all the doctors. We know that in smaller communities they had losses, and the pandemic has been hard on family physician practices especially in those communities. We are working with AMA to address the pressure on family doctors as part of the work as we work towards a new agreement, and we will continue to focus on solving this problem in rural Alberta.

Calgary Storm Damage Recovery Funding

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, next month marks the two-year anniversary since the devastating hailstorm hit northeast Calgary, and as I drive through my community, I still see houses with hail damage. The UCP government has done nothing to help these people. The Premier once promised to call his friends in the insurance industry, but those calls appear to have been ignored. Thankfully, the city has stepped up with supports to help Calgarians replace their roofs with stronger ones that can resist future hailstorms. Why has the UCP refused to provide similar support to the people of northeast Calgary?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will acknowledge that the hon. member did go and pose for a picture along with the Leader of the Opposition. Congratulations on that. But while they were posing for that picture, members of ours from northeast Calgary went and have been working with people who had hail damage, working to make sure that the insurance claims that they had were honoured, pushing the insurance companies to honour those claims. That is actually more than the NDP did when there were hailstorms when they were in government. We will continue to faithfully work with people that suffered damage through disasters.

Mr. Sabir: Given that the city has recently ended the hail-resilient roofing rebate program and given that the program was oversubscribed and ran out of money due to its high demand and given that it would cost $5 million to process the remaining applicants, not the made-up $2.5 billion figure the UCP keeps citing, and given that this is just one-sixth of the annual budget of the war room, will the government step up and help the people of northeast Calgary, or will they continue to fund their shameful war room?

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, the NDP has just revealed the way they look at the world. We have a disaster recovery program that is designed to look after uninsured losses, which is what the design is. What the NDP wants to do is pay for everybody's loss in Alberta that hasn't bought insurance, billions of dollars. You know what? They haven't even put any thought into the extent of what they're asking for, putting the government on the hook to pay for every uninsured loss: roofs, homes, automobiles. They just don't have any idea what they're asking for.

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, given that the minister last week announced $744 million in flood mitigation for Calgary and refuses to fund $5 million for hail-resistant roofs in northeast Calgary, why is there a double standard? Why are people in northeast Calgary treated differently, Minister?

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, what the NDP doesn't understand is that there is no double standard. Disaster recovery program is for uninsured losses. The NDP is suggesting that nobody buys insurance and the government replaces every single thing for every single Albertan that's ever lost. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall, you had your opportunity to ask your question. Now I'd like to hear the answer.

Mr. McIver: Now, I appreciate that the hon. member that's asking the question posed for a picture once, and he wants to be thanked for that. Mr. Speaker, instead, he's actually suggesting that we put insurance companies out of business and that the government pays for every single loss that everybody has, no matter what. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Utility Costs and Rebates

Ms Sweet: Mr. Speaker, skyrocketing utility prices are crippling Alberta's rural economy. It's having a detrimental effect on families, businesses, and nonprofits. I'm hearing from people across the province who can't afford their monthly bills. Our economy is still recovering from the devastating effects of the COVID-19 pandemic. The rural Albertans I'm hearing from say that their bills are hundreds of dollars higher now than they were under the NDP government. Will the associate minister of electricity rise in this House and tell rural Albertans specifically what he's going to do to address this crisis today? No more talking points. Let's have some action, Minister.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to invite any of the members of the NDP to come and experience rural Alberta at any time. In fact, the Sundre stampede rodeo is about to happen at the end of the month, and I hope they all come and see what rural Alberta is really about. The Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity and this government are working tirelessly to help with bills and to fix the boondoggle that the NDP made with our electricity system and our heating system in this province. We have rebates coming for both electricity and natural gas, and we have fought against Justin Trudeau's carbon tax, that they supported.

Ms Sweet: Well, given, Mr. Speaker, that utility costs were lower when we were in charge and we took action to ensure they never hammered household budgets the way they are right now and given that the devastating effects of these utility costs have left some rural municipalities to call on the Alberta Utilities Commission to launch an investigation and given that we support any inquiry into why costs are so high, does the minister support the call from the mayors of Taber, Fox Creek, and other municipalities, and will he join them in supporting an investigation into these skyrocketing costs?

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, I love that the NDP talked about when they were in government. When they took government, electricity cost 3 cents. After they were done, they capped it at 6.8, almost triple. Why did it triple? They cut off the cheapest source of electricity. They added a carbon tax. They supported the federal – with these folks across, actually, a stated objective is to have everybody taking the bus because they wouldn't be able to drive. That's actually their goal. Now they're complaining about the cost? They've actually succeeded in making it unaffordable.

Ms Sweet: Well, given that this government continues to do nothing and, again, municipal leaders are asking for an inquiry and given that the Premier promised the natural gas rebate 100 days ago and we still don't know where that is and given that the minister himself represents a rural riding of Morinville-St. Albert, has the minister forgotten the people who put him in that chair? Does he even care? Explain to the voters of the constituency of Morinville-St. Albert why this government is doing nothing.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, there was an inquiry into what happened with electricity, done by this government as part of our platform, that came back and said that the NDP broke the entire system, did Albertans an extraordinary disservice, and made electricity prices skyrocket. On top of that, they have inside this House filibustered and tried to block natural gas rebates. Shameful. They stood with Justin Trudeau and their boss Mr. Singh in Ottawa, forcing a carbon tax on Albertans over and over, and have defended Justin Trudeau trying to steal Albertans' birthright, which we will not let happen.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Antiracism Strategy

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud of this government's work to fight racism and thankful that this government is taking concrete steps to stand up to racism. For example, the discriminatory practice of carding was banned by this government, and we created the hate crimes task force as well as the associate ministry of immigration and multiculturalism to act as an advocate for Alberta's minority communities. To the Associate Minister of Immigration and Multiculturalism: can you update this House about what this government's initiatives are to make our province a more welcoming place for everyone?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Immigration and Multiculturalism.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for that question and also recognizing some of our government's work to combat racism in this province. In addition to banning the horrible practice of carding and establishing the hate crimes unit and community liaison, we have more than doubled the funding to protect places of worship and multicultural places through the Alberta security infrastructure program. By the way, that program is very welcomed by the communities. I continue to do my outreach.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to that minister for his outreach and his efforts. Given that moving to a new city can be overwhelming, especially when you're moving from a new country, and given that according to Stats Canada hate crimes were on the rise from 2019 into 2020 and given that racism can happen in the workplace, to the same minister: can you tell this House about some of the initiatives that our government is undertaking to make sure that every Albertan feels safe and valued in this workplace?

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Immigration and Multiculturalism.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member. Under the fairness for newcomers action plan we have created a fairness for newcomers office to work with regulatory organizations to ensure that their processes are up to date, fair, and procedurally correct. One of the best ways to reduce challenges in the workplace for newcomers is through credential recognition. We have also created the Alberta mentorship program. We had the first-ever Premier's summit for newcomers. We are also bringing forth the newcomers' recognition award.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again thank you to the minister for his efforts. Given that wiping out racism and hate is an ongoing challenge and given all the initiatives this government has taken and the broader community has taken to make Alberta hate-free through various grants and other programs to reduce barriers for minority communities, to the same minister: what is the government's benchmark to ensure that we are achieving our goals in this area, to create an inclusive and welcoming community?

The Speaker: The hon. associate minister.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member. We continue to have discussions with Alberta's Anti-Racism Advisory Council and are nearing completion on more than half of their 48 recommendations. We have been working across multiple ministries on an action plan to reduce systemic racism and to collect feedback to implement more inclusive programs. I'm happy to say that our government has done unprecedented work for our newcomers and racialized communities so that they can thrive, feel safe, and reap their full potential in this beautiful province of Alberta.

Dene Tha' First Nation Concerns

Mr. Feehan: Yesterday I raised concerns about the devastating flooding at the Dene Tha' First Nation in northern Alberta; 1,100 members of the nation have been evacuated from Chateh and have been housed in hotels wherever possible. Unfortunately, housing is not consistently available, and the roads to camping sites such as Rainbow Lake have been cut off by the floods. Last year flooding forced the nation to replace 72 furnaces and hot water heaters, an expense the nation cannot continue to support. A protective berm is needed in the community of Chateh. What is the government's plan to get this berm built as soon as possible?

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you to the hon. member for that question. It's a very important question. I'd like to start off by saying that we know it's a difficult time for many residents in northwestern Alberta. Our first priority is to ensure the safety and security of everyone. I do want all Albertans to know that my department is on the ground, working around the clock to undertake significant repairs. I've also had a conversation with the Dene Tha' First Nation Chief, James Ahnassay, and I will be visiting in the coming weeks to have an in-depth conversation about how to enhance critical infrastructure.

Mr. Feehan: Given that on Tuesday I spoke with Chief Ahnassay, who expressed concern that evacuation out of the community is severely hampered by the poorly maintained roads and the dangerously steep approach to the community from highway 58, and given that this road is so steep that in wintertime ambulances have refused to go down the hill and are forced to wait for patients to be brought up to them, will the Minister of Transportation provide the people of Chateh with the necessary resources needed to repair this road into the townsites?

Mrs. Sawhney: Again, Mr. Speaker, we are taking a crossministry approach on this. I have been in touch with the mayor of High Level as well because they are also impacted. Again, I will be visiting with the chief in the coming weeks to make sure that we're having a detailed discussion on the infrastructure that we need to invest in to make sure that they are safe and secure.

Mr. Feehan: Given that in my conversation with Chief Ahnassy he expressed concern that clear-cutting upstream has seriously affected the environment and landscape, which has resulted in the nation experiencing hundred-year floods three times in the last few years, and given that to prevent natural disasters from doing the damage that we are seeing in Chateh now, more needs to be done on climate mitigation and protection, will the environment minister tell the people of Chateh what specifically he will do to mitigate and prevent the community of Chateh from experiencing flooding of this nature in the future?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta government and our largest industries and Albertans all across this province are investing unprecedented amounts in technology to be able to make sure that we can meet our environmental obligations to be able to combat climate change. That's a sharp contrast from that member and the Official Opposition, who dedicated most of their time in government to attacking our largest industry and, in fact, as the Court of Appeal just said the other day, working to help Justin Trudeau steal the birthright of all Albertans.

Mr. Feehan: You took $50 million a year away from those communities. You stopped the Indigenous climate leadership . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: It's unfortunate to see that . . .

The Speaker: Order. Order. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford had his opportunity to ask a question.

Mr. Feehan: Yeah; but it was better than his answer.

The Speaker: Order. Of course, the Speaker would never judge the quality of a question or an answer because we all know how that would end.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, you see it right there. The NDP get mad when we attack their boss, Justin Trudeau.

Mr. Feehan: When you take money away from Indigenous communities.

Mr. Jason Nixon: But this side of the House: we work for Albertans.

Mr. Feehan: You took money from Indigenous people.

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted.

Child Care Access and Affordability

Ms Pancholi: This week Albertans learned that the UCP will fail to meet its promise to reduce child care fees by 50 per cent for families in Calgary, Edmonton, and Lethbridge. Well, the UCP also promised to create 10,000 new child care spaces this year. Thousands of families are on wait-lists right now. If the UCP stands a chance of creating these many new spaces, all UCP ministers, not just Children's Services, need to be working on this. Let's see if any of them are. To the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation. The UCP's plan for downtown Calgary includes nothing about creating new child care spaces. Why not?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our made-in-Alberta child care plan will provide $3.8 billion for child care in Alberta over the next five years to support improved access to affordable, quality, and inclusive child care. This new child care agreement is great news for working families with children zero to kindergarten age who are enrolled in licensed child care. It's also great news for our province's economic recovery. Alberta was one of the first provinces to help reduce fees for parents, and families are seeing savings already.

Ms Pancholi: Sounds like that minister is doing nothing.

Given that 40 per cent of the new spaces that the UCP claimed to create last year never actually opened and given that creating 10,000 new child care spaces requires a well-developed strategy, involving nonprofits, school boards, and, importantly, municipalities, and given that I've spent months actively speaking to municipalities across the province about creating child care spaces but they tell me they haven't heard from any UCP ministers on this, will the Minister of Municipal Affairs tell us when he plans to start taking this seriously? Why isn't he talking to municipalities about new child care spaces? Doesn't he care about the families in Calgary?

Ms Fir: Mr. Speaker, more than 90,000 children are benefiting from our agreement and are seeing reduced fees. Part of the approach is to complement Alberta's existing strong subsidy model that supported thousands of low- and middle-income families across the province. This means that those families who were already receiving the highest subsidy were already on their way to paying much lower fees. The CCPA report made their conclusions based on projections from a phone survey before the child care agreement in Alberta was rolled out. The report also did not take into account Alberta subsidies, an important part of how parents are saving on child care fees.

Ms Pancholi: Well, given I'd understand that I'd be afraid to admit I'm doing nothing as well, like they are all ...

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

Ms Pancholi: ... and given that creating new child care spaces is meaningless if there are no early childhood educators to staff them and given that there's an extreme labour shortage in this workforce but this government continues to attack the postsecondary institutions where they learn and upgrade their skills as educators and given that failing to address this labour shortage has direct implications on our economy and the ability of families to go to work, can the Minister of Advanced Education tell this House if he's done any work at all with Alberta's postsecondary institutions to increase the number of spaces and access to early childhood education programs? And be specific, please. We'd like to grade your work.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 2:36.

The hon. the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's always rich and entertaining to hear the members opposite talk about impacts to the economy.

But anyways, families are paying between $10 to $25 a day, and most supports are being targeted to the parents who need it most. Parents are seeing on average a 50 per cent reduction in their fees, but that will vary depending on the fees targeted by . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. The hon. the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction is very close to me, but it's difficult to hear her from even this range. I hope that I'll be able to do that with some reduction in the noise.

Ms Fir: Mr. Speaker, no family will pay more than they did before that.

I know that it's painful and difficult for the members opposite to hear about the outstanding work the Minister of Children's Services is doing in child care and the positive impacts that's having for our economy, but they just have to face it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Federal Travel Vaccination Mandate

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When it comes to COVID-19, Canada has one of the highest vaccinated populations in the world. However, according to manufacturers of the COVID-19 vaccines efficacy is greatly diminished for the current variants. As such, it behooves most rational-minded people to reconcile the federal mandatory vaccine policies that not only limit freedom of movement but freedom of employment of its own citizens. In fact, the freedom convoy, that had millions of supporters not only in this country but internationally, is asking the same question. Why do we need this mandated? It's simply out of touch with current realities. The response to the concerned citizens? Invoke the Emergencies Act, something that typically is only reserved for war or unless you're fans of the bromance down east. To the Minister of Health: what is being done by the provincial government . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health is rising.

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, thanks for the question, hon. member. This government will always call out federal government overreach. An example of that overreach is the use of the Emergencies Act. It was unnecessary and disproportionate. Vaccine mandates and other public health measures also must be proportionate to the risk at that time. At this time the federal vaccine mandates for travel are disproportionate and pointless. We'll keep advocating for the federal government to align their public health measures with the evidence and with the policies in place here in Alberta and in other provinces.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister. Given that the concerns of Canadians, regardless of vaccine status, were over the infringements of rights and freedoms as per our Constitution and given that people had enough of the virtue signalling regarding the COVID policy and given that the federal government had their desired effect of scaring their citizens into conformity and that the federal government has shown its track record of begging for forgiveness after they've done these types of acts rather than seeking parliamentary approval, to the Minister of Justice: what are you and your fellow ministers doing to pressure the federal government to cease these infringements on Canadians' rights and freedoms?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, when it comes to standing up for Albertans' rights and their constitutional freedoms, no government across Canada is doing more than this one. We want to know: when will the NDP join us in our fight against the no-more-pipelines bill? The Alberta Court of Appeal ruled that it's unconstitutional. We've stood up for Albertans' rights time and time again. When will the failed, failed, failed NDP join us in standing up for the constitutional rights of Albertans? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister. Given that the travel restrictions not only within our country but across the U.S. border and internationally have a negative impact on the economy and given that numerous countries have already done away with their restrictions, what is being done by the government of Alberta to have the removal of the restrictions on its citizens travelling for work or leisure in and out of this province who just happen to not be vaccinated from the first vaccination that went around for COVID?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Council of Chief Medical Officers of Health Canada have been clear. Public health measures must be based on the risk at a given time, and they must be adjusted as the risk changes. Federal travel restrictions are hurting our economy with no proportional public health benefit at this time. We welcome the changes that the federal government made in April. They're a start, but they are not enough. Federal vaccination mandates are out of step with the evidence at this time, and they need to end.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will continue to the remainder of the daily Routine.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Camrose has a statement to make.

Women's Reproductive Health

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud to rise today and speak to the topic of women's health in recognition of Women's Health Week. I want to first acknowledge the Women's Health Coalition, who has advocated tirelessly on this subject and kindly joined us in the Chamber for question period yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, women's health is crucial, yet there is a serious lack of understanding regarding women's health. There is a shortage of training and knowledge about the challenges that face women, particularly women's reproductive and general gynecological health. Unfortunately, when it comes to reproductive health, 10 per cent of cases concerning men are listed as urgent, yet only 1 per cent concerning women are treated with the same urgency.

Traditionally in medicine, the health of women during their child-bearing years or when they were bearing children was seen as the most important. While the wonder of conception and child birth are amazing things, I can tell you that there is far more to women's reproductive health than just those years.

Mr. Speaker, we must bring women's health into the spotlight. It is time to take action and work to get more health practitioners trained in gynecology. It's time to acknowledge that there are women who experience heavy menstrual cycles every month. It's time to raise awareness that this could be a sign of health complications and make sure doctors are trained to recognize this and provide treatment. It is time to acknowledge that women face challenges like fibroids, endometriosis, polycystic ovary syndrome, and so many more.

Here in Alberta and across the world there is more time to bring awareness to women's health and its importance. I am proud to say that Alberta's government is up to the challenge. We are committed to making sure that women have access to quality health care in a timely fashion across the province.

This week and all weeks I encourage continued conversation around challenges faced by women in their pursuit of quality health care. Only in hearing the stories and understanding the challenges can we arrive at the solutions.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Lobbyists

Mr. Barnes: Hey there. Have you ever wondered why megacorporations have access to the highest political offices in the province, but you can't even get a response to an e-mail? The answer to this quandary is simple: hire a lobbyist.

We all know lobbying is the most simple and proven way to get your way, and thankfully Alberta has some of the most toothless lobbying regulations in Canada. In Alberta we don't even prevent immediate family members from lobbying each other. "But wait," you say, "isn't that a little shady?" To that we say, "Don't you want a sole-source contract?"

If you're looking to hire a lobbyist in Alberta, start with one of the Premier's pet firms. You can even hire the Premier's most recent campaign team, something that is technically legal in Alberta. You know what we say? "Technically legal is the best kind of legal." If you're an Albertan who can't pay your utilities or you're struggling with rising insurance costs, you can stand in line with the rest of the schlubs, or you can do what the rich and the powerful do: hire a lobbyist today.

But wait; there's more. For a limited time only, when you hire one lobbyist, three more work for free on the Premier's leadership review. You may already know that the Official Opposition has been outfundraising the government of Alberta for years. The Premier is getting desperate. As such, you can rest assured that there is no job too big or too small for our crack team of party insiders. Using one of our patented political greasing technologies, we can unstick rusty hinges and pry our way into virtually any Legislature door.

And don't worry about Alberta's pesky financial contribution limits. Our Premier and his cronies have rewrote the rules to ensure there are plenty of loopholes to exploit. If money in politics is like water on pavement, Bill 81 opens all the floodgates. Call now and we'll even throw in a free Best Summer Ever hat and an open for good T-shirt. Lord knows there's no shortage of defunct swag lying around the Premier's office. Operators are standing by.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As deputy chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills I am pleased to present the committee's final report on Bill 207, Traffic Safety (Tow Truck Warning Lamps) Amendment Act, 2022, sponsored by the hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont. This bill was referred to the committee on April 28, 2022. The report recommends that Bill 207 proceed. I request concurrence of the Assembly in the final report on Bill 207.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the Speaker has the call. The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein has moved concurrence in the report on Bill 207, Traffic Safety (Tow Truck Warning Lamps) Amendment Act, 2022. This is a debatable motion pursuant to Standing Order 18(1)(b). Are there any members wishing to speak to concurrence?

Seeing none, the deputy chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills has requested concurrence in the report on Bill 207, Traffic Safety (Tow Truck Warning Lamps) Amendment Act, 2022.

[Motion for concurrence carried]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite number of copies of an article that ran today in the Calgary Herald highlighting the cruel cut made to the Alberta School Councils' Association by the current government and stating that an NDP government will reinstate their 650,000 annual dollars in funding.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There have been 58 shootings in Calgary this year, and people are concerned about the proliferation of guns and gun violence, so I am tabling the requisite number of copies of an article titled 'This Is a Tragedy for Our Community': Mother of Five Dead after Road Rage Shootout in Forest Lawn.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung I saw.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise with the five requisite copies of a report that shows that the health and climate impacts from coal power cost Alberta millions. Health and environmental groups urge Alberta to improve a phase-out of coal. I mention this in reference to the laughter that emanated from the other side by government members after I said that coal phase-out was saving lives when, in fact, this report clearly shows that it does and that each year 700 emergency visits, 4,000 asthma episodes, and nearly 100 premature deaths are precluded by this move.

The Speaker: Are there other tablings? The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings here, again from folks having difficulties with vaccine injuries: one lady unable to find work, the other one unable to travel in the country, which the opposition was heckling and laughing at today in a statement.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. At approximately 2:34 the Deputy Government House Leader rose on a point of order.

Point of Order Allegations against a Member

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll be quick. At the time you just mentioned, the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, while the hon. Minister of Environment and Parks was answering a question, said: you took money from Indigenous communities. Making such a claim about a specific member in this Chamber is unparliamentary. I rise under 23(h), (i), and (j) and would ask that that member please apologize and withdraw.

The Speaker: The hon. Opposition House Leader.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. At that time certainly the Minister of Environment and Parks had imputed false motives by suggesting that the anger from the Official Opposition was to do with support for the Prime Minister when, in fact, we're very concerned because under the UCP government $50 million that had previously been allocated for climate change adaptation to Indigenous communities is no longer there, making the statement that the UCP took money from Indigenous communities correct.

Unfortunately, the member, in the heat of the moment, used the phrase "you." He was talking about the government, and certainly the entire dialogue back and forth was focused on the UCP government's actions, which have resulted in Indigenous communities having less money for climate adaptation. Given that he misspoke, though, and said "you" rather than "the UCP," I certainly withdraw on his behalf although he is also in the room . . .

The Speaker: It makes it difficult, because he will apologize and withdraw.

Ms Gray: There we go. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Feehan: I apologize and withdraw the word "you" and replace it with "your government."

The Speaker: I consider this matter dealt with and concluded.

At approximately 2:36 the Government House Leader rose on a point of order.

Mr. Schow: Withdrawn.

The Speaker: I consider that matter dealt with and concluded as it has been withdrawn.

Hon. members, Ordres du jour.

10 a.m.

Tuesday, May 24, 2022

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Good morning, hon. members.

Prayers

The Deputy Speaker: Let us pray. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 21

Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Chair: This is the bill's first time in Committee of the Whole. Are there members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I appreciate the opportunity. As we've discussed during second reading of this bill, there are a number of aspects of the bill that we are indeed in agreement with. You know, the majority of these changes that are being proposed in this bill are really administrative, and we agree with a lot of them.

However, there are some and, I would say, one in particular that we're a little bit, well, I would say a lot in disagreement with. Of course, that is the one aspect of the bill which basically gives the minister of environment such widespread powers over parks. Given the track record of this UCP government, it's very hard for us to just assume that everything will be all right with the kind of power that is being allotted to the minister of environment when it comes to this particular file.

What we've seen so far when it comes to Environment and Parks here in the province of Alberta is this government trying to basically sell off parts of our provincial parks system. Of course, Albertans came out very strongly against the mining of the eastern slopes. I would say that it was quite the boondoggle for this UCP government. People from all over the province, no matter where, were in complete disagreement with this proposal by the UCP, which they didn't even bring into the Legislature for us to really debate.

There was no opportunity for feedback from the opposition as they moved in this particular direction, and we had no other choice but to then support the majority of Albertans, who were also saying that they did not want the mining of the eastern slopes for coal. I'm glad that they did, and I'm glad that they came out in such force to actually demonstrate that this was not their will and that they were against this particular proposal by this UCP government.

Therefore, when it comes to this particular issue, it leaves us all imagining the worst because of the track record already established by this UCP government, that demonstrates to us that they cannot be trusted. It's Albertans themselves that are saying that this UCP government can't be trusted when it comes to this particular file and many others, I would say.

Just to be absolutely clear, I'd actually like to quote from the bill. In the bill under Minister's Directives and Codes it says, "The Minister may set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines . . . or other rules relating to any matter in respect of which a regulation may be made under this Act." That can only be interpreted as the minister being able to do absolutely anything the minister wants when it comes to this. Here we have an omnibus piece of legislation that is sneaking this one particular proposal in, and Albertans have already spoken widely against anything that this government would propose with the actual mining of the eastern slopes. I do believe that it's a point of contention. Basically, Albertans don't trust this government.

Essentially, what kind of powers are we talking about, Madam Chair, when it comes to the powers being allocated to the minister of environment on this particular file? It could be, for example, perhaps the power to partially privatize a park. Perhaps it's for restricting access to parks. We've already seen what this government has done with Kananaskis, you know, a very common summer destination for many families and, I would add, many low-income families. They don't have the opportunity to travel abroad. Kananaskis was a summer destination for so many people, one that they could just simply drive to, if they had access to a car, that is, and actually enjoy the mountains here in the province of Alberta. And now this government has decided that, well, if you're going to be able to enjoy these mountains, you're going to have to pay a fee to get in. We're seeing more and more of this government making decisions that are actually restricting Albertans, and we can't be certain that the minister won't do more of this if he's given these widespread powers that have been determined in this particular piece of legislation.

It leaves us on this side of the House very worried that the powers won't be used wisely or with all Albertans in mind. Frankly, I would say that I find it unfathomable that this government would actually do that, restrict access. Now, I understand, you know, that to some of the individuals on the other side of the House it's, like: oh, well, you just pay this small fee. Well, maybe the members on the other side of the House interact with individuals where, yeah, what to them is a small fee, for others is not accessible. That's why it's important that all Albertans be considered when this actually takes place. And I think that it's imperative on this government, being elected into office to actually represent all Albertans, that they would actually consider this.

Now, first of all, it could be with Kananaskis, but then it could be with other provincial parks all throughout Alberta that they would begin starting to charge a fee. We've seen that in order to hold a campsite, for example, they're adding a fee. I understand that the intention behind it was so that people wouldn't hold a campsite and then later on not use it, but this also restricts access for people that may not have the financial ability to actually pay for it, right? They also want to be able to enjoy Alberta's parks. It's one of the few options that they do have when it comes to vacationing in the province of Alberta, so this, in fact, is an economic barrier. And I completely understand. You know, some members on the other side of the House or perhaps all of the members on the other side of the House see it as just a small fee, but, as I was saying, Madam Chair, what some people consider a small fee is, to others, an economic barrier. They'll have to make another decision or go somewhere else. When they're used to going to Kananaskis, they would then have to consider going somewhere else.

But I think what's most challenging about this particular aspect is that it just gives such an incredible amount of power to the minister of environment. Now, I've spoken at length, Madam Chair, about more power being put into the hands of ministers during this government. I couldn't put an exact number on it, but I would say, you know, that definitely more than half the bills that have been presented inside of this House during this government's tenure have been putting more power in the hands of ministers.

Like, if it was one bill, okay; perhaps understandable. But then when it becomes four, five, six, 10, 20 bills, all with particular changes made that actually put more power into the hands of ministers, you have to start asking yourself: why is this government so power hungry? A lot of these decisions were made by agencies, boards, and commissions prior to this government coming into power, where Albertans had an opportunity to participate in the decision-making process of different aspects of the business conducted by this government here in the province of Alberta. People were actually aiding. There were councils where debates were had, people had discussions on particular aspects, and together they would reach a decision, and then they would make a recommendation to the minister to actually make a particular change.

But now what we're seeing with this government is that they're taking away those powers from agencies, boards, and commissions, so taking power out of the hands of Albertans that are actually participating in the democratic process, and they're putting that power into the hands of the minister. For me, it just begs a question. You know, the members on the other side like to talk a lot about freedom. They like to talk a lot about small government, and this bill is a testament to their perspective on trying to curb red tape. Yet in the same bill, in which, according to them, they're proposing more freedoms, less regulation, less red tape, they go and put the power in the hands of a minister, where there is no accountability; this coming from a political party that likes to yell about accountability all the time.

You know, for many of the members that are private members of the government caucus on the other side, when they were in opposition, members of the Wildrose would talk about accountability endlessly in this House, that the government had to be held accountable. Yet now those same members are on that side of the House supporting bills that actually create an environment of less accountability when it comes to the powers that this government wields through each of their ministers. It's highly questionable. You can't be speaking out of both sides of your mouth, Madam Chair. You're either for accountability or you're not. Like, there's no other word to describe that than "hypocritical" and flip-flopping on an issue.

I think that Albertans have demonstrated, as we've seen through last week, they're very much wanting to hold those in power accountable. I think that the members on the other side of the House have to listen carefully – listen very, very carefully – when it comes to the desire of Albertans and the fact that they want to hold their government accountable. This is a step in the wrong direction when it comes to this proposed piece of legislation. It's definitely a step in the wrong direction. You know, giving this amount of power over to a minister is not what Albertans have in mind when it comes to strengthening their democracy. Albertans want to have more say in the democratic decision-making process, not less.

The way that things stand right now is – like, we saw this happen a couple of weeks ago when the government decided to take away insulin pumps from Albertans, and there were a number of examples where this government took away insulin pumps from children that depend on those insulin pumps to actually go to school. Yes, I understand that they were proposing an alternative, but that alternative had not been put in place yet, so these individuals felt that they were being left hanging, hung out to dry, Madam Chair.

A more appropriate and more effective way of moving forward would have been to move from one program to another if that is indeed what this government wanted to do, but it didn't have a solution to a problem. It was actually creating a problem for Albertans. I, for one, am so happy that those Albertans decided to come together. From my understanding I believe it was more than 13,000 e-mails and letters that were actually sent to the Minister of Health to demand that he not end this program of insulin pumps.

There have been multiple examples of this kind of decision-making by this government that actually negatively impacts Albertans, and by putting more power into the hands of ministers, you can bet that you're going to see that. Consulting with a handful of people is not the same thing as consulting on a broad scale with the people of Alberta. It's very easy to go out and be like: oh, well, I consulted with a handful of people. That's what is not being divulged. Yeah, you can go out and, like, ask a handful of people and be like, "Oh, yes, I consulted," but that's not the appropriate way to consult.

A lot of the people that wrote in those letters regarding the insulin pumps stated that they were not consulted. Advocacy groups representing these individuals said that they weren't consulted. It begs the question, then: who did this government actually consult to make this decision? This is becoming more and more of a problem with this government, Madam Chair, where they say they've consulted with certain people, yet the decisions that they're making are having drastic and negative impacts on Albertans. I find it just incredible that they would take away a program that was actually helping children go to school. You take away their insulin pump, and what happens then? And not just children but a number of Albertans.

I can only imagine, Madam Chair, that by putting more and more power into the hands of ministers and not devising an appropriate way of actually consulting, then the government is going to end up running into more instances where they're going to have to backpedal on decisions that they're making, because there is no process where they're actually consulting with a wide group of Albertans when it comes to particular issues.

I can only imagine that the same thing that happened with strip mining of the eastern slopes that was being proposed by this government, that a minister having that much power, wielding that much power, making those kinds of decisions will actually end up in a similar type of situation, where a minister may think, "Okay; well, I consulted with a handful of people; I think this is a good idea," you know, and will actually propose a change in legislation, and because the government has a majority, they can come into this House and actually ram the piece of legislation through as quickly as they want, not taking into consideration any feedback from the opposition. Yet the real opposition, Madam Chair, are those Albertans out there that do not want these kinds of changes being made in their province, and the members on the other side of the House need to consider that.

It's important that the government be as transparent as possible when it comes to these kinds of decisions, but we're not seeing that. We're seeing a lack of transparency; we're seeing a lack of accountability from this government, making changes that perhaps are beneficial for friends of theirs, for example the raising of insurance.

The Chair: Are there others that wish to join the debate on Bill 21? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. Good morning to you. Hopefully, you had a great long weekend and a rest through the constituency break. I know that I certainly did. It gave me a little bit more of an opportunity to explore Bill 21, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. As we know, we have a very thick piece of legislation here that is affecting 16 different acts around nine different ministries, which would be the very definition, of course, of an omnibus bill, something that members of the government caucus and members of the government bench, when they served very well in opposition, were extremely opposed to. Yet it seems okay now that we have this type of bill before us.

Nevertheless, here it is. We're seeing changes to some of the different acts: the Animal Health Act; Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act; Cooperatives Act; Education Act; health statutes act; Highways Development and Protection Act; Local Authorities Election Act; Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Act; Municipal Government Act; Pharmacy and Drug Act; Provincial Parks Act; Public Lands Act; Railway (Alberta) Act; Residential Tenancies Act; Rural Utilities Act; and Surveys Act. Those certainly would not fall under one category.

Of course, I always have to mention this when I get the chance because my good friend from Edmonton-Mill Woods, when she was labour minister, brought forward some changes all within labour, one ministry, some great changes that I very highly supported, and members opposite, you know, lit their hair on fire because they thought it was just such an omnibus bill. Yet here we have it. And every time I bring this topic up, there's always deafening silence on the other side around this.

Nevertheless, I will try to push forward here to talk a little bit about Bill 21. Some of the changes that I want to highlight – well, there are many, and I don't think I have enough time with which to bring them up, but I'll certainly try. We're seeing some changes right now around the Animal Health Act. As we know, there are cases of avian flu that are currently starting to grow within our province, which is not a good thing, of course. We are seeing changes around reporting, not necessarily the length of reporting time; it's just simply being moved from legislation to regulation, which of course signals to me that, you know – moving that: is that considered red tape? I don't know. You're simply shuffling it from once place to another unless you intend to change it, in which case, are you going to be increasing that number, or are you going to be decreasing that number? It would be interesting to hear back what the intention is around moving that, what they heard around the reasons they felt that that needed to be moved.

I'd also like to bring up some of the changes around the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act. Of course, as we know, Alberta has gone through a very significant challenge this year with the death of children in care. I can't even begin to imagine what the family members have been going through with regard to trying to address that within themselves. When we're seeing some of the changes around that, you know, again: what are the reasonings for doing that? Why would you want to change it to remove the one-year maximum on licences, both new and renewals, especially during the time that we've just seen over the past 12 months? I'm looking forward to hearing a little bit more on that, and hopefully we'll actually hear from the Minister of Children's Services as to why that was handed down to the red tape minister.

The reason I bring that up is that that now takes me to changes around the Education Act. We've very clearly heard one thing being stated by the red tape minister and then something completely opposite by the Education minister. Why did that piece of legislation get handed down to the red tape minister? I mean, if that was the case, you'd think that maybe at least some briefing notes, you know, had managed to filter their way down. It wasn't like it was just a little detail that was missed or maybe slightly misinterpreted; they were completely opposite positions. One said that there will be absolutely no more reporting. Then the other one: oh, no; there will be reporting. Which one is it? Why then is the red tape minister legislating on education matters? I've always had a problem with this.

You know, it's supposedly all about making life easier for businesses to be able to operate, to make things faster, so I'm curious around these changes on education. How will these changes make business move faster? How will this be creating jobs for Albertans here in the province? I'm very much looking forward to hearing from the red tape minister some of those statistics that are available around those things. What kind of improvements has this made? Is there a percentage that we can attach on to that?

I guess, you know, as my good friend from Edmonton-Ellerslie had pointed out, it starts to question this whole notion of transparency. Can we trust the UCP government to work in the best interests of Albertans? Of course, I always will bring people back right to the leader of the UCP, who made a promise way back when to disclose a donors list, yet we're still waiting for that donors list. How am I expected to be able to trust this government to do what's right when the leader can't even manage a simple little thing like that, a promise that was made?

Now, of course, this leads me into some of the changes around the Provincial Parks Act. Now, Madam Chair, again, as I'd mentioned, members of the government bench, members of the government caucus who served in the 29th Legislature: pretty much any time that they saw any kind of authorities being given to ministers, they very clearly communicated that they were in disagreement with that. Again, as my friend from Edmonton-Ellerslie very clearly pointed out, the changes that are being made here with the Provincial Parks Act and Public Lands Act are significant changes allowing the minister to make decisions as they see fit. I can just imagine what those members would have said back then had the NDP government done something like that, you know. You always hear that notion: people lighting their hair on fire. I have a feeling they would have lit their entire bodies on fire when they saw that.

The reason I'm kind of going down this line of thinking here: my friend from Edmonton-Ellerslie managed to kind of get me thinking a little bit, you know, with the whole lack of transparency – and, of course, that's backed up by that beautiful title that's been bestowed upon this government as one of the most secretive governments in Canada, which tells me that perhaps transparency isn't quite as transparent or is as transparent as mud in this case – and some of the decisions that we've seen the government make over the course of the 30th Legislature. We saw the Lougheed coal policy that was taken out really without any consultation around that, and we know how that worked out. Albertans pushed back and pushed back significantly on that. Then comes the little escapade we went through around parks and how they're handled, being potentially sold off and whatnot, and again we saw that significant push-back from Albertans around that. So this starts to develop a little bit of a pattern.

When I'm thinking about the environment minister and, I guess, some of the tirades that we've seen occur, to move that degree of ability to make decisions like what's being proposed in part of Bill 21 around that causes some very significant mistrust and red flags. You know, for me to sit here and try to say: well, I'm just going to have to trust that the minister is going to make the right decisions – I mean, as soon as it seems like there's any kind of significant push-back, the minister is then, quite honestly, trying to control the narrative. And we've seen that here in the House. Why, then, wouldn't that translate to the public at large? I'm just wondering why, then, the minister, who, as I know, when serving in the 29th Legislature had a significant problem with these types of changes being given to ministers, feels that it's okay now. Was it the case that he didn't actually believe that back then? Or what has changed in the meantime to be able to take that kind of position? Of course, I would also love to hear from others that served during that time and what's changed around that.

You know, I don't necessarily have problems with all of Bill 21. I think there are some other changes that are going okay, but because of some of the major concerns I have, as I just mentioned around parks – and I'm going to take a small bet here that perhaps my friend from Edmonton-Gold Bar might have some significant comments around that. Changes and the conflicting messaging around changes to the Education Act I think are a problem. So I'm faced with that we have some legislation that's fine; some that isn't. They're butting up against each other. I don't think I could support Bill 21 as it's currently written because of those problems. Perhaps, maybe we might see some suggestions to make it a little bit better. Perhaps, maybe then I can get to a point of being willing to support it.

But I certainly look forward to comments from others on some of the questions I've raised here in this brief time. We are in Committee of the Whole, so there's a good chance that I may be popping back up with more to say based on what I hear, but at this time I'm looking forward to what others say, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to rise and offer some comments on Bill 21, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, and I can confirm for my friend from Edmonton-Decore that I do have some changes to propose to this bill. The member spoke almost as if he had inside information as to what was going to happen this morning, offering betting advice to people who are paying attention to this morning's proceedings. I will move this amendment now. I have the appropriate number of copies. I'll wait for your signal, Madam Chair, to proceed.

The Chair: Hon. members, this will be known as amendment A1. Hon. member, please proceed.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I'd first like to read the amendment into the record. I move that Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be amended by striking out sections 11(3) and 12.

And just to remind everybody in the House what section 11(3) does, the section amends the Provincial Parks Act to the following:

Incorporation by reference

12.11(1) A regulation under this Act may adopt or incorporate documents that set out standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines, objectives or other rules of any government, board, agency, association or person, including, without limitation, any standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines, objectives or other rules set by the Minister under section 12.12, relating to any matter in respect of which a regulation may be made under this Act.

(2) A standard, directive, practice, code, guideline, objective or other rule may be adopted or incorporated under subsection (1)

(a) in whole or in part and with or without modifications, and

(b) as it reads on a specific date or as amended or replaced from time to time.

(3) When a standard, directive, practice, code, guideline, objective or other rule is adopted or incorporated under subsection (1), the Minister shall publish it on a public website of the Government of Alberta.

Minister's directives and codes

12.12 The Minister may set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines, objectives or other rules relating to any matter in respect of which a regulation may be made under this Act.

And there are similar provisions being proposed to the Public Lands Act.

This amendment, of course, simply strikes out those two sections of the bill that I just read into the record. There's a very simple reason that I'm proposing to do this, Madam Chair, and that's because Albertans cannot trust the UCP government to keep its hands off our provincial parks or public lands and manage them in the public interest. These two sections that I read into the record give significant power just to the Minister of Environment and Parks to set any policy document that he likes as a regulation affecting provincial parks or public lands.

This follows along with the terrible track record of this Minister of Environment and Parks. We've already seen him, in February 2020, try to sell off or close down hundreds of provincial parks in the province. We've already seen him assess a random camping fee on public lands, where one didn't exist before, driving up the cost of going into our own backyards at any time during the year. We've seen him assess a $90 Kananaskis Country pass, again, making it more expensive for Albertans to go into their own backyards, where previously no cost existed. We've seen the minister arbitrarily try to alter the water allocation order on the Oldman River system. We've seen him arbitrarily remove environmental protections during the height of the pandemic in the oil sands area.

This minister already has significant discretionary powers that he has used to significantly, negatively affect the quality of public land management, parks management, and environmental protections in this province. The people of Alberta do not trust him to do anything more with our provincial parks and public lands, and that's why we are proposing to remove these sections from the bill.

Now, I've had a chance to talk to some people with more legal expertise than me regarding what these sections would do, and one of the questions that was posed to them was: does this mean that any small "p" policy or document by anybody can be adopted into the regulations, thus creating different regulations in different areas based on what someone wants in the area? The answer is yes. And is it that the minister still has to decide to adopt these, or can government staff, area managers, do the adopting? This answer from my acquaintance, who is a legal expert, is quite concerning. The minister needs to sign it, but he has no real obligation to understand it, giving the department a lot of effective power. Then he goes on to say that under section 12.11(2)(b) the minister can set the regulations so the incorporated document can be amended later without any ministry involvement at any time. So once the minister has adopted a small "p" policy as a regulation affecting a park or section of public land, anybody in the department can go ahead and amend it at any time and not make anybody aware of it. This is not the kind of democratic oversight that the people of Alberta expect the government to have over its department.

Allowing department officials to change regulations effectively at any time is a remarkable power to give to the department and one that they should not have. It is widely accepted that the Legislature is the place where we set legislation and orders in council are what govern regulations. Those are the purview of cabinet and only cabinet. Here the minister is taking this job away from cabinet, giving it to himself, and then letting the department officials do whatever they want with it. This should make people extremely uncomfortable.

What is mind-boggling to me, Madam Chair, is that the party of small government, the party that wants no government control over things like provincial parks or public lands, is effectively relinquishing its control to the public service, saying: "You know what? It's not our job anymore to administer parks and public lands. We're going to let the staff do it, and we're not even going to bother to check in on them or use the powers that are given to us as members of cabinet to run the show." That's not right. It's certainly not consistent with the ideology that the government members purport to hold, and it's certainly not something that the people of Alberta are comfortable with.

Madam Chair, I think that this amendment will successfully limit the ability of government to overreach in its powers to regulate provincial parks and public lands, and people should vote for it. What's particularly concerning to me, though, is that this can create an arbitrary set of rules for individual provincial parks or different segments of public land that aren't consistent across the province and could lead, potentially, to widespread privatization of our public parks, the encroachment of industrial activities on public parks.

You know, I'm dealing right now, as the environment critic, with a couple of significant issues that are affecting provincial parks here in Alberta right now. One is the threat to the Big Hill Springs provincial park near Cochrane. There's a massive gravel pit proposed right on the western boundary of that pit. If this piece of legislation goes forward, the minister actually has it within his power now to carve out a segment of Big Hill Springs provincial park as part of the gravel pit. I don't think the people of Alberta realize that that kind of power is being given to the minister here. If members opposite vote against this amendment, what they are essentially saying is that they trust the Minister of Environment and Parks to not turn over a provincial park like Big Hill Springs to a gravel pit operator.

Dealing with another issue right now in Pigeon Lake, the government is entertaining a proposal to allow a massive feedlot on the shore of Pigeon Lake. The Pigeon Lake provincial park is right next door. What's to say – if this amendment isn't adopted and this bill goes forward as originally proposed, the Minister of Environment and Parks could allow manure spreading in Pigeon Lake provincial park from that feedlot. Is that what government members want? Do they want 36 tonnes of manure a day being spread in Pigeon Lake provincial park? That's what this section of the bill would allow.

Those are just two examples, Madam Chair, two realistic threats to our provincial parks that exist right now that could be made much worse if the minister is given this power. I know that all government members have had an earful from the people of Alberta on the need to better protect provincial parks.

Well, here's a tremendous opportunity to show them that they've learned the error of their ways. They should vote in favour of this amendment and stand up for protections of provincial parks like Big Hill Springs and Pigeon Lake. At the very least they don't want those constituency e-mails and phone calls about why a gravel pit is encroaching on Big Hill Springs provincial park, why manure is being spread in Pigeon Lake provincial park. They don't want those. Moreover, they shouldn't trust the minister of the environment to have this kind of power.

Madam Chair, I sincerely hope that the members opposite give serious consideration to this minister of the environment's track record on protecting public lands, on protecting provincial parks, more accurately on failing to protect those things, that they understand what's at stake here if this amendment is voted down and the original bill is allowed to go through as is. We could have significant degradation of our provincial parks and public lands, and they have no power to stop it once this is in place.

For those reasons, Madam Chair, I urge all members of the House to vote in favour of this amendment. Thank you very much.

The Chair: Are there others to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you. I'd just like to seek unanimous consent of the Chamber to move to one-minute bells for the remainder of this morning.

The Chair: Hon. member, we'll have one 15-minute bell, and then we'll have one-minute bells following that. If I could comply to your wishes, I certainly would, but that will be possible after the first bell.

Ms Gray: It was a good try. All right. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Ms Fir: Thank you. I would just like to speak briefly to the proposed amendment. Not surprisingly, the messages being shared by the member opposite are not accurate. Many components, all components, of this bill are about making life better for Albertans and enjoying their use of parks. As it relates to the Provincial Parks Act and the Public Lands Act, the changes are going to support an outcome-based approach and development of locally specific rules and guidelines which address concerns about a current one size fits all. We know the members opposite would like to have one size fits all apply to as many things as possible and have as much control as possible, but this is about moving from one size fits all to more location- and use-specific rules of Crown lands. This approach will manage recreational activities in parks and public lands. It can be complicated and confusing. It's good news. It's about moving to an outcome-based approach where we can provide that flexibility while maintaining protection of Crown lands, and it's about a common-sense solution, tailoring solutions to the need of a specific area.

There would, of course, continue to be public stakeholder and Indigenous engagement on regulations, directives, rules, codes, and standards as required, so I will not be supporting this amendment. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there others to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm always pleased to rise. In spite of the minister's, you know, shameful personal attacks on my character, I do want to correct the record on one of the things that she said. She said that the regulations would be put out for public consultation before they're adopted. There is nothing in the bill that does that. There is absolutely no requirement to do any public consultation before any piece of policy is adopted as a regulation, so for the minister to stand here in this place and suggest that that's true needs to be called out. The people of Alberta need to understand that these changes can be made at any time with no notice and no public consultation whatsoever. I think that's important to get on the record, that the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction is completely wrong on that fact.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to rise in support of this amendment.

You know, Madam Chair, I think, first of all, it is distressing, to say the least, to hear the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction provide the Chamber with some explanation as to the accuracy of what a bill introduced under her name does and does not do – the track record is not great on this topic certainly with reference to other aspects of this bill – when certainly this particular minister had absolutely no idea what this bill, in fact, does around education.

Now, to the substance of her remarks that this section of the act provides flexibility and an ability to sort of deviate from a one-size-fits-all approach to parks and public land management: first of all, I find it interesting that the minister has in fact, in the speaking notes that she read verbatim off her piece of paper, conflated parks and public lands. They are two different management approaches with two different management intents regardless of which parks designation you're talking about within the Provincial Parks Act or even what kind of public land one is discussing, whether it's in the green zone or elsewhere.

Now, there is no question that within the parks act, if we want to focus in on that – because I highly doubt that the minister knows this – permitted uses and activities according to each park designation are already laid out in statute, and those uses and activities are enumerated, then, with further detail in a park management plan. I'm speaking specifically here under the parks act. There are different permitted uses under different classifications within the parks act, and then what happens is that a park management plan is put out to further provide detail to the public on what is and is not a permitted use, activity, lease, and so on.

Oftentimes, because the parks act is a very old piece of legislation within the GOA – to my understanding, it's one of the oldest pieces of legislation within the GOA – it can be a little bit confusing, which is why the parks management plan is so important. In general, for example, in provincial parks one is not allowed to hunt; however, there is an ability already for the minister to allow for certain seasonal hunting, for example, or for certain wildlife management purposes, and they do that through the parks management plan.

The public knows and expects this to be the case, because when they put it out in the parks management plan, it is put out to public consult and an even lengthier period of Indigenous consultation, so any of the flexibility and one-size-fits-all little catchphrases that the minister just read off her piece of paper provided to her by other people can be captured with appropriate public consultation within that park management plan. Certainly, then, operational decisions are made within that rubric by, first, the executive director of operations within Alberta parks and then on down through regional directors and even park rangers, if there are any left. I am reliably informed that the layoffs have been quite severe, and there are fewer and fewer of them all the time.

There is no need for this change, Madam Chair, unless one wants to introduce more range of permitted activities within the current designation or grant leases that may not be in the public interest or may not conform to appropriate levels of oversight in a way that makes it opaque to the public that this is happening without changes to the park management plan, without those public consultation periods, and without those Indigenous consultations. I'm just going to put it on the record right now that Indigenous nations will be reviewing any of these changes because they are subject to judicial review under Indigenous consultation. If you start changing land-use purposes, activities, designations without Indigenous consultation, there is an equal and opposite reaction from both treaty organizations and individual Indigenous organizations of various kinds.

Now, it seems to me that what we are doing here is putting power into the hands of a minister and a Government House Leader that as recently as last week proved to the public and to this House that he is not trusted by even the majority of his own party members, let alone Albertans. This is a minister that was responsible for the first iteration of pre-pandemic outrage based on his handling of parks and coal mines specifically. His environmental management record sparked absolute outrage in particular throughout Calgary and in particular in the riding of Calgary-Elbow, where the member has just announced his resignation rather than face the music of the public. In no small part when you walk around those streets of that particular seat, you will see no end to parks and coal mining signs. Now going on two, two and a half years of this. This is a source of tremendous shame and electoral peril for this government, for which this environment minister is in large part responsible given that it was also his job to shepherd legislation through this House and in so doing has certainly flushed a great deal of his own credibility among his own caucus members, let alone the public.

To be asked by this House at this time to entrust that kind of power through this legislation in the hands of that Government House Leader is a bridge too far. Certainly, we just saw last week it is a bridge too far for his own party members, it is a bridge too far for a good number of his caucus mates, it is a bridge too far for the Alberta public, and it is certainly, Madam Chair, a bridge too far for sound environmental management in this province whereby we are protecting nature for future generations and for recreational and other uses in a sustainable way for our children and grandchildren. It is for that reason that this amendment should be accepted. This piece of legislation in its current form must be amended to take out this most egregious and vexatious section of it, a piece of the legislation that Albertans do not support. Certainly, management of parks and protected areas should be placed in the hands of someone who merits the trust and respect of the people of Alberta.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to join debate on the amendment before us. I mean, I think the important role of the opposition is to, you know, scrutinize any legislation that does come through by government and to make suggestions on improvements. Certainly, I know that this amendment brought forward by the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar goes a long way to improve Bill 21, so I guess I commend all of the members in this Legislature to be in support of it.

As was already explained by the member previous to me, this is sort of – the amendment addresses the most egregious, I think, part of Bill 21, which is, of course, giving the minister significant powers to sort of do what he will. Sadly – and I really do see this as a tragedy – we've seen time and time again that this UCP government is not trustworthy, oftentimes not competent in the decisions that they make. When this kind of bold action of giving the minister the significant support – it creates tremendous concern for me, you know, as an Albertan, let alone as a member of this Legislature, and I know that certainly when I speak to my constituents or others that I meet with on a regular basis, they too express this very similar concern.

Certainly, this amendment strikes out section 11(3) and section 12 of Bill 21. I guess the most challenging part of it, certainly for me, is section 12.12, and it says, “The Minister may set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines, objectives or other rules relating to any matter in respect of which a regulation may be made under this Act.” That’s one part that we would like to amend, to actually take that out of the legislation, because that gives sweeping powers to the minister. I certainly agree with that.

We know that this seems to be a little bit of a trend by the UCP. I know that the Minister of Seniors and Housing also has a similar clause in the affordable housing act which gives her tremendous power. She gets to designate what’s affordable housing, what’s not affordable housing without sort of any definition. Oftentimes things are specified more clearly not in this specific legislation but in regulations, which we can’t see until they are produced. Of course, we know that regulations don’t have the power of legislation, and they are easy for the minister to change autonomously, like, unilaterally. Certainly, you know, as a believer in strong democracy this, of course, is a concern. There need to be checks and balances in politics, having things brought before the Legislature instead of being decided by one person, one cabinet minister even, and not even the Executive Council.

I think that that is a significant weakness of the legislation, and I would certainly encourage all members of this Legislature to vote in support of this amendment, which goes a long way to improving this legislation. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there others to amendment A1?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Chair: We are back on Bill 21 in Committee of the Whole.

Let’s get a speaker set up, and then members can move freely as they wish. Any speakers to Bill 21 in Committee of the Whole? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Madam Chair. I’m not going anywhere, by any means. In fact, we’ve got some amending to do.

You know, it’s a very good reflection of just how these red tape reduction bills are actually just omnibus bills with no rhyme or reason to them. Bill 21 also contains changes to education and the Education Act, right? When we go from parks to education, it’s like this spinning wheel that’s perhaps a reflection of this government’s agenda for the last three and a half years, taking potshots at parks and schools and hospitals and whatnot.

Anyway, you know, we’re always here, the Official Opposition, to try and help, right? As you might recall, with Bill 21, when it was introduced, the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction told the media that private schools would no longer have to report on the tuition fees they charged. You also may recall, Madam Chair, that later that same night the Minister of Education told the public that her colleague was wrong, that private schools would still have to report on the tuition fees that they collect.

Madam Chair, my good friend and MLA for Edmonton-Glenora has sought clarity on this issue, you know, in the public interest and to help the government as well, so I do have an amendment that I would like to move on her behalf, please. Let me know when you want me to read that.

The Chair: All right. Hon. members, this will be known as amendment A2.

Hon. member, just note that you’re moving on behalf of another member. Please proceed.

Mr. Eggen: Okay. Well, thank you, Madam Chair. You can see that we have this amendment which is including some new language.

The Chair: Sorry. Can you start by reading it into the record?

Mr. Eggen: Yeah. That’s what I’m going to do.

The Chair: Oh. Okay. Thank you.

Mr. Eggen: Yeah. I’m just getting warmed up, right? Before noon it takes a few pulls on my chainsaw to get going here.

The hon. Ms Hoffman to move that Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be amended in section 4(3) in clause (a) by adding the following:

(3.3) The person responsible for the operation of an accredited private school must, within 30 days of the end of each fiscal year, report to the Minister the amount of any tuition fees charged to [the] students during that fiscal year, including all academic and non-academic fees.

Also:

(3.4) For the purpose of subsection (3.3), the fiscal year of an accredited private school is September 1 to . . . August 31.

And then:

(3.5) The Minister must publish the information received under subsection (3.3) on the publicly accessible website of the department administered by the Minister within 30 days.

And then also adding after section 29(4)(a.1):

(a.2) if, in the case of an accredited private school, the person responsible for the operation of the accredited private school does not comply with subsection (3.3).

Madam Chair, this is a way by which we can, you know, clear up some of the confusion from the government side. That confusion spread into the public as well, quite frankly. Regular folks were very frustrated that they couldn't get clarity from this government as they focused on busily fighting and squabbling with their own internal party matters, and in the meantime here we have some of this legislation left hanging.

This amendment – thank you very much to the Member for Edmonton-Glenora – removes ambiguity, right? Ambiguity is the enemy of reason in this House, Madam Chair. You know, if we can just simply compel private schools to submit information to the minister about tuition fees that they charge, that clears the whole issue up.

Quite frankly, I know that private schools are happy to do so, on the whole. Certainly, I know that I myself as minister of K to 12 education did work closely supporting private schools to have clarity around tuition and everything else, right? I have always worked very closely, for example, with the Edmonton Islamic Academy, who are exemplary in their operations of their private religious school, and we should all be very proud of the example that they provide in regard to both clarity and transparency and education as well.

You know, as well, just to make sure we catch the other side – right? – it is to compel the minister to make that information public online. I think everybody deserves to know that. We know that private schools receive quite significant monies, public money, and any time we see anything that does get public money, then I think we deserve to see what's going on behind that expenditure.

You know, this government, again, has set a trend and a tendency to not do that – right? – anything from the war room to other investments that this government makes. It's very hard to see how and where and why that money is being spent. We don't need that in education. It really is not helpful.

Quite frankly, I believe that this amendment really should be supported by this government as a demonstration that they have no ulterior motives with this particular part of the red tape reduction act. Of course, when it came out, at first it was pure chaos in regard to different ministers saying different things. Once again, you know, we're trying to help out here as the Official Opposition. We're trying to set a good example. I mean, if the government happens to be the Official Opposition next time, this is kind of how you do it, right? Pro tip: look for constructively critical places where you can make legislation better.

This amendment does what the Minister of Education said she would do, promised to do verbally. It's always good to put it in writing, I think, and I think that the public will be better served and that the government will demonstrate their clarity on this issue. Most importantly, the public interest will be better served as well.

I would encourage all members to support this amendment, and I'm curious to hear from other members in this regard. Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to speak to amendment A2? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise this morning to speak to the amendment introduced by the Member for Edmonton-Glenora. I have to say that I agree with the previous speaker in wanting to ensure that there's clarity and understanding. We've watched this government create chaos in so many ways, and specifically under this piece of legislation, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, we had the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction saying one thing and then the Minister of Education saying another.

When we're looking at ways to help, I think that this piece of legislation could be amended, and it should be supported. We're asking for some clarity, and I think the Member for Edmonton-Glenora provides that in the amendment request. It will help reduce confusion, provide some transparency. I think that when we're looking at ways to make legislation understandable to the public, decreasing chaos is the way to go.

When we hear the discrepancy between the cabinet across the way there, I think that this amendment is a way to decrease that confusion and that chaos. If it's their intention to be clear, I think that this amendment is simple, it's straightforward, and it should be supported by the government if they truly have no ulterior motives and want to be able to support the way that they say that they do.

I appreciate that the previous member, from Edmonton-North West, mentioned the Edmonton Islamic Academy. That was a school that was in my riding from 2015 to 2019, and I can tell you that they do incredible work in the community. Although they're no longer in Edmonton-Castle Downs, many of the staff and the volunteers and the students that attend EIA live in Edmonton-Castle Downs. I've watched over the years as this school provided incredible opportunities for young people, that, you know, they're still benefiting from today. They have a culture in that school where once you're involved, you tend to stay involved. We watched students who've graduated come back and volunteer and provide their experience to the students that are emerging through the academy.

I think that when we're talking about schools within the province of Alberta, we need to be able to provide them with clarity and with understanding, and they should be able to feel that they have a clear understanding of the legislation that is impacting how they do day-to-day business. I think that the incredible people at Edmonton Islamic Academy deserve to know what's happening within this government and what decisions are being made that have an impact. You know, I'm a complete supporter of this school and the education and the community building that they do, quite frankly, and I would hope that all members in the Chamber want to provide that clarity and understanding to all schools in the province of Alberta, and accepting this amendment is a way to do that.

I know that this piece of legislation is quite significant. It has many pieces of legislation that are impacted, all under the statement of red tape reduction, but specifically when it comes to education, we saw complete chaos happen, where we have a minister responsible for red tape and then a minister responsible for Education giving two completely different messages. What this would do is that it would align what the government is saying their intention is, and it will provide some clarity and perhaps reduce confusion that was created by these two ministers on the same piece of legislation.

I think that, you know, Albertans that I talk to are frustrated with this government and with the chaos and consistently opposing messages that are coming. This takes a very important piece of legislation and provides that clarity, and it basically says what the Minister of Education promised would happen, so I see no reason why this government wouldn't want to accept this amendment and remove any ambiguity that's caused by their own government. It's providing some clarity on what the Minister of Education is saying they want to see happen, and I would be very, very curious why any member in this Legislature wouldn't want to accept this amendment and vote in favour of it.

I think that by saying yes to this amendment – it's quite simple; it's straightforward. It's doing exactly what the Minister of Education said that they want to do. It would compel the minister to make the information public online and not be shrouded in secrecy. It would provide an opportunity for transparency to Albertans. You know, in our opinion, on this side, it should be supported. There should be no reason, unless there are ulterior motives, not to support this amendment. It's a way to make what the associate minister of red tape said and what the Minister of Education is wanting – it provides that clarity and that transparency.

I think when it comes to, you know, the role of opposition, we're listening to frustrated Albertans. We're listening to people that just have had enough of the confusion and the chaos. And this is one simple way that, I believe, this government could reduce that, by supporting the amendment brought forward by the Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

I think that with that, Madam Chair, I would like to conclude my remarks, but I truly hope that everyone in the Chamber supports this amendment. Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to speak to amendment A2? The hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Ms Fir: Thank you. I will not be supporting this amendment. It's not surprising that the members opposite continue to fixate on this component of the bill as a distraction from all the amazing, good content that was in this bill. The Minister of Education already clarified that independent schools are required to report private sources of revenue, including tuition, to the government and that that's required as part of the annual audited financial statements.

What we are eliminating is one specific additional schedule that independent schools currently submit specific to tuition. This has been clarified by the Minister of Education, therefore making this amendment unnecessary. Again, just a distraction by the members opposite from all the amazing components of this red tape reduction bill.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to amendment A2? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I find it interesting to hear the minister stand and say that there is open transparency and that that has to be reported, but we are removing one piece where, you know, charter schools don't have to report on tuition. In fact, then, there isn't openness and transparency because not everything is having to be reported and disclosed, clearly, as the minister just indicated, which is why this amendment is so important.

Again, why would the government choose to remove one schedule that does not require the openness and transparency of every financial component of running a school? I don't understand why the government feels the need to do this. What is it about the tuition piece that the government doesn't feel should be reported?

We see – again, I have a Christian school in my riding, and I just went on their website and everything that could be reported – because they're open and transparent, and they did actually end up going under Edmonton public schools. They were an independent school that chose to move into the public system partly because of the fact that they weren't able to keep up with the tuition schedule that they would need to be able to operate outside of the structure of the public schools. They still have, however, the requirement for the fee schedule when it comes to the Christian program fees, and they also still have school fees.

Now, the concern that I have here is that that doesn't necessarily have to be put on every single website. And to not have to disclose what the tuition is for each school I think should speak to the question around: what is going on within this government to ensure that tuition is accessible for all Albertans, to ensure that anybody who would choose and want to go to that school has the financial ability to do that? If that is not publicly reported, there is no accountability to ensure that independent schools are open to all Albertans, because they could potentially create a tuition schedule that becomes so expensive that not every Albertan has the ability to access it.

The whole argument from this government is that these schools should be accessible to all. It's about giving choice, according to the government. But if individuals aren't able to access those schools because the tuition is so high they can't afford to go there, then it's actually not accessible, which is why all of these need to be publicly disclosed and reported, so that Albertans can make those choices and so that's there's also an accountability there to ensure that every school that is being funded through public dollar, supported through public dollar, is accessible and available to all Albertans.

Again, the minister has been clear – and I'm sure we'll want to hear from the Minister of Education at some point as to clarifying this piece now around the tuition.

Clearly, what we've heard over the last few weeks from the minister is that everything is open and transparent. Everything was supposed to be publicly disclosed. And now, again, we hear from the minister opposite, the associate minister, saying that, well, everything is disclosed except for the tuition. Again, it's not going to be openly disclosed. Inconsistencies between the Minister of Education and the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction: this is why Albertans are concerned and why Albertans don't feel like they can trust this government, because we keep getting inconsistent responses when it comes to the questions that are being asked.

Why now is this schedule being changed? Last week we were being told that nothing was being changed. Everything was going to be open. Everything was going to be transparent. Albertans would be able to see everything. Now, today, we hear that that's actually not the case. I think, again, that is why it's so important that this amendment be adopted by the government. Be open. Be transparent. If you're going to help through public dollar to support independent schools, then Albertans have a right to know what those fee schedules look like, including tuition fees. Tuition is actually one of the biggest barriers that Albertans face when trying to access these schools, so it needs to be open. It needs to be transparent. If the government chooses not to do that, then what they're saying is that they don't actually believe that these schools should be accessible to all Albertans. Albertans should be able to access them through these fee schedules.

Again I would urge the government to really consider showing Albertans that this is about educational choice, as they say, that this is going to be accessible to all Albertans, that there won't be a financial barrier when it comes to tuition, to accept this amendment and do what they're saying they're doing. If they choose not to, then once again they're validating the very concerns that Albertans have, which are that they can't trust this government to make sure that they have access to the very services that are being supported through their public dollar.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'll keep my comments very brief. I think my friends from Edmonton-Manning, Edmonton-Castle Downs have very clearly spoken to why we need to vote in favour of this amendment. You know, I've lectured over and over and over again in this House about language and what's being presented. Obviously, when Bill 21 came forward, the red tape minister believed, with her comments, that the case was that they didn't have to report. Now, she said that the Minister of Education has corrected that. I want to know why it was misinterpreted to begin with. If we're allowing the red tape minister to bring forward changes like this to different pieces of legislation, as I had mentioned, 16 different acts across nine different ministries, why is that confusion happening? Either the red tape minister is not consulting with the different ministers on legislation that is being changed, or it's the other way around.

Again, it's funny how it always comes down to the language; what's being said, what isn't being said, and, more importantly, what are you saying about it? There was obviously a conflict there. This amendment, that was brought forward by my friend from Edmonton-Glenora and the critic for Education, clears that language up so there's no misinterpretation about it. Again, it's not about us. We know what's now happening in the debate. But if somebody else isn't able to check, for whatever reason, isn't able to ask any one of us what went on during this discussion, this is how confusion begins. I've persistently and consistently seen that from the UCP government bringing this forward.

I would sincerely hope that members opposite will reconsider voting in favour of this amendment. This will clear up the language. There won't be any kind of misunderstandings going forward. There won't be any need for a minister to correct another minister, and hopefully that practice would then even continue going forward. But then, at the very least, maybe one of these ministers would like to stand up here in Committee of the Whole and explain to us who's not talking to the other. I'm very much in support of this amendment going forward, and I think we need to continue this kind of practice to clear up these constant misunderstandings that we've seen with regard to pieces of legislation that are being handed down to the red tape ministry, obviously in some effort to try to justify the $10 million to $15 million that's being spent on this associate ministry over the course of this Legislature.

Albertans needs to know that they can trust the decisions that are being made, because clearly right now that trust is almost gone. I'll conclude my remarks there, and we'll see if I'll maybe perhaps get an answer for one of my questions.

The Chair: Are there others to speak to amendment A2?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

[Motion on amendment A2 lost]

The Chair: Are there others to speak to Bill 21? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Chair. I want to speak briefly to this bill. I do understand that this bill has changes which are mostly of an administrative nature, and we can support those changes. But this bill also contains very controversial changes that we cannot support, that Albertans don't support. For instance, the bill gives the Minister of Environment and Parks broad powers to "set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines . . . [and] other rules relating to any matter in respect of which a regulation [can] be made under this Act." That's huge, huge power. In legal terms, if we interpret that, that means the minister can do anything he wants. That's not okay with us. That's not okay with Albertans. Nobody trusts this caretaker government with our cherished provincial parks.

The second thing is that they are also making changes to how private schools report public funds. I think Albertans deserve to know how their funds are spent, how their tax dollars are spent, and this bill will water down that transparency. No wonder this government got an award in secrecy and transparency because of changes like this.

It is for those reasons, primarily these two changes. These are not acceptable to us. These are not acceptable to Albertans. That's why we cannot support this piece of legislation.

Thank you, Madam Chair. I will take my seat.

The Chair: Are there others to speak?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, May 24, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Members of the gallery, if you'd like to take your seats, you're welcome to do so.

Members of the Assembly, in just a couple of moments here we're going to take a group photo of the 30th Legislature. We only have a couple of minutes, so if you can please get yourself ready. I'm going to ask a number of you to move into position so that we can see everyone. The photo will be taken from the press gallery down to the Chamber floor. I see that the hon. Member for Camrose has moved and the members along the back row have moved. Well done. I will skip – yes. Please come in. Take your seats. Members, if you can see, it will be at the press gallery. I'm sure that you can see the photographer. Hon. members, please. Thank you so very much. I feel as though we have created some sort of record in which the time that that photo has taken place.

We will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by Ms Brooklyn Elhard. Please rise and feel welcome to join in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all of us command.
Car ton bras sait porter l'épée,
Il sait porter la croix!
Ton histoire est une épopée
Des plus brillants exploits.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Statement by the Speaker

Anniversary of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II Address to the Legislative Assembly

The Speaker: Members, we have a number of very important things happening this afternoon, so I would like to beg for your indulgence for just a few brief moments.

Members, we are so very fortunate to do our work in the Chamber, that has seen many historic moments, perhaps nothing as historic as when Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II addressed Albertans from this very spot on this very day in her 2005 visit commemorating Alberta's 100th birthday. It was the first and only time that the monarch had addressed the people of this province from the floor of the Assembly. During her visit a series of stained glass windows designed by Paul and Andre Winter were unveiled, depicting the reign of monarchs throughout Alberta's first hundred years. The centre window at the front entrance of the Legislature Building commemorates the reign of Her Majesty the Queen. The monograms of the royal cypher stand for Elizabeth Regina II and are surmounted by the royal crown. The royal cypher is flanked by wild roses, which were adopted as Alberta's floral emblem in 1930.

Her Majesty reiterated:

During a previous visit 32 years ago I said that “. . . I want the Crown in Canada to represent everything that is best and most admired in the Canadian ideal. I will continue to do my best to make it so during my lifetime, and I hope you will all continue to give me your help in this task.”

Members, I think we can all agree that Her Majesty has honoured her commitment.

As a way of giving thanks, we now have the opportunity to celebrate her 70th year of service during this platinum jubilee year. I invite all Albertans and members to submit a congratulatory message, photo, or other monarch moment to be included in a digital display marking her unparalleled reign. Information about how to participate can be found on the platinum jubilee page at assembly.ab.ca.

May God bless the Queen.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, I am pleased to introduce a friend to many and a former Member of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta. They call him Mr. Landslide, Dave Schneider, for his massive electoral victory of eight votes in the constituency of Little Bow. He is accompanied by his wife today, Mrs. Sharon Schneider. I invite you to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Members, we do have many guests in the gallery, so I would ask that you hold your applause until the end of the introductions, and I would ask that all guests rise as I introduce them.

Earlier today I had the pleasure of meeting a School at the Legislature group joining us from Father Leo Green school in the constituency of Edmonton-Decore. Please rise and receive the welcome of the Assembly.

Also, members, joining us today in the members' gallery, a very special guest and the wife of the Minister of Indigenous Relations, Rose Wilson.

I'm pleased to introduce 10 members of the Memory Keepers Association of 1994 Genocide Against the Tutsi of Rwanda. They're guests of the Minister of Labour and Immigration. Please rise and receive the welcome of the Assembly.

Also in the gallery is a group of 20 childhood educators who are the recipients of the minister's award of excellence in childhood development – they are here in recognition of Early Childhood Educator Day, which was Friday, May 20 – two of which just happen to be from the outstanding constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, one of which is celebrating their birthday today. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Also joining us today are guests of the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East. She's the constituency assistant for the constituency, Ms Naomi Knoch. In the gallery as well are four representatives from Farming Smarter and West-Central Forage Association. They are guests of the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

And, finally, members, there are two guests of the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek, Jonathan Moser, senior vice-president and ESG practice lead of Rubicon Strategy, and Jonathan Stewart, the CEO of Direx. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Government Record

Ms Ganley: Alberta has a bright future, but we have to see the world as it is. We have to work together to move Alberta forward. I look around me and I see bright, innovative, hard-working people, and I know that we can achieve it. Alberta can continue to lead today and for years into the future but only if we have a government that looks towards the future and not the past.

For the past three years Alberta's UCP government has grasped at old, disproven economic theories, where diversification is a luxury we can't afford, climate change is a hoax created by a children's movie. They even created a curriculum that is 50 years out of date. This is not what Albertans thought they were voting for, and the current Premier's resignation changes none of it. The drama and the infighting and the disunity that have plagued the UCP are not over. It's only just beginning. To all those Albertans who voted for the UCP and feel let down by their actions and behaviour over the last three years: you deserve better.

Alberta's NDP is working day and night to build a team that will provide the forward-looking, thoughtful, responsive, pragmatic, and unified government that Albertans need. Every one of us will work tirelessly on what matters to Albertans: good public health care and good public education, good-paying jobs for you and for your children into the future, and protection from the rising cost of living. Albertans deserve a government focused on those things, not focused on infighting and empire building. The UCP will try to tell Albertans that they've changed and learned, just like the current Premier claimed when he took office. It won't be anymore true today. We can leave the UCP to their internal battles, and together we can build that bright future.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge has a statement.

Sikh Community

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to be a Member of this Legislative Assembly to represent not only the constituents of Calgary-Falconridge but also as a representative of the Sikh community. In the past two weeks gurdwara committees in Calgary and Edmonton organized Nagar Kirtans to celebrate the foundation of Khalsa Panth and festival of Vaisakhi. I would like to thank the Premier and my caucus colleagues along with thousands of Albertans for their participation in those celebrations. Those are the wonderful events that celebrate the culture and religious practices of Sikhism. These events are an opportunity for more and more Albertans to join with members of the Sikh community in their values of respect, kindness, and selflessness.

Since 1897 Sikhs have called Canada home. By 1906 there were roughly about 1,500 Sikh people in our country, which has now grown to more than half a million. While working hard, the Sikh community has contributed to other communities through their selfless service. I'm very proud of Alberta's acceptance of Sikhism along with other cultures and religions that have been welcomed to this province. Our acceptance of diversity offers a strong motive for Sikhs and other communities to choose Alberta.

As we have faced challenge through the world-wide pandemic, Sikhs have participated by helping other communities through delivering food and providing sewa, service. Today we see gurdwaras in many neighbourhoods of Alberta's major cities, signifying the success of Sikhism in Alberta. Mr. Speaker, Sikhism is a religion and culture of belonging. I'm proud to see that our government has built strong ties with Sikh communities. I know there will be continued success for every community in Alberta.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Agricultural Innovation Hubs

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. All of us in this Chamber know how vital agriculture is to our province. Today I bring a message from our southern rural communities. While we all know the pandemic, the invasion of Ukraine, and soaring inflation challenge every aspect of our lives, out on the Alberta landscape farmers plant crops with their famous dogged determination or, as I like to refer to it, the Albertan spirit. Farming requires accepting change and adopting practices that sustain soil and water.

Fortunately, in Alberta we have a class of nonprofit associations dedicated to finding the best ways for farmers to adapt to change. They are a network of regionally focused, on-farm innovation hubs across the province. The one closest to me is Farming Smarter, and it is a stellar example of what these associations contribute to our economy and vibrant rural communities. It operates with a privatized approach but focuses on the public good. Farmers trust information coming from these hubs and participate in setting direction and discovering best practices suited to their region. It is a board comprised of farmers, and its commitment to agriculture and innovation will never waver.

While going about the business of changing the way people farm, these hubs invest in people. Farming Smarter grew from one half-time position to 10 full-time specialists and 15 summer student technicians. It became Alberta's strongest regional innovation hub because of strong leadership and strong partnerships. Farming Smarter is a hub of postsecondary student learning, industry professional development, and on-farm research. It connects all prairie ag scientists directly to the landscape. Farming Smarter turns 10 in 2022, and we can expect it to remain on that landscape for decades to come. As long as it thrives, our agricultural industry also thrives.

Recent history illuminated the importance of domestic supply chains and food security. These associations reinforce both. We need to support these rural economic engines, and I urge this House to recognize the value and dedication the innovation hubs bring to our agricultural industry and invest in them. If they win, we all win.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

AISH and Income Support Indexation

Ms Renaud: In 2018 the NDP government introduced and passed legislation called An Act to Combat Poverty and Fight for Albertans with Disabilities, and that was a great day. The progressive legislation provided a one-time increase to AISH and income support recipients while automatically indexing the rates to inflation. Disability and antipoverty advocates had for decades asked the government to inflation-proof benefits so that disabled and low-income adults would be able to manage future increases of rent, food, and utilities. Inflation-proofing benefits was an important step to ending the downward spiral of grinding poverty while restoring a measure of dignity for those who rely on these benefits.

In 2018 all of the current UCP members and ministers, who were then PC and Wildrose members, supported this legislation. They shared personal stories and constituent examples on why indexing AISH and income support was so important. The legislation passed, and the path out of poverty for disabled Albertans was becoming visible.

In 2019, soon after forming government, the UCP summarily cut AISH and income support, immediately halting any progress out of poverty for tens of thousands of vulnerable Albertans. They said that times were tough and fiscal restraint was necessary, so they took it from disabled people while they directed tens of millions to a ridiculous war room, cut taxes for the wealthiest corporations, and bet billions on Trump's re-election. Not one single minister or government MLA stood up for disabled and low-income Albertans, and they all voted to take money from the poor and disabled. They are all complicit. They remain complicit.

Three years later inflation is at a 31-year high, and the cost of food, rent, utilities, and more has devastated household budgets for those already living in poverty. What disgusts me the most, Mr. Speaker, is not the blatant hypocrisy from this party but their selfishness and their weakness. They boast about a balanced budget thanks to record-high commodity prices when they know poverty is deepening. Food insecurity and homelessness are spreading as a direct result of these cuts, and still they do nothing. We will change that.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon has a statement to make.

NDP and UCP Government Records

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In 2019 the people of Alberta spoke clearly that they did not trust the NDP. They could not be trusted to oversee the energy sector as they appointed anti-oil activists and imposed the carbon tax. They could not be trusted to oversee the electricity file as they cost Albertans billions of dollars. They could not be trusted to control government spending as they created deficit after deficit and accumulated over a $60 billion debt. They could not be trusted to balance the budget but, rather, to tax and spend. They could not be trusted to oversee the agricultural sector after passing Bill 6. They could not be trusted to develop an educational curriculum that would address significant issues in math and language. The NDP could not be trusted to support parental choice or parental authority in our education system, refusing to allow any new charter schools while they threatened to close 27 independent schools. They could not be trusted to protect our democratic institutions as they legislated away secret ballots for union members, disenfranchised the election of Senators-in-waiting, and voted against the right of recall.

In contrast, this UCP government has passed close to 90 per cent of our campaign promises, bringing forward grassroots legislation like the right of recall, citizen-initiated referenda, and we brought back Senators-elect. The UCP promised to balance the budget: promise kept. The UCP promised to create jobs and lower taxes: promise kept. The UCP government passed legislation that recognized parental decision-making and choice in education while creating more charter schools. The UCP government has defended and expanded the oil and gas industry. The UCP government has introduced the AIOC program, that has done more to help First Nations become full partners in the Alberta economy than any of the empty left-wing rhetoric. The UCP diversified the economy, seeing huge gains in the film industry, the technology industry, the industrial hemp industry, the hydrogen industry, and the list could go on.

Mr. Speaker, as the 2023 election grows ever closer, the people of Alberta will be provided with a clear choice, and I think we know who they can trust.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Electric Utility Rebates Health Care System

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, an Albertan named Bobbi* wrote to me terrified to know her power could be turned off because she's fallen behind on her bills. You see, she's been off work since December because she needs surgery that, unfortunately, has now been delayed, and to make matters worse, her husband's construction job was shut down in January, around the time her whole family got COVID. Despite all of this, Bobbi has managed to stay on top of everything except the power bill. To the Premier: on what date exactly will Bobbi and her family get the rebate that he promised to them?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the NDP for having decided to stop blocking that legislation. We finally got it through the Legislature after their obstruction. It's now the law. It's received royal assent, and a clear direction has been given to the 40-plus electricity retailers in Alberta to deliver that $150 rebate on the bills of Albertans as soon as they possibly can. That is our full expectation.

Ms Notley: Well, if only Bobbi could get away with paying her bill as soon as she possibly can.

I'm focused on her and her family right now because no one over there is. For five months this UCP government has been on leadership campaign autopilot, and now we have a health care system that is literally flying into the side of a mountain. The Premier has lost his mandate to pursue radical restructuring, and he simply must reinvest in front-line care and start supporting the front-line workers he's ignored for years. Will the Premier commit to working on health care stability, not chaos, for once in this mandate?

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 1:52.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, regrettably, Bobbi is being forced to pay – her household is being forced to pay $600, if they're an average household in terms of their expenditures, on the Liberal-NDP carbon tax, the same carbon tax that this Conservative government repealed, the same carbon tax that we fought all the way to the Supreme Court, the same carbon tax that the NDP wants to quadruple. The leader of the NDP wants Bobbi not paying $600 but $2,400 in carbon tax, making her family poorer, making it tougher for her to pay her bills.

Ms Notley: Well, that was rather fanciful, Mr. Speaker. That was not what I was asking about. I was asking about health care.

Now, today I wrote the Premier outlining the tenuous nature of his mandate. The fact is that, going forward, Albertans need him to focus on stability and resourcing across the board on every issue rather than ideologically driven policies with consequences that will far outlast this Premier. Now is the time to help Albertans who can't afford their bills, who can't see a family doctor, and who want better from their government. Will the Premier do that, or is he still refusing to read the room?

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 1:54.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that the NDP leader sure didn't read the room of Albertans when she imposed the largest tax hike in Alberta history with the carbon tax, when she increased income taxes, increased taxes on employers, and created a jobs crisis in this province. This is the government that is cutting taxes, that scrapped the NDP carbon tax. While they want to raise the cost of living, this is the government that has scrapped the Alberta fuel tax, that is providing more consumer relief during this time of high inflation than any government in Canada bar none. Why did she and the NDP join into a coalition with Justin Trudeau with no demand for inflation protection for Canadians?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has the call.

Government Policies and Cost of Living

Ms Phillips: Albertans are working harder and harder; they're falling further and further behind. According to the latest figures Albertans took a 4 and a half per cent cut to their wages as weekly pay failed to keep pace with the rise in the cost of living, much of which is being caused by this interim UCP government. Income tax, property tax, tuition, park fees, insurance, utilities: all gone up under this acting government. In fact, economists say that these UCP cost increases are making inflation much worse. So why is this acting Premier, for now, adding more costs and driving up inflation, that leads to wage cuts for Albertans?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, this is the government that eliminated Alberta's fuel tax and has saved Albertans 13 cents a litre, delivering a $150 electricity rebate, consumer price protection for natural gas. That is the member and the party that wants to make life, especially fuel, more expensive. They want to quadruple the carbon tax in their coalition with Justin Trudeau. Why doesn't the member just admit it? They love to see the cost of living go up. They want to punish people for consuming energy.

Ms Phillips: All kinds of uncertainty in Alberta politics right now but one constant, this Premier's self-importance. Anyway, enough about yesterday's man.

Alberta's unemployment rate is higher than the national average. Calgary has the highest unemployment rate in the country amongst cities, and Alberta has had the slowest wage growth in the country for more than three years. The situation is so bad that even the Finance minister says that he can't afford to pay his bills. If the Finance minister can't afford his own bills while earning almost 200 grand a year, how can this government expect Albertans to pay theirs, and why won't he at least help out with people's cost of insurance? Is it his friends at Wellington who want him to run for leadership?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the party that gave us a jobs crisis and the worst economy in modern Alberta history has a lot of chutzpah to talk about the fastest growing economy in Canada, 165,000 net new jobs created since the beginning of last year, $70 billion of new investment over the past year, the first balanced budget in 14 years, with record investments in health and education, a government that's kept 90 per cent of its election promises, that beat Justin Trudeau and his no-more-pipelines act at the appeal court two weeks ago and is now acting more than any government to support . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, the cost of living is up; so is unearned pomposity.

According to a recent survey half of Albertans are just $200 away from not being able to pay their bills at the end of the month. That's the highest level in the country. But as Albertans fall further behind, the answer they get from the current Finance minister is to get a better job. Well, we all know the acting Premier is now looking for another job, and the Finance minister has his eyes on the Premier's seat, but not everyone has this luxury. What will the government do to help Albertans falling further and further behind on their bills as the UCP continues to add up more and more costs on utilities, insurance, taxes, and everything else they can find?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, it's simple. We eliminated the Alberta fuel tax. We're providing both consumer protection on gas prices and the electricity rebate. Why don't they just stand up and admit that it is NDP policy purposefully to make everything more expensive by quadrupling the NDP-Liberal carbon tax? How can they want to quadruple that tax, making it more expensive for people to heat their homes, while pretending to care about the cost of living?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Hospital Emergency Room Wait Times

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, Albertans want a government that is focused on fixing the urgent crisis in health care. The UCP's health care chaos has left many families without a doctor, and now those same families are being forced into the emergency room, where they're having to wait longer. According to AHS wait times in Calgary are at the highest point in two years in every single ER in the city. If the Premier is truly focused on the crisis, can he tell us why he spent the weekend trying to explain his resignation status to the people of Alberta rather than dealing with our overwhelmed ERs?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for the very important question. There is significant pressure on our emergency rooms, and that's why Alberta's government has added an additional 800 staff in emergency departments, more today than there were under the NDP. We've also added 230 more paramedics than two years ago, and 20 more fully staffed ambulances will shortly be operational in both Edmonton and Calgary. We've also hired 250 additional personnel to increase by 19 the number of baseline intensive care beds in our hospitals, and we're on track by September to add another 31 additional intensive care beds in our hospitals.

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, Albertans have watched this government fight with front-line health care workers for two years in the middle of a pandemic. The crisis is worse at Alberta Children's hospital, where the percentage of children seen by a doctor within four hours has dropped by half. Can the Premier put himself in the shoes of those parents and children lined up outside of the ER and tell Albertans what specific action he is taking to ensure that no child waits outside the ER ever again? Is this even a priority over there?

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member is right to raise concerns such as those, which are in part a result of the fact that while COVID is not currently a threat to our overall hospital capacity, it's still imposing a real burden. Many kids are getting COVID cases and being taken to the emergency ward. In addition, we've seen a spike in influenza cases, and there's an additional challenge with respect to acuity. Many people who did not present to hospitals or doctors through the COVID period have seen chronic conditions worsen. All of those things combined are placing a unique pressure on the system, which is why we've added $1.8 billion to the baseline health care budget.

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, Alberta lost 140 doctors last year. There are currently 24 communities with fully or partially closed hospitals, including many with no ER coverage over the long weekend. EMS red alerts are increasingly frequent, and dispatch is so overwhelmed that they're forced to hang up on calls. The Alberta Medical Association says that ERs are at the breaking point, beds are blocked, and urgent care is now being delivered in the hallway. Is this what the Premier wants his legacy to be? If not, what is he doing to fix it?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, speaking of legacies, one legacy of the NDP government is that they left us with the most expensive health care system in Canada, with some of the longest surgical and diagnostic wait times and the lowest per capita number of critical care beds of all 10 provinces. That is their shameful legacy. I'm proud that this government – as part of our $1.8 billion record additional investment in health care we've seen the hiring of some 230 additional paramedics. As I said, I believe it's 18 – 20 ambulances will be added both in Calgary and in Edmonton in the next few weeks.

Insulin Pump Program Consultation

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, many people with diabetes gave a deep sigh of relief when the UCP announced that they were pausing plans to cancel the insulin pump therapy program. However, that relief was lost last week after the UCP's inconsiderate, insincere consultation with that community. Instead of a listening ear, the diabetic community was met with scripted talking points, officials dodging questions, and an utter lack of empathy from their government for what thousands of dollars in new costs would mean for them. Will the Premier today admit that this was a sham consultation, apologize to the people who joined in, and tell us how he will truly listen to the diabetic community going forward?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, last week approximately 300 people participated in the town hall with Alberta Health. I don't know why the member would characterize their participation as being a sham. These are people with legitimate concerns and constructive feedback. I know the minister is intently listening to them. As you know, we've expanded access to more modern assistance for people who are coping with diabetes, and the minister has paused certain other changes fully to consult with the community of people living with diabetes.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, selling parks, coal mining in the Rockies, a disastrous curriculum: the UCP has a long history of insincere consultation. In this case they left the diabetic community questioning if the UCP actually plans to listen at all or if this is just a cruel attempt to buy some time before they continue with their original plan to cancel the program. Albertans already don't trust this government with their health care, and this kind of treatment for the diabetic community continues to undermine their trust. Is the Premier or is the minister simply killing time before cancelling the program like they always intended, or will they do better and actually listen to the diabetic community?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for raising this issue. It is an important issue. As I said two weeks ago, we put a pause. We said that we'd consult, and no one will be left behind. I give that commitment to the House. I give that commitment to the people who are affected by this program. I thank those, the 300 people, who participated in the town hall last week. That's the start of consultation, because we are not going to make any changes until we get this right.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, there's a crisis in EMS which the UCP has not addressed. Doctors are leaving the province at record rates, and the UCP has failed to adequately respond. There are lineups outside hospitals to access an emergency department; health care professionals burning out, not knowing how they can continue; surgeries being diverted and cancelled across the province; over 20 hospital closures in rural Alberta. The UCP has no answers or plans for any of those problems, so I have to ask. To the Premier: why are they focused on taking away insulin pumps for people, a choice that will undermine their health and make every one of those other problems worse?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I want to be clear. The intent of the changes that we announced was never to take away insulin pumps. We recognize that this community needs the insulin pumps, and we also recognize that this actually helps that community stay out of hospitals. Our intent in making the changes would be able to broaden access to different types of supports for this community. I recognize that we didn't get this right in terms of the announcement. That's why we're going to fix this. We are focused on fixing our entire health care system. We are investing an historic $1.8 billion additional money into it, and we'll get this right.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein has a question to ask.

Premier's Appearance before U.S. Senate Energy Committee

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Canadians and Americans are concerned about the cost of energy. Albertans know that prices are high because of the supply crunch created by Russia's criminal war coupled with failed policies from left-wing governments. We know that Albertans can rise to the world's energy needs and supply responsible and reliable Albertan energy to Americans and abroad. Can the Premier inform this House about his recent trip to testify before the U.S. Senate energy committee?

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Together with the ministers of environment and Energy I had the opportunity last week to make an historic presentation before the United States Senate committee on energy to make the point about how Alberta can be the solution to the global energy crisis, particularly for North American energy security. Our American friends are facing record-high fuel prices because of a scarcity, in part because of Russia's invasion of Ukraine. This province, with the third-largest oil reserves on Earth, can and must be part of the solution to displace dictator oil with responsibly produced Alberta energy.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Premier for his efforts. Given that Albertans deserve greater market access for their responsible and reliable energy and given that Americans deserve greater access to that very same Alberta energy and given that we know that failed left-wing policies have left this continent's energy infrastructure underdeveloped and increased Americans' reliance on oil from the world's worst regimes – Russia, Venezuela, Saudi Arabia – will the Premier tell us the response that he heard from Senators when he was down in the States?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the response from American Senators – I think there were 12 who attended the hearing and heard from Alberta – was amazingly positive. Democrat Senator Joe Manchin, chairman of the committee, said, “We must work together to chart a responsible path forward that’ll ensure security & unlock prosperity for [both of] our nations.” As he has said, Alberta is a key part of the solution to both North American and global energy security. We were delighted to get our message across at the highest levels of the American Capitol.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again to the Premier. Given that that is great news and given that the issue of energy security is one with life-and-death implications for people not only in the free world but right across this globe and given that, to paraphrase Senator John Barrasso of Wyoming, energy must be reliable and affordable, otherwise people suffer and sometimes die, can the Premier tell us what the outlook is for increased partnerships between America and Alberta on energy security for those who call this continent home?

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I informed the committee that there are currently about 300,000 barrels of unused capacity in the continental pipeline system, which we could fulfill this year, in addition to pipeline optimization, rail capacity, the pending completion of the Trans Mountain expansion, all of which could represent well over a million barrels of additional Alberta production. That means jobs in Alberta, it means more revenues for social programs here, and it means displacing OPEC oil. I was very pleased that the committee accepted my invitation to come to Alberta as soon as they can to see how we are leading the world on responsible energy production.

Violence Prevention

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, this weekend the North of McKnight Communities Society organized a town hall in my riding to address the proliferation of guns, rising gun violence, and increasing concerns about community safety. There have been 58 shootings in Calgary so far this year. The people I heard from feel abandoned by the UCP. They’re too focused on their own infighting to take real action, and they have only spoken out about keeping firearms in the hands of Albertans. Can the Minister of Justice rise in this House today and pledge specific actions to curb guns and gun violence in Calgary and throughout this province?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. It is an important question. There has been an alarming increase in violent crimes, particularly in our major urbans in the province, and that is a concern for this government. We will continue to make sure that our municipal police services have the adequate funding to be able to respond, and we will call on our municipalities to make sure that they work within the Police Act to make sure that our independent police commissions are making decisions about budgets to make sure that we have adequate funding for our police services in this province.

Mr. Sabir: Given that we have actually seen violence endorsed by the UCP, given that the members for Taber-Warner and Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland supported the Coutts blockade even after they stockpiled weapons and plotted to kill RCMP officers, and given that they have faced no sanction from the Premier or minister for their actions, will the minister rise and state for the House record that his colleagues were out of line endorsing the planned violence at Coutts and that he will personally talk to the Premier about removing them from the UCP government?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, let’s just say that when it comes to getting advice from the #defundpolice caucus over there, we’re not going to take any advice from them. We’re going to work with our police services throughout this province and make sure that they have the resources to be able to respond to the gun violence that we are seeing in our communities and make sure that we’re supporting those police officers in coming home safely to their families every night.

Mr. Sabir: Given that we have already seen a contestant in the UCP leadership race call for amnesty for those who plotted to kill cops at Coutts and given that members of the governing caucus have demonstrated through their actions that they may agree with her and given that the Minister of Transportation and some of her constituents were at the same town hall this weekend, will the Minister of Transportation rise and condemn any talk of amnesty for the Coutts blockaders, and will she pledge real action to curb guns and gun violence in the communities we both represent?

Mr. Shandro: Completely ridiculous, Mr. Speaker, as we expect to see from the NDP. We continue to see them advocating for ridiculous policies and ridiculous responses to various issues throughout this province. We will continue to work with our police services throughout the province, make sure that they have the resources to respond to the increasing rates in violent crime in this province while they will continue, as we’ve seen, to advocate for defunding the police.

Violence Prevention and Social Supports

Member Irwin: Last week two men were violently killed in Edmonton’s Chinatown in an unprovoked attack. They are remembered as hard-working, kind, and dedicated community members. Their families and many folks in Chinatown are looking for real solutions to improve safety, housing, and help those struggling with addictions and mental health. They don’t want blame or finger pointing between levels of government. Their message is clear: this can’t happen again. To the Premier: can we work together and with the city of Edmonton to help Chinatown?

Mr. Shandro: A really good question, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the member for that very thoughtful question. Let me just say on behalf of the entire House that our hearts are with the families of the victims of not just the two shootings that we’ve seen in Chinatown, but we’ve seen gun violence outside of pubs on Jasper Avenue and an increase generally in violent crime in Edmonton. That’s why the concerns right now that I would have with Edmonton city council in announcing an effective cut of $22 million to the Edmonton Police Service budget – it’s a concern, in particular the way that they’re proposing to do it, without even advising or working with the Edmonton Police Commission.

Member Irwin: Given that the communities I represent are home to some of the hardest to house folks – many of them live rough and in encampments. Given that a proven way to help support unhoused folks is through permanent supportive housing – it not only saves money; it saves lives, too – and while the city of Edmonton has attempted to expand permanent supportive housing, they’ve not received support yet from the UCP. There's never been a more critical time to invest in housing, so will the Minister of Seniors and Housing acknowledge the crisis that our communities are facing and commit today to prioritizing supportive housing?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, it's a great question. Thank you for the question, to the member. This is why we need to work – and we call the NDP to work with us – ensuring and calling on our municipalities to make sure that our police services throughout the province are getting the adequate funding that they need to be able to respond to violent crime throughout the province. It is time for us to make sure, in particular when we see increases in violent crime – this is not the time for us to have any municipalities decreasing the funding of police services in this province.

Member Irwin: Given that my constituents have pleaded for help to support the unhoused folks living in unsafe situations in their communities yet haven't had a response and no action from anyone in this provincial government – it's hard to understand the scope of the housing crisis and how many people are living rough unless you get out and you walk on the streets, in the ravine, in the parks, in the river valley – and given that my constituents have invited members of this cabinet to walk with them, on their behalf I want to just ask again: will any minister from this government join my constituents to just truly start to understand the severity of the housing crisis and the very dire need for action?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, hon. member, for bringing us some very important questions, and my condolences to those family and friends who have these tragedies happen in their family. Yes, from my colleagues and across ministries working on their plan to the meetings of the community leaders: they are working on a plan for how we're going to prevent these tragedies from happening again. As Seniors and Housing we are continuing to provide the budget and are looking to work with the municipalities, work with the city, work with the mayor to make sure that we provide affordable housing for the . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Federal-provincial Relations

Mr. Barnes: For Albertans, this government has failed to achieve a fair deal with Ottawa. Justin Trudeau continues to implement his just transition plan to phase out Alberta's leading industries, an immediate and pressing issue for oil and gas mining and other primary sector workers and rural communities. More than ever Albertans need an intergovernmental affairs minister willing to get tough. To the Premier: now that you've announced plans to step down, will you immediately resign as intergovernmental affairs minister to make way for someone who will stand up for Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. What I can say is that this government will be focused on the economy, on the people's business in the weeks and months ahead. From day one we made it a point to position this province for disproportionate investment attraction, job creation, and wealth creation. It's working. Investment is pouring in by the billions. Jobs are being created. In fact, our unemployment rate is lower than before the NDP took office.

Mr. Barnes: Given that I doubt the prospect of a lame-duck Premier writing more useless letters has Justin Trudeau quaking in his boots and given that on April 25 the members of this Assembly approved my motion to deploy every tool at this province's disposal to maximize its ability to achieve a fair deal for Alberta and given that the current intergovernmental affairs minister has achieved no progress towards a fair deal nor has even launched formal negotiations, to the Premier: when will you pass the baton to another member who is actually interested in achieving a fair deal?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, I was proud to be with the Premier and the Minister of Energy down in Washington last week advancing the interests of this province further than any government in history when it comes to our oil and gas industry with Washington, standing up for the birthright of all Albertans, a sharp contrast from what that hon. member and the NDP have done in their time in government. I will remind you of just a few weeks ago, when we won a historical case in the Alberta Court of Appeal on Bill C-69, standing up for Albertans. That is some significant work by this government, and we're going to continue to do what we need to do to defend the people of Alberta.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, given that on November 18 this Assembly approved a motion to recognize the results of the equalization referendum and given that the equalization program is up for renewal in just 2024 and given that any changes to the program must be negotiated prior to that deadline and given that Justin Trudeau has a deal with the NDP to keep themselves in office well beyond this current Premier's tenure, to the Premier: isn't your continued tenure as intergovernmental affairs minister now effectively counterproductive to Alberta families' best interest?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, while that member has focused on tag lines and Internet memes, this government has focused on getting things done: again, a historical win to defeat the NDP and the Liberals' no-more-pipeline law, Bill C-69, done by this government just a few weeks ago, and just last week again in the Senate for a historical hearing to be able to move Alberta's energy interests forward. That's what this government is doing, real, concrete action, and you're going to continue to see it.

Confined Feeding Operation Proposal

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, a lot of government policy just stinks, and oftentimes it's complete bull, figuratively speaking, of course. But trust this government to turn cliché into reality: literal cow manure, 36 tonnes a day, to be precise, dumped into the Pigeon Lake watershed if the government allows a proposed feedlot on the west shore of Pigeon Lake. There are health risks from existing cattle manure runoff: gastrointestinal illness; skin, ear, or eye infections. Can the minister justify why this feedlot location, where families vacation, people live, and children swim in the lake, is in any way acceptable?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we're proud in Alberta to have one of the best regulatory systems in the world. Confined feedlots are regulated by the NRCB. I don't – and none of my colleagues – interfere with the regulatory system. We have strong environmental rules. We trust the regulatory system to do their job. No, we will not listen to the NDP's calls to break the law.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that I'm just asking the government to protect Pigeon Lake and given that I have received hundreds of e-mails from folks across the province with concerns about this project and given that when I was out there door-knocking last week to hear residents' concerns, folks were unanimously opposed to the location of this project and given that users of this area could only find out about the short window for feedback through a small weekly flyer and didn't have time to provide feedback or ask questions – I can't help but feel that this supposed consultation effort stinks – will the minister pause the project, go back into the community, and provide genuine consultation and public engagement?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I don't have the authority to do that. Again, unlike the NDP, I will not interfere with an independent regulator. That said, we have very significant water regulations and rules inside this province that will ensure that Pigeon Lake is protected. The NRCB has a good track record of making sure that those rules are enforced. We will let the regulator do the job free of political interference. Again, to the hon. member: he should stop trying to interfere with regulatory agencies inside this province. It is against the law.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that I'll never apologize for trying to protect Pigeon Lake and given that a large community event was held with presentations, speakers, hundreds of attendees, and advocates hoping to find a way to make this project better for the community and given that the information shared could have been of value but, unfortunately, not a single UCP MLA, including the MLA for Maskwacis-Wetaskiwin, showed up and given that it was made clear at the community event that people in Pigeon Lake think that this decision literally stinks, does the Minister of Indigenous Relations and the local MLA even care, or would he rather just hold his nose and avoid talking to people who do care about . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, that does not surprise me. It has been my experience that the NDP does not respect the rule of law, but the Conservative Party does. Again, we have strong environmental rules that will protect Pigeon Lake, and we trust the NRCB to do its job, including the hon. Indigenous affairs minister, who works very hard on behalf of his constituents each and every day. He is keeping tabs on what is taking place at the NRCB. But, again, we will not politically interfere with an independent regulator, ever.

Edmonton Downtown Revitalization

Mr. Bilous: Downtowns across the province are struggling, and Edmonton is no exception. The office vacancy rate sits at almost 20 per cent. People have not returned to the downtown core, and I regularly hear concerns from residents and small-business owners about safety concerns. These are big issues to tackle, and the UCP does not have a plan. All they could muster for downtown Edmonton was $5 million in their last budget. To the minister: why such little support from the UCP for our province's capital city?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, cities around the world are dealing with the challenges of bringing workers back to the downtown offices. Alberta is no different than any other jurisdiction around the world. That being said, right now we're working with our Edmonton metro working group. They're going to give us advice on how best to move forward here in our province. That being said, we want to make sure that our downtowns are safe. As our Justice minister has recently said, we want to make sure that our municipal partners are investing in police to make sure our city cores are safe when people come back to the workplace.

Mr. Bilous: Given that the UCP has finally received the report on revitalizing downtown Calgary and that many of the recommendations for Calgary include support for wraparound services, including housing and mental health and addictions, and given that we're dealing with a housing and opioid crisis in downtown Edmonton that's leading to concerns about safety – in fact, the Edmonton Chamber has identified this as one of their top priorities – will this government finally listen to their own working group and the business community by investing in these services that can help vulnerable Albertans and partner with the city to enhance safety and revitalize our downtown?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, you know, I thank the member for the question. As I've indicated in this House before, this is a very complex problem. A very close friend and ally of the members opposite in the NDP, of course, is a city councillor in Edmonton. He has a couple of policy examples which are to exempt people in Edmonton from minor possession but also trafficking of drugs, so I'd like to know. The member opposite: does he support the policy of supporting drug traffickers? I have some serious concerns, because I'm pretty sure the people of Alberta have concerns about the NDP supporting drug traffickers.

Mr. Bilous: Given that those comments are absurd and offensive and given that the UCP has left money on the table for affordable housing and thrown up barriers for accessing mental health and addiction support and given that the mayor of Edmonton said that the UCP is chronically underfunding these services in Edmonton, which is holding Edmonton's economy back, why is this government failing to support our downtown and holding back Edmonton's economy? And please stop blaming. Take responsibility. You hold the pen to funding; fund them.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs has risen.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member knows as well as the mayor of Edmonton knows, the funding between the major cities is based on a formula. The formula is applied equally to both cities, and they each get what they get. That being what it says, Budget '22 has $118 million over the next three years to begin implementation of a plan to put 25,000 more affordable homes in Alberta over the next 10 years. We've got $588 million as part of our support for LRT projects, $371 million towards an Edmonton hospital, $142 million towards the Gene Zwozdesky centre, $92 million towards the Terwillegar expansion. There's so much more we're doing. We're doing lots for . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge is next.

Economic Recovery and Job Creation

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Calgary-Falconridge is a constituency in northeast Calgary which is full of people excited to contribute to Alberta's economic recovery. Many of the people in that area of the city are newcomers to our province who are looking for long-term careers to establish themselves and families in Alberta. To the hon. Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation: as we work to diversify the economy, what types of job opportunities does that create for my constituents under a UCP government?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to that member for the question. There is good news right now. Our unemployment rate is down to 5.9 per cent across Alberta, the lowest that it's been since early 2015. People from across Canada are now moving to our province for high-paying jobs and affordable cost of living. Our logistics industry: you could look at warehousing, manufacturing. You look at the film and television industry. On top of that, the tech sector, the first quarter of 2022: $466 million, a new record for Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that Alberta's unemployment rate is now lower than it was when the NDP took office thanks to the UCP government's job-growth policies and given that more people are moving back to Alberta and Calgary to find good employment, to the same minister: what is the UCP government doing to bring jobs back to Alberta and make life more affordable in our province?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, it has been the mandate of this government since day one to make sure Alberta has the best possible business investment environment. From making sure that we've lowered the corporate tax rate down to 8 per cent with our job-creation tax cut, eliminating red tape, we're well on our way to getting to that 33 per cent mark that we set. People didn't think it was possible, but we've done it. We're working that way. Alberta is back. We've built up that reputation again. People are putting billions of dollars to work in our province. Thousands of jobs are being created across our province.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that northeast Calgarians are happy to see those unemployment numbers under the UCP government and given that the NDP drove thousands of jobs out of our province when they were in office as a result of their terrible policies and tax hikes, to the same minister: what are some of the large, job-creating investments in and around northeast Calgary that have brought Alberta back to life?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, one of the industries right now that doesn't get a huge amount of play in the media is the logistics and warehousing industry. Right now Alberta is a hub when it comes to getting goods from the Pacific Ocean across Canada with our access to the port of Prince Rupert and port of Vancouver. We're seeing warehouse after warehouse going up; amazing job opportunities in warehousing as well as logistics that are happening right now across our province. That is just one industry of many. We also have the film and television industry. Right now in our province we've effectively doubled that during our time in office. That's an exciting industry. Lots of career prospects here in diversified industries.

Land Titles Registry Delays

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, typically it should take a few days and, at peak times, maybe a couple of weeks to register land title documents, but currently there is a three-month delay for Service Alberta to register such land titles. This is holding up real estate transactions such as buying or building a new home, and ultimately it's holding back our economy. Meanwhile the UCP is only focused on their internal drama. Why is the government allowing their infighting to hold back our economy? Did they really spend so much time fighting with each other that they completely forgot about the important work of the land titles office?

Mr. Glubish: Well, Mr. Speaker, it appears as though the member opposite has forgotten everything that I shared with him during our budget process earlier in the year. If he remembered what we talked about, he would know that we approved in Budget 2022 over $9 million of additional funding to address the challenges in the land titles office. I want to assure all Albertans that we are investing in building capacity in this system so that we can deliver timely results for those Albertans who are looking to purchase or sell real property in a timely manner.

Mr. Carson: Well, given that these land title delays can lead to confusion around where municipal tax bills are sent as we head into tax season and given that this confusion can lead to bills being sent to the wrong owner, which can lead to Albertans being penalized for late property tax payments, and given that this is through no fault of their own – instead, these delays are the direct result of the UCP government's incompetence – is this government prepared to cover late fees if assessments are sent to the wrong owner?

Mr. Glubish: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it perfectly clear that part of the reason why there are delays in our land titles office is because our systems are so old. In fact, they predate the Internet, and what that means is that when the NDP were in government, they did nothing to prepare for future growth in this province. Well, we will not make that same mistake. We are investing in building capacity in our land titles system and modernizing it to prepare for the future because – you know what? – Alberta is back. Our volumes in our land titles office are over 100 per cent higher than they were last year. That's a good sign. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Carson: Well, given that this government already tried to sell off land titles after being lobbied by the Premier's former chief of staff and given that this deal would have provided a 35-year contract to a private company that would have substantially increased fees and given that this deal was in the final stages of closing and the UCP had already started laying off staff, leading to the delays we see today, why is this government more concerned with helping their friends and insiders than Albertan families who are trying to buy their home?

Mr. Glubish: Well, Mr. Speaker, once again the members opposite do not have any idea about what the truth is. Yes, it's true that we investigated and did due diligence on a possible transaction that could maybe have added value for Albertans through a concession agreement, and – guess what? – that due diligence showed us that we should not proceed, and we did not proceed.

Mr. Speaker, the member is alleging that we would have done something that would have increased fees, when, in fact, we made it very clear that the fees would be in the control of the government no matter what decision we made. We are always looking out to protect Albertans, unlike the members opposite, who did absolutely nothing to prepare Alberta for the future.

Residential School Gravesite Identification at Saddle Lake Cree First Nation

Mr. Feehan: Last week the Saddle Lake Cree Nation announced that they had uncovered human remains likely belonging to children at the Blue Quills residential school. The lead investigator for the nation obtained records showing that between 1898 and 1931 212 students died at the school. The community discovered what they believe to be a mass grave in 2004 and has requested that the federal government pay for two pieces of ground-penetrating radar equipment so that their own surveyors can conduct the search. What supports and resources has the Minister of Indigenous Relations offered to the First Nations to help them in identifying this tragedy?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. This is a very important question right now with what's been going on. We worked closely with Saddle Lake. As you know, we put out our community research grant. They applied for it and did receive it. We don't tell them how to use the money or what it could be used for, but it can be used for the ground-penetrating radar. It could be used for elder groups to talk about the problem or how to move forward with it. That money has gone out the door. They have received it, and we're working closely with the community.

Mr. Feehan: Given that the Saddle Lake Cree First Nation also requested funding for mental health services to support witnesses as people are encouraged to come forward and given that the investigative team believes that there could be more missing children than the 212 who have been accounted for in the records and given that the First Nations have been historically underfunded when it comes to mental health funding, what mental health supports for this community dealing with this unfathomable tragedy has the Minister of Indigenous Relations provided, and will he commit to delivering more?

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, along with the community research grant we did put out mental health grants, which they also received. There was also money set aside through Alberta Health for the general population throughout all of Alberta to help. These are going to be ongoing issues. The trauma that's going to come out of this is going to be huge, and we recognize that. We know it's going to be an ongoing situation. We want to work with these communities to make sure that they're able to get through this difficult time. That's why I travel across the province, speaking with people and trying to work with the communities to help them get through this difficult time.

Mr. Feehan: Given that this work has been traumatic on the team who have uncovered the bodies while digging graves for reburial, including members of the community, and given that the investigation team has predicted that there could be more than the 212 bodies indicated by the available records and given that it is said that in the past many families were afraid or unable to speak out when a child never returned home, what is the minister doing to ensure that Saddle Lake Cree First Nation and any other community can access the resources needed to identify and address any missing children or mass graves on the site of the former residential schools?

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Wilson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Like I said, this is going to be an ongoing issue across Alberta. There were many residential schools across Alberta, and this is going to be a situation that's going to carry on for quite some time, unfortunately. We're working closely – I've worked with the University of Alberta, who have a program there. We're helping them as they help with ground-penetrating radar. We've also worked with some private corporations that are going to be doing the work for free.

Mr. Speaker, this is going to be an ongoing thing. There is a helpline for the survivors. It's a national crisis line. If you need more information on that, please contact my office, and we'll help you with that.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Early Childhood Education

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last Friday, May 20, we celebrated Early Childhood Educator Day. The minister's award of excellence in childhood development recognizes the important work of early childhood educators and providers. I'm proud to note that one of the winners, the Aboriginal Head Start program at the Grande Prairie Friendship Centre, is from my constituency. Early childhood educators are passionate, enthusiastic, and skilled individuals who dedicate every day to care for and educate the next generation, and I thank them. To the Minister of Children's Services: what are you doing to recognize these exceptional individuals?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As the member noted, this award highlights exceptional early childhood educators and programs right across the province. Last Friday we were able to have a virtual celebration with the award recipients to congratulate them on their win, and today we have a number of them here at the Legislature as well as in the gallery. It is truly a pleasure to be able to thank them for the very important work that they do. I also want to thank all early childhood educators right across the province for all that they do to support kids and families.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again, through you, to the minister for her answer. Given that Alberta's government has recently made many exciting investments related to the federal-provincial child care deal and given that we know quality child care cannot exist without quality educators and further given that the Minister of Children's Services has previously mentioned upcoming early childhood education workforce supports as part of the overall child care plan, a made-in-Alberta plan, to the same minister: what are you doing in the immediate term to support these educators and grow the workforce for tomorrow?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The federal-provincial child care deal has absolutely been a game changer for Alberta families. I am absolutely positive that this would not have been possible without the dedication and passion of early childhood educators right across Alberta. We continue to provide among the highest wages in Canada for early childhood educators, but we know that there is more to do. There is more exciting news to come. We are engaging on exactly what those next steps are right now, and I know that there will be great news when it comes to professional development and additional supports for educators very soon.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again, through you, to the minister for that answer. Given that we know this minister is committed to addressing current issues in the early childhood education, or ECE, workforce and given that we've seen her incredible work on the made-in-Alberta child care deal and given that early childhood educators are highly skilled professionals whose contributions play an integral role in Alberta's economy and, of course, in the development of our children, to the same minister: what is Alberta's government doing to build a long-term early childhood education strategy to ensure Albertans can access quality child care for generations to come?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Our first priority was to roll out these affordability dollars for parents so that parents could be confident in getting their children back into these spaces and increasing our enrolment in all child care spaces right across the province. We also announced $7 million, doubling the investments we put into inclusive child care training, very important, right across the province in every single type of space. We can double the amount of educators and programs that are able to offer these supports, and we have $300 million dedicated to supporting our early childhood workforce. On that, I'm excited to say that there's more news to come.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will continue to the remainder of the daily Routine.

Emergency Medical Services

Mr. Nielsen: I want to start by offering my deepest thanks and the thanks of the entire opposition caucus to Alberta's EMS and paramedics for their heroic work under tremendous pressures during the pandemic and afterwards. Even when facing stressful situations, fewer resources, and more and more work, they still show up and they go to work saving lives. They are facing burnout, exhaustion but still go out to help Albertans. Albertans appreciate the work and know the sacrifices that these front-line heroes are making and do support them.

The UCP's plan is to continue ignoring the crisis and even, disgustingly, to ask advanced care paramedics to take a pay cut. Our caucus has warned about the increasing number of red alerts, instances where in our largest cities there are no ambulances available to respond to emergencies. We have stood with paramedics to present the data that shows clearly that, under the UCP, ambulance response times have been progressively worsening this past year alone. There is no clearer evidence of this crisis that has developed under the UCP than the image of 14 ambulances waiting outside the Red Deer hospital, waiting to drop off patients for care.

Rather than seeing and hearing the concerns and warnings from the front line, the UCP has chosen instead to ignore the problem in hopes it will simply address itself. The Education minister and the Health minister have tried to dismiss the crisis by claiming that this is a Canada-wide problem, as if that stale talking point somehow provides comfort to Albertans who, thanks to the UCP, now have to worry, if they're injured or in an accident, how long it will take an ambulance to arrive, if one will even arrive. For the past two years the UCP have sat back and watched as this crisis has developed.

The NDP won't do that. We will stand with paramedics. As a government we will work with them to ensure they have the support, resources, and partners to ensure they can do their essential work.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Health Care in Northern Alberta

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In 2019 the value of major projects in the Northern Alberta Development Council region was just over $60 billion. Northern Alberta is the economic powerhouse in Alberta, and the people who make sure that northern Alberta continues to be an economic powerhouse feel left behind. My constituents are unable to deliver their babies in their hospitals; they have long wait times to see a physician, if they can find one; the emergency rooms are often closed; and, to make matters worse, when my constituents drive to the nearest city to take care of their medical needs, they are often met with potholes and frost heaves. These conditions are getting out of hand, and they are unfair to the Albertans who work so hard to contribute to the prosperity of this province, especially when they are seeing other Albertans receive first-class services often on northern Alberta's dime.

Mr. Speaker, we can't just tell the people of Bonnyville, Cold Lake, and St. Paul to move to a place to get better access. We need these people in these communities. My constituents have rich and very diverse histories in these regions. Also, these individuals run our oil sites, our logging industries, and our farms that are located there. As many of my colleagues have pointed out in this House before, transferring wealth from one area in which it is generated through hard work and responsible fiscal policies to another area that frivolously spends is unfair. Northern Alberta is starting to feel like they are contributing equalization payments to large city centres to pay for public transit and ring roads.

Let me be clear, Mr. Speaker. I want Alberta to be prosperous, but it is time that we start to look at the needs of northern Alberta and take action. If we contribute so much to Alberta's GDP, then why can't staff be paid more in our regions so that we have reliable access to emergency rooms, obstetrician departments, and education? Before we look for a fair deal for Alberta, we need to look for a fair deal within Alberta. Let's look at addressing these problems and not leaving the Albertans who run the economic powerhouse behind.

Go, Oilers, go.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Government Record

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to bring recognition to everything this government has done and continues to do, from building and strengthening relationships to being exceptional representatives to Alberta. We are showing that Alberta is a place you can be confident in investing in and a region you can trust. Not too long ago the Premier hosted Senator Manchin for a tour of our oil and gas sector. During the tour the Premier provided a strong voice for our resources and a road map to reducing the world's dependency on dictator oil. Just last week the Premier also made a resounding case for a North American energy alliance as he appeared before the Senate energy committee in Washington, DC.

In the past three years alone we have reached more meaningful accomplishments, created more jobs, and sparked more investments in Alberta than the NDP ever did. We did so by doing something they never did: listening to Albertans. You know what, Mr. Speaker? We will continue to do just that. As elected members of this Legislature it is our duty to advocate for our province and its residents. It is a privilege to do so, that we can never take for granted. Our government has taken this duty very seriously, and the results we've achieved in just three years are remarkable, and it's only the beginning.

By building bridges, the Premier and our government have given Alberta's voice more weight in jurisdictions all around the world. This is paving the way for new opportunities to be explored in our province. It is for this reason that I am extremely proud of our government and its efforts. I eagerly anticipate our province reaping well into the future the fruits of success our government has been able to plant in proving Alberta's voice abroad, and, Mr. Speaker, we are far from finished.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Early Childhood Educators

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last Friday, May 20, was early childhood educator day in Alberta, and I wanted to take the opportunity to highlight the important work of these individuals. Early childhood educators are hard-working and skilled professionals who look after our children every day. The trust we instill in these people is immense, but it is earned. As we know, in many cases early childhood educators love the children in their care as though they were their own.

Mr. Speaker, early childhood educators provide essential daytime care, without which many parents would not be able to participate in the workforce or go to school. In Fort McMurray, in the region that does not sleep, where energy companies produce Alberta and Canada's revenues 24 hours a day, seven days a week, we need the support of these early childhood educators to provide overnight care for families that have parents working the night shift in Alberta's energy sector. This care is vital to our economy because it enables parents to contribute to the prosperity of this province and nation.

Early childhood educators also play a critical role in shaping the future. The early childhood years are critical for knowledge development and building a foundation for lifelong learning. Through fun, creativity, and learning ECEs shape Alberta's youngest children into leaders of tomorrow. Every year the Minister of Children's Services recognizes the most outstanding in educators through the minister's awards of excellence in child development. We are joined in the gallery today by some of the recipients of this award. I want to take the opportunity to thank all early childhood educators for their important work and for shaping the future leaders of tomorrow. Through you, Mr. Speaker, thank you.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, as chair of the Select Special Information and Privacy Commissioner Search Committee I am pleased to table the committee's report recommending the appointment of Diane McLeod as Information and Privacy Commissioner for a five-year term commencing on August 1, 2022. Copies of this report will be available online.

Thank you always so much, Mr. Speaker.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The hon. the Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to give notice of two motions. First is Government Motion 30, to be put on the Order Paper in my name as follows:

Be it resolved that (a) the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices is the all-party committee of the Legislative Assembly as referred to in section 131.1 of the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act for the purpose of considering a draft amendment to section 8 of the publication ban, court applications and orders, regulations proposed to be made under section 131(1)(d.1) of that act; (b) the committee may without leave of the Assembly sit during a period when the Assembly is adjourned or prorogued; and (c) the committee must submit its report to the Assembly within three months of the day on which it commences its consideration of the draft regulation.

I also rise, Mr. Speaker, to give oral notice of Government Motion 31, also to go on the Order Paper in my name.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly concur in the report of the Select Special Information and Privacy Commissioner Search Committee tabled on May 24, 2022, Sessional Paper 117/2022, and recommend to Lieutenant Governor in Council that Diane McLeod be appointed as Information and Privacy Commissioner for the province of Alberta for a term of five years effective August 1, 2022.

The Speaker: I am not sure that it's needed, but knowing that we have an introduction of bills, perhaps the Government House Leader might be willing to extend the Routine.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It will be close, so, yes, I would like to extend the Routine.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the Government House Leader.

Miscellaneous Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to move first reading of Bill 24, which will be the Miscellaneous Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, as you know and the Chamber knows, a common piece of legislation in a legislative sitting.

This includes amendments that'll be housekeeping in nature that will provide clarity on several acts of Alberta. Mr. Speaker, a fairly simple piece of legislation, and I hope it has the support of all members of the House.

[Motion carried; Bill 24 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The Opposition House Leader has a tabling.

Ms Gray: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Actually, I have seven tablings, with your indulgence. Opening comment: they are all related to Bill 17, where the sponsoring minister had said that he'd received not a single letter or e-mail and that the concerns being raised by the opposition were imaginary.

My first tabling is strong concerns from the University of Lethbridge postdoctoral association.

My second tabling is an e-mail of strong concerns from the University of Lethbridge graduate bargaining team.

My third tabling is a letter signalling strong concerns from the University of Alberta Postdoctoral Fellows Association.

My fourth: a letter of strong concerns from a six-year academically employed grad student and PhD candidate who previously sat as the VP of the Graduate Students' Association at the University of Alberta.

My next is from the University of Calgary Graduate Students' Association, particularly their Labour Relations Committee. Again, strong, strong objections to Bill 17.

A University of Calgary graduate student has written in to the minister.

As well, from the Athabasca University Faculty Association, again expressing strong concerns with Bill 17.

I table these letters and correspondence for the record.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order, and the hon. the deputy government whip has withdrawn his points of order.

That leads us to Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Bill 17

Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to rise and move third reading of Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

Mr. Speaker, as I have said previously in this House, Bill 17 introduces changes that would improve Albertans' access to bereavement and reservist leaves and maintain the status quo at postsecondary institutions. Proposed changes to reservist leave would better address reservists' need to take time off work to attend annual training by removing the 20-day limit on the amount of time reservists can take for this training. To recognize the pain and grief of those who lose an unborn child, Albertans experiencing the end of a pregnancy other than as a result of a live birth would have access to unpaid bereavement leave regardless of the reason or timing for the end of the pregnancy. Other proposed changes would maintain the status quo at postsecondary institutions by allowing academic staff, graduate students, and postdoctoral fellow associations to continue to have exclusive right to represent their members in collective bargaining negotiations.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

We have heard much debate on the proposed changes in this bill, Madam Speaker, and I thank all members for their thoughtful contributions.

I am pleased that we have had broad support for the changes to the reservist leave. These changes recognize the vital role reservists play in protecting the country by making sure they can take the time they need for annual training while keeping their civilian employment. They will continue to be required to give their employers four weeks' notice and include the anticipated return-to-work date before taking reservist leave, which can help employers plan for their absence. Once again, Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague the Member for Leduc-Beaumont for his commitment to the men and women who put on the Canadian military uniform, members of the Canadian Armed Forces for sharing their views with him and for their service. With these changes, reservists would have the time they need for their annual training.

Madam Speaker, we have had a thorough discussion on bereavement leave. We voted on an amendment that provides a broad approach to address any situation where a pregnancy ends other than as a result of a live birth, regardless, once again, of the reason or timing for the end of the pregnancy. I do want to thank the MLA for Sherwood Park and Ms Aditi Loveridge, the founder and CEO of the Pregnancy & Infant Loss Support Centre, for their advocacy and help in this regard. I would also like to thank the members of this House and others who have spoken about the importance of making bereavement leave available to any employee who experiences pregnancy loss.

As we have discussed in this House, the legislation does not mention any specific examples of pregnancy loss. Madam Speaker, this is intentional. The legislation uses general terminology to make it clear that any employee experiencing the end of a pregnancy other than as a result of live birth is eligible for bereavement leave. To be clear, this includes miscarriage, stillbirth, abortion, and other medical termination and other specific situations that may not have come up while debating this legislation.

Madam Speaker, this wording, "other than as a result of a live birth," is already used in the Employment Standards Code specifically for maternity leave, where employees whose pregnancy ends within 16 weeks of the due date have access to maternity leave. Including specific examples of pregnancy loss in the legislation raises the risk that we will leave some circumstances out or create confusion for people on whether there is a difference in who is covered under maternity leave and bereavement leave provisions. The length of bereavement leave is also staying the same, at a total of three days per calendar year.

Madam Speaker, the third set of changes in Bill 17 allows academic staff, graduate students, and postdoctoral fellow associations to continue to give their members strong representation at the collective bargaining table. During debate on this bill some members commented on whether stakeholders were consulted about this change. I would like to speak briefly about that.

Both the former Minister of Labour and Immigration and the Minister of Advanced Education discussed the exclusive right of these associations to represent their members during meetings with postsecondary faculty associations in 2021. The majority of these associations indicated that they support continuing to give academic staff, graduate students, and postdoctoral fellow associations the exclusive right to represent their members. Madam Speaker, academic staff, graduate students, and postdoctoral fellow associations have the experience and the expertise to represent their members. They also have existing relationships with postsecondary administrations. Allowing them to continue to have the exclusive right to represent their members will ensure a continuity of experience, expertise, and stability.

Madam Speaker, Bill 17 preserves the status quo at postsecondary institutions while improving employees' access to reservist and bereavement leaves. It allows academic staff, graduate students, and postdoctoral fellows to continue to receive strong representation from their associations, and it allows our brave men and women in uniform and those who have lost a pregnancy to take needed time away from work without the fear of losing their employment.

For these reasons, Madam Speaker, I move third reading of Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others wishing to join debate on Bill 17? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise in third reading to talk about the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. I would like to focus my comments on the changes in the Labour Statutes Amendment Act contained in Bill 17 specifically because in his third reading speech just now the minister has stated as fact that the majority of associations have asked for and want this change while acknowledging during the Committee of the Whole debate that he did not reach out to and talk to graduate student associations or postdoctoral fellow associations across this province.

I've just finished tabling seven letters that the minister has received in the past week from associations at the University of Calgary, the University of Alberta, the University of Lethbridge, Athabasca University, all making clear their strong objections to these sections. Given that the minister during debate in Committee of the Whole suggested that the Official Opposition was raising imaginary problems and now we know that these were very, very real concerns, Madam Speaker, at this point I would like to introduce an amendment to third reading.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, this will be known as amendment REC1.

Hon. member, please proceed to read it into the record.

Ms Gray: I move that the motion for third reading of Bill 17, Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following: "Bill 17, Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be not now read a third time but that it be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of reconsidering section 2."

Madam Speaker, this amendment is not to prevent Bill 17's final passage. However, I think that this Assembly and particularly this minister did not have the full facts and information while we debated at Committee of the Whole and that there should be an opportunity to return to Committee of the Whole so that this bill can be improved and the concerns of incredibly important stakeholders, who are experiencing an extreme power differential between their employment status and their employers, can be considered and put into the record.

Now, I will remind you, Madam Speaker, that during debate at Committee of the Whole the minister said that he had received not a single letter or e-mail on this particular issue, that he had not heard a single negative report on the bill, that we were referring to "imaginary problems," and that he was "absolutely committed to the well-being of our postgraduate and postdoctoral fellows that work in our great postsecondary institutions." Given that we now have letters from many of these associations suggesting, first, that they were never consulted, that no one had reached out to them to get their input on these sections, and, secondly, that they strongly object to Bill 17 and the impact it will have on them, I find it very problematic that we continue on in third reading without going back to Committee of the Whole, where we can have a more fulsome debate.

Now, I have tabled seven key pieces of correspondence that are representative of the workers in this sector and their perspective on this piece of Bill 17. Certainly, we heard during debate at Committee of the Whole that the minister said that the current arrangement is working and there have not been complaints. I really must stress that people, particularly in the graduate student and postdoctoral sector, were not complaining because they were anticipating being able to have their constitutionally protected rights to collectively bargain upheld once the timelines had passed, timelines that Bill 17 is now going to interfere with.

Certainly, some of the letters included: "Without proper consultation, the UCP Government has put our workers in a precarious situation. We deserve autonomy in the decision of who we choose to represent us." Other letters spoke to how "deeply troubled" they were with "recent assertions that post-secondary associations were consulted prior to the introduction of Section 2 of Bill 17," because, as we now know, they were not, that the legislation "being considered is a testament to the complete lack of consultation with those impacted." Certainly, several of the authors of these pieces of correspondence really wanted to flag that the "bill was introduced during final exams and during the time when Graduate Student Associations are in the process of rolling over to a newly elected executive" and that the bill was introduced "during one of the busiest times of the year" for graduate students, again, I will repeat, Madam Speaker, after they had not been consulted in any way, shape, or form.

Now, I have tabled these seven pieces. I suspect that the minister may have received more than just those seven pieces, but I want to thank all those who wrote in and copied the Official Opposition so that we could make sure that this was put on the record. This correspondence was received during the constituency break, which I hope gave the minister ample time to review and potentially even reach out to these organizations.

Given how important this is and how seriously this impacts fundamentally important, constitutionally protected rights of freedom of association and to collectively bargain, I believe that this amendment, which would move us back to Committee of the Whole, is entirely appropriate and should be supported by all members, including the minister who has moved third reading and has moved this bill. I hope to hear from said minister, particularly given the divergence of opinions between what he has stated repeatedly through debate – and now we get into third reading – about how widely supported this section is with the evidence that it is not the case, particularly for graduate students and postdoctoral fellowship associations.

For that reason, I move this amendment. I look forward to hearing more of the debate on this particular piece. I encourage all members of this Assembly to support this amendment so that we do not pass Bill 17 in a form that will remove the rights from these workers, workers who deserve to be consulted, workers who deserve to have a government who respects their valuable contributions and is prepared to listen to their concerns.

With that, I will conclude my remarks, and I look forward to the debate. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other speakers to the debate? The hon. Member for Peace River.

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I will address the amendment put forward by my hon. colleague, but I will do that in just a moment. I think it's interesting that they're now trying to slow down progress on this bill, which is strange because there was a convergence, strange bedfellows in politics perhaps, where we had two different sides of the aisle and two very different sides of the political spectrum within these two coalitions of the NDP and the Conservatives coming together on the amendment we saw in Committee of the Whole.

It's that amendment that I think is why this is so important that we not delay and why we move forward so quickly. I understand – and I'm happy to be corrected by members opposite – that from the labour-intensive, socialist point of view the concern was making sure that workers' rights are concerned and protected in this legislation, so the goal was to say that we need to expand the definition of who could be able to get bereavement leave.

This bill allows parents, particularly mothers who end up having a miscarriage or stillbirth, to be able to take a bereavement leave, and that's important. I agree with the members opposite that it is a basic right that they have to be able to mourn the loss of their children, to be able to recuperate after what is a very trying and difficult time in that family, mother and father's life. The truth is that without the dignity and respect that we show to our most vulnerable, I don't think we're a very strong society at all.

I appreciate that the members opposite come at it from a different perspective, theirs from the strong tradition of solidarity within labour union movements. I appreciate that, but my perspective is more animated instead by my deeply convicted pro-life belief that those stillborn and miscarried babies deserve to be recognized by those mothers. Those mothers have gone through a true and genuine loss, and when they lose that child, they need to grieve, and that is what bereavement is for, to grieve the loss of someone, and there is little more intimate a relationship than there is between a mother and a child in a womb. Every movement, every single moment that mother is aware of the caring, nurturing love that she has for that child in the womb. I think to recognize that miscarried and stillborn babies are valuable to that mother and for us as a society and a Legislature to pass legislation acknowledging that is the least that we need to do.

Life itself is valuable, intrinsically so, and there's not any of us in this Legislature, any law we can pass, that has the competency to change that. It is intrinsic in the nature of life. Madam Deputy Speaker, if any one of us has intrinsic dignity, every one of us might. It's true no matter where you come from. Happily today, sitting above me, we had representatives of Rwanda, and when they underwent the Tutsi genocide that happened – that life is valuable, intrinsically. No matter what tribe they come from, what part of the world they come from, no matter how old or young they are, no matter how sick or valuable they may or may not be to our society, no matter where they are, in a womb or out, that intrinsic dignity is real.

Human life is something that we must always cherish no matter the circumstances, Madam Deputy Speaker, and that is why I was so glad to see the amendment expand to include loss of pregnancy for any reason. That includes abortion. That includes children that were lost in abortion. I believe that those mothers should have that same opportunity for bereavement leave. Whatever they might do with it, I think it's important they have that opportunity. I believe every single life, no matter the cause of the loss of that pregnancy, is real. No matter the circumstance that led there, I think it's important that that opportunity for grief and bereavement is offered, if by any place, by this Chamber, that acknowledges the dignity of that life. We must. We must as legislators say that every life – if any one of us has intrinsic value, every one of us has that value.

I believe that this piece of legislation, as interesting as it might be, created these strange bedfellows that aren't naturally always aligned, especially on these kinds of issues. A socialist, labour union NDP Party along with strident conservatives who believe in the dignity of life such as myself and others, a diversity of views in my caucus, all came together to say that we must recognize this.

Madam Deputy Speaker, we cannot acknowledge the life of the stillborn and the miscarried without also acknowledging the intrinsic value of the miscarried and aborted babies. Those aborted babies are babies nonetheless. I believe that deeply.

That's why I'm so glad to see that the NDP as a caucus unanimously voted in favour of the amendment to protect that right and to acknowledge their existence as children that ought to be grieved, that this Legislature ought to acknowledge that bereavement extends not just to those inside our world today that live outside the womb but those in the womb as well. It is a deeply held conviction of mine that we must protect every single innocent life.

I know it's a fraught topic, Madam Deputy Speaker, but one that we must address and one that I feel compelled to put on the record today. That is my belief, and I believe – maybe I'm in a minority; I don't know – that thousands upon thousands of other Albertans will appreciate that as well. But I think the ones who appreciate it the most are not the ones driven by an ideology, not the ones informed by a set of beliefs and who come to a place with an abstraction, but the ones who get to benefit day to day from this piece of legislation, that will recognize the value and dignity of all these children before they're born and also recognize the grief that mothers and parents need to go through when they lose a child.

I am proud to say, Madam Deputy Speaker, that I will be voting in favour of the legislation. I will not be voting in favour of the amendment, which, I believe, the purpose of is to slow down the passing of this legislation. I believe this will be the most pro-life piece of legislation that I will ever have the chance to vote on in my life, probably the most pro-life piece of legislation this Chamber will pass, and I couldn't be more proud that we're going to do it, I believe, God willing, unanimously, on all sides of the aisle.

Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. First of all, let me thank the Member for Peace River for his comments. You know, he referred to us as unlikely bedfellows. Noting that we are coming up to Pride Month, I was entertaining the thought of being his bedfellow.

Mr. Williams: I'm married. I'm very flattered, but I'm married.

Mr. Schmidt: Oh. Anyway, we can't be held responsible for our thoughts, Madam Speaker, but it was an interesting picture that I didn't expect the Member for Peace River, of all of the members here in the House, to paint.

I wanted, unlike the Member for Peace River, to focus my comments on the actual amendment that is before us today, and that is to send this bill back to Committee of the Whole to reconsider the changes to the Labour Relations Code that are being proposed here.

Before I get into the reasons why we need to reconsider the changes, I want to provide the House with a little bit of historical perspective that I would have as the Minister of Advanced Education who brought forward the legislative changes that are being amended in this bill before us today. When I was Minister of Advanced Education, we inherited a unique labour relations model in the postsecondary system in Canada, one where academic staff were designated as academic staff by the boards of governors of the universities and colleges where they worked, with no possibility of appeal, one where academic staff were prohibited by legislation from going on strike, where binding arbitration was the only option for settling labour disputes. That was true for graduate students, and postdoctoral fellows had no recognition as employees whatsoever under the Labour Relations Code or the Post-secondary Learning Act or any other piece of legislation that affected the province of Alberta.

We recognized that this was unconstitutional, and we embarked on significant changes to the labour relations model in the academic sector to comply with the Constitution of the country, that allows for employees to freely associate in labour unions and to withdraw their labour if they see fit to do so and, conversely, to give employers the rights to lock out their employees if they saw fit to do so after exhausting all of the other legal channels, putting everybody in a right to strike or a right to lock out. I'm proud of the work that we did restoring those constitutional rights that had never been granted to academic workers in this province, and I'm very pleased to see that those labour relations changes have resulted in some strong negotiations and significant wins for faculty associations in the province of Alberta, all across the province.

I'm also particularly proud of the fact that we were the first jurisdiction in the country to freely recognize postdoctoral fellows as employees of universities. This was something that no other jurisdiction had done, and by doing so, we granted postdoctoral fellows the ability to form unions and to negotiate for better wages, better working conditions, and, really importantly, extended health benefits. That was something that was very important to postdoctoral fellows that I talked to when I was Minister of Advanced Education.

A lot of the postdoctoral fellows who work in our universities come from outside of the country, earn very little money, and have a really hard time covering those additional health expenses that crop up from time to time. I'm thinking of dental bills, medical bills, prescription drug costs, if you need to get an ambulance, for example. They didn't have the ability to pay for those things. But because our government was the first in the country to recognize postdoctoral fellows as employees, they had the right to bargain as a union for extended benefits, a significant advancement.

There is no shortage of labour exploitation in universities and colleges. By allowing postdoctoral fellows to form unions and negotiate under the Labour Relations Code, we significantly advanced workers' rights on campuses in Alberta. Now, part of the deal when we made these changes was to protect the exclusive bargaining rights of faculty associations, grad student associations, and postdoctoral fellow associations for a period of five years. Now, why did we do this, Madam Speaker? The reason was because none of these associations had any history or experience dealing with a traditional labour relations model, where people could strike or be locked out. They had no strike funds in place. They had no experience running a strike. We gave them a five-year period to effectively get their act together and prepare for a traditional labour relations model as it's practised in other jurisdictions in the province.

But at the very beginning all of those associations understood that once that five-year period was expired, their members would be able to freely choose who was their bargaining agent. That was designed to be an incentive for faculty associations, grad student associations, postdoctoral fellow associations to demonstrate to their members that they could effectively act as their bargaining agents, and if not, then those members would have the right to choose another bargaining agent. That was the deal. Everybody understood that at the time. Now, with these changes that the minister of labour is proposing, that deal has been rendered null and void.

Now, Madam Speaker, when I was Minister of Advanced Education, I was accused of running a plot on behalf of CUPE to turn over labour relations on campuses to that union in particular. Now, nothing was further from the truth, but I will say that larger labour unions have much more resources in terms of people on the ground and money in the bank to support smaller bargaining units in bargaining for better working conditions and wages and benefits. These smaller associations, particularly grad student associations and postdoctoral fellow associations, when they're small, are left at the mercy of the employer. They don't have the collective power to fight back against the potentially unreasonable demands that the employer may make of them during bargaining. So if they so choose, if they see that their employer is taking advantage of them, under the system that we promised them in 2017, when we introduced the legislation, they could choose as of 2022 a new bargaining agent to better represent them. Now that's being taken away from them.

You know, one of the documents that my friend from Edmonton-Mill Woods tabled this afternoon was a letter from the postdoctoral fellows at the University of Lethbridge. They said that they represent 30 employees. Thirty employees. Well, these are employees who earn very little money, $15 to $20 an hour typically, and they often have a hard time making ends meet. What kind of strike fund can 30 employees who are earning $15 an hour generate on their own? If an employer makes them fight hard for a good deal at the bargaining table and puts them in a position where their members want to go on strike, they won't have the power to fight back. So it's only fair that in these kinds of circumstances the postdoctoral fellows at the University of Lethbridge have the option of choosing a bigger union to better represent them, give them a fighting chance to bargain a fair deal for themselves.

This government loves to talk about fair deals. Why aren't they giving the postdoctoral fellows at the University of Lethbridge at least the courtesy of an invitation to consult on the changes? Maybe they're perfectly happy with their postdoctoral fellow association as it's constituted, but the minister of labour won't even let them have their voices be heard and is forcing them to stick with their existing association, with no chance of that being removed in the near future. It's absolutely not fair, and it's unconstitutional, Madam Speaker. I am certain that if any group were to challenge the constitutionality of this legislation once it's proclaimed, the Supreme Court would probably uphold the finding that it's unconstitutional.

That's why we are here to propose this amendment to send this part of the bill back to Committee of the Whole so that we can reconsider these changes and at least give the minister and the members of the House the opportunity to hear from the people who are being impacted by these changes to see if this is actually what they want and what additional tools they need to put themselves into stronger positions of bargaining with their employer.

Madam Speaker, it's quite clear to me that the minister made a mistake when he proposed these changes, and I think that the only proper thing to do is admit that he made a mistake, send this portion of the bill back to Committee of the Whole, allow members of the Legislature to hear from the people who are being impacted, and then make a decision on what the right path forward should be.

I urge all members to vote in favour of this amendment and reconsider this section of the bill. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I will rise in support of this amendment and having the bill recommitted back to Committee of the Whole to remove section 2. Now, I appreciate the member speaking to the fact that he believes that this is a way to slow down this piece of legislation. It is not the case. In fact, the government could easily send this bill back to Committee of the Whole under this recommittal amendment, remove section 2, consult appropriately, proceed with the bill without section 2 in it, and we can all vote on it and move forward.

Then the pieces that the hon. members were concerned about, with the amendment that both the government and the opposition agreed on in regard to parental leave in relation to loss of pregnancy, would be dealt with. We would be able to support that. We would be able to move this bill forward with those pieces of the labour code in place to support the very concerns that the hon. member was speaking to while removing section 2 out of the piece of legislation and allowing the minister appropriate time to go back to the seven or so associations that have written him in the last week and fix the legislation as they're requesting be done.

I don't think it's unreasonable to ask that this bill go back to Committee of the Whole, and in fact it would be in the best interests of the government to do so so that they can actually fix the very concerns that the minister is hearing.

It's not very common to see a group of associations come together and write the minister in such a quick period of time, at the capacity and at the level that this minister has received. Again, as my hon. colleague mentioned, we only received seven of those letters. We don't know if the minister actually has received more correspondence in regard to this section of the bill or not, so there may be more concerns being brought forward, in particular on section 2, that the minister needs to consider and look at with more detail and go back to those organizations and those associations and have those conversations.

But what this speaks to, again, is the very issue that this government continues to see themselves in, which is looking at bills, writing bills that speak to so many different sections that don't necessarily speak to each other. We see this with the red tape reduction legislation all the time, where this government will then introduce a section of a piece of a bill, they will make changes, and then all of a sudden realize that those changes that they have made now impact a whole bunch of other sections in other pieces of legislation that then now have to be amended or fixed because they create a problem over here.

Well, again, this government has done the same under Bill 17, moving and looking at a variety of labour-related codes and regulations, adjusting a whole bunch of pieces, and then realizing that they actually are not even correlated to each other: one is about the ability for bargaining and the right to association, the other piece of the bill is about parental leaves or loss-of-pregnancy leaves, yet they're in there together. Again, I think that what this minister needs to do is to acknowledge that maybe this was an error and that there is more consultation that needs to be done, bring the bill back into Committee of the Whole so that the section can be evaluated and removed.

Then we can all agree that the changes to the employment standards around loss of pregnancy for any reason can be adopted by both sides of this House. We fundamentally both agreed. When the amendment was introduced by the government in Committee of the Whole around pregnancy loss, it was agreed that that was something that we all supported. This actually wouldn't prevent the bill from potentially, because I will not determine the outcome of a vote in the House, moving forward by the end of today. It's an easy fix. You come back, you introduce an amendment, you remove the section, we vote on that, we move forward, go to third reading, decide what the outcome of that is, and done as dinner.

I disagree fundamentally with the government member that stood up and said that this is a tactic to slow things down. It's not. It's just this government's unwillingness to work collaboratively with the opposition on something that really should be fixed, that is very simplistic in the process of really just some parliamentary practice. It doesn't take very long. We're all skilled at being able to move into Committee of the Whole and rising and reporting and coming back and doing all of the things that we need to do. We could get this done today. So I think it's very important that the government really look at the opportunity that is being presented to them with the request to move into Committee of the Whole, to revert back. It gives the government the opportunity to introduce, make a change, continue on, and then the bill could potentially be dealt with by the end of today.

I think that we all agree that the loss-of-pregnancy component that is in this piece of legislation is something that we can all agree on, so of course we wouldn't want to prevent that from happening. We would want to encourage the bill to move forward, and we support that in happening. We believe that bereavement leave needs to be in place as soon as possible, so we fundamentally agree with what the government member was saying only a few minutes ago.

We disagree on section 2. I don't believe that the government was aware to what extent the issue was going to be for them when it was introduced into this House because, of course, as indicated by my colleague, most of the associations that were being impacted were in the middle of exams and were in the middle of doing a variety of different things when this piece of legislation was introduced.

I mean, we could say that maybe that is why the government introduced it when they introduced it, because they knew it was going to be a problem. Instead of choosing to engage and ensure the right to associate was protected, the government decided to do this at a time when people were distracted and the associations were distracted by the work that they do, so they wouldn't be able to be loud and push back on the government the way that they maybe normally would have. There's that component. That could have been the case. I mean, we can't necessarily always trust this government in what they do and why they do the things, and maybe this is an example of that. Or, giving the benefit of the doubt, the government just didn't have a clue what was going on because they didn't consult properly, and now there's a mistake.

Going back into Committee of the Whole: here's an opportunity. This is the opposition trying to help the government do something that makes sense, maybe save their bacon a little bit in regard to this. Bring it back, go into Committee of the Whole, look at section 2, make the changes. Decide what they want to do, whether it's remove section 2 altogether or amend it, which takes longer – but that's up to the government to do – and then we can proceed after it's dealt with. Now, again, I mean, I would be interested to see if the government is willing to do that. I would encourage them to do it, though. I think that at some point humility is best, and sometimes acknowledging that you made a mistake – whether you got caught in the mistake or not, it was a mistake.

Or be honest and stand up and say that there is a fundamental disagreement between the government and the opposition around the right to association, and the government doesn't agree with that; therefore, that was why this was done. If that's the case, the government could be honest and say that, too, but be honest either way. Be honest that you don't agree with the right to association. Be honest in that you slid this through when nobody was paying attention because we didn't really want to deal with it, or be honest and say: we made a mistake; we should probably bring it back and fix it.

It's all about honesty. It's all about showing Albertans that you can be humble and admit when you make a mistake. I would think that we're at a time where this government would like to maybe shift the direction that they've had in the past, and this would be a prime opportunity to do that. There's a little bit more humility, maybe, in this government, and this would be an opportunity to show that humility and acknowledge that mistakes were made, turn over a new leaf. Things are changing. Here's your opportunity to show us today, first day back, that things are different. Probably won't happen. You know, we like to believe that things can change, but we do know that past behaviour is a prediction of future behaviour. The likelihood of things changing is probably not going to happen the way that Albertans would like it to.

I will leave it at that. I will support this recommittal back to Committee of the Whole to support the government in trying to make better decisions and to fix this mistake. I will leave it with them to decide whether or not they're willing to take that opportunity.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Happy to rise this afternoon, provide some additional comments, of course, with the amendment we have to recommit here to Committee of the Whole, a very sensible amendment given my comments when we were in Committee of the Whole and the changes that were being considered around the labour relations amendment. I know that a previous speaker had spoken about delaying the bill here and moving it forward, and I would remind members that during Committee of the Whole we took steps to try to separate some of that out, try to make changes around those labour relations amendments to try to save the government a lot of hassle, a lot of time, and probably a lot of money. I spoke at length and even quoted some of the federal regulations around individuals' freedom to associate, with their ability to be able to choose their own bargaining agent. This is a federal Supreme Court decision that is very, very clear. You are able to choose who you have bargain with you.

The problem with the language that's contained right now here in Bill 17 is that it goes against that. As somebody, again, who's been involved in the labour movement for a considerable amount of time, over two decades, dealing with contracts, dealing with my employer, dealing with other employers and their contracts and their language, I can tell you that this change violates that. It will be challenged, and you'll lose, and you're going to cost Albertans a bunch of money, kind of like you cost them a bunch of money betting on Trump, kind of like you cost them a bunch of money putting together a report that found no wrongdoing. I can go on and on.

Now, again, just to address some of the comments earlier around delaying the support of the House around pregnancy leave, I will admit that I feel the language could have been a little bit stronger. I'm kind of taking a little bit of an approach there where sometimes I can't always bargain the best language that I could get, but at least this was something. It was much better than nothing. It could have been better. But, see, if we'd divided these out so we could have quickly moved on that, we could have dealt with the language around the labour relations changes.

As my friend from Edmonton-Mill Woods tabled earlier, the documents from, you know, the Graduate Students' Association, postdoctoral associations very clearly stating that they didn't get proper consultation – my friend quoted this, and I'll redo it again. "I have not heard anyone out there who says that we need to upset the current arrangement."

If we look at what the current arrangement is right now, it was set to expire, thereby then falling in line with the federal guidelines on this. My friend from Edmonton-Gold Bar, who went at length through the history of how this came forward, offering, you know, the types of labour relations language that these associations have never had before – they've never had the ability until the Supreme Court ruling around strikes and things like that. Now all of a sudden they have to try to begin to understand what labour relations is, how bargaining works, creating language, give, take, all that fun stuff of bargaining. It was very purposely put in there, an expiry date giving them a short period of time to get their feet underneath them, at which point then they have to go forward, and if the associations, with the blessing of their members, decide they want to change their bargaining agent, they can do so, just like every other Canadian is allowed to do in this country. They have that ability to do that.

Unfortunately, I'm sorry to say, this language around labour relations proposed in Bill 17, which is why we need to send it back to committee, violates that. It goes against it. You read the language. It's plain and simple. We can quickly go back to Committee of the Whole, give the minister time to read these letters that were tabled by our labour critic around the consultation process – none of them were consulted. None of them agree with the changes. I'm saving you a bunch of headache, saving you a bunch of time. I'm saving you a bunch of money. Again, this will be challenged. You'll lose. You'll cost Alberta taxpayers that money, because I'm certain it's not going to be coming out of your pockets.

So let's just save all of that headache, quickly move this back to Committee of the Whole – we can fix this; it's not a big deal – and then we can move forward when we've got language that we can support in its entirety in all of Bill 17. But this rhetoric around trying to slow things down? No; that doesn't hold water. We attempted to try to fix this earlier, and the government members ignored that.

Now that we have the proof, I'm hoping members opposite will reconsider. My friend from Edmonton-Manning said that we can fix this quickly. You won't get a lot of push-back. We can change the language so it doesn't violate a person's ability to the right of association and choosing their bargaining agent. Their choice, not ours. It's just that simple.

I'm hoping we will hear some backpedalling a little bit. This is a good amendment, to send it back to Committee of the Whole so we can move forward with a piece of legislation that will in its entirety help Albertans. Again, as I said, I wish the language around the parental leave was just a little bit stronger. I would have been more happy with that, but at least it's a starting point. Maybe in a future Legislature, Madam Speaker, we'll get a chance to make that even a little bit stronger and protect everybody's rights around that.

I will be supporting the amendment for it to go back to committee, and I look forward to hearing more from other members of this House.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to the amendment? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise, first of all, to speak, obviously, in favour of this recommittal amendment and to provide a couple of comments, first of all, as to process. There is no need to dilly-dally on this. We can simply send this piece of legislation back to committee real quick – we could probably do it before 4:30 – and take out the section in particular that deals with this matter in the Labour Statutes Amendment Act on that piece, specifically, with respect to being able to choose a bargaining agent for postdoctoral and other graduate students and other university staff. We can do that and send it back here into third. You know, if Parliamentary Counsel wants to have a look at it during the dinner break, that's fine. We can return at 7:30 and probably get this matter done and dusted by this evening. This is not difficult. We all are capable legislators, and where we fall down in our capabilities, we have Parliamentary Counsel to assist us.

There is no question that this can be done. It can be done expeditiously, and this attempt to use this specious reasoning that somehow, you know, this is frustrating the work of the Legislature is a completely inane assertion and ought to be withdrawn by the member who made it.

I am going to, first of all, begin with the words of a constituent of mine, Dr. Chelsea Matisz, who is the president of the University of Lethbridge Postdoctoral Fellows Association, who has written to the minister, and I know that the ULPA has also spoken to the Minister of Advanced Education. I don't know if the two ministers have had any chance to talk about this.

Certainly, in our government, when we were making labour standards changes in response to the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour decision in which we affirmed the right, which had been affirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada, for postdoctoral and other graduate students and academic staff more broadly to bargain collectively within legislation and removed the prohibitions on free and fair collective bargaining that that had heretofore existed in this province, the Minister of Advanced Education was very much involved in that process and very carefully consulted, which is why we ended up with this time-limited sort of period of time in which, by request, academic staff associations and others had said: you know, can we put the brakes on this for five years until we can figure out what this means for us and how we go about this process of freely and fairly choosing a bargaining agent?

This is a group of people who, of course, didn't really even know what that meant before that, and now they do. So, certainly, there is no question that we put that in place and that had we not had an expiration date on it, those associations would have had grounds to very, very quickly have that section of the act struck down because without that expiration date it is prima facie unconstitutional, which is exactly what we are about to do here. Legislatures ought not do things that are, on the face of it, a Charter violation, and in this case this is, on the face of it, a violation of our section 2(d) rights, as affirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police decision of January 2015.

[Mr. Reid in the chair]

Back to Dr. Chelsea Matisz, who is a postdoctoral fellow in neuroscience. She is the mother of a child, as well, who is deaf. She is a neuroscientist who is tremendously committed to the community. She has also had to spend her time during her postdoctoral fellowship, which is an Alberta Innovates fellowship at the University of Lethbridge, advocating for the restoration of PUF funding because she doesn't have anything better to do, being a brain scientist and the mother of two young children, one of whom she has had to go to the wall advocating for within the school system and elsewhere given the amount of supports that have been taken away from that child.

Here we are, where Dr. Matisz has also written a letter saying, "[Look.] this amendment clearly violates the rights of our members to freely associate and choose their representation." They have 30 postdoctoral workers at the University of Lethbridge, many of whom are international, from other areas of Canada, working in research laboratories, and "on top of the production of knowledge that made us pursue academic work . . . [the] members are . . . under extreme pressure to mentor, publish papers, write grants, and teach."

Postdoctoral fellows are, by their very definition, working to further their careers, and they have to do that with a tremendous amount of pressure on them. Having representation is therefore critically important. They do not have time, in Chelsea's representations to me over the last little while, to play lawyer, as she says. She is a literal brain scientist. She has another profession to undertake. Now, Chelsea writes papers such as Neuroinflammatory Remodeling of the Anterior Cingulate Cortex as a Key Driver of Mood Disorders in Gastrointestinal Disease and Disorders. She does not have time to mess around in collective bargaining. She would like to pay her dues and have a bargaining agent that she has freely and fairly chosen, her along with the 30 others, to concern themselves with these matters.

Now, it's really important that these folks have representation. We have just seen the extent of that importance at the University of Lethbridge, with some seven, eight weeks of labour disruption in the city, where we had neighbours set against one another. We had the community that had wedges driven within it, all because of an incredible amount of cuts cascading down onto the community and leaving the board of governors in an extremely untenable position, leaving deans and others in extremely difficult positions as they've had to navigate $20 million worth of cuts to a town of 100,000 people. The economic impact has been devastating.

This is yet another reason why I would prefer folks at the centre for neuroscience to continue to do their work given the amount of disruption that we have already seen to their research agenda, to graduate students' and undergraduate learning conditions, to our scientific labs' general output, and to the reputational damage that has been visited upon the University of Lethbridge by this government's short-sighted cuts, that are in fact getting in the way of our ability to produce scientific research in the public interest, as Dr. Matisz does.

Now, literally this afternoon we could pass a bill that, in fact, conforms to our section 2(d) Charter-guaranteed right of freedom of association. I'm going to remind the House that the courts provide the Legislature with a great deal of latitude. For example, the expiration date that we would have put on the original legislation of some five years: the courts would not have seen that as a substantial interference because, first of all, it was at the behest of the associations themselves, and, second of all, it was time-limited for specific reasons. The court has actually been really clear on this right to freely choose our bargaining agents because section 2(d) [of the Charter] protects . . .

And I'm reading here from the Supreme Court decision

. . . three classes of activities: (1) the right to join with others and form associations; (2) the right to join with others in pursuit of other constitutional rights; and (3) the right to join with others to meet on more equal terms the power and strength of other groups or entities.

That is, in fact, how the right to collective bargaining has been interpreted by the courts.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Now, the right to collective bargaining is one that guarantees a process, not an outcome. This is why it is really important to understand that associations, in the first instance, asked us for that time-limited expiration and why now having that be an indefinite thing will constitute substantial interference in the exercise of people's Charter rights.

The degree of choice required by the Charter reading from the court's decision for collective bargaining purposes is one that enables employees to have effective input into the selection of the collective goals to be advanced by their association.

This does not.

Moreover, accountability to the members of the association plays an important role . . . A scheme that holds representatives accountable to the employees who chose them ensures that the association works towards the purposes for which the employees joined together.

They have to be able to choose those purposes. Now, the court writes that the industry culture and workplace necessarily conditions what is required to permit meaningful collective bargaining.

Whatever the labour relations model, the Charter does not permit choice and independence to be eroded such that there is substantial interference with a meaningful process.

Now, here in this legislation, as it was in the court's decision in January '15 on the RCMP members' interference in their ability to choose their bargaining agent, this is not in this piece of legislation "a case of a complete denial of the constitutional right to associate." In this legislation, as well, workers have the right to be part of an association; it is just this particular association. That is exactly the prohibition that the court strikes down in January 2015. "Not only are members represented by an organization they did not choose . . . they must work within a structure that is part of the management organization." That is what was struck down by the courts some – well, pretty well seven years ago.

So we ought not do things that we know are wrong, like, just generally in life, but also the courts have taken a very, very dim view of Legislatures who serially undertake these kinds of actions, particularly as they concern collective bargaining. In B.C. they did this a couple of times with interference in teachers' negotiations over the course of the Christy Clark government. They brought in some legislation that was clearly struck down over a period of years. They came back in and introduced the very same legislation, which very, very quickly rose through the appeal processes, and the Supreme Court struck it down in, like, two weeks or something. It was really, really quick. They said in there that Legislatures should not do this. So that's where we find ourselves now, where a Legislature is doing exactly this.

I'm going to put it on the record because when this goes to its inevitable constitutional challenge, the Hansard will be read by the members of the court, that this government was warned that they are doing something that is prima facie unconstitutional, and they barrelled forward with it anyway. Except what they could do is take this piece out right now and refer it back to Committee of the Whole, solve the problem – bang; done – pass the legislation, and we don't have to go through all of that headache.

And Dr. Chelsea Matisz can get back to being the brain scientist that she's good at, not having to write grouchy letters to a labour minister. This is a complete waste of her time. She should be parenting. She should be publishing articles. She should be restoring the reputation at the University of Lethbridge so we can attract more people like Dr. Chelsea Matisz to an absolutely amazing centre for neuroscience, where research and science in the public interest is happening every day that advances what we know about ourselves and about the world around us. That is what we should be doing with our time in this Legislature. I know that the Minister of Advanced Education has heard that because I told him, and I know that the minister of labour has heard these messages because those letters were tabled and he received them.

Now it's up to the government to do the right thing. They can write back to Dr. Matisz and say, "No; actually, we prefer that you waste your time," or they can say, "Yeah; absolutely, we pulled this section because it was poorly conceived." That is fine. We've already done that in this Legislature once with the electricity storage bill that came in last fall, that stakeholders didn't like. It was pulled, and it was substantially improved, and it sailed through this House, and we voted in favour of it. We can do that again, or we can persist in this breathtaking hubris and arrogance that is characteristic of this government and this front bench in particular and that has led to its catastrophic and historic comeuppance that was just delivered last week. I guess we can persist in that. See how it goes.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others on the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill, and I'm quite happy to follow the extremely well-reasoned arguments from the Member for Lethbridge-West, who has outlined very clearly that the government – if they proceed with the bill as it is in its current state, it is going to be found ultimately to be unconstitutional on a matter which has been before the Supreme Court no less than a half dozen times and had clearly been determined in this country as being a fundamental right, to choose your own representation. We can see here that this government is failing to do this. The argument that they gave for failing to deal with this issue is that they had not heard any complaints. In fact, the minister at one point said in the House, quote: let me confirm that again; there has not been a single e-mail or letter on this particular issue. You know, we were a bit surprised to hear that because, of course, we don't know what letters arrive in the minister's office, yet we've been hearing fairly regularly from organizations that they were concerned about this.

I know that it surprised me, too, because initially when I spoke to this in the House, I said that I hadn't heard some, and then subsequently because I had put that out there, people had gotten back to me and said: no; there are concerns. So I know that people are listening, I know that people are responding, and I can't imagine that they only responded to me and not to the minister.

Subsequently, we learned over this weekend that there were many people who wrote letters to this minister addressing exactly the same issue that had been addressed to me. We know that the critic for labour from the opposition side of the House, the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, has actually received a number of carbon copies of letters that were sent to the minister and was able to even, just today, file seven letters that came from organizations such as members of the bargaining units at the University of Calgary, the University of Alberta, the University of Lethbridge, and Athabasca University.

We know that the minister may not have heard something initially about this, as I had not, but we know that subsequently there has been a significant number of people that have been coming forward and saying that this needs to be addressed and expressing their concerns and putting those concerns in writing, as apparently required by the minister.

You know, the minister's arguments for not making changes to this section of the bill certainly have been demonstrated to not be based on substantive truth. As such, it is really requisite upon this minister to go back and correct themselves, as, in fact, I have done on this particular bill, initially saying that I hadn't heard anything, but now I'm telling you that I have. That's exactly what the minister should do, should just follow the lead here on this side of the House and go back and refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole, only so that one section of this bill can be withdrawn to avoid ultimate potential constitutional challenges at the Supreme Court on this particular issue. Seems like a pretty simple thing to do.

Now, I know, of course, that some members on the government side of the House have complained that this somehow delays the legislation. Again, we've seen this sort of false narrative being presented here in this House before. Taking the time in the House to actually review a bill does not actually change the ultimate implementation of the bill in the long run. These things don't happen immediately on the day on which they're discussed. There is a process that takes a while, so putting it back into committee, having committee remove one section, and then going back to the vote: we could even do that in one day, today. It would literally make no change in terms of the day that this bill came into effect.

We've seen this kind of somewhat deceitful argument being presented by the government in the past. We know with regard to the government's attempt to subvert democracy in this House by forcing the bill discussing the rebates for utilities through in one day without proper consideration for the various three stages, four stages including the Committee of the Whole, in the House, trying to push all that through in the same day, and of course their argument was that somehow the opposition was delaying those rebates. But in truth, anybody watching can tell that even though we didn't agree to that immediate pushing through the House on that particular day, they got through that bill within a matter of days, and it still has not come into effect some weeks later. So they're arguing that we delayed something that they haven't actually done anything with after they got it passed.

Now, even in the House today the Premier was asked about a date on which those rebates will be put out, and in fact the Premier was unable to give us a date. He gave us the classic line of in due time. I think that that tells us that when the government is saying that we are delaying something here in the House, it is not, in fact, a legitimate argument and it does not actually make a difference in terms of the implementation of the actual contents of the bill. It simply is a change in terms of the processes here in this House.

It's quite discouraging to see the government raise yet again these false arguments in which they simply do not want to hear from people in the province of Alberta, in this case people who are represented by these kinds of bargaining committees at places like the University of Alberta, University of Lethbridge, University of Calgary, and Athabasca University. The government is simply saying: we are going to pretend that there is a problem that does not exist in order to not hear you. You know, this seems to be the classic issue here. The government has routinely throughout their time in government really been loath to be open to democratic processes, in fact, have made a number of attempts to be seriously undemocratic in their administration of the business of this House.

I mean, we are still the only place in the country where the government has designed a process for, essentially, the elimination of all bills coming from the opposition side of the House. Everywhere else in Canada, including the House of Commons, opposition members can bring bills forward to the House of Commons. But in this House the government designed this very undemocratic process in which they refuse to see a bill in the House until it has gone to a committee, which they control, and then in the committee they have stopped 100 per cent of the opposition bills from moving forward and have proceeded with 100 per cent with the government-side bills. So we clearly know that they are trying to subvert democracy in this process. It has nothing to do with the efficiency of the House or anything else. It has to do statistically, quite demonstrably – they are using this to actually stop the democratic process that has been part of the Westminster system for many hundreds of years.

That just seems to be the pattern here with this government, that they don't actually support democratic processes and continually try to bring new procedures into the House in order to subvert democracy. Of course, we've seen this in terms of the number of times this government has brought in closure, which is considerably higher than any other government previously. We see this in terms of trying to, you know, essentially mislead the public by saying that a delay of discussing a bill in the House will actually delay its implementation when indeed that's not true.

I really think the government should take this opportunity to for once just stand on the side of democracy and to actually allow a discussion in the House to occur for the sake of the people of the province of Alberta. They don't even have to agree with things in the end. They can say they disagree, but they should allow democracy to occur. This is something that this government has been essentially against since the time that they came in. You know, we certainly see this here in the House, and we certainly see that they struggle with democracy on their own side in their own private business. We get very discouraged when we see these kinds of things going on. We get discouraged when we have a Premier that's still under investigation by the RCMP for their behaviour in what should have been a democratic process in terms of getting elected.

It's really too bad because there's much about this bill that we actually would like to support. I know that there was a speaker, the Member for Peace River, who stood up to talk about this amendment and then, of course, didn't speak about the topic of the amendment at all but talked about some of the other parts of the bill that we are fully supportive of. You know, I want to say that moving this back into committee is not because we are against those portions of the bill. We would love to have separated out these pieces so that we could easily support the good things that are coming out of this bill. We certainly would love to support the sections with regard to pregnancy leave and bereavement.

I think it's very important that we recognize that this is a significant shift in terms of acknowledging the suffering of people that have gone through often very traumatic kinds of situations and the need for them to be able to be given time to appropriately grieve. We heard some very good speeches on both sides of the House about grieving and the process of grieving and the process of, you know, having to say goodbye to a family member in the case of a terminated pregnancy for whatever cause. We know that there is consent. This government could go back to the Committee of the Whole, get rid of the egregious parts, the antidemocratic, anticonstitutional parts of the bill, and move on with the good pieces that we obviously have unanimous consent on, which is something that, of course, members of the public are constantly asking us to do here in this House, and that is to work together to provide consent on both sides of the House for a piece of bill. Yet when we try to do that, the government does everything possible to try to undermine us and to stop us from actually contributing to the democratic process here in this House.

I find it very discouraging that we find ourselves yet in this place again with a government that does not wish to engage in the processes that we are all sent in this House to do on behalf of our citizens, and that is to bring ideas forward, to debate those ideas, and to use those ideas to actually inform policy in this House. It's just discouraging to see that the government has decided that they don't wish to have the Westminster system used in its effective way in Alberta like it is being used across the rest of Canada. You know, I think people in the public should come to realize that there have been numerous examples of this government acting in ways which are largely undemocratic, refusing to allow witnesses from the opposition to appear in committee, refusing in committee to allow bills to enter into the House, and then refusing in the House for us to debate all the sections of the bill. What this government would like to do is just be able to come up with its own ideas, ignore the House, and implement those ideas without any kind of a back-and-forth, democratic, opposition-based process, which is not what a democracy is. By its very definition, a democracy requires that you have the ability for voices that are opposed to government policy to be heard, and this government is just choosing to not do that on a regular basis.

I think it would be nice to see the government take an opportunity to come back to the House. You know, it would only take a short period of time here in this House. We could stop this constant request from our side to do this right now. We could go back into committee. We could have that piece finished by 6 o'clock. We could have legal review done over the dinner hour, and then we could come back into this House later this evening to pass this bill.

You know, it's not a difficult thing to do. It's only the right thing to do.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's an honour to rise to speak to the amendment before us, put forward by the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, again, recognizing that "Bill 17, Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be not now read a third time but that it be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of reconsidering section 2."

I have had the opportunity to speak to Bill 17, I think likely in second reading, potentially, and I spent the majority if not all of that time discussing the piece around bereavement in this legislation. We again did hear a member of the government speak to that piece this afternoon. I don't plan to reflect on those comments too much other than just thanking the House for their indulgence and the opportunity to speak to some things that are very personal to myself but also again pointing out that the member of government stood up on this amendment and talked about the importance of these changes to bereavement.

I respect and understand where that member was coming from, but the fact is that we have two quite separate issues on the table within Bill 17. Specifically to the changes that we're seeing around freedom of association and the Labour Statutes Amendment Act changes, there are some major concerns that deserve to be addressed, and many organizations that have come forward – and those documents have been tabled, again, as previous members have stated. These associations, whether they're graduate student associations, faculty associations, postdoctoral fellow associations, are raising red flags that this government, first of all, is not respecting the, you know, constitutionally and Supreme Court protected idea of freedom of association but, above that, has not taken the time to consult with these associations through the process, which has left them with so many questions. At the end of the day, they just want the opportunity for fair representation and the opportunity to choose a bargaining agent of their choice.

When we look at some of the comments that have been made, specifically, I believe, from documents that were sent to the Minister of Advanced Education – and, of course, the opposition was included on those documents – the Postdoctoral Fellows Association of the U of A had raised concerns about high turnover, which is quite natural in these situations. From one to four years we'll see many of these people come and go, and they were raising concerns that it makes it really hard to establish a long-term association, I guess, or establish what often needs to be a large conversation that carries on for many years. They, in their documents that they sent, again pointed out the fact that these organizations often need aid from larger, established organizations, whether it's one union or another.

I think it's important that we reflect on some of the comments that have been made, and I will go over some of those, as previous members have. When we are talking about ensuring a sustainable path forward for these associations and their ability to freely associate and also just have their voices heard at the bargaining table and by this government specifically, Madam Speaker, this government has got it wrong, and that is very clear by some of the comments that have been made.

Looking at the position put forward by the president of the Athabasca University Faculty Association in their communications with the minister, specifically to the comments that the Minister of Labour and Immigration made about how the government has done such a great job of consulting, the president made it very clear that the Athabasca University Faculty Association was not consulted, you know, prior to this legislation coming forward or through the process at all.

That is a consistent message that has been sent again and again to this government, that they don't feel like they've been consulted. When we're looking at the graduate bargaining team from the University of Lethbridge, straight from the letter: "This is a clear infringement of our right to choose representation. Further, this decision is massively out of touch with the needs of, and resources available to, graduate student workers."

I don't think that these associations could be more clear that the government is going down the wrong path, Madam Speaker. Again, from the standpoint of freedom of association, from the standpoint of supporting our postsecondary institutions and graduates and people who are looking to be represented by these organizations, the fact is that again and again what we're seeing consistently from these associations is that this government has not listened to them and should put the brakes on this legislation.

Now, again, as we've heard from many members in the opposition here, we are ready and willing to go back to Committee of the Whole, take the time to get this right. Madam Speaker, we don't need a lot of time. There are some simple ways that we can get this right, move this legislation forward, and pass it so that we are supporting Albertans with the, you know, expansion of bereavement that is being considered through this legislation. The fact is that with how it's written right now, there are concerns.

Again, when we look at the documents that were put forward by students from the University of Alberta, they're, again, concerned about the lack of consultation, the need for freedom of association. There are just so many things that need to be dealt with regarding this legislation and the proposals being put forward that we need to pause this, go back to Committee of the Whole, hear some of the voices that are so desperately asking for this government to listen to them, and ensure that the legislation that is passed, if passed, is going to, first of all, support the associations across this province who are depending on clear, straightforward legislation that is protecting their constitutional right to freedom of association and, again, also ensuring that it is within constitutional parameters.

We've heard many times the discussions about the Mounted Police Association of Ontario versus Canada and the findings of that Supreme Court ruling. Unfortunately, what this government has put forward through this legislation is likely to cause some issues if it were to be challenged. When we are considering legislation before this House, I think that we should be ensuring to the best of our ability that it is going to hold up, that it is constitutional, that it is supporting, in this case, the postsecondary graduates and these associations that are regulated by this legislation. Unfortunately, at this time it doesn't seem to be the case.

We have given opportunities for this government in previous readings of this legislation to get this right. We, unfortunately, haven't been taken up on that offer up to this point, Madam Speaker, but we still have a chance here by supporting that this bill not now be read a third time but that it be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of reconsidering section 2.

With that, again, I appreciate all the comments that have been made by the opposition here this afternoon. I've learned a lot, and I'm sure many members have.

With that, I will take my seat. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to speak to the amendment?
The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I just want to say a couple of last words on this. You know, as I analyze what is happening with Bill 17, I can see once again that this UCP government generally and this Justice minister are trying to be too clever by half and trying to set up a political situation rather than actually dealing with the issues at hand. The two issues are separate but sort of related. They're both labour issues. One, of course, is in regard to bereavement and pregnancy loss. I think that we amended this element of this bill quite well. I actually was surprised. It turned out to be an effort from both sides that bore some pretty good legislation.

Then, you know, with this other part, in regard to postsecondary workers choosing their labour representation, their union representation – again, I know that the Justice minister reached out, just like I was doing in my job as the postsecondary Official Opposition critic, to faculty associations and so forth. There were some issues that needed to be worked through, right? A lot of faculties around the province quite literally had little or no representation for a long time, and their faculty associations were not fully functioning as unions.

Indeed, we never saw a strike at all in the history of the province from faculty until Concordia University had labour action in January and I believe – was it February for the University of Lethbridge, in close succession? These things were historic, and of course they were directly connected to historic cuts by this UCP government in our postsecondary operating grants, more than $690 million over three budgets. It was a generational and unprecedented loss of funding for our universities and colleges and polytechnics at the very time that we needed them the most, quite frankly, to help diversify our economy, to help to train and to retain a whole new generation of young people coming through from high school, and to offer retraining and upgrading and diversifying of our workforce and to build citizenship as well.

I mean, Madam Speaker, the essence of a good life and of a good society is for us to understand each other and to understand the world around us. That's what universities and polytechnics and colleges do. So all of that – the rug was pulled out from under them, with unprecedented generational cuts to postsecondaries. And some faculties said: "Hey, you know, we need to buttress our – we need to protect ourselves. We need to protect the faculties that we've built – right? – the people we've attracted from around the world, and we need to make sure that we fight back." We saw the beginnings of that with Concordia University and the University of Lethbridge as well.

Anyway, you know, the Justice minister – or the labour minister, I guess, he is now, right? People have a lot of changes over there with the ministries and so forth. You've got to keep a little running tab book. Apparently, he's the labour minister now. He thought that, well, he could pull something clever off by pairing this other legislation around bereavement with faculties choosing their labour representation. But they messed that up, too. They did not read exactly what was going on. They failed to consult people around the province, and then they wrote legislation which was fundamentally faulty and excluded postdocs and other sessional people entirely from the legislation. Even the people that initially said – and I heard the same stories from different faculty associations around the province, who said: yeah, can you maybe change this a little bit? They don't agree with it either because they did such a poor job of this element of Bill 17 in excluding whole sections of the labour force in postsecondary education and so forth.

The whole thing just isn't working, right? The house of cards, which is too clever by half, I mean, seems to be a fatal flaw of not just this labour minister but this whole government, always trying to game everything all the time. I mean, that seems to be their, you know, default position. Rather than governing, they constantly try to game people, game one against the other, play these things. You know what? It doesn't work.

The air just went out of the balloon last week, and, you know, it seems like quite a sad crowd over there. I mentioned to our caucus meeting at lunch today that rather than looking like the government on the opposite side, it looks like a bunch of people waiting for a domestic flight over there somehow – right? – in the waiting room of the airport, looking at their watches, you know, and looking at the roof or whatever. So I guess there's always cosmic justice in this. If you try to game people all the time or some of the time, then people will realize that you can't be trusted all of the time.

Anyway, it's a good idea to go back to committee on this thing. We're trying our best to help – again, this seems to be a theme of the day – this government build legislation that, you know, we can be proud of. I mean, there are lots of elements in this bill that are really important. I think that we could work with it if we make some tweaks, bring it back to committee, like the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, our House leader, had suggested. I can see kind of the raw material of something we can work with, this Bill 17, in general. Those are my last thoughts on this recommittal.

You don't see recommitments too often, actually. It's kind of an interesting parliamentary procedure, and it's a clever one. Let's go for it. Let's use it. I encourage everyone to vote for it. I guess I shouldn't have said that everybody looks like they're waiting for a plane over there. We need you to vote for this thing. Recommittal: let's do it together; let's do it now.

Thank you very much.

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

4:50

Bill 11 Continuing Care Act

The Chair: This is Bill 11's first time in Committee of the Whole. Are there any members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to join the debate in Committee of the Whole on Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act. Certainly, you know, we in opposition were looking forward very much to this bill coming forward, because the pandemic shone a very bright light on our continuing care system in Alberta, and it did show some pretty disturbing information to us during COVID.

This was, I think, a significant opportunity for the government to actually move quickly and responsibly to make sure that residents of continuing care facilities across our province were supported and protected, because there were a lot of things that didn't go well during COVID, you know, in Alberta. According to the National Institute on Ageing we had the most outbreaks in facilities across our province of any province in Canada. Of course, that's nothing to be proud of. In fact, that's something that is a deep concern. Those outbreaks led to many residents of continuing care contracting COVID, and over 1,600 residents of continuing care facilities in our province died.

That is a great tragedy. Many of those deaths were preventable. Not all of them, but many of them were. We know that they were spread in facilities a lot of times by the very people who were working to support the residents of continuing care facilities, and there are a whole bunch of reasons for that. Certainly, many of the facilities were very ill-equipped to deal with a pandemic. They didn't know what to do. Because of the structure of our continuing care system in Alberta, you know, a large number of facilities are private, for-profit. We know that there is a tremendous amount of financialization in the sector, which means that these facilities are really seen by owners and shareholders as wealth-generating businesses. It's really about the real estate. It's about increasing their investments, being able to pay dividends to shareholders. It's not, sadly, about what it should be about. It's not about service to residents of continuing care facilities. As I said, COVID shone the light on this very brightly.

How do these private facilities, these facilities that are really operating to create profit for their shareholders, make those profits for them? How do they make sure that that is the goal of it? One of the ways is, sadly, very much to not hire full-time staff. Oftentimes the staff – I would call them precarious. These are precarious workers. They're often vulnerable themselves, and they aren't given full-time jobs. They're only given part-time jobs, often with no benefits, so that they can keep the costs low for staffing.

Consequently, sometimes they work at more than one facility. Maybe they work in a fast-food industry. These are low-wage workers. These are oftentimes racialized people, mostly women, newcomers to our country. You know, English is oftentimes their second language. So these are workers who are often pretty vulnerable themselves, and throughout the pandemic many of them were afraid of even going into work because of the impact it would have on their families. There was just a myriad of issues.

COVID really taught us the importance of having full-time staff with benefits who had support. This is not work that is unskilled. We need to have highly skilled, trained people in these positions. I mean, they're caring for our parents. Certainly, both my parents are in different continuing care facilities. My father has pretty profound dementia, so he's in a secure unit. My mom is in, well, a lodge up in the town I grew up in, in Peace River country. You know, these are our family members, who we want to be cared for.

We were hoping with Bill 11 that that actually was the intent of this bill also, but what we found is that it is framework legislation that really doesn't give us a lot of information. You know, we were hopeful. I mean, it's been quite a bit of time since the facility-based continuing care review was completed. The government did do consultation, and they put together a report, but it's been over a year since that report came out, and now finally this legislation has come out. But guess what the legislation says. The legislation says: "We're not actually going to give you any details that we understand would make the situation better, that we heard from Albertans. We're leaving that all to regulations. Those regulations are going to come out in the spring of 2023."

So we're still waiting. We're still waiting, and people are still in a vulnerable situation in our continuing care system. Thankfully, you know, many people have been vaccinated, of course. Frail, fragile seniors who, of course, weren't vaccinated at the outset because we didn't have a vaccine for COVID-19: many of them did lose their lives. But certainly both my parents have three vaccines each. I have three vaccines, and I think they may be in line for the fourth one, actually.

As I said, sadly, 1,600 people did die in continuing care at the outset, and a lot of it was because of the way these continuing care facilities are run, where profit is the motive. In having staff only on a part-time basis with no benefits, working at many facilities so that they could cobble together some kind of full-time work to make ends meet so that they could care for their own families, sadly, many of them did transmit COVID from one facility to another, and then many residents of continuing care facilities did lose their lives because of that.

We were hoping this legislation would, you know, take bold action and take control of the situation and really address some of the issues that I'm just talking about. Certainly, we know that the facility-based continuing care review said that we actually need 6,000 – 6,000 – more staff in our continuing care system. What's happening with supporting that? What are the postsecondaries doing? What's the government's plan around that? I mean, creating 6,000 more workers is not a simple thing to do, but from their own report we know that many more staff are needed.

We know that we need improved working conditions so that people are supported in their work. You know, sadly, a lot of these staff aren't necessarily – they may be new to Canada. They're not super confident about how the labour system works in Canada.

They may not speak up about their concerns, and then they have such a large number of residents to support, and it's overwhelming for them.

We know that in continuing care facilities, I mean, that is a key thing. Our staff are so important because they are supporting our loved ones to dress themselves, toileting them, helping them in and out of bed, you know, very intimate work.

Certainly, during the time of COVID, when everybody is masked, that can be confusing and just pretty challenging. They have all these new protocols to follow because of COVID, and then that's just an extra burden on the worker without much support. A lot of times family members would help out, but of course the facilities were closed oftentimes to family members coming in. Many times family members would take on responsibilities for feeding their loved ones, helping them with the day-to-day, and certainly just the connection, the social connection.

That's a difficult thing for the workers, to be able to have that kind of time, to be able to support people. They have so many more people to support, and they have to hurry up. You know, it's very difficult to create a relationship, to create trust with the residents when there's all that kind of pressure. As I said, oftentimes they're just part-time workers, so they have to go to another job. So, yeah, everything is rush, rush.

Improving working conditions to make sure that they have the support they need: that's another recommendation from the facility-based continuing care review that could have been fleshed out more. What does that exactly mean? What does the government think needs to be improved? Certainly, we know – and we've heard this; this is something that I certainly heard a lot when I was Minister of Seniors and Housing, too – that we do need increased full-time staff. We need staff that have stable, full-time, permanent jobs. They need to be supported in that so that they cannot be worried about, you know, not having benefits or rushing to another job, whether it's within the industry or in another industry, and just be able to have that support of full-time benefits. That's also very important because these staff are crucial to the well functioning of any kind of continuing care facility.

Then the fourth recommendation is to increase the amount of home care provided. That's also a very important piece of this, to make sure that people are supported with home care and then also giving more specifics about service to people in continuing care. Of course, the recommendation that I've heard is 4.1 hours a day that staff would support them.

We were hoping for some specificity in this bill regarding some of those recommendations that came out of the facility-based continuing care review. Certainly, you know, I have no issues with any of those recommendations. Sadly, the bill itself does not articulate any of that, and I guess that's sort of a disappointment because I think we need change now. There are still challenges in our continuing care system. They haven't been alleviated. Thankfully, because of vaccination, things have calmed down in those centres, but I think the staff are still precarious.

Certainly, the for-profit model, that whole financialization of the sector continues to be a significant concern for us here in the Official Opposition. We know from many research studies, in terms of positive outcomes for residents, that public and nonprofit facilities are much superior to private facilities. So, you know, with the large number of private facilities, the for-profit motive, it's really a concern that that wasn't addressed more by this government.

We certainly know that, you know, the federal government did give money to these private agencies to support the facilities and support workers. It came sort of through the provincial government, and there were some challenges with the provincial government, of course, getting that money out the door so that people could be supported. But we also know, too, these private operators weren't being responsible about what that money was intended for. Of course, it was to support staff, to support the residents in a very difficult time. Some of those independent private operators – guess what? – took that money and gave it to shareholders. They gave dividends to them during this time of COVID. So, I mean, that is just flagrantly clear, that with the private operators the goal isn't about seniors' care. The goal is about profit, making sure their shareholders get money. That money: the intention absolutely was to support residents in continuing care facilities and certainly support staff in them. That's very distressing for me, for sure.

I guess some of the other concerns are that, as I said, Bill 11 – we were really hoping that this legislation would take a hold of the issues that we saw really illuminated through COVID-19 and address them. You know, the UCP said, "Yes, it's coming; we're doing that" even though they sort of dragged their feet after the report. More than a year ago it was brought out, the facility-based continuing care review. But I guess it's just another demonstration, very sadly, that we really can't trust the UCP. I mean, they say that things are coming, they say that they're going to revamp the system, but unfortunately that's not really what happened.

You know, there are so many other examples of this that I find distressing. I mean, just recently the CEO of AHS was fired by the UCP. Certainly, we understand that it's to expedite the privatization of health care in Alberta, because she was standing up for public health care, which is where we stand on that issue also, and certainly the whole NDP caucus knows the importance of public health care and wouldn't be doing the many things to dismantle our public health system that the UCP is doing.

Another thing that the UCP did some time ago now is that they took grieving families' right to justice away in Bill 70, the COVID-19 Related Measures Act, so loved ones of residents in continuing care facilities can no longer, you know, go to the court system for justice when they feel like their loved ones hadn't been cared for. Certainly, I remember very well that people couldn't see their loved ones and were frustrated by the decisions of many facilities, and many people died in these facilities. We heard stories of loved ones being left for extended periods of time in their own waste. Certainly, some people died – you know, these were preventable deaths – because of the wide spread of COVID-19 in the facilities.

They wanted justice. They wanted to be able to take these private operators to court, but the UCP decided, "No; we're going to protect these big privates," and they took away the citizens of Alberta's rights to seek justice through the court. I mean, that's another situation where you can't really trust the UCP. It's taking away Albertans' rights even though there is some egregious issue going on. So many grieving families reached out to me during that time, and, you know, it was abhorrent that they weren't given that kind of justice.

I already had mentioned that private operators took COVID funding for shareholders and not to support residents, so, again, that profit motive is so clear.

You know, it goes beyond just health care. Some of the things that we really can't trust this government regarding – certainly, the billions of dollars that were thrown away on a nonexistent pipeline: it was very clear when President Biden said in his campaign that he would not be supporting the pipeline, but regardless, like, money was thrown to a nonexistent pipeline. So that's also a question of competence, a question of trust of this government.

Certainly, we know the fiasco of the energy war room, the waste of millions of dollars, really: for what purpose? I mean, there's just been scandal after scandal coming out of there.

Something that is particularly upsetting to me is that the UCP fired the Seniors Advocate. I mean, I think that especially during COVID the Seniors Advocate and her office would have been very helpful to residents of continuing care facilities because that's the role of the advocate, to support seniors in their . . .

The Chair: Are there others to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise this afternoon to speak to Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act. I would like to thank the hon. member for her very important remarks regarding this piece of legislation. I think that she's got some incredible outreach when it comes to working with seniors. This was her ministry, and I know that many continue to go to her with concerns. There's definitely been no inability to advocate on their behalf, so when I hear the member talk about the concerns that have been raised and are simply not addressed in this piece of legislation, you know, I really take that to heart because I'm hearing a lot of similar concerns.

When we talk about staffing in long-term continuing care facilities, I think that's one of the biggest concerns that I hear from staff, from residents and family members of those that live in these homes. I think that when we talk about the care of seniors, we need to look at what is deserving. I think that having a place where people are stable in their employment, they have continuity of care. They have confidence in the services that they're providing. It simply creates a working space that's supportive of the staff, which then, in turn, has an incredible impact on the individuals that they're working with.

To be clear, they're working with them in their homes. This is where seniors live. It's not an organization that they attend weekly. This is their everyday home, and unfortunately we're seeing staffing issues that are not considering the type of work that these individuals are being asked to do. Like the member had acknowledged, there are many that are without full-time contracts. We live in a place where full-time employment is a requirement in order to be able to pay your bills, and if you can't achieve full-time hours in one space, you're often working multiple jobs, which creates an impact on not just the staff but the individuals that they are providing care to.

I know my experience working in group care: I had the incredible privilege to work with youth in their home. That was the first and foremost thought every day when I went to work: this is my job, but I'm going into their home. Being able to provide a place of safety and security within that context is so important. When you have staff changes that are continuous, when you have multiple staff members coming and going, it creates a space of chaos when it comes to the day-to-day lives of those that you're trying to serve.

I think that this piece of legislation had a real opportunity to take the learnings that we've seen not just in Alberta but all across Canada when it comes to the actual state of what our continuing care is. Unfortunately, none of that is reflected in this bill. I know that at the beginning of COVID we watched other provinces call on the Canadian Armed Forces to come in and assist because there was just so much happening in some of those facilities that they needed additional support. A report came out from that, and I would argue that, yes, it was based on two provinces, but I would think that the same findings could be found in homes in the province of Alberta, because I heard those stories. I heard the horrific experiences of some individuals that are living in continuing care facilities, things like being simply understaffed.

What that means: when you're working with seniors who are vulnerable, who are heavily reliant on those that provide care for them, it can have devastating impacts on those individuals. It's not a matter of not having enough customer service at an organization or enough people to put clothes on hangers. These are everyday needs that are being dismissed and not because the staff don't want to do the work that's required, but they simply can't. There were things happening where individuals were being left in soiled linens for days. There were situations where people were asking to be assisted to use the washroom and told: no, I just changed you. The impact on an individual's well-being is huge when it comes to not being able to have the staffing in place that can actually meet their needs.

I think this government had an incredible opportunity to really look at the learnings from other provinces and to listen to those that are living in Alberta right now in these facilities and could have made some significant, meaningful change to better the life of seniors living in these homes. Unfortunately, we don't see that in this legislation.

I know that I've heard heartbreaking stories from individuals, nurses, care providers that are burnt out. They signed up to be working in the field of human services, to work with community, to really, truly be of service to those that they work with, and they're at a place where they don't feel like they have the actual capacity to do the work that they want to do. So many nurses have told me that they're simply in there distributing medication and meeting basic, basic needs. They're burning out. They're stressed out. When you put in a pandemic, that we saw unfortunately take so many seniors in continuing care – 1,600 and counting passed away from COVID. You see the impact that that has on the families, the other residents, the staff. When staff are telling me that they're working in multiple facilities and they're afraid that they're bringing COVID from home to home and then back to their family but there's nobody there that could replace them, this has trauma impact on those individuals, the trauma of residents knowing that their friends are being isolated because of COVID.

It's so much bigger than what this piece of legislation does, and I think that when we have a government that took away the opportunity for families to have justice, I'm unfortunately not surprised that we have a piece of legislation that has no action. We actively saw government take away the right for family members to have some sort of justice when it came to their loved ones in care, and this was a real opportunity to have legislation that made an impact, to be able to listen to what the families have said, to listen to those residents that live in continuing care, to listen to the staff, the pleas for actually doing something that has meaningful impact. That's not what this legislation does.

This UCP has continued to fail residents of continuing care throughout the pandemic, and I struggle to understand why. There are so many stories, that I know every member of this House has heard, of someone that's been impacted by a death of a resident, of an Albertan in continuing care, and some of those tragic deaths could have been prevented. There were decisions made by this government that didn't take into account what the health care providers were asking for, what those that are working in the facilities were asking for, what family members were asking for. Unfortunately, this legislation does nothing to mitigate any of the risk that was identified and to actually make it better for those that are working and/or living in these continuing care facilities.

I know that there's incredible trauma that's happened throughout the pandemic, just so many that are at the front line, and I would argue that those providing care in these continuing care facilities have been exposed to trauma. There's something in the social work profession, in helping services, emergency responders that's called vicarious trauma. That would have an impact on residents as well. It's not just the staff, but it's the residents that are living this day to day. These are their homes.

There needs to be some sort of action to support seniors in their home. We need to look at the staff-to-patient ratios. Right now I know of students that are working in some of these continuing care facilities that are saying that without the students there is absolutely zero possibility of meeting the basic needs of the residents. Students aren't a given, Madam Chair. Students are dependent on the postsecondary institution. It depends on how many students are registered that year. There are so many variables that it's not a guarantee that they're going to have students, and to hear students being put in these situations where they're burning out, where they're questioning whether or not this is the field that they want to be in when they're not supported by government, when they're not seeing real change or real support that has an impact: that, to me, is very, very concerning. I know what it's like to work in someone's home. I know the stress that can come along with the needs that you're expected to do as a staffperson.

To hear those concerns and to have the ability to make change: I'm just so confused why this bill doesn't provide any sort of action when it comes to those pleas. We have a government that says: "Just trust us. All of that will be in the regulations." It's really hard to take them at their word for that because we haven't seen anything that would suggest that this is being taken seriously. We saw – this UCP took away, like I said, the family's right to seek justice. What kind of message does that give to the families right now with this legislation? Just trust us? Based on their record they don't have a voice. They have no right as grieving families to seek justice for their loved ones. That's the track record that this government has.

We saw this government refuse to create an independent office for a seniors advocate. When I have individuals calling my office asking, "Who can we complain to? Who will hear our voice?" well, I know that members of our caucus are being that voice. They're sharing those stories. They're sharing those pleas. I know that the government is being included in that information because I'm CCed on it. I know that they're sending it to the Premier, they're sending it to the Health minister, they're sending it to the seniors minister, yet it's having no impact. I'm just really concerned, when we have a bill that says Continuing Care Act, why it's not taking the information and putting it into action. It's simply not doing anything to actually support the real needs that they're intending or saying that they're supporting.

When we look at the conditions and the standards of the facilities, there is just so much that needs to change. Like, we've heard in debate that, you know, COVID shone a light on some of the glaring – glaring – mistreatment and horrible working conditions and living conditions in continuing care, yet here we are debating a piece of legislation, Bill 11, that has nothing in terms of action. We've been living in a COVID world for two years. We've been hearing stories of those that are impacted and the pleas to make changes, but there's nothing in here that actually makes those changes. The UCP is saying that it provides accountability, but we haven't even seen this government be accountable for the decisions that they've been making. We know that there were promises that the UCP made that they would increase home care, the amount of hours of care for residents that they would receive, increase the proportion of full-time staff, but that's not actually in this piece of legislation, so they're not even committing to their own promises.

It fails to make any substantive or meaningful changes. I struggle when we continuously hear: "Just trust us. It'll be in the regulation." This is an opportunity to have it clear-cut, to have some sort of impact of change, some sort of action, yet it's not in this piece of legislation. I know that Albertans are struggling, and their struggles are falling on deaf ears. It's very concerning when we know, glaringly, what the concerns are: the staffing ratios, the inability to have the opportunity for full-time employment, some of the standards of care. We have the information of what could make it better, yet we're not seeing that being implemented. I struggle with why we have this piece of legislation before us when it's not really doing anything substantive to actually improve working conditions or improve quality of life for those that are living in these facilities.

There's significant risk in continuing the way that we are. We're hearing from so many across the province that have loved ones in these facilities that require significant amounts of care that as a family member they can't provide. They're relying on the support of staff to do that, and still the needs of their loved one are not being met. I have friends that – the whole family, she and her husband and her two adult children, rotates for meals for her great-aunt just to make sure she gets fed. The place where she's living doesn't have capacity to sit with her and feed her the way that she needs. She has some quite significant medical challenges and requires a lot of support, and the staff just simply can't do it, so the family every day, three times a day, rotates to make sure that their aunt is being cared for and fed.

I know that that situation isn't unique. I hear so many stories of concerns with loved ones, especially during the height of the pandemic, when visitors weren't allowed. We were hearing pleas from staff that they needed more support, they needed help, because they relied on family members and other caregivers to come in and support them. Why has that gone unactioned? How can those that are working in health care trust a government that has made no significant change to support them in the work that they do? I just feel so . . . [Ms Goehring's speaking time expired]

Thank you, Madam Chair.

5:30

The Chair: Are there others? The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Madam Chair, and I'd like to thank the hon. members across the way for their comments on Bill 11 and their passion and compassion for Albertans and improving the continuing care system. The Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs asked the question: why do we have this before us? I'd like to comment on that because on this side of the House we have the same passion and the same compassion for Albertans, for seniors, those living with disabilities, those in our continuing care system, and that's what this bill is all about. It's about improving it. I want to talk a little bit about what this bill does and what it's intended to do and what it's supposed to do, and then I'll talk a little bit about what it doesn't do and address some of the concerns raised by the other side, because it's really important that we frame this correctly.

What this bill does is that it provides one overarching piece of legislation that will provide consistency and alignment across the continuing care system. It will start a major transformational change to existing policy and practice, and this includes a number of things, Madam Chair. It includes replacing the multiple acts with one piece of modern legislation for continuing care and allows us to bring together not only multiple acts but be able to reform multiple regulations and policies to be able to enable transformation. It will improve transparency and accountability to Albertans regarding how the continuing care system is governed.

It will enable a person-centred, flexible, and innovative system of care for Albertans. It will establish a consistent approach, an alignment of legislated requirements and services across our entire continuing care system. So what will happen, Madam Chair, is that an individual won't have to move rooms because they're going from one level of care to another one. They can stay in the same room and the care can be brought to them, for example.

It's going to address gaps in the current legislation, and this framework is exactly that: it is a framework. Bill 11 brings everything together so that we can start the transformation, particularly in regard to getting the regulation and the policy in place.

I want to just comment a little bit about the intent behind it because it goes to the preamble, which is an important part of the bill because it actually signals what we're trying to accomplish. Many of the things – I think we can agree on both sides of the House that these are important, you know, that we do this to be able to improve our continuing care system. I'll just highlight a few of them.

Whereas the Government of Alberta is committed to ensuring that the delivery of continuing care and the design of the continuing care system in Alberta are based on a person-centred approach;

[where] the quality of life of continuing care residents and clients is the highest priority for the Government of Alberta . . .

[where] family and friends who act as caregivers play a significant role . . .

[and also where] staff who provide continuing care enhance the quality of life of residents and clients and [are] well-trained and supported [and that this is] vital to the continuing care system.

So all of these principles are highlighted in the preamble, and that's the core of what this framework is for.

Now, I do appreciate comments from the other side because it seems to be that the debate is not about what's in the bill and the framework, but it's what's not in the bill. Madam Chair, I've mentioned in this House before, and I'll say it again. You know, some of the items that are being talked about – for example, the Member for Edmonton-Riverview mentioned that the number of continuing care spaces needs to be enhanced. There needs to be some more detail or a framework regarding staffing models or how many hours of care are provided. There needs to be a movement – and this is all highlighted in the facility-based continuing care report – towards home care. Well, all of this is currently covered in regulation and/or policy. That's the appropriate place for that. It never has been in any of the existing acts, right? We do need to update the regulations once we pull it all into one place, and we are committing to Albertans to do that. It's not in the acts as they exist today; it's in regulation and policy, and that's the appropriate place for it, Madam Chair, because as things change, we need to modify this. I point out to members across the way that when they were in government, they didn't put it into an act. That is the appropriate place for it, to be in the regulation and to be in policy.

Madam Chair, we are taking action. Not only does it need to be in regulation or policy; quite frankly, changes to support the transformation of our continuing care system need to be budgeted for, and Budget 2022 does that. We allocated $1.7 billion for community care, an increase of 7.6 per cent, or $122 million. We allocated $1.2 billion for continuing care, an increase of $16 million, or 1.3 per cent, from the previous year. To the point raised by members across the way, home care: we increased home care by $81 million, or a 12.1 per cent increase from the previous year, and that is simply just the start.

In addition, we recognize that there need to be more continuing care spaces as the population is aging, and we need to invest in that.

Madam Chair, last year's budget provided for 1,500 spaces to be created this year. In Budget 2022, in addition to that, we added another $204 million over the next few years to build more continuing care spaces, $91 million to complete the Bridgeline Riverside continuing care centre in Calgary, another $142 million over two years for the Gene Zwodzesky centre in Edmonton.

Madam Chair, we are taking action. We understand that we need to transform our system, and the place to take action is getting the framework right – so that's this bill – and then investing into home care, continuing care, community care, which we're doing through Budget 2022, and then updating the regulations, updating the policies associated with this.

I appreciate the passion on the other side of the House in terms of, you know, focus on improving our continuing care system. We feel that same passion on our side of the House, right? That's why we launched the facility-based continuing care review. That's why we budgeted an additional $200 million in Budget 2022 not only on the expense side but also on the capital side, and that's why we need to move forward with this Bill 11 to be able to start this up. This is the framework that enables transformation, so I would ask members on the opposite of the House to support this as it is and to vote in favour of it so we can get it done, we can get it done quickly, because you're right: we need to move and move now. So let's support this, let's get this passed, let's move to the next stage in terms of regulation and policy, and our government will continue to take action to support seniors and to support those with disabilities.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm happy to rise to continue on some of the comments here around Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act. I appreciate the minister getting up and sharing some thoughts. In one of the comments there, I noticed that he pointed out that he doesn't feel that we're talking about the bill and what's in the bill. I've always said that you look at the language. What does it say? What doesn't it say? What are you saying about it? Now, here's the challenge, because we're not talking about what's in the bill: it's because these things will affect what is in this bill.

Let's start with one of the things that he mentioned around that report my colleagues from Edmonton-Riverview and Edmonton-Castle Downs talked about, the facility-based continuing care review and some of the recommendations that were made in that, including staffing. So we're talking about increasing spacing. You know, you had talked about enabling so that if somebody needs a higher level of care, they don't have to move their room. I certainly agree with that.

You had made some mentions around accountability and transparency, and I'm going to challenge you a little bit on that. I feel that the government has struggled with that. There is a reason that the government has been labelled one of the most secretive in Canada, but we'll leave that part of the debate for another time.

One of the most critical things is that you can have the best facilities with the best equipment, with the best intentions, with the best legislation; if you don't have the people to staff it, it will start to fall apart, so all the beginning steps, all the beginning framework will be for naught.

Here's why I find myself now – you know, the labour hat is coming on – focusing around the staffing side of things. First off, I'm very, very lucky in Edmonton-Decore. I have some very, very good facilities. Can there always be improvements? Absolutely.

I've seen one, for instance, that's really taken that to the next level. But the funny thing is that they're all, every last one of them, always looking for volunteers. Certainly, nothing against – you know, thank God for volunteers and the heart that they bring to things. But if you need volunteers to run your facility, you don't have enough staff right then and there.

Now, my colleague from Edmonton-Riverview had talked about some of the precarious employment, people working part-time. If you want to kind of tie this to a little bit of an economic reason, Madam Chair, when you have people working full-time and they're making a reasonable wage and they're able to participate in the economy, you know, a wage that they can spend on a house, grow their family with, you don't have to worry about people working multiple jobs, which then opens up potentially other jobs for people. But there's this big focus on part-time employment, including in our continuing care.

Nobody could have seen this coming. Well, perhaps maybe we could have if we looked back in history across other pandemics and kind of put two and two together. But when you have employees that have to work at multiple facilities because they can only get part-time, because that facility can only afford to pay part-time, that increases your chance of transmission when this pandemic hit us. This is not saying that facilities weren't trying their best. I have full belief that most really did. Unfortunately, we did see examples where that didn't happen, where they didn't try their best, and people literally paid for it with their lives.

Now, when you have the proper staffing level – again, we can create the framework legislation where, for instance, as the minister mentioned, if you now start to need a higher level of care, you don't have to move rooms. Great idea. I'm fully onboard with that. But if you don't have staff to be able to handle it, you're still going to run into problems.

That brings me to a story that I just heard last week, on Wednesday. I have full permission from my constituent to tell this story. It's actually two parts: one about his father, one about his mother, and the result of the shortfalls in continuing care. Now, had there been a seniors advocate perhaps, maybe there would have been somebody bringing these forward together already. I know that the government felt that folding that into the Health Advocate was a great idea: cutting red tape and saving money. It has negatively impacted seniors. I'm telling you this. I've heard it too many times now, as has my friend from Edmonton-Castle Downs, I've been CCed on the e-mails. It's not working. Seniors, the people that built our province, need that voice. That's not in this piece of legislation. That will help improve continuing care.

Ken, my constituent, recently talked about his mother in one of the facilities. Now, it's ironic because she spent her career in continuing care helping people, trying to make sure they can get dressed, that they can eat, that they can go to the bathroom. To then finally wind up where he visits her one day – and she's in her room. It's dark because the curtains haven't been, you know, opened up. She's got her hands covering her face, and as he walks in, she puts her hands down, realizes it's her son: thank God you're here. She's covered in food because there wasn't enough staff to give her the level of needs that she required.

This is not to blame staff. Staff are doing the best they can. But if you are pulled in too many directions, as my colleagues have mentioned, not only do you get frustration, exhaustion, and everything else that comes with that, but it's ultimately the resident that suffers. You can have all the enabling legislation that you want, Madam Chair, but at the end of the day, if you don't have enough people, you can't execute it.

He talked about his father, who passed away just – I think it was two years ago, plus or minus a couple of months. He got a call because the facility had to inform him that they forgot about him and that he spent five hours on the toilet because there weren't enough staff. Again, I realize this is not part of the legislation that's in Bill 11, but without it, Bill 11 means nothing. It will not help.

I also heard the story – you know what, Madam Chair? I'm going to sit down for a moment because I think the minister wants to intervene. I'm going to give him that opportunity to speak, and then I might jump back up again.

The Chair: It's Committee of the Whole, so there are no interventions, but you may speak as many times as you like.

The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Madam Chair. Thank you to the hon. member. I'll make this very short. The hon. member made a comment that the bill doesn't address the issues that the hon. member is raising. I actually ask the hon. member to take a look at part 4, compliance and enforcement, and also part 6, the resident and family councils, because there are elements in this bill, right? Part of the changes about transparency and accountability, especially when you talk about compliance and enforcement, provides new tools so that if there's an issue where a continuing care operator – and I appreciate, you know, that they're working very hard. But if they're not able to provide the levels of service, then not only are there tools to be able to pull their licence, in the worst case, but in other cases we can actually use administrative tools to make sure that they comply and provide the level of care that they are required to under the standards. And there are resident and family councils.

I would ask the hon. member to take a look at that in terms of the context of these issues. There are issues now, but there have been issues before – right? – and we need to have a framework in place to address them going forward.

I want to thank the hon. member for the opportunity to provide a comment even though there is an ability in the Committee of the Whole. Thank you.

The Chair: You guys can talk as long as you want although be aware of the time.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: The proper comment should have been: maybe I'll take my seat to listen to more discussion. I'll have to remember that for Committee of the Whole myself.

Yeah. I appreciate those comments. I know which one he's talking about, especially in terms of the family council. That's something I've certainly encouraged family members to bring forward to these facilities. I've attended some of these meetings. Again, it's coming down to staffing levels. It's not that the facilities don't want to have enough people. That's top of mind. It comes down to the money.

I'm going to be a little bit critical here of the private, for-profit facilities. I don't begrudge them, somewhat, around wanting to make a profit, but they don't wait till the end of the year to see how much money is left and that's their profit. They cut that off right at the hop, right at the beginning: that's our profit for the year, and then what's left over goes into the care. If that happens to run out, that becomes a problem. Then you see these shortfalls in staffing so that they can hit those bottom lines, because they can't actually run out of money and not be able to run their facility. So they calculate these things out.

You know, you have residents, for instance, with feeding problems. That might be swallowing. There may be other challenges. Again, you know, I'm hearing a story from Ken about another resident in a facility where a staff member comes in, tries to feed. Whatever the reason, they just couldn't get them to eat. They put the spoon down. They walk away because they have other things they've got to do, and they've got to try to get to those. Then they come back. They pick the spoon up. They try to feed. No success. They put it down, walk away. The next thing you know, you've got the cleaning staff coming in: well, the person didn't eat. They take it away. Now that resident hasn't had anything to eat.

Again, you can have the family councils, you can have the enabling legislation, but when it comes to the people that built our province, that all of us here in this Chamber enjoy, we have to step up. I appreciate that the minister, you know, talked about the money that's being invested in continuing care and in home care, but here's where I'll challenge. As I've always said – I'll be honest; I'm not trying to start a fight; I'm not trying to be disrespectful – if we've got $30 million a year to go chase after Bigfoot, we have money to spend on our seniors. If we have $1.3 billion to bet on an election, we have money to spend on our seniors. We can ensure that our staffing levels are high enough so that that level of care is exemplary, so that we don't have residents with food all over them and who haven't been changed and have been there like that for hours, so that we don't have residents that get forgotten about on the toilet for five hours or more.

I appreciate the comments from the minister, but this is why we were bringing such things up, because without them, at the end of the day, like I said, you can have all the councils you want. They're going to keep bringing up the same thing: "There's not enough staff. There's not enough staff. There's not enough staff." That's always – always – what I keep hearing. We need to do better with our seniors, and I feel we had a better chance with Bill 11 to address some of those things.

Again, it's Committee of the Whole. I know there are others that want to jump up and speak to this. I'll reiterate again that I feel that the Seniors Advocate being rolled into the Health Advocate hasn't worked. It's created a bigger problem. That voice of seniors has been watered down because of that. There are absolutely way more, you know, health concerns that the advocate has to focus on – I appreciate that – but not at the expense of our seniors' voice. We could have re-examined that here in Bill 11 to bring more focus around that.

I will give way to some of my colleagues here and let them have a chance to have a say here.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Madam Chair. With the brief amount of time left here this afternoon, I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 11 in Committee of the Whole, and I'm thankful for the comments that have been made previous to me. Of course, I've had the opportunity to speak to Bill 11 previously, but I'm always happy to take another opportunity to share some of my thoughts and concerns in this instance.

You know, I appreciate as well that the minister is willing to stand up, but what we've heard this afternoon is essentially – again, it's been repeated – that this is a framework and that so much more has to come from the regulations. First, we can look at the report that was released in May 2021, which has been talked to at length, the facility-based analysis and how we can improve these situations. Of course, since then the government has come forward with Bill 11 saying that this is addressing many of the concerns in there, and the rest, Albertans and this House – well, not this House, because it will be done through regulations. Alberta seniors, who are disproportionately being negatively impacted and dying because of the lack of response from this UCP government: well, they have to wait an entire other year to see what those regulations might look like.

I think it's also important to reflect on the fact that this is quite possibly, if it's not called earlier, in the middle of election time, so now we have a commitment from this government that they are going to finish this process in the midst of an election. I truly find it unbelievable, Madam Chair, that this is going to be finalized by the time the next election rolls out, and I think it's truly unfortunate for all Albertans and especially the seniors who are depending on this minister to move forward with this process.

I mean, the minister stood in the House and said: well, some of the really important work, like the preamble, has been finished in this legislation. I mean, if it wasn't so sad, Madam Chair, I would have to laugh at statements like that, talking about person-centred care and family and friends playing a significant role, the minister saying that that's the core of this legislation in the preamble. It's truly unbelievable that in the year since this report has been released, they've only been able to come up with a framework and then have the audacity to tell members of this House that they need to pass this legislation so that they can move forward with the regulations. They've already said that it's going to take an entire year to pass that.

There is no accountability from this government when it comes to many things but in this instance how this government cares for and protects seniors. That, as the previous member stated, is clearly shown in the terrible decision to roll the Seniors Advocate into the Health Advocate office. Since then we've seen no accountability on that file in terms of annual reports coming on behalf of the Health Advocate, and further, of course, the person in this position is a UCP insider. I've talked to countless Alberta seniors who do not have faith in the current advocate, that question day in and day out why they don't have a senior advocating for their interests. It's quite clear, when we see legislation like this coming forward, that it's because this UCP government simply is not interested in listening to them.

We saw the minister talk about things like the resident and family councils and how important they are. The NDP agrees, and that's why we brought forward that process, the opportunity for those councils to take place in these homes. In many instances these seniors and the families felt like their voices weren't being heard, so we brought that process forward. This government and this minister are acting like it's a new process. That's simply not the case. It's the same on many of the issues that are legislated through this, that in so many cases this is simply just bringing together several pieces of legislation and not actually improving them in any way, Madam Chair.

The fact is that this government is telling Albertan seniors that they have to wait another year while day after day we are losing more of those seniors. Families are grieving people in their life that they have lost, and unfortunately this government is unwilling to take any real action on this issue, which is truly disappointing. It's been said again and again in this House that the report, that was previously tabled in May 2021, is a good report. It's something that we should be moving forward on as soon as possible. The government has had a year to make that possible, and unfortunately all we have is a framework, and we are told to wait another year, again, while Alberta seniors are dying. It's truly unfortunate.

We need to do better. Seniors deserve better. They deserve a better government, and they deserve better representatives in the government making sure that their voices are heard. They deserve an advocate, and they deserve to have many things, Madam Chair, not the least being full-time staff to support their needs. Again and again we see that the staff, the health care workers that are taking care of these families are themselves living in poverty. How can we expect that they are able to offer their best when it comes to supporting . . .

The Chair: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but the clock strikes 6. The committee will be recessed until 7:30 this evening.

[The committee adjourned at 6 p.m.]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: Nobody needs to stand, but I guess maybe everybody should be seated. I would like to call the committee to order.

Mr. McIver: Unbelievable respect. That's what it is.

The Deputy Chair: Of course, and I appreciate it.

Bill 11 Continuing Care Act

The Deputy Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments to be made at this time? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has risen.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I am pleased to rise to speak to Bill 11, which is the Continuing Care Act. I know I've had the opportunity to speak to this bill before, but I'm very excited to get to speak to it again because I ran out of time last time. No one will be surprised to hear that. [A cellphone rang]

What we were talking about is what the bill does do, which is to say that it consolidates several pieces of legislation. Now, I'm a fan of modernizing legislation. I think it's important. Anyone who knew me from the Legislative Review Committee when we were in government will know that I'm oddly nit-picky about very strange things, but I think it's important. I mean, it is the law, right? We talk about it in a very glib manner sometimes in this place, but it is the law, and it needs to be sufficiently modern so that it can handle modern contexts and so that people can apply it out there in the real world, because that's what it does. So it is important that we consolidate regulations.

However, I think that what needs to be considered here is context. We have a context where the long-term care system in this province and provinces across the country, in fact probably in most of the world, has been severely tested over two years of a pandemic. I think flaws have been discovered that maybe were there before but were a lot less obvious. We saw, tragically, a number of people dying and quite a high number of people dying in long-term care, and we shouldn't lose sight of that because those were real people.

Yes, many of those residents were older or they were disabled, but their lives had value and their lives had meaning, and they were cut short in part because of a pandemic but in part because the systems we had in place were not able to adequately adjust to a pandemic. I think that's serious, and it's something that should be treated with the greatest seriousness and also with great speed because this is a problem that's still occurring today. People are still being infected today, and residents of a long-term care home can still have very serious outcomes.

The thing that this bill doesn't do is fulfill the promises that this UCP government made a year ago. It doesn't fulfill the promise to increase home care, it doesn't fulfill the promise to increase the number of hours of care that a resident would receive, and it doesn't fulfill the promise to increase the number of full-time staff. I'd like to go through each of those in detail.

I'm going to begin with the last, actually, the proportion of full-time staff. We saw that an order had to be brought in for single-site work. That was a good and important thing, but it had to be delayed and modified and with exemptions granted because our system was not able to adequately adapt to it. We have designed a system that is so focused on the dollars you spend on each individual, not on their quality of life, not on whether they wind up in a higher level of care because they didn't receive adequate care in the level that they were in. This is a real thing, particularly when you're dealing with patients who have the early signs of dementia. If they receive appropriate and adequate care, if they are adequately engaged, they are much more likely to be much more functional for a much longer time. They will spend less time in a higher level of care, and we all know that higher levels of care are much more expensive.

That's something that's worth talking about, too, because it often gets lost in this conversation. When people are trying to compare private homes to public homes, they forget that there are different levels of care. There are four levels of care and then dementia care. Dementia care has way, way, way higher staffing needs than the lowest level of care, which is right, right? We're trying to put the appropriate individuals in the right places so that they get the level of care that is necessary for them.

Patients with severe dementia require a lot of care because they are often problematic in terms of that sometimes there is violence. It's not because the person intends there to be but because they are scared and confused and don't understand what's going on. It's often the case, going back to the full-time staff thing, that they're dealing with different people on a day-to-day basis. Can you imagine anything scarier than waking up and not knowing where you are and having someone come to care for you that you don't recognize and that you don't know and routines that are unfamiliar to you? This is the day-to-day life for a lot of these folks.

So the increase in the proportion of full-time staff is important. It's important from a pandemic perspective because we saw a lot of transmission occurring as a result of the fact that we rely on a system where staff are kept to part-time hours to avoid paying them benefits, and then they have to take multiple jobs in multiple different places. That's obviously bad in a pandemic; I think it's bad generally. I think it's bad generally because I think that people at the end of their lives deserve dignity, and part of dignity is knowing the people who are caring for you and not just sort of being, you know, a number in a room that is cared for by whoever happens to be going by. I think that it's important, and I think it contributes to the quality of life and ultimately contributes to a slower decline, which means that people are not put in those higher level care homes, which actually does save money.

I think this could be measured. We don't currently measure it in the system, but I think it could be measured, and it could be demonstrated that it saves money. There are a lot of things that come out of what you do and don't measure. Like, when people started doing social return on investment analyses for a number of social programs – for instance, affordable housing – it's often the case that estimates run between something like $4 and $10 in terms of policing costs, judicial costs saved by investing in affordable housing. I think that a similar analysis could be run here.

That proportion of full-time staff is important, and it's important, actually, for another reason. We talk a lot in this place about job numbers and whether they're going up or down. The numbers are reported in a detailed way and an important way for those who are familiar with them, who read them regularly, like most of us in here, but they can sort of be, I think, distorted somewhat for the public. When I see job numbers, as we have recently, where you're seeing the percentage of part-time jobs increasing, I don't always think that that's necessarily a good thing.

It's good to have more jobs, absolutely, but I think that for most people the ideal situation would be to have one full-time job that you work at that is able to cover your bills, and then that's it. You can choose to work an additional part-time job if you want to choose to work an additional part-time job, and that's fine. But increasingly we see a situation where full-time employment is becoming more and more rare. We see people in the gig economy, and we see things like this, where individuals are being forced to run from here to there to the next place to try to cobble together enough part-time jobs to essentially make a full-time salary, but they still don't get benefits, and that's a problem. It is a shift. It's a shift in our world, and I think it's a shift that government ought to concern itself with.

Now, I'm sure my friends across the way would tend to disagree, but I think government has a role to play in putting in place the incentives that cause the market to create more full-time jobs and fewer part-time jobs, however that is done. Whether it's having everyone have their benefits through their employers, having that sort of money redirected centrally and then everybody getting covered by benefits centrally, or whether having some sort of tax credit for paying for benefits for people, there are lots of different sort of policy solutions that you can have to this. I think that a world where increasingly people are cobbling together, you know, 60 hours out of three jobs to try to make ends meet is not the best-case scenario. It's a situation where our children may have it harder than we did, which is not something any parent ever wants. Many people come to this country – my grandparents did; I'm sure many people here have that same story – to build a life for their kids so that their kids can have better than what they did.

So, yes, there are three reasons, I guess, in summation, to increase the proportion of full-time staff, and they are better care for the residents; obviously, infection control, as we have discussed; but also that it's just better on a sort of overall view of a society for more people to be able to get by on just one job.

The other thing I mentioned that this bill doesn't deal with is the number of hours of care that a resident would receive. Now, that is relevant for many of the same reasons, because people at the end of their lives deserve dignity, and dignity involves often assistance with things. It often involves, in this case, assistance with, say, bathing and hours of care. I mean, these are very direct impacts. Like, we're talking about the difference between one bath a week and two baths a week, and that's a big deal. If you were the one-bath-a-week person, that would be a big deal in your life. I think that's a legitimate consideration.

So that is another reason that it's important to sort of be handling these things, be handling the number of hours of care, that and because if we do face a situation, like we have, when you're already running your system at absolute maximum capacity, when you are already running your staff to the point where they're borderline exhausted every day, where, you know, you're sort of two minutes of staffing time away from an emergency every day, then when something like a global pandemic hits, you're ill prepared. That is what we saw. This government promised that they would make that change, that they would increase the number of hours of care that residents receive.

Again, this is important to their quality of life. It's important to basics like nails being cut and hair being brushed and to people who require assistance with bathing or eating or any number of other things, but it's also important in terms of keeping people engaged in the world, in terms of having activities like exercise and going for walks. I mean, we all know the benefits that exercise has and having, you know, more individuals to be able to sort of move people and assist them to access exercise programs, to do exercise programs. These are important things. Social programs: also incredibly important. When people stop socializing, there are measurable impacts on cognition and on cognitive decline, particularly for those in early-stage dementia. Those things can be measured. We know they are important.

If we're measuring not just the dollars per unit but if we are genuinely considering those lives to have worth, which I think we ought to do, then quality of life should be one of those measures. It shouldn't just be: how much does it cost? It should be: what is your value for money? What are you getting for the dollars you invest? That's how we should think of it. We should think of it as an investment. That's how public services should always be thought of, because when you don't think of them that way, you get a sort of gradual chipping away that makes the world generally worse off. Maybe you can handle an individual for a smaller amount of money, but the quality of life that that individual is experiencing becomes lower and lower. I mean, that's one of the many reasons why I think the hours of care should be increased and why I think it's important.

You know, the government is saying: okay; well, we brought in this legislation, and this is going to happen by way of regulations. I mean, this "trust us" thing happens over and over again, but the "trust us" part never happens. They say, "Trust us," and then they never follow through. I don't know. It seems that people continue to be surprised. The UCP continues to be surprised that Albertans don't trust them, but when you keep making promises and you never follow through on them, people will not trust you. That's how it works.

So, yes, that number of hours of care is important. I don't think it can wait till 2023. You know, these recommendations were from a year ago. I feel like at least some of these changes could have been in the legislation. There was no reason that they needed to fall to regulation. In fact, when you're sort of delineating between what ought to go in your legislation and what ought to go in your regulations, basic protections should go in your legislation. The reason that basic protections should go in your legislation is because that is the thing that comes here to this place about which there is a public debate.

Now, I have a whole theory about there being fewer and fewer folks in the media, meaning that information doesn't necessarily flow to the public the way it used to, which is, I think, bad, very bad, for democracy, in my opinion. The theory at least, the purpose of a legislative branch, is that we come here and we debate, and we debate on the public record. There are reporters who take that information, and they take it to the public, and any member of the public can read what I have said here today, can, you know, access – I think probably you could watch it right now online; maybe some people even are. The point is that there is a public debate created about this sort of thing. The protections that you are putting in place for people belong in the legislation because that is what the public conversation is about, and the public has a right to weigh in on that.

Things that go in regulation are details. They're sort of like – you put fees in regulation because they tend to sort of change over time every few years. You tend to put in regulation sort of details of how the mechanism of government will implement things. The public doesn't necessarily have an interest in that level of detail, but what they do have an interest in is the care that their parents and grandparents will receive. This sort of hours-of-care issue is a basic protection, and it should rightfully fall to the legislation, in my view.

Finally, the other promise that is not enacted here is an increase in home care. Yes, we're talking about long-term care. We're not talking about home care. But the two are intimately linked because for a number of people in lower level care beds they actually could just as easily have stayed at home. That's good for a number of reasons, infection control being one of them but also sort of regularity being another one. In home care there are demonstrated effects. One of the things that the Member for Edmonton-Glenora did, when she served as Health minister, that I was really proud of was to increase home care. When we talk about health system costs, whether in the actual health system itself or in long-term care, home care is the best dollar-for-dollar investment you can make to decrease that.

Generally the most expensive piece of your health care system tends to be the sort of acute care, emergency room, ambulance kind of portion, right? And we need that. It needs to be there for an emergency, but if you can have more home care, you minimize the number of emergencies because it doesn't get to that point. It's the same way that I think the UCP's policy with respect to family physicians and the sort of consistent attack, specifically on primary care physicians, was so problematic, because that just drives things into the acute-care system. Not only does that drive up costs, but if the system – and this is what we're seeing right now. At a certain point the system maxes out on costs. There are no more costs to be driven up because there are no more bodies. There's no one to do the work, so what happens is that you just get people getting sicker or even possibly dying, and that is a really big problem because . . . [Ms Ganley's speaking time expired] Oh, man. Again?

The Deputy Chair: It goes quick.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. Actually, if it's okay, it was just – sometimes it's so tight.

Mr. Bilous: I had some very important, timely comments to make, but by all means.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Mr. Singh: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I stand today to voice my support for Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, which will, once again, enhance and modernize public health care while also responding to and meeting Albertans' health care needs. Before going further, let me thank the Minister of Health and the team for supporting and protecting Albertans who have voiced their concerns about the health care system in Alberta.

Mr. Chair, let us be reminded that Budget 2022 is moving Alberta forward by strengthening our health care system, getting more Albertans working, and bringing our finances back into the black. As we move forward, Albertans need a strong health care system with the capacity to manage extraordinary surges and provide an excellent standard of care to all. Budget 2022 provides more than $22 billion in Health's operating budget, a $515 million, or 2.4 per cent, increase from the 2021-2022 forecast. Excluding COVID-19 costs, it will grow by a total of $1.8 billion by 2024-2025 in order to scale up capacity, another year of record-high investment for health care in Alberta.

Record investment in health care means that Albertans will see expanded access through additional ICU beds, new facilities in new communities, and more mental health and addictions care around the province. This record investment also ensures that Albertans across the province have access to the highest quality and most modern services our health care system can provide. Over the next three years Alberta will invest $100 million per year to provide additional health care capacity on a permanent basis, including adding new intensive care unit beds. The budget also includes a $750 million COVID-19 contingency this year, which will help address the surgical backlog and ensure the province can cover evolving pandemic-related costs.

Mr. Chair, this Budget 2022 will majorly impact and expand the continuing care programs and services for seniors and vulnerable Albertans. Budget 2022 provides nearly $3.7 billion in operational funding for professional health care and support services across the continuing care system, which is a 6.3 per cent increase over last year.

There is no doubt that our health care workers in Alberta are one of the strongest and hard-working members of our society. In honour of nurses' services during the pandemic a one-time lump-sum payment of 1 per cent was made in 2021. Our health care professionals have shown immense dedication in taking care of our loved ones and families and spending countless hours working hard, especially during the past couple of years, and their perseverance and commitment to serving the community is commendable. Our nurses have shown great initiative time and time again, and with the support of the government a new deal, which runs from April 2020 to March 31, 2024, contained a 4.2 per cent wage increment throughout the time of the contract.

Mr. Chair, the Calgary-East constituency has been happier than ever knowing that there are more health professionals working in our health care system than ever before, and they're compensated with a larger budget than ever before. More registered nurses, paramedics, physicians, and other professionals are needed. Alberta Health Services had 30,517 registered nurses as of February 2022, up from 28,735 in February 2019. There are 1,800 more nurses than there existed before the outbreak, under the NDP. Alberta Health Services now employs 230 more paramedics than it did two years ago. Paramedic staffing has climbed by 9 per cent, from 2,659 in December 2019 to 2,891 in 2021. The number of doctors registered with the CPSA in Alberta continues to rise, with a net gain of 33 physicians from the previous year's fourth quarter.

Budget 2022 will support even more growth by setting a new high for health spending. The total number of Alberta Health Services' employees is expected to rise by more than 3 per cent in 2022-2023, from 81,600 to 84,400. As we try to enhance access to care across the system – more surgeries, more diagnostic testing, more EMS calls, more home care and continuing care – those employees will provide more services to Albertans. The actual health care battle was waged by the NDP administration, which stood by and let wait times rise for four years.

Mr. Chair, I would like to share another proud milestone in the Calgary-East constituency. The Brenda Stafford Foundation, BSF, opened the doors of their newest site and welcomed the first residents who now proudly call Clifton House home. The highly anticipated Clifton House first broke ground on construction two years ago, in February 2020, located across the street from the existing Clifton manor long-term care site in Calgary, 47th Street SE. After Clifton's existing long-term care residents have completed their transition, Clifton House will then commence welcoming new supportive living residents from the community in partnership with Alberta Health Services' transition services. I look forward to seeing more supports and investments being made in Calgary-East to support our vulnerable and working members.

Over the years many continuing care stakeholders have asked the Ministry of Health to review Alberta's legislation to address challenges that exist in the system. The legislation review was part of our broader commitment to transform the continuing care system to do everything to ensure Albertans have access to high-quality continuing care. Support from continuing care stakeholders and the 33 written submissions and feedback from 7,000 Albertans that identified issues and recommendations for improvement as well as the input received through the home care and nursing home regulations review were all vital in addressing changes. Again, I want to thank everyone that contributed to this process. This feedback from stakeholders was instrumental in developing the proposed legislation.

Mr. Chair, Alberta's government is taking steps to protect the continuing care system throughout the province and ensure that the present-day services meet the needs and expectations of all Albertans. Albertans deserve the best quality health care, especially when accessing our continuing care system, one that best reflects present-day practices and services while addressing the ever-changing needs and expectations of those who rely on them. Bill 11 fulfills our government's campaign commitment to address the needs of the current legislation surrounding Alberta's continuing care system as well as the gaps in the current system revealed by the COVID-19 pandemic.

Mr. Chair, Alberta's present law for the continuing care system is comprised of several acts and regulations, some of which date back to 1985. This is why the government is introducing a new, streamlined continuing care framework as developed. Introduced and approved, the standards and regulations will be implemented as early as spring 2023. Continuing care in the province has evolved, and existing legislation does not effectively reflect current practices, services, or settings or address Alberta's changing needs and expectations. The Continuing Care Act consolidates all patchwork legislation from previous governments and takes action against the inertia left behind by the NDP in the critical sector of Alberta's health care system.

The proposed legislation will support a system that is more responsive to the needs of clients, residents, and families now and in the years ahead as a foundation to the overarching goal that Albertans receiving continuing care services are supported to have a good quality of life, whether it be through home and community care, in supportive living accommodations or in continuing care homes. The Continuing Care Act will enable system efficiency and improve service delivery for Albertans and support health care accountability and sustainability. It will modernize Alberta's approach to home and community care, supportive living accommodations, and continuing care homes while reducing the red tape surrounding this complex system.

Mr. Chair, Bill 11 will mandate frequent inspections for continuing care homes, assisted living facilities and home and community care officers to guarantee compliance with the act, rules, and standards. Furthermore, Bill 11 will enable new administrative monetary penalties to be imposed on operators who fail to comply with the legislation, establishing broad regulatory-making authority to set out additional details on content in the act as well as to include content in legislation or additional topics such as staffing and the provision of goods and services.

The new legislative framework will enable clear expectations through regulations and policy regarding what services and supports are available to Albertans accessing different levels of care and clarify and standardize which services require client copayments versus which are fully publicly funded. Most other Canadian jurisdictions – B.C., Saskatchewan, Ontario – have more copayment fees in place than Alberta for various goods or services provided in their public continuing care systems. Alberta has a range of seniors' benefits for those most in need, ensuring the most vulnerable seniors can count on a stable source of income and continue to live safely and independently in their chosen communities. Alberta's government made the commitment to maintain seniors' benefits and our financial assistance program to protect eligible low-income clients and residents. Again, Mr. Chair, we need to modernize our existing laws so that Alberta's approach to home and community care, supportive living facilities, and continuing care institutions can better assist Albertans today and in the future.

In Alberta our commitment and promise are to support and strengthen the health care system so Albertans can continue to have access to high-quality, patient-centred health services in a more sustainable and efficient manner. The Continuing Care Act will initiate substantial transforming shifts in existing policy and practices, including replacing many statutes with a single, simplified piece of up-to-date continuing care law, improving Albertans' understanding of how the continuing care system is run by increasing openness and accountability, providing Albertans with a patient-centred, adaptable, and creative health care system now and in the future.

Mr. Chair, Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, should not be delayed any further. The aim is to create a unified strategy and align legislative mandates and services through all of the continuing care system. This will fill loopholes in the present legislation to provide that Alberta has the ability to monitor and enforce compliance with legislative obligations, including standards. Again, Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, will create a more responsive health care system that can better meet the needs of patients.

I would like to once again encourage everyone in this Chamber to support this bill and support all families, communities, friends that need these changes to our outdated health care system. This will timely help our hard-working health care professionals and Albertans to receive the benefits they deserve. I again applaud the minister and the team members that have been involved in the making of these changes and for all of their efforts, that will ensure the protection of Alberta and will ensure that our communities, families, and patients are being protected and safely cared for.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other – I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'll start off by acknowledging my transgression earlier, where my device went off when my hon. colleague the Member for Calgary-Mountain View was in the middle of her speech. For that, I will be making a donation to SCARS, one of the foundations of my wife's choice. [some applause] Happy to do that. Apologies to all members of the Chamber for that transgression. [interjection] Yes. As per what happens from time to time, the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud is chatting in my ear. I will give her credit for helping to identify this animal rescue not-for-profit as the charity of choice.

I also, Mr. Chair, need to acknowledge the fact that I believe with all of my being that the Edmonton Oilers will defeat the Calgary Flames in tonight's game. Miraculously, I feel like the Oilers just scored. I can't put my finger on it, but I can feel it. Can you feel it, Mr. Chair?

You know, having said that, I will make one last comment before I move on to bill debate, because obviously it's very important, the job that we all do here in the Chamber. But I do just want to acknowledge how proud I am of two Alberta teams to make it to the second round, and, most importantly, Mr. Chair, the economic impact of the Flames and the Oilers going to round 2 and one of the two teams going to round 3 will be significant, significant for our restaurateurs, our hoteliers, the tourism sector that has been hit so hard over the past couple of years because of COVID. So I can't help that I think my frame of reference will forever be through an economic development lens, and not only am I a proud Oilers fan but acknowledging the benefit that it brings to our great province.

The last comment on this, because I could probably go for 15 minutes on this, Mr. Chair, is that our capital city region serves northern Alberta, it serves northwest Saskatchewan and, I would argue, northern Saskatchewan, and because Saskatchewan doesn't have an NHL team, it serves most of the province – I will give southern Saskatchewan to the city of Calgary – and also a number of residents in British Columbia. So the point is that it's great to see all of the benefits of our two great teams squaring off. I will leave hockey for now, but if I get that feeling again, members may see me wave my arms, as the hon. Minister of Health has already witnessed earlier this evening.

It's my pleasure, Mr. Chair, to speak to Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act. I have some comments to make. The minister – and I will thank him and acknowledge the fact that he's been very active in this debate thus far on this bill. Granted, though – or maybe, no. I'm not confusing this. I mean, this is a Seniors and Housing bill, but also it is the hon. minister who is sponsoring this bill. There are a number of changes this bill is implementing that I do support.

The fact, as has been talked about in this Chamber, that there are a number of pieces of legislation that will all be pooled or pulled together out of a number of different ministries and pulled into one act does provide a simplicity and an ease of looking at all of the legislation, regulations that surround seniors' housing or continuing care or home care. So, you know, I think, if I may, it brings together legislation from a number of different ministries, and moving forward I do think that there are benefits to that, and it will provide an ease of amendments or future changes to the act. So that's a positive, Mr. Chair, which I will acknowledge.

The challenge or challenges that I have with this bill: there are a number of them, Mr. Chair. Now, the first, which has to be highlighted – and I place this squarely on the government's shoulders. I will not single out an individual minister or member of cabinet, but we have come face to face with a very, very sad reality, which is the number of Albertans in continuing care who have passed away from COVID and throughout this pandemic. It is a tragedy. I know that members of the government caucus have also referred to the 1,600 Albertans who have lost their lives as tragic, and it is. Any time we lose a single Albertan or Canadian to a pandemic or unnecessarily, it is tragic.

I had hoped to see a number of initiatives or programs or supports or actionable items to help address that call to action. Unfortunately, Mr. Chair, I don't see action in this bill that would address that. I think – and I've said this previously in the Chamber – that this bill in its current form misses an opportunity, an opportunity to make substantive and meaningful changes. Now, I want to flag – and I know that the minister has been very responsive, and I suspect that he will rise and address some of the comments and questions that the opposition is putting forward, which, again, I appreciate. My understanding of the UCP's promises a year ago is that a bill or a commitment would increase home care, increase the amount of hours of care that residents would receive, and increase the proportion of full-time staff. Unfortunately, the bill falls short. It falls short of these commitments.

It also leaves much to the regulations. You know, I know that my colleagues have pointed out the fact that we've heard on a number of different pieces of legislation the government imploring Albertans and members of this Chamber to trust them and to trust that through regulation, which is, of course, decisions made behind closed doors by Executive Council exclusively, they'll make the right decisions and make the right changes.

Mr. Chair, I want to point out a number of examples where the government has claimed that Albertans should trust them, starting off – first and foremost, at a time when the world was facing a global pandemic, this UCP government chose to wage war on doctors and nurses. You know, when I speak to colleagues across the country, they cannot believe that in one breath a government thanks the very front-line workers who – sadly, today we have an unprecedented number of them going on stress leave and needing to go on leave because they've been completely overworked. A way to repay them has been the threat of wage rollbacks for a number of health care officials and, for others, picking a fight with them and driving many out of the province.

My frustration is that there's been a lack of an acknowledgement despite the fact that the opposition has tabled numerous documents showing, in black and white, doctors leaving Alberta and indicating that they are leaving Alberta because of how this government has treated them, and the government stands up and denies that this is happening. You know, to me, Mr. Chair, this is something that is quite unprecedented. I mean, sure, members may embellish or in the past may have embellished in this Chamber, but to have members claim that down is up and black is white when there is evidence of the contrary, again, not the opposition or another member saying, "Trust me" but actual documented proof that's been tabled in this Chamber – it's unbelievable to me that anyone can claim the opposite is true. We've seen a number of doctors leave this province.

We see the number of red alerts where there are no ambulances available in a city reach record highs in the province's history. The fact that we have children's hospitals with lineups where they have to wait for hours blows my mind. Where are we living? I thought we were living in Alberta. I thought we were living in one of the richest provinces in the country and one of the wealthiest provinces.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bilous: Then please explain to me how there's a lineup outside a children's hospital.

An Hon. Member: You're seeing things.

Mr. Bilous: I can't get my head around that. I'm not seeing things. That's documented in the paper. There are photos of lineups of families and kids waiting to be admitted.

Now, I don't believe anyone on either side of this Chamber would ever want to see that. I know there are members on both sides that have families, that have kids, and I'm sure members are feeling as outraged as I am. If I had to rush Olive to the hospital and stand in line for hours, I don't know what I would do. I'd probably lead a demonstration to this Legislature, because it is unforgivable. It's shameful. The point here is that it's preventable. It's preventative. Now, again, I'm not claiming that the government or the minister would ever do that intentionally, but if that wasn't a call to action, then I don't know what is.

Now, I'll be the first to admit that I've had great conversations with the Minister of Health about some of the other cities that are facing doctor shortages, the minister explaining the steps that he's taking to increase the number of doctors. I respect that, and I respect the fact that it takes time. You can't flip a switch and suddenly replace 20 doctors. I get that. My frustration is that we have allowed, this government has allowed the system to get to a point where kids are waiting outside of a hospital. There's another way. There's a better way. I'm not saying that the solution is just throwing gobs of money at the system, but if we get to a point where we can't even address emergency needs of our citizens, there's not a larger or louder alarm system that should be going off for every single member of this Chamber.

You know, there are other examples, Mr. Chair, where this government has made the wrong decision. Now, I don't claim that any government in the history of the world is perfect and makes perfect decisions. I'll be the first to acknowledge that our government, when we were government, made some wrong decisions and walked back policy. I'll give a great example. When I was minister of economic development and trade, we first introduced the Alberta investor tax credit, and the tax credit – when we went back to stakeholders, venture capitalists, Albertans, start-ups, they indicated: hey, we have a bit of a wrinkle here. We worked with them to address the issue as quickly as possible – I'm trying to think of the adjective – where I was more than willing to stand up and admit that we didn't quite get it right and we needed to make changes to do that. We did end up making the appropriate changes.

My point is that not every decision that any government is going to make is going to be perfect, but a great example – so this is a bit of a criticism and at the same time an acknowledgement for government. The decision to remove the insulin pump program was a wrong decision. Many Albertans rely on that, and quite frankly the cost to government was small compared to the value it gave to Albertans. It took many, many brave Albertans to stand up and call on the government to rescind that decision. The criticism is that that decision never should have happened. Now, having been in government, maybe that decision wasn't flagged to the minister as it should have been. Maybe it was a decision that passed through without the proper oversight, but – and here's the acknowledgement – the minister and the government halted that decision in its tracks.

What I will say – and I've said this to members of the government caucus. A decision to halt a program or to backtrack takes courage. It's not easy to admit a mistake, especially when we live in this environment where each side jumps all over the other if one misstep is made. It's unfortunate that we live in that environment. Now, I won't apologize for the job the opposition was elected to do, which is to hold the government to account, to propose solutions and ideas to amend legislation in order to improve it, and to call out the government when faulty decisions are made. That example did erode trust in many Albertans who, whatever the reason was, didn't understand how a program that has existed for so many years, that has been a game changer in the lives of Albertans, was suddenly going to end.

For those reasons and many others, when I speak again . . .

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join? I see the hon. Minister of Health has risen.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I want to thank colleagues in the Chamber for commenting on Bill 11: the Member for Calgary-Mountain View, the Member for Calgary-East, and the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. This, I believe, shows, quite frankly, the importance of the Continuing Care Act and the importance that we all feel in terms of improving our system for seniors and for Albertans.

I made comments prior to the dinner break, but I wanted to actually just get on the record again and then chat very briefly about why we're putting forward this, because I appreciate the comments made by the Member for Calgary-Mountain View saying that she is a fan of modernizing legislation, you know, recognizes that it is important, that it is the law, and having a framework, a framework that actually pulls the various disparate pieces of legislation together into one piece of legislation, which this does, Bill 11, is important. Similarly, I thank the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview in terms of recognizing that it's positive to bring all the pieces together in one piece of legislation. So we definitely agree on this, and we agree that there needs to be a framework.

Now, I've also heard the members opposite talk about some of their concerns with the legislation, and it's not actually what's in the legislation. The concern, what they've highlighted, is what's not in the legislation. The Member for Calgary-Mountain View, you know, talked about home care, talked about the number of hours provided to individuals in continuing care centres. They talk about staff and staffing models. Well, Mr. Chair, I'd like to point out that none of these items today are in legislation. These items are either in regulation or they're in policy, and that is actually the appropriate place for these items because these things will change. Having a staffing model in legislation is not appropriate because it will change over time.

You know, having a requirement for home care and being specific about how much you put in: that's not appropriate at that location, in the legislation. Rather, that comes through the policy and comes through how we fund it from a budget standpoint. My colleague from Calgary-East spoke quite eloquently about the amount of funding that we are putting into these elements: additional funding into home care, additional funding into continuing care, additional funding into community care, and additional funding into continuing care spots. It's not only additional funding on the expense side, over $200 million in Budget 2022, but also on the capital side, well over $200 million, and that's in addition to the money we've already put in place for an additional 1,500 spots, Mr. Chair.

My comment here is that these elements, the details regarding, you know, what came out from the facility-based continuing care review and was highlighted – the appropriate place actually is in regulation. It is in the policy. That's where it should be, and quite frankly the members opposite: when they were in government, that's where they left it. They didn't change it. So it's appropriate that it be there.

Now, the hon. colleague from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview suggests that – you know what? We cannot – you know, the government says: "We will deal with these issues in regulation. We will deal with these issues in policy. We'll go out and consult and ensure that we get it right as we develop this over time, as we modernize our approach and our framework for continuing care." The members opposite suggest that Albertans can't trust us.

Well, Mr. Chair, I would suggest that they can because we're already making a difference. We're already investing in transformation. We're putting our money where our mouths are: the additional $200 million on the expense side, as I indicated already, an additional $200 million plus on the capital side, and we are investing in our entire health care system. My hon. colleague from Calgary-East spoke at length about the investments that are made. So we are focused on making the change, and the appropriate place is in the budget. The appropriate place is in the regulation and is in the policy.

I would urge all colleagues in the Chamber to support Bill 11. Let's get started with the transformation that we need for a positive legislative framework, as recognized by members opposite already. Let's get this going. We're already starting the transformation in terms of the budget. We need to move forward in terms of the regulation. As the hon. members know, how do you do the regulation? Well, you have to do the legislation first. Then you can do the regulation and then make the change. So I would urge everyone to support Bill 11 and to support it soon. Let's get started with the legislative changes that we need to support Albertans and deliver better continuing care.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any members wishing to join? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows has risen.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm pleased to rise in the House and add my comments to Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, with the help of my constituents, particularly, I would say, Albertans but particularly the racialized Albertans who reached my office and wanted to voice their concerns regarding the continuing care system.

I got aware of, like, more of the issues and challenges faced by our continuing care system in 2015, when I got a chance, actually the first time ever in my life – I joined electoral politics and became the candidate in the federal election in 2015 for Edmonton Mill Woods. For the very first time I became aware of the weights of the issues and the arguments made around home care in relation to the weaknesses and capacities and what's more to do in the continuing care system. That's where I heard debate between continuing care and home care as a part of continuing care and where I also got a chance to speak to my constituents and go to three provincial ridings, door-knocking and specifically speaking to the ethnic communities, what they think about this.

I was surprised to hear the challenges and the seriousness of those issues, particularly when it comes to the communities where English is not a first language or they don't speak fluent English. There is I don't know what amount. Like, there's basically little to no support in the majority of the cases in the whole province, probably similar cases in other provinces as well. But particularly in Edmonton, in my neighbourhood, where I spoke with people, they were seriously concerned about the lack of support that their seniors and their family members can get in their own language.

In the case in my community, where people come from India, they are able to communicate in a number of different languages. As residents of the Indian continent they can communicate in Urdu, they can communicate in Hindi, and they can communicate in Punjabi and some other languages. Even being that individual, it was not something that was attractive and seems beneficial, sending that individual to continuing care. Sending the member to continuing care means that you need to have a full-time member of your family online most of the time willing to take a call and support your family member to translate the information. They were lacking the service, not only the lack of, you know, being able to communicate with the staff but sometimes very critical information, the barrier of being able to communicate with the health professionals, with the doctors. So you can imagine the kind of impact that that put on those individuals.

That's why the continuing care services or the system at large is not really popular in the racialized communities, so when it comes to the continuing care system, when we discuss these things in our houses, specifically in the racialized communities, people get scared. People just fear what's going to happen to their remaining life. That is where I came across, through the conversations with my constituents during the door-knocking, the most support, the majority of the support, from the people for the home-care supports, where they were happy. The lack of multilingual staff still exists there, but they were still, you know, comfortable at some level with the majority of the time their family members are around to help communicate with the staff or communicate on behalf of them.

The majority of the people wanted to stay home not only due to the language, but also it was very important for their mental health, that will keep them kind of – how would I say? – more positive. They wanted to stay with their family. They wanted to spend more time with their spouses, that they have spent a life with. There are cases where, you know, the husband and wife or the common-law partners are in very different situations. If the one partner needs continuing care, the other one is actually well enough to do it themselves. In such a case they don't want to part ways, and they wanted to live at home.

There's a critical issue for accessing home care due to lack of funding, lack of staff, lack of services. You can imagine how this is impacting the health and well-being of those families. I can just probably say that some of the UCP government caucus members can probably assure my comments on this. There's a general perception in the community that sending your loved ones or your seniors to the seniors' home or continuing care or long-term care means that he's not going to live anymore. He's not going to live very long. His life is not there very long. That is kind of the impact, and these are kind of the challenges.

I have visited personally some of the continuing care system. It was very, very discouraging and sad to see the people in critical need not being able to call staff or, if they call staff, not being able to communicate with staff with the issues they wanted to get addressed, not being able to talk to the doctors. And lack of food of their choice: there are not many choices. The other biggest issue we heard: the lack of, you know, capacity for being able to worship their own faith. There are lots and lots of barriers. We live in a multicultural society, but we have to go a very long way to create this in reality, the society as a plural and multicultural society.

This is sort of the feedback and the concerns I hear from my constituents, I hear from my communities across the province. I would have been happy to support something in this House, but I didn't see anything coming forward like this that I could be happy to go back in my riding and go back to the communities and tell: this is kind of the concern you raised to us, and this is what we're discussing in the House, and we're responsible representatives, and we do not waste the time of our House on, you know, unimportant issues.

Getting the feedback and also the importance of the issue in my community – I just wanted to share this with the House members, that could be probably experienced in other cities as well. In Edmonton my community members, the first generation who moved here, the second generation, probably in the '50s or early '60s, got together. They worked for decades here, they fund raised, they built organizations: that was the plan. If these problems are not being addressed in the system, at least they can come up with something where they can help their community members, where they can feel that they will not feel these barriers. Unfortunately, there were millions of dollars, the work of a number of years. But eventually, I think five, six years ago – I believe it was in 2014, somewhere in there – they ended up going nowhere, actually. There were a lot of bad years. The type of background, expertise, and things that were required – they ended up giving up the project and even handing out all their funds and collections to the agency that became responsible for this. All they got out of this: they could pick or choose, probably, in return, maybe four or five rooms to use out of the facility for the community.

This is a serious problem, and it's turning into a crisis in racialized communities. These are the issues we need to focus on and look at. Unfortunately, what I see in Bill 11: we are basically dealing with some of the administrative pieces of legislation that will probably help, you know, something, streamline a bit better on smooth transitions, but that doesn't even touch the basic problem.

That does not even, like, look at the basic problems that we should have been looking for, particularly after the COVID-19 pandemic, what happened in the past two years: over 1,600 people passed away, died, in those continuing cares and the anger and the agitation among those family members.

This government eventually ended up bringing a bill in the House to bar those families and bar those family members from – I will say, you know, they were robbed by that Bill 70, the piece of legislation this government brought in. Their ability to seek justice, what happened to them in the continuing care system: those families were simply wronged. They lost their loved ones, and they were looking for answers. What we should have drawn from that was to improve our accountability system among this, but I don't see anything happening in Bill 11 around that issue.

Unfortunately, I have to say that even if we discuss those legislative changes, it probably is going to help in some way, streamline in some manner. But, as such, it is ignoring the serious, serious matters and concerns in the crisis we are seeing in continuing care, so I have to say on the record that we cannot really support the bill as it is.

The recommendations, particularly – I just wanted to be on the record for saying this. The recommendations came from the facility-based continuing care review. I also wanted to say that the government has had this report of 42 recommendations for over a year on their table. That report actually recommends so many changes, policy changes. The biggest thing in this that they're asking for: increasing the staff, specifically in home care and continuing care. They're also highlighting that by doing this, the government will not only be helping families, helping out seniors, but government will also be saving more money, saving approximately $452 million annually, not even one-time money.

It is discouraging to see that the government would not see those benefits, that the government did not see the actual problems. It is three years of the UCP ruling. The UCP has only one more year to go if the election is next year. But it is sad to say that they failed to see this problem. By not addressing these issues in Bill 11, it's a clear message that this UCP government is very ignorant and they're not going to care about the seniors issue within this term.

So, Mr. Chair, with this, I'm going to conclude my remarks by saying that it's sad to see that Bill 11 does not touch on or debate or argue any of the real issues around continuing care. I cannot support this bill.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, here in Committee of the Whole. I appreciate the debate that's happened so far. I appreciate that the minister has been present at points in the debate and has offered some thoughts on the record in response.

An Hon. Member: You can't say if he's here or not.

Mr. Shepherd: The minister has been present at points during the debate. I made no observation whether he is currently here as part of the debate, but I appreciate that the minister indeed has made a point of participating and bringing views forward and responding to members.

Just reflecting on some of the remarks the minister made tonight in response to the debate that's taken place so far, the minister talked about modernizing legislation, and indeed that's what he's looking to do here. They are pulling together many pieces of legislation, consolidating, looking to update some pieces, make some administrative changes, a number of other things, lay the groundwork for other things with the intent to introduce later in regulation, policy. Now, I certainly recognize that that has been the process in many cases, but when I hear this government use the terms "modernize," "streamline," "expand," my radar goes off, Mr. Chair, because we have seen what this government does in so many respects when it throws out those kinds of buzzwords, particularly when it comes to the health care system.

Now, these government members love to, at length, go off on their favourite narrative about our time in government. To condense it, essentially sort of saying that our government had no understanding of how business and the economy operated, went into a complex system, blundered about, made so many mistakes that we apparently tanked the entire economy of the province of Alberta from our lack of knowledge. Now, Mr. Chair, I would say that every bit of that misrepresentation is absolutely true for this government with the health care system. Every single bit of that false, unnuanced narrative is absolutely factual for how this government has approached and handled the health care system with its incredible arrogance and hubris that it came into office to undergo their modernization of the Alberta health care system, their streamlining of that health care system.

Just think of how this government approached modernizing and improving the physician funding framework in the province of Alberta, Mr. Chair. First, by coming in and tearing up the contract with – well, first passing legislation giving themselves the power to tear up the contract with physicians in the province of Alberta, and then immediately going ahead with doing so in February of 2020 and embarking on a clearly antagonistic campaign against physicians in the province of Alberta, clearly with an intent to try to perhaps bully doctors into submission. We've seen how that has resulted. They blundered into a complex ecosystem, attempted to cut all kinds of different things, different payments, different codes, make sweeping changes that their own members had to rebel against.

The then Minister of Health, some of the members sitting in this very Chamber at this moment had to go behind closed doors, largely didn't do it in public, but they certainly had to go back and let the then Minister of Health know that he completely misunderstood what was happening and the potential damage that was going to do for access to health care in their constituencies, largely in rural areas, Mr. Chair. Unfortunately, this government's continued blundering has done exactly that and has indeed deeply damaged their access to care in many rural communities across the province of Alberta.

But this government wasn't done with that, Mr. Chair. They continued, through a global pandemic, to put politics ahead of public health, continually made decisions that compromised our health care system, pushed it to the absolute limits, exhausted front-line health care workers, and as a result we have a building and continuing health crisis here in the province of Alberta.

When this government talks about modernizing and improving, Mr. Chair, we just look at their attempts to modernize the insulin pump therapy program, again using words like "expanding," "offering more choice." The minister talks about, you know, that they will go out and consult on how they modernize legislation. It was very clear that there was no consultation done with the actual diabetic community in the province of Alberta on the changes to the insulin pump therapy program.

In fact, the minister talks about how, you know, they wanted to improve things, make things better, that indeed they had thought this through, yet there was no detail provided when they made that announcement. If they truly thought that this was a way it was going to make this program better, that it was going to offer more choice and offer more opportunities, you'd think they'd want to be able to lay out in detail precisely how they were going to achieve that, yet diabetics in Alberta had to continue to pound on this government's door and beg for further information and detail, and the minister could not even simply just lay out: these are exactly what costs each level of Albertans are going to face. The government did not want to put that on the record.

Of course, they did pause and they did reverse, as my colleague from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview did note. They said that they would go out and consult again, but then we saw what that consultation looked like last week, where we had 300 Albertans from the diabetic community who were basically being told the same thing they had been told before, getting a little bit more detail maybe but certainly not being given the sense that they were actually being heard or that the government was looking at changing its position as much as they had sent a couple of officials to explain the government's position to them again, just assuming that they just really didn't understand it the first time.

So I am concerned, Mr. Chair. When this government talks about transformation, when it talks about modernization, what's going to actually be there in the fine print? What is it we are going to actually see this government choose to do?

The minister talked about the investments this government is making. Mr. Chair, let's be clear. In terms of health care spending this government is still behind where it would need to be simply to keep up with population growth and inflation. When it talks about historic health care spending, of course, we have had historic population growth. We have certainly had historic inflation growth. We've had a historic pandemic, and we have had a historically incompetent government when it comes to the health care system.

Indeed, you know, just earlier today we heard the Minister of Justice express his concerns about what he called effective cuts, Mr. Chair – to be clear, an effective cut being when you don't give the level of increase that was expected – and talk about how that was a bad thing when this government has denied doing that in health care, education, so many other areas. They have made sweeping effective cuts to almost every social service and public service in the province of Alberta.

The fact is, Mr. Chair, as we are debating Bill 11 here, the Continuing Care Act, and this government is saying that it is looking to improve the continuing care system in the province of Alberta and that it will eventually do so and that we should trust them to later come up with the details and show their work, that the context we have is that this is a government that has bungled almost every effort it has made at transformation in our health care system in the province of Alberta to the fact where they have driven out doctors, where, as my colleague from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview noted, we have lineups outside of ERs for children's hospitals, we have sweeping wait times in other ERs, we still have surgeries that are being cancelled.

We have this bill, and the minister says: "We need to move forward. We need to get started." Well, Mr. Chair, there have been many opportunities for this government to step up and actually take action, and we haven't seen that. Certainly, we have seen delays in bringing forward this administrative legislation, and I imagine we're probably going to see delays in moving forward with regulations and the other pieces because at this point we essentially have a caretaker government. The lights are on, but it's questionable how many folks are actually home as we move from the obsession with trying to save the Premier's job to now figuring out which of them is going to take it next.

That said, I think we have good reason to want to look very closely at what this government's intentions are when it comes to continuing care in the province of Alberta, indeed home care in the province of Alberta. In all of these areas we recognize there absolutely needs to be work done. We recognize that there needs to be much better collaboration amongst the various health care workers and various health professions that contribute to looking after seniors in the province of Alberta. But I have very, very serious doubts, Mr. Chair, that this government has the capability of doing that, that this government is not going to fall back on ideology, as it has done in so many other cases, that it's not going to return to its obsession with forcing more private profit into our public health care system, that it's not going to further trample the complexity of the ecosystem that is health care in the province of Alberta.

That said, we are going to have some further opportunity for debate on this bill and further opportunities, I guess, to see what the government has to say, but at this point I find it difficult to see a reason why I would support this government in moving forward and trust in the work that they intend to do.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 19

Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022

Ms Ganley moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, be amended by deleting all of the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment May 9: Mr. Feehan]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has risen. For clarity, we are on REF1.

Ms Gray: REF1. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’m pleased to speak to REF1 and in support of this important referral amendment. We are speaking about Bill 19, the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022. This is my first opportunity to respond to this important piece of legislation, and I’d like to begin by saying that I do so as someone who owns and lives in a condominium, one of the 12 per cent of Albertans who live in condos.

I just looked it up, Mr. Speaker, and one week from today will be my 19-year anniversary of living in the condominium that I own, and I know this because my husband proposed when we moved in. So that date is etched in, but the date of first home ownership is an important one for many, many people, whether you got engaged on that day or not.

Condominiums provide a really important source of affordable home ownership for many, many Albertans. They’re an incredibly important part of our housing options here in the province. During my time, now coming up on 19 years, of living in my condo, at times I have sat on the condominium board. I currently do not, but I really want to emphasize that when we’re talking about condominiums, when we talk about the complexities with condo ownership, so, so often the members of the boards are the owners of these properties. They are sitting on the boards in volunteer positions trying to do their best to protect their investment and the investment of their neighbours, which is, in fact, their homes.

Now, there are many people who do have condominiums as investment properties, but there are also so many Albertans who are living in a condo that is their place of residence. My parents live in a condo in downtown Edmonton, and many, many of my constituents in Mill Woods live in condominiums throughout the Mill Woods neighbourhood. So as I begin my remarks on the Condominium Property Amendment Act and my support for the referral amendment, I certainly want to emphasize that I think condominium living is incredibly important, and it’s important that Alberta have modern and up-to-date legislation to reflect what owners and their boards need. I’m really grateful for all of the people who work on condominium boards and do their due diligence and do their best to support fellow condo owners and their neighbours.

To be very clear, in this province condominium owners have been looking for updated legislation that recognizes their unique challenges for a long time. Since the condominium act was introduced in 2014, a phased process has been going on to update condominium legislation and regulations to better support condo owners. Bill 19 in many ways furthers that conversation and puts into place many things that stakeholders in the condominium world have asked for, yet I support referral amendment 1.

I am supporting referral amendment 1 for a couple of very important reasons to me. First off, I think that this bill should be referred to a standing committee because it is missing some incredibly important things that condominium owners, the stakeholders, including lawyers and other service providers, boards themselves, and the organizations that represent them have asked for, specifically, the need for a tribunal process, something that this government expressed support for, that previous governments have done much, much consultation on, that, in fact, this government had consulted on yet has not been included. I think that’s a really important piece that we are missing in Bill 19.

Secondly, as we’ve seen in other pieces of legislation, so much of Bill 19 is deferred to regulation. And not just little things, Mr. Speaker. Giant decisions that fundamentally impact how this bill is going to operate in practice and how it will impact condo owners and condo boards have been deferred to regulation, making it very difficult for me as a condo owner and a legislator to look at this bill and to understand how the government intends to draft it and put it into place in a way that will protect, again, owners, boards, and the public.

Certainly, we know that right now, because so much of the dispute process does end up requiring the court system, a system that’s adversarial and, of course, incredibly backlogged right now, we need to be looking at other ways that we can try and make sure that we’re responsive to the needs of those who are on condo boards and for condominium owners, certainly in the case where there are owners who are causing damage, one of the main fundamentals that Bill 19 seeks to address.

I certainly want to recognize how important this is, but so much of this is deferred to regulation, and the dispute tribunal has not even been put into effect, something that many of the stakeholders were expecting and were only just told in March of this year by the minister would not be coming forward because, of course, this government had other financial priorities than setting up a tribunal process. The need for tribunals has been described as urgent. I believe that sending this to committee is going to be the most important part.

Now, there have been lots of questions raised during debate about the process for damage chargebacks, which I think is incredibly important here. We know that the inclusion of damage chargebacks in Bill 19 is bringing Alberta more in line with Ontario, British Columbia, and other jurisdictions, but without that tribunal process there are some serious concerns that we have about how this is going to be developed through the regulations. Certainly, there's a lack of trust for this government, their ability to consult.

Just today, Mr. Speaker, I was speaking about a completely different piece of legislation where entire groups of stakeholders had not been consulted, just as one example, but over and over we've seen and heard one thing from this government and seen another thing take place, a real undermining of trust. You see that when you're out talking to the public, when you're out door-knocking. I think that because the tribunal was not enacted, because so much has been deferred to regulation, because there is such a lack of trust, referral amendment 1, REF1, that we are talking about, would allow us to help the government strike the right balance, make sure that we've got the ability to really look into the chargeback system and understand the potential risks that may be included with it, because the last thing we want to do is to implement something that is going to cause more harm.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Now, again, I'm fully aware that many condominium stakeholders are supportive of the moves forward in Bill 19, and I do hope to be able to support this bill, but in its current form and with so much being left to regulations, there are some real challenges that need to be solved. I think that all parties, all stakeholders have come to an agreement that the tribunal process is something worth looking at. Now, there are other options potentially. There could be reverse onus on condo boards to require good faith and issue fines where boards fail to substantiate proof of chargebacks. We could ensure that we don't simply allow charges without some accessible limits or recourse to appeal. In this current form I have questions about those appeal processes and how we make sure that while we solve the problem of irresponsible owners and tenants who cause damage that incurs costs on to the other owners within a condominium, we also make sure that there are reasonable solutions for any cases where costs are being issued and we make sure that there's fair and due process put in place. Certainly, I would love to hear more about why the tribunal process could not have been brought forward with this given that we've been talking about years and years of consultation and this government has been in power for three years and talking about these issues with condominium stakeholders throughout.

So I rise to speak in favour of having up-to-date, robust condominium property legislation but also in favour of referral amendment 1 because so much has been left to regulations, we're missing the tribunal piece, which so many people have said we have an urgent need for, and I'm very concerned that we can do better and that by sending this to committee, we might be able to help the government improve Bill 19 and address some of the concerns that have been raised through debate in second reading and on this referral amendment.

Mr. Speaker, if I can just get a time check from you.

The Speaker: Four minutes.

Ms Gray: Four minutes. Okay.

I think I've hit the majority of the notes that I wanted to in speaking to this referral amendment, so at this point I will take my seat and look forward to further debate on this particular issue.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Five minutes and 22 seconds left in second if that's what you were referring to. I'm not sure which time you were checking.

Are there others? The hon. Member for St. Albert, it would appear.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise and speak to referral amendment 1 for Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022. It was interesting to hear from my colleague from Edmonton-Mill Woods. I, too, live in a condo. I haven't lived in mine quite as long as she has, and I don't have a happy anniversary to mark the time. I think I've been there 13 years. Yeah. So this is a topic that is quite important to me as well.

I think, you know, condominiums, or condos, are an important option for Albertans to live in. I think we've been spending quite a bit of time lately talking about the range of housing that needs to be available to Albertans. Certainly, condos are a way for people to afford to get into the housing market. They are often more accessible financially for people. There are certainly pros and cons to condo living, but I'm certainly grateful for the condo association that I live with and the condo that I live in.

As my colleagues have said, I too am grateful for the vast majority of condominium association boards that are made up of volunteers, who give up a lot of time. The meetings are often not super exciting. They're a little bit dry as toast sometimes, but they're essential to keep these associations running smoothly. So I would like to thank all of the condo associations in Alberta that work really hard to make their associations function as best as they can.

I would like to talk a little bit about this piece of legislation and why I think it's important to be referred to a committee to slow down and to take the time to get things right. You know, if there's been a theme of this session or, let's be honest, all of the sessions since 2019, if there's a theme that I find that I'm constantly saying any time we speak to a piece of legislation, it is: it is so unfortunate that this government, this UCP government, seems almost incapable of recognizing maybe when they just haven't gotten it right – maybe they've missed a piece of the consultation, maybe they've forgotten a piece, or maybe they've come into some information a little bit late – and that they just pause, stop, and go back and fix it so that it's the best piece of legislation possible. I think we've only seen a couple of examples where this government has actually caved a little bit to public pressure and made a few changes. Certainly, you know, that was welcome, and we're happy to see that, but we just don't see many examples of that in this place.

The most recent example that I can think of is – well, it's actually not legislation; it was a policy change – around the insulin pumps. You know, first we heard: “No, no. We're not doing anything. NDP fear and smear.” Then it turned out that, oh, they had made a change that was going to make life more difficult for people with diabetes. So there has been a pause, and that was really only because of public pressure.

I would suggest that we have outlined for this government a few things that really need to be fixed in Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, and I think we're more than ready to support this piece of legislation. I think it's important. I think anything that we can do to support condominium associations and also the people that live there or the people that rent there – I think that it's incumbent on us to do that.

One of the things that we really, really wanted to have amended and looked at, talked about is a tribunal. We've been asking this question again and again in debate: why was there no tribunal included in this bill, and when will the tribunal be implemented, or has, you know, the minister decided that one will never come into place?

What we get are answers from the UCP government, things like: "Well, trust us. It'll come in regulation." Well, we've already established – actually, Albertans have already established – that there is zero trust for this government. Zero. None. Zero trust. We have seen example after example after example of corruption, dishonesty. So for this government to say, "Don't worry; we'll get it right in regulation," we don't trust the government. We in the Official Opposition, Albertans certainly don't trust the government. But what Albertans do want is solid legislation that will make life better for them, in this case people that live in condominiums, people that own condominiums, condominium associations.

So for that reason we believe that the bill should be referred to a standing committee so we can create a process where there can be resolution to the shortfalls that we've identified, particularly in instances of damage chargeback, which Bill 19 establishes. I think my colleague mentioned that both Ontario and British Columbia have processes for damage chargeback, but they also have a tribunal process for resolution. We think that's important for a number of reasons. Bill 19 leaves resolution entirely up to regulation. We've established that there is very little – well, I would suggest there's almost no trust with this government. It is one of the least trusted governments – I would say it's probably the least trusted government in Canada.

Mr. Schow: Are you sure about that, though?

Ms Renaud: If you'd like to add to debate, please stand up.

Before creating a process for boards to charge owners, we should also have a clear process for owners to dispute it. Referring this bill to committee would allow us to create the ability to charge damage fees and to ensure that there are limits in place for how this is done. There are a couple of other options worth considering; however, we would like to strike the right balance.

I think that we have seen repeatedly over the last three years that sometimes, in their rush to get a piece of legislation out, there have been some shortcomings and, in some cases, just absolute failure to consult the appropriate people. The example I just talked about was around the insulin pump program. You know, it may well have been a change in terms of policy that perhaps the government thought would not impact people's lives or might make another program stronger. I'm not sure what the motivation was behind that, but I'd like to give them the benefit of the doubt in thinking that there was no malicious intent except a failure to consult. When there is a failure to consult with the actual people whose lives will be impacted by changes to policy or legislation, then chances are you're going to get it wrong. So we would like this government to stop, refer this to committee so that there can be time for consultation, and the committee can make the recommendations for change that will make this a better piece of legislation.

Other possible options worth looking into may include reverse onus on condo boards that would require good faith and issuing fines where boards fail to substantiate proof of chargebacks. We would like to ensure that we don't simply allow charges without some accessible limits or recourse to appeal. We have heard that many condo owners have been waiting for a tribunal to be set up in Alberta, and then this is just a shortcoming in this piece of legislation. So, again, taking this bill to committee would allow both the government and the opposition time to participate in a process to consult and get things right. Perhaps there are just a few changes to this legislation that could be made to make this a better, stronger piece of legislation.

Now, you know, we talk a lot about unintended consequences, and I think that without taking the time to correct the issues that we've identified throughout debate, there is a lot of opportunity for there to be more unintended consequences that will hurt Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, as I've said, there are a number of things that I think are actually very positive in this legislation. There are some common-sense fixes that we've identified, that we've said, you know, absolutely, we're supporting and happy to see them in the legislation. But what we're asking for is that this bill be sent back to a committee so that we can look at this piece of legislation and ensure that it is the best piece of legislation possible.

If I could get a time check, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Six minutes remaining.

Ms Renaud: Okay. Well, actually, I'm good. I think I've covered all of my notes, Mr. Speaker, so I will encourage all members to vote for this referral amendment, send it back to committee, and let's make it the best piece of legislation possible.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to speak to the referral motion?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call the question.

[Motion on amendment REF1 lost]

The Speaker: Back on the main bill. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods and the Opposition House Leader.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We are now back on second reading of Bill 19, and I will just briefly take the opportunity to say, as a condominium owner and someone who lives in a condo myself, as do 12 per cent of all Albertans, that having up-to-date, solid condominium property legislation is incredibly important. I have been disappointed that Bill 19 does not further the need for tribunals, which all stakeholders and all parties have said is important and would address an urgent need, and how much of Bill 19 is deferred to regulations, requiring us to trust a government that there is a great deal of a lack of trust in.

Certainly, Bill 19 does not answer some really important questions about how we will make sure that everything is implemented in a way that is fair and reasonable given how critically important condominium ownership is for so many Albertans. We are talking about people's homes, we are talking about people's investments, and we are talking about something that is significantly important, so much so that getting it right should be the priority. That was one of the reasons why the Official Opposition and I supported the idea of sending this to committee to make sure we can get this right.

That being said, we're also talking to our stakeholders, and we know that there is much in Bill 19 that is supported by the stakeholders and the condominium industry. But I still have such strong concerns with how much is deferred to regulation. I still have such strong concerns because the government has not moved forward on some of those critically important pieces. I know we will have more to say on Bill 19 as it continues through the process. We're only in second reading and just starting to talk about these issues.

For now, Mr. Speaker, and given the debate that we've had so far, I would like to move that we adjourn debate on Bill 19.

Seeing none, I am prepared to call the question.

[Government Motion 29 carried]

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Bill 11 Continuing Care Act

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General on behalf of the Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased, gosh, honoured to rise and move third reading of Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act.

We have made a commitment to Albertans that the government would modernize and improve Alberta's continuing care system, and that includes our continuing care legislation. Our existing legislation is, quite frankly, ridiculously outdated, which has added layers of complexity and inconsistencies across different aspects of the continuing care system, multiple pieces of legislation, multiple regs, and a lot of ways in which the operators in continuing care, whether it's AHS or otherwise, have had much difficulty being able to operate in such a system as that. It's been a barrier for providing responsive care and services to Albertans.

Now, the continuing care system has evolved over time, and so have, quite frankly, the needs and the preferences of Albertans who are looking to access the system. New, streamlined legislation is needed to reflect the environment that we're living in today. Bill 11 will establish the legal authority under one legislative framework that will allow the government to make meaningful changes across continuing care now as well as in decades to come, changes that Albertans have been asking for for many, many years. This is the first step to enable the continuing care system transformation.

This legislative framework will maintain what works well in current legislation and apply it consistently across the continuing care system. It will address limitations to our existing laws and bring them up to date under one act while adding stronger protections, greater accountability, and oversight for the continuing care system. This improved legislation provides consistency as well as clarity, and it will ensure that Albertans receive high-quality care and services.

Several members have expressed their concerns that the legislation is scant on detail, and I've stated before, as well as the Minister of Health, that these concerns will be addressed through regulations and standards. Most of the standards that we had before will be kept or increased, but the regulations and the standards documents are the right place for those details.

The Continuing Care Act is the legislative framework that Alberta needs to be able to move forward, and we need flexibility to modify and to change details over time. That allows the government to work very closely with our stakeholders to inform ourselves as to what regulations should be now and in the future.

I want to reiterate and emphasize to everyone here today that Bill 11 requires operators and providers to comply with the act, to comply with regulations, and to comply with any applicable standards or guidelines. It will also maintain the ability for a resident or a resident's family member to initiate the establishment of a resident and family council for the residents of the continuing care home or supportive living accommodation.

Some members have raised concerns that consolidating multiple pieces of legislation under Bill 11 will reduce standards or somehow dilute the legislation. For example, in the Supportive Living Accommodation Licensing Act an operator must be licensed when they provide services related to safety and security for four or more persons and offer or arrange for at least one meal per day or housekeeping service. This is a very prescriptive definition, and therefore some settings may structure their services in a way to avoid licensing. As such, the definition in Bill 11, the new Continuing Care Act, is broader, and it captures the overall intent of a supportive living accommodation.

The new definition will capture settings that provide safety, security, or personal welfare and the provision of meals or accommodation services. This definition has been expanded to ensure oversight and to be able to protect potentially vulnerable residents in these settings.

As to the development of Bill 11, the government has been transparent and has consulted Albertans throughout the entire process. This began in 2019, even before the pandemic had hit the entire world, quite frankly. We had begun consultations, we had begun public engagement related to transformation of the continuing care system that ended up first being tabled and released in May with a report on how to improve and expand and transform the continuing care system, which then led us to guidance on how to improve our legislative framework, which we see now in Bill 11.

That public engagement specific to continuing care, as I said, began much earlier but throughout early '21 on the legislation, and we've received written submissions from 33 stakeholder organizations. Their input has been vital, and these stakeholders have been asking for changes to the legislation for decades.

In addition, over 7,000 Albertans provided input to the facility-based continuing care review, which I mentioned, which helped shape the new legislation. Through these engagements Albertans also gave their feedback on their experiences and lessons learned from the pandemic, which has also informed Bill 11.

More importantly, Bill 11 strengthens the compliance and monitoring of the continuing care system. Albertans have demanded more transparency from government to publicly report on continuing care services and settings, and the act will establish a consistent ability for government to request information from continuing care providers or operators.

It establishes the authority to publicly report on information and findings in the public interest such as inspection reports. This will enable Alberta Health to more effectively monitor providers and operators and to enforce compliance with legislative requirements, including standards.

Protecting the quality of care and services for Albertans is paramount. Bill 11 maintains existing enforcement mechanisms and expands these protections. It will permit the government to enforce inspection requirements across all continuing care services and settings. It will also allow the government to appoint an official administrator to operate a continuing care home where there is a significant risk to the health, the safety, or the well-being of residents. It will enable the government to impose administrative, monetary penalties if an operator or provider is not compliant with minimum requirements.

In closing, let me emphasize the importance of why Alberta needs new continuing care legislation. Having one overarching piece of legislation will provide consistency and alignment across the continuing care system. Because we had previously, Mr. Speaker, many different types of legislation dealing with the continuing care system, it wasn't treating the continuing care system as it is, a spectrum, a spectrum of services for residents and their families. Instead of treating different parts of the continuing care system as silos, this one overarching piece of legislation will now treat the continuing care system as that spectrum.

The new legislation will help start the transformation of continuing care, which includes the recommended actions from the recent reviews of the system. Many of the recommendations from the facility-based continuing care review can't happen, quite frankly, until we have this new piece of legislation, that will enable us to implement the system-wide transformation that's needed. More importantly, the Continuing Care Act will support a responsive, client-focused system that is better able to meet the needs and quality of life of Albertans now and in the years ahead.

Before I complete, Mr. Speaker, because this is a piece of legislation that began with me in my previous role, there are so many folks in the Ministry of Health who were included in the review of our facility-based continuing care system and of the home care that we provide to Albertans and on this piece of legislation, but one fellow in particular I want to shout out and make sure that he's mentioned in Hansard. He is a fellow who just retired recently. He was the assistant deputy minister for the ministry who oversaw all this work, and I just want to thank John Cabral for his leadership in the ministry, for his wisdom, for his guidance, for his advice that he had provided to me when I was the Minister of Health. That work continues now through his successor, Evan Romanow, and Andy Ridge as well, because there have been some changes in how the divisions within the ministry have been set up. But I just want to, in particular, thank John Cabral for all of his work on this. This is for him.

I ask for your support for third reading of Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: All right. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to provide some comments at this stage of debate. I've spoken to this piece of legislation a number of times. I'm going to start with what's good about it, building on what the minister was just saying, and then we can take it from there. We probably won't stay in that space.

There's no question, as the Minister of Justice was just detailing, about the ability to ensure that those inspection reports are publicly posted, the ability for the government to appoint an administrator should something fall down at a particular facility. The ability to levy administrative penalties, in my view, is almost always a good thing when you are looking at enforcement actions of various kinds across government activities simply because it is more efficient, more direct, and can be, I think, more effective in terms of ensuring compliance wherever you're looking at an administrative compliance role for government, whether it's in occupational health and safety or elsewhere.

In that sense there are certainly, I think, statutory, legislative efficiencies to be achieved by having one piece of legislation. I think that to the extent that this bill reflects some of those concerns of stakeholder groups and of family advocates and patient organizations and seniors advocates over the years, this is a piece of legislation that is fine on the face of it for what it does. We've discussed at length what the legislation does not do, and we can get to that in a moment, but I think that in the sense that there are some positive things in the bill, I suppose the government should be commended for showing up to work to do the bare minimum at this point. Like, I'm not sure the people in the streets are going wild over legislative actions that streamline several different acts into one act. It doesn't seem to show up on the list of top issues for the public.

What does is health care. That shows up as a pressing concern by the public, and there are really two reasons. You know, I think the government would like to assure itself that it's all COVID, it's all because of COVID, and COVID is behind us, so they say, so there's no problem anymore both in terms of the perception of the leadership of the province – that was certainly the very facile explanation that was provided: oh, people were just upset because of COVID, COVID was very divisive, everyone was very sad about COVID, and the government was between a rock and a hard place because of COVID, da, da, da, da, da. We heard this all the time.

This is both not the root of the problem for the government's current leadership travails, and it is also not the root of the problem in terms of the management of the health care system. Indeed, the problems with respect to health care in this province were preceded by COVID by an interminable war on doctors that persisted through the pandemic and the absolute belligerence faced by other front-line health care workers, whether they were within the Health Sciences Association or paramedics or paramedic firefighters or in emergency response or folks who work in hospitals such as respiratory therapists and occupational therapists and others or registered nurses, LPNs, and health care aides.

All the way through the health care system – and in this I include the continuing care system – there has been a studied disrespect and a persistent approach that there is something inherently wrong with the public health care system and the people who work in it and the people who need to access it that can be solved by continued belligerence and yelling, sometimes metaphorical and sometimes actual and real. That preceded the pandemic, and that affect, that ethos, that approach is woven through the three years of this single, truncated term of this Premier's leadership.

That's where we get to the issue of health care action. I heard the Minister of Health yesterday, and I think it's a fair point that he made that we over here, when we were discussing this legislation, were just discussing what was not in it. Yes, that is to a large extent a true thing that he said, so you know he cannot be faulted for that. But when you have just lost 1,600 continuing care residents from a pandemic, when you consistently had workers saying that there were not enough workers, when you consistently had families indicating that the one-site rule was not appropriately staffed and resourced in order to keep patients safe, when you consistently had a patchwork of approaches – and this would not be rationalized by this legislation. It would not be addressed by this legislation in terms of the ability for families to continue to do visitation.

All of these things, all of the incredible amount of isolation that happened for elderly people through COVID in large part because these facilities did not have the resources, a.k.a. the staff, to be able to take creative solutions, whether it was outdoors or whether it was other ways to have human connection during a pandemic, so people suffered. Elderly people suffered. Many of them died, as we've discussed, and we've had no review and no reckoning with that. But even those who did not perish or become severely ill suffered a great deal of isolation. There is no substitute for human interaction, particularly of families and loved ones, and a lot of that cascaded out of resourcing. That was horrible to watch. I watched it first-hand. It was heartbreaking, and in many cases it was completely unnecessary.

Here we get to the actual health care action contained within this bill. Now, the Minister of Justice earlier, in his comments speaking to third reading on this bill, indicated that it had been a lengthy process, the facility-based review – and that is true; that is also a true fact – and that a number of Albertans engaged in that process. Also very true, indicating, I think, the level of concern for people living in continuing care, the 1,600 who died and the many, many who suffered otherwise and the people who care for them.

You know, that review indicated a number of promises from a year ago: to increase home care, the amount of hours and care that residents would receive, and increasing the proportion of full-time staff. None of those things are addressed in this bill, and as I have said, the minister has sort of indicated in one of the stages of debate, because we've been discussing this bill at length – I can't remember when – that those things are properly subsumed to regulation.

Now, I do not agree. I think that legislation can set out at least some of your targets, metrics, or goals. We do in fact have legislation that does this across the GOA. There is nothing stopping us from doing it here and from indicating intent to begin to repair some of the war on health care that has been precipitated by this government since it took office.

That's where we see no indication of metrics, goals, standards. We now have a government that is not likely to develop those metrics, goals, standards, ratios, any of those things that underpin a properly functioning continuing care system and, in fact, were also part of the recommendations in both Ontario and in Quebec in response to the crisis in continuing care that happened through COVID. They did reviews. They had the courage to do reviews, and some of the recommendations were, in fact, around staffing ratios and so on.

We see no movement or even indication that that's going to happen in this province, and no one on any side of any political debate can seriously say with a straight face that this government is going to have the bandwidth to develop such regulations and get them through the legislative review process and then cabinet. Are you kidding me? I mean, this is a group of people that, as my friend from Edmonton-North West said yesterday, looks like they're just busy looking off into the distance in an airport lounge, just waiting for something to happen at this point. This is not a group of people that is seized with the importance of governing, none whatsoever; they are seized with the importance of their own futures.

We're not going to see those regulations, and that is why having at least some indication that the government takes the recommendations of the facility-based review into consideration and that it intends to resource those recommendations appropriately could have been properly situated within this legislation.

Now, we have heard over the course of this debate that the minister would like to keep people out of the acute-care system. Again, a laudable goal, I think one that we share, that the acute-care system should be for folks who are in need of acute care. Continuing care is oftentimes diametrically opposed to that. Fine. Fair enough. But here we do not see any indication of increased resources for home care, which is part of the minister's intent. So, too, do we not see increased staffing ratios and so on in assisted living and long-term care facilities, which, I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in fact that lack of care means that people end up back in the acute-care system. I lived this last summer. I watched it happen in real time. The fact of the matter is that it is nice to articulate a goal, but in government there is really only one group of people that can take action on it, and they are in this Chamber, and they're not doing it.

The other way to keep people out of acute care is of course to have a family doctor around every once in a while, which we certainly do not have in Lethbridge. I'll leave that to another conversation, but you know it was astonishing to me last week, when Alberta Health Services provided a presentation to the community, when they said to a community where, like, half of the people don't have a GP: well, it's not so bad here because it's worse up north. Well, then, I feel very, very poorly for folks up north and the crisis that has been created by this UCP government and the fact that they don't seem to be addressing it down south or up north or anywhere else, really.

Now, there is no question that there is unfinished business in this legislation, and we heard it in the minister's final comments at third reading just now. We heard that the facility-based review "helped shape" this legislation, not that its recommendations were fulfilled at all, because they aren't. The facility-based review recommends 6,000 new staff be hired, and we see absolutely no workforce action plan to fulfill that particular recommendation. We heard that the lessons learned from COVID informed this legislation. Well, there could not be a more bureaucratized phrase. You know, I've been in this place long enough, seven years, to know government talk when I hear it, and when we're informing from lessons learned, that means that we're kind of – sure, we heard the words that you said, but we're not actually doing the thing.

The final thing I heard, which I think actually did signal doing the thing, was that the focus is a client-focused system. Now, those are not the kind of words that, if the civil service fed them up to me, would come out of my mouth, because there is no way on this planet or any other that I think of elderly people who live in assisted living or long-term care, who are in need of our respect and our care, as clients. It should be a citizen-focused system. That is what we are trying to build here, because people who give their lives to building this province ought to be cared for in a way that puts their dignity at paramount. They're not customers. That to me is – thank goodness there isn't more in this legislation, I suppose, to sympathize with the minister's point on that particular topic. Thank goodness they are distracted with their own internal drama and their Days of Our Lives, you know, little soap opera over there, that they can't do more damage in this sector.

Another thing that isn't in this legislation that could be is an independent seniors advocate. Of course, the province fired them; one of their first acts. I'm not quite sure why they felt so threatened by such a thing, but here we are. So, you know, when the minister says – and I have acknowledged what's good about this legislation in terms of the inspection reports, the ability to appoint an administrator, the ability to levy administrative penalties. It would seem to me that the system would have a better early warning system had that independent seniors advocate been in place. That is an unfortunate thing, indeed.

We exit the conversation around this legislation, Mr. Speaker, as we exit this session, which is this is a piece of, essentially, drumbeat-of-government legislation. It is the actual bare minimum. It is job-description legislation. Congratulations for coming to work, guys. But, really, at the end of the day, there is not substantive action on the things that both matter to Albertans and that there is a moral imperative to take action on. That is, in fact, the fundamental failing of this legislation, and it's, in fact, the fundamental failing of this government. In its short tenure, its truncated term, especially, you know, the barely, not even three-quarter-term Premier – we'll see how long he stays; I guess he'll get to meet the Pope, and then he can go. I suppose that was the reasoning for him staying.

But, you know, we end up with a piece of legislation that is fine on the face of it but with so much work remaining undone, work that should be focused on three things: health care and restoring health care, affordability – we didn't even discuss that, but one of the first things this government did was that it also deindexed the amount of assistance per person who was living in long-term care such that that is also being eaten away by inflation, because our most elderly and vulnerable residents are also victims of this government's war on their pocketbook via inflation – and the restoration of trust.

Certainly, without a reckoning around what happened during the pandemic and what has happened system-wide in the health care system and to our services, this government has in fact obliterated its trust with Albertans and certainly even with its own party members and supporters, and this legislation does not aid in repairing that trust as well.

With that, I will conclude my comments on this legislation, Mr. Speaker, and leave the House with an entreaty to, when discussing matters of long-term care and assisted living, think not only of the contributions of seniors and elderly people and vulnerable people but also the moral imperative to do better.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on Bill 11 for third reading are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to rise this morning to add some final comments around Bill 11, Continuing Care Act. Actually, I have a lot of comments and probably not enough time to get through them all, but I will do my best to try to hit as many of those throughout the debate. I've taken quite a few notes and scribbles along the way, thoughts that occurred during comments from others and so forth.

Obviously, in listening very intently when the minister opened up debate here for third reading, as you can imagine, I heard all of the right buzzwords coming out all the time, things like transparency, accountability, you know, consultations. So I think it would be appropriate to remind this House of some of the connections around these different words that we've heard and the government's actions to date. While I can appreciate that they want to promote transparency, I would suggest that the government needs to try harder to do that considering they still own the incredible label of one of the most secretive governments in Canada. If you're going to want to promote something like transparency, then you actually have to walk that walk, not just make the talk.

Then when I heard things like accountability. Well, Mr. Speaker, as we know, earlier in the 30th Legislature – I guess maybe not that early – at one point in time, when we were starting to look at some of the consequences and effects that COVID had racked on the continuing care facilities and some of the consequences that happened there, one of the things that the government moved to change around accountability was to move the definition of negligence to gross negligence. Now, anybody knows that when it comes to language and the difference between negligence and gross negligence, it is very, very difficult to prove gross negligence. You pretty much have to be able to show that there was absolute intent to create a problem. While I feel that most operators did their absolute best, to then slap on that gross negligence and deny the families any chance to question those actions, I think, was misinformed by the government.

That now leads me to the consultations. My friend from Lethbridge-West had also talked a little bit around this. One of the things that, you know, the minister had said in the opening remarks around third reading here was that consultations have informed Bill 11. When I look back at some of the consultations that the government has said that it's performed, maybe I would draw attention to one of the most recent failures of consultation, and that would be around insulin pumps. The community was very, very clear that they were not heard on this issue. Again, that's just one very recent example, and I know that there has been failure around consultations informing Bill 11.

You know, I appreciate that there were submissions that were made by – I think the number was 33 – different operators. I appreciate them putting in those submissions and their thoughts about how to make the system better to care for the seniors that not only built this province but built this country and looked after all of us as we were growing up in it. Now it's incumbent upon us, of course, to return that exact same thing.

While I appreciate that there were some attempts to reach out to families and get their thoughts, I think there should have been much more effort in that department to really, truly get an idea of what's going on. I mentioned some of these during some of the debates that I had, in somewhat a little bit of a back and forth, with the Health minister during Committee of the Whole yesterday, Mr. Speaker.

One of my constituents, who had I talked to about his experience with one parent and the continued experience with another parent – so just to remind, this constituent's father had passed away roughly two years ago. This would be, of course, on the watch of the UCP government. He ended up getting a call to say: well, you know, we're sorry; we accidentally forgot that your father was on the toilet for the past five hours. It was due to a lack of staffing. So you have an individual that's trying to look after him and was just overwhelmed with everything that was going and then a shift change, and the next thing you know: somebody's looking for his father and finally finds him in the bathroom and figures out that he had been there for the past five hours. I'm certainly not blaming any of the employees.

The reason I'm bringing this up – this is where I'll probably focus a lot of my comments, as I did in Committee of the Whole. Because the government has – I believe my good friend from Edmonton-Riverview said that it was a little over a year now that they've had that report, the facility-based continuing care review. They had it for a year, and in that report it says that the entire system needs at least 6,000 more employees, okay? So if you've done your consultations and you have this report and those consultations reflect what is in Bill 11, I'm sorry; I don't see anything about how to solve this 6,000 staff shortage that we see. I don't see any framework about increasing the funding to facilities so that they can accomplish that.

Now, I see facilities in my very own riding of Edmonton-Decore always looking for volunteers. Bless their hearts for what they do, but it's not enough. As I've said before, if you're looking for volunteers, you clearly don't have enough staff. I'm not blaming the operators. They're doing what they can, but it's not enough.

That then leads to the second story from this resident, whose mom, ironically, served her entire career in continuing care and now is there. He goes to visit her one morning. She's in her room, a dark room, because somebody hasn't had the time to open the blinds or turn on the lights. She has her face in her hands. She's so glad to see her son because she's covered in food, and nobody's been able to clean her up and change her clothes. Again, I'm not blaming the staff. There's not enough.

Now, the government loves to pat itself on the back for all this historic funding it's been talking about. Well, if there's all this historic funding, why are we still seeing volunteers being called for? Again, it's a persistent and consistent thing I keep seeing. Things are not matching up with what I'm hearing from the government.

That then leads me to this whole thing around full-time versus part-time. You know, we certainly see some part-time jobs being created. The problem with a part-time job is that it usually comes with a part-time salary, and part-time salaries don't necessarily pay a mortgage or are enough to build a family, which means somebody ends up having to work two part-time jobs, which is part of the problem that led us to the high transmission rate when COVID first broke.

The reason I'm bringing this up, Mr. Speaker, around Bill 11 is because I don't see anything about addressing that. Again, we heard in some of the opening comments around consultations informing Bill 11, around what we've learned from the pandemic informing Bill 11. If that is indeed the case, it starts to fall back to staffing.

You shouldn't have staff needing to go to different facilities so that they're making enough money to be able to pay their bills. I'll spare everybody in this House a tirade on bills going up and what people are having to pay. But if we have indeed been informed by COVID, then going forward, we should be preventing any such thing, but it's still the case. We have staff that are jumping between facilities. Again, I'm not blaming providers. They're doing what they can. But for seniors who have built our province, built our country, looked after all of us, this is our A game that we've apparently been informed of? That's why I've been so critical about Bill 11. Sure, I can concede the fact that if we've got a bunch of pieces of legislation that are better off under one piece of legislation, that's fine. I can accept that, but there is so much more.

Now, I know the Minister of Health had pointed me to a section around the family councils and whatnot. I've attended some of those within the facilities in Decore, and the same thing keeps coming up, which, funny enough, brings me right back to what I've been talking about most of this time: staffing, people not getting the help they need. Residents that somebody comes in to feed and may have feeding problems, may have other challenges on top of that: they try to feed them; no success. They put the spoon down. Then they go and they leave for a while. Then they come back. They try to feed again: "Oh, you're not eating? I'll come back." This goes on for several hours. The cleaning crew comes in, and they go, "Well, you didn't eat" and take your food away. Now that senior hasn't eaten at all. This is not what they signed up for.

And this is why Bill 11 should have gone much further than simply just first steps, as the minister had originally said in opening comments when this debate started. If this has indeed been informed by consultation, by what's happened in COVID, this thing should be at least twice as thick as it is. To say, "Well, trust us; everything will be done in regulation" – I would say that the trust of this government by Albertans is pretty darn thin, and they've lost patience with you.

We can do better, Mr. Speaker. We should have done better. We seem to have money to chase things like Bigfoot and to write all kinds of reports. We need to step up.

The Speaker: Hon. members, third reading of Bill 11. Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to join debate on Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, in third reading. As my colleagues have already said this morning, and certainly yesterday I had the opportunity to debate this in Committee of the Whole and happy to reiterate some of the concerns about this legislation, the ND caucus will not be voting in favour of it. As has been said, COVID-19 really shone the light on our continuing care system in Alberta and all the significant problems with it. You know, it was a devastating tragedy, where 1,600 seniors living in continuing care in our province died. Many of those deaths were preventable.

There was much to be done, and much could have been done but, sadly, was not. That has a lot to do, I think, with the slow movement of this government. One of the things that we petitioned the government on at the outset, for at least two months before they moved on it, was to restrict staffing to one facility. We know that that was one of the significant concerns regarding the spread of COVID-19.

How come this is an issue? How come people are working at so many different facilities? That's really the question underneath that. Like, how is that happening? That has a lot to do with the private facility operators maximizing, you know, their profit. That's what they're focused on. It's not about seniors' care for a lot of these private facilities; it's really about making enough so that they can give dividends to their shareholders. The great tragedy in that meant that they weren't focused on the care of seniors. They were focused, again, mostly on this very select group of people who happen to be their shareholders.

Of course – I've spoken about this before, and I will again – just the whole financialization of the continuing care sector created a lot of the difficulties and continues to, Mr. Speaker. You know, an example that I like to share is the AgeCare facilities. There were four in Calgary back in 2020 that were sold off to Axiom, Montreal based. It's really a wealth-generating company. It's all about the real estate. It's all about the profit. It's not about the seniors' care. Guess what happens when these facilities are sold off to companies like this? The focus is not about serving seniors, serving the residents in those facilities but, rather, generating this profit.

And guess what? They give employees just, you know, part-time jobs that have no benefits and have extremely high expectations of them. Certainly, if there's a union, they try to bust that union because, of course, unions fight for workers. They care about workers being supported, and they want them to have those full-time jobs. They want them to have the support to be able to care for their families, have health care benefits, extended health care, be able to have vacation, and several details that we all know about and that they should have.

You know, if you take care of your workers – guess what? – they do a better job. They're not so focused on just surviving, but they are able to be more stable and are able to contribute and come to work feeling supported and happy. And guess what that does? That supports them to be able to give better service to the residents. Sadly, that's not the way it is in the system. In spite of the Herculean work of many of the health care aides – just let me acknowledge so many of them. Despite sort of all this swirling around them and the pressure on them and cobbling together working at several different facilities so that they can make a living wage – I mean, these are low-wage workers, Mr. Speaker. They are people making close to minimum wage if not minimum wage. Oftentimes they're racialized. Mostly they're women and newcomers to Alberta or Canada, and oftentimes they feel like maybe they can't speak up about their concerns. They're concerned about losing their jobs if they do. It's really taking advantage of people who are doing their best to serve people instead of supporting them.

It really disturbs me, and I think that this UCP government hasn't acknowledged that ever. They sort of like to skate over this issue of financialization in the continuing care system. Certainly, when they did, you know, respond to some of our calls to have a one-site rule about staff, because of the spread of COVID-19 really significantly in continuing care facilities across the province, there were so many exemptions to that, because of the strong lobby of these private providers, that it became almost like it didn't really matter, the order by the chief medical officer of health. There were so many exceptions to that health order that there was a significant question of whether it really made any difference at all; why bother?

That just showed time and time again all sorts of decisions made by the UCP government that, you know, put seniors at risk, sadly. As we know, more than 1,600 lost their lives in Alberta. Certainly, it's been said time and again that many of those were preventable deaths. I mean, I think this is one of the fundamental things that needs to be looked at in our continuing care system that isn't, certainly, in this legislation at all. There's no willingness of the UCP to look at much of the research regarding this. We look at private, we look at nonprofit, we look at public, and we know the outcomes for residents are far superior in nonprofit and public continuing care facilities. Outcomes are much less positive for residents in private facilities. I mean, that alone should be pushing the UCP government to look at these issues, but sadly they're not.

Because of what we've just been through, COVID-19, which shone this bright, bright light on the continuing care system, you know, we were really hoping that Bill 11 would be addressing this fundamentally, looking at the concerns in that system and really providing some better outcomes for seniors. Instead, we have framework legislation, and the government tells us repeatedly: that's fine; we have another year or so, and we're going to put those kinds of details in regulations.

We all know that regulations and legislation are different. Regulations can be shifted by the minister whereas legislation has to come before the Legislature, and it has to be for all parties, so it's more public and we know what's going on. This is another way that it's kind of behind closed doors and can be shifted and changed, you know, by the minister himself or herself. The transparency obviously is absent, so that is definitely a concern regarding having things mostly in regulations.

The other thing, Mr. Speaker, that is a deep concern to me is just: where's the urgency? Where's the urgency of this government? You know, 1,600 people died in continuing care. It's like: okay; we did the facility-based continuing care review over a year ago or about a year ago. Now we have this legislation, and now we have to wait another year.

I mean, this government is going through some of their own internal challenges. They now are looking for a new leader. I mean, it's a caretaker government. They're not going to be doing anything over this next year to really move this forward. I don't have faith that that's going to happen. There's just too much internal strife and upset. It's very disturbing because we are not seeing a government that is actually governing in the best interests of people in Alberta and certainly of vulnerable residents of continuing care facilities. So here we are waiting again. There just is no urgency on the part of the UCP to see this as a significant issue.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I have had a deluge of calls, meetings with people from across the province concerned about this and often grieving because of the loss of their parent and just the state of affairs in some of these facilities and how the parents were cared for or not. My colleague from Edmonton-Decore just gave some very specific examples of, really, neglect in the sector and not support for residents in continuing care. Of course, this isn't what any of us want, but what's missing with the UCP is that they just don't see this as an urgent matter. They feel like: okay; we did this, and we've got this information, and now we have this legislation. Years are passing. Years are passing, and what does that mean? The system is not improving, you know. It's not getting better, yet we know very clearly – I mean, I commend the government on the facility-based continuing care review because it gave us some really specific concerns that need to be addressed, and that's great. They have the information. The UCP has the information, but still it's kind of like we're in quicksand.

We know one of the major things that came out of the facility-based continuing care review is that we need to support staff, and we need to actually create significantly more staff. Six thousand more staff are needed. That is the government's own information. That's their information. They got that from their consultation on what is missing, what needs to improve in the continuing care system. Are we hearing things about working with postsecondaries, support to actually enhance training? This is skilled work. This is not just anybody can just sort of get a job and think that they know how to support seniors in continuing care. This is skilled work, and we do need to have programs to support them, so what is the UCP supporting postsecondaries to do?

We know that what the UCP is doing with postsecondaries is devastating them, dramatically cutting their funding and all the time saying, "Well, compared to the rest of Canada, tuition is average," or something like that. Meanwhile these institutions: their funding has been cut by millions and millions of dollars. The U of A here, which is in my riding: 50 per cent of the cuts from postsecondary were at U of A alone. It was a devastating, devastating hit to them. You know, the U of A is doing the best they can to keep functioning, but there's just no question that we're losing professors, we're losing grad students. People are going to other places because the quality of the education system at the University of Alberta, and across our province but particularly at the University of Alberta, is being devastated by the UCP.

One of the things that we know about postsecondary, especially in a time of challenge – and let's face it; we've been through a time of challenge – investment in postsecondary actually is, you know, really value-added because over the longer term it helps to diversify the economy, make sure that we have the qualified workers to be employed in our province. Instead, the UCP does the opposite and they attack the postsecondary institutions.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any other members wishing to add to debate this morning? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to interject on this particular bill. As I'm sure you know, because you've been in the House during debate on this bill, I've spoken to it at all readings: second reading, Committee of the Whole, and now on third reading. In order to summarize all the, I'll say – I'm trying to put it in a nice way – evaluation of this particular bill, I would say that for me the most fundamental piece is that this government continues to put seniors and families on one side and then the interests of private, for-profit care operators on the other.

Now, I can understand, because the members on the other side are advocates for free market, laissez-faire, government stays out of processes. But I continue to insist, Mr. Speaker, that when it comes to continuing care, this is not the place for the market to apply all of its rules, because we're talking about the care of seniors in our community. Now, you've heard me go on endlessly about, you know, with all due respect to the members on the other side, that when you apply market rules of supply and demand, there are always going to be individuals that are going to be left out, not being able to afford – and that's the key message here – the care that they actually need.

Now, for seniors, who have dedicated their lives to contributing to the Alberta economy and society as a whole: every senior deserves to have good quality of care in this province as they continue to age. Every senior. Now, what happens when you apply private, for-profit care operators into the system and that's the only option available? Well, then, of course, you're going to have people who just cannot afford that kind of care.

Now, I've talked to many of my constituents where they're paying $5,000 a month, some up to $7,000 a month, for their parents to be in a private, for-profit care home. To be quite honest with you, Mr. Speaker, I find this just incredibly exorbitant. Incredibly exorbitant. While members on the other side may think, "Okay; well, that's affordable," there are a lot of people here in the province of Alberta who cannot afford that. What happens to them? What happens to the people who are priced out of the market? That's an honest question. What happens to those people? And what is the role of this government when it comes to taking care of those people? As far as I understand it, we're here to govern on behalf of all Albertans, not just the ones that have the pretty pennies.

Now, the government did its facility-based continuing care review. There were a number of issues that came out of that, specifically seniors and their families advocating for more accountability in the system so that they could get proper care, an increased quality of care inside these homes. Okay. Let's imagine that, well, the market system is here to stay and that's it. There's no option around it. At least those private, for-profit care operators need to follow the instruction and regulation of this government when it comes to the quality of care of these individuals. That's what the facility-based continuing care review was all about, Mr. Speaker. If we're going to maintain this for-profit model here in the province of Alberta, then at least, bare minimum, it needs to measure up to an improved standard of care for everybody who needs to access continuing care in the province.

I'll highlight again that the members on the other side like to decrease or get rid of regulations rather than impose regulations. Now, I get it. There are some regulations which, you know, they like to call red tape, which I'm sure, Mr. Speaker, I've heard out of your mouth as well in debate here in the House. Yes, there are examples of things that provide, I would say, barriers or obstacles, but then there are regulations that are focused on health, safety, and care. Those aren't red tape, Mr. Speaker. You cannot call those red tape. If a private, for-profit care operator comes to the government and says: "You know what? You could get rid of this regulation and that regulation and this regulation" but it has to do with the care and health and safety of individuals, that's not red tape. On the other side of that regulation is actually the health and safety of individuals, and in this aspect our seniors, the ones that are in continuing care.

I think it's very important that – here was an opportunity. Here was an actual opportunity for the government to take the facility-based continuing care review that they did and then actually bring into force some of the issues that were being highlighted in that.

Now, as the Member for Edmonton-Riverview highlighted, a lot of the workers in this industry happen to be racialized women. I know a lot of these racialized women. A lot of them call Edmonton-Ellerslie home. I've had the opportunity to meet with them and talk to them about the working conditions inside of these private, for-profit care homes. They've highlighted for me extensively how when they compare the work that they do to others in the health care system, they don't get the same amount of benefits. They don't get the same amount of pay.

You know what? I just don't get it, why members on the other side of this House seem to think that with new Canadians coming here to Alberta, coming here to Canada, who are racialized, it's okay to pay them minimum wage when they're doing a very similar job to someone in the rest of the health care system. You're the ones that decided to change the rules. It was Conservatives that brought in for-profit care here in the province of Alberta and then stripped the regulations of making sure that these individuals were paid in a fair way when it came to their counterparts in the public system. That's on them. They continue to advocate for paying these workers the minimal amount with no benefits.

You know, a lot of these racialized women – of course, as you know, Mr. Speaker, it's not just women; it's also men, right? The majority of them all racialized, coming from different countries, but now they call Alberta home: they tell me that they're too afraid to speak up for themselves. In some of these private, for-profit care homes I've heard of people just being too afraid because they are threatened that they will lose their job. If you become a squeaky wheel, you're going to lose your job. That's the reality that's happening in these private, for-profit care homes. It's our responsibility as a government to do what's fair and just and right, to make sure that an individual working within that system does not have to fear that they will lose their job simply because they're speaking up for their rights. That responsibility is on each individual inside this House.

To strip regulations that would take away the right of an individual to actually speak up – you know, a lot of the time, Mr. Speaker, I've heard straight from their own mouth: instead of advocating for themselves, they're advocating more for the people that they care for. That's the reality. That's what I hear from these individuals when they come to see me. They're speaking up for the rights of the people that they're caring for because they see how – because this private, for-profit care model tends to do the bare minimum in order to provide the care that is needed by these individuals.

I want to remind this House that we have a very solid example when it comes to this government siding with private, for-profit care operators over seniors and families when they introduced Bill 70, the COVID-related measures act, which was much more about protecting private, for-profit care operators than it was for seniors. Now, over this pandemic we have had over 1,600 deaths of seniors in continuing care facilities. Again, I stress that this government should have taken the opportunity to present a bill in this House that actually dealt with what was covered in the facility-based continuing care review and brought something of substance into this Legislature for us to vote on.

To not have done so, I would say, is shameful, Mr. Speaker. I don't often use, you know, the shame and blame approach. I'll be a hundred per cent honest with you; I don't like it. I don't think it's very productive. But in this case, the government having done its review, the government having gone through COVID, 1,600 deaths of seniors over the course – more than 1,600 deaths of seniors during this pandemic, and the government has decided to do absolutely nothing to address the recommendations in the review? I'm sorry, but that's shameful.

Now, in the facility-based continuing care review they focused on addressing the issue of staff-to-patient ratios, but we hear nothing from this government when it comes to that.

We talked about mandating minimum care hours so that all people in continuing care can actually get an increased and improved quality of care that they deserve, and then, of course, I was talking about, when it came to the experience of mostly racialized women that actually work in this sector, actually improving the care and working conditions for individuals that are working in this particular field, Mr. Speaker.

I believe I've highlighted a number of issues where this government has been lacking. I'll honestly say that it's very difficult for me to support this bill because I just do not see it addressing the issues that are so desperately needed by those living in care here in the province of Alberta. Those people deserve better, Mr. Speaker. They deserve a government that will stand up for them, a government that will actually work when it comes to implementing change that they desperately need here in the province of Alberta. That's what Albertans deserve, that's what seniors deserve, and the majority, those racialized women, also deserve better.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday has risen to add to debate.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise this morning to speak to Bill 11, and I have appreciated the comments so far. Of course, this is my third opportunity, I believe, to speak to this legislation, and I always appreciate the opportunity.

Obviously, I want to echo many of the comments and concerns that my colleagues have shared and also just reflect on some of the things that we've heard through this debate, the lack of action from this government through the pandemic and even before the pandemic hit our province and our country. The fact is that this government has failed to take action to support seniors in our province, whether we are talking about in these continuing care or long-term care facilities or whether we are also acknowledging the opportunities and the importance of supporting seniors where they're at when we look at home-based care.

Unfortunately, through this pandemic we have seen how a failure to move towards more home-based care and to keep seniors in their homes and in their communities has made the pandemic worse in terms of mortality rates, worse in terms of supporting seniors with their mental health and their feeling of belonging. Instead of moving towards more home-based care and investing historic levels of dollars, which we should be doing, especially right now through the pandemic, we are seeing quite the opposite and not only when we talk about direct investments in home care but when we reflect on the bigger picture of the priorities and decisions of this government, whether we look at the decision of this government to deindex the Alberta seniors' benefit, making the decision to drop dependants from having the ability to access medical and medication coverage under somebody who may be a low-income senior, the decision to make cuts to programs like SHARP, the seniors home adaptation and repair program. These are all programs that keep seniors in their homes, in their communities.

Unfortunately, this government has gone in the completely opposite direction. What we are seeing in some cases is families being forced into situations and scenarios where they don't necessarily want to be and, with that, through this process and through this legislation itself, again, an unwillingness to strengthen the protections, to ensure that the standards are brought up. Instead, we're told that we have to wait another year to see that process of the regulations play out.

We have Bill 11 before us, which this government is calling a framework. The minister stood yesterday and, I'm sure, many times before that to talk about how proud he was of his government and himself and of the preamble that was in the legislation, committing to strengthening this process. But within the legislation itself we do not see any increased standards for these facilities other than some small changes around transparency.

I can appreciate that the minister has made some commitment to increase transparency around financials, but there is a much bigger picture that needs to be looked at here, not only how we take care of those seniors but how we take care of the workers who are providing supports for those seniors. I said yesterday – and we've heard it many times this morning – that if we are creating a system where the health care aides and the workers in these long-term care facilities are themselves living in poverty, are themselves having to go to multiple jobs, working 60-plus hours a week, they aren't going to be fully focused, necessarily. They will do their best – and I know they do; I've met many of these workers, who put everything they have into supporting seniors in these homes – but, unfortunately, if they are working upwards of 60 hours a week, they are often concerned about their own survival.

We've had many opportunities through this process and before the pandemic to ensure that we were strengthening standards, to ensure that we were supporting these workers financially, whether we're talking about top-ups, whether we're talking about mental health supports and respite care, and unfortunately this government has heeded none of that advice from the members of the opposition, from the workers in these facilities. What we've seen instead is a continuation of the same old, and through this pandemic what it means is a higher mortality rate for seniors and, as we've heard, even higher for seniors in these for-profit long-term care, continuing care facilities.

A year ago we had the facility-based continuing care review come forward. I'm happy about the work and what was provided through that process. Unfortunately, this government has made little movement to ensure that these processes and concerns that were addressed through this review are actually implemented. Instead, we have a bare-bones framework come before this Legislature in Bill 11 and are told that seniors in our communities and the families who support them have to wait another year to see what those regulations might look like. It is simply not enough. As I said yesterday, Albertans and seniors deserve better. They deserve to live with dignity. They deserve to be taken care of by people that are also being taken care of in turn, Mr. Speaker. They deserve the full support of the system, and unfortunately they are not getting that right now.

With that, again, Mr. Speaker, I want to leave a bit of time for my colleague here, but I have appreciated the opportunity to speak to this. In this case I do not see myself being able to support this legislation. I think that the government has spent too much time infighting and concerned about who is going to lead their party into the next election, and that is to the consequence of the seniors who are looking for support in our province.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any other members wishing to rise and join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased to rise and offer a few comments on Bill 11. I want to, first, start off by thanking my colleagues from Lethbridge-West, Edmonton-Decore, Edmonton-Ellerslie, Edmonton-Riverview, and, of course, Edmonton-West Henday for offering their comments and, you know, pick up on a thread that my friends from Edmonton-Ellerslie and Edmonton-West Henday wove through their comments, and that's on the issue of affordability, if I could frame it that way, right?

Both my friends from Edmonton-Ellerslie and Edmonton-West Henday talked about the poor working conditions and low wages that people working in the long-term care sector work under. It's especially important, in this incredible inflationary environment that we find ourselves in now, to make sure that people who are working in long-term care stop falling further and further behind. You know, I've mentioned a number of times in debate on issues around long-term care and health care, broadly speaking, that my oldest daughter works in a long-term care facility as a health care aide. Fortunately, the wage top-up meant that she didn't start at the usual starting wage for long-term care workers in this province, but she's only making $22 or $23 an hour for incredibly hard work and can only find work 20 or 25 hours a week. That's not enough for her to live on. She's 20 years old, and the only way that she can make ends meet is by continuing to live at home with her mom and her dad.

Now, you know, Mr. Speaker, I'm fortunate enough to be able to afford to continue to help her with her living expenses, but many of the people who work in the long-term care sector don't find themselves in such fortunate circumstances. As my friend from Edmonton-Ellerslie mentioned, a lot of long-term care workers are new Canadians, so they not only have to make enough money to establish themselves and set their families up in their new lives here in Canada, but many of them have significant financial responsibilities to their families at home. I know that many new Canadians really struggle because they find it hard to keep up with the cost of living here at home, but they're also expected to send money back to families in the Philippines or Cameroon or other countries around the world that new Canadians come from.

I know from personal experience, Mr. Speaker, that one of the things that is really stressful for those families is that their families at home don't understand that $20 an hour doesn't go very far here in Alberta, right? They just hear that dollar amount and think that that has the same buying power as it does at home, so they're under continual pressure to send money home to support their cousins or their uncles or all kinds of family members who put these expectations on them to provide financial support. We can't continue to operate a long-term care system successfully by underpaying and overworking all of these people, who are highly trained, very good at their jobs, provide essential services. We just can't afford to do that.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the affordability for the seniors living in these long-term care centres is something that is also growing increasingly important. As I mentioned, even though wages aren't going up, the cost of living in these long-term care centres is absolutely going up. As my friend from Edmonton-West Henday pointed out, so many of these centres are for-profit centres that absolutely will not let their bottom lines shrink because the price of gas and the price of electricity are going up. No, no, no. "Shareholders have got to be paid first, so we've got to make sure that not only do we keep the staff wages low, but we keep jacking up the prices for the people who are living in those long-term care facilities, and we'll keep cutting corners," because profitability is the number one objective here in these for-profit long-term care centres. The people who pay the price for that, who pad the bottom lines, are the seniors in care and the people who care for them. That's absolutely not fair, and it places a tremendous burden on the families who have members in care.

You know, it was heartbreaking to hear my friend from Edmonton-Decore tell the story about the fellow he knew whose father was left on the toilet for five hours. I bet they don't bring that up at the shareholder meetings. Maybe they should. Maybe that should be a requirement, that the kind of neglect that seniors experience in these long-term care facilities should be the number one issue at the annual shareholder meeting for long-term care facility providers so that the people who are making profits understand exactly the price that people are paying to make sure that somebody is getting a good return on their investment.

That's not a price that I think people should be paying. I think it's immoral that people are making a profit by leaving somebody's father on the toilet for five hours. It's absolutely wrong. This government refuses to even acknowledge that that's happening, and they say that they're making some significant advances in the legislative framework around long-term care facilities by creating this framework legislation.

Anyway, I have, unfortunately, exhausted my time, and I can see the intent stares from House leadership both on my side and the government side. You know me, Mr. Speaker; I am not one to ruffle feathers in this House, so I will conclude my comments by saying that I don't support this bill, and I urge all members in the House to vote against it.

Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any other members wishing to rise and add to debate this morning on Bill 11?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call the question.

[Motion carried; Bill 11 read a third time]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to request unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 8 and Standing Order

9(1) in order to proceed immediately to Committee of the Whole on Bill 205, Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Public Bills and Orders Other than

Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 205
Human Tissue and Organ Donation
(Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022

The Chair: I see the hon. Member for Highwood rising to speak.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Chair, and thank you to the House as well for allowing us to move into the Committee of the Whole today with respect to my private member bill, Bill 205, the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. Bill 205 starts the very important work of setting a solid foundation for improved human tissue and organ donation systems here in Alberta. I have engaged with many individuals that have years of experience in the organ and tissue donation field as well as many families who have been directly affected by organ and tissue donation here in the province. Many of these individuals have shared with me recommendations that will help create a stronger foundation for Alberta's organ and tissue donation system.

Of those recommendations that have been proposed, this bill addresses areas that really stood out to me in making the biggest difference and improving our current system and closing the gap between us and leading jurisdictions across the world. Of those recommendations, it was clear that we need to continue to build and strengthen our current online registry, where individuals can register their intent to donate, and I will remind all people: it is important that we have these conversations, and if you wish to be an organ and tissue donor, please visit the Alberta registry to sign up and proclaim your intent to become an organ or tissue donor.

It was also clear when I spoke to doctors, surgeons, and AHS representatives that there are many opportunities for the province to continue to improve our online registry awareness and continue to educate people about our system and how to become an organ donor. As I mentioned previously in this House, when it comes to organ and tissue donation, the chances are extremely low. Only 1 to 2 per cent of opportunities exist within our entire health care system across Canada. It's essential that we continue to provide improvements to our system and our donation registry system and continue to educate Albertans as well that when it comes to choosing to be a donor, there are many options available.

When it comes to donor choices, Albertans should know that within that, they have the ability to be very prescriptive of what organs they wish to donate as well as if they want to be a tissue donor. So it's important that we continue to heighten the education and awareness around this issue, and I encourage families to have this very important discussion.

However, with that being said, one of the most important components or, I believe, the most important component of Bill 205 is the change from mandatory consideration to mandatory referral. Mandatory referral is now being reviewed in many jurisdictions and is being credited as one of the most impactful changes to improving organ and tissue donation opportunities.

I'll also note that the top-performing organ and tissue donation jurisdictions in the world all have some form of mandatory referral. To be clear, mandatory referral will not create language that contradicts other health legislation which assumes that an individual does not consent unless they have specifically indicated their consent. I want to be clear on that.

Mandatory referral, simply put, will substantially decrease missed donor opportunities in Alberta. This became clear through many of the seminars that I attended over the time in which I was working on Bill 205. Clarifying the process in which donors are referred to Alberta organ donor organizations and the timeline in which this is done presents one of the greatest opportunities to ensuring appropriate time to properly identify potential donors and refer those donors. It's critically important that we do all we can to ensure that our organ donation organizations within the province have the time to be able to properly assess medical suitability for donation and communicate with the families of that loved one.

Now, organ donation organizations within the province, known as ODOs, are highly skilled in both communicating the importance of organ donation and in how it can help the grieving process. With that, they also understand the many factors that prevent individuals from donating their organs, and they are careful about overpromising and underdelivering with the affected families. This is crucial, that we have the specialists in this field working with those families. This is one of the times when they're experiencing one of the worst times of their lives as they're grieving, and we want to ensure that they're communicating with the best individuals possible when it comes to this.

Ultimately, I believe that, all of us, this is what we want, to improve opportunities for organ and tissue donation and respect an individual's choice to donate while simultaneously making the extremely traumatic situation easier for those families and making sure that we work with them through this critical time.

We also need to continue to educate and provide awareness about the benefits, and within this bill there are also changes that will ensure that the most updated and informed information is provided to residents in the province through our registries.

With that, Chair, I do want to comment that after review and since tabling the bill, I've worked and continued to work on this bill. At this time I would like to move an amendment which will clarify some of the wording that was necessary as well as some changes to the agency. Now, I've worked with my stakeholders . . .

The Chair: Hon. member, maybe take the amendment first, and then I'll let you speak to it.

Mr. Sigurdson: You bet. Sorry. I apologize, Chair.

10:40

The Chair: Hon. member, do you have a signed copy of this amendment from Parliamentary Counsel?

Mr. Sigurdson: I do, Chair. It was in that pile. It was on the very top with the paper clip, and it was the signed copy.

The Chair: I'm missing the last page, probably of the original. Okay. We have it.

Hon. members, please note this is a six-page amendment. I think there is some agreement in the House that not reading it into the record in its entirety is going to be okay. Members will receive a copy on their desks before we vote. Is that not amenable? It's amenable. All members will receive a copy before a vote is to take place.

Hon. member, this will be known as amendment A1. Please proceed with your remarks.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Chair. Sorry for getting ahead of myself. Of course, I'm pretty excited about the chance to be able to get into the Committee of the Whole and continue the work on this bill and the progress on it.

Of course, this amendment corrects and addresses some of the language issues that needed to be done in order to make sure that it aligns appropriately with the current legislation within Alberta and also addresses a couple of small changes with relation to the agency to ensure that it works within the current Alberta health care system that we have within the province. As well, it makes a small change to the enforcement date, of course, to align with the next fiscal year, which I think will allow the appropriate time for the government to be able to build and be able to work with this, implement it, and get these changes in place in time.

Of course, we all understand the importance of this bill and we want to see it happen as quickly as possible. But, of course, there are some changes in here that are pretty substantive, so I wanted to ensure that we had the appropriate time to do so within our current health care system. At this time I look forward to additional comments with relation to it.

I, of course, move this amendment, and I will reserve the rest of my time to the House. Thank you.

The Chair: Any members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise this morning to speak to Bill 205, the amendment. I just want to start by saying that we strongly support organ donation and the steps that will improve donor participation rates in Alberta. I think that, looking through this amendment, this very long amendment, it addresses some technical issues to ensure that this bill works well. There's nothing in this amendment that changes the intent of this bill, so we're absolutely happy to support it. We recognize that the private member does not have the same resources as a government does to make bills. I believe that this bill was supported in the Private Bills Committee in principle and that the technical issues that were brought up in that meeting have now been addressed through this very lengthy amendment. It's very much appreciated that that feedback was provided and acted on.

I just want to say that, unfortunately, through this new process with private members' bills the UCP seems to not apply the same principle to the NDP bills that are being brought forward at all, most notably with Bill 204, the Anti-Racism Act. It's very concerning that there seems to be somewhat of a double standard, and I'm just disappointed that that is the case. However, saying that, we're happy to support this amendment because we support increasing organ donation and want to ensure that this bill works. I just would like it noted that perhaps the UCP should apply the same position to opposition bills.

With that, Madam Chair, I would just like to encourage all members of the House to support this amendment, and I will take my seat. Thank you.

The Chair: Have all members who wished to receive a copy of the amendment received a copy? If anyone has not – okay.

Are there any members wishing to speak to the amendment?

Seeing none, we will vote on the amendment.

[Motion on amendment A1 carried]

The Chair: Are there any speakers to the main bill as amended? Seeing none, I will call the question.

[The remaining clauses of Bill 205 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Any opposed? That is carried.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Chair. I move that the Committee of the Whole rise and report Bill 205.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports the following bill with some amendments: Bill 205. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. That is carried. The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise again to request unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 8 and Standing Order 9(1) in order to proceed immediately to third reading on Bill 205, Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 205

Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am really excited to see Bill 205 reach third reading in this House. It has been an honour to see the constructive and positive dialogue happen from both sides of this House on Bill 205, the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. I've previously stood in this House to speak on why Bill 205 is absolutely critical, and I've told stories of many individuals who nobly helped save the lives of strangers and, as well, of those who received the gift of life themselves. Today I want to take time to thank the individuals who have been instrumental in helping me get this bill to this House and to this stage.

Over the past year and a half I have had countless conversations with medical specialists, nonprofits, transplant institutes, organ donation advocacy groups, business community members, Alberta

Health Services, Alberta Health, registered donors, and recipients, and through this entire process, Madam Speaker, I've truly been touched. When I entered into starting work on this bill, I myself was a little bit ignorant of the process of human tissue and organ donation. What I found over the process was that I didn't have to go very far to find individuals where this really impacted their lives, either being donors or recipients.

Now, through that, the Alberta ORGANization Group is one group that has been instrumental through this entire process, and two specific individuals, that I do want to speak about today, really were there through the duration of this process and always helped me when needed, answered questions, and did a great job of continuing to help educate me on this. Both Greg and Linda Powell have been there day in, day out, working with me on this. Of course, they formed a patient-led organization with an interest in organ donation. Greg and Linda Powell have, you know, really been experts in this field and bringing this up, and they continue to work in this field. I think the province is very lucky to see the fruits of that labour that they've done over the years. It's through their guidance that Bill 205 hits some of these major areas that are needed to help modernize our system and continue to improve our system for the future.

With that, Flavia Robles and all the individuals within the Kidney Foundation have been an instrumental resource as well for Bill 205. She provided insight into how to develop a system that will be able to both improve the lives of Albertans and, with that, the impacts of what this means, so it really was beneficial to have her input as we worked through this.

I also want to thank the Alberta Transplant Institute for the seminars they put on. These were very, very interesting. They bring a lot of specialists from around the world and within our country to be able to talk about the impacts of tissue and organ donation. With that, they connected me with those experts in the field who helped explain both the legal aspects and ethical foundations of an effective system and, as well, highlighted a lot of the international best practices.

I also want to thank Canadian Blood Services for their continuing advocacy and providing publications on their best practices.

More importantly, Madam Speaker, I wouldn't be here today if it wasn't for – I think one of the initial conversations that I had with Cindy Krieger and her very impactful story about her daughter Morghan. It really did move me, and it drove me to continue to work as hard as I could to make sure that this bill made it to the Assembly and then had the best chance of, you know, being a bill that could be something this House would be willing to support and pass as legislation.

As well, the Woolfsmiths and their incredible story about their very, very young child that passed and how many lives that that child's gift of life went on to save: it really, truly did touch me. With that as well, the Boulets' tireless work and advocacy. It's these families and their resilience during the most difficult moments in their lives where we understand how important an effective system is.

It really is our responsibility here as legislators to make sure that we do support that by making changes that will help those 700 individuals, as of today, that are waiting for these life-saving procedures. With individuals having to wait seven years, as an example, just to receive a kidney, it's clear that we do need to make changes and we do need to continue to have this very important conversation.

With the amount of support I've received from nonprofits, organ donation advocacy groups, medical specialists, and the thousands of Albertans who wrote letters of support, I'm very humbled today and honoured to be moving Bill 205 in third reading. I really do believe it'll modernize our system and help improve the future of tissue and organ donation in Alberta, because, really, this bill is about one thing: it's about saving lives and saving lives through reducing wait times.

With that, Madam Speaker, I will sit, and I will hear comments from the House. Once again, just very excited to be in third reading. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Very happy to rise this morning to be able to add some very brief comments here in third reading of Bill 205. You know, when it comes to organ donation, I don't think there's any debate whatsoever. That gift can potentially change another person's life; it can even save that life.

I think back to the time, you know, when my daughter was younger and she was facing a couple of open-heart surgeries. I remember talking to the doctor at the time, and I said, "What happens if this doesn't work?" He very abruptly said, "Well, we'll have to probably transplant her heart." As you can imagine, that was a shocking moment in time, and it gave me only a very tiny little brush with the thought that I might have to consider that. Now, obviously, the good news is that that's all it ever was, just that brief moment of a brush. For families that do actually have to face that, having that support, that knowledge base to be able to work through that process, I think, is paramount.

You know, I've had the opportunity to work with the Member for Highwood on this even before we fully started to review it in the Private Bills Committee, that I also participate in, so I got the chance to see some of the work that the member had done on this. As we all know, private members don't have a lot of resources in terms of being able to do this, so I was quite taken aback by the amount of consultation he was able to achieve, the feedback. Certainly, as the bill moved forward, the correspondence that I got in my office was very positive.

You know, again thinking back to my time and my experience, I can't even imagine what families face around organ donation, not only giving that gift but also receiving it, so having the opportunity to tap into people that can guide them very well through that process: I wish it was available way back when, when my daughter was facing this stuff.

I was obviously surprised when we ran into a couple of hiccups after the committee review, and the amendment now, that we've just recently passed, clearly is able to address those, clear up any confusions or misunderstandings or any conflicts that might have occurred across the different pieces of language and acts.

Now we have a bill that I think will serve Albertans very, very well and will help those Albertans, when they do face this, have that knowledge base and guidance, so I'm very happy to rise today in support of Bill 205. I certainly look forward to seeing how that's going to help more Albertans get through potentially what will be a very, very difficult time in their life. I will thank the Member for Highwood for bringing this piece of legislation forward, for all the work he's done on it and, certainly, the work that we've continued throughout the process so that we understand it. It's certainly made our ability as opposition to be able to go out and do our quick background work on it very, very easy, so I appreciate that.

Thanks, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this morning to speak in third reading to Bill 205, Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. I've had incredible opportunities to speak in the House about the importance of human tissue and organ donation over the years. I can tell you that this is something that is very personal for me. One of my dearest friends, Christine Post: her son at eight years old got very, very sick, and it was determined in a very short time frame that he required a heart transplant. He was very, very sick. Initially they thought that it was the flu, but fortunately they were able to diagnose him with idiopathic dilated cardiomyopathy, which was very, very scary, hearing those words, and very unknown to the family. Ultimately, it meant that in order for Austin to live, he needed a heart transplant.

Now, we know that organ donation is life-saving. We also know that there are some significant barriers that can cause someone to not be able to donate. This was learning that we went through very quickly and in a traumatic way. One of the key things that this experience taught me was the importance of talking about organ donation, and I think that this piece of legislation is a wonderful step towards that. What it means for so many people is that it starts a conversation about the intent to become an organ donor, and when we look at how many lives can be saved through donation, it's quite significant.

I know that through this path with Austin and his journey we talk a lot about the importance of organ donation, and one of the key things that is important to know is that when you identify that you would like to be an organ donor, that's one of the first steps. There are a whole bunch of other processes that have to happen, and I think that this legislation will absolutely create space to allow those intentions to come through. One of the most important pieces that is still required is to talk to your loved ones about your intentions of becoming an organ donor. I know that we have a space where you can register to become an organ donor, but if your loved ones aren't aware of your intentions, ultimately they're the ones that make that decision, so being very clear with your family and your friends about your intentions is so important.

It was because of the incredible gift of the donor for Austin's heart that he was able to be a recipient. He went through a very fast process of getting his heart, which is uncommon. It's not often that this process happens so quickly, but because of this he's been a huge advocate for organ donation, heart transplant awareness, research regarding pediatric hearts.

I think that when we have the opportunity in this Legislature to be able to talk about such important issues, it's important that we support pieces of legislation that truly can make a difference, a life-saving difference. It's a huge gift that the families can provide to save so many lives. I know that there are so many people in this province that are on wait-lists and are in desperate need of donation, and so many people in this province are registered to be organ donors. This piece of legislation, I believe, will truly have an impact in creating a space for more life-saving opportunities.

With that, Madam Speaker, I would like to just conclude my remarks and say how much I appreciate the member for bringing this forward, and I would hope that all members of this Chamber support this legislation. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'll just take a few minutes. Thank you to all of our colleagues in the House that have spoken to this. To our colleague from Highwood: we know that this has been quite the journey for you. I'm also . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt. Just direct your comments through the chair.

Mrs. Aheer: I apologize. Sorry. He's sitting right here. It's very difficult. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

We also very much appreciate – like I've mentioned before, when I had the opportunity to speak to this bill, the member and I share in common some friendships with people who have actually gone through the process of donating the organs of their loved ones to people and knowing and hearing from the people that now have those hearts beating inside of people that they've met.

I just wanted to take a moment to thank the member and, through you, Madam Speaker, thank the House for the opportunity for the stories that have come from our colleagues that are very touching, and it is true, you know, as we all stand in this House and understand the legislation that needs to come forward, that so many of us wish that had been available many, many years ago, especially because many of us have been touched by these particular situations.

Thank you again to our colleague from Highwood. Thank you so much to the House for the opportunity to be able to debate this and talk about it and for making the legislation stronger together.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate?

Seeing none, would the hon. Member for Highwood like to close?

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'll just quickly close by saying thank you to everybody that I spoke to this within the House. This is, I think, a very monumental stage for us to continue to move forward with conversations surrounding this very sensitive issue but as well an issue that we need to bring more to the forefront, and we need to continue to have these conversations with our families and friends.

I hope everyone here – and I'll say it again – makes the incredible decision to become a tissue and organ donor. It really is truly impactful to so many lives. It is the gift of life, and it is something incredible.

Thank you again, Madam Speaker. Thank you to the House.

[Motion carried; Bill 205 read a third time]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I move that the Chamber be adjourned until 1:30 this afternoon.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, May 25, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have a number of visitors joining us today in the Speaker's gallery, some who have joined us and some who will join us momentarily. I see the hon. Member of Parliament for Peace River-Westlock, Arnold Viersen, and he's accompanied by summer intern Shona Arsenault. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

I would also like to note that joining us in just a couple of moments will be the Member of Parliament for Sherwood Park-Fort Saskatchewan, Garnett Genuis.

Also in the gallery, a very familiar face to many in this Assembly, is the former member for Edmonton-Meadowlark and the onestoried Leader of the Official Opposition. I'd invite him to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. Dr. Raj Sherman.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Members, joining us in the galleries today is Mark Allard, the vice-president for North America of Methanex Corporation, and he is a guest of the hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Also joining us, please welcome Matt Osborne, president of the Alberta professional firefighters and paramedics association. He is a guest of the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Statement by the Speaker

Page Recognition

The Speaker: Hon. members, I have an important statement to make this afternoon that I would like to make before we continue with our usual business. I would like to call forward all of the retiring pages who are here today to please join me at the dais. Some of our retiring pages are not with us today.

But as many of you will know, as a long-standing tradition of the Assembly the pages have coauthored a letter, which I will read to you today. The following will be a quote from their letter.

Mr. Speaker,

As we approach the end of Session, many of us will be moving on from the Page Program. We, the retiring Pages, would like to express our thanks for the opportunities given to us in serving the Legislative Assembly. Pages often come to the Assembly with the aspiration of assisting in the democratic process . . . and it has been our honour to do so.

We would like to give a special thanks to Kaitlynn Church and the rest of the Sergeant-at-Arms' Office for their care in overseeing the Page Program [and] to the Bills and Journals Clerks in 315, whose procedural knowledge is essential to the execution of our duties, and to the members of the Legislative Assembly Security Service, whose humour make [the] long days feel short. Finally, we express our gratitude to the Members of the Legislative Assembly . . . for their dedication in the service of their constituents, and to [the] Table Officers and the Speaker for their leadership in facilitating democracy in [the great province of Alberta].

However, we have found that the greatest joy in serving the Assembly has been the chance to work alongside our fellow Pages. We each come to the Program as eccentric students eager to engage in the political process. Through quiet mornings, hectic afternoons, and long [long] evenings, the Page Program brings our group of oddballs together and gives us a special shared experience in which we ground invaluable friendships. It is . . . the opportunity to make these friendships that we express our deepest gratitude to the Assembly.

Yours sincerely,

[Now, to you and through you, Mr. Speaker, a third-party, independent member, let me just say to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview: I love you, mom.]

To be fair to Wade, I added that part after.

Pages, please rise. Hon. members, join me in thanking our pages. [Standing ovation]

Members' Statements

Dog-friendly Restaurant Patios

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, summer is just around the corner, and with summer comes patio season. This year grabbing a drink and food in Alberta is going to be just a little bit nicer for some of our four-legged friends. No longer shall my dog Kai and other furry friends need to be left home when families go out to enjoy the summer weather and great food Alberta has to offer.

Starting today, Albertan restaurants no longer need to go through a lengthy approval process to allow dogs onto patios. Albertans elected a government committed to cutting red tape, and we took that promise seriously. By establishing a ministry of red tape reduction, we have been able to lead Canada in reducing unnecessary government bureaucracy. This change will make it easier for Albertans to support our restaurant industry while they are out with their dogs this patio season, and we're doing this all without compromising food safety. Nonservice dogs are allowed on patios only and must be on a leash or in carriers at all times. Cutting this piece of red tape will allow our public health inspectors to focus their efforts where they are needed most and remove some of their burden.

It's policies like these that, when put together, demonstrate just how much this government is working and doing to make the lives of Albertans easier. I know that my dog Kai, an Australian cattle dog, will be very happy to join me and my family when we go to get a bite this summer out on one of the fabulous Sherwood Park patios. Mr. Speaker, Albertans should know that they have a clear choice: Conservatives on this side, who are working to make their lives simpler for Alberta families, or the socialists on the other side, who want to make life more complicated.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

NDP Provincial Election Candidates

Ms Pancholi: Real leaders know that they're only as good as the people they surround themselves with, so let me tell you about some of the people on our NDP team: health care leaders like registered nurse Diana Batten in Calgary-Acadia, who knows what it takes to manage a health crisis, as does front-line paramedic Cam Heenan from Leduc-Beaumont, who is ready to fix EMS, and Dr. Luanne Metz in Calgary-Varsity, a world-renowned medical researcher and neurologist.

We have leaders focused on diversifying our economy and creating good jobs in our energy sector, like energy analyst Samir Kayande in Calgary-Elbow and sustainable energy expert Nagwan Al-Guneid in Calgary-Glenmore.

We have leaders who know how to collaborate with local voices to build stronger communities, like former councillor Druh Farrell, running in Calgary-Bow, and former councillor Rob Miyashiro in Lethbridge-East and former councillor Karen Shaw in Morinville-St. Albert. Karen also brings first-hand experience as a cattle farmer and successful entrepreneur, as does Richard Bruneau in Camrose. Richard is Métis and through his experience as well as the experiences of Indigenous candidates like Jodi Calahoo Stonehouse in Edmonton-Rutherford and Marilyn North Peigan in Calgary-Klein, we will walk a real path of reconciliation.

When it comes to our parks and natural spaces, conservationist Sarah Elmeligi from Banff-Kananaskis is there to ensure that they are never ever converted into coal mines.

We'll build good schools and properly support students with Rosman Valencia in Calgary-East and educational assistant Julia Hayter in Calgary-Edgemont.

We'll take action to make sure life is more affordable with antipoverty advocate Janet Eremenko in Calgary-Currie and support small businesses with entrepreneurs like Gurinder Brar in Calgary-North East and Parmeet Singh in Calgary-Falconridge.

Mr. Speaker, I haven't even gotten to the group of people here with me in this House, a group dedicated to Albertans, united, focused, and ready to make life better. On our team we don't have to fight over the leader; we stand behind ours. The NDP is ready, and we are focused on what matters to Albertans. We can't wait to be Alberta's next government.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Addiction Treatment and Recovery

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In 2011 I started working at the youth shelter, where the goal was to keep kids alive for the night. Of course, staying alive was a starting point, but it certainly wasn't where we wanted to stop. Thankfully, our leadership at the time had the vision to shift our thinking to provide more for youth than simply keeping them alive. Recognizing their strengths and their resiliency, we knew our youth were capable of so much more, so we created opportunities to build off those strengths and to help them go on to grow and thrive in their communities.

I've recently met with homeless service providers, and I've heard stories of people being revived in the street, in Dumpsters, in camps, and inside the shelter. There is an instinct to focus completely on keeping people alive and getting people housed. "Housing first" is still a common phrase among service providers in Alberta. Overdose prevention sites and digital overdose response systems are available in most major municipalities. These can be good initiatives, and they can be a part of a comprehensive system, but they cannot be the end goal.

We often hear the saying that we need to meet people where they're at, but we can't simply leave them there. That is why this government is focused on providing a path out of addiction and into recovery, and we've taken multiple steps to create those opportunities. We've created 8,000 newly funded treatment spaces. We've removed barriers to for-fee addiction treatment. We've built recovery communities. We've created the opioid medication treatment on demand through the virtual opioid dependency program, and we've worked with service providers across this province to build a system that helps people build a better life for themselves. Last week I was able to attend the groundbreaking event for the first recovery community in Lethbridge, that will provide 200 additional annual treatment spaces for Albertans. The excitement was huge.

Mr. Speaker, addiction continues to plague our community. The pandemic has made things worse, but there is hope in recovery. It is possible for everyone, and it is up to us to provide those opportunities for people. This government is focused on making sure people can recover from addiction and build stronger, healthier, and safer . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Calgary Beltline Area Protests

Member Ceci: After almost two months of relative peace and quiet Calgary's Beltline residents were once again disrupted by protesters over the weekend. The noise, the verbal abuse, and the views of many of these people put a chill on the entire area. Residents can't enjoy their weekend in peace, and businesses suffer from reduced foot traffic, yet the UCP government is once again silent.

It's like déjà vu. In fact, one business owner in the Beltline asked on Twitter if they were in a time machine. Just like a few months ago, the UCP has refused to act or speak out against protesters. The so-called party of law and order refuses to stand up to lawlessness, just like they did at Coutts. Instead of standing up to those who shut down our border for two weeks or more, some members of the UCP caucus chose to stand with these criminals.

In fact, the outgoing Premier tried to court many of these people in an effort to save his own job. Now that he failed to do so and was shown the door by his own party, the UCP will be caught up in several more months of internal drama instead of focusing on the priorities of Albertans. This could mean several more months of Beltline protests while our provincial government sits idly by and the residents and businesses continue to suffer. If so, this would be a failure of the government to protect the most basic right of Albertans, the right to peace and security.

We cannot allow this to continue. We need a government that will end the chaos not only in our streets but with our governing party itself. Albertans are tired of the drama and infighting within the UCP. In fact, they're just plain tired of the UCP. It's time for a government focused on what matters to Albertans. It's time for an NDP government.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East has a statement to make.

Clifton House Seniors' Village in Calgary

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to discuss an exciting development happening in my constituency. On April 4 Clifton House, a seniors' village located in Forest Lawn, southeast Calgary, had its grand opening. Clifton House will eventually be home to a total of 175 residents and provide both supportive living and long-term care services. This will help to better support residents to age in place as their care needs develop over time.

Clifton House is located across the street from Clifton Manor, a long-term care site built in 1972. Clifton Manor's existing long-term care residents will slowly relocate to Clifton House. Clifton Manor will then be decommissioned, with long-range plans for redevelopment. The eventual redevelopment will include additional supportive living and long-term care continuing services along with affordable housing solutions for independent seniors.

The new Clifton House and the eventual redevelopment of Clifton Manor illustrate the importance of evolving with the times.

Let Clifton House be a symbol for the necessity of modernizing the continuing care system. Our seniors deserve to have facilities that allow for progression. They deserve to reside in facilities that are constantly striving to give them the best care possible.

The residents of Clifton House deserve legislation that is as modern as their new facility. Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, will now give them just that. Bill 11 will address the cracks in the legislation left from previous governments and finally reflect present-day practices and services while still allowing for the flexibility needed to address changing needs and expectations. This government will continue to strive to have our continuing care system embody that brighter future.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Homelessness

Mr. Dach: Having a place to call home, a real roof over your head, a place to hang your hat is something most Albertans take for granted. For an increasing number of Albertans, however, having a stable place to call home is a distant dream.

People become homeless or houseless in Alberta for a multiple number of reasons. People don't choose to become destitute. We as a society have a responsibility to address the root causes and provide real solutions both in housing and compassionate, properly funded wraparound services to treat the underlying mental illnesses and addictions issues; sadly, something we have not seen this UCP government willing to do.

Realtors in Alberta have always fought to sustain the dream of affordable home ownership or rental in the real estate marketplace, but for too long tackling the crisis of the homeless population has been outside the scope of professional realtors' responsibilities. This needs to change, because it's a human right. Housing is a human right. Stable, affordable housing is a first step towards independent living free of mental illness and addictions. Housing the homeless is an ongoing and urgent priority and an investment which we must make as a society to support those who experience homelessness.

As an honorary life member of the Alberta Real Estate Association I call upon every one of the nearly 11,000 area members to step up and embrace a leadership role to eliminate homelessness in Alberta. Realtors have unmatched ingenuity when it comes to housing people. I call upon Alberta realtors to share their ingenuity, experience, and ideas to solve homelessness in their community with me and all Albertans. Visit albertasfuture.ca to upload your vision to help lift people out of homelessness in your corner of Alberta.

I look forward to hearing from the voices of professional real estate in Alberta. Working together, we can tackle the homelessness crisis.

Sexual Violence Awareness

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, on May 17 I had the honour of participating in two walk-and-run events to raise awareness about child abuse and sexual violence, with the Zebra Child Protection Centre and the Saffron Centre. These centres provide critical services for children and families who have been affected by abuse and sexual violence. These centres provide resources such as advocacy, education, counselling, and legal support for survivors.

After these events I decided to do more research into sexual violence as May is Sexual Violence Awareness Month, and, Mr. Speaker, I was floored with what I found. Let me share some statistics for members of this Assembly. Since 2008 14,403 cases of sexual assault against children have been recorded in Alberta;

1.8 million Albertans have experienced sexual violence in their lifetime. Two-thirds of women and one-third of men in Alberta will become a survivor in their lifetime. Children, Indigenous women, individuals with accessibility needs, and people from the LGBTQ community are more likely to face sexual violence in their lifetime.

Alberta's government has taken action to respond to on-campus sexual assault, sexual assault against children, and sexual assault and social context training for judges. We need to continue to support prevention services in conjunction with response services in this province.

I call on the government to continue its efforts to address this epidemic of sexual violence with more prudence and action. Albertans need the vital resources provided to them by organizations like Zebra and the Saffron Centre, yet we need to move more swiftly and adequately to prevent sexual violence in a way that is survivor-centric.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Personal Income Tax and Benefit Deindexation Insurance Premium Costs

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, this divided Conservative government is collapsing, and as we heard yesterday, the current Premier has no plan to change direction, so maybe the next one will. Now, for years the Minister of Finance has defended the Premier's decision to raise taxes through bracket creep. Now Canada's inflation rate is at a 30-year high. Food costs are up 10 per cent, shelter up 7 per cent. By the time the next election rolls around, Alberta families will lose around $700 per year to bracket creep. To the Finance minister: will he reverse his own bad policy, or will he continue to defend his boss's legacy?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we inherited a fiscal train wreck from the members opposite. Had we not sat down and provided real, sustainable fiscal management, Albertans would have very few options in the future. We made some tough decisions, but we've put this province on a sustainable fiscal trajectory with a balanced budget. And, yes, we will be re-evaluating the question of reindexing our personal tax system.

Ms Notley: Well, I hope so, Mr. Speaker. You know, the Minister of Finance walked into a multibillion-dollar oil revenue windfall, and his plan so far is to make inflation worse, not better.

Now, when the price of goods rises at rates like this, it's those who earn the very least who are most impacted. The minister's decision to freeze benefits as inflation rises means less support for working parents, for seniors, and for Albertans on AISH. Does the minister plan to launch his campaign on a record of taking $3,000 a year out of the pockets of Albertans living with severe disabilities?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government took responsible decisions to ensure that our programs were sustainable in the future. We did all of that by not reducing our support for those on AISH. We maintained our AISH funding . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: The Finance minister.

Mr. Toews: . . . which is by far and away the largest in the country. That's important to every member on this side of the House because it's important to Albertans.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, they took $3,000 a year out of the pockets of severely disabled Albertans. When push comes to shove, we've seen whose side this minister is on.

Now, when our opposition raised the voices of hundreds of thousands of Albertans paying through the nose for their car insurance because of this government, the minister defended that decision to take the cap off and then went on to go to bat for big insurance companies and their big, fat profits. Why does the Finance minister think he's up to leading the province if his first instinct is to make regular Albertans pay more, lose more, while shovelling more money to profitable corporations?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The only members in this House who made Albertans pay more are the members opposite, when they introduced the largest tax increase in the province's history, the carbon tax. That's driven up the cost of groceries. It's driven up the cost of fuel. It's driven up the cost for seniors heating their homes. We've suspended the fuel tax. We're bringing relief to utilities, and we're positioning this economy for growth and investment attraction.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition for her second set of questions.

Government Policies

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, the Premier has a historically low approval rating because he's the leader of Team Bad Ideas. For instance, we have a cost-of-living crisis, yet the Finance minister keeps taxing inflation. The Education minister is raising school fees. The Advanced Ed minister is hiking tuition. The Energy minister can't deliver utility rebates for love or money, and the parks minister is obsessed with turning K Country into Pay Country. Now that the captain of Team Bad Ideas is out, is there anyone over there who will pledge to reverse these onerous hikes on Albertans today? If not, I will.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, Albertans would have no confidence in the members opposite because the members opposite, when they were in government, increased costs for every Albertan. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. I heard the question; now I'll hear the answer.

The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Moreover, Mr. Speaker, they raised taxes on businesses. They raised taxes on individuals. They brought in the carbon tax. They sent tens of billions of dollars of investment out of this province, creating a jobs crisis of epic proportion. We've reversed those policies. Investment is returning, jobs are returning, and the budget is balanced.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, now that the captain is out, here's another question for the team. We have a crisis in health care: overflowing ERs, severely delayed EMS response, doctors leaving, and front-line health care workers exhausted. They need support, resources, and stability, yet the divided Conservative health priorities under the last guy are wage rollbacks for specialists, more private surgical care, and taking insulin pumps from diabetics. Is there anyone over there who will pledge to cancel that absurdly out-of-touch agenda and start fixing front-line health care?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, our agenda is to fix health care, and we are delivering on that agenda. We are investing $600 million this year, $600 million next year, $600 million the year after that; $1.8 billion additional funding. That's expense funding, and that is the highest level ever that we're investing in health care.

I was pleased to be able to make an announcement today in regard to expanding capacity with EMS. We are adding 19 new ambulances by September in Calgary and Edmonton. We made a commitment of $64 million to do 20 over two years. We're accelerating that because we need to provide service for Albertans . . .

The Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, none of these folks can claim that the Premier's resignation is about change or renewable and then continue with these bad policies, as that answer demonstrates. Again and again, it's the entire team that has to go. Prove me wrong. Is there a single leadership candidate, amongst the 20 or 30 of you, who feels that children have been failed by this backwards curriculum, who doesn't want to mine the Rockies, who believes that standing up for a woman's reproductive rights is the Premier's job? Will they stand right now and say so, and if not, why should anyone in this province believe these guys can change?

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, it's a well-known fact that women's reproductive rights in this province are the same today as they were yesterday and as they will be tomorrow.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Health Care System Capacity

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, thanks to the UCP's war on health care, hospitals are partly closed today in Spirit River, Beaverlodge, Grande Prairie, McLennan, High Prairie, Wabasca, Whitecourt, Edson, Lac La Biche, St. Paul, Drayton Valley, Rimbey, Rocky Mountain House, Wainwright, Hardisty, Consort, Sundre, Three Hills, Hanna, and Bassano. Albertans are waiting longer than ever for an ambulance, and children and families are lining up down the street to get into emergency at our children's hospitals. Will this Premier agree that this crisis in health care, created by his government, has gone far beyond the impact of COVID-19?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises some serious issues, and I want to speak to them. But before I do that, I want to comment on their comments on the war on health care. Quite simply, that is not the fact. We are investing in health care. As indicated earlier, we're investing $1.8 billion over the next three years, the highest amount ever in health care in the history of this province, more than the investment by the previous government. We are hiring more health care professionals: AHS, 2,800 this year over next; nurses, 1,800 over the last two years; paramedics, 230; and even more. I'll talk about . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, this government went to war with health care workers, which is why tens of thousands of Albertans can't find a family doctor, leaving them nowhere to go but the emergency room if it's open. The Alberta Medical Association says that emergency medicine is now at a breaking point. Despite this crisis in health care the minister stands up once a week, tells Albertans that everything is fine, nothing to see here. Will this Premier commit to reporting this afternoon and every week on doctor departures and recruitment, ambulance wait times, and cancelled or diverted surgeries? If not, what is it that he has to hide from Albertans?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, we put an additional $1.8 billion in the system, the highest amount ever. I have indicated in this House that there is some strain on our health care system. We recognize that. But this is not unique to Alberta, and it's not unique to this particular time. There has been strain on our system at other times, particularly when we're dealing with influenza A. Right now we're dealing with challenges through COVID, influenza A, and a health care deficit. But here's the good news. We are coming on the downside of the sixth wave. We're going to see pressures released, and we're investing . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton–City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, this minister is so tone deaf that it is no wonder Alberta's front-line health care workers are exhausted thanks to him and his government. But despite that, this government decided to go ahead and fire a trusted and experienced leader in Dr. Verna Yiu, someone who actually earned the trust of Albertans by telling them the unvarnished truth at the height of COVID-19 about the state of our health care system. Albertans have yet to hear a word from this government's new interim CEO. Will this minister commit to bringing him to his briefing this afternoon so Albertans can hear directly from the new head of AHS about the crisis this government has created in our hospitals?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I fully appreciate that the system is under strain, but the other side has indicated that we've put the system in crisis. Those are simply not the facts. The facts are that we are investing in our health care capacity a huge amount of dollars, and we're investing in people in terms of our health care capacity. We are actually having results. The other side left us with a huge backlog of surgeries, and we are focused, through the Alberta surgical initiative, to get those wait times down. Cataracts, which is the first area of our focus: we have reduced that to the lowest median wait times it has been even under the previous government.

Postsecondary Education Funding

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, this government's attacks on postsecondary schools have been driving up tuition costs and literally driving students out of the province. Students are leaving at an alarming rate, students who would otherwise be starting families, businesses, buying houses, launching innovation, and helping to build our communities, but the UCP seems more concerned about balancing budgets on the backs of Albertans instead of planning for the future. What is this UCP government's message to the students that they have driven literally out of this province?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have increased investment in Advanced Education in Budget 2022. Our forecast for the current year was $5.250 billion, up $300 million for the current budget year. Moreover, we're investing $600 million in skills, talent, ensuring that every Albertan has the ability to participate in the new economy, the strongest economy in the nation.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, Jordan Dewever, a student who was directly impacted by this government's budget cuts to postsecondary, chose to attend another school in another province because tuition in this province was much higher and this government's actions caused the U of A rankings to go down. More and more students are being faced with this, directly contributing to the skills and labour shortages that we're seeing here in the province now, and it'll only get worse in the future without action immediately. Does this Premier understand the very weight of the terrible decisions he's made with the cuts to postsecondary? Does he understand how he is compromising all of our economic . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and on behalf of my colleague I know that in Budget 2022: $235 million in new funding over three years to Advanced Education, which included $171 million over three years to create 10,000 new spaces at our universities, colleges, and polytechnics. Alberta remains below the national average for tuition costs. According to Stats Canada the average undergraduate tuition is $6,567; the national average, $6,693, so still below.

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, this UCP government must be held accountable for the damage that they have inflicted on postsecondary. We have not seen the level of 18- to 25-year-olds leaving this province since the 1980s. I have prepared a bill, coming out this afternoon, that will make sure that the UCP wears the long-term impacts of cuts to postsecondary, to our economy, and to our society. Will someone in that UCP government agree to sit down to discuss this bill we're bringing forward this afternoon and commit to a full study of the economic impacts of the devastating cuts to postsecondary being made by this UCP government?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the member opposite is bringing forward a bill, but how hypocritical of the member opposite when they imposed the biggest tax hike in all of Alberta with the carbon tax, not to mention all of the other things that they put in place.

Mr. Speaker, we are doing tangible things to in fact increase postsecondary: $171 million to create 10,000 new spaces, $12 million to support existing scholarships, $15 million to create new bursaries for low-income students, $8 million to create new microcredential courses, $6 million to create more internship opportunities, and so on.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray–Wood Buffalo.

Emergency Medical Service Response Times

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government has heard the concerns of Albertans with regard to the increased pressures being placed on emergency medical services. The party opposite continues to say that we're doing nothing to address the pressures on EMS. Budget 2022, however, included a $64 million increase to the EMS budget for AHS. In typical fashion, the opposition is once again attempting to mislead Albertans. That money should be making its way into the system, so it's a simple question. Are we taking action to address the pressures on EMS or not?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. We absolutely are taking action. The dollars are real, and our commitment is real, and the claims to the contrary are simply false. I announced just this morning that AHS is using the dollars in Budget '22 to put 19 new ambulances and five support vehicles on the streets by the end of September. That includes five new ambulances in Edmonton and four in Calgary by the end of June and five more each in both cities by the end of September. To do it, they've created a hundred new permanent positions and extended 70 temporary positions. Tomorrow we'll be hearing more about the steps to address pressures . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for the reply. So it is a given that the claim that this government is not taking action in regard to EMS is false, plain and simple. But the opposition also claims that this government is somehow causing the pressure in the first place. I don't think there's any argument that the system is under some real pressure, but the question is: why? Why are we seeing so many patients flooding into EMS and emergency systems overall?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. The pressure on the system is real, but the claim that any one government is causing it just ignores the reality. COVID-19 is impacting every province and other countries. In England, for example, they're dealing with long EMS response times for the same reasons that we are: a surge in calls starting last summer and pressure on the hospitals that delays transfers into emergency. A big factor is care that was deferred earlier in the pandemic. In 2021 emergency visits dropped by a quarter across the province. We'd never seen anything like it. On top of COVID, a late flu season and other factors are driving demand. We're responding by increasing capacity.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister again for the reply. It is a given that the increase in call volume that is affecting emergency medical services was not caused by government policy, obviously, and our government is taking action to address this. But what about the system overall? EMS can't manage the situation on its own. What are we doing to resource the whole, entire health system to support EMS and the patients who rely on prehospital care?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, the member is right. Response times are too long, and we need to get them back down within our targets. EMS can't fix all that on their own. We need to add capacity to the whole system, and that's exactly what we're doing. There are 800 more staff in emergency than in 2018, under the previous government; 1,800 more RNs in AHS in total; 230 more paramedics than just two years ago, before the new crews hit the streets; 1,500 new continuing care spaces opening this year. All of this is supported by a budget that is $600 million higher this year than last year, higher than ever before, and a total increase of $1.8 billion over the next three years.

Education Funding

Ms Hoffman: The current UCP government is sabotaging public education, and they're failing to fund growing school divisions and provide them with the necessary supports for disabled students, infrastructure, and staff. The Calgary board of education is dealing with the UCP's cuts to funding, and their funding cut means that five-year-olds with speech and language delays are getting more than a million dollars less from this government. Why is the current government cutting kindergarten children's speech support in our largest school district when kids need more support, not less? When the minister puts her pin on in the morning, is she thinking that children are the first to face her cuts? Because they are.

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. We added $700 million over the next three years to increase funding overall. I've got an $8.4 billion budget, of which $1.4 billion goes to support special-needs children and all the other supports for those most vulnerable within our education system. School divisions have authority. They get 98 per cent of the funding. They oversee their budgets, and they are making those decisions.

Ms Hoffman: Given that the minister should read her budget or at least the Calgary Herald and given that the CBE will have 1,500 more students in September but their budget is going to be less and given that grants to infrastructure maintenance and renewal were also hard hit by the UCP, with a 40 per cent slash to overall funding for this area for the CBE – the end result: they're laying off staff – and given that the UCP is so focused on each of their own individual jobs, will they at least apologize to all the people being laid off in Calgary because of this government's cruel cuts?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, I wish the member opposite would have spent the six hours that we had in estimates actually reading my budget, the Education budget, and understanding it, because there are more dollars allocated than there ever have been before. In fact, even though we only have 716,000 students, bums in seats, we're actually funding 730,000 students. We have been because we have been holding them harmless. Every school authority knows this, and they have appreciated it.

Ms Hoffman: Given that the strain of growing enrolment has Edmonton public also projecting a funding shortfall for 1,700 students and given that the Ross Shep school council was told by the Education minister that more funding would be provided to Edmonton public in the future, why did the Education minister tell the Ross Shep school council that there would be more funding for Edmonton public in the future when the minister clearly failed to deliver on those 1,700 unfunded students? Will the Education minister apologize for failing to support Edmonton staff, students, and families and families all across this province?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, again, the member opposite does not do her homework. It is unfortunate, because the member opposite, if she did her homework, would know that in 2020 the Edmonton public school division projected 4,700 more students than they actually had in their classrooms. We funded those 4,700 students because we were holding harmless. In 2021 they had 2,000 students fewer than they actually projected, which we funded. We continue to fund more students than they actually have.

Natural Gas Rebate Timeline

Ms Ganley: It has been over a hundred days since the UCP promised Albertans a natural gas rebate, a hundred days of Albertans struggling to pay their bills.

An Hon. Member: What's the price of natural gas?

Ms Ganley: Today the price of natural gas is above $9. That's more than $2.50 above where the natural gas rebate is supposed to kick in. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Ms Ganley: But Albertans will have to wait until at least October to see any relief. This UCP government has waffled back and forth on whether Albertans can expect relief earlier. Once and for all, can the associate minister tell Albertans when these rebates will kick in?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we're going to help people at the pumps. We're going to help people with their home heating and electricity. We are listening to Albertans. But we also want to make sure we focus on helping people with affordability by making sure that they have jobs. Right now the unemployment rate is 5.9 per cent. Now, why is that number relevant? That number is the exact same as before the NDP chased away jobs, thousands of jobs, and told people to go get a job in British Columbia. Never the NDP. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Ms Ganley: Given that the UCP promised electricity rebates for January through March but have completely failed to deliver so far and given that Albertans are, right this very minute, choosing between paying their utilities and buying groceries – they have no patience left for this incompetent government – and given that Albertans have a right to expect their natural gas rebates in a timely fashion, can the associate minister commit to this House that Albertans will see rebates for October in the month of October?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Let's talk about electricity markets. Let's talk about why costs are so high. It's the members opposite when they were in government. They brought in the carbon tax. [interjections]

The Speaker: Oh, my goodness. All I can hear is the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, they brought in the carbon tax, increasing the cost of utilities. They prematurely went from coal to gas, costing Albertans 1.3 ... [interjections]

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: They prematurely transferred ...

Mr. Feehan: The biggest failure ...

The Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford will come to order.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, the members opposite cost Albertans $1.3 billion by prematurely going to gas from coal. On top of that, they added $7.5 billion of transmission costs that all Albertans are paying for.

Ms Ganley: Given that this UCP government has plenty of promises but absolutely zero follow-through and owes Albertans some transparency in terms of these rebates – and we've written to the Auditor General for just that – and given that Albertans are still waiting for their electricity rebates from January, one more time. The price of natural gas is above $6.50. Can Albertans expect to see a rebate in their hands in October? Yes or no?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, everyone in this Chamber knows that the NDP did everything that they could to stonewall passing legislation to provide assistance to people in their homes. Let's not forget every single cost that the NDP put onto Albertans. But right now there's hope for Alberta. Right now Alberta is back on the economy. Canadians are moving here in numbers we haven't seen in decades. After the NDP chased away people, chased away opportunities, there's hope now for the future of Alberta. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Loewen: Our big tent is like a big family. We haven't always gotten along. A good patriarch needs to provide a table where we can all come together, hash things out, and make sure every member feels respected and heard. Alberta's next Premier will need to refocus this government on the things that build trust, consensus, and unite Albertans. It's time to focus on some of the good work ministers have delivered. The Minister of Transportation has focused on enhancing traffic safety and has provided timely responses to my office's inquiries. Can the minister tell us about her transportation plans going forward?

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you to the member for that question. Mr. Speaker, we have worked hard to ensure Alberta's highway network is as safe as it can be for the travelling public. Alberta's government recently passed Bill 5, which provides protections for all roadside workers. We heard Albertans loud and clear when they told us to get rid of speed traps and fishing holes. We did just that. We are holding municipalities accountable for their use of photoradar, ensuring it's not a cash cow. Our recent budget invests $30 million to help fill a shortage of commercial drivers, including supports for women.

Mr. Loewen: Given that in this modern world Albertans are concerned about connectivity and given that from the ability to stay in their local community while attending online classes to the wave of online business opportunities and to simply be able to take a hands-free call on highway 43 without the risk of it dropping, providing rural Internet is one of the most important things for this government to accomplish to unite Albertans, to the Minister of Service Alberta: during your travels around the province consulting Albertans, what did they tell you about their need to be connected?

Mr. Glubish: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm really pleased to inform this House and remind this House of Alberta's historic $390 million commitment that we announced as a part of Budget 2022. It is a part of Alberta's broadband strategy to ensure that every single Albertan and Alberta business will have access to high-speed, reliable Internet over the next five to six years. We also have been able to track $390 million of matching funding from the federal government to go dollar for dollar for every single dollar that we'll be putting to work. I'm especially excited to say that in the very, very near future we'll be announcing the first tranche of projects in collaboration between the Alberta government and the Canadian government. Stay tuned.

Mr. Loewen: Given that every time we eat a meal in Alberta, we need to thank our farmers and given the difficult years we've had from drought to flooding, prairie fires to hail, from increased input cost due to inflation to the reduced availability of goods to declining bee populations and the inflexible federal regulations preventing us from importing replacement hives, to the minister of agriculture. Albertans must unite behind our agriculture sector as they fight to put food on our tables. Can you tell us about your work to support this economy?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. That member has always been a great advocate for the beekeeping industry. Historic drought from last year. We're very proud of the $360 million AgriRecovery program that was rolled out not only for livestock producers but also for beekeepers. We continue to work with the federal government and, through them, CFIA. We've asked them for an updated risk assessment rating for the importation of northern California bees into the province. That industry has been rather decimated as of late. They're looking at bringing in bees from Italy. We're looking at all sources and continuing to work on the BRM suite.

Heritage Funding

Ms Goehring: Mr. Speaker, throughout the term of the UCP government we have seen cuts across all ministries, including cuts to the very heart of who we are as Albertans. Since the UCP took office, cultural industries have taken a hit, particularly in the area of preservation of our history. In this area, funds available to heritage have decreased by 27 per cent. Despite a change in the minister for this portfolio there has been no change in direction, putting preservation of our history at risk. Can the Minister of Culture please tell this Assembly which parts of our history are disposable?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Culture.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A great opportunity for me to really affirm those many organizations and institutions in our province that preserve our history and our heritage. I've been working with many of them. Quite frankly, the work they do is amazing, and we will continue to support them.

Ms Goehring: Given that one of the sites bearing the brunt of this government's budget cuts was the Ukrainian cultural centre heritage village, which reported having to cut its hours of operation because of the UCP cuts, and given that Ukraine has been invaded by Russia and that promoting our Ukrainian culture in Alberta is more important than ever – if nothing else, it demonstrates support to the community – can the minister commit that the next time he visits Ukrainian Village, he'll bring along an apology and a commitment to actually fund this vital cultural site?

Mr. Orr: Mr. Speaker, you know, this government's position is to work co-operatively with all of our different cultural groups in this province. We gave $11.35 million to the Ukraine aid with regard to the war, additional money for them to bring in and support immigrants to Alberta. The fact that they just want to politicize it and turn it into an angry yelling thing is ridiculous. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Ms Goehring: Given that the lack of provincial oversight and reduction in funding for historical resources means many of these rural sites are now at risk and that once they are gone, they will be gone forever and that the loss of historical sites and resources has negative impacts on local economies and tourism and given that just one year of the $30 million war room would have ensured stable funding for heritage sites, is this government really going to continue trying to create a fight with Bigfoot when it could be focused on supporting and promoting Alberta's diversity and rich cultural communities?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, of course we want to promote Alberta's culture, and this government is doing that, but we also want to promote and defend our largest industry and our largest employer. This government will never apologize to the NDP for standing up for the oil and gas industry. Unfortunately, when they were in government, they sold out our birthright to the Justin Trudeau Liberals in Ottawa. We will not do that; we will stand proudly with our largest industry and make sure that Alberta continues to lead the way in this country and world-wide on being the best energy provider anywhere on the planet.

Post-COVID Long-term Health Effects

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, the COVID-19 pandemic has been hard on so many Albertans, with over 4,000 having lost their lives to this deadly disease and hundreds of thousands being infected and getting sick. Alberta needs their health care system to be there for those who are sick and recovering and those who are still sick, but it's been estimated that between 5 and 30 per cent of people infected with COVID-19 could develop long COVID symptoms for years to come. That means potentially tens of thousands of Albertans who need support to fully recover from this pandemic. So what is this government doing, in the midst of the crisis it created, to support those who are dealing with long COVID?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Long COVID is an issue. We understand that. It can take many different forms. My department is undertaking a study on long COVID to better understand the effects of the pandemic on Albertans' physical and psychological health. We also offer supports both through Calgary and Edmonton sites and online, virtually, to be able to deal with long COVID. We understand it's an issue. We're investing in it, and we're going to support the health of Albertans.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that this government was reluctant initially to even acknowledge the existence of long-haul COVID and the impact it put on those afflicted with it and given that AHS estimates that 1 in 5 Albertans who were infected with COVID-19 could go on to have long COVID, which includes serious symptoms like brain fog, heart palpitations, sleep disturbances, and more, and given that there are currently only a handful of locations that provide care for long-haul COVID patients in Alberta, what specifically is the Health minister doing to ensure that everyone in Alberta, rural areas, all communities that are impacted by long-haul COVID can be treated promptly?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, while more research needs to be done to understand the extent and the impact of long COVID symptoms, our government and Alberta Health Services have tools and supports in place for affected Albertans. There are four specialized referral clinics for long COVID in Alberta, and AHS is establishing further supports, including physical therapy and occupational therapy. AHS has also established a post-COVID task force that has developed a number of resources to support health care providers when assessing patient symptoms for long COVID and determining their rehabilitation supports that they need to be able to address this issue.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that this government has continually put our health care system under severe stress with their best summer ever, their privatization agenda, their war with doctors, and so much more and given that, despite the boasts of the Premier, many Albertans, including rural Albertans, are losing access to primary care and family doctors and given that we're seeing huge pressures on our emergency rooms and hospitals and given that this creates a worry about people not being able to have their serious long-haul COVID diagnosed and treated, can the minister tell this House what advice he has for the potentially tens of thousands of Albertans impacted by long COVID who don't have access to a family doctor, can't get into a hospital? What does he suggest they do?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as previously indicated, we understand that this is an issue. We have four clinics. Also, we're looking to provide supports to health care practitioners across the province to be able to provide supports to Albertans. We are also making significant investments and expanding the capacity in our health care system, particularly in rural Alberta. Budget 2022 included $90 million to support rural health care and family physicians. That includes the rural, remote, northern program; rural medical education; the clerkship program; the health professions action plan; the locum program; and the rural physician on-call program.

Federal-provincial Relations and Constitutional Reform

Mr. Jean: Mr. Speaker, last October a very clear majority of Albertans endorsed the equalization referendum. A few weeks later MLAs passed the required constitutional resolution to give force to that referendum. Indeed, the 62 per cent yes vote is as good a result as any government ever received in Alberta. Albertans obviously want something done about equalization. Can the government tell Albertans if the Prime Minister and other Premiers have been informed that Albertans want constitutional negotiations on equalization to begin?

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Premier and other Premiers are meeting this week, and this will be one of the things that our Premier will raise to continue the fight with Ottawa. But that is only one of the paths that we have to be able to fight to defend our province. We cannot depend on Ottawa to protect the future of Alberta. I, for example, just returned from Washington – we'll be back there in a few weeks – where we're working with our own diplomatic corps to advance the interests of this province. There are several ways that we can continue to fight back, including just recently winning on Bill C-69 in the Alberta Court of Appeal.

Mr. Jean: That's right, Mr. Speaker. This government has done some good work on promoting Alberta's energy industry in the U.S.

But given that the most important thing we can do to help our energy industry is to get constitutional fairness in Canada – as the Premier has admitted, Canada is broken: equalization, perpetual underrepresentation in Parliament, and laws that are designed only to hurt Alberta. Constitutional negotiations can fix all of this. Will this government show that it understands the anger of 62 per cent of Albertans and demand that the rest of Canada join us in constitutional negotiations?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, this government has been building a coalition all across Canada to defend our constitutional rights. Alberta has been a leader in that in the last several years and will continue to be. Again, I want to reiterate that it's a great show of leadership by our province to stand up to Bill C-69, the no-more-pipelines law. While the NDP wanted to support their close ally Justin Trudeau and shut down the birthright of Alberta, we went to the Court of Appeal and won, and it has been made clear that Ottawa can go home and Alberta will set the course for our future.

Mr. Jean: Constitutional change is never easy, but it also isn't impossible. Given that once negotiations start, other provinces would also want to make constitutional changes – COVID has shown that across Canada health systems are broken. Many provinces will not be able to afford to fix them because they can't print money like the feds can. Since there is good reason to believe that constitutional talks can lead to improvements to Canada, why won't we act on the strong mandate Albertans gave us in the equalization referendum and demand constitutional negotiations immediately?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes. The Premier is meeting with his counterparts tomorrow in Regina, bringing up these exact issues. There is much work to do, but we've made some progress. On fiscal stabilization the cap has been lifted from $60 to $170, meaning an additional $500 million for Alberta every year that program triggers. But the cap needs to be removed, and we will continue to advocate with our counterparts across the country for fairness in the federation.

The Speaker: I might just remind the hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche that I appreciate it may be your first question since you've returned to the House, but questions after 4 ought not to be delivered with the use of a preamble, and I think the House would agree that that was a perfect example of a preamble.

Emergency Medical Service Response Times

Mr. Nielsen: This government is unwilling to take responsibility for the crisis they've created in the health care system. For months we've heard stories and reports of EMS workers at the point of burnout because of the pressures they've been under for years, made worse by this government's attack on front-line workers. Albertans are rightly concerned about how long it will take an ambulance to arrive. Real concerns and a real crisis deserve more than the minister's empty talking points. Can the minister explain what he considers to be an acceptable wait time for an ambulance? Ten minutes? An hour? What if it never comes?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. We are taking real action to be able to address the increase, the 30 per cent increase, in call volumes that we've had since last August. This issue has not only affected our province, but it has affected provinces across the entire country. We are taking real action. This morning I was able to announce that we're creating a hundred new emergency medical service positions and extending 70 temporary positions, which will put 19 ambulances on the street in Calgary and in Edmonton by September. This is a commitment that we made as part of Budget 2022, an additional $64 million to be able to build capacity within our EMS system.

Mr. Nielsen: All that and you still have 60 ACP positions not ready for this weekend.

Given that this government's so-called solutions are designed to kick the ball down the road rather than actually address the crisis the government created and given that the Minister of Health shamefully attempted to downplay the parking lot medicine that occurred under his watch rather than immediately acting to ensure that such a thing never happens again in Alberta and given that this government has had three years to ensure that world-class EMTs and paramedics have the support they deserve, does the minister regret the failures of the Premier and the previous Health minister that have led us to this point?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, that's simply absurd. We are investing in our EMS system. We have added 230 more paramedic positions over the last two years in addition to the 170 we just talked about recently. We have put more vans on the street. We know that there are challenges with the entire system. That's why under my ministry we appointed an advisory council. This council not only includes AH and AHS, but it includes unions. It includes representatives of the private sector and the public sector and not-for-profits to actually solve the problems. I'm looking forward to their . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Nielsen: Given that all front-line health care workers like paramedics went above and beyond during the pandemic and given that for all front-line workers this government sought to fight with them rather than support them and is even now seeking to cut the pay of advanced care paramedics and given that this is an insult and a sign that this government's word can't be trusted, will the minister rise in his seat and tell the Finance minister that now is the worst time to cut the pay of paramedics? If he won't, is it because he's hoping to keep his job in the next UCP cabinet?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank all health care workers for stepping up during COVID and during these very challenging times. Our government is not only investing in expanding capacity in health care; it's investing in people. I was very pleased that AHS and UNA have been able to reach an agreement. I look forward to the ongoing negotiations that are going on between AHS and HSAA, and I'm optimistic that they'll be able to get a settlement. We are investing in our people. We are adding positions, 2,800 additional positions, in AHS. We are putting money where our mouth is with an additional $1.8 billion over the next three years.

Disability Service Provider Funding

Ms Phillips: For months we on this side of the House have been raising the concerns from Albertans about the impact of cost-of-living increases. Disability service workers are already struggling with the impact of inflation, and now the agencies they work for are being hammered with insurance costs and higher utility bills. Many agencies fear that they may have to reduce services. These are financial problems with a financial solution, so I'm asking the Minister of Finance to commit to two things: meet with the disability service workers association and take a proposal to Treasury Board for an upward adjustment to agency contracts to reflect inflation pressure on wages and the skyrocketing cost of utilities and insurance.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, through you, to the Member for Lethbridge-West for raising this important issue. I believe that everybody in this House is concerned about the most vulnerable in this province because Albertans are concerned with the most vulnerable. We will follow up on that specific advice, but we've also included increases in Budget 2022: a $40 million increase for those on AISH, a 5 per cent increase for the disability services line in Budget 2022. We are committed to ensuring that the most vulnerable are protected in this province.

Ms Phillips: Well, given that during this pandemic disability service workers went above and beyond in an incredibly difficult situation and given that at a time when we should be lifting burdens from the front lines, who stepped up so much during the pandemic, this government is doubling down on adding costs and making it harder and harder for Albertans with disabilities to get the services they need – the Minister of Finance has a budget surplus due to the price of oil – will the minister make a commitment today to adjust agency contracts for utilities, insurance, and labour costs and meet with the disability services workers to communicate with them on this?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, hon. member, for this question. Supporting the workers in the disability sector is important for us, and our office has worked with the Alberta Council of Disability Services. We're fully aware of some of the challenges that the workers are facing. We're working on a comprehensive strategy. We're looking at the credentials. We're looking at the training opportunities. We're also looking at any other ways that we can help to raise the bar and the standard for that sector there.

Ms Phillips: Well, given that this is a moral issue and also a financial issue and given that the Community and Social Services minister's awareness is not quite cutting it and given that it is Treasury Board that makes these decisions and the Minister of Finance is also the President of Treasury Board, will the Minister of Finance commit to a one-time upward adjustment to agency contracts for utilities and insurance and a cost-of-living escalator for the wages of front-line disability services workers, and will he personally meet with Sue Manery, director of the disability service workers association, to discuss the pressures faced by the agencies and those who provide critical caring work to people with disabilities?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, I appreciate the member opposite raising this issue. In Budget 2022 we've included a 5 per cent increase in our disability services line. We've included an increase for those that are on AISH. We recognize that there are real affordability challenges for Albertans today. That's why we brought in an electricity rebate, that's why we brought in the natural gas price protection mechanism, and that's why we've suspended the fuel tax. I'm confident that my colleague the Minister of Community and Social Services will deal with the specifics of this issue competently.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Kindergarten to Grade 6 Draft Social Studies Curriculum

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A strong, well-rounded education is paramount to setting up children for success. Math, grammar, and science prepare children and inspire them to create a better world while social studies ensures that children are taught valuable history and provides exposure to new cultures that ultimately broaden their perspectives. To the Minister of Education: can you provide an update on the development of the new social studies curriculum? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member. He's absolutely correct. A strong, well-rounded education helps set our children up for success. That's why we have spent the last year listening to feedback from all Albertans on the draft K to 6 curriculum. After hearing about some of the concerns that there were around age appropriateness, content load, First Nations, Métis, and Inuit content as well as cultural and religious content, we released a new draft social studies design blueprint, which lays out a plan for future content changes. We are listening, and we're continuing to make changes.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that social studies can teach children about Canadian multiculturalism and given that a strong social studies curriculum would assist Albertans in upholding multicultural values and given that there are numerous cultures within Alberta to learn about, to the Minister of Education: can you tell Albertans about some of the cultures and religions that will be included in the updated social studies curriculum?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have heard plenty of feedback from Albertans on the inclusion of culture and religion in the draft K to 6 curriculum, and we have made changes based on that very good feedback. As I said before, every student will see themselves reflected in Alberta's new curriculum. When we eventually release a revised draft of social studies, there will be opportunities for teachers and students and others to explore a multitude of cultures and religions, and it will allow flexibility for classrooms to explore the diversity of all students.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that there will be multiculturalism taught in the new social studies curriculum and given that there is a growing population of Hindu Albertans, who have a vibrant culture that deserves to be taught in schools, and given that I strongly support including the teaching of the Hindu religion and Indian civilization in the curriculum, can the Minister of Education update Albertans on the status of the Hindu religion and Indian civilization being included within the social studies curriculum?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member. Like I said, the draft K to 6 social studies curriculum is currently in the draft design blueprint stage. I was honoured to meet with representatives from Alberta's Hindu community several times, and I'm proud to say that their feedback is being looked at and incorporated into the work that we're doing on the blueprint and into the curriculum as well. We want to make sure that the students leave school with a deep appreciation for the rich multicultural fabric of our province and how this diversity has helped shape Alberta into what it is today. We are so blessed in Alberta to have so many ethnic groups here, and we are so proud to have them in . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order, members. Prior to departing, if my eyes don't deceive me, I believe the former Minister of Energy and Member for Drayton Valley-Devon, Diana McQueen, has snuck into the gallery. I hope you'll join me in welcoming her.

Hon. members, in 30 seconds or less we will continue to the remainder of the daily Routine.

Tourism

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to rise today and acknowledge Tourism Week, which is happening all across Canada from May 29 to June 4. As the parliamentary secretary for small business and tourism and one of the MLAs representing our mountain parks and the MLA representing the most beautiful constituency in the province, I've had the privilege of connecting with many outstanding tourism operators throughout the province. The tourism industry is a crucial economic driver for many communities in every corner of our province. In 2019 the Alberta tourism industry contributed $8.4 billion to the province's GDP.

While we know the last couple of years have been difficult for the tourism industry, tourism operators are resilient. In fact, we are currently only second to B.C. in tourism recovery in Canada, and like the rest of the economy, tourism is still on the rebound. Total tourism spending is expected to return to prepandemic levels in the next couple of years. With the help of this government we will ensure that that happens. We've expanded Travel Alberta's mandate to a destination management organization and increased its budget by $63 million over three years. We're investing $3.75 million in new Indigenous tourism experiences to change perspectives and preserve culture, language, and traditions. We also continue to reduce red tape and regulatory barriers to foster growth in the tourism industry.

The growth of the tourism industry will be felt all across this province, from small rural communities to our big cities and everything in between. The future is bright for this industry, and we continue to hear all the time of new investments from the private sector to enhance Alberta's visitor economy. With the border restrictions decreasing and the beautiful weather upon us, many Albertans, Canadians, and international tourists will be visiting and taking advantage of the many sites Alberta has to offer. I encourage all people to visit and support our excellent tourism operators.

As we celebrate Tourism Week, I'd like to acknowledge the contributions of the tourism industry and everyone involved in our visitor economy to Alberta's economy, culture, and social well-being.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat has a statement.

Health Care System Capacity

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Across this province Albertans are recovering from a tumultuous two years of a pandemic that wreaked havoc on our communities and families and left the health care system overwhelmed and vital health care workers exhausted.

As the MLA for Brooks-Medicine Hat I have watched as physicians, nurses, respiratory therapists, surgeons, and others worked around the clock to help those who need it most. Our health care system has been pushed to its limits, and because of a glaring lack of capacity in our system we see a dire need for reform, modernization, and transformational change.

Through historic investments in health care and capacity building, Alberta's United Conservative government is doing the work to ensure that Albertans have the care that they deserve. We need to look for more solutions, and we need to continue to build capacity. I was proud to stand with the Minister of Advanced Education in Lethbridge as he announced new dollars for Medicine Hat College so that they can train and educate more hugely needed health care aides. Another solution is to invest in infrastructure in the services that rural Albertans rely on, and this is why I was proud to stand with the Premier and the Minister of Health as we announced sustainable, predictable funding for HALO air ambulance, an essential service that was woefully ignored by previous governments.

While these are great steps to address health care challenges that are facing my constituency, there is still so much more that can be done. I know this because the constituents in Brooks-Medicine Hat have come to me with solutions every day. Mr. Speaker, no matter where you live – urban, rural, north, south, or somewhere in between – you should have access to timely, quality health care when you need it. The time for transformational change is now. We cannot continue to do things a certain way because that is the way that they have always been done. We need to look for long-lasting, meaningful solutions.

I look forward to welcoming the Minister of Health to Brooks-Medicine Hat this summer as he tours the province, consulting with rural Albertans and those who are on the front lines and know their communities best. Local decision-makers know best what their communities need, and I am grateful that the minister is planning to come down to Brooks-Medicine Hat to learn straight from them.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to present the Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future's final report in relation to its review of the Lobbyists Act pursuant to Government Motion 86, agreed to by the Assembly on June 15, 2021. I would like to thank all of those who made presentations and made written submissions to the committee as we conducted our review. The report will also be posted shortly on the committee's internal website.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Bill 208 Post-Secondary Funding Assessment Act

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise and request leave to introduce a bill: Bill 208, the Post-Secondary Funding Assessment Act.

Yes. This bill would require the Minister of Advanced Education to conduct an economic impact analysis and publish the results in the Legislature whenever operating support for postsecondary decreases by more than 2 per cent so that Albertans may understand all of the effects of these choices. The UCP has cut more than $690 million from our postsecondary system, and young people are leaving the province at record rates. This is a necessary bill to allow Albertans to understand the long-term impacts of cuts to postsecondary, to our economy, and to our society in general. I hope that all members of this House will support this important effort by supporting Bill 208.

[Motion carried; Bill 208 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

Mr. Rutherford: Mr. Speaker, in accordance with section 20(1) of the Auditor General Act it is my pleasure as chair of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices to table the following reports from the office of the Auditor General. One, Alberta Indigenous Relations, Alberta Labour and Immigration: Indigenous Economic Participation; and First Nations and Metis Leaders' Insights.

Two, Alberta Community and Social Services: Family Support for Children with Disabilities.

Three, Assessment of Implementation Reports: Alberta Health Services, Travel Alberta; AHS Controls over Expense Claims, Purchasing Card Transactions and Other Travel Expenses; and Travel Alberta: Managing the Risks of Cloud Computing.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

The Speaker: I see the Member for Central Peace-Notley has risen. I'm not sure as we haven't called an order of business. Do you have something to say?

Mr. Loewen: Yeah. I'd like to request that Standing Order 8(2) be waived and that the Assembly revert to Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders pursuant to Standing Order 8(1) to resume consideration of Bill 202. This precedent was set earlier today with a private member's bill. This morning the Legislature shut down an hour early, so there's obviously plenty of time to pass Bill 202 also.

Thank you.

The Speaker: For clarity's sake, this is a request for unanimous consent to do aside with those standing orders as mentioned?

Mr. Loewen: Yes.

[Unanimous consent denied]

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 21

Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to move third reading of Bill 21, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

This bill is our sixth red tape reduction bill so far and moves our province one step closer to reaching our goal of cutting red tape by one-third. It makes common-sense changes that will save Albertans and Alberta businesses time and money by digitizing forms, streamlining reporting requirements, and making it easier to do business across the province, and it takes our province one step closer to cutting red tape by one-third.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

For instance, we've made changes to the Animal Health Act, which will give the government flexibility to respond to large events such as the avian flu, which is currently impacting poultry producers in our province. As it stands, it is legislated that notifiable diseases be reported to the Chief Provincial Veterinarian within 24 hours, and it must be reported by phone, in person, or by fax. To be clear, we are not removing the requirement for reportable and notifiable diseases to be reported. Within regulation it is currently required, and that is not changing. The changes we are proposing will allow the minister to adjust the 24-hour requirement based on certain circumstances. For instance, if there is a rapidly spreading disease amongst livestock in the province, the minister could shorten that timeline to better control or monitor the spread.

We are also allowing producers across the province to report notifiable diseases more easily, which is a key pillar of our red tape reduction strategy. By allowing producers to use modern methods of reporting, like e-mail, we're helping to save them time while strengthening the channels of communication, which is vital as we take action in preventing the spread of disease.

These are common-sense changes that support producers in our province, yet the members opposite try to politicize it. The changes to the Animal Health Act will strengthen our ability to respond to extraordinary circumstances in a timely manner, which is to the benefit of producers and their livestock.

Bill 21 also takes steps to ensure uninterrupted services for rural Albertans. The proposed changes in this bill will allow rural electrification associations, or REAs, to purchase one another. The move to allow REAs to purchase one another is based on feedback gathered during stakeholder engagement sessions in spring 2021. Electricity-sector stakeholders participated in the engagement, and our reforms are focused on that sector for the time being. In fact, Dan Astner, the president of the Alberta Federation of REAs Ltd., said:

We are encouraged by the proposed changes that will support REAs and increase the likelihood of ongoing sustainability. Rural Electrification Associations played a significant historical role in powering rural Alberta; we appreciate innovative industry opportunities that they may continue to play a beneficial role in a dynamic rural Alberta economy.

This is a change that REAs have been asking for for years, and we are proud that we were able to bring it forward and support rural Albertans.

But we didn't stop there. The proposed amendments would also enable rural utility associations to deliver other services such as providing fibre-optic services if allowed in regulation. The changes would support the long-term sustainability of rural utility associations, benefiting rural residents and businesses who depend on them for services, and facilitate rural economic development and diversification.

Now I will address changes to the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act. The amendments being brought forward in this bill are focused on renewals, not new licences. The option to provide a longer term licence renewal will be based on the track record of the facility or foster parent. If they are consistently maintaining the high safety standards, there is an option to provide them with a licence renewal of up to three years. These changes would help staff spend less time processing annual licence renewals from facilities in good standing, would continue to fully comply with the terms of their licence and more time working with facilities who may need more help, resulting in increased safety for children in care.

After the renewal Children's Services staff will use existing practices of engaging with facility owners to ensure they continue to meet the required standard of care. For foster care providers this includes meeting with the caregiver in the home at least every three months, completing an annual evaluation, including an environmental safety check, and conducting a reassessment of the home if the foster family encounters a significant life event that may impact its continued ability to provide care.

For child and youth facilities this includes conducting annual site visits, completing the environmental safety check, and regularly reviewing the facility provider file for any signs of concerns and to ensure facility documentation is up to date. As the Minister of Children's Services has stated in this House time and time again, our government is committed to the safety of children in our care.

We've also proposed some changes to the Education Act by eliminating one very specific additional schedule that independent schools currently submit, specific to tuition. As clarified numerous times, Bill 21 does not remove the requirement for independent schools to report information related to private sources of revenue, including tuition, to Alberta Education. This will continue to be required as part of the audited financial statements they provide annually and is in addition to a new requirement for them to publicly disclose financial statements to parents by either posting those online or by sharing them with parents directly, which means these schools will now be more accountable to the parents who choose to pay tuition.

Bill 21 also makes amendments to the Provincial Parks Act and Public Lands Act, which will result in more flexibility when managing our provincial parks and public lands while maintaining standards and protecting the environment. Despite what has been said by the members opposite, there will continue to be public stakeholder and Indigenous engagement on regulations, directives, rules, codes, and standards as required. These changes are limited to setting technical, operational, or administrative requirements and guidelines.

We are also making changes to the Pharmacy and Drug Act to give the Alberta College of Pharmacy the flexibility in its oversight of pharmacies which will allow for a more pointed response to changes in the health care environment such as natural disasters, pandemics, or drug shortages. Given the many obstacles we faced in the last two years due to the pandemic, the changes prepare our health care system for the future, ensuring Albertans continue to have access to the services they require.

Now, one part of Bill 21 that I'm particularly excited about and that I'm sure municipalities and businesses across the province are excited about are the changes to the Municipal Government Act. These amendments could be a game changer for mobile businesses across the province. Right now businesses are required to get a business licence for each jurisdiction they operate in, costing them time and money. However, the proposed amendments will allow municipalities to work together to only require one licence for multiple jurisdictions. This would be a significant change for businesses like food trucks, photographers, mobile pet groomers, and many others who take their business on the road. Paul McLaughlin, the president of the Rural Municipalities of Alberta, said:

Supporting a healthy business community is a priority for municipalities in local and regional economic development efforts. Reducing red tape and barriers to utilizing intermunicipal business licences and other regional approaches to economic development is an important step in allowing municipalities to play a larger role in growing their local and regional economies.

While some of the members opposite can't face it, cutting red tape makes a tangible difference for Albertans and Alberta businesses, and this is a great example of how we can get government out of the way and support our province's economic recovery.

We're also making other simple, common-sense changes that will make life easier for Albertans. For example, we've made changes to the Residential Tenancies Act that will allow Albertans to receive their security deposits back via e-transfer. Prior to this proposed change Albertans had to either get their security deposit back in person or by a cheque in the mail. I don't know about you, Mr. Speaker, but I think most Albertans have, for the most part, limited their use of cheques and handling cash. Almost everything we do now can be done online, so giving tenants and landlords the ability to streamline this process and use modern technology is a win-win.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one aspect of Bill 21 that is important to all Albertans is the change to the Local Authorities Election Act. These amendments take important steps to protect the private information of Albertans who choose to run for office and their donors. As it stands, there is no legal obligation for a municipality to redact private information such as home address or phone number. While it's common practice to redact this information, these changes are ensuring that it must be done while still requiring that the donors' names and the amount donated are still disclosed. It's about striking the right balance between privacy and transparency.

As many of us in this Chamber have been doxed, we understand just how important this change is. People shouldn't fear their safety because they ran for office or donated to a candidate. There is no reason that information like a person's home address or phone number should ever be publicly disclosed. I know that on this side of the House we strongly support the privacy of Albertans. I'm not sure if the members opposite can say the same, given their action of hacking the private information of Albertans, but I do hope they support this part of the bill.

Bill 21 also brings forward changes to the Railway (Alberta) Act. The Member for Edmonton-McClung spoke at length about how these changes could impact short-line rail operators and how this wasn't asked for. To be perfectly clear, this change has nothing to do with short-line rail operators. The proposed amendment is to support heritage railway operators, which are not the same thing. Heritage railways operate in whole or in part within a historical park, contain rolling stock or structural facilities manufactured in 1965 or earlier, operate at 30 kilometres per hour or slower, and travel fewer than 240 kilometres per day. They aren't hauling grain, as the member opposite suggested, which is exactly why we brought these changes forward. It doesn't make sense to have heritage railways following the same operating rules as larger industrial railways that haul things such as minerals and agricultural products. These changes will not impact the safety of Alberta's rail lines, but what they will do is help bolster Alberta's tourism industry.

The safety of Albertans is and will continue to be of the utmost importance. Despite what the members opposite may think, cutting red tape isn't about removing safety standards; it's about making Alberta a better place to live, work, and raise a family. The more red tape we cut, the more we ensure Alberta is the destination of choice for investors. We're committed to making Alberta the freest and fastest moving jurisdiction in North America by getting government out of the way so that our businesses can continue to invest and create jobs, fuelling the province's economic recovery.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I encourage all members to support this bill. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. associate minister.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has risen.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to rise this afternoon and provide some final comments here in third reading on Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. I know the minister is very, very excited about the bill and some of the red tape bills that have come before it and all the red tape they've been cutting.

I would have to argue that there are aspects along the journey that, I would suggest, are not red tape reduction. Maybe that's why we're on the second associate minister for this ministry. As I've mentioned before, as fun as it sounds, when Albertans were able to go out and cut their own Christmas tree, they still had to fill out all the forms to do that. They just saved the $10. I would be very hard pressed to call that red tape reduction.

What I'm not hard pressed to say is that Bill 21 is yet another piece of omnibus legislation, something that I know the former Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction was very much against when serving in opposition in the 29th Legislature. So it was always interesting to see these pieces of legislation come forward in omnibus form, that which he supposedly said he was very much opposed to seeing. Of course, with Bill 21 it's unfortunate that we maybe haven't heard some of those comments reiterated about this current one that we have in front of us.

Nevertheless, as was mentioned, we have 16 different acts that are being affected, none of which, you know, can be grouped together all in one group because they encompass nine different ministries, so it's the perfect example of omnibus legislation. But this is what we've come to expect from the red tape ministry, something that has been costing Albertans and will cost Albertans by the end of this Legislature somewhere between $10 million and $15 million.

It's been very, very difficult to establish, really, who's in charge of red tape reduction. Is it the minister in each ministry? Is it the associate minister? Is there collaboration? The reason I bring that up around the collaboration, of course, is what we saw in terms of the confusion here in the bill that's before us around the proposed changes to education and statements when the bill was first released by the red tape minister and then quickly corrected by the Education minister.

I'm certainly willing to provide, you know, kudos where it's due. That was cleared up, but the fact that it happened to begin with tells me that perhaps the language that's contained in Bill 21 around those changes to education was confusing to begin with. So looping back around to the collaboration: was there collaboration between the red tape minister and the Education minister? Was this all led by the Education minister and then just simply handed down, like we've seen many pieces of legislation that have been handed down, to the red tape ministry to bring forward?

I mean, at one point in time we saw the former red tape minister present a piece of legislation to the public, and when reporters started asking all kinds of questions about it, as they should – I just thought they were great questions. Nothing nefarious about it or trying to lead him astray. All we kept getting was pointing fingers around: "Well, you'll have to ask that minister. You'll have to ask that minister, and maybe you should ask that minister over there." If it's your bill, you should be able to answer the questions to it. That's why, when I saw that confusion around the different statements at the beginning of seeing this bill, I couldn't help but start to ask questions, and it did take us a little while to get those answers.

One of the things that led us off here in the opening remarks in third reading here for Bill 21 – one of the things I heard was "common-sense changes." This is a buzzword, of course, that we've heard on a bit of a regular basis. I bring that up because I want to start to direct our attention around some of the changes with public lands and parks. My friend from Edmonton-Gold Bar, who is the environment critic, had some very significant concerns with regard to that piece of the proposed legislation.

For one, there is significant leeway that is being provided to the environment minister around making decisions about how these lands could potentially be used. One of the, I guess, examples that caught my attention very, very quickly was the proposed feedlot at Pigeon Lake. You know, some of the background information that I was hearing around the consultations that he has done with residents in that area – they are very, very engaged on this issue. There are certainly significant concerns potentially about contamination of Pigeon Lake itself, and we really haven't seen some good answers provided around that.

It's unfortunate. Obviously, Committee of the Whole is usually the best time to be able to kind of walk through those types of things, and all it was was answers like: well, the NDP just hate business, and they don't want to see the province grow and create jobs. No. We're asking these questions because these are the questions that are coming up by Albertans in the area that's being affected by this.

When you couple that with these almost unprecedented changes that are being proposed for what the minister can do, the minister can pretty much bypass almost everything around that. I think Albertans are very rightly concerned around that. If there are ways that we can, you know, create a safe environment for that lake, reduce if not eliminate any potential contamination, I don't think there's anything wrong with having that open discussion around that and including the residents in that area for that instance.

You know, we always hear, again, one of the buzzwords, around consultation. A lot of times it seems I'm either seeing a model of consul-told or we're only listening to the people that tell us what we want to hear. I mean, the MLA responsible in that area wasn't even in attendance. I heard it was standing room only for a Saturday night of a long weekend. That's just how engaged the residents are on this. Kudos to them for paying attention to this.

We've also seen some changes, as was mentioned earlier, around the Animal Health Act. I don't know if it's just bad timing, coincidence – I don't know – as we're seeing cases of avian flu growing in the province and then some of the changes that are being suggested. Of course, the minister has said that there are no changes in terms of the reporting timelines, that it's just simply being moved into the regulations, which means, then, that changes could be made after that without actually coming into the House for any kind of review or debate. Certainly, from what I've seen in previous actions by this government, I can't help but have to call that into question as to what the purpose potentially might be.

You know the example, of course: the removal of the Lougheed coal policy and trying to move forward with coal mining in the eastern slopes, which potentially would put a lot of Albertans' drinking water at risk. We've certainly seen an example, just to the west of us, where there was a significant leak and the hazard that that has created. We certainly don't want to repeat such a thing, especially since, as we know, there's been some significant investment in southern Alberta around irrigation, something that's critical to those areas and the farming that goes on down there. It would be an absolute shame to have all of these changes and upgrades there only to find out now that the water that they're going to use is contaminated. Again, Mr. Speaker, you can't help but have to start to ask the questions, at least to do my due diligence.

I do want to share the changes around the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act and the potential extension of the renewals up to three years. I know, from my past, that when there are changes that are being extended, sometimes it allows for an area of a window where, if we have people that, for instance, are being checked on a yearly basis now and they know they're not going to get checked for three years, things can slowly become lackadaisical. So I have to voice that concern around that. My hope is that those changes will continue to be very closely monitored, especially here in the beginning, when they start, because, as we know, in this province we've gone through a very significant past year with regard to the death of kids in care. I would highly caution the government, moving forward on that, to stay on top of that.

I know we've seen some other changes, which, again, I'm not necessarily against. One of the highlights in the opening remarks by the red tape minister was around the changes to the Railway Act. Again, if there are fingers being pointed to one of my colleagues, blowing it out of proportion, I would have to question, then: was the language clear enough so that there wasn't any room for interpretation? Over the course of this 30th Legislature I've persistently and consistently seen that instead of having the best language we could have, the clearest language we could have – again, not about us. It's got to be about: 20 years down the road, when we're all gone, when we're not here to answer any questions, can somebody read that same language and come to the same conclusion, without even having to go back and read the debate and listen to the debate, and understand what's going on? If we're not actually hitting that mark, then we haven't created the best language that we possibly can.

Obviously, my colleague, in his critic role, was reading through that and, again, started to ask questions and probably through his consultation had those questions come up, so just trying to perform our duties as opposition, making sure that there's clarity around these kinds of things.

Changes around the MGA: I would probably tend to agree with the red tape minister that these changes allowing licences to cross municipal borders would definitely be a good thing. I think municipal governments will be pleased to be able to do that, but it's probably one of those cases where, you know, the municipalities are happy to get good news when it seems they tend to get a lot of bad news: the big-city charters being ripped up, funding that they need for critical infrastructure projects or addressing things like homelessness and houselessness falling considerably short.

As I've argued even earlier today, you know, when we seem to have $1.3 billion to bet on an election or tens of millions of dollars to chase a cartoon Bigfoot, then I would suggest we probably have money to supply these kinds of things and allow municipalities, who are the front line, who are dealing with, you know, the people – and I still get calls, nonetheless, about potholes or their back lanes and things like that. So definitely probably some good news for municipalities. I'm sure they're going to say: hey, how about giving us some more of this kind of treatment, because we kind of like that?

Changes around the Pharmacy and Drug Act. Again, one of those: any kind of good news we can get. Our health care system is in crisis. The past couple of years, through the pandemic, have been very, very taxing on Albertans, on Canadians, on the entire planet. But, again, let's not forget where we came from. We started things like ripping up the contract for doctors, going after nurses, going after other health care professionals. We saw changes to things like diagnostic imaging, where instead of a chiropractor or a physiotherapist or an audiologist being able to order these things directly, they now have to go through the extra step of going to their family physician, getting that X-ray ordered, then eventually going back to have it read, and then, hopefully, that can get shared with their other health care professionals, for instance their chiropractor, and then they can finally get the care that they need. That in itself is the definition of red tape.

When that change was made, I did of course ask the former red tape minister what the thoughts were around that. Was there any consultation with the ministry? I got absolutely no answer, so I can only conclude that for our $10 million or $15 million, as I mentioned earlier, we're not getting any communication; hence why I'm coming back to Bill 21 and why I question the communication between the Education ministry and the red tape ministry.

It's, again, one of those cases where we have a sandwich where some of the layers are good, but some of the other layers aren't. There are, I guess, significant barriers that I have with regard to that. It's not something where I can simply say: well, because there are all these other good things, let's just ignore the bad. I can't ignore the bad. I simply can't. You know, for that, I find myself unable to support Bill 21 here in third reading. I would suggest to other members of this House that they not support it as well, but I certainly look forward to hearing their comments through the course of third reading.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. A pleasure to rise at third reading of Bill 21, the bill that speaks to all the other bills and impacts all the other bills. I have always really struggled with the red tape reduction philosophy of putting legislations together that are not related to each other whatsoever into one big piece of legislative change. We see in this piece of legislation 16 different pieces of legislation that are being changed, different sections within those pieces of legislation, and many of these pieces of legislation never talk to each other or will ever meet the same ministry. I think that that is a problem.

It is a problem for a variety of different reasons, the first reason, obviously, being the fact that when you look at this bill, you know that it's very, very thick. It does not give a lot of confidence, I would say, in the willingness of the government to be open and transparent about what they're actually trying to do. You have to go through pages and pages and pages of this bill to find the piece of legislation that is being changed, to look at that section of the piece of legislation that is being changed, then go back and find the other legislation that it is changing and look at it in that way.

That is not typically how legislation is drafted or how it typically works. Usually you would see a bill that is just a small, little piece of a bill, and you would see the pieces of legislation that are being changed. It would only be one piece of legislation. It's very easy, then, for people who want to look at that legislation to be able to compare it to what is being changed. This does not do that.

What I don't understand, when we look at this bill, is how we move from pieces that deal with municipalities, with the local authorities act, to looking at the Cooperatives Act, which deals with co-operatives, to looking at the Education Act, to looking at impacts to the Children's Services legislation, to looking at things that deal with Environment and Parks, the tenancies act, surveying, pharmacies, provincial parks, public lands. None of these bills are supposed to talk to each other and be in the same piece of legislation.

There are reasons why we have different ministries. There are specific expert areas that you need to be able to look at and work on, and when you look at legislation, you need to be able to look at the fact that – when you look at the Provincial Parks Act, when you make a change to it, it will have a waterfall effect through the whole piece of legislation. It will impact regulations. Therefore, having public lands and provincial parks together makes sense. But having the tenancy act in the same piece of legislation that deals with where people are going camping does not make any sense.

The question then becomes: why is the government choosing to do it this way? Well, the government will say that it's housekeeping. I think what Albertans will say is that it's about trying to hide transparency and being honest with Albertans about what they're actually trying to accomplish. I think the parks changes specifically would be a prime example of that. When we look at the changes under Bill 21 with the Provincial Parks Act and the Public Lands Act, there are significant changes that are given to the minister to be able to arbitrarily change what is going on in our parks.

The minister has said: well, all it does is allow me to be able to put up sign locations and warning signs without having to turn it into a big thing. I think I disagree. In fact, I might agree with him in the sense that it could be about putting up signs and that he doesn't want to have to go through the process of consulting with those areas that are being impacted and going through a thorough consultation, because as the minister he would know.

But a sign could say something like, "ATVs are not allowed in this area; off-road vehicles are not allowed in this area," or the sign could say that they are. Well, that makes a significant change. We could go from not being able to ride an ATV through a creek because the sign says "No" to the sign all of a sudden being removed, and all of a sudden you can ride your ATV through a creek that you weren't allowed to ride it through a little while ago. That's an interesting change that the minister could make.

The minister could also decide to put up a sign that says, "This area now has a fee that you must pay to camp here" whereas a couple of days prior to that, that area may have been considered part of the Crown land that was not necessarily needing to have a fee attached to it. The minister could say that this is about signs. It could just be about signs, or it could be about signs that say some very interesting things that change the whole landscape of that area that is specifically impacted in the area that comes to provincial parks, Crown land areas.

I think that we can fundamentally agree on signs. I think the intention of those signs: we will both probably disagree as to what the intention of that is. But this bill will now give that power to the minister to be able to do that, so there may have been some honesty from the minister in regard to the sign locations and being able to put up signs. The full intention of what those signs would have meant maybe was not as open and transparent as I think we would have liked to have happened. I think this is where the fundamental problem happens with this bill. The government will implement a small change, and they will rationalize that small change with a very simplistic argument and then expect Albertans to just trust them with it: "Trust us. Trust me that I'm just going to put up a sign and the sign will not have a significant impact on the area."

The struggle that I think Albertans have and has been very clear, especially when it comes to the development in areas that protect our waterways and our parks, is that Albertans can't trust this government. We saw it clearly with coal. We've seen it with the Kananaskis pass. All of a sudden there's a fee that is now being attached to camping in Crown land areas, with the understanding that that $90 fee, that a family now has to pay to be able to use Kananaskis, would help to hire more fish and wildlife officers and enforcement of those areas to ensure that if there were parties happening or people weren't being respectful to the landscape, those areas were being cleaned up appropriately, that that land was being protected, and that people that were being found to disrespect the landscape would face fines.

What we've heard most recently, I believe – and my colleague from Lethbridge might be able to help me out – is that I think we've lost something like 16 fish and wildlife officers most recently, layoffs, which is counter to the argument that we heard from the government when the Kananaskis pass was introduced. In fact, the $90 Kananaskis pass: the government generated a lot of revenue off those passes last summer – during COVID the only thing you really could do was get outside – with that commitment, and in fact we saw a clawback in the staffing supports that the government promised that that pass was going to be used for.

Again, I think that some of the stuff in Bill 21 – I mean, I want to be fair to the government, because I believe that, you know, I can stand here and criticize forever. I mean, I could, and as opposition I try to be helpful at some point. I want to be fair that Bill 21 has some good stuff in it, but the struggle is that this piece is really bad. How does the government expect the opposition to vote in favour of a bill that actually has some good things in it, and then they slide in this really, really bad thing?

This is the problem, again going back to what I was saying at the beginning of my argument, when you stick a whole bunch of bills together and a whole bunch of pieces of legislation, 16 pieces, and you say: okay; opposition, you need to now vote in favour of this because you should, and look at all the good stuff that's in here. Well, the problem is that with all the good stuff that's in here, with this one piece that's really bad when it comes to Environment and Parks, it just kind of annihilates the opportunity to try to be supportive and work with the government. It's put this one piece in there, which is why you shouldn't put 16 pieces of legislation into one bill, because the minute that you do that, you take away any opportunity to be able to actually get the support that you need, well, that you should want, and be able to say that these things are good.

The co-operatives piece: there's some weird language in there. I'm not really a big fan of the fact that we would be encouraging more foreign investment in co-operatives. I mean, the whole intention of a co-operative is to try to have local investment and be really – like, to support the co-operative movement in Alberta should be about bringing Albertans together to build co-operatives. I guess that piece I'm not a big fan of, but there are some other pieces to support the co-operatives that I actually like, and I would have been happy to look at an amendment for that at one point if it hadn't been that it was part of a bill that had already 16 other pieces of legislation in it.

The licensing requirements that the minister actually spoke about I also find very curious and interesting because the associate minister during her speech was talking about: "Well, yeah, it's going to be a licensing requirement for foster parents and group homes under Children's Services. Like, for children in care it will now be every three years, but don't worry because the checklist will still be required to happen, and the home inspections will still be required, and all of these things will still be required." Okay. I worked with licensing when I was a social worker in Children's Services. I understand the process. I used to do home assessments for new foster parents. That's part of the licensing requirements. The only thing that would be changing, then, is that the sign-off by a licensed staff, the staff that is part of the licensing unit, would be done every three years.

The issue I have with that: if the checklist is still happening and the annual checks are still happening, and if there's a life change, like a new child is added or there's a new marriage or whatever, that is part of licensing, and that would be updated. If all of that is still happening, then why is the government changing it from one year to every three years? Everything that is required for a licence is actually going to still continue to happen.

It goes back to my prior argument that I made when we were in second reading, which is: it's about money. If you don't change the level of a licence for a foster parent or a group home, you don't have to pay the same amount of per diem to a foster parent or a group home staff because you will say that they don't have the same licensing requirements, because licensing is from level 1 to level 3 or specialized if you have a medically fragile child in your foster home. You get paid as a foster parent a little bit more a day based on your licensing level because your education level is higher usually, because you have more complex needs of the child in your home. Therefore, your odds are that you probably would be buying and spending things on children above and beyond what you normally would.

Let's be fair. Foster parents are not in this to make money, but they do deserve to get the supports and compensation in the sense of what they will be putting out for their kids, right? Like, if you're still buying diapers and stuff for a child that may be typically toilet trained – usually over the age of three is kind of the age level we always kind of assessed it at – then there should be supports for that. And, yes, there could be extra financial supports by the province provided to that foster parent, but there's also some expertise and understanding and training that is required to be able to support a child that may have a developmental delay.

If the licensing requirements are changing in this legislation, in Bill 21, but all of the checklist requirements, the annual inspections, all of the things, as the minister just clearly indicated in the speech – then the only thing that is not changing is the level that a foster parent will move through their licensing requirements, and I have a real problem with that because what that tells me is that we're not going to honour the expertise of foster parents and of group home staff, which means they're not going to be compensated appropriately. Once again, we can't trust this government to do the right thing.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday has risen.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise this afternoon to speak to Bill 21, and I have appreciated the comments from my colleagues so far today. Of course, I've had a few opportunities to speak to Bill 21 but always happy to speak a little more about issues that I see coming up. Specifically, I just want to take some time to speak to the comments made by the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Obviously, this is a piece of legislation that they have put forward. Unfortunately, as many of my colleagues have said before me, I find myself in the same situation, where we are faced with another piece of omnibus legislation, where there are some things, potentially many things in this legislation that we can support. Maybe they are administrative changes – maybe they are not particularly large changes – and in certain instances, like we see with the changes to the Local Authorities Election Act, for instance, changes that are essentially procedurally happening already. But for one reason or another the government feels the need to put that into legislation, and that's fair enough. Absolutely, I can see why there might be some interest there in ensuring that these best practices are moving forward, protected in legislation – then that's understandable.

But I do have some concerns particularly, again, with some of the comments that the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction made specific to that issue, talking about how the opposition doesn't believe in the strengthening or the protection of Albertans' private information, and for a few reasons in particular. I mean, when we look at the history of this government and some of the decisions that they've made and actions that they've taken – and a first instance that I want to point to: looking back at actions of the previous Health minister.

We've said it previously on the record that we were very concerned with the actions that that previous Health minister had taken when in that office, using the powers of that office and of the department to gain access to the personal information of a physician, I believe, in our province and with that information, first of all, if I'm remembering correctly, using it to call that person because of a disagreement of facts or beliefs and, because of a social media post that was made, berating that physician, Mr. Speaker, and, further to that, whether through access of that office or because maybe the minister already knew where this person lived, actually showing up to their house. So when we want to talk about protecting the private information of Alberta citizens – and for this government to act like they have a clean slate or a clean track record on this issue: I think that there's nothing further from the truth in that respect.

Further to that, when we look back at other decisions that this government has made, reflect on decisions back in, I believe, August 2021, there were discussions happening in the Legislature and in the province regarding the Babylon app offering virtual visits for Albertans to be able to access health care services over their phone. That's a reasonable request. I think, especially through the pandemic, that many Albertans are potentially accessing that, and that's fair enough. But through every step of the way, when we introduce new processes like this, we need to do our best as a government to protect the private information of citizens.

Unfortunately, through that process of allowing Babylon to start providing those services in our province, the Privacy Commissioner, from the very beginning, made it clear that not only did the government not come to the Privacy Commissioner's office, and neither did the company themselves come to ensure that they were following correctly the Health Information Act and Personal Information Protection Act – neither of those things happened – but further to that, as they continued to operate in our province, they did not ensure that they were, again, following the rules that have previously been put in place to protect the private information of citizens in our province.

Again, when we look at some of the articles that were discussed and some of the concerns that the Privacy Commissioner had flagged, particularly flagging that Telus was collecting more personal information than was necessary and using facial recognition without the patient's consent, we have a clear track record from this government of not doing everything that they can to protect the personal and private information of citizens across this province. Further to that, we saw, going through the process of the ministry process of providing vaccine passports, if I remember correctly, the compromised information that was raised through that process as well.

Again, the government is trying to move forward with initiatives which, whether we agree or disagree on them – fair enough – are not protecting the private information of citizens. For the associate minister to say that, you know, we don't support the need to protect that information is simply ridiculous, and further to that, I don't believe that they've been doing everything that they can. It's truly unfortunate because, again, some of these processes may be revolutionary, may be successful and an important piece of our health care system or our election system moving forward, but this government has failed again and again to ensure that through those processes they are protecting the private information of Albertans.

When we look at the changes, as I mentioned earlier, to the Local Authorities Election Act, I don't see any real issues with this amendment that is being proposed. It simply codifies in the legislation what already occurs in most instances and in practice and potentially even duplicates some of the protections that are already taking place in legislation. I would ask, as I'm sure has been raised before, if the government is actually seeing in certain jurisdictions in Alberta that there are these concerns of personal information being shared, if that has actually been the case, or if they're simply trying to create solutions for issues that don't actually exist.

That seems to be the case historically in other pieces of red tape reduction that we've seen come before this House, the government making amendments to legislation often on the administration side of things and procedural side of things and potentially tightening up inconsequential parts of legislation that are already out there but then also connecting it to completely unrelated changes that are more consequential and that Albertans are rightly concerned about but being upset that not everyone can support their legislation at the end of the day because they have made such major changes and consequential changes to other parts of the legislation. We've heard that throughout this debate.

When we look at the changes in section 12 to the Public Lands Act, the fact is, Mr. Speaker, that based on the history and the decisions of this environment minister and the actions that that minister has taken, people simply do not trust this government or this minister. The entire conversation around the Kananaskis pass, the K Country charges that this government is putting onto Albertans to enjoy the natural environment that Albertans have always held so dearly to their heart: they're being told by this government that they should have to pay to access such opportunities. It's truly unfortunate because beyond that, this government has not provided any clarity that this money is actually being reinvested into the places that they are collecting this money from.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the same goes for other changes that are included in here around the Provincial Parks Act. It really goes to the heart of this discussion because this government and this minister have talked about the idea that they're struggling to be able to make changes to park signs or road signs in parks and that we need to make such substantial changes to the powers that are provided to the minister. We've seen this before, and I've talked about this. We had similar conversations around Bill 10 and the powers that the government was trying to give themselves to be able to pass legislation and create it without even coming before this House at all, and we do see hints of that again in this legislation with the environment minister trying to give themselves a massive amount of power and so much more legislative authority over this process than they already have.

Mr. Speaker, there are, as has been stated, a lot of acts that are being touched on in this legislation, 16 sections amending 16 different acts, everything, as we've heard, from the Animal Health Act to the Education Act to the Cooperatives Act to the Municipal Government Act to the Rural Utilities Act, and the list goes on. Unfortunately, as the Member for Edmonton-Manning stated, as best as we can, it makes the most sense to be able to vote on these things separately. If these are substantial changes, which we are seeing in the case of the Public Lands Act and certain other pieces in here, we should have the opportunity to vote on these as separate pieces of legislation, because the changes that are being proposed are so substantial.

Looking further at changes to the Municipal Government Act in section 9, another opportunity where we see positive changes that I and my colleagues would very likely support if it was a stand-alone piece of legislation or amendment to that legislation, unfortunately because of the depth of changes that we're seeing from this legislation on so many different acts, it's going to truly be hard to support that even though we believe in some of the things that are being proposed in this legislation.

I think that it's also important to comment, as the Member for Edmonton-Decore did, that while we are talking about changes to the Municipal Government Act and how the province interacts with our municipalities across the province and the support that we are providing to them, this government also has a terrible track record on that front. The Member for Edmonton-Decore talked about the big-city charters and the decision of this government to go back on a substantial commitment that they made in the previous election and in the session under an NDP government to support those proposals that we had put forward when we were in government to support municipalities in a historic way, to provide sustainable funding, to change the relationship and how that funding is shared between the big cities in our province. Unfortunately, the government went back on that decision.

Further to that, the conversation around abandoned oil wells and how we are going to reclaim those operations across our province. Hundreds of millions of dollars, billions of dollars, Mr. Speaker, have been left to municipalities to try and figure out. Unfortunately, even though we have seen legislation come before this House, it's been very clear from stakeholders and municipalities across the province that we simply have not seen enough action on this, that the UCP government has not made any substantial or real commitments to ensure that that tax liability is not going to be left with municipalities, is not going to be left as a burden on taxpayers across this province.

We have seen many opportunities for this government to take substantial action on issues like these. Unfortunately, instead, what we get are piecemeal pieces of legislation like Bill 21, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, which touches on many important pieces of legislation but is stopping short of actually doing some of the very important work that needs to be done across this province to ensure the long-term sustainability of our big cities and our smaller municipalities across the province.

With that, Mr. Speaker, as I've said time and time again in my opportunities to rise on Bill 21, I do have substantial concerns with this legislation. While there are some, maybe even several, amendments or sections in this legislation that I see myself being able to support, there are just as many more consequential pieces that raise concerns with me, that make it very hard for me to support.

With that, I think I will take my seat, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this legislation again. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has risen.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to provide comments at this late stage of both getting on in the day but also of the session on third reading of Bill 21, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. As discussed, this is a piece of legislation that amends 16 other statutes. You know, the red tape reduction associate ministry thingy: really, the only job here is to bring legislation into the House. It's the only real identifiable task that I can see, so it's really important that we understand what the legislation does do and does not do. Certainly, on introduction day it's really important to know what is going on in the legislation, and that was not a bar that was met with this particular bill.

When we review the acts that are in this legislation – I was just going back and looking at everything that we had, all of the business of this session. We are now on Bill 21, so I was going back through, you know, from 20 on down, and really observing that most of this is not a free-standing piece of legislation. In fact, when you look through at what is done with this particular legislation, the Animal Health Act changes, for example, in the main positive, could have either been free standing or could have been bundled with another piece of legislation that came in.

The Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act changes. I think we've heard from the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning just what kind of potential risks they're introducing into the children in care system, so there is no question that that piece should stand on its own, and I along with, I think, the majority of Albertans would agree with my assessment that I do not believe that the appropriate level of diligence and care has been exercised in terms of putting this into an omnibus piece of legislation.

The next section concerns the Cooperatives Act. There is no question that likely those changes could have been bundled with the Financial Innovation Act, Bill 13, or some other piece of legislation. It seems to me that that would have been the most appropriate place to put it.

The Education Act changes. You know, one day they're claiming loudly and vocally that private schools will no longer have to produce financial data and it was a big change, and then later on we had another minister saying loudly and vocally: that's not true, and it doesn't really change a whole lot. So it would seem to me that there were other Education Act amendments, and this could have been put with those that were before the House this time around or at least in Bill 15 anyway.

There was a health statutes amendment act that seemed to be administrative in nature. There was also the Continuing Care Act that this piece of legislation could have been bundled with.

There are the Highways Development and Protection Act changes within this legislation that seem to be administrative in nature, so those could have been bundled with the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2022, that was brought in under Bill 5.

The Local Authorities Election Act in section 7 simply codifies in legislation what already occurs in practice and deals with campaign disclosures from municipal and school board elections, so it could have been bundled with the MGA changes that, in any case, come before the Legislature pretty well every session.

The Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Act changes certainly allow the minister to appoint an administrator and so on. This could have been bundled with some of the other changes under residential tenancies or the condos if it is, in fact, the Service Alberta minister that is responsible for this. I cannot remember the desi reg on this, but certainly we also had the Finance minister before the House with changes to some motor vehicle pieces under the Finance portfolio.

Then we come to section 9, which is the Municipal Government Act. Pretty well every session some MGA changes have to come before this House, and the Municipal Affairs minister brings these changes to this House, at least historically has been the case, so there's really no need for a Red Tape Reduction minister here in this bill. It's just simply giving her something to do.

The Pharmacy and Drug Act changes: here, again, these could have been bundled with either the Continuing Care Act or the other health statutes amendment act, and that would have been more appropriate and certainly could have been done, therefore not doubling up on the House's time.

The Provincial Parks Act: there's no question that given the level of trust with the environment minister from the public and the fact that he has imperilled so many Calgary seats by his actions and in southern Alberta – but those should have been free-standing changes if he wanted them, similarly with the Public Lands Act changes, and he should have shepherded them through this House. But, of course, hiding them under the cover of the Red Tape Reduction minister at least provides some level of political inoculation for someone who has certainly not done his own government any favours.

The Railway (Alberta) Act, section 13 of Bill 21: certainly, these changes are, again, somewhat perfunctory in nature, really not objectionable and could have been bundled with the transportation safety act.

The Residential Tenancies Act, section 14: there is one small change here that could have been put with the Service Alberta minister when he brought in legislation around condominiums, and there was some other business that, I believe, he had before the House this time around. But there's no question that there was no need for a free-standing minister on this, or Red Tape Reduction minister. The Minister of Service Alberta could have handled it.

The Rural Utilities Act: you know, we did have an electricity storage bill before the House, and this could have gone in there and had the same associate minister bring it through. Really, no need for a free-standing minister here. The whole exercise, the sort of kabuki theatre, of having a Red Tape Reduction minister: absolutely no need for her work there.

Section 16, which is the changes to the Surveys Act – again, I would have to refresh my memory as to the desi reg here. It looks like survey plan with land titles, so I think that's Service Alberta, but sometimes some of these things fall under Municipal Affairs. I think, again, you know, just sort of figuring out the lines of authority here on the fly, it would seem to me that bundling that with the residential tenancies and condos bill could have been appropriate.

All of this is to say, Mr. Speaker, that I've just gone through this significant piece of legislation that amends 16 acts, found absolutely no need for a Red Tape Reduction minister in any of this business of government, and, more to the point, have also identified that, essentially, this has been a Seinfeld session, a session about nothing.

There is no question that there's decent work to be had in some of this sort of administrative, or what Dave Hancock used to call evergreening, legislation. He used to say that really euphemistically, and then the Klein government would bring in something that people didn't like, but that was his way of doing it. He had some very memorable phrases. You know, this is all extremely perfunctory work that I've just identified and really nothing to get a gold star about in terms of getting up in the morning and going to work.

When I look through all of the other legislation, I've identified where this bill could have easily been tucked into other business that came before this House, with a couple of exceptions, where it would have been in the public interest to have a free-standing debate on them, that is to say the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act changes and the parks and Public Lands Act changes.

When you look back over the business before this House, really, too, here you do not see a focused agenda, focused on health care, affordability, and restoring trust in government; not at all. In fact, it took this crowd until Bill 18 to introduce electricity rebates despite the fact that the Premier at the time announced them on February 1. There is no question that what we have here is a bit of a government on autopilot, which is actually an insult to autopilot. Really, we exit this session with a Premier who has pulled a George Costanza, quit and then showed up the next day to his job, and a legislative session that has essentially been about nothing. I will remind the House of the finale of the Seinfeld show.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my comments on this bill, for which there is no need to have a minister. There's no need for an extra ministerial salary. There's no need for the fleet car. There's no need for any of it. This is a ministry of performance art, where the heavy lifting, such as it is – it's sort of a medium lifting, sort of fair-to-light lifting – could have easily been accomplished by other members of the front bench. You know, congratulations for making changes to the heritage railways. People must feel really good about their political legacy.

With that, I will provide my concluding comments on this piece of legislation.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join? I do see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I will attempt to be brief in my remarks regarding this particular bill during third reading here. Of course, as has been expressed by many of my colleagues on this side of the House, when it comes to Bill 21, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, there is so much here that we do agree with. The fact is that there are substantial changes that we could potentially support, but because the associate minister has decided to create other additions – and even in debate during Committee of the Whole we actually introduced an amendment to take those aspects out of the bill, yet the members on the other side decided to vote against that amendment. Even though we were saying, “Hey, you know, we can all get along here if you just take this one aspect of the bill out, and then we can all vote on this very happily and go home,” the members on the other side of the House decided to hold steadfast to their initial proposal, which demonstrates for everybody following us at home that this government doesn’t like to play.

Mr. Hunter: How many amendments did you pass when you guys were over here?

Member Loyola: You know, Mr. Speaker, it’s tragic . . .

The Acting Speaker: I’ll just remind all members of this House – and I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member – that if other members do wish to speak, there is the opportunity for at least three interventions of one minute each.

The individual with the call at this time, though, is the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. [interjection] No; it’s quite fine.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the government has demonstrated and the private members of the government caucus have also demonstrated that they’re just unyielding when it comes to actually making compromises on the bills that they have presented here in the Legislature. You know, proposed legislation after proposed legislation we have – some of them it’s been, like, “We want to refer this to committee,” but there have been other bills that we have debated inside of this House where we’ve actually wanted to make slight changes, slight modifications, that if the members on the other side of the House would have agreed to, it would’ve been easy to pass them, no problem whatsoever.

Now, of course, when it comes to this particular bill, it’s 16 sections which amend 16 different acts, and it is the prime example of an omnibus piece of legislation, which so many members on that side of the House used to light their hair on fire when we did it, when we were in government. But here they are doing it themselves, right? It’s quite hypocritical. It’s quite hypocritical that you would get up and debate and you would say that you don’t agree with omnibus pieces of legislation, that it’s not appropriate, yet here they are doing it themselves.

Now, the other aspect of this particular bill is the absolute centralization of power in the hands of the minister of environment when it comes to that particular piece. That’s the one piece that we wanted to amend, but the members on the other side of the House decided to vote it down. Just to be clear, I want to quote specifically from this bill, where it says, under directives, that “the Minister may set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines . . . or other rules relating to any matter in respect of which a regulation may be made under this Act.” When interpreting this, you could only assume that it basically allows the minister to do anything that they want and without having a check and balance, because it’s saying that it could be done in regulation.

As we know, regulations do not need to make it into the House or need to be debated, so we’re talking about substantial changes – substantial changes – that could be made to regulation here in the province of Alberta and the opposition would not be allowed to debate it, not one bit. It would just be simply done by the minister. It wouldn’t need to be debated. In that case, then, why have a democracy at all, Mr. Speaker, if the people in government are just going to make changes any way they want through regulation and don’t need to be debated here in the House at all?

When it comes to the entire ministry of environment, this associate minister, through this piece of legislation, is basically giving the minister of environment free access. You don’t even have to deal with our democratic processes. You could basically do anything that you want, and it can be done through regulation and doesn’t have to be even debated inside of the House. That is what is happening here and what we’re so strongly opposed to.

Now, we made a slight amendment, a small change. We suggested an amendment, but this government decided to vote it down. Just take this one aspect out, and we would have agreed to support this bill. I find it hypocritical, because members when they were on this side of the House would never agree to something like this. They would never agree to something like this. They would go on and on about transparency and accountability, yet now they’re doing the exact opposite. They’re not being transparent. They’re not being accountable. There are changes that could be made by the minister of environment that wouldn’t even have to be debated inside this House, and who knows what those changes could be.

If we actually – well, this government will vote this through. I’m sure they will, regardless of our opposition.

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, a point of order has been called. I see the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Point of Order Anticipation

Mr. Schow: Now, Mr. Speaker, we know that in this Chamber there’s a long-standing tradition of not presupposing the outcome of a vote. The member opposite from Edmonton-Ellerslie clearly just said that the government will vote this through. We as representatives of the people are here to ensure that their voices are heard. We consult on them and vote based on a number of factors, but presupposing the vote is certainly out of order in this Chamber, and I ask that member, who is a veteran member of this Chamber, to retract, apologize, and move on in a manner that is conducive and in accordance with an elected representative.

The Acting Speaker: Was there a standing order in that? I would honestly recommend that the hon. member include a standing order in order to create the point of order.

Mr. Schow: Somewhere in section 23.

The Acting Speaker: Section 23 in totality: I’ll accept it.
I do see the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think you cautioned the government side that the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has the floor, and still the government members were heckling the member and not letting him speak freely. Again, this is not a point of order without citing anything, just Standing Order 23. What's in 23? It's a long standing order. I think the member used House procedure, the standing orders, to again disrupt my hon. colleague while he was talking on important aspects of this piece of legislation. That was not a point of order but another attempt to disrupt my hon. colleague from speaking freely in this House.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I believe that the correct standing order is 23(e). Am I correct? I am correct. I did, unfortunately for the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall, accept 23, generally speaking.

What I would do is just ask that the hon. member withdraw the comment about presupposing the will of the House, and then we can continue along with his comments.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Of course, I withdraw.

Debate Continued

Member Loyola: What I meant to say is that most likely, given the track record of this government – every bill that they have presented inside of the House, they have passed. You know, regardless of amendments being made on this side of the House, they have not accepted one amendment by the Official Opposition during their tenure in government.

Mr. Williams: Will the member give way?

Member Loyola: Unfortunately, no. I do not accept. I'm going to wrap up here. That's why I don't accept your intervention.

This is the concern that we have before us and why we are not supporting this bill: it gives just too much power to the minister of environment, and we don't know what that minister could do. Perhaps he could partially privatize some of our parks or restrict access to some of those parks. The point is that we don't know. The minister will be able to set in regulation any change that the minister desires, and none of that would actually have to enter into the Legislature as a proposed piece of legislation and therefore wouldn't be debated at all. We would have absolutely no way to counter anything that the minister of environment would wish to do in that particular instance.

That is, like I said, Mr. Speaker, the crux of my argument and why I will not be supporting Bill 21. Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any others to join? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I welcome the opportunity to be one of the final speakers on this piece of legislation. Of course, I stand to oppose this egregious legislation, and I will try to take some time to explain why it is fundamentally horrid and should be rejected by all democratic citizens in the province of Alberta. This follows up on the extremely well-articulated arguments by the Member for Lethbridge-West, who has quite clearly demonstrated that you don't need to create an omnibus bill when you actually have ministers who have responsibility for each and every single section within this bill. You could simply have those ministers bring this information forward.

It begs the question: why would you not have the minister responsible bringing forward these pieces of legislative change? The answer, in my mind, would be that it is because you are trying to bury something, hide something within that legislation, and put in things that sound good and sound acceptable and then slip in the poison pill, slip in the thing that is so egregious that nobody would ever pass it if it was actually introduced by itself in this House.

That's exactly what we see here. We see that there are certainly times at which we could agree with sections of the legislation. Some of them are minuscule changes and could have happened in any other place. Some of them are useful changes that we could certainly have supported had they appeared in the appropriate ministry and been brought forward. But what we have here is the government making one of their, again, repeated antidemocratic moves, shifting the decision-making away from the democratic process of the House into the process of the cabinet, making decisions by writ and not being responsible to the people of the province of Alberta and transparent through the process of this elected forum here in this House.

That section, of course, that we all see and that has been spoken to quite clearly by the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie is the decision to give completely unwieldy powers to the minister of the environment when not only is this unnecessary, but it is dangerous and unsafe in this province. We have spent many years in this province creating a very reliable set of strictures around environmental regulation and processes by which people can speak to the environmental needs in this province. We have plans for all the areas of the province, that are created by local people and built up. Within them there are regulations that prevent people from making buildings or doing other things unless they fit with the plan.

The South Saskatchewan plan, for example, was very clear that the First Nations in the area could not build a gas station along the edge of their own community in spite of the fact that they would just be taking the small section between the roadway and their bridge. They still couldn't do it because the South Saskatchewan plan did not allow it to happen. So what we had is that we had a process that was being upheld by everybody and being respected by everybody, and when they didn't agree with it, such as in the case of the people from the Stoney Nakoda nations, they asked for a change of the plan and have been patiently waiting while that plan is slowly being re-examined and looking at: could we change the line of the South Saskatchewan plan just by a few hundred yards so that they could have a gas station in their home community?

That's what we want to see in this province. We want to see people being patient and changing the plans after due consideration. All of that has just been wiped out by this bill. What this bill has done – and let me be really clear when I say this. This bill has allowed that “the Minister may set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines or other rules relating to any matter in respect of which a regulation may be made under this Act.” That is an absolutely ridiculous breadth of power by this government, to give the minister the ability to change everything without bringing it back into this House.

I can only ask: why is it that they would wish to do this thing at this particular time? Why would they wish to take the democratic process out of this, the protection of the environment, and put it in the hands of an environment minister that has a horrendous record on the environment, an environment minister that stands up and talks about everything but the environment in this House, is not known in any way to try to protect the environment, in fact, has tried to sell parks in this province, has tried to mine the eastern slopes in this province, has tried to sell water against the wishes of people downstream in this province? We see this happening all the time.

So I have to ask: why is it that they would take this kind of legislation and create the power for a minister who clearly is not interested in the environment and is clearly not going to go forward? The answer, in my mind, must be that there is some advantage to the minister somewhere along the way, that there are groups to which he is a party and groups with which he wishes to curry favour, that he wants to be able to change the legislation without having to come into the House. He wants to be able to do this of his own right. For example, were he to be a member of, let's say, an ATV club who wanted to change their trails up into the Rocky Mountains and not obey the environmental regulations that are presently in place, they'd simply go to this minister and say: "Hey, you're part of the club. Why don't you change the rules so we can run our ATVs anywhere we want? We can rip up the environment, and there won't be any actual consequence here." That's the kind of thing that becomes available here. Now, I would expect that this minister would never choose to do that, but why would you create legislation that allows a minister to do that, to curry favour in particular areas?

One of the other things this bill does is that it allows there to be a variation in rules from one site to another site, so there's no consistent, overall pattern of environmental legislation here. There's no desire to protect the environment. What they're wanting to do is be able to go to individual groups and curry favour and say: we are going to change the rules just in your little area so that you can do these terrible things that nobody would want to have happen, but because we're going to do it in a small area, we think we can get away with it. That's what's happening here. We are moving from the democratic process of designing environmental legislation that protects all of Alberta with the same rules and allowing a minister to find little favourites along the way, to change the rules here and there for clubs that they belong to and clubs that they want to curry favour with, and as a result they will be able to forward their own ambitions, perhaps politically or whatever else they may have, but not protect the environment.

The worst thing that we can do is start to say, when we're trying to protect an environment which is literally world-wide, that we can change the protections in individual places and not worry about the consequences for the larger world and the environment around all of the province of Alberta. So this is very . . . [interjection] No. It is very suspicious to me that they would do this kind of thing, because it absolutely tells us that they're not really interested in the movement that we have had moving forward.

Mr. Williams: Discussion?

Mr. Feehan: I would love discussion if I ever thought you'd bring something forward, but not today.

Mr. Williams: Hon. member, please give way. I request again.

Mr. Sabir: Point of order.

Mr. Feehan: I can't, because I've never heard you offer something for discussion. I must . . .

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, although I wasn't quite sure I was able to hear it, I do believe that a point of order was called by the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall . . .

Mr. Sabir: Yes. Under Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j) . . .

The Acting Speaker: Please, sir, I still have the floor. Once I sit down, then, of course, you get your opportunity to make your arguments.

Please, hon. member.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Sabir: I am rising under 23(h), (i), and (j). I understand that a member can get up and ask for an intervention, and I'm pretty sure that the member who was trying to intervene was the one who brought this provision in the standing order, but I do not believe that using that kind of language, raising one's voice in this Legislature, is good for the order in this House. That's not the way listed in the standing orders to intervene, and I think the member was clearly offside of the piece of the standing order that he brought forward.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Deputy Government House Leader has risen.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I don't believe that this point of order reaches the threshold that you would need to rule against the hon. Member for Peace River. If there was a problem with the decibel level that he raised his voice to, then I would encourage him to direct similar comments to the Member for Edmonton-McClung and the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford. On numerous occasions through the last three years those members have had, well, I would just say unparliamentary outbursts that raised very high decibel levels.

Mr. Feehan: You mean like your environment minister swearing at the chair?

Mr. Schow: I do have the floor, hon. member. You're welcome to stand and finish your remarks.

Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j) clearly says:

Makes allegations against another Member;

That did not happen.

Imputes false or unavowed motives [against] another Member;

That did not happen.

Uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder.

That also did not happen.

While I recognize that interventions are a relatively new feature in this Chamber, I would encourage all members, if your interventions are rejected, to simply in a parliamentary way sit down and accept the rejection. This is not a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and let's move on.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River has indicated that he has something new to add to this debate.

Mr. Williams: I withdraw unreservedly any unparliamentary volume that may have offended members opposite, and I ask only for substantive debate in the Chamber. I cannot wait to receive an intervention soon.

Mr. Feehan: Keep waiting.

4:30

The Acting Speaker: Are you looking to add to the debate on the point of order?

Mr. Feehan: No. Sorry. Waiting for my return.

The Acting Speaker: I can see how this could potentially fit within (j) anyways. That said, I think that part of this – the direction that I thought it was going to go, actually, would have been to use an intervention to join debate without having been called upon by the member who currently had the floor. I think that this just stems from a discussion that we were having in this House where the hon. member mentioned that he welcomes discussion after moments prior saying no to an intervention. However, saying no to an intervention is his right.

I think that I would just caution the whole room today that – of course, I listen to these debates with great interest. As such, if the volume can stay to a level where I can hear the person with the floor, that would be very much appreciated.

If the hon. member could please continue with his comments.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I, of course, can increase my own volume enough to overshout anybody, as people will know in this House.

I think I'll summarize my final point here, and that is that this is a government that has totally failed on the environment the people of Alberta. They have no plan moving forward. They have taken out all of the plans that have been put forward by previous governments in this province, and they are doing absolutely nothing to protect the environment for our children in the future. As greenhouse gases increase, it will be on this government's soul for having failed to do anything about it whatsoever. I think this legislation is part of the plan to subvert the future well-being of the environment of this province.

With those final words, I will end for today. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: I believe the individual who caught my eye was the hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the previous speakers. For the record I will accept interventions. We want to try to wrap things up here for those who believe in democracy. For those folks at home and for the fans in the stands, thank you so much for joining us here and seeing how your tax dollars are being spent while we talk about your future. The last time I checked my clock, it was about $500 a minute of your future that we're spending right now. So I hope you understand that we should be spending this fulsomely and talking about it.

What we do have here, folks at home and in the stands, is a red tape reduction bill. Now does anybody know what red tape is? We do on this side. We campaigned on it. It's unnecessary bureaucracy and, quite frankly, lengthy regulations that slow down progress. When the fact that we have an environment minister allowed to make changes in regulations because it gives him the freedom to do so – one of the litmus tests that we have here, when I look at this regulation and this law, is if I would trust you guys on the opposite to actually do it. That's always my weather mark.

Now, here's a question that I often ask my kids: why does a mouse like cheese? Because a mouse is a mouse. A mouse likes cheese. Why does a socialist like red tape? Because they're socialists. They like to wrap things up, slow things down. There's another saying out there, too. It's like: to catch a thief, you have to think like a thief. To see how a socialist might use regulations and abuse them, maybe I can listen to some of those arguments and put them in replay back there. This is what we committed to. We're going to save those kids, that are now exiting the room, $500 a minute of their future cost savings by going through this and actually saving the economy, getting things done.

As far as the environment, we all love it. It's called where we live. I would suggest that most folks that have worked in major industries and lived in rural Alberta have their livelihoods tightly captured to the environment, and we definitely respect it. Again, the litmus test: would I trust you with this regulation? Absolutely.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I'd love to conclude my remarks and thank those kids for coming in upstairs and seeing how their future tax dollars are being spent. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I do believe I see that the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley has risen.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Yes, I would like to speak to this Bill 21 and talk about red tape. There's nothing that we dislike more than red tape. I think maybe we could just get back to the definition of red tape. By definition it's rules and regulations that are excessive, unnecessary, redundant. They're rules and regulations that hinder decision-making, and they delay or create inaction.

We obviously are in a society now where we have a fairly fast-paced society, and I think we need to be able to respond to a society that's fast paced. Our business world relies on things to happen fast. There's often a joke that government operates at the speed of government. Of course, that's somewhat a derogatory term. I think that's something we could change, and one of the ways we can change that is by reducing red tape. Now, reducing red tape will help municipalities, businesses, and all Albertans to be able to get through processes so they can actually get work done, actually get to the work of the people that they represent.

Now, part of this bill is going to help municipalities move forward with economic development and revitalization by speeding up the review and approval processes for municipal community revitalization, freeway designations, new freeway access locations, and help communities get on the road to economic growth. When I look at that, I look at different projects like the industrial gateway project that the MD of Greenview is proposing south of Grande Prairie. That's a process that's been delayed a bit, and I know that the previous government had some delays in there, and now we're making some progress, finally, with that. There are businesses that are coming in and wanting to do business and set up business there, billions of dollars of investment, but because of delays, namely of the previous government, there have been billions of dollars of investment lost. Those investors went elsewhere with their money and with their investment. We need to be conscious of that and how red tape slows down production.

Look at the community of Fox Creek. I believe it was seven or eight or nine years that it took to be able to purchase a piece of provincial government land right adjacent to the town so they could develop it. That went through multiple governments where they weren't able to get that process done in time – of course, it's done now – but, again, lost millions and millions of dollars of investment. At the time that they applied for that land, I believe they said that there were about 70 businesses that were looking for property to develop in that community, and by the time they got the land, the list was zero. Those companies had gone elsewhere and done business elsewhere. We have to be able to be conscious of this.

I did have one municipal employee describe the process like this. This is what it was like going through the approval processes. It was like you wanted to make a cup of coffee, so you went to the government and said: "I want to make a cup of coffee. What do I need?" And they say, "Well, you need coffee grounds." So they go and they get the coffee grounds and come back, and it's like, "Okay; well, we're ready to make this cup of coffee now." "Well, do you have a coffee pot?" "Well, no." "Go get a coffee pot." So they go and they get a coffee pot, and they come back and they say, "Okay; we're ready to make this cup of coffee." "Well, do you have water?" It's like: "Well, I thought that was kind of given; where we're making a cup of coffee, we'd have water. But, no, we'll go get water.” So they go get water and come back, and then they say, “Well, did you get cream?” And they’re like: “Okay. Is there anything else that we need to make this cup of coffee so when we go back, we can bring it and make this cup of coffee as fast as possible? We’re going back and forth lots here now.” “Nope; nothing else you need.” So they go, they come back with the cream, and then they say, “Well, did you get the sugar?”

This is the process of working through government bureaucracy and red tape that we need to stop. We need to be able to get past these processes. When businesses and municipalities come to government and they ask, “Okay; what do we need to do to get this project approved?” they need to be told that up front so that they can work immediately at that, bring the full package forward, and make it happen. That’s why reducing red tape is so important, because we can avoid situations like that, where governments and municipalities are held back in their desire to get projects done.

Part of this bill also talks about the REAs, rural electrification associations, which is something kind of near and dear to my heart because my family was always involved in the rural electrification associations in our community. To be able to give them an opportunity to become more sustainable over long-term periods: I think this is very important, to have this in this bill.

Part of the bill deals with making it so livestock owners and veterinarians can report animal diseases by e-mail. Again, this is something that’s long overdue. It’s good to see it in this bill here now because, obviously, in this day and age we should be able to take care of this business in a way that we deal with business elsewhere. So I think this is good, to be able to do that by e-mail and, of course, all the other means that were used before.

Having landlords be able to use e-transfers to return security deposits to tenants: again, just simplifying the process so people can do business quickly, efficiently, effectively and be able to carry on with other things.

Alberta foster parents can exercise their right to appeal government decisions affecting their foster home licence. My daughter has foster children, so when I see that and I see that the process is becoming, you know, more effective, more efficient in allowing foster parents to have some say in decisions that are made that affect not only their home but the children that they’re taking care of, I see some really good things in this bill that I really like.

It’s a fairly extensive bill. It’s a thick bill. But, again, you know, things like the Animal Health Act, being able to report animal diseases to the government by e-mail: good work there. The Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, the changes there so that they can now appeal decisions made by a director: again, good work there.

Lots of good things in this bill. I’d like to, you know, commend the minister on this work. I think this is good work. This is what we’re here to do. When I look at some of it, though, I see some of it maybe would be fitted more for a miscellaneous statutes amendment act but, again, still needs to be done. Having it in here: great. Let’s get this work done. Let’s be able to, you know, allow businesses and municipalities and the people of Alberta to be able to move forward and not be hindered by government. Is there more work to do? Yes, of course, there’s always more work to do when it comes to red tape. I think sometimes in government we take two steps forward, one step back. Again, we’ve just got to keep looking at it, keep listening to Albertans where they see issues, and see if we can stop these delays.

One thing that always comes to mind for me is the transfer of grazing leases. That’s been an issue for quite a while. The previous government wasn’t able to clean that up. You know, when you purchase a grazing lease in Alberta, it can take almost a year to transfer that grazing lease to the new owner. You could purchase it, let’s say, at an auction sale or something. The auction sale company does their business with it. The real estate agents take care of their business. The lawyers do their business. The finances are all taken care of. And then you wait for a year for the government to actually transfer that grazing lease from farmer A to farmer B. That’s something that we obviously need to work on. I think this government has been exploring that and working on trying to improve that situation, but these are the things that slow down business and slow down people’s lives.

Again, when we look at the definition of red tape, it’s excessive, it’s unnecessary, it’s stuff that’s redundant. It slows things down. It hinders decision-making. All those things are so important to – as a government I think it’s incumbent on us to be able to make life easier for Albertans, not make life more difficult and create barriers for process. I know that sometimes government fears making a decision in case it’s wrong, so they try to kick the can down the road and, you know, hope something changes or something comes to light that’ll help make the decision easier, but sometimes we just have to make decisions. We have to move on, and I think that’s what Albertans expect.

We need to be able to have these municipalities, when they have a project that needs to be done – if they want to replace a culvert and they’ve got to go to Environment to get permission to do that because there might be some effect on a waterway or something, that process needs to be laid out very clearly. They need to be able to get through it quickly and efficiently because time is money. The more time people spend going through these bureaucratic processes, that delays the work that needs to be done and causes other problems down the road.

Again, good work on reducing red tape. Lots more to do. Look forward to this government doing more of that.

I’ll leave my comments there. Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join?

Seeing none, I will offer the hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction the opportunity to close should she so choose. That is waived.

[Motion carried; Bill 21 read a third time]

The Acting Speaker: Now I see the hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’d like to also thank all members for their participation this afternoon, but at this time I move that the Assembly be adjourned until 7:30 p.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 4:45 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Wednesday, May 25, 2022

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Good evening, hon. members. Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 24

Miscellaneous Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to rise on behalf of the Government House Leader today to move second reading of Bill 24, the Miscellaneous Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

The Miscellaneous Statutes Amendment Act improves clarity in our laws, Madam Speaker. It allows lawmakers to make minor changes in the law and to correct anomalies, inconsistencies, outdated terminology, and errors to provide clarification in provincial law.

This bill would make minor amendments to 19 acts, which include – I've been asked to make sure the House is aware of all 19 of these acts, so bear with me, everyone – the Dairy Industry Act, the Family and Community Support Services Act, the Health Professions Act, the International Trade and Investment Agreements Implementation Act, the Interpretation Act, the Legislative Assembly Act, the Marketing of Agricultural Products Act, the Marriage Act, the Metis Settlements Act, the Occupational Health and Safety Act, the Personal Information Protection Act, and the Post-secondary Learning Act, as well as the Queen Elizabeth II Platinum Jubilee Recognition Act, the Recall Act, the Safety Codes Act, the Skilled Trades and Apprenticeship Education Act, the Societies Act, the Surface Rights Act, and, finally, Madam Speaker, the Vital Statistics Act. [some applause] Thank you very much.

Madam Speaker, while all of these amendments are minor in nature . . .

Member Irwin: Could you say that again?

Mr. Ellis: You want me to repeat that?

. . . they would add clarity and consistency to our laws. Thank you, Madam Speaker, very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much. Just on behalf of the Official Opposition we appreciated the government working with us on this particular piece, and we are pleased to support the Miscellaneous Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

The Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. minister like to close debate?

Mr. Ellis: Waived.

[Motion carried; Bill 24 read a second time]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 10

Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022

The Chair: This is Bill 10's first time in Committee of the Whole. Are there members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Sorry. I thought the lovely member across the way – but maybe we'll be hearing from her shortly, so I shouldn't assume.

It is an honour to rise. In fact, it feels like it's actually been a little while since I've spoken in the Chamber. I don't want to presuppose anything, but I may not have a whole lot more opportunities to do so.

As I like to do the first time when I speak in the Chamber, I just acknowledge – you know, we had the opportunity earlier today, many of my colleagues and I, to stand in support of paid sick days outside of the Legislature. There was a really good rally, and it was an important reminder of the fact that we are still in a pandemic. We as legislators should acknowledge the fact that the pandemic has laid bare many of the challenges that health care workers have seen and many of the gaps in our health care system. Shout-out to all those workers on the front lines not just in health care but in education and retail and anywhere on the front lines.

I will just speak briefly tonight to Bill 10. I did have the chance to speak to Bill 10 in I believe it would have been second. It feels like a while ago now. Time is awfully confusing here, both inside and outside the Chamber. I'll restate a few of my remarks. I said then that we absolutely, you know, on this side of the House believe that female genital mutilation – the intent of this bill is an important one. I appreciate very much that the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore has had a number of conversations on this bill. I know that she took some of the questions and comments that I had for her, mostly, I think, actually, offline. We mostly spoke outside the Chamber. I know that she did take some of that feedback to heart.

If she's willing to talk a little bit to the bill today, I did just want to ask a little bit more around the consultation piece on the bill. One of the things that I don't want to say I struggled with but that I questioned is just that, you know, it's not – the member can correct me, but I believe she said, at least it was in a media report, that there were no cases reported of FGM here in Alberta, something to that effect. I guess my question is: who did you consult with on this? What made this be a priority piece of legislation for this government?

I want to frame this positively because, as I shared in second when I spoke to this bill, I remember when I was a high school social studies teacher in rural Alberta. I remember this was actually one of the human rights abuses that we talked about. One of my students even did a bit of their presentation on this topic, so it's something that a lot of people don't necessarily know is happening globally. However, again, I would love to learn a little bit more about the Alberta context and why it is that of – again, I want to frame this not as criticism but just as questions. You know, there are so many issues facing women and gender-diverse folks in this province. I've said this – again, I know I'm a broken record. I want to not frame this as criticism, but I've talked to a lot of women and a lot of folks across this province. I do every day, and I'm proud of that. Quite honestly, this is not an issue that I've heard to be a concern.

I've heard a whole heck of a lot of issues, particularly surrounding women's health. I think that was something that we've said in our early comments on this bill as well. You know, when we heard that there was something coming to do with women's health, I was intrigued to see what it would be. I was a little bit surprised that there wouldn't be perhaps something that would address the challenges that women and gender-diverse folks experience when accessing obstetrical care, as an example, across this province. We know countless communities – I know that my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre has named a whole bunch of them – where women and folks who need those services are not able to access them. I mean, maybe that couldn't be addressed through legislation, but it could certainly be addressed through tangible action by this government. That's one example.

Another example. I note the Associate Minister of Status of Women mentioned this as well, just talking about something I talked about back in, I think, March – oh, time is confusing – Endometriosis Awareness Month, right? That's an issue that, I'll be honest with you, I didn't know enough about until I met with some women and some folks who struggle with it and just hearing how incredibly debilitating that women's health issue is.

My questions, I guess, primarily for either the Associate Minister of Status of Women or the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore, would be to just talk a little bit about the consultation process. What led this to be a bill that would be a priority of this government?

You know, I said it multiple times in this Chamber in this session: this government had an opportunity with so many pieces of their legislation to really make transformational change. A great example would be the Continuing Care Act. I believe that's Bill 11. The pandemic has really exposed some of the huge gaps in the continuing care system. What an opportunity for this government to be leaders and to try to really address some of those challenges. No. Instead, they presented a piece of legislation that's very much mostly housekeeping changes, administrative changes, right? We saw that with a number of other pieces of legislation this session. I think there are members, no doubt, on both sides of this Chamber that would question the seriousness or the gravity of the pieces of legislation that came forward this session.

With that, again I want to make it very clear that, you know, we are in support of this bill and we are in support of having these sorts of difficult conversations. We all want to be in this Chamber leaders, I'm certain, when it comes to standing up against human rights abuses such as FGM. But I still do have a few questions, so I'm hoping that we can get a few answers from that side of the House.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, and thank you so much to the member across the way for the questions. Really great questions, actually. One of the most transformational things that happens in this place is actually being able to bring pieces of legislation like this, that elevate many of the things, many of the topics that the member spoke about. In my lifetime, especially coming from – I'm part of a very beautiful culture on one side, the Southeast Asian culture. I'm very lucky. There are so many beautiful things about my culture, but there are also things that call into question the equality and equity for girls and women.

A lot of the legislation that we bring through this House – and I think that the opposition could equally agree – not only comes from the people that we speak to but elevates the discourse around many, many discussions. When we're talking about sexual assault, domestic violence, and – in this particular case, FGM stems from many discussions around child marriage and honour beatings and honour killings and situations that still occur.

Just to add some clarity, Madam Chair, for the member across the way, we are coming into something called the cutting season. Now, the cutting season is something that happens in other countries whereby they call it vacation cutting. Because we don't necessarily know – you can imagine that the cutting of the clitoris, the sewing of the labia, and all of the sort of practices that go along with this are not something that one would speak about.

I think about so many things that I've learned. The member had talked about this under other situations regarding surgeries and transformational changes that happen. A lot of the things that we talk about in this House, Madam Chair, a lot of us don't have a lot of information about. We wouldn't have been able to learn about those things or start the process of education had we not had the opportunity and the privilege to be able to bring those things before the House. Any time we can save any little girl from any situation, especially in Canada – in Canada we believe we are a country that believes in the safety and security of girls and women. We say that when people enter our borders. We tell people, when they come to Canada, that their daughters will be safe.

However, with a practice like this – and I'd also like to just mention that this legislation is not led by western philosophy; it is led by the diasporas around the world that are changing. They are changing the world for their girls in countries where millions – 200 and some million girls have been cut and have lost babies or have died as a result of having labour with closure of the labia minora.

In Africa there is a report that is called the Maputo protocol. The Maputo protocol is a protocol across Africa that is about protecting and promoting the rights of women and girls across Africa. The Maputo protocol in section 14 talks about women's rights over their body and reproduction rights and many, many things that are very important to all of us in this House and in Canada. But the most important piece about that protocol is what they're doing across the diaspora and through Africa to help elevate the rights of girls and women.

The language and everything that is in this bill that has been used – and you'd asked about consultation. I'm not sure, to the MLA, if we had actually sent this list of consultations. I'm happy to share that with you. But if you don't mind, I'll read – like, it's two pages long of consultations. I'm happy to share . . .

The Chair: Through the chair.

Mrs. Aheer: Sorry if that's a prop. I apologize, Madam Chair.

The Chair: No, no. Just speak through the chair.

Mrs. Aheer: I won't go through the entire list.

Member Irwin: No. That's fine.

Mrs. Aheer: But I'm very happy to share – yeah. I can send it over to you if you like. Okay.

The Chair: Hon. members, speak through the chair.

Mrs. Aheer: Yes. Okay. Thank you, Madam Chair.

One thing I wanted to actually talk about with the member, through you, Madam Chair, is that we'd actually had some interesting conversations with folks after the legislation came forward. Some of the colleges had actually reached out to us to go: why are we doing this, and how does this impact us?

The conversations that we had were so amazing because we were able to explain what the situation was, knowing that a lot of these colleges are dealing with new Canadians, and the ability to have an open conversation – quite often the colleges are the people that are working with these folks that already have really, really solid protocols for sexual assault and domestic violence and many other things and are able to have another tool in their tool kit should they hear something about this. Imagine if under the circumstances they had heard through their discussions that they're having with folks that this situation was occurring and the ability not only to help a little girl but even to help a family in this situation.

The member had mentioned about the opportunities of other legislation coming forward. There is a lot of transformative legislation that can happen in this place, but until we start these difficult conversations and are willing to actually have it within this space – it's difficult for all of us, and we all come from very different places, with a lot of really important things that need to be spoken about. The member had spoken about that with the LGBTQ2S-plus community and transformational change that has to happen in there, the gender-reaffirming surgeries that we had actually spoken about, which is super important.

We just want to make sure that all of that important work has its place to be able to talk about that and that we're talking about this, that we're talking about little girls that are having an action put against them that is against their will in this country and, when they are sent overseas to have this procedure done, the incredible number of medical situations that can occur to their little bodies as they grow and have to deal with this and, on top of that, supports for survivors and potentially help to have reconstructive surgery when needed in order to be able to put their perfect bodies back the way they wanted them if that's what they choose to do.

I'm trying to remember the other questions that were asked. I apologize. I did write some of them down.

I wanted to also say that the member had mentioned about the seriousness and the gravity. I think that suggesting that one situation has more seriousness and gravity than another one puts us into a situation where we're choosing. I think all of the discussions that we're having in here as a result of this discussion show the seriousness and gravity of how it is that we protect our public and how as a Legislature, when we say that we're going to protect girls and women, we're going to protect girls and women.

If I may say, I've met hundreds of women in this province. Was the actual procedure done in Alberta? Not as far as we know. Are procedures being done in North America? Yes, they are. In fact, in the United States, because federal legislation was only available and state legislation was not available, girls were continuing to be cut in places like Michigan, because the federal legislation and the state legislation didn't align.

I also wanted to mention the many networks that are organizing around the world globally to end this practice, again, just to reinforce that this isn't us as a western culture trying to impose our ideas onto a different culture. This has been led completely by the cultures that are trying to change and alter the way that girls are being treated. You can imagine: just put yourself into a situation for a moment in a different country whereby your value is being measured over whether you will be promiscuous or dirty. Those are the languages that are used when a girl is not cut or sewn up. This isn't in any way to point fingers at anybody. This is thousands of years of cultural practice that have come into play that have determined the go-forward. That girl that is going to a different group, going to a different family is worth – her value is increased because she has been cut. Everything that goes along with that facilitation of her marrying into, you know, the neighbouring family or whatever that is is about elevating her value.

Imagine if we as a western nation are able to help our counterparts across the world to show what the value of a girl is and find other ways to show coming of age and opportunities to really develop how it is that we treat girls and how it is that we see that development and the importance of their development and who they are, that we do not need to alter them for them to be clean or not promiscuous. Those are just a couple of those things.

Imagine for a moment the labia minora being sewn up and that there's only a tiny, little hole for a girl to menstruate and urinate through. And then, on top of that, you add in the aspect of intercourse or anything like that when she's of age and she gets married and what that's like for that person. And then you add, on top of that, that she gets pregnant and delivers a baby and has to be opened and then sewn shut again. It doesn't need to happen here, and we don't need to know a direct example of that to know that it's happening and that there are girls and women who are impacted by that. We know that. We've talked to the doctors; we've talked to the organizations. We know that this is happening. We just don't know how to prevent it yet.

This legislation is enabling legislation to help all of us learn a little bit more about how we can be there for our people, whether you're a person who just got off the airplane yesterday and are starting your life in Canada and, hopefully, Alberta or if you've been here for seven, eight, 10 generations.

One of the things that was very profound for me that I read – there's an organization called Our Daughters. In it one of the women – her name is Ifrah. She started this organization, and the entire mandate is: let's make sure that our daughters don't suffer the way that we did. Again, it is led by the associations and the women, these powerful women, in cultures who are coming forward to defend their daughters.

I think that as a multicultural society, a beautiful province that wants to fling her doors open to everybody and anybody who wants to come here and be successful, not only do we look at health care, but we have to look at racism, we have to look at bigotry, and we have to look at the way that women are marginalized in the system. We have to look at so many different things.

But if we have the tools to be able to make ourselves better and to understand it and to be able to ask the questions – I spoke to one of the doctors. Oh, gosh, this is going back four and a half years ago. They had mentioned that they had seen a woman, several women, actually, that had been altered, and if you can imagine, they were able to ask questions about abuse like ligature marks and other things that are on women's bodies if they've gone through physical abuse. They were able to ask questions about that, but they were not comfortable asking about an alteration of the labia or a cut of the clitoris, because they didn't know how to ask the question. These are professionals who probably have every conversation imaginable with a person when they're on the table, but they were terrified to ask the question, too, because they didn't want to be offensive or, you know, talk about something that they didn't know about. We need and have responsibility, because we know that this is happening, to make sure that we have the opportunity to educate people.

If it's one girl or if it's 10,000 girls, it doesn't matter. What matters is that we elevate the discussion around that protection, and that will lead to other legislation, some of what the member was talking about, which I think is really important, but also around other cultural practices that countries are trying desperately to end like child marriage, like honour beatings, and like honour killings. I wish I could tell you that I hadn't had experience with that in my own families, but unfortunately, like most families, we have history in our own of these kinds of behaviours.

So it's very, very personal for me, and it's really, really important that as a person from a Southeast Asian background I'm able to share these experiences with you and that we can pass legislation that I think will elevate all of us and, hopefully, lead to other pieces of legislation that are equally transformational and that understand the seriousness and the gravity of all of the things that we're dealing with.

Thank you so much.

Private Bills Committee of the Whole

Bill Pr. 2 Calgary Heritage Authority Amendment Act, 2022

The Chair: Are there speakers to the bill? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you. We are discussing Bill Pr. 2, Calgary Heritage Authority Amendment Act, 2022, in Committee of the Whole. I stand in support of Pr. 2, something that we know is supported by the city of Calgary and the Ministry of Municipal Affairs, but I was also thinking that this was a bill that would be amended, as was recommended by the committee. An amendment to Pr. 2, I think, would follow the recommendations of the committee and improve this piece of legislation. Specifically, I believe we're looking for an amendment that would address liability of the authority with respect to loss or damage.

Having said that, with that amendment this particular piece of legislation is really going to make some very straightforward changes to change the legal name of the Calgary Heritage Authority to Heritage Calgary, to clarify the definition of heritage resources and the activities of the authority, and to modernize its governance framework. As I mentioned, again, there is agreement between the stakeholders involved as well as support from the city of Calgary and the Ministry of Municipal Affairs.

This piece of legislation will also, through various sections, change some of the definitions, including adding the words "director," "executive director," "inventory of evaluated historic resources," "board," and expanding the concept of heritage resource with specific categories of items to be included such as buildings, historical landscapes, culturally significant areas.

I want to thank the committee that reviewed Pr. 2 as well as the petitioner, the general manager on behalf of what is currently the Calgary Heritage Authority, for bringing this forward. This piece of legislation was discussed at the committee, and I'm very pleased that all parties are in support of it, particularly with the one amendment that will improve this piece of legislation.

On behalf of the Official Opposition I'm very pleased to have spoken briefly to this Pr. 2.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the hon. Opposition House Leader for her great remarks. I appreciate that.

I'd like to rise now and move an amendment. Would you like me to read that?

The Chair: No. I would like your copies and the original.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Okay. Here you go.

The Chair: This will be known as amendment A1.
Hon. member, please proceed.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Perfect. Thank you, Madam Chair. Essentially, the amendment that I'm moving on Pr. 2 is to clarify the extent of the authority's limitation of liability. It is important to ensure that petitioners are not being granted powers or rights that would be extraordinary when compared to what is provided to other entities under the public law of Alberta.

Some of the parts of subsection (2) limit the liability of directors in relation to the authority. Others, however, relate to liability of directors in dealing with third parties. From a legal standpoint it is important to ensure that organizations are not entirely limited from liability. Otherwise, their acts, omissions, even if caused through an employee or director, could result in significant damage, loss, or injury to a third party that has no legal recourse to be compensated.

With that, I move this amendment. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there others to speak to the amendment?

Seeing none, I will call the question on amendment A1 as moved by the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

[Motion on amendment A1 carried]

8:00

The Chair: Are there any members wishing to speak to the bill as amended? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much. Just briefly, Madam Chair. I'd certainly agree with the comments made by my colleague on this side just a few minutes ago. The general manager: I certainly know that person, and I believe that the petition to make the changes that are identified here will assist in not only governance but ultimately, I believe, in the protection of important historical resources in Calgary, something that – many people in Calgary believe not enough protection goes on. I know that there has to be some remuneration to property owners if this action is taken but not if the provincial government takes the action.

In any event, the city of Calgary will be better served by a more streamlined and better functioning entity, and I certainly want to support that happening not only for the protection of built structures but other significant structures in the Calgary area.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak?

If not, I will call the question.

[The remaining clauses of Bill Pr. 2 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Any opposed? Carried.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Chair. I move that the Committee of the Whole rise and report Bill 10, Bill 24, and Bill Pr. 2.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Mrs. Frey: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bills: Bill 10 and Bill 24. The committee reports the following bill with some amendments: Bill Pr. 2. I wish to table copies of amendments considered by Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. That is carried.

Private Bills Third Reading

Bill Pr. 2 Calgary Heritage Authority Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Excellent. Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to rise today to move third reading of Bill Pr. 2, Calgary Heritage Authority Amendment Act, 2022.

One thing I really appreciate about Heritage Calgary is that they maintain the sites and its inventory but in some cases find a way to come up with new and creative uses for some of these facilities, and I just wanted to share a quick story about how a church that was built in 1911 made the decision to use their building to provide shelter and food for the homeless many years later. They took in a 15-year-old boy who went on to found an organization that impacted thousands of people. That organization eventually outgrew that church and moved to another heritage site, the electric warehouse, which was used to help thousands more.

Most of us could not imagine Calgary without the Mustard Seed and would lament the loss of these structures on our landscape. These buildings are not just part of our past, but they're also part of our future and who we are as a people. The preservation and celebration of our past builds a future and a culture for our children.

As I have previously spoken to this bill, I didn't want to talk too long on it, but I wanted to give this one example of the importance of preserving these historical buildings. With that, I will sit down.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you. I certainly want to support Bill Pr. 2. I'm also conscious that there are many other structures in Calgary that the Calgary Heritage Authority, now going to be called Heritage Calgary, I think, has taken issue with and wants to see preserved and has met with resistance. They try and negotiate as best possible to save as much as they can. One of those buildings, older structures, is the Calgary brewery site in Inglewood, where there is a rather large development plan for it, and hopefully some of it will be saved for the future generations to understand what the industrial landscape looked like in Calgary in the 1900s, early 1900s.

But with this private bill before us, Bill Pr. 2, I certainly want to say that the members of the opposition support it.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others wishing to speak?

Seeing none, would the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein like to close debate?

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: No. I'm good.

[Motion carried; Bill Pr. 2 read a third time]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to thank everyone for their participation tonight. I would argue that we have record progress and record speed. With that, I would move that the Assembly be adjourned until 9 a.m. tomorrow, which will be Thursday, May 26, 2022.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 8:07 p.m.]

Prayers

The Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interest and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 10

Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. Can I just check: are we moving then, today, into third reading?

The Speaker: Correct. You're moving.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, sir. I just wanted to make sure I was in the right spot.

It is with great honour that I rise today to move the third reading of Bill 10, Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022.

First of all, I have few people that I would like to just take a moment to thank. As the former minister for the status of women it's my absolute privilege to have worked with the present Associate Minister of Status of Women on this bill. It takes an entire House of people to bring these kinds of things together, and when you're able to do this work together, it just feels incredibly special. It's one of those moments that I won't forget in a very long time, so thank you so much, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the present Status of Women associate minister. I am absolutely and beyond grateful – and to the Minister of Health as well.

There has been so much consultation and work that's gone into this. It's been a passion project for many of us, but mostly I would just like to be very clear in understanding that we are supporting leaders in their fight against female genital mutilation globally, including women affected by this in the diasporas that have really led this discussion and have created organizations and foundations, including – and if you have a moment to take a look at these foundations, it's extremely enlightening to understand the work that is going on globally – Dear Daughter campaign, the Irfaa Foundation, and broader networks like End FGM and End FGM Canada.

With the summer holidays that are coming up – and we're all looking forward to spending time with our families – for some girls: they will be shipped off for the cutting season. Bill 10 offers a chance for all of us to have a discussion and raise awareness around issues of female genital mutilation, and subsequently we'll give voices to all of those who have suffered and to understand the practice but, hopefully, to be able to end this practice.

Bill 10 will offer supports to victims, including supports for necessary protections for children at risk and supports to manage the resulting physical and psychological trauma for girls and women who have underwent FGM.

When a society displays that it understands and it empathizes with girls and women who have undergone this practice, it actually elevates a whole bunch of discussions around sexual assault and domestic violence, around the protection of girls and women, child marriage, honour beatings, and honour killings. That elevation and that discussion raise all of the discussions that are so important to so many people in this province. When we display that empathy, we will be able to show not only support for people who are coming forward, the stigma and the terrifying positions that some of these women and families have found themselves in, but be able to support them on their journey to healing and well-being and to potentially even be able to come forth and speak about it.

That's been one of the most profound moments for me in this journey with speaking to women who had actually undergone this process and hearing from them not only the trauma that they've gone through but also the questions that they had about their own selves and their families and what to do in the future for their own daughters. What we're seeing now is that this movement of women and men and folks across the world is that they're paving a way so that it doesn't happen to their daughters.

I also want to thank ministry folks, past and present, that are in the ministries right now. Also, a dear friend of mine, Giselle Portenier, who, as you know, has a documentary in the name of her daughter, and it was, again, another one of those moments in my life that profoundly changed the way that I look at things.

It was sort of a moment in time for me four and a half years ago, when human trafficking, female genital mutilation, and all of these – we know that it's happening, we know that it's going on, but we actually started honest and forthright discussions about these issues. As you know, for all of us in this House these conversations and the legislation that have been brought forward in this House, that we've all shared and worked on, will hopefully work towards prevention but give us all tools in our tool kits to be able to help not only survivors but work in the area of prevention of these horrible things that are going on after decades and even centuries of suffering under harsh practices inflicted onto women and girls. These are in the name of cultural practices, patriarchy, and traditional gender norms. It's really time to change the status quo and to stand in support of women and girls and in their quest for equality and justice.

I would just like to thank again the folks in this House and also the opposition for their wonderful contributions to this, for asking such very, very important questions, and for the robust debate. I've learned so much in the questions that folks asked in here, pushed even harder for us to find and get details and to make sure that we were able to make sure that this legislation was what it was and that the intention is extremely honourable for the work that needs to be done. Thank you again, because this is one of those moments where we stand together. When we say that we're going to protect women and girls, we're actually going to do that. In Alberta we are the first province in Canada to bring legislation forward like this. We were the first province to do the proclamations and the declarations about female genital mutilation. Again, very, very grateful for the opportunity to stand here after 11 years of working on this. It's been very emotional, and I'm very honoured.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to third reading of Bill 10, Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022. Let me start off by thanking the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore for bringing forward this piece of legislation. Certainly, it's an important piece of legislation. It's important to raise awareness about this practice and violation of basic, basic human dignity and right.

In this day and age, Mr. Speaker, there are still, according to WHO, World Health Organization, 200 million girls and women alive around the globe who have been put through this horrible, horrible practice; 200 million women. As the member mentioned even in her remarks this morning, in some way, shape, or manner it's still happening in Canada as well, that girls and women are shipped over to their countries to undergo this torture. I think the said bill is important to raise awareness, but at the same time this bill doesn't go far enough to provide tools to the relevant departments, be that law enforcement, be that some other department, to find out: who are those people who are co-ordinating that practice, and why is it that women and girls are shipped off to undergo that practice in this day and age? Nonetheless, it is a good piece of legislation. It gave us as legislators an opportunity to discuss this practice here and an opportunity for all Albertans to learn about this basic violation of human dignity and rights of women.

Speaking of human rights and women, when we talk about human rights, when we talk about women's rights, when we talk about women's dignity, when we talk about their equality, when we talk about justice about them, then we shouldn't be selective. We should be supporting all of their rights, and we should be supporting their equality and their ability to control decisions impacting them as well.

Three weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, three or four weeks ago now, the Supreme Court of the United States overturned Roe and Wade. That was a decision that was in place for almost five decades protecting a woman's right to get an abortion, protecting the basic woman's right to their bodily autonomy, and in this Chamber many times my colleagues asked the current Associate Minister of Status of Women and the Health minister whether they will get up and affirm women's rights to their bodily autonomy and condemn the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The answer we were getting was that it's a decision of a court of a foreign jurisdiction that we don't have any influence over and all that.

Here this morning we were listening to the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore on how it's important to be a part of a global cause even though this practice is criminally banned here in Canada, but it's important for us that we be a part of a global moment for a basic human dignity and women's right issue. I wholeheartedly agree that we should. We cannot stay on the sidelines. We cannot stay silent, that if it's not happening here, it doesn't impact us. I totally agree with the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore that events happening around us, violations of human rights happening around us, violations of women's rights happening around us: it's important that we weigh in and we stand against those violations.

It's critically important, and it is for that reason that we ask this government to take a clear stance on the Supreme Court of the United States issue as well, because that impacts women's rights across North America, but we didn't hear a word about that, because then it's an ideological consideration for this government.

Again, when we are talking about basic human dignity and rights, then we should talk about that by rising above and beyond our partisan interests.

Mr. Speaker, you may recall this, that back in 2018, when the NDP was in government, we brought forward a bubble-zone legislation.

The purpose of that legislation was to put a bubble zone around facilities that provide abortion services so that women seeking those services can do so without any harassment, without any intimidation, and be able to exercise their right over their bodily autonomy in a harassment-free manner. In this Legislature, with members of this UCP – the PC and Wildrose; I think that at that time they had merged – every time that issue came to a vote, they ran out of this Legislature; 13 times.

There was also an issue of human rights. That's an issue of women's rights. We should not put partisan qualification on women's rights. We should stand for all of their rights. This practice of FGM is a horrible violation of their bodily autonomy and their rights. We should stand against that, and based on the same principle, when there is an attack on women's right to exercise their bodily autonomy – it doesn't matter where it happens – we should also stand against that. Instead of dodging questions – that somehow on decisions of some foreign jurisdiction, of some foreign court, that this government has no control over, we should not say anything – I think we should stop peddling those kinds of double standards. Violation of one's human rights, regardless of where they are, is a violation of every human's rights.

The second thing. I also want to mention – and I guess that was just recent – that 21 kids were shot in Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will explain why it relates to this debate. They were killed mercilessly. In 2020 the leading cause of death of kids in the United States was no longer motor vehicle accidents; it was shootings. Those are the stats publicly available. Most parties of conservative leanings, whether they are in the States or in Canada, will passionately engage in debate against abortion based on their right-to-life arguments, and they will stand against a woman's right to choose, a woman's right to exercise bodily autonomy in their decisions. But now that so many kids are getting killed – and that will impact us as well. There was a gun found in Bowness high school just a week ago. I'm glad that the administration and police were able to safely handle that situation.

When we talk about these issues, we get so partisan about access to abortion services and women's right to exercise their own will in their own decisions that we will go as far as blocking these efforts and not say anything about what impact Roe versus Wade will have in Canada.

We will never engage in debate around proliferation of guns. That is actually killing more kids in the United States than anything else. That certainly is happening in Alberta, too. In Calgary alone there were 59 shootings this year alone, and more than 50 per cent of those guns are not lawfully obtained or anything. Those things are also impacting people's rights, are impacting Albertans' safety and security.

But back to this bill, I would say that it's an important piece of legislation. It will certainly help us raise awareness around this practice. As I said, it doesn't go far enough to create means and tools so that we can find out who those groups are who are sending girls and women back to those countries where they can still be subject to this kind of inhumane treatment, inhumane torture. We should do everything in our capacity to block these practices and uphold basic human rights, basic women's rights, and basic dignity of all girls and women.

Whenever there is an issue, whether it's happening here or somewhere in our neighbourhood, somewhere around the globe, that impacts basic human dignity, we should rise above our partisan interests and speak in favour of human rights and human dignity without any qualification.

With that, I will take my seat on this side of the House. I will be supporting this piece of legislation, and I hope my colleagues will do the same.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this very, incredibly important bill. I'd like to thank the member for bringing it forward and for shepherding it through this House and ensuring that it passed in an efficient and speedy manner.

You know, there is really nothing that I would support more than the central argument of this particular bill, and that is the ultimate right for people to have bodily integrity and not to have other people assault their bodily integrity and take that away from them.

I'm sure everyone in the House knows that I spent many years working in the area of child sexual abuse, and that again is the core issue of that area of concern. You know, the resulting trauma from having your bodily integrity violated is really one of the most fundamentally abusive experiences that anyone can experience, whatever the cause, whatever the nature of the assault is.

As a result of that, we have come, thankfully, to a place now in modern society where we understand that that has to be underneath everything else that we do. We certainly can make rules and regulations and ask people to engage in things, but your bodily integrity is something that must be maintained. It's a complex argument, isn't it? It's a very difficult line to walk sometimes because sometimes it's very clear for us.

When I was working in the area of child sexual abuse, it was very clear to me that one should not rape a six-year-old child. Nobody would disagree with that. But by the time I got up to working with kids that were 16 years of age, suddenly there were arguments: "Well, maybe there was some reason that this should happen or not happen. Maybe we should treat it differently." What was happening was that people were losing the underlying argument about human bodily integrity being the fundamental issue here, and I sometimes find the same thing happening with female genital mutilation.

For me, it's absolutely clear: there's absolutely no circumstance where a nonmedical procedure should be done to anyone's body. I think it's fundamental that we respect that integrity of the human body. But we see groups coming forward saying, "But it's part of our culture, part of our faith" or whatever else, and I just really want to spend a few moments trying to talk about that. First of all, it isn't part of any religion, for no one at all. It isn't a doctrine of faith for anyone. It simply is a cultural practice. It's a habit done by a group of people sometimes using religion as the shield for doing it, and we have to be very careful not to allow that kind of imposition of cultural habit or excuse to suddenly make us forget the fundamental question here, and that is the question of bodily integrity.

You know, I think that we are in a difficult place here in this province because we are trying at the same time to welcome people into our province, to celebrate the various attitudes and cultural practices and belief systems from around the world because we know that that kind of plurality of ideas and expressions of self actually lead to a better society. But at some point, sometimes we have to be able to say that you cannot claim our desire for multiculturalism, our desire for a diverse society as a right to take away some fundamental underlying right, and that's essentially what's happening here in the area of female genital mutilation.

We then have a very difficult argument, because we need to be able to say: we welcome you, whoever you are, however you express yourself, and we accept that you may want to do things in a way that is different than we do things. But there's a point at which we have to say no. There's a point at which we have to say that we understand that it may be a habitual practice in a place where you come from, but it cannot ever find root as a habitual practice or a practice ever under any circumstances in a place that has an underlying philosophical belief system in the integrity of the human person and the human rights that are associated with that person.

I think that legislation of this kind is very important because it signals very strongly that we have drawn that line, that we have said that while we're open to all kinds of diversity, there are some things we simply cannot because they are a violation of human rights. We understand that human rights imply the ability to choose how you live your life, but at some point, if your choice of human rights violates the rights of another person, then we can no longer support your choice. It's a difficult line to draw, but I'm glad that this member has been focused on what is important and has worked through that and gotten us to a place where we can say that this is a clear statement about the underlying value of humanity and the underlying value of an individual to determine control of their own body.

I really think that we have to take a little bit of time to look at: why would this even exist in this world? Unfortunately, I simply have to say that this is a reflection of a history that we all share in this world of a culture of patriarchy and misogyny. The purposes of this practice, even in the places that are doing it, are not for the benefit of the person who is subject to the female genital mutilation but, rather, for the benefit of the male segment of society so that they can fulfill some fantastical belief about the purity of the person that they're going to marry or the daughter that they're essentially going to sell off to another community, to another person. It's a reflection back to the idea that somehow women are the chattel of men and that women's only existence is to satisfy the needs and desires of men, including the needs and desires to marry a woman who is deemed pure within a culture. This kind of absolute patriarchal violence towards women is completely unacceptable.

It's really important for us in this House to be absolutely clear that the issue isn't just female genital mutilation, but it is the philosophical ideas that lead to that kind of thing becoming a possibility. Those ideas were encapsulated in patriarchy and misogyny. It's very important for us as citizens and government representatives in this province to take a very clear stance against patriarchy and misogyny, to understand when it is being played out in our society in any manner, whether it's directed towards female genital mutilation or any of the other violations of women's rights, and to exorcise that horrendous approach and that dictation of what is right or wrong to women and who they are, how they express themselves, and to the integrity of their body.

It is important that we continue the process of rooting out that horrendous philosophical idea that somehow men can make decisions over women and over women's bodies, the same way we have done that with saying that slavery is illegal and wrong because it is taking control over someone else's body, the same way we have said that child sexual abuse is wrong because it is violating the integrity of that person's body. Whenever we see an expression of that patriarchy in any area of society, it is requisite upon all of us to stop it and to eliminate that expression in all of its various forms so that we can stop that which is underpinning these kinds of horrendous things such as female genital mutilation. That's hard to do because, like most people, individuals who are involved in the patriarchy believe that they have come to that place by a birthright. They have that right because of just who they are: that's the way it's always been, that's the way my dad was, that's the way my grandfather was. They cite history and tradition as somehow being correct and therefore being inviolate in terms of assault from those of us who understand that that kind of attitude is really and completely unacceptable.

I want to spend my last few minutes calling on, particularly, the men in this House and the men in society to work very hard on an antimisogynistic set of laws and practices in this House and in society to ensure that we root out that which supports the violence of female genital mutilation. We've got a long way to go. It has only been in the last 100 years that we've even begun to recognize some of the ways in which this is going on. We still have many traditions that seem small and minor, but in fact they're actually a reflection of that.

You know, still at most weddings the father gives away the bride. It's a fascinating expression that she does not give of herself freely to a partner, but her father gives her away. Now, I understand that there's family tradition around what that's about and so on, but I also want people to reflect on the fact that that says, on some level, that that father owns that daughter and is giving that daughter away, that the daughter is not freely choosing to do that. I think that those are the kinds of things that we have to start to change.

There's nothing wrong with a family coming together and celebrating the marriage of a daughter, but to believe that somehow this is not her choice but, rather, the family selling the daughter off is one that we have to be very careful about. This is a minor example, but it's just an example about how you don't think about the things that are part of the patriarchy. They just seem kind of normal and natural and kind of even fun and nice, yet when you examine "What is the root of that? What is that a reflection of?" you realize that we have to do more self-reflection and understanding about the ways in which patriarchy is inherent in our society, and we have to begin to act in a way that does not do that. This is not a new concept. When I was married, I didn't choose to have that sort of father-giving-away-the-bride kind of thing happening; instead, both parents came together to celebrate the union of their children.

This kind of thing has been happening for a long time but not by everyone, and it's time for all of us to get together to focus on the horrendous, traumatic abuse that exists in areas such as female genital mutilation and child sexual abuse and understand that there are ways in which our culture supports that kind of mentality and that our job is not only to stop the outcome but to stop the inputs, and that is inputs through a philosophy of misogyny and patriarchy. All of us here in this House are in positions where we can choose to do that in a way that would lead the community that we serve.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has the call.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's definitely a privilege to be able to rise this morning to add a few comments to Bill 10, the Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022. Of course, I will also start by thanking the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore for bringing this forward, for all of her work – you know, I think what was said was shepherding this through the House – for her passion on the subject. But I also want to thank her because she has also given me an opportunity to reflect where we've been, to think about where we're going, and also given me the opportunity to reaffirm something.

You know, perhaps the member might remember that I got a chance to do this back in the 29th Legislature, and it all revolved around my time as I was learning how to be a relief rep for my union, and the individual that was teaching me taught me something very, very critical. She was the embodiment of a mentor, somebody who today I still consider a mentor to me. Up until my opportunity to work with her, essentially, I always felt that when it came to women's issues – I mean, what could I say? I'm just a man. Like, I can't have an opinion about that. She taught me that that was wrong. She taught me that I can actually have an opinion on these things, because by not having one, my silence promoted that, I guess, complicity in things.

You know, I was able to be able to stand up with confidence and say that these things that are holding women back, that are making their lives more difficult: I can actually say that they're wrong. I have that permission now to do that. Because of this bill, you've given me the opportunity to be able to reaffirm that yet again, like I did back in the 29th Legislature. That's very exciting.

Now, upon the reflection – and I know my friend from Edmonton-Rutherford had talked about this a little bit. I mean, we've certainly come a long way with regard to women's rights, equality, equal pay, but we're not there. There's still an incredible amount of work to do, and it's incumbent upon us to be able to support those types of things with things like the strongest language possible that, you know, there's no doubt about it, there's no room for interpretation where people can sometimes get creative. You know, I'm very much in favour of the language that I see within Bill 10 because it's clear. It's saying: "No. This is wrong, full stop." There's no room for interpretation around that, and that's the kind of thing that I like to see.

With all that work that has yet to still happen – and, you know, fingers crossed, I'm hoping that maybe I'll even see that work completed in my lifetime. It's funny how here we are in the 21st century. There are signs that fights that have already happened to try to advance women's rights now may be at threat yet again. We're seeing that south of the border. I honestly thought that maybe those discussions were finally done. We're there. We've arrived. But now we seem to be backsliding, and it's incumbent upon all of us in this Chamber to make it absolutely clear that we won't stand for that. It will not be allowed to fall back. Bill 10 allows us to do something like that.

Now, you know, as was mentioned earlier, Roe versus Wade: I mean, that was a Supreme Court decision and enshrined in legislation, and now all of that is at risk. Fingers crossed again, I hope this will never ever become at risk. If it does, those that come after us, I hope, will fight as hard to protect it as we're trying to do today with this piece of legislation and others going forward.

Standing with the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore, you know, I am going to continue to ask the government to do everything they can, for instance with the health care system, to fund it as fully as possible so that women and girls have every single opportunity to access the health care they need when they need it, and that means doctors in rural Alberta, no doubts about what they're able to access, no hurdles to get around. Anything less, I think, will do a disservice to Bill 10, and we can't allow that. We just absolutely cannot allow that.

I don't know if there's a lot more that I can actually add to that. Again, I do want to thank the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore for bringing this forward. There's much more work to do. Again, maybe I'll reiterate the call that my friend from Edmonton-

Rutherford made. As the men in this room we must stand united behind women to make sure their rights are upheld, that we get to actual equality, because we're not there yet. We don't have that. Women are not equal, and they should be. My gosh. We're in the 21st century already. We have to step up to fight.

Not only do we have to do that; we also have to be willing to call out those that don't. Hence my recommitment to being able to say: I can have an opinion. It is all right. I can stand and say: female genital mutilation is wrong, period, full stop. No other excuses apply.

I really appreciate the opportunity available to add those comments, to be able to stand with the member in support of Bill 10. I would certainly urge every member of this House to stand firmly in support of it. My hope is that, going forward, again, hopefully maybe in my lifetime, we will actually see full, one hundred per cent equality and the chance for women to shine the way they should have many, many, many years ago. I look forward to that time.

Thank you for the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to be able to add some comments around this.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing and hearing none, I am prepared to call on the hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore to close debate.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. Thank you so much to everybody today who contributed to this debate. I thought I would close out our debate today by reiterating some of the very important parts of the legislation that are very strong and have enhanced the legislation that came before us with respect to the prohibition and the procurement and the performance of female genital mutilation. Some stuff that had come up earlier when we were talking was about what this legislation actually does in order to draw that line in the sand, and thank you so much, through you, Mr. Speaker, to my colleagues across the way for those comments. It is so important to have clarity.

I'd also like to say that I stand with women and I stand for women's reproductive rights, and I will do everything that I can from my side to make sure that as we go forward on all of those issues, we are working collaboratively every single moment on all of that. I am so grateful for this debate.

The approval of the proposed legislation, should we pass this today, will expressly state that:

1.11(1) A regulated member shall not procure or perform female genital mutilation.

(2) A person who has been convicted of a criminal offence related to the procurement or performance of female genital mutilation is not eligible for registration as a regulated member under this Act.

Requiring that notice, information, or a complaint alleging the procurement or performance of FGM be automatically referred to a law enforcement agency.

Prohibiting a complaint alleging procurement or the provision of FGM made against a regulated health professional to be referred to an alternative complaints resolution.

Requiring that a regulated member's practice permit and registration be cancelled immediately after the regulated member has been convicted of a criminal offence related to the procurement or performance of FGM.

Prohibiting a person to apply for reinstatement of their practice permit and registration if the practice or the registration have been cancelled as a result of a decision of unprofessional conduct based in whole or in part on a conviction associated with the procurement or provision of FGM.

Requiring that a regulated health professional, while acting in their professional capacity, or a college if they have reason to believe that a regulated health professional has procured or performed FGM.

Requiring that if the governing body of a similar profession in Canada, the U.S., or another performed FGM, that the college cancel the regulated member's registration.

Requiring a college council to adopt standards of practice respecting FGM. Standards of practice would address matters ranging from education or training related to the prevention and prohibition of FGM, supporting its victims in securing or providing further supports that may be necessary to protect a child at risk, and also how to manage the resulting physical and psychological trauma to support a victim.

I'm so grateful to have been able to share this time with you. I also wanted to state that we have come a long way. Legislation like this helps us to keep building and to be adding to the discussion around the safety of our girls and women not only in Canada but globally. This gives us all a little bit more permission today in Canada to say that the things that we believe in and we stand by, we are going to legislate on to make sure that they are protected.

I would like to end with this. The exercise of being able to come before this space for legislation is not about pointing fingers or having a western philosophy imposed, what we believe is something we need to change on another culture or their practices. Some of these practices have been going on for thousands of years. It's taken the entire globe to come forward and have a discussion around this to decide where we need to go and what needs to happen, particularly in women's equality and equity and standing up for women's rights globally.

The most important thing that we can do is elevate the discussion and have those educational tools but also strengthen existing legislation to give people the opportunities to make sure that there are outcomes that lead towards prevention, that lead towards maybe saving one little girl from this happening to her but that also strengthen legislation so that there are consequences for this behaviour. In Canada we have the opportunity to do that. When we talk to folks in Africa or other nations, they're dealing with this from the perspective of their culture and how they're trying to fix this, and I respect that so much. I've learned so much from them.

Thank you again for the debate. Thank you for the opportunity. I'm absolutely blown away and honoured to have had the opportunity to bring this before the Legislature.

Thank you.

Bill 24

Miscellaneous Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. chief government whip on behalf of the Government House Leader.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise on behalf of the Government House Leader today to move third reading of Bill 24, the Miscellaneous Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

As noted previously in the House, the Miscellaneous Statutes Amendment Act allows lawmakers to make minor changes to laws to correct anomalies, to correct inconsistencies, outdated terminology, and errors, or to provide clarification in provincial laws. I want to thank everyone for their support yesterday, through you, Mr. Speaker, and urge all members to vote in favour of third reading.

The Speaker: Hon. members, third reading of Bill 24, Miscellaneous Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. Are there others wishing to join in the debate? Questions, comments, or otherwise?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call on the minister to close debate.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, May 26, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, we will now be led in the singing of God Save the Queen by Ms Brooklyn Elhard. I'd invite you to participate in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

God save our gracious Queen,
Long live our noble Queen,
God save the Queen!
Send her victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us,
God save the Queen!

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: I'm not sure what it is, but I feel like there's a little enthusiasm and anticipation in our voices this afternoon, for good things that lie ahead, I'm sure.

Hon. members, I am pleased to introduce to you for a final time – well, I would never presuppose a decision of the Assembly, but it's certainly the last time I'm going to be introducing them. They are the retiring pages. We had the opportunity to celebrate them today over the lunch hour and read their letter to the Assembly yesterday, but I have invited them to have a different perspective on QP today. They are seated in the Speaker's gallery. I invite you to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. [Standing ovation]

Hon. members, also joining us in the galleries today are a group senior high school students and teachers from the Calvin Christian School in the constituency of Cardston-Siksika. I would ask that you rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Also seated in the members' gallery today is Indra Ramayan, a guest of the Minister of Indigenous Relations. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

I also have noticed a number of legislative staff members. All of us in this Assembly know that without those keen and capable and willing staff members, we are unable to do our roles. So if you are a legislative staffer and you're in the gallery today, please rise and receive the thanks of the Assembly.

Finally, seated in the members' gallery today are the family of Emma Hopper, the director of research and policy for the United Conservative caucus. Please join me in welcoming her parents and brother: Christopher Hopper, Michelle Hopper, and her brother Benjamin Hopper. Please rise, if you're able, and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview's 10th Anniversary Reflections

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, for the past 10 years I've had the honour of representing the people of Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview in this Chamber. I'd like to offer my congratulations to the members for Calgary-Hays and Cypress-Medicine Hat for also reaching this milestone of service. It has been and continues to be a thrill to be able to rise in this Chamber to highlight our constituents' concerns, raise their issues, and to be their representative in the House. That is why each and every one of us was sent here, to stand up for our constituents and be their voice.

But we don't get here by ourselves. As I reflect on the last 10 years, I want to take the opportunity to thank the many people who helped me get here. I want to acknowledge first the people of Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, who for the past three elections have put their trust in me to stand up for them. While we all claim to represent the best constituencies in Alberta, I have to tell this House that I actually do represent the best constituency. A heartfelt thank you to the dedicated volunteers who worked so hard over the past 16 years to send me here, and the same to the team of staff that I've had the honour of working with over the past 10 years, both in my constituency office and here at the Legislature.

I want to thank the stakeholders, small businesses, entrepreneurs, and community organizations who I've worked with these past 10 years to serve Alberta and the people of Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. I also want to thank my caucus colleagues, truly the hardest working caucus in the country. Importantly, I want to offer my thanks to the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, a strong, compassionate, brilliant leader who I look forward to calling Premier after the next election. The last 10 years in this Assembly have taught me that it's critical that each and every member say thank you to each and every person who enabled us to have the opportunity and entrusted us to do this important work.

I'd like to close with the words of Margaret Mead. "Never doubt that a small group of thoughtful, committed citizens can change the world; indeed, it's the only thing that ever has."

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

30th Legislature, Third Session, Reflections

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the spring session wraps up, I want to look back at the accomplishments of this Assembly. First, we marked a milestone in Alberta's recovery plan by passing Budget 2022. Our Minister of Finance presented a balanced budget for the first time in over a decade and delivered on a key commitment of this government to control spending and get our province's finances back on track. It's important for everyone to remember that the budget would not have been balanced if we had stayed on the same reckless spending trajectory of the NDP.

Alberta's government also continued to attract massive investment in aerospace, logistics, venture capital, manufacturing, and so much more while positioning Alberta for further investment in hydrogen, tourism, hemp, and film and television. To confront the rising cost of living driven by record inflation, the government eliminated the 13-cents-per-litre fuel tax and passed legislation to provide rebates on electricity bills. We know that Albertans are struggling with rising costs and recognize there's still more that needs to be done. Alberta's government continues to build on its strengths, support entrepreneurship, and promote diversification, through Alberta's recovery plan, into new and emerging sectors to attract investment and create more good-paying jobs for Albertans, which is helping to drive our unemployment rate to the lowest that it's been since 2015.

I also want to congratulate my friend and colleague from Highwood on passing the human tissue and organ donor act, Bill 205. Raising awareness and creating a mandatory referral process will save lives. I'd also like to congratulate and thank my colleague from Chestermere-Strathmore for championing Bill 10 and getting that important piece of legislation past the finish line. The Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022, brings up an uncomfortable topic, female genital mutilation. I admire her work on this, and as a man I acknowledge that we need to have these conversations no matter how uncomfortable they may be.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, our government has fulfilled close to 90 per cent of our campaign promises.

Catholic Education

Mr. Rowswell: Today is World Catholic Education Day. Mr. Speaker, I'm so grateful to live in a province where diversity is celebrated and where families can send their children to a school that permeates faith in daily education. Catholic education has a long history in this province and, in fact, were the first schools in Alberta. As society changed, so did education. We now have public, francophone, independent, public charter, and home education as well, but throughout the years Catholic education has held fast and stayed a pillar of community and faith across the province. Alberta's government supports school choice and has proven over and over that we are committed to maintaining that long-successful tradition of school choice in our province.

Mr. Speaker, when the members opposite were in office, they made a systematic effort to dismantle educational choice in Alberta. In their dogmatic view, public schools are the only schools worth funding. The NDP may preach tolerance and respect for diversity, but we've seen how empty their talking points were. Unlike the members opposite, who would defund everything except public schools, we believe that it is parents' right to choose the type of education that is best for their child. That's why this government passed the Choice in Education Act, which reaffirms that parents have the right to choose the kind of education they feel is best for their children, and that includes Catholic education. Parents, teachers, and students of faith can be assured that Catholic education will remain Alberta strong under a UCP government.

1:40 Racism and Hate Crime Prevention

Mr. Deol: Mr. Speaker, for months we have seen the tragically increasing instances of hate crimes in Alberta. Between January and March 2022 Edmonton police investigated 23 hate-motivated crimes. This has almost doubled from 2021. People have been assaulted, harassed, threatened, and abused. This must stop. Every Albertan has the right to feel safe and secure in every city, town, village, community, and neighbourhood in Alberta. We need our government to do more to ensure that this will happen.

We need a government that takes action, but sadly, when given the opportunity to take a meaningful step forward, the UCP took us backwards. Bill 204, created after months and months of consultations and work with stakeholders and racialized Albertans and which addressed the need to collect race-based data, was shot down by the UCP, who refused to even allow the bill to be debated.

What's more, for over a year the recommendations of the government's own antiracism advisory committee have been sitting on the government's desk, with little action to get these completed. These are critical recommendations that would break down barriers to accessing the justice system, and so much more than this government is allowing remains.

This government needs to ensure that there are no structural barriers based on race, language, background, or any other criteria. This government needs to ensure that no Albertan is left behind or unable to access the institutions that work for them. But for over a year now racialized Albertans have been watching and waiting while this government fails to do what is required of them. Now, with the Premier's resignation and the months of infighting that we are facing, that means that these critical recommendations will continue to be delayed and ignored. While the UCP fail to step up and address this issue, the Alberta NDP remain focused on tackling the root causes of racism.

Thank you.

United Conservative Party and Premier's Leadership

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, in spite of the centennial crises Alberta has faced, we've accomplished more in these last years than we've seen in generations: the Alberta Indigenous Opportunities Corporation, with genuine reconciliation. We see a leading model for genuine care and treatment for those suffering from addiction and the opioid crisis. We see school curriculum and school choice embedded deep into our legislation and into the identity of Alberta. We have a roaring economy in the film industry, in fintech, in agrifood. We see forestry having its best year ever. Oil and gas is back. The truth is that we even have a balanced budget for the first time in 14 years. The Oilers are going to win the cup. Alberta is on a roll.

The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that we have done this together as Albertans, as legislators, as a United Conservative movement. We have done this together, and we owe our Premier a debt of gratitude and thanks for the sacrifices he has made for the sake of this province.

Mr. Speaker, the legacy of this Premier is going to be opportunities for generations of families for decades to come, and I could not be more proud to be saying that today. The truth is that it is easier to destroy something good than it is to create it. It is easier to tear something down than build it up, and there are members in this Legislature who have made their career, quite literally, out of tearing down our province and our movement. The saddest part is that they're not necessarily members of the NDP. I'm asking every one of us, as we go forward as Albertans into this new season for what we are called to do, to consider how we can build, how we can be like the example of the Premier, who led in selfless service for the good of the province, who can try and build something up rather than tear it down.

I believe the only risk that we have as Conservatives and Albertans is from the inside. The NDP will come out, and they will try and destroy us. That is baked in. The question is: will we as Conservatives take up this obligation we have for the betterment of Albertans and work together united?

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Canadian Armed Forces in Edmonton

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to speak about the Edmonton Salutes Committee, which was established in 1997. I've been honoured to work with this dedicated team since 2015 in my former role as the Alberta government liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces and currently as a community member at large. The committee's mandate is to promote and recognize our local military community contributions, both at home and abroad.

The Edmonton Salutes membership is drawn from the city of Edmonton, corporate Edmonton, surrounding municipalities, and the government of Alberta. Military members from the 3rd Canadian Division support group, HMCS Nonsuch, and the Canadian Forces recruiting centre, prairies and north detachment Edmonton, representing army, navy, and air force, each have a seat at the table. The committee has collaborated to promote and support initiatives such as the freedom of the city parades and ceremonies commemorating the centennial battles of victories and soldiers' sacrifices; collaborating on the development of the former CFB Edmonton location, which is now the Griesbach neighbourhood; supporting the Military Family Resource Centre and other organizations seeking to recognize the military in the capital region; and supporting the arts by sharing experiences and honouring our Canadian Armed Forces stories in a variety of mediums.

I've been able to participate in troop deployments due to the hard work of this committee, and we were able to support soldiers as they departed to and/or returned from the Middle East and eastern Europe.

Times have changed, as have the needs. The MFRC, as a result, has really shown the character of doing more with less. As a result of COVID, it is estimated that the overall budget was cut by 15 per cent. The loss in fundraising dollars has been due to the inability to host fundraising events. With that in mind, I'm excited to share that the MFRC gala is returning, after a hiatus due to COVID, on June 4 and will be held on the eve of CAF Day. They are seeking donations, sponsorships, and auction items and, of course, hoping that individuals will be able to purchase tickets and attend. Let's show the MFRC our support.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Government Record

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Recently I was door-knocking in Calgary-Currie, and someone asked me: why do the NDP get to make these claims that never seem to come true, and when they get it wrong, they never apologize? I said: good question. The NDP did say that we would be blowing up mountains for coal mines and selling all of our parks, but none of that happened. We've all seen the lawn signs, and this will likely surprise you: the only government that sold a park since 2015 was actually the NDP. So the only ones actually trying to go breaking our parks was the NDP.

Health care and education. All they say is, "Cuts, cuts, cuts," but in the real world we are spending at record levels on both health care and education. The NDP also say that people are moving away in droves, but the data shows net migration into the province. They just ignore the data and keep getting it wrong. They said that we would fire nurses and cut their salaries, but we are hiring nurses, and we gave them a raise, something they never did. And when it comes to collective bargaining, the deal we struck with the nurses is evidence of a government that bargains in good faith.

Over the last three years what has come true? Well, we balanced the budget at $70 oil. In April 2019, when we took over, oil was at 70 bucks, and there were billions in structural deficit. We brought back more jobs than we had before. Film productions are now part of traffic reports in Calgary. Under the NDP $37 million was a good year for tech investment. Guess what? Under us $500 million in the first quarter of this year alone, or just close to that.

So if you are looking for a responsible government, one that attracts investment, balances the budget, with sustainable support programs, then the choice is clear. It is not the NDP opposition, that always seems to cry wolf. Their track record of getting things wrong makes them the least trustworthy opposition in Canada. I think the NDP owe Albertans an apology for their alarmist fearmongering.

Thank you. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order.

Health Care Worker Education Funding

Mrs. Allard: Mr. Speaker, Alberta is back. Alberta's unemployment rate is at the lowest level since 2015. We're seeing rapid growth in every area of the province, from oil and gas to diversified high tech, film and television, and agriculture. While this is an exciting time to be in Alberta, it also brings challenges. One of those is a shortage of skilled talent. Employers, students, and regional leaders across the province, including in my constituency of Grande Prairie, are concerned that today's training programs will not meet the needs of our workforce for tomorrow.

That's why I was pleased to join the hon. Minister of Advanced Education yesterday with representatives from Northwestern Polytechnic and Northern Lakes College in Grande Prairie to announce an investment of more than $850,000 in new funding to create more than 340 new seats in health care related programs at their respective institutions. In particular, Northwestern Polytechnic will receive approximately $417,000 to create 95 seats in the bachelor of science in nursing university transfer program, 48 seats in the practical nurse diploma program, and 48 seats in the health care aide certificate program: real answers to real problems. This supports both the health care system as a whole and the Grande Prairie region by training local staff to work at the newly opened Grande Prairie regional hospital.

These new seats are thanks to a total of $171 million in targeted enrolment expansion funding under the Alberta at work initiative. Mr. Speaker, with this funding Alberta's postsecondary institutions will create nearly 10,000 additional seats in high-demand programs right across our province. Over 120 proposals were submitted to the minister by 23 institutions and scored against a rigorous evaluation method that included alignment with workforce and regional needs and learner demands.

Mr. Speaker, the targeted enrolment expansion is the largest enrolment expansion in Alberta's history, and that happened under the UCP government. The investment announced yesterday will help Northwestern Polytechnic and Northern Lakes College expand their operations and enable them to continue the great work they do.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Government Record

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As Albertans have struggled through this pandemic, sacrificing their vacations, cancelling family dinners, and not seeing their loved ones, the UCP government spent their time flying to a tropical paradise.

While front-line workers fought tooth and nail to keep the health care system working and from crumbling in the midst of a pandemic, the then Health minister fired 11,000 of them and said that they could make their way to the unemployment line. If that wasn't enough, this government introduced a huge job-killing budget just like the one that cut over 300 public servants and 750 postsecondary education jobs as well as massive cuts to services that all Albertans depend on.

Rather than helping Albertans struggling with surging energy prices, they decided to spend tens of millions of dollars on a war room that couldn't be audited and had nothing to do but embarrass Albertans and draw eyes to what they thought was an anti-oil movie about Bigfoot.

At the end of the day, Albertans know that it doesn't matter who the next UCP leader is; the UCP is bad for Alberta and bad for Albertans. It's not focused on the things that matter to Alberta families. It's focused on itself and distracted by its internal disarray and infighting. Albertans are tired of being dismissed by this government and watching our province crumble under so-called leadership.

Albertans know that this government will never truly support them, and they are working, organizing, and fighting together. They are ready for change. Albertans will not let this government damage this province any longer, and they are out of chances to give this government that has only failed them at every turn. They've seen again and again what matters to this province, and it's obviously not the UCP. So we are ready to send them out and send them packing.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I wondered if the Government House Leader might be willing to make a request for unanimous consent to proceed to the remainder of the daily Routine. That will be followed by question period, which will still allow a 50-minute question period. Who knows what would be happening after QP, but perhaps you might be willing to . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do suspect that most of us know what's going to happen after QP. If the House is interested, I would move for unanimous consent to finish the Routine so that we can do a full question period and then go home for the summer.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The Opposition House Leader.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have one tabling, just regarding Bill 17: a letter from the vice-president of the University of Alberta Graduate Students' Association.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing none, we would typically be at points of order, and I'm only hoping that we can have a real quality question period that provides an opportunity for just what the Government House Leader suggested to happen.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has question 1.

Government Record

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, as we get ready to break for summer, the government should acknowledge that this sitting has been an absolute disaster: a no-help budget, more health care chaos, multiple failures to support Alberta families. The UCP refused to act on inflation, leaving Albertans with less. Instead of quick rebates, Albertans are suffering through a months-long saga of bureaucracy and buck-passing, endless political knife sharpening, like the member's statement we just heard from the Member for Peace River, culminating in the Premier's resignation. Why did the government spend so much time on themselves and no time helping Albertans?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I'm proud to be part of a government over the last three years that has passed 137 pieces of legislation through this House, has worked tirelessly to defend our constituents, and in this session has removed the gas tax in the province to help people with inflation, brought in electricity rebates, gas rebates, and has stood up to Ottawa repeatedly while they have sold out Albertans to their Justin Trudeau boss inside Ottawa.

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, this government is collapsing, and they're taking our health care system with them. ERs are so blocked that children are lining up outside of the hospital. We have more hallway medicine. EMS is in crisis. Doctors are leaving, and front-line workers are exhausted. Instead of support and stability, the government fired the AHS CEO, threatened wage cuts for respiratory therapists and health specialists, and they're working overtime to take insulin pumps away from diabetics. When the government stood up in an unfinished room filled with unstaffed hospital beds, were they surprised workers weren't standing with them? Because I wasn't.

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I'm proud of the work that our government is doing right now in investing in our health care system and investing in additional capacity. I've mentioned in this House numerous times that the system is under strain. It's under strain here in the province of Alberta, and it's under strain across the entire country given COVID, given the influenza A, and given the backlog of care that we've experienced because of COVID. But we are responding to that. We are investing significant dollars, the most dollars ever, into our health care system: $600 million this year, $1.8 billion over three years. We are investing in our health care system.

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, empty rooms do not save lives.

For four months straight the UCP government has failed to act on what matters. Utility rebates: failure. Stronger health care: failure. Modern curriculum: failure. Protecting the mountains: failure. Supporting tech companies.

Some Hon. Members: Failure.

Ms Gray: Fighting racism.

Some Hon. Members: Failure.

Ms Gray: Helping downtown Calgary.

Some Hon. Members: Failure.

Ms Gray: Standing up for women's rights.

Some Hon. Members: Failure.

Ms Gray: Upholding the public trust.

Some Hon. Members: Failure.

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, with this many failures, just who is really focused on supporting Albertans? It's Alberta's NDP.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, while the NDP focuses on theatre, this government is focused on defending Albertans. You want to know the greatest failure that has happened in this Legislature and in this city? It's the failure of the NDP to stand up for Alberta, to stand up for our industries, to stand up for our children, to stand up for our grandchildren. Shame on them as they stood time and time again in this Chamber, with their close allies in Ottawa. Albertans can rest assured this government is united and we're going to continue to stand up for them.

The Speaker: Now I know how a teacher feels on the last day of school.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Government Policies and Cost of Living

Ms Ganley: The UCP have sat in this House for 13 weeks this spring, and Albertans are worse off. The UCP passed a budget that will charge Albertans billions of dollars in income taxes through bracket creep. They reduced the value of benefits to families, to seniors, to Albertans living with disabilities; jacked up the price of tuition and interest on student loans; removed the price protection on car insurance, and now it's more expensive. Why did the UCP spend this entire session making life more expensive for Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. That simply is not accurate. We have spent this entire session putting Albertans' interests first. We have brought forward a sustainable fiscal budget, a balanced budget for 2022. We positioned the economy for investment attraction and growth, creating tens of thousands of jobs, the lowest unemployment rate since 2015, since the NDP were in office.

Ms Ganley: And then there are utilities. The UCP removed the price protections on electricity, and bills soared. Natural gas prices have hit a 30-year high. The UCP spent literally the entire session of this Legislature failing to get rebates out the door. Even now they're prepared to scatter for the summer with their work still not done. We can't get a straight answer on when Albertans will see their natural gas rebate. So let's try one more time. To the Finance minister: when will Alberta families see the natural gas rebate?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the question from the member opposite, because in Budget 2022 we were clear. The natural gas rebate period would be October 1 to March 31. So I know that the Minister of Energy is working with utility companies to ensure that Albertans receive the natural gas rebate October 1, should natural gas prices trigger the rebate. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Ms Ganley: There is no more help coming for Alberta families under this UCP. After spending the whole spring scheming and plotting against each other, they're now going to spend the whole summer scheming and plotting against each other some more. We need a new government. I'm going to continue to demand that this government do its job, but since it's clear they have zero sense of responsibility, I have a message for Albertans. The NDP is a unified team. We are energized, we are ready to lead, and we are always focused on what Albertans need, including money in your pockets.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, what you just saw there was fear. Do you know what the NDP knows? The United Conservative Party is united. We are going to continue to work each and every day for Albertans, and we're going to elect a new leader who will be the new Premier of this great province, and we will fight each and every day to make sure those socialists will never be on this side of the House again.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has the call.

Public-Private Partnerships for School Construction

Member Loyola: The P3 school model is a proven failure in Alberta, but this UCP government loves to go back to the well of failed experiments. At Bessie Nichols school, one of the previous P3 failures, the private contractor wouldn't give the school control of the thermostat during the coldest days, citing cost overruns. Let the kids freeze to make a buck: that's the model. But earlier today this government celebrated bringing in more P3 school contracts. They love the P3 model. To the Premier: as Albertans are already showing you the door, does this government really have to burden Albertans with more failed experiments that hurt our children?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, this morning I joined the MLA for Leduc-Beaumont in announcing the start of construction for five P3 high schools together with the local school boards, who agreed with me that we addressed their genuine concerns. We are fixing those past shortcomings, and we strengthened the contracts. They were happy with that.

Member Loyola: Albertans know that P3 school contracts are terrible for kids because they've seen the evidence first-hand. At Johnny Bright elementary school students were forced to walk through huge mud pits as high as their knees because the private contractor wanted to save a buck and wouldn't fix the drainage issues. Yet after a disastrous history with P3 school projects, this UCP government decided to strap the taxpayer to another bad deal. No wonder they're the least trusted government in the country. To the Premier: Albertans don't trust this government on P3 contracts or anything else, so why barrel ahead with something they don't want?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, Albertans trusted this Premier's campaign commitment of building more infrastructure under public-private financing . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. I heard the question, and we'll hear the answer.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans trusted this Premier's campaign commitment to build more infrastructure under the P3 model, so they are seeing the value when we adopted the process to determine the value for money for all the investments. Albertans liked it. That's why we are implementing that.

Member Loyola: P3 school contracts got a failing grade throughout their history in Alberta, so no wonder this failure of a government is clamouring to bring them back. This is a government that looks over the abyss of disaster and then decides to jump, and you've got to ask why. Perhaps there is something in these contracts for the current Premier's friends and insiders, but there's certainly nothing here for Albertans. Will anyone on the front bench stand up for Albertans, say no to these terrible P3 deals, and stop selling out our kids and the taxpayers?

Mr. Panda: As I said, everybody on the front row here ran on that commitment to implement P3s, and Albertans gave us the mandate. Mr. Speaker, for that side profit is a bad word. They want to please their union bosses, who actually are okay with these P3 contracts as we addressed their concerns and we are hiring local skilled labour. Even their union bosses are onside.

Ministers' Offices Human Resources Policy Review

Ms Hoffman: On November 3 the current Premier announced that Jamie Pytel, the former Edmonton Integrity Commissioner, had been tasked with conducting a review of HR policies for government staff following the serious accusations of misconduct. It has now been over 200 days since the review was started. It is critical that the concerns raised by this former staff member, that resulted in the report being commissioned, are addressed. To the Minister of Finance, who is responsible for the public service and who is rumoured to be looking at becoming the next Premier: has he seen the report, and will he commit to publicly releasing it and implementing all of its recommendations?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For – I don't know – probably the sixth time I will say it again, that Ms Pytel's report will actually be submitted and the recommendations will be made public. We've said that all along, and that's exactly what will happen.

Thank you.

Ms Hoffman: The allegations raised by a former UCP staffer have been extremely serious, and that's why ensuring this report with all of its findings and recommendations needs to be released publicly – to date the report has not been released, nor have any of the findings or recommendations. To the Minister of Children's Services, who stated that she's looking at standing to be the next Premier: has she seen the report? Will she commit to publicly releasing it and implementing all of its recommendations?

Ms Issik: Okay. So I think this will be the seventh time, Mr. Speaker. The report will be submitted, and the recommendations will be made public, and there will be no comment from me or any other minister or member on a case that's before the courts.

Thank you.

Ms Hoffman: The Minister of Transportation and the Minister of Labour and Immigration have both stated that they're looking at becoming the next Premier. It's important to Albertans that they know that regardless of who sits in the Premier's chair next, the serious concerns of harassment made by a former UCP staffer are addressed. Will the Minister of Transportation or the Minister of Labour and Immigration or any other minister looking to become the next Premier stand up in this place, tell us if they've seen the report and if they will release it publicly and commit to implementing all of the recommendations?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, I've said also many times how seriously we take the issue of sexual harassment and that sexual harassment should not happen in any workplace – not in any workplace – anywhere, especially in Alberta, period, full stop, end of sentence. We've made that very clear. They can keep going on about this report, but they've already asked, and I've already answered.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Technology Industry Development

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think we can all agree that Alberta is a province of innovators and entrepreneurs. Where we may disagree in this Chamber is on whether or not we see and celebrate the development, growth, attraction, and success of our innovation and technology ecosystem. To the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation: what specifically can you point to that is a clear indication that all members of this Assembly and all Albertans should celebrate our tech and innovation sector?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, our tech sector in the province of Alberta is booming. Let's give this some context. Under the NDP in 2017 tech venture investment was $37 million. Remember that number: $37 million under the NDP. In the first quarter alone of 2022: $466 million of venture capital. The city of Calgary was on par with the well-known tech hub of Vancouver. Alberta is booming in tech, and we're looking forward to doing more.

The Speaker: The hon. Member of Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that the left continues to downplay the growth and successes in this space and given that they cannot seem to stop themselves from criticizing the incredible investment we're seeing – I wonder if they don't understand how important this huge growth is – to the same minister: what do these increasing levels of venture capital investment indicate about Alberta's ecosystem?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, it means jobs, jobs, and more jobs for Albertans and people looking for prosperity and opportunity. Right now the city of Calgary has the fastest growing tech labour force – get this – in all of North America. That happened under this government because we made the right investments in talent, in accelerators, in venture capital partnerships. Our government believes in diversification, and we have gotten the job done for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I appreciate the minister's answer. Given that opportunity breeds opportunity and given that when tech professionals are looking for work, they want to have options and further given that the world is fighting over tech talent right at this moment, can the minister please share how Alberta is setting itself apart and what we are doing to funnel as much tech talent as possible into our province?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for that question. Right now – this is just a good-news story for our province – the unemployment rate in Alberta is 5.9 per cent. We haven't seen that level since before with other Conservative governments. Not once – let me say this; not once – under the failed NDP did they ever get the unemployment rate below 6 per cent. They failed Albertans. They failed to diversify our economy. This government has diversified Alberta's economy, and it's coming roaring back.

2:10 Support for Persons with Disabilities

Ms Renaud: There are alarming problems in disability services for children and adults. Alberta's Ombudsman has said that the AISH appeal processes are unfair and troubling as disabled appellants are not automatically accommodated. Accommodation in an AISH hearing at the very least should include the ability for an appellant to have a qualified advocate assist them during the appeal, but now appeal panel members, known as director's representatives, will be allowed to decide if they consent to the disabled appellant having a representative at the hearing. Why is the minister creating even more barriers for people with disabilities?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. Taking care of the most vulnerable Albertans is important for this government. Giving them a fair chance to have a chance to hear about their case, challenging the administration through the appeal panel is important. With COVID online, remote hearings have been introduced in the process, but with COVID ending, we're incorporating the online and in-person processes together. With the recommendations from the panel the department took the full acceptance of all the recommendations, and we're going to implement that.

Ms Renaud: Given that the Auditor General of Alberta has confirmed what we knew to be true, that the family support for children with disabilities, FSCD, program does not have effective oversight, and given that thanks to the AG report we now see that things like timely assessment, timely agreements have deteriorated under the UCP and given that we know the minister is hiding the wait-list, claiming that eligible families aren't waiting, that they're just in various planning stages, will the minister commit now to transparent reporting on all eligible families who are not yet receiving services, or will he continue to hide information from Albertans?

Mr. Luan: Mr. Speaker, it always surprises me how much the opposition critic doesn't do her homework and throws out all kinds of statements like this. This review covers the first two years that were under the NDP, so the latter part of this review is us. We're cleaning up the mess created by the NDP government. We're on top of that. We know there are some inconsistencies happening there. The department is committed. We're going to uplift the policies, guidelines. We're going to do training. Within 90 days we're going to implement all of those actions.

Ms Renaud: Given that the UCP has made life more difficult for disabled Albertans by cutting AISH and income supports but continue to mislead Albertans by saying that benefits are the highest in Canada, a deliberate untruth, and given that the UCP has slowed processes for disabled children and their families to receive FSCD supports – then they hide the wait-list data – and given that the UCP is in the process of making fair AISH appeal hearings even more difficult for appellants, will the government finally stop insulting and misleading with their spin and listen to disabled Albertans and their families? They need help, not spin.

Mr. Luan: Mr. Speaker, I can never be surprised by how the opposition critic will spin issues like this, confuse Albertans. Here are some facts. The $1,685 per month AISH benefit today is the highest among provinces in Canada. On top of that, we added $12 million to the disability budget, $1.4 billion . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The minister needs the opportunity to be able to answer, and the Speaker should be able to hear him.

The hon. minister.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The current budget for AISH added $12 million more; $1.4 billion is the highest in Alberta's history. On top of that, we introduced prenatal benefits, again . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton–Castle Downs.

Arts and Culture Funding

Ms Goehring: Mr. Speaker, this government continuously claims that they support our arts and culture sector. However, they haven't seen them put their money where their mouth is. The federal government announced that they will provide Alberta $17.5 million for the major festivals and events support initiative and the tourism relief fund, yet members of our arts and culture industries have had to fight this UCP government for any ounce of support to get out from under the pandemic. Will the minister explain why the federal government had to come save Alberta's festivals and culture events and this government couldn't?

Mr. Orr: Mr. Speaker, that is more fork-tongued doublespeak from the NDP. It never ends. The reality is that the Culture budget this year for the department is up by $38 million. Only in a deranged mind is an increase of $38 million a decrease. So they need to start to speak the truth and speak it clearly, because we support the cultural industries. We're the only ones who put in a bill to support them, and we will continue to do so.

The Speaker: Out of an abundance of caution and a hope for no points of order in the remainder of question period, I might remind members to ensure that even in the boisterousness of the last day of session our language needs to be parliamentary, and we ought not be making accusations about other members.

Ms Goehring: Given that the stabilize program this government designed to help festivals and culture events through the pandemic could not be used for any retroactive costs organizations incurred throughout the pandemic and given that we have said many times in this House that the arts and culture industries were one of the hardest hit, being first to close and last to open, and given that retroactive funding is what our festivals, artists, venues, culture events, and tourism sector asked for, will the minister explain why he ignored these sectors and the professionals within them and commit to matching the federal dollars so we can support artists properly and help them grow in Alberta?

Mr. Orr: Oh, Mr. Speaker, the NDP are living in the past. The reality is . . . [interjections] They totally are because the reality is that now if you talk to the arts and culture sector, you talk to the booking agents, you talk to the artists – I talked to a band member this morning; I've talked to various arts groups – they're overwhelmed with bookings. People are filling the venues. The artists have got more bookings than they can handle. We provided $37 million in stabilize funding, and it's worked. Alberta is back, so are the artists, and they're doing well.

Ms Goehring: Given that the federal government provided Alberta this money to help tourism projects adapt their products and services to create new experiences in hopes of attracting more visitors to the province and given that debt from the pandemic isn't all these organizations have to worry about – they're facing higher utility prices, taxes, and insurance under this government – and given that the tourism association of Alberta said that it could take up to 10 years to rebuild our tourism labour force, meaning we needed to start helping this sector yesterday, will the minister give our arts, culture, and tourism organizations a fighting chance, match the federal investment, and allow these groups to use the funding to climb out of debt from the pandemic?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we're working with Travel Alberta by providing them an additional $63 million to jump-start the tourism industry and get it back to where it was before the pandemic. I find it disingenuous that the NDP failed the film and television industry and have the audacity to come in here and claim that they support the arts and culture community. They failed the film and television industry. This side of the aisle has more than doubled that industry, and they're on their way to becoming a billion-dollar-a-year industry because of the policies of this government.

Emergency Medical Services

Mr. Sigurdson: Back in January this government launched the Alberta Provincial EMS Advisory Committee to produce suggestions that will improve our emergency care system. Since January there have been countless meetings discussing solutions to improve our air ambulance, rural dispatch, paramedic support, ground ambulance, and workforce planning, but many Albertans are concerned about the current issues that are still affecting EMS response times. To the Minister of Health: based on the current recommendations of the APEAC committee can you advise on any items being implemented to reduce response times?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health has the call.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for that important question. I'd like to thank all members of the advisory committee for their ongoing hard work. The EMS advisory committee has identified 10 points of immediate action that will help address concerns. One initiative involves Strathcona county emergency services launching a pilot project leveraging the flexibility within the county's integrated fire-EMS model. This adds two community response units to provide advanced life-support care within the county. These community response units will be in addition to the four ground transport ambulances currently serving Strathcona county.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for that answer. EMS workers are highly trained personnel who help save lives, but their job is associated with high levels of mental, physical, and emotional stress. These stresses can contribute to high rates of burnout, clinical depression, and physical conditions that hinder the EMS provider's ability to work in the field. One major goal of APEAC is to address these high levels of burnout. To the Minister of Health: can you please inform this House as to what is being done to provide real support to those front-line workers?

Mr. Copping: Thanks again to the member for the question, Mr. Speaker. Alberta's front-line EMS workers rose to the challenge these past few years, and I want to thank them for their dedication to Albertans. The EMS advisory committee also recommended a pilot project in Spruce Grove, which we are implementing immediately and we announced earlier today. This allows two licensed paramedics to respond as a medical first response and change to an active-duty ambulance and transport a patient to hospital when an AHS resource isn't available. This will reduce pressures on local EMS and improve response times when it's most critical.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for that answer. The current problems that exist are issues that have been building for years, and it is clear that we need our EMS system to provide stronger support to Albertans today and into the future tomorrow, so to the Minister of Health: what system changes in addition are being put in place to ensure greater accountability and transparency to make sure that our system is improving and will continue to improve in the years to come?

Mr. Copping: Thanks again to the member for another great question, Mr. Speaker. Again, stemming from the recommendations from the committee and from AHS, we are piloting a temporary exemption to allow emergency medical responders to staff more ambulances throughout the province. That means that, when necessary, two EMRs can transfer nonemergency patients without needing a paramedic onboard. Additionally, EMRs can now join an advanced care paramedic to respond to emergency calls. This change puts us in line with other western provinces. I want to thank the member and all the committee members for their continued hard work, and I look forward to receiving their interim reports and their final report so we can continue to improve EMS services for Albertans.

Mr. Dang: Mr. Speaker, remember March 2020? Members of this House across party lines came together to praise health care and essential workers. Soon after the UCP government turned their backs on them and waged a war against Alberta's health care workers, and now as Alberta is recovering from the pandemic, the very same heroes are running on empty. This government's horrendous treatment of health care workers has literally driven them out of this province, so much so that this UCP government is struggling to hire more paramedics, but that's not going to be enough to solve the crisis in the province's emergency response system. Will the Minister of Health stand up today and accept that Alberta's emergency response system is struggling because of the bad decisions made by him and his UCP government?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As we've spoken in the House before, the health care system is under strain, including our emergency response system. It's not only under strain here in Alberta; it's under strain across the entire country. Not only COVID; we've had issues dealing with care that has been postponed, and we also are dealing with the opioid crisis. We understand there are issues, and we are investing to address those issues. As I just spoke earlier, not only did we put in Budget 2022 $64 million additionally into emergency responses, but we're actually receiving recommendations from the advisory committee, and we're acting on them.

Mr. Dang: Given that there are currently 20 central Alberta communities with fully or partially closed hospitals, putting more pressure on surrounding communities and urban hospitals, and given that so far the only thing that this UCP government has promised central Albertans is that they will not pull back the extended temporary services until next March, can the minister promise that he will do what is right and necessary and finally offer every paramedic they're hiring permanent, full-time positions with benefits?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, we are doing what is right, and we're doing what is necessary. We are investing in capacity in our entire health care system; that is, $600 million this year, $1.8 billion over the next three years. This is in all aspects of it. We are focusing on EMS, as I indicated, $64 million. We just announced yesterday an additional 19 units by September for EMS in Calgary and in Edmonton, and that's on top of the units that we've already announced, and we've already staffed in Airdrie and in other smaller communities across the province. I'm looking forward to further recommendations from the advisory committee. We will . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Dang: Given that people living in these communities can see that it is not working and given that the situation is worsening daily, with more areas without any ambulances able to respond to emergency calls, and given that according to the Health Sciences Association of Alberta the current measures the government is taking so far are inadequate and far too slow, will the minister promise to do at least the bare minimum? Will he provide Albertans with a clear, transparent, and up-to-date information portal about doctor recruitment and ambulance wait times?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, we are continuing to invest in our health care system, including emergency medical services. It's not just EMS. EMS is only one part of our system, and if EMS, when they go to the emergency department, can't off-load immediately in the emergency department, then that actually backs up our EMS system. We are addressing this by investing in the entire system. That includes continuing care, an additional $200 million in Budget 2022 into continuing care to provide more spaces, which will help the flow through in our emergency departments. We are hiring more staff than ever: 800 more staff in emergency departments than four years ago under the previous government. We are investing in capacity in our health care system. We will deliver.

The Speaker: Now it's time for the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Keystone XL Pipeline Provincial Equity

Ms Ganley: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. In March of 2020 Albertans woke to the news that the UCP government had bet $7.5 billion on Trump winning the White House. This gamble came despite ongoing legal and political risk to the Keystone XL project, and ultimately the project was cancelled and the UCP lost $1.3 billion of Albertans' money. Now we find out the UCP set up numbered companies in Delaware the day before the $7.5 billion bet was made. Why is the government now in the business of setting up numbered companies in Delaware?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The KXL project was certainly a project that was worthy of investment given the potential for wealth creation for future generations of Albertans – $20 billion of wealth creation for future generations of Albertans – and I want to compare it to the crude-by-rail venture that the members opposite implemented when they were in power. They risked $2.8 billion of Alberta's money, all of it failed, all of it lost, to move potentially a few barrels of oil.

Ms Ganley: Given that the project was cancelled, which means that the government still hasn't approved a single new pipeline despite its promises to do so, and given that the government has now filed a NAFTA challenge over the cancellation of the KXL but the lawsuit is based on the existence of the numbered companies and given that the numbered companies had to catch up on their unpaid taxes before the challenge could even proceed, is the UCP's entire legal strategy based on these numbered shell companies that can't even pay their taxes?

Mr. Toews: Again, Mr. Speaker, with respect to KXL we've been very transparent with Albertans. We were transparent on the risks, on the opportunities. We structured the deal so any losses would be limited, and we were transparent there. But what I want to say, and what I will not apologize for, is a government standing up for the oil and gas industry. We are seeing Trans Mountain go forward. We've seen Enbridge line 3 get completed. We've seen a whole group of optimizations, increased capacity. We're exporting record barrels of oil out of this province.

Ms Ganley: Given that TC Energy actually protected their shareholders in the deal and they have now said that the Keystone XL won't be revived and given that the Premier continues to talk about trying to revive the Keystone project after losing $1.3 billion, even saying he would contribute more of Albertans' money to the project, why weren't Alberta taxpayers protected like TC's shareholders in this deal? How much more of Albertans' money is this government going to risk on the project?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We will continue to stand up for energy workers right across this province. The members opposite destroyed KXL. They destroyed Energy East. They destroyed Northern Gateway while they were in office. We're supporting the energy industry. We're exporting record barrels of oil every day, and on top of that we're seeing a more diversified economy. The economy is growing. Oil field workers are going back to work.

Energy Industry Surface Rights Payments Grazing Lease Renewal System

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, Alberta's Surface Rights Act allows companies interested in pursuing energy projects to rent land from private landowners to remove minerals, oil, and gas, perform mining or drilling, or construct related facilities. Despite these rental agreements, several of my constituents have informed me that many companies have failed to pay rent on wells and pipelines on their private property. To the Minister of Environment and Parks: who can my constituents contact for support related to unpaid rent by these companies?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's important that the hon. member's constituents contact the Land and Property Rights Tribunal, who have the power, underneath section 36 of the Surface Rights Act, to compel companies to pay for their obligations when using surface access on his constituents' land. Further to that, they also have the ability to be able to have the government pay to compensate for surface rights disturbances when companies can't, and then the government will take over that debt with those companies. That's the best place for his constituents to go for relief.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, Minister. Given that the landowners have the onus of printing, completing, and submitting recovery of compensation forms to obtain payments for contractual agreements already in place and given that this is only a first step for the Surface Rights Board to provide the operator with a deadline to respond and does not terminate the lease and its associated responsibilities for abandonment and reclamation, to the same minister: how will you ensure this cycle of exploitation and abuse by companies against private citizens does not continue?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy and the Minister of Municipal Affairs are working with the Alberta Energy Regulator and the Surface Rights Board to make sure they have adequate resources to be able to make sure that landowners can get access to justice and to have a fair process. The Surface Rights Board is there for both companies and for landowners to make sure that rules are followed. One of the greatest challenges that we had when we came into government was that this important board was underfunded. We worked with Treasury Board to get them proper resources. I'm proud to say that double the applications are moving through the surface rights system, and the ministers are going to continue to make sure that farmers and landowners have access to justice.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you again, Minister. Given that the Surface Rights Act also encompasses grazing lease applications and given that the current application processing time for lease transfers or applications is over two years and given that the onus is on the applicant to keep checking back to see where the application is in its process, once again to the Minister of Environment and Parks: what can be done to reduce these application processing times to allow landowners and lease seekers to maximize the proper use of the land?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, the grazing lease renewal system was broken, no doubt about it. It was based entirely on a paper-based system that in some cases was a century old. Over the last couple of years the Alberta Environment and Parks department has been working to digitalize that system. It is now inside a digitalized system while we worked with our friends in red tape. I'm happy to say that, unlike under the NDP, when you were waiting two to six to seven years to get a lease renewed, now you're waiting about 30 days underneath this government.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre is next.

Harcourt House Artist Centre in Edmonton

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For almost 35 years Harcourt House has been at the heart of Edmonton's visual arts community, providing affordable studio space for hundreds of artists, including Barbara Paterson, whose iconic statues of the Famous Five were created there and now sit on Parliament Hill and Calgary's Olympic Plaza. Their gallery has showcased thousands of Alberta artists. Their programs have provided arts education for thousands more, including Albertans living with disabilities. But two weeks ago the Minister of Infrastructure gave them six months' notice to vacate the building they've called home for over three decades, a move that could effectively end their operations. My question to the minister is simple: why?

Mr. Panda: The member opposite brought the issue up to me previously. Based on that, we actually extended the lease a couple of times. As you know, Mr. Speaker, these publicly owned properties: we had to look at what the best use of those properties is in the interest of Albertans. We haven't made the decision yet, but we're going to make those decisions very soon.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, given that in January of this year the board at Harcourt House requested an extension of their lease and given that in early March officials in the department said that that wouldn't be a problem, that they'd send the paperwork in a few weeks, but that was followed by months of silence before Harcourt received the minister's six-month notice in early May and given that it's a sharp pivot and an impossible timeline, one that will leave 42 artists with no place to work and Harcourt with no place to provide already funded programs, workshops, and exhibitions, to the minister: for the sake of the organization, the artists, all who depend on them, will you meet with them to discuss an extension?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, the officials in the Ministry of Infrastructure have been in discussion with the renters of the building. We were very co-operative with them, and we extended the lease a few times. We also offered them alternate offers. We hope they come to the table with a reasonable offer.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, given that forcing Harcourt House to vacate their home of 34 years with six months' notice is effectively a death blow for the organization and the good work they do for the visual arts community and given that with soaring resource revenues we know this government is in a position to realize a multibillion-dollar surplus this year and given that the Minister of Culture recently toured the building, commented that its condition was much better than he had been led to believe, why is the Minister of Infrastructure rushing to sell this property so quickly at such great cost to Edmonton's visual arts community? The building is fine. This government is not short of cash. Why can they not extend this lease?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, the facts are that its six months' notice is not true. We have been talking to the renters of the building for years. Also, the building has deferred maintenance, so Infrastructure is conscious about the safety of the occupants. Also, if the occupants wanted to buy the thing, they can bring, you know, a reasonable offer so taxpayers' money is protected.

Support for LGBTQ2S-plus Albertans

Member Irwin: The last few months have been incredibly challenging for all Albertans, well, years, in fact. Isolation, loneliness, struggles with mental health: these are just some of the feelings that many of us can relate to. Members of Alberta's 2SLGBTQ-plus community, particularly youth, have found the pandemic especially challenging, but there is hope and there is joy on the horizon. As we near Pride Month, it's a time to celebrate, to come together safely but to also remember that Pride began as a protest. The fight continues until all members of our community are welcomed and loved. Can the UCP tell us how the Premier plans to celebrate Pride Month?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm actually looking forward to Pride Month. We're planning to actually put flags up in both Edmonton and Calgary. I'm planning to actually do a number of round-tables and meet with a number of stakeholder groups. I actually plan and hope to go to some fun events, too. I'm really looking forward to Pride Month. I think it's a great time for everybody to really come together and understand our 2SLGBTQIA community, and I'm really happy about it.

Member Irwin: Given that just yesterday the Minister of Education stated that all students will see themselves in curriculum and that this is a minister and government that have shown from the outset that they're okay with a curriculum that marginalizes and omits diverse perspectives rather than uplifts and amplifies them and given that one of the very first acts of this Education minister was to make life harder for queer and trans kids through ramming through Bill 8, or Bill Hate, Minister, can you just explain to the House: how will 2SLGBTQ-plus students see themselves in curriculum? Please be specific.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are very proud of the fact that our schools are safe and warm and welcoming communities that welcome everyone. They're very inclusive. We did pass the Education Act, which does have comprehensive LGBTQ2S-plus legislation in it. As well, in our K to 6 curriculum we are teaching our children not to bully, to be inclusive. We also teach them about different family structures in the new curriculum. In fact, there are instances where families look different: sometimes there are two moms, sometimes there are two dads, sometimes there are other family structures. We include everyone because we believe in everyone.

Member Irwin: Given that it's soon to be Pride Month and that while we want to celebrate, there's a lot of work to be done – we know that queer and trans youth face many barriers, including mental health challenges, substance use, suicide as well as an increased risk of homelessness, with as many as 30 per cent of unhoused youth identifying as queer or trans – and given that organizations that support these youth report more challenges than ever when trying to support these young people yet this government refuses to adequately fund this vital grassroots work, will the Minister of Community and Social Services commit in the House today to prioritizing funding for organizations that support unhoused youth?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I thank the member for the question, because we support many organizations that, of course, help people in the trans community, the LGBT community, and we're proud to support them. We're going to continue to support them. I know I was out there with the minister of social services in the community of Chinatown today, and one of the biggest things, the biggest questions they had to me, the leaders within the community, was: who was their MLA? They didn't know who their MLA was. That, to me, is one of the bigger issues in the community of Edmonton right now. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order. [interjections] The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo will come to order. [interjections] Order.

The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Oil and Gas Export

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Oil is in demand and an important resource for our international partners, and Alberta can help that demand. Alberta energy plays a key role in Canada's economy and should be a key resource in exports to other regions, just like the United States. I know that the Minister of Energy and the Premier recently travelled to Washington, DC, to discuss America's need of oil and other critical minerals which Alberta has. To the Minister of Energy: as a result of these discussions with U.S. officials, what progress can we expect to see that will benefit our oil and gas sector?

The Speaker: The hon. the Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was very proud to be in Washington recently with the Minister of Energy and the Premier, standing up for our energy resources. Most importantly, what we have learned is that we cannot trust Ottawa, unlike what the NDP has tried to do, which is make a coalition with Justin Trudeau and the federal Liberals in Ottawa. We can't trust Ottawa to defend this province. Instead, we've built our own diplomatic corps in Washington, and we continue to fight for our largest industry and make clear to our largest customer that we are here to be able to provide the energy needs to the world. Unlike what the NDP have betted on, oil and gas in Alberta is not done.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for his answer. Given that Alberta's oil and gas sector contributes an extensive amount to Canada's 3.7 billion barrels per day of oil exports and given that the overwhelming majority of oil exported comes from Alberta and given that 96 per cent of oil leaving Canada heads to the United States, to the same minister: how important would a North American energy alliance be for North American energy security and the betterment of Alberta's oil industry?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, it would be absolutely critical for all of North America. It would make sure that we have energy security on our continent. Both governments, on the Canadian and the American side, would not have to use dictatorship countries to be able to provide our energy needs. This is why the Conservative government in Alberta continues to stand with our oil and gas industry, because we can provide clean, affordable energy to the entire world. Unfortunately, the NDP and the Liberals want to take our birthright and bury it in the ground, but rest assured that they're never going to get on this side of the House. We're going to continue to provide the world . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the relationship between Canada and the United States should be strong when it comes to oil exports and given that Alberta is working hard to drive impact and create positive change such as a sustainable, low-carbon global economy, including getting to net zero by 2050, and given that one of the safest ways to move large amounts of oil safely is through pipelines, can the minister share with this House why projects like Keystone XL should continue to be a topic of conversation between the United States and our Canadian officials?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most shocking things about the left when it comes to oil and gas transportation. They continue to block pipelines, which is the safest way to be able to move oil and gas products across the continent and the world, and instead try to force it into trains and other transportation methods which are significantly dangerous for the environment at times. It makes no sense, and it shows yet again that the Liberal-NDP coalition in Ottawa wants to shut down the oil and gas industry and let dictators provide our energy needs inside North America, but we're not going to let that happen. We're going to continue to make sure that we provide energy to the world.

The Speaker: Hon. members, this concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period.

Statement by the Speaker

Remarks at the End of the Spring Sitting

The Speaker: Prior to calling on the hon. the Government House Leader, I would like to make a brief statement about the legislative session. As of May 24 the session had 35 days. House sittings: there were 68 of them counted separately, morning, afternoon, and evening; approximately 218 hours of sitting. That's the equivalent of watching Gone with the Wind 53 times. There were 20 evening sittings although a special thank you goes out to all members on behalf of the Legislative Assembly staff as there was no sitting that went past midnight, which was the first time since the 28th Legislature, Third Session, 2014 to 2015.

The number of words transcribed was 1,742,987. When you consider that for this session and for the first time in over 20 years we had American sign language interpretation in the Chamber, not only is that a lot of transcribing; that's a lot of fast-moving sign as well.

With the Legislature Building and the galleries being reopened for the Third Session, we welcomed many visitors and guests. Joining us in the Speaker's gallery, there were 21 different groups of visitors, including ambassadors, elected officials, former members, and their families. Compare this to only 14 visitors introduced during the record-long Second Session of the 30th Legislature. We also had the privilege to take the opportunity to introduce 115 different guests throughout our proceedings, as all of you know, some with easier names to pronounce than others.

There have been no fewer than 215 seating plans published since 1906, but this session, for the first time, recognizes the new designation Honorary Member of Executive Council, as established by the Queen Elizabeth II Platinum Jubilee Recognition Act, which appoints members to Queen's Counsel.

Hon. members, on behalf of my office I'd like to say thank you, but more importantly on behalf of all Members of the Legislative Assembly I'd like to say thank you to the table officers, the pages, Hansard, 315, the bills and Journals clerk as well as all staff of the Legislative Assembly Office, that go above and beyond during the extra long, difficult days that a legislative session brings.

With all that said, the hon. the Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to quickly echo your comments, I believe, on behalf of all 87 members of the Legislature. Through you to the table officers, the pages, the entire team of the Legislative Assembly Office, the Sergeant-at-Arms, security: thank you for all your hard work this session. They got us through another one.

Mr. Speaker, as well, through you to all members of the Chamber – opposition, independent, and government members – thank you for all your hard work this session. I wish you all the very best this summer. Travel safe. I look forward to seeing everybody in the fall.

With that, I am happy, Mr. Speaker, to advise you and the Assembly that pursuant to Government Motion 23 the business for the 2022 spring sitting is now concluded.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 2:48 p.m. pursuant to Government Motion 23]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, September 15, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Let us pray. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our King and to his government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interest and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. May Your kingdom come and Your name be hallowed. Amen.

Statement by the Speaker

Queen Elizabeth II

April 21, 1926, to September 8, 2022

The Speaker: Hon. members, I was deeply saddened to learn about Her late Majesty's passing. Our heartfelt condolences go out to the entire Royal Family. Her late Majesty Queen Elizabeth II was the emblem of public devotion. As the longest reigning British monarch she leaves behind a legacy of service through over 600 royal patronages across the Commonwealth, including 36 charitable organizations in Canada. For the vast majority of us, we have never known a life without Her late Majesty as monarch.

Her example of a life of service to others and poise under unrelenting pressures may have even influenced some in this Chamber to pursue a life of public service. As one reign succeeds another, we are witnessing a historical moment as a new sovereign takes his place as our King. For the moment we mourn the loss of a beloved monarch and celebrate the life of a remarkable woman, a woman who on her 21st birthday addressed the Commonwealth and dedicated her life, "whether it be long or short," in service of others.

May Her late Majesty Queen Elizabeth II rest in peace. I ask you to take a moment of silent reflection and prayer as we remember Her late Majesty. Rest eternal grant unto Her late Majesty, O Lord, and let light perpetual shine upon her.

Members, we will now be led in the singing of our national anthem, followed immediately by God Save the King.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all of us command.
With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
The True North strong and free!
From far and wide, O Canada,
We stand on guard for thee.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

Hon. Members:

God save our gracious King,
Long live our noble King,
God save the King!
Send him victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us,
God save the King!

The Speaker: Please be seated.

The hon. the Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to ask the Chamber for unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 7 in order to allow our Assembly, Alberta's Assembly, to proceed immediately to Government Motion 32, an address to His Majesty King Charles III in memory of our late sovereign, Elizabeth II, in order to pay respects to her.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Orders of the Day

Government Motions

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Address to His Majesty the King

32. Mr. Kenney moved that an humble address be presented to His Majesty the King as follows:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Assembly, now assembled, wish to express the deep sympathy felt by this Assembly for the great sorrow which Your Majesty has sustained by the death of the late Queen, Your Majesty's mother; extend to all the Royal Family the deep sympathy of this Assembly in their grief; assure Your Majesty that Her late Majesty's unstinting dedication over a reign of 70 years to the service of our great province and its people and to the service of the countries and peoples of the wider Commonwealth will always be held in affectionate and grateful remembrance; and express to Your Majesty our loyalty to You and our conviction You will strive to uphold the liberties and to promote the happiness of the people in all Your realms now and in the years to come.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I rise to give thanks for the life and to mourn the death of our late sovereign lady Queen Elizabeth the great. While her portrait gazes over our proceedings today, as it has done for decades in this place, it is difficult to conjure the words adequately to express the grief that so many of us suffer at her loss. I must say very personally that her death has hit me harder than I expected, as though I have lost a grandmother or a long-time friend, so it is truly a serendipitous honour that my last speech in this place as Her late Majesty's first minister is to honour her remarkable life and legacy.

Dying in her eighth decade on the throne, the Queen was a constant and reassuring presence throughout our entire lives. Indeed, the reign of Elizabeth II as our head of state spanned 70 of the 117 years, or 61 per cent of the time, that Alberta has existed as a province and nearly half of the history of the Dominion of Canada. Through all of those years hundreds of members of this Legislature swore an oath of allegiance to the Queen, to her heirs and forebears. Thousands of laws have been passed by this Assembly that were adopted by and with Her late Majesty's consent. Her Executive Council governed under her authority, and our courts dispensed justice in her name.

Her first British Prime Minister, Sir Winston Churchill, was prophetic when he said upon the accession of the then 24-year-old Princess Elizabeth to the throne that it was the beginning of a new Elizabethan age. Mr. Speaker, that age has finally drawn to a close. For so many of us, it seemed as though it might go on forever. Such was her devotion to duty that she seemed utterly unstoppable. Indeed, when I first met the then Prince of Wales and now King Charles 25 years ago, I said to him, "Your Royal Highness, I very much look forward to the day that you'll be the King of Canada," and he responded to me with a wry smile, "Well, with the way that my mother is carrying on, I doubt that day will ever arrive."

Just consider this. The first British Prime Minister of her reign, Winston Churchill, was born in 1872, and her last British Prime Minister, who was invited to form a government just 36 hours before her death, was born in 1972. Her first Canadian Prime Minister, the great Louis St. Laurent, was born in 1882, and her last Canadian Prime Minister was born in 1971. Her life bridged such vastly different worlds, from the Victorian to the postmodern, from the days of horse-drawn carriages to the space age, yet she mustered the wisdom to navigate the century that incorporated exponentially more change than any other in human history. Through those tumultuous cultural, political, scientific, and social upheavals she was the lodestar, the bedrock of our institutions, of our common life, and the guarantor that certain virtues and customs worthy of continuing would persist. She gave us that comfort and certainty not by wielding practical political power but by her own constant example of duty, service, humility, dignity, and, yes, faithfulness.

Through her graceful example she told us to honour and protect what the great poet T.S. Eliot called "the permanent things." As the personification of the Crown she stayed true to her coronation oath and naturally revered tradition as "the democracy of the dead," in the words of G.K. Chesterton. But she also understood that tradition must evolve because, as the composer Gustav Mahler said, "Tradition is not the worship of ashes, but the preservation of fire." So she led the modern evolution of the monarchy, preserving what was essential while adapting to change and new public expectations.

Mr. Speaker, in losing Her Majesty, it also feels that we close the chapter on the greatest generation. The stoicism of our late Queen was characteristic of the generation that rose up from every corner of the British Empire to defend civilization from Nazi barbarism during the Second World War. Princess Elizabeth could have fled to the safety of Canada when Britain was under threat of invasion, or she could have secluded herself in the royal estates, but instead she beseeched her father, King George VI, to be allowed to serve, becoming Second Subaltern Windsor of the Auxiliary Territorial Service, and there she demonstrated her famous practicality as an army truck mechanic, learning skills that held her in good stead for the rest of her life, particularly bombing around on Balmoral in her Land Rover.

I don't believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Queen ever called herself a feminist, but she didn't need a label or a theory to break barriers and prove her ability in areas previously reserved to men. She demonstrated that and her great boldness when the late Crown Prince of Saudi Arabia visited the Royal Family at Balmoral. The Queen suggested that they go on a drive through the estate together. Prince Abdullah reluctantly agreed, only to find that the Queen put on her wellies and jumped in the driver's seat, bolting out of the yard at full speed, careening around tight corners, and speeding down narrow country lanes while speaking excitedly and pointing out key features of the estate. Apparently, the Prince became white-knuckled and terrified and through his translator begged Her Majesty to slow down. Of course, in her own mischievous way the Queen made a powerful statement for the women of Saudi Arabia, who were prohibited from driving.

Since her passing, Mr. Speaker, we have heard much about that dry sense of humour, which I observed first-hand during her last visit to Canada, during which I had the high honour of being her minister in attendance at various events. On one occasion I accompanied Her Majesty and His Royal Highness to, to be honest, I'm sure her favourite Canadian event, the running of the Queen's Plate, the greatest thoroughbred race in North America. She presented the award to the winner of the great Queen's Plate, named after her great-grandmother Queen Victoria, and then came back to the viewing stand.

She was scheduled to watch one more race and then depart for the Royal Canadian Air Force jet to take her back to London, but, Mr. Speaker, that one race turned into a second race. It turned into a third and a fourth race. Now the royal party was running nearly 40 minutes behind schedule. One could see Prince Philip getting a little agitated. I observed as he approached Her Majesty and said, "Ma'am, we are now 40 minutes late for the flight," and I heard her distinctly say, "Philip, I have the distinct impression that the airplane will wait for me."

Beneath that wry exterior was a woman of great intelligence and substance. All of her Prime Ministers remarked at how astonishingly well informed she was about matters ranging from the economy to global affairs. She was the Commonwealth's greatest diplomat. Former Prime Minister Harold Macmillan once said, "I was astonished at Her Majesty's grasp of all the details sent in messages and telegrams." Mr. Speaker, for those who work in Whitehall, ministers are often known not to return their red boxes, their ministerial homework, with the work completed, but Her Majesty, who was known as reader number one, always returned her work completed on time. She took her role, in every respect, seriously.

Mr. Speaker, let it be said that one of Her late Majesty's greatest achievements was the creation and the preservation of the Commonwealth, this great family of nations, which has lived through many stresses and strains, an incredibly diverse collection of nations which share a common history connected to Britain and the English language. Across the world was spread her territorial family, a group of wildly diverse nations, vast and tiny, rich and impoverished, republics and monarchies, that she charmed and cajoled and nudged to remember what bound them together and what together they might achieve. We have her to thank for its vitality today.

Mr. Speaker, the constant throughout the Queen's life was, of course, a profound and unshakable sense of duty. As she famously said on her 21st birthday to a global radio audience, as you cited earlier, "I declare before you all that my whole life whether it be long or short shall be devoted to your service . . . God help me to make good my vow, and God bless all of you who are willing to share in it." Later in life she said, "Although that vow was made in my salad days, when I was green in judgement, I do not regret nor retract one word of it."

Mr. Speaker, that sense of duty continued until the very end, when she commissioned her 15th British Prime Minister to form a government while, we now know, she was deathly ill, hours from her deathbed. Indeed, the only thing that could stop Queen Elizabeth II from performing her duty was death itself, which as a woman of profound Christian faith she undoubtedly embraced as the passage to her ultimate destiny, to be united with her Lord, the King of Kings.

Mr. Speaker, we in Alberta have been blessed in so many ways. One of those ways is to be the inheritors of the great traditions of Westminster parliamentary democracy and the constitutional monarchy, which she personified for most of our province's history. On her several visits to our province she demonstrated a great love and admiration for this place and for its people, for its First Nations, for newcomers from every corner of the world.

Mr. Speaker, her name will live on. In this place her name will live on forever in schools and streets, roadways and buildings, and, indeed, Mount Queen Elizabeth and the Queen Elizabeth Ranges of our majestic Rocky Mountains.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, many of the functions of the Legislative Assembly occur in what we have known since 1954 as the Federal Building, which was acquired by the government of Alberta, refurbished, and is an important extension of the work that we do here. Your Honour will know that when it was commissioned, the 10th floor was named after the Windsor family after Her late Majesty's family and its various members. I believe it is fitting that we extend that recognition of her service to our province, so in the weeks to come, that will be formally renamed the Queen Elizabeth II building.

Mr. Speaker, why do so many experience an unexpected grief at the loss of a woman that most people never met personally, who was perhaps a distant image on a coin or a stamp or in television reports? How can we explain the impact that her passing has had on so many here and around the world? The queue is miles long for people to pay a brief moment of respect at her catafalque at Westminster Hall.

Mr. Speaker, I think the answer is twofold. Firstly, people around the world have a sense of turning a chapter in history, of being part of history in observing her death but also because we live in a world where there is, sadly, much darkness, where there is evil, violence, instability, exploitation, the denial of human dignity. We see it now in a spectacular way in Vladimir Putin's appalling invasion of Ukraine. So when we look at our late Queen, what we see is the counterpoint, the opposite, the contradiction to that darkness and division which characterizes too much of modern history. What we see in her is dignity, faithfulness, and, yes, goodness. We join with our fellow Albertans, Canadians, subjects and citizens of the Commonwealth spanning the globe, and countless others in paying tribute to a truly good, dutiful, and faithful woman.

Mr. Speaker, as I've said, the late Queen was a woman who held a quiet but deep Christian faith, so I join with countless people here and around the world in praying for the repose of her soul and the consolation of her family. She would have meditated many times on the parable of the talents, so I hope and believe that she will finally hear the words: "Well done, good and faithful servant. [You have] been faithful over a few things; I will make [you] ruler over many things. Enter . . . into the joy of [your] lord."

Thank you, Your Majesty. May God save the King.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise on behalf of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition to remember and to commemorate the life of Her late Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. I offer my deepest condolences to King Charles and the Royal Family for their loss and to all Albertans who are mourning this loss.

Elizabeth II is the only Queen of Canada many of us, including myself, have ever known. Her reign of more than 70 years is the longest of any British monarch, and it's extraordinary to reflect on the massive global changes that have occurred over that time. When a 25-year-old Elizabeth ascended the throne in 1952, telephones were rotary dial, computers were the size of refrigerators, and no one had heard of Elvis Presley or the Beatles. She reigned through countless moments in world history: the moon landings, the fall of the Berlin Wall, and the extraordinary rise of digital communications, just to name a few.

In Canada she oversaw pivotal moments, as many have already mentioned in talking about her over the last few days, such as the repatriation of the Constitution and the adoption of the Charter in 1982. Of course, as we all know, this effort also involved securing within that constitutional document provincial dominion over our natural resources, something, of course, very important to Canada and very, very important to Albertans, something that could only happen in a peaceful democratic setting that encouraged thoughtful, open debate, negotiation, and resolution. It was under her gaze that this example of positive political development was able to take place. Through these seismic changes Queen Elizabeth remained a symbol of stability, continuity, and liberal democracy for the United Kingdom, for Canada, and for the Commonwealth nations around the world.

Now, we must also recognize, Mr. Speaker, that the British Crown can evoke some very different reactions from Indigenous people in our land, who have been and continue to be subject to colonization and the consequences of colonization, and it also can evoke different reactions from other citizens of the country with roots in jurisdictions that also struggled with the consequences of conflict with the Crown. And those who still endure the harms of colonialism will have a different view on the institutional monarchy itself. Those Canadians have a right to voice these perspectives. We must honour those perspectives, we must listen to those perspectives because I believe as well that the example that Queen Elizabeth herself demonstrated is that that is exactly what she would do and she would call on us to do.

That being said, we are here to recognize and memorialize Queen Elizabeth herself and the personal attributes that allowed her to contribute to the well-being of our Commonwealth throughout the term of her reign. She made her first visit to Alberta before she became Queen, in 1951, and she would visit five more times, most recently in 2005.

Now, I don't have quite the level of personal stories that our Premier has, but I will say that in 1978 she did come to Alberta and to Grande Prairie to turn the sod on the construction of the hospital that still bears her name there. I was fortunate enough to have dinner with her during that visit. Mind you, I was 14 at the time, and there were 500 of our closest friends and neighbours in the room, so I don't know that I made much of an impression on our head of state that evening. My mother and father, however, did get a chance to meet her properly. My dad used his audience to lobby unsuccessfully for her to visit our hometown of Fairview, which was celebrating its 50th anniversary that year.

But it was, honestly, my mother who treasured that opportunity the most, up to her dying day. I want to talk to you a little bit about why that was, because if we examine Queen Elizabeth through my mother's eyes, you can understand the admiration that she invoked so broadly not only in Canada and the Commonwealth but around the world. My mother was born in the U.S., and she was involved in what some folks might today refer to as radical, woke, left activities. She travelled in the same circles as Abbie Hoffman, she attended peace marches, and she travelled throughout the southern United States to register Black voters before moving to Alberta in 1962. Later in life, while living in Alberta, she pursued a degree in liberation theology. She visited Nicaragua after the Sandinista revolution and South Africa during apartheid, where she met Desmond Tutu. Notwithstanding all of that, she was 13 years old when she watched Princess Elizabeth ascend to become Queen of the entire Commonwealth. For her generation, watching that and being nearly of the same age was a revelation. It captured her imagination, and I know this because she spoke to me about it a lot.

Like so many other young women at the time, her admiration of the Queen never waned throughout the remainder of her life. As a woman coming of age in the late '50s and early '60s, Queen Elizabeth provided the strongest example of a woman leader to a generation of women who didn't really have much else to look for in the way of female western democratic leaders at the time. She was so much an icon that my mother also tried very, very hard to emulate the Queen's fashion sense. Let me tell you: now, there were some hats that I believe might have worked well at Ascot or Queen's Plate but didn't work so well on main street in Fairview. There was a little bit of explanation that I would periodically have to make to folks.

But I tell you this story to illustrate the broad appeal that Queen Elizabeth had to so many regardless not only of their politics but of their country of origin. At the time of marrying my father, my mom couldn't maintain dual citizenship, so she happily became a Canadian citizen. She used to talk to me about that. She was a big political geek, and I was quite young, and she used to tell me how proud she was to be part of a constitutional monarchy. At the age of seven I nodded my head and waited for her to move on to the next topic; nonetheless, she would argue that in the U.S. the President was more distanced from the people because in principle, in the absence of a monarchy in the U.S., it meant that the formality and the celebrity and the dignity of the role were attributed to the President and therefore somehow removed them from the kind of democratic accessibility one would hope to see in their democratic leaders.

My mom believed very strongly that the presence of the monarchy in Canada inherently released politicians from that formality and the ceremony that might otherwise have distanced us from our constituents. Now, I think that political scholars and monarchists and republicans and others, constitutional scholars, will debate that point, but I just remember my mother believing it very strongly as part of her overall value that she tried to share with me and our family about her respect for the Queen. What is true is that there is no question at all that Queen Elizabeth ensured our democracy would rest on stability, on dignity, and on integrity and the rule of law, that not only her role represented but her conduct within that role represented.

Now, that was evident in her 1978 visit, when the Royal Family opened Commonwealth Stadium and kicked off the games here in Edmonton. The Queen attended a banquet hosted by Premier Peter Lougheed where she gave a televised national address about the importance of a unified Canada. She said the following:

Encouraged by wise government both at the federal and provincial levels, Canadians have cherished their diversity. They exhibit a highly individualistic approach to life while at the same time adhering to the ideal of a firmly united people.

She went on to say:

I'm delighted to find that the people of Alberta, in developing their enormous natural resources, are determined to remember that material strength does not solve all man's problems and that ultimately it is the quality of life that we all live that matters. All this has been achieved in Alberta by people of many different ethnic origins working together, and it is in the interests of Albertans, like all Canadians, to continue to build a society where the individual can find full expression in an atmosphere of tolerance, co-operation, and harmony.

Here we are, 44 years later, continuing to practise and honour those Canadian traditions in this place.

Of course, Canadian unity has been repeatedly tested, and when Elizabeth II was here in 1990, she acknowledged a, quote, sense of anxiety about Canada's future and spoke of a united Canada, quote: which I trust I shall see in future years when I come again. She went on to say:

I am not just a fair-weather friend, and I am glad to be here at this sensitive time. The unity of the Canadian people and their will to live together will be tested in the months ahead. Knowing Canadians as well as I do, she said,

I cannot believe that they will not be able, after a period of calm reflection, to find a way through present difficulties.

She was right about that, and I believe she's still right today.

In preparing to make this statement, I was also kind of pleased to stumble across an article written about the Queen's last visit to Alberta in 2005. Now, during this trip highway 2 became Queen Elizabeth II highway, or the QE II, as we all refer to it, and the Provincial Museum of Alberta became the Royal Alberta Museum. She also made a trip to Jasper, visited Commonwealth Stadium, attended a centennial celebration at the Saddledome, and took a helicopter tour of the oil sands.

But what caught my eye – it will make no surprise to folks here – was a story about a minor kerfuffle regarding invitations to dinner with the Queen. Apparently, there was a misunderstanding about whether the opposition leader, Stephen Harper, was invited, and that led to a bit of a shakeup in the seating chart, because who did Premier Ralph Klein find himself sitting next to? Well, none other than Jack Layton. Apparently, Premier Klein wasn't very happy about this at first, but – wouldn't you know it? – they found common ground and spent the evening discussing the sponsorship scandal. We talk about Queen Elizabeth as a unifying force, and indeed in that moment she managed to get even Ralph Klein and Jack Layton to break bread together.

During her visit the Queen also addressed the Alberta Legislature for the first time in the province's history. In her address in this very room she left Albertans with this sound advice, and I quote: "During this visit, as we honour the spirit of those who built this great nation, it is timely to remind ourselves that we can indeed make a difference for those who will in turn come after us. If we strive in our own lives and in our own way to leave the world around us a little better than the way we have found it and to maintain the highest standards in everything we do, we can legitimately take pride in our contribution." End quote. I believe that all of us in this House today can agree that Queen Elizabeth was utterly tireless in holding herself to the high standards she described that day.

These visits left a lasting legacy in our province and many memories for Albertans. Her presence can be felt and seen around the province, as the Premier has outlined. Looking back, these visits took place at pivotal times in our history. While she avoided giving her opinion on political matters, she still had strong convictions, and people took notice when she did express an opinion. Prime Minister Brian Mulroney said that Queen Elizabeth II was a, quote, behind-the-scenes force on ending apartheid. Here in Canada she firmly believed in a united Canada.

She has been described by those who knew her as compassionate, humble, and wise. During her visits she left us with wise words about diversity, tolerance, co-operation, and national unity. These words are just as true today as they were then. These are themes that all members who have the privilege of sitting in this Chamber and those who may sit here in the future would do well to remember. It's a reminder that there is more that unites us than divides us as Albertans and Canadians. The Queen was known for her dedication and her service to people. Indeed, her disciplined, diligent, careful, unwavering, unending focus on duty serves as the embodiment of what public service looks like.

Some of us on both sides of the aisle have served in Her Majesty's government. Some of us, again on both sides of the aisle, have served in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, and that framing of the role of the opposition is an important reminder. However vehemently we disagree in this place, we are loyal to Alberta, loyal to Canada, loyal to the democratic, legal, and political traditions which flow from the Crown. We should all follow the Queen's example: service and duty. These traditions have been a profound source of stability in Canada, and even when we have our differences, it's these democratic principles and respect for the rule of law that allow us to resolve those differences peacefully.

For generations Queen Elizabeth was a source of that kind of stability, sometimes in uncertain times. Her passing makes familiar things feel different. It changes the words of our national anthem. But the immediate and peaceful transfer of the Crown to a new monarch should also remind us of the fundamental political stability that makes us Canadian, that makes us members of the Commonwealth.

It is my honour to wish all the best to King Charles III on behalf of our caucus, His Majesty's Loyal Opposition. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Government Motion 32, a humble address to His Majesty the King. Are there others? The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the other speakers so far on Motion 32. It's with great humility and, quite frankly, sadness that I'm rising to address the passing of our Queen and wishing the best in optimism to our new King.

I never met the Queen. I never saw her at a parade. Being a farm kid, that was pretty far off in the distance. But my grandmother was the daughter of a British officer from the British Expeditionary Force, and grandma always had a corner of the house that was kind of dedicated to the Queen, royalty, and such, everything that was related to what happened with the Queen and the family and how it was relevant to Canada. I think it's with that that some of those inherent things have stuck with us over the years, you know, humble beginnings in farm kids and otherwise. This is hitting me kind of hard, as if my own grandmother passed, and I think that's kind of a surprise for a bunch of us, how much this lady actually meant to all of us here.

Being 25 years old when she stepped into that position and carrying that role with such dignity and grace for over 70 years is outstanding. Folks in my generation have never known a sovereign other than the Queen, and I think it's with that, part of that duty and loyalty, that there were a couple of us in my family – my brother, my youngest brother, signed up to be part of the Royal Naval Reserve because of it. I got to swear an oath as an MLA.

I don't have a ton of interactions with that, but what I did was that I reached out to folks in my community, and I couldn't imagine then seeing on social how many stories came forward and how much of an impact she really had. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to retell a few of those. One is Edward Gallagher. He's a former military officer. He wanted to send a story and wishes to the King on behalf of himself and his family. It was on March 8, 1983. It was just shy of his 21st birthday, and he was attending the Royal Roads Military College. He actually commanded an honour guard for Her Majesty the Queen, and he had tea with her. He says that the visit lasted for 15 minutes in total, but he remembered like it happened yesterday. Hers was a life of service unmatched. Ed shared a number of photos with us as well, and it had a profound effect on this gentleman for the rest of his life of service in our community.

Retired Sergeant Cole Rosentreter, Canadian airborne. When I asked him for any thoughts as well – and he'd served in Afghanistan – he said that a lifetime of service is what he offered to the Queen, and he would offer it again without a second thought. He says: I cannot lead you in a battle, I cannot give you laws to administer justice, but I can do something else; I can give you my heart and my devotion to these old islands and all the peoples of our brotherhood of nations.

Retired master sniper, Canadian pathfinder, airborne Sergeant Ben Klick:

As a monarch the Queen was an eternal constant, a reminder that our loyalty is not to the transient politicians or temporary administrations but to the nation, the people, and their ideals. As a person she was the living embodiment of selfless service and a standard that we all aspire to. Those who met the Queen may say that when you meet people, you get a sense of how important they are. When you met Her Majesty, she made you feel how important you were. This is leadership, and we'll miss her.

Retired Lance Corporal Glenn Brooks from the Australian airborne:

It's times like these when the multitude of humble servants like myself who served that wonderful monarch stand by, silent and respectful. I have no words that could add weight to her passing of our loss. I appreciate the offer. In my own way I met with her for a few seconds in Sierra Leone in 1994. It touched me forever and made me realize who I was and what I was doing and what my duty was.

Master Corporal, combat engineers, Chance Burles:

Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth was always a constant in our lives. Her face was adorned on our money, her photo in every school, in every office, ever present, watching over us as a picture of service and duty that reminded us to hold ourselves to a higher standard. When I first joined the military, I swore in her service. I pledged my allegiance to her. Once in the military her presence was felt even without ever having her being there, on the insignia, the Queen's crown. They lived by the Q and Rs, the Queen's regulations and orders. Even the grass was off duty because it was the Queen's. Her presence was ever there. With her loss we reach the end of an era, one in which she presided over great changes and upheaval. As the times changed, the technology changed. She showed us that change was not a bad thing, but we should always hold the touchstone that made us who we are. We see only as we do as we stand on the shoulders of giants. She was one of those giants. Thanking Her Majesty for always being there.

Another lady that I know was an officer in the Canadian navy, actually, and she also swore two oaths, one as a servant to the people of the province. In her words, it was her honour to serve us in both. What she wrote was:

Queen Elizabeth II personified the duty of selfless service. Her steadfast devotion to service was a living embodiment of what it means to sacrifice yourself for the good of others. Her Majesty was once a serving member in the Armed Forces herself, having served in the Auxiliary Territorial Service during the Second World War. True leadership is not just shown in words but by actions and being unshakeable in her duty, loyalty, and the dedication of those who selflessly serve with honour. Her Majesty the Queen was the daughter of a royal naval officer, she married a royal naval officer, and her two children had very long naval careers.

You can tell that there was a propensity to naval and an affinity from Andrea.

Having served in Aberdeenshire, where Her Majesty and the Royal Family spent a portion of their time every year, many who served there felt more of a personal connection with Queen Elizabeth II. Her Majesty showed an unwavering devotion to the Armed Forces members and remarkable care and commitment to our families. She was the Armed Forces' honorary mother and grandmother, who commanded a unique respect through her wisdom, compassion, and unimpeachable example.

There's more here, but obviously, with respect for others that have things to say, I'm going to wrap this one a little shorter. Andrea Petzold thanks the Queen for her service. She says:

Thank you for your 70 years of service, Ma'am. It was an honour to have served you.

To paraphrase a traditional goodbye of the Royal Navy, fair winds and following seas, weary traveller. Your duty is done. Lay down your heart and rest.

God save our Queen, and long live the King.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to rise today to commemorate the passing of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. During my first term as MLA I had the pleasure of serving in the role of the government of Alberta's liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces and now act as His Majesty's Loyal Opposition liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces. As such, the relationship between the Crown and the military holds a special place in my heart.

Queen Elizabeth's relationship with the military was expansive and ever-changing yet still retained a level of warmth and care for those who served. Much of this is due to the times in which she lived and the impact on her as a young girl. The Queen came of age during World War II. For so many at the time, it would have been shocking for young women to go and train as mechanics and drivers, yet that is exactly what she did. In 1945, at the age of 19, Princess Elizabeth joined the Auxiliary Territorial Service, the women's branch of the British Army, and became the first female member of the Royal Family to actively serve in the military. She was also the last surviving head of state to have served during the Second World War.

Upon becoming the sovereign, she developed and maintained a meaningful relationship with the Canadian military, many of whom served in the Queen's Guard. Recently members of the Royal Regiment of Canadian Artillery United Kingdom Public Duties Contingent provided their public duties for a month in 2021 as the Queen's Guard at the four royal residences and important locations in the London district, including Buckingham Palace and the Tower of London.

Honouring our local talent for the multiple mount and dismount ceremonies, the Queen's Guard was accompanied by the 36-person Royal Canadian Artillery Band, based here in Edmonton. As commander-in-chief of the Canadian Armed Forces Her Majesty sought to comfort and motivate military personnel at challenging times. In a particularly thoughtful gesture Queen Elizabeth also invited the 20th Field Regiment of the Royal Canadian Artillery to Edinburgh in honour of its 100th anniversary. Today that regiment consists of the 61st Field Battery, stationed in Edmonton, and the 78th Field Battery, based out of Red Deer, and is an active reserve unit in Alberta and serves as the ceremonial salute regiment for the province. It was deeply important to her to provide comfort and support when remembering those who had been deployed away from their families, a matter close to her heart as a military spouse herself and with many of her children and her grandchildren having served, most particularly Prince Harry, in Afghanistan.

The Queen supported veterans of the Armed Forces through her many patronages, including lending support to her grandson Harry's creation of the Invictus Games, an international multisport event held for wounded, injured, and sick servicemen and servicewomen, both serving and veterans. In fact, she even participated in a skit, joining Prince Harry, Duke of Sussex, in response to a challenge issued by the Obamas in relation to the Invictus Games, a video that went viral and continues to be used in the form of GIFs, clips, and memes today. And it is this level of warmth and kindness, something rarely attributed to this particular monarch, that allowed her to use her love and connections with military persons for public good by giving back to those people she so respected and ensuring all knew they were cherished by not only herself but by the monarchy itself.

As the NDP critic for Culture I cannot help but admire the Queen's dedication and contribution to sports and culture in Alberta. In 1951, while still Princess Elizabeth, she made her first visit to Alberta and watched a CFL game where Edmonton beat Winnipeg in the western semifinal. Calgarians were so excited for her visit that the Calgary Stampede put on a special fall edition of the show. It must have been a success as she would go on to visit three more Stampedes over the decades. In 1978 Queen Elizabeth opened and attended the Commonwealth Games in Edmonton, a monumental event that included building the brand new Commonwealth Stadium.

Opening sporting events in Canada became somewhat of a tradition for the Queen. She opened the Olympic Games in Montreal in 1976, the year that I was born, and officiated at the opening of the Commonwealth Games in Edmonton and then in Victoria in 1994, which is the year my oldest was born. The Queen also opened the 2012 Summer Olympics and Paralympics in London, making her the first head of state to open two Olympic Games in two countries. An avid equestrian and breeder of horses, she visited Spruce Meadows and inaugurated the yearly Queen Elizabeth II Cup.

Her Majesty also opened the museum of the regiments at Canadian Forces Base Calgary and visited the provincial museum of Alberta when it was renamed, in her honour, the Royal Alberta Museum.

In addition to her love of sports, the Queen actively participated in philanthropic efforts, and she left a legacy among her family to do the same. She was patron of more than 600 organizations and charities and helped raise over £1.4 billion for her patronage during her reign. She sought to bring people together through sport, culture, and philanthropy. So, too, did she encourage the values by which she lived on the world stage. In speaking to the United Nations, she stated: over the years I have observed that some attributes of leadership are universal and are often about finding ways of encouraging people to combine their efforts, their talents, their insights, their enthusiasm, and their inspiration to work together; we all must take these words to heart and strive as leaders to work together for the benefit of the people we serve.

Rest in peace, Your Majesty.

God save the King.

Mr. Schow: Grief and gratitude. That is what fills my heart today: grief for the loss of our Queen, Elizabeth II, but gratitude for her lifetime of service; grief for the Royal Family as they have lost a valued family member and matriarch but gratitude for her work on behalf of countless families around the world outside the walls of her own home; grief that we may no longer know her renowned compassion and good humour but gratitude for the example she set as a world leader and the time she spent through her 70-year reign as Queen visiting cities around the globe.

Edmonton, Alberta, is one such city. In 1978 Queen Elizabeth visited Edmonton to open the Commonwealth Games. It was her third trip to our capital city, and her time spent in Edmonton is well documented. She attended a banquet hosted by Premier Lougheed at the time and visited several other landmarks during her stay. But this was a unique visit because the mayor of Edmonton at the time was Cec Purves, my wife's maternal grandfather. So I asked him: what was she like? And this is what he had to say: the Queen is only five foot, four inches tall, but when she entered a room, her personality and presence commanded the attention and respect of everyone present.

She was reserved, but once she got more comfortable, she would show you her tremendous sense of humour. During her stay she kept a strict timeline and waited for no one. In one instance she was at an event with then Premier Lougheed. At one moment he got distracted, speaking with someone else, and instead of waiting for him, the Queen left him behind. In another instance, while walking through the massive crowds of people as she toured Edmonton city centre with then Mayor Purves, her husband, Prince Philip, was lagging behind. He was zigzagging back and forth through the crowd talking with people as he could. He did that so much that the Queen had to turn around, and finally she snapped: Philip, stop dawdling.

But the compassionate side of the Queen, which was one of her most notable traits, was also on display one evening at a dinner at Government House hosted by then Premier Lougheed and with Mayor Purves. As the dinner was about to begin inside the building, a large crowd of people had formed outside the building, and she had no intention of going outside, but Mayor Purves and Premier Lougheed asked and tried to convince the Queen to go out on the balcony for a moment, and she did. She went outside and she waved, and the crowd below was delighted. As a politician I have learned that some of the smallest things we do can have the largest impact. That is no different for a monarch.

Today we grieve the loss of Queen Elizabeth II, but we are grateful for her life of service and the impact that she had on the world. May she rest in peace.

God save the King.

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Immigration and Multiculturalism.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today is a solemn day in Alberta as we recognize the passing of Her Majesty the Queen and pay tribute to her life in the Alberta Legislature. I am honoured to rise and speak as the Associate Minister of Immigration and Multiculturalism as well as the MLA for Calgary-North, offering condolences on behalf of my constituents.

Queen Elizabeth II's reign was the longest of any other British monarch in all of history. For most people throughout the world, she is the only monarch they have ever known. Mr. Speaker, she has been the bedrock upon which governments of Alberta and Canada have relied for the past 70 years. As elected officials we have had the honour and responsibility of governing under her authority, and now we have that same authority and responsibility under the authority of King Charles III. As every bill from this Legislature until this date became an act in Her late Majesty's name through royal assent by the Lieutenant Governor, future bills will now become acts through His Majesty's name.

Perhaps even more important than the Crown's link to our Legislature is the Crown's work in society. The Queen was an incredible example of selfless service, especially through her charitable work. She was the patron of 600 charities throughout the world and, when you include her family, almost 3,000 charities world-wide. Her favourite charities were those that focused on the community and service issues, closely followed by her support for education and training causes. As the former executive director of England's Charities Aid Foundation, John Low, has said – and I quote – she has done more for charities over the past 60 years than any other monarch throughout the world. Unquote. Prior to my election I could have never predicted, Mr. Speaker, the demands of serving in the public eye and representing a constituency.

This has been the most demanding job of my life, beyond anything I experienced in the private sector, including charitable work, but it is one that I am honoured to be doing. Despite my experience, I cannot imagine the demands that the Queen faced in overseeing England and the many other countries in the Commonwealth. Between the demands of her family, her country, her ceremonial roles, her charitable work, and her Commonwealth tours, I am not certain anyone could maintain the same level of calm under that amount of pressure. As we reflect upon the Queen's life here in this House today, I cannot help but feel gratitude for the example of leadership she has set. May she always be remembered for her unparalleled service to Canada and to the world.

In his inaugural speech King Charles III said:

As the Queen herself did with such unswerving devotion, I too now solemnly pledge myself, throughout the remaining time God grants me, to uphold the Constitutional principles at the heart of our nation. And wherever you may live in the United Kingdom, or in the Realms and territories across the world, and whatever may be your background or beliefs, I shall endeavour to serve you with loyalty, respect and love, as I have throughout my life.

In the same way that both Her late Majesty Queen Elizabeth II and His Majesty King Charles III committed to a life of selfless service, let us do our work as legislators and government in the same way. I will always be grateful for her life of service and now the service of King Charles III. May God save the King.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Government Motion 32. The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm grateful to rise to join the Premier, the Leader of the Official Opposition, and my legislative colleagues in commemorating the life and reign of Queen Elizabeth II. As the most well-travelled head of state, the Queen made a number of state visits, including being the first reigning monarch to visit Australia and New Zealand. She was also the first British monarch to visit the People's Republic of China and the Republic of Ireland.

[Ms Rosin in the chair]

Her reign covered a time period of constant change for the monarchy, with many countries gaining independence and self-government. I represent a very diverse riding, and I have many constituents from a Southeast Asian background and, in particular, from the subcontinent, where the British Empire once extended, as well as having constituents who have served in the British military. Many of these communities and constituents have strong opinions around colonization and their relationship with the Crown, and they voiced their feelings, but I will leave that for another day.

Today we gather to recognize the life of service led by Queen Elizabeth II. Today we were all reminded of the words she spoke on her 21st birthday, making a commitment to the British people: "I declare before you all that my whole life whether it be long or short shall be devoted to your service and the service of our great imperial family to which we all belong." And a long and devoted life it was. During her long reign Queen Elizabeth II remained a symbol of stability, continuity, dedicating her life to those people whose lives were touched by the monarchy. This includes the complex and unique relationships found between the Crown and Indigenous people. As Albertans, as treaty people, we live here because the Crown entered into these relationships with the Indigenous persons for whom these lands were home.

When I was practising Indigenous law, the concept of honour of the Crown regarding treaties was of vital importance. In all its dealings with Indigenous people, from the assertion of sovereignty to the resolution of claims and the implementation of treaties, the Crown must act honourably. So as the foundation of the relationship between the Crown and the Indigenous people, in order to honour the Crown, Queen Elizabeth II and King Charles III, we must ensure treaty obligations are fulfilled as intended. We are all treaty people, from those who live here to those who represent the signatories of the treaties. As we recognize and pay respect to Queen Elizabeth II in her role as monarch, we must also acknowledge the need for reconciliation and the significant work we have yet to do.

I offer my deepest condolences to King Charles and the British people and all those who are mourning the loss of the Queen. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: I see the Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my humble honour today to stand in the Legislature and pay tribute to the remarkable life of Queen Elizabeth II. Our late monarch inspired the world with her strength, her poise and grace, and the deep, abiding sense of purpose that she carried throughout her life. Hers was a life of unwavering service to country, the Commonwealth, and her people. That steadfast purpose was a constant throughout her 70-year reign despite immense technological, geopolitical, and societal change.

[The Speaker in the chair]

During World War II she gave her first public address to boost morale and served as an active member of the Armed Forces, where she trained and worked as a mechanic. At the age of 25 she became Queen and in front of 20 million people world-wide publicly devoted her life wholly to duty and service to her country, not a ceremonial post but a calling, a vocation that she carried out with humility and dedication.

The Queen's annual Christmas message was an encouragement to millions each year. For 69 of her 70 years as sovereign she met people in their homes, pulling back the curtain on her public life and sharing a deeply personal piece of herself, her family, and her faith. Two years ago, during a time of great fear and grief, she gave her first-ever Easter address, speaking a much-needed message of hope and the light of Christ over a troubled world.

Just two days before her passing she personally met and appointed Britain's newest Prime Minister, still honouring her vow and discharging the duties of her office. Her dedication to family and country, the Commonwealth, and to people around the world exemplified service above self and inspired that in others. There may not be a public figure in my lifetime to whom these words apply more: from the Gospel of Matthew, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise today as someone who has been a subject of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II his entire life. I think that's true for the vast majority of citizens in Alberta and across the Commonwealth. I'm also proud to rise today as someone who is a subject of Queen Elizabeth II, Queen of Canada. This has been her title in Canada since 1953, when the government of Canada changed her title to that. I think it's very important for us to recognize today that she has been the Queen of Canada and that King Charles is now the King of Canada, a separate title. We are not just subjects of the United Kingdom but our own proper monarchy, which we have a direct connection to.

Now, I'm not a royal watcher, admittedly, Mr. Speaker. I don't follow the tabloids. I cannot name the entire Royal Family. There are many, many reasons that across the entire Commonwealth there are monarchists. There are many, many reasons why we appreciate Her Majesty the Queen. For me, it's a cultural connection to the institution of the monarchy. It's a connection to tradition, particularly the institution of the monarchy.

But I must say, as Canadian public commentator Ben Woodfinden said publicly recently, that I was surprised by how much it affected me when I learned of her passing. Of course, many of us knew and expected this to come soon, at 96 years old, but still it hit me hard. In many ways she was a silent grandmother there for so many of us throughout so many of these important experiences that Canada went through. Referendum debates on separation for Quebec, amendments to our Constitution, visits to Alberta, the naming of Commonwealth Stadium: these were important parts of our public life that we lived together, and the Queen was always a part of it, not just as the monarch is, not just as a monarch there who was carrying on an institution that goes back over a thousand years, but as somebody that we felt like we knew. Her Christmas addresses are what hit me every year. I appreciate so deeply that message. I didn't when I was younger, but as I got older, I came to very much appreciate it.

There's something to be said about the fact that she is a unifying figure from an institution of our past, not the idea of hope in the future, what we will be together later on – these are good things to be unified around – but it's from the depths of our history, the very, very deepest part of who we are in western civilization. That's what unites us. That's rare, Mr. Speaker, and something I think we should be celebrating in her life. In the 70 years of her reign she was always a unifier. Stories we heard from both our Premier and the Leader of the Official Opposition celebrate these moments of unity together, coming together in our public life, again, through the monarch.

I think this is important. I think that institutions, by definition, are formative, Mr. Speaker. They form. They form people who go through them. It's not just people that they form; they form our society. They form us as a people all together. That is what the monarchy has done to Canada. In her history from the very beginning, even before her formation as a dominion in 1967, it was the monarchy that formed us, that made us unique in North America. We are not American, happily so. We are Canadian, proudly a part of the Commonwealth, previously subjects of the British Empire, now proud sovereign citizens loyal to Her Majesty the Queen both in government and in opposition. This is formative.

But there are few monarchs in history that are able to say that they formed the monarchy itself. In her reign in Alberta and in Canada and in the United Kingdom and the entire Commonwealth she shaped what that institution is to us, in our eyes. I mean, we were communicating with telegraphs, very often, at the time that she ascended to the throne. She has been the monarch since 1952, in February, when she, you know, took over because her father passed away, and in her reign we've heard a lot of the history that has happened, throughout the great moments of parliamentary debate and prime ministerial interactions.

But in my constituency here in Alberta, Mr. Speaker, in 1950 and all the way through until the winter of 1951, Alberta and my constituency in particular went through the greatest forest fire in Canadian history, even to this day. Three million acres burned down in the Chinchaga fire. After that fire, as it was extinguished in the winter of 1951, Queen Elizabeth became the Queen, rose to replace her father on February 9, 1952. In that entire time, silently growing in the forests of northern Alberta along with Her Majesty the Queen, along with our province, have been the trees, this forest that continues to grow. I can think of no better analogy, in common one to one, than with this organic growth, continuing up, sustaining us in the north, for sure, and our economy, providing for us warmth – there were still people breaking land and burning wood stoves for many, many years during her reign – as that forest supplied for us resources that we needed. A part of who we are, the very environment in which we lived every day, were these trees that grew up along with Her Majesty the Queen, along with us.

It's not just my life that has been lived. My father, born in 1950: his entire memorable life has been under Her Majesty the Queen. I'm told that my grandmother on my father's side met Her Majesty the Queen when she came to Alberta and visited her long-term care facility – old folks' home they used to call it – when Her Majesty was here. Of course, that is the one interaction my family had with her. In Her Majesty's service to those who built our province and came before us, that seems so fitting, doesn't it?

It seems so right that the one interaction that I have of any kind of grasp at some sort of tangible connection to her is through her honouring my grandmother because of what she did before. She could have been hanging out with Prime Ministers, but, no, she was in the forests; she was hanging out with the common people in service of them. Those stories are so common. When you hear them on the news today – it seems like a 24-hour newscast – there are stories of people with these, and there are so many of them because she did it every single day of her life in service. She formed us in the institution of the monarchy. She formed us as a people, in her small way. I'm grateful to her for that.

I want to end in a prayer, a prayer that we have all uttered so many times that we forgot it was a prayer, but I think we should all mean it very seriously today when we say it. God save the Queen. God save her soul.

God save the King.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Ms Rosin: Mr. Speaker, it is with grief and sadness that I rise today to speak to the life and the legacy of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. While this opportunity may be one of the greatest in my career in this House, it is also one of the most difficult, for what can one individual of this Chamber say to pay the proper respect to the woman who so dutifully served us for 70 years of her 96-year life? Never in our past has there been nor in our future will there ever be anyone like our Queen. Ascending to the throne at just age 25, having never been intended for it, she grew to become the longest serving monarch in our Commonwealth and the longest serving female head of state in world history. She also grew to become my personal hero. Her photo hangs in my house, her portrait in my office, reminding me daily of the leader that I and every member of this Chamber could only ever aspire to be.

In her life Queen Elizabeth served as a mechanic in the world war, she studied constitutional law, reigned over 15 British Prime Ministers, and addressed the U.S. Congress and remains the first and only monarch to ever do so. She travelled tens of thousands of kilometres for duty, drove the Saudi Arabian King around Britain at a time when it was still a punishable offence for women to so much as drive back in their home country. She participated in high-level tactical and political conversations with some of the most iconic leaders of our lifetime. She held over 50 ranks in the British military, gave assent to over 4,000 British acts of Parliament, and served as a constant beacon of grace, joy, goodness, and civility around the world. In the present-day context much of this may seem ordinary, but in the context of a young woman thrust into public service at such a young age and in the mid-1900s, it is extraordinary. She was extraordinary, Mr. Speaker.

For 70 years Queen Elizabeth's smile warmed our hearts. Her compassion touched our homes, her words gave hope to even the darkest of situations, and her elegance gave a generation of young girls a standard to look up to. She brought the Crown out of Buckingham Palace and into our living rooms and connected millions of citizens around the world in a way that only she could. So many of us, myself included and many that we've heard in the House today, felt as though we knew her, as though we had a personal, albeit undeserved, relationship with her. Known for her wit and for always being one of the most well-researched and well-educated conversationalists in the room, Queen Elizabeth II grew to become not simply our figurehead but our head of state and not just a title that she was bestowed but one that she earned.

Over 70 years on the throne Queen Elizabeth II upheld the Crown uncompromisingly, always putting the institution, our values, our traditions, our customs, and the preservation of our way of life ahead of herself and her family, no matter the personal cost. Duty was the highest priority in her life, second only to her love of Jesus Christ. That she met with Britain's new Prime Minister in the final 48 hours of her life is the most beautiful and perfect exemplification of her constant, lifelong, unwavering commitment to the higher purpose for which she was called. Having such a figure of grace and stability as our sovereign is something that many of us as Canadians may have taken for granted over the years. The beauty of the institution that is the Crown is that our people and our democratic institutions are silently bound by respect for our history, a loyalty to our nation, and a duty to uphold a common foundation of morality.

The Crown is not just the head of state; it is synonymously the head of church, which, although largely symbolic to this day, quietly instills in our governments, our justice system, and us a basic set of principles that are not often so found in the American republic, which is guided by the politics and populism of the day. The Crown transcends politics, allowing us quietly, perhaps even subconsciously, the freedom to govern ourselves by justice and virtue rather than by public approval.

We may not always realize it, but under Queen Elizabeth II's grace and discipline the Crown profoundly bound us to one another through a love and a recognition for who we are and where we come from. Her Majesty's passing is now an opportunity for us to reflect not only on the woman who was but on the importance of renewing our respect for the unifying influence of the institution that gave our country life.

While the face of the monarchy has changed, the tenets of what it represents have not. My mother and I recently went to Britain in June to celebrate Her Majesty's platinum jubilee, her 70th anniversary on the throne. We woke up at 4 a.m. to camp out at the parade route. We joined the thousands of people in the streets to watch the air flyby. We attended her famous horse derby. At the time it seemed like a moment in history that we went to celebrate and be a part of, but looking back, it almost feels serendipitous that we chose to be there that day. Mr. Speaker, it's with immense sadness that we say goodbye to Queen Elizabeth II. Our world will unquestionably never be the same because of her, but it is also unquestionably a much better place because of her.

Upon her visit to Alberta in 2005, while addressing this Chamber, Queen Elizabeth referred to our province as a land where "freedom reigned" and where "great opportunities" lie ahead. Well, Mr. Speaker, I haven't been to heaven myself, but I certainly hope that after all she sacrificed and gave this world and our Commonwealth for 70 long, dutiful years, she can now say those very same things about her forever home. During that same visit she stated that she wished for “the Crown in Canada to represent everything that is best and most admired in the Canadian ideal. I will continue to do my best to make it so during my lifetime,” she iterated. Your Majesty, you’ve done that and so much more.

God save the Queen.

Long live the King.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you so much. Mr. Speaker and hon. members, I’m truly humbled. It is such a privilege to be able to speak today to honour Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. Did you know that she visited Canada most out of all the Commonwealth countries, 22 times? I would like to just take a moment to thank both our Premier and the Leader of the Opposition for their wonderful speeches and stories. It’s really what regular folks like me want to hear and love to hear, those stories and the influences and impacts of those who were actually fortunate enough to have met her. I really believe it brings her closer to all of us.

She was also extremely committed to reconciliation. She honoured the painful history of our First Peoples and what they endured, and she spoke quite often about the work that remained to heal.

I rise today, like so many others of my colleagues, to honour the legacy of our departed sovereign Queen Elizabeth II. Up until last week – others have said this, but I think it bears repeating – Queen Elizabeth was the only sovereign that many Albertans and Canadians had ever known. She had been at the centre of the postwar world in a constant government and in a culture for an entire human lifetime. That consistency is something that is likely needed more now than at any point during her long reign, a steady hand, a kind word, a commitment of decency and dignity and decorum in a world where it seems like it’s coming undone.

We know that Her Majesty provided all of us with an example of a life of service and a profound commitment to our institutions. Up until her final days she fulfilled her responsibilities, including free, fair democracy. I, for one, am so honoured to be able to honour that legacy and show everyday Albertans and Canadians and globally that our government and its institutions are worthy of this respect because they put the people ahead of themselves.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker and fellow members and to the people of Alberta, for the time to honour the legacy of what for me is one of the most important leaders of our last century. I would just like to end with a quote. When Queen Elizabeth began her last visit to Canada, she talked of coming home. Of course, she said that in New Zealand and Australia and many other places as well. She said: “Canadians have, by their own endeavours, built a country and society which is widely admired across the world. I am fortunate to have been witness to many of the developments and accomplishments of modern Canada.” And then she said this when she arrived in Halifax in 2010: “As Queen of Canada for nearly six decades, my pride in this country remains undimmed. Thank you again for your welcome. It is very good to be home.”

May she rest in peace.

God save the King.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-North East, followed by the hon. Member for Camrose.

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’m greatly honoured to rise today to speak on this day of remembrance. Today I wish to pay homage to Her late Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. God rest her soul. Her late Majesty was an unwavering presence in our lives for as long as many of us have been alive. She reigned with gracious glory for over 70 years, and it is for that very reason that her leadership and dedication to the Commonwealth will be dearly missed.

Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II has helped shape our history in many ways. From her service in the Armed Forces in World War II to her unprecedented dedication to humanitarian efforts across the globe, Her Majesty was indeed a Queen that loved to serve people. Throughout her life Queen Elizabeth II was involved in over 600 nonprofit organizations across the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth, from the British Red Cross to the Royal College of Nursing. Much of her humanitarian work centred around helping people around the world and bettering the ability for health care workers to provide such essential services.

It is estimated that the Queen raised over $2 billion in humanitarian efforts over her course as head of state. This would make her the most charitable and influential monarch to raise money for nonprofits in the history of the monarchy. Her late Majesty’s dedication to charity work did not only assist millions of people from across the globe but also changed the narrative of what a monarch should be. In a 2012 interview with The Guardian chief executive of the CAF John Low summed up the Queen’s charitable work by stating that Her Majesty’s work has set an example for all of us; by giving time and money to people in need, she proved herself to be more than just a monarch but a true leader.

Just recently Her Majesty donated substantial relief to the Disasters Emergency Committee. That funding directly supported Ukrainian refugees suffering from brutal attacks by Putin’s war machine. Throughout her life she also contributed to other disaster relief efforts. Her Majesty donated to the 2015 Nepal earthquake relief and provided funding for the 2014 Ebola crisis and relief efforts for the 2019 Idai cyclone. It is clear that the Queen’s gracious and giving spirit helped so many people across the world.

Mr. Speaker, the elected officials who stand here to serve Albertans: she has set an admirable example for all of us. No matter on what side of the Chamber you stand, we are all here to represent our constituents and work towards better communities and lives for all. Queen Elizabeth’s presence and devotion to the public service will be dearly missed, so now it is up to all of us to carry the torch into the future. May we all learn from her actions, and may we all follow in her footsteps.

She was a true trailblazer for the monarchy, and her spirit of giving back will never be forgotten. While we mourn the loss of our Queen today, let us also celebrate her life, love, and dedication to the Commonwealth. May God rest her soul.

And may God save the King.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Camrose, followed by the Minister of Infrastructure.

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today, in great sadness, we gather here to extend our sincerest condolences and reflect on Her late Majesty’s extraordinary life and reign. This is a period of mourning for the people of Canada, the Commonwealth, and the world. Earlier this year I had the fortune to observe a momentous occasion, Her Majesty’s platinum jubilee, which marked her 70 years of faithful service, the longest of any British monarch in history. Her unwavering fidelity and devotion to her country and the Commonwealth was acknowledged world-wide. Over the course of 70 remarkable years she presented herself with timeless decency, integrity, and grace. Her late Majesty was a beacon of stability and leadership as she dedicated a lifetime of full-hearted duty.

Her late Majesty was an exceptional woman whose achievements and milestones serve as inspiration to women across the globe. At the young age of 25 she became only the sixth woman in British history to ascend to the throne. She has since been a driving force and one of the most influential women in the world. She dedicated selfless service to the military and trained alongside other women in the Auxiliary Territorial Service. Her wisdom and composure have contributed to her respected, admired, and wildly esteemed legacy around the world.

When I was only six years old, I wrote a letter to Queen Elizabeth. As a little girl I was captivated by Her Majesty's grace and poise. To this day I can still remember the excitement and surprise I felt when I opened a letter from the lady-in-waiting. I was over the moon. It is a memory I have and will continue to cherish, look back on fondly. Throughout her 70-year reign Her late Majesty has been an inspirational figure to many Albertans and Canadians such as myself.

Queen Elizabeth II has always kept Canada close to her heart. From 1952 to 2022 the Queen made 22 official visits to Canada, where she made sure to visit every province, territory, and coast of our vast nation. Alberta was honoured with six visits from Her late Majesty throughout her life. She toured Edmonton, Calgary, Banff, and Lake Louise, leaving Albertans with lasting memories.

She was an exemplary woman who has been with us through many hardships and exhibited care and compassion when the world needed it most. For many people she was an anchor of stability and hope and faith during unprecedented times. Her life of public service had a profound impact on a global scale, and she has touched the lives of millions. She will always be remembered for her commitment and dedication to her duty and her people. Her legacy will live on, and she will continue to be a role model for many generations to come.

It has truly been an honour to have taken my oath to the Queen and to have had the privilege to serve Albertans and Her Majesty. God save the King.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Infrastructure.

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is always an honour to rise and speak in this House. It is especially so today to speak in support of this motion, Government Motion 32. Her late Majesty Queen Elizabeth II was an ever-present force of stability and tradition in our nation.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Madam Speaker, the day was June 30, 1990, when my family and I, along with my grandpa and grandma Craig, went to Calgary to see the Queen inspect her two regiments there, of which she, the Queen, was colonel-in-chief. They were the King's Own Calgary Regiment and the Calgary Highlanders. There she presented the Calgary Highlanders with their new colours. The Highlanders, I believe, were actually the last Canadian regiment to change their colours from the Union Jack to the Canadian flag. And this, of course, was the ceremony to do just that.

My grandpa, grandpa Craig, marched in that ceremony with the King's Own Calgary Regiment, to which the reserve unit in Red Deer was attached. My grandpa remained in the reserves after World War II. He was there, I believe, as a medical officer. My grandpa actually said several times, with amazement in his voice, that the Queen walked within three feet of where he was marching.

I, however, remember sitting up in the stands at McMahon Stadium and, of course, as a 10-year-old boy, spotting and pointing out my grandpa and, of course, watching the Queen with admiration, surrounded by family at such a special event. These are great memories that I have not thought about for years, so in somewhat odd fashion I would like to take this opportunity to thank Her late Majesty for reminding me of these cherished memories of time with my family and my grandparents.

Her late Majesty, of course, again visited in 2005. I also, though, had the opportunity, as was previously mentioned – when she opened the games in Victoria in 1994, I got to see her there as well. However, I would just say that Her late Majesty's presence is felt in many ways, sometimes through personal memories and stories, such as what I shared, and then also sometimes through the buildings, roads, parks, and, of course, pathways that bear her name throughout Alberta. Albertans and their families experience and enjoy these sights every single day.

On that note, and as we heard from the Premier, our government will be honouring Her late Majesty by renaming one of the buildings here on the Legislature Grounds. The Federal Building will soon be officially recognized as Queen Elizabeth II building, and I am honoured to play a small role in that process through my ministry.

Madam Speaker, I'm not trying to speak on behalf of people, other colleagues in this Legislature, but I am certain that we all join His Majesty the King in solidarity in expressing our deepest sympathy for his loss. Her late Majesty's contributions to this province and, of course, to our nation are immeasurable, and her memory will be an eternal one.

Again, Madam Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to speak, and of course God save the King.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is an honour and a privilege to say a few words today in remembrance of Her late Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. The Queen and the Royal Family have always had a special place in my heart. Growing up, I was fortunate to have a grandmother who was an avid monarchist, who collected every picture, magazine, postcard, and newspaper featuring the Royal Family. So, for me, from a young age the Queen wasn't simply a symbol or a person; because of the Queen I was able to have a special connection with my grandmother as she revealed her memorabilia to me whenever I would visit.

My grandmother would actually have a birthday cake for me whenever I visited her as a child, no matter what time of the year it was or how far away my birthday was. It was sort of awkward. I remember visiting my grandparents in December at Christmastime. I have three siblings who were all born in December, yet my grandmother would have a birthday cake for me because I was somewhat special to my grandmother. I never got confirmation about why that was or why my grandmother would call me and not my siblings to wish me a happy birthday, but I do suspect that it was because I shared a birthday with Queen Elizabeth, the Queen Mother, August 4.

You know, one of my fondest childhood memories is actually watching with my parents when the then Prince Charles and Princess Diana drove past us in a red convertible on a visit to Nova Scotia. I was five years old at the time. I was much too small and much too short to see past the massive crowds that had formed, but my dad told me that if I wanted to see Princess Diana, I would have to stand up on his shoulders. I was a little bit scared of such a thing, but he's like: the only way you can see them is if you stand on my shoulders. So he hoisted me up and I stood on his shoulders, and he had a hold of my feet and told me to stop shaking so I wouldn't fall. Again, it was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity as a small child to see the royals drive by.

Later in my life I had the opportunity to spend some time in the United Kingdom, and with my Royal Family connection just ingrained in me since a child, it was natural to be huddled by the fire on a blustery Christmas day in Scotland with a priority to watch the Queen's Christmas Day address.

When I think of Her Majesty, the one word that comes to mind above all else is "service." As we know, on her 21st birthday, when she famously declared, "My whole life whether it be long or short shall be devoted to your service and the service of our great imperial family to which we all belong," you know, those are words that we can all hope to aspire to as we serve Albertans. Her life of service did start before that, when she served in World War II as the first female member of the Royal Family to serve in uniform full-time. Over the course of her life and her reign as Queen she lived up to and exceeded her 1947 declaration of service, dedicating her life to the service of Britain, the Commonwealth, and, indeed, the world.

Throughout her life Her Majesty demonstrated her affinity for our province, visiting Alberta five times as Queen and once as Princess. Her love of our province and people is matched by the love that Albertans have for her. She personified the ideals of dignity, grace, decency, and humanity that we all strive to emulate, so for many of us she was a symbol of stability in an ever-changing and often uncertain world. For most of us she was the only monarch we ever knew.

I think that the reason that I, my grandmother, and so many around the world loved her so is because she wasn't just a Queen; in her we saw a mother, a grandmother, a sister. She played all these roles and more, not just in her own family but to us all. We can all relate to her as if she was family, and in this way she was. She will be remembered by us all for being the great Queen that she was, yes, but just as much if not more for the great person that she was.

Although her life was long and fulfilling, I know that I'm not alone in wishing it was just a little bit longer.

May Her late Majesty Queen Elizabeth II rest in peace and glory. Long live the King.

3:10

The Deputy Speaker: The Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to join my fellow Albertans and people across the Commonwealth in mourning the death of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. Throughout her life Her Majesty provided courageous leadership and diplomacy as an exemplary female head of state to Canada and the 55 other member states of the Commonwealth. During her remarkable 70-year reign she was a constant in an ever-changing world and the only monarch that most of us have ever known.

As a child I was privileged to meet Her Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh as they toured my constituency of Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville on August 2, 1978. It was a special day that I will always remember. Being in awe of her natural beauty and extreme kindness, I remember that she wore an emerald green dress and a hat, which made her look very regal. I also remember that many of us were extending our hands out to her. She did not reach out to all, but she did take the time to say hello to myself and a few of my young friends.

Throughout her reign Her Majesty the Queen has been a role model for young women in leadership since her coronation at the age of 27. I take great inspiration from her as Alberta's Associate Minister of Status of Women. Her Majesty has exemplified diplomacy, wise counsel, and unfailing public service. She has surpassed barriers and preconceived notions of what it means to be a woman in leadership throughout her entire life. On her 18th birthday in 1944 Princess Elizabeth, as she was then known, insisted upon joining the army, where she volunteered as a truck driver and mechanic during the Second World War. She provided wise counsel to 15 Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom, 13 male and two female, including the incoming U.K. Prime Minister, Liz Truss, meeting with each Prime Minister on a weekly basis to discuss state matters.

She had been the head of the world-wide Anglican Communion and the Church of England for decades before female priests and bishops were officially recognized in these churches.

In addition to being the longest serving British monarch, Her Majesty was also married for over 73 years – wow – and the greatest length of time of any British sovereign. She married her much-loved husband, Philip, Duke of Edinburgh, on November 20, 1947, and they remained devoted to each other throughout their lives. The Duke of Edinburgh passed away in April of 2021 after 73 years of marriage to Her Majesty. We can now take solace that they have been reunited.

Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth will always be remembered in our hearts as the epitome of the slogan made popular while she was serving in the Second World War, Keep Calm and Carry On.

Thank you, Your Majesty, for your incredible 70 years of service and devotion to Canada and the Commonwealth. We will do our best to live up to the example of servant leadership that you have provided for us all. May you rest in peace, Your Majesty.

May God bless His Majesty King Charles III and Queen Consort Camilla along with the Prince and Princess of Wales, William and Catherine, as they begin their new roles. God save the King.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is with great sadness that I stand to speak to Motion 32 today. In our Confederation of provinces we have inherited a democratic government where the power of government is established in a constitutional monarchy. As a high school teacher I would often have students who had never been taught that the portrait of Queen Elizabeth II in my classroom was not the portrait of a foreign monarch but that of the Queen of Canada. I would try and help them understand why in Canada we continue to have a monarch, the value of having the Queen as our head of state. I would point out how she and her representatives, the Governor General and Lieutenant Governors, could in a nonpartisan fashion represent the government of Canada, the provinces, and therefore all Canadians regardless of political inclination or loyalty.

The long and often proud history of our ties to Great Britain are embedded in our relationship to the Crown. I would try and help my students to understand that the Queen, while a figurehead as far as the real exercise of political power, was nonetheless a binding influence in our country, one that provided a very strong and real sense of stability in our nation, where sometimes geography and language and culture and religion could stress the bonds of unity.

I'm old enough to remember the Union Jack flying from every school and government building in this province and country. I remember Dominion Day as a child rather than Canada Day, I remember singing God Save the Queen in school and at Cub Scouts, and I remember burying my grandfather, a Canadian and World War II veteran, with his flag of choice draped over his coffin. That flag: the Union Jack. I always believed that while all of the political benefits of being a constitutional monarchy had merit, it was the Queen herself and the way that she acquitted herself as our monarch that spoke the loudest as to why we should support this ancient institution in our very young country. It was her long reign, characterized by her devoted service to the Commonwealth and her subjects in Canada, that made her more than just our monarch but someone that we loved and could admire.

For this Canadian, I found it almost impossible to comprehend how she crafted an ancient institution based on a power imbalance of monarch and subject into a modern, dynamic institution based on a servant-leadership relationship with her government and her people. With every visit to Canada she showed us that we could be proud of her and the institution that she represented. We were a monarchy. With every visit to Canada and to Alberta and, indeed, to this very Chamber, she reminded us of her grace and dignity as our monarch and her very real humanity. With every walkabout, with every flash of wit, with every visit to a farm or every time she opened up a ceremony, she reminded us that underneath the long history and tradition of being a Queen, she was also a mother, a wife, a real person who also had to face the everyday struggles and disappointments that come with a long life. She was our monarch, and she was also one of us.

The Queen has passed. Her long and distinguished reign is over, but there is still comfort in being able to pay tribute to Queen Elizabeth II and then, with heartfelt gratitude, repeat what has been said before over the many years of our democratic history as a constitutional monarchy: God save the King.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others?

Mr. Toor: Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak and commemorate the life of Her late Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. My colleagues have already spoken some wonderful and heartfelt words about the Queen. I would like to use this opportunity to reflect on Her Majesty's platinum jubilee, which we just celebrated in this Chamber last June. This year Her late Majesty became the first British monarch to celebrate a platinum jubilee after 70 years of service. If you stop and think about it, 70 years is an immense amount of time. She has seen the world go through technological changes, political changes, and social changes. We celebrated her then for years of service and steady presence throughout those times of change; we celebrate her now for those same reasons and the life she lived.

She celebrated her silver jubilee in 1977 and golden jubilee in 2002. It was during her golden jubilee celebrations that she made it clear that she was the sovereign for all her people and for our different religions. This shows that God's love stands the equal measures to the whole of humanity. It is a resonant echo of Sikh teachings, that shows the important commonalities between our different faiths. Dedication to duty and respecting others are the fundamental values of the Sikh community.

She made everyone she met feel comfortable and respected. She was beloved throughout the world, and that was certainly the case right here in Canada and Alberta. She visited our beautiful province six times, five times as the Queen and once as a princess. She even honoured this very Chamber with her presence in 2005, the first time a reigning monarch had visited our Legislature.

Her late Majesty was a dedicated sovereign who helped shape our history during her 70 years on the throne. She was our longest serving monarch. I hope that Albertans find some time in this mourning period to commemorate the remarkable life of Queen Elizabeth II and her long and dedicated service to the Commonwealth.

Time to rest now, Ma'am. Thank you for everything.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today with a heavy heart and with the utmost respect and reverence to remember the late Queen Elizabeth II. Growing up, I remember dreaming of princesses and royalty, like most little girls do, and because of that I developed a deep fondness for the Royal Family. Although as a little girl I had never been to the United Kingdom, I felt a sense of connection to the late Her Majesty and felt an affinity for her that I haven't ever felt for the likes of any celebrity or any public figure. Her regality was unreal to a young girl from Medicine Hat whose only crown was made of plastic, yet she was as real as anyone could be, close in our minds and hearts yet thousands of kilometres away.

It was not until I sat down to collect my thoughts today that I really understood the magnitude of what she gave of herself to us. We in this place, as public office holders and MLAs, pledged our service to Her Majesty to serve faithfully and dutifully. It's a large undertaking, a contract that must be entered into with respect for those you serve and a reverence to make decisions prudently. I took that oath in 2019 at the age of 25. In contrast, at just 25 years old Her Majesty took on a duty that not even she expected to take, the consequences of which not one of us could ever fathom. She pledged her life and all she was and was to become in service to us for 70 years.

In a touching tribute by the Rt. Hon. Boris Johnson she was referred to as a changeless human reference point, and I think that sums her up quite well. Through global chaos, turmoil, changes in government, changes in lifestyle, politics, fashion, and everything else in between she was constant. She remained in her perfect way the picture of elegance, a personification of grace, and an embodiment almost of omnipotence, one that I fear our world will never see again.

What is truly astounding is that in all of this pomp and circumstance, in her regality and effervescence, she maintained a sense of relatability with even the least of those that she served. On the day of her passing, snippets of her sense of humour and wit were shared across social media platforms. Whether it was jumping out of a helicopter with James Bond or cutting a cake with a sword or sharing a marmalade sandwich with Paddington Bear – that one always seems to get me – with seemingly small trivial endeavours in the grand picture of her reign she endeared herself to us all.

Her stable and enduring presence was a testament to her deep and abiding faith. One of my more favourite quotes from the late Her Majesty is when she said: "Each day is a new beginning. I know that the only way to live my life is to try to do what is right, to take the long view, to give [the] best in all that the day brings, and to put my trust in God." I believe that all of us, Christian or not, can relate to that and uphold those values.

As we reflect on the life and reign of Her Majesty and welcome in a new era with King Charles III, we do so with the knowledge that her remarkable life of public service and dedication to country has left an impact. As the longest reigning monarch, Canada's Queen, my Queen, we are learning the lesson that she so elegantly taught us: grief truly is the price that we pay for love.

May God bless the Royal Family at this time, bring comfort to all she served, and may God save the King. Long live the King.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to speak to Government Motion 32? The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Madam Speaker. What do you say to honour someone who has given so much to her country, to the Commonwealth, and to the whole world? A life of self-service and sacrifice should always be remembered. Queen Elizabeth II was a role model to so many. As a woman of faith, integrity, and quiet dignity she was a steadfast leader. I trust that much will be written and said about such a noteworthy person, but for now I just want to say: thank you, oh good and faithful servant of the people. May you rest in peace, and may God bless your son the King.

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call the question.

[Government Motion 32 carried]

The Speaker: The hon. the Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, absolutely, that deserved a round of applause. I'm sorry I interrupted that. Go ahead. [applause]

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, through you to all members of the Assembly from all parties for taking the time today to come back to Edmonton. This was a very historical moment, and I appreciate everybody's efforts. I hope you all travel back safely to your constituencies. As such, I will move that the Legislative Assembly adjourn until Monday, October 31, 2022.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 3:27 p.m.]
