I am concerned that this bill might have those unintended consequences, so I would very genuinely and very seriously like to hear from the minister, you know, about the legal opinions they got to ensure that this definition, as provided in the legislation, isn't going to have that impact. In particular, I'd like to hear why there's no specific exemption put in for surgeries performed for trans people. I'm really concerned.

These are people who have an incredibly difficult time accessing health care, Mr. Speaker, and it can have incredibly tragic results. I mean, imagine living in a body that doesn't feel like your own, that doesn't feel reflective of who you are and going through the process of coming to terms with that and sharing it with the people around you, the sort of emotional difficulty and resilience of that, and then add on to this potentially, you know, years of additional appointments and being questioned and being asked if you really know who you are and having to jump through administrative and bureaucratic hoops. I've had people in my office to notarize paperwork, just to sort of change names or change gender identifiers on legal documents, and it was piles of paperwork. We were sometimes notarizing for half an hour. The barriers to this and the sort of length of wait for surgery can be incredibly emotionally traumatic to people. And given those barriers already being in place and given the difficulties that people face already, I think this House deserves to understand why the definition was written this way and what protections are in place.

I am hopeful, Mr. Speaker, that the government has an explanation, that somewhere there is a legal opinion that states that this will not create a problem and that it can be shared with this House. This isn't a situation where "trust us" is going to cut it because this really is something that has a huge impact for a lot of people. I hope that the minister can come forward and answer those questions. I hope that there is a detailed explanation for why that sort of explicit exemption wasn't required in regulation, why this definition won't catch trans people seeking health care. That is the thing I would like to ask on that.

The other question I have – and, again, I'm not saying that this is a bad bill. I am supportive of this bill, but I do have questions about other areas of women's health care, especially in light of the fact that this government has sort of taken steps around talking about, like, the necessity of certain procedures and whether certain procedures are necessary and whether they're kind of – I mean, honestly, in their communications material the government almost suggested that these things were a burden on the health care system and that certain things should be deprioritized, and those things affected primarily women.

You know, even something like saying that carpal tunnel syndrome isn't sort of a priority surgery: well, that affects primarily women, right? That's the sort of information you find out if you don't scrap the GBA plus analysis that departments used to have to do when we were in government. You find out that those things are disproportionately affecting women. As well, there are a number of surgeries. There's some level of controversy over whether hysterectomies are medically necessary in certain circumstances, and that can have a real impact on women seeking health care.

We know as well the sort of impacts of intersectionality on people seeking health care, whether they are believed, whether their symptoms are believed, how seriously the medical system as a whole takes their concerns. We can see in the data the impacts of that on longevity, not just on women but particularly on women who are marginalized in other ways.

This is a good step forward, but I feel like there are so many ways this government could have acted to protect women's health. There are so many ways that it could have been sort of possible to move this forward, and I kind of wonder why some of those are missing here.

I think that in the pandemic we have truly seen what it is to say that an otherwise neutral circumstance has a disproportionate impact on certain populations. The pandemic is ostensibly neutral, but it had a disproportionate impact on women and their lives. It was women who more than anyone else had to stay home, who more than anyone else had to reduce their hours of work or leave the workforce. I suspect, though I do not yet know, that when all of the sort of data analyzing is done at the end – I'm curious to see the impact not just of the pandemic itself but on the sort of, like, cancellation and delay of health care that people have experienced, whether that impact fell equally on every population. I suspect that it didn't.

We know, again, that women and especially women of colour are less likely to get timely access to medical care for a whole series of reasons. We do need to recognize that. We do need to recognize that that is a reality, that intersectionality exists, that these are real things that have real impacts, impacts not just on someone's health but on their life or death.

I do think it's good that we are moving forward with this bill, but I feel like it really could touch on so many other areas, Mr. Speaker, and I feel like there are a lot of missed opportunities here in terms of supporting women's health care, in terms of ensuring that we are supporting equitable access to birth control, that we are supporting equitable access to abortion, that we are ensuring that we are providing equitable access to women so that women's health concerns – endometriosis was one of them that was mentioned.

I believe it's Endometriosis Awareness Month. I mean, this is a real concern. It's a concern that affects women. It's incredibly painful and difficult. It interferes with the quality of life in just about every aspect, from work to enjoyment of their home time, and it tends to be undertreated in our medical system. It tends to particularly, again, be undertreated in women who are more marginalized, for instance women of colour, Indigenous women, women of sort of lower incomes or lower education levels because it often requires that the person go back to their medical professional over and over again with the same complaints before they receive treatment, and they're sometimes not taken as seriously as the health concerns that come forward from men.

When our systems have these disproportionate impacts, we need to recognize the existence of those disproportionate impacts, and we need to do what we can to equalize things. That's why gender-based analysis plus is so important. Having that come forward when we were in government was, I think, always incredibly useful information, because it's not always immediately obvious on its face, especially if you're not super familiar with an area, what impacts a certain apparently neutral rule will have on different populations.

Yeah. I think my two main concerns with this bill are why there's no explicit exemption for trans health care and whether we're very, very certain that this definition isn't going to catch that – those are folks who really do not need any additional barriers, in fact, quite the opposite – and, you know, why these other women's health concerns are not addressed.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and speak today to second reading of Bill 10, the Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022. I welcome the opportunity to discuss this bill. I want to begin by saying, as I think my colleagues have already mentioned as well, that we do support this bill. Certainly, moving forward with any actions we can take to prevent, to address issues of female genital cutting is deeply important. We support this bill and are happy to do so.

As I understand it, the bill does a few things. Of course, we do know that female genital mutilation is already contrary to the Criminal Code of Canada. I believe it's under section 268 of the Criminal Code, which specifically makes female genital cutting a criminal offence. This bill purports to – well, it does a few things. Of course, it adds a specific definition, as my colleagues have mentioned, for female genital mutilation.

Actually, before I go further, Mr. Speaker, I should say that I know there is a difference in terminology that's sometimes used. The bill uses the terminology “female genital mutilation.” I have certainly heard and I understand, at least, it to be the case that a number of survivors would prefer to use the term “female genital cutting.” Actually, I note that one of the recommendations that I believe obstetricians and gynecologists give when supporting women who have experienced this is to respect the terminology of the survivor as to what they'd like to use. I'm a bit more comfortable myself using “female genital cutting.” That's the terminology on which I had done some research and experience in my past on this issue. I appreciate, though, that the bill actually provides a definition around female genital mutilation. It describes it as the “excision, infibulation or mutilation, in whole or in part, of the labia majora, labia minora, clitoral hood or clitoris of a person, except where valid consent is given.”

The bill also requires health workers to report cases of female genital cutting to both law enforcement and their professional regulatory body. Of course, these are changes that are being made specifically to the Health Professions Act, so it's really covering a number of health professions, not just physicians and surgeons but, of course, all of the health professions. I believe there are – I can't remember exactly – 62. Maybe that's a little high in terms of the number of health professions that are covered under this act. But it applies to all of those professions, and it does require that any health workers who have been convicted of FGM in any Canadian or international jurisdiction are prevented from, basically, practising in their profession and from holding permits or professional licences in Alberta.

Again, I don't take issue with this bill. I understand Alberta will be the first province bringing forward legislation like this, but I suppose that speaks to part of the questions I have around the necessity for the bill. I'd love to have the mover of the bill bring forward sort of some information around, you know: how many occurrences do we know of female genital cutting happening in Alberta? Are there limitations with respect to the effectiveness of the Criminal Code provisions? I'm not entirely sure – I've done a little bit of a review of the Health Professions Act – but generally when a health professional has been convicted of certain provisions of the Criminal Code, they automatically can no longer practise. I'm not sure if this is in addition to that. I know that sometimes within the Health Professions Act specific provisions of the Criminal Code are highlighted, and section 268 does seem to be mentioned, I believe, once in the Health Professions Act.

I have a few questions about how much of an issue this is in Alberta. Now, I respectfully acknowledge that this may be an issue that we don't have a lot of data about. Specifically, part of the concern around female genital cutting is that it does happen in the shadows, and we may not have a lot of data about it, so we may not be able to conclusively say whether or not it is a pressing issue in Alberta. But, certainly, to stand in solidarity, I suppose, with the idea that we completely condemn female genital cutting is appropriate, and I support that.

However, I also do share the concerns raised by my colleague the Member for Calgary-Mountain View around how female genital mutilation is defined in here and whether or not it will inadvertently capture some medical procedures that may be part of a gender reassignment surgery. I'm not professing, by any means, to be an expert in the medical and surgical aspects of such a surgery, but that is a question I have. I would certainly anticipate that it is possible to consider that it could be captured by how this bill defines female genital mutilation.

As my colleague mentioned, any potential increased barrier for trans individuals to access health care should be considered and wholly rejected. We want to be very clear. We know that trans people already suffer significant barriers and challenges in accessing appropriate health care, and we would not want to be unintentionally – and I certainly hope there's no intention to do so; I don't perceive that there is – creating an additional barrier for trans people to seek health care services.

I do hope that we will hear some conversation around that from the mover of the bill to understand a little bit further the protections that are in place. Now, I appreciate that the definition does include that there's an exception where valid consent is given. It's certainly, though, my concern that there is a perception that gender reaffirming surgery would somehow be considered captured by this definition. We want to be very clear – and I believe we should be that clear in legislation – to make sure that that is not captured by that. I hope that we will have some conversation around that.

I've had the opportunity, like, I know, many members of this House, to travel the world and to experience and live in other countries even, and I did have the opportunity to spend a significant amount of time in South Africa. That's where I got a little bit of an understanding of and exposure to some of the discussions around female genital mutilation. But, of course, we know that those issues are not just issues that happen in other countries around the world, that they are concerns that we have here in Canada.

But, again, I am slightly concerned that we are focusing on this issue where there are already significant Criminal Code protections. We do know that there are also already requirements under the Health Professions Act that if a practitioner has committed and has been convicted of a Criminal Code offence, they automatically lose their ability to continue to practise and in many cases cannot be reinstated.

This feels like an opportunity to really discuss other pressing issues around women's health. I know my colleagues have spoken about it, but I think we need to speak about it because of the issues that are pressing in women's health. I know of many women and I've received many contacts and e-mails and messages from constituents and Albertans who have concerns about a lot of things when it comes to women's reproductive health, not only accessing current services.

Actually, I'm struck by – my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood might remember this. There was recently an excellent thread by a doctor, and I'm apologizing that I can't pull her name right now to my mind, because I do want to give her credit. She did a great Twitter thread not too long ago talking about the limited access that women may have to – and I always pronounce it wrong – Mifegymiso. You know, this is an important drug that for many women is an important part of their reproductive health. This is a drug where I'm proud that, when we were in government, we supported it being covered, because we knew it was important for women's reproductive health. It's an important drug, but in this thread by this doctor – and I promise to find out her name and get back to the House on that – she talked about how few pharmacists, for example, made that drug available.

Member Irwin: Dr. Emma Herrington.

Ms Pancholi: Dr. Emma Herrington. Thank you very much to the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

It's Dr. Emma Herrington, and I want to give her credit because she canvassed a number of pharmacies around Alberta to see whether or not those pharmacies made this drug available. She was shocked to find out how few of those pharmacies knew that it was available and made it available.

So when we talk about access to reproductive health services and treatment, we should be talking about this issue. This is a pressing issue that many women access and should be able to access, yet in Alberta apparently it's not widely available. That's something that we could certainly talk about.

I'd also like to talk about – you know, I know that for women that I know in my life, access to important surgeries such as a hysterectomy is often very important and even things such as breast reductions. I appreciate the Member for Calgary-Mountain View pointing out that I believe it was this government that had a report brought out – I believe it was an Ernst & Young report; there have been so many reports; it was before the pandemic – which talked about a number of surgeries and procedures that were deemed to be not medically necessary, and breast reductions, for example, were considered one that was not.

If any of you have experienced this or know women in your life who have experienced it, breast reduction surgery is critically important to a woman's health in many circumstances. It can alleviate significant pain and discomfort. There are many associated problems that go along with that challenge, so that is certainly very important to women's health, having access to breast reduction surgeries.

When we're talking about access to women's health, we have to talk about the surgery backlog, really, that so many Albertans are facing and that, certainly, Alberta women are facing. We know that the mismanagement by this government of the pandemic has resulted in tens of thousands of Albertans, including women, not having access to necessary treatments and procedures and surgeries. That should be a top priority, I believe, for this government.

I also want to talk a little bit about postpartum depression and anxiety. You know, when I looked at the throne speech for this government, there seemed to be a lot of focus on women reproducing up until the point of having a baby but not as much conversation about medical health supports and mental health supports that are necessary after a child is born, not only for the mother and even the father but also for children. I think we should be talking about greater access to mental health supports for women, for example, who are experiencing postpartum depression or anxiety, a very common issue that can negatively impact not only the woman's health but also the baby's health and a family's health and well-being. These are the kinds of issues that I believe should be raised and should be highlighted.

I also want to talk about – you know, we do understand that female genital cutting may exist in the shadows. We may not have a lot of data about it, and that speaks to how important it is to collect good data. I'm very proud that my colleague the Member for Edmonton-City Centre has brought forward a private member's bill, that I'm very much looking forward to debating in this Legislature – and it will hopefully have the support of all members of this House – to collect race-based data in all areas of services that the government delivers, and that includes health care. That can help us inform, I believe, some of the practices and supports and highlight those communities, those individuals, those racialized individuals who may need additional supports.

When we see this bill come forward, I hope that means that there will be some support for this private member's bill, which will really speak to helping to get into that data that may be living in the shadows. Let's try to focus on trying to pull out those pieces of information, because that's important to developing strong policies and practices going forward and legislation and making funding decisions. Again, it also speaks to why gender-based analysis is critically important. We know that when policies and legislation and funding decisions are made that appear to be neutral, they may not be neutral in their impact. That consideration should be made before those policy decisions are made.

I think that this bill appears to be a fine bill. There are a number of questions that, I think, I and my colleagues have raised that I really do hope we will have an opportunity to discuss further in this House, but I also hope that we will see this bill as an opportunity to consider other serious health concerns that women face in this province and how we can address those not only – it's not just about funding; it is about data, and I very much welcome that.

You know, the members of the Official Opposition believe strongly in evidence- and data-based decisions and making decisions based on what we know will best serve the people it's intended to serve. I see this as an opportunity to really get into those issues of race-based data. Maybe it will reopen a critically important conversation in this House around gender-based analysis. I think we're doing a disservice to the women of this province when we fail to consider their lived experiences and the impacts of policies and funding decisions that are being made on them simply because it's an oversight by this government.

It is important for intersectional work as well. I feel it's important that we talk about that. Especially in the context of female genital cutting, we are often talking about intersectionality. We're talking about how race and gender and sexual orientation and sexual identity and income and ability all come together. My understanding is that the intent of this bill is to really protect, and if we are hoping to protect, we need to consider all the various identities and vulnerabilities that people experience and women experience.

I hope to have a fulsome conversation and to hear from the movers of the bill on some questions around the necessity of this particular bill, how many women and girls it's hoped to protect. I hope to have a really good discussion about that.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has risen.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to join in the debate on Bill 10, Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022, in second reading, and I want to thank all of my colleagues this afternoon who have spoken before me on this important piece of legislation. Certainly, I'd like to begin by just stating my support for Bill 10 as a piece of legislation that I will be pleased to vote for in this Assembly.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 10, just to quickly summarize what we are doing in this piece of legislation, is going to enhance the protections for women and girls against the practice of female genital mutilation, which is defined in this legislation. As my colleagues have, I will begin my remarks by simply saying that the topics we are covering in this bill debate are very sensitive and potentially triggering for those who may be listening. We know that there are women and girls here in Alberta who have been subjected to this practice and family and friends who love them who may also be impacted by this, but even just hearing these topics discussed can certainly be really upsetting, because we're talking about something very, very damaging, very sensitive at this point.

The Bill 10 as announced by this government would do a few different things. It will ensure health professionals who are convicted of performing, offering, or facilitating female genital mutilation in Alberta will be removed from the practice, Bill 10 will prohibit individuals convicted of this crime elsewhere from practising in Alberta, and Bill 10 will require health profession regulatory colleges to adopt standards of practice, including education, awareness, prevention, and sensitivity training, to better support the physical and mental health of women and girls who may have undergone female genital mutilation.

Now, it does that, in part, by starting off with a definition of what female genital mutilation means, and as my colleagues have noted, I will also note that sometimes the language can change when we're talking about this issue. The act talks about female genital mutilation; it's often referred to as female genital cutting as well. It is internationally recognized as a human rights violation, Mr. Speaker. FGM denies women and girls their right to health, security, physical and emotional integrity, and it violates their right to be free from torture and cruel, inhumane, or degrading treatment. Certainly, we know that this practice is incredibly physically damaging up to and including that it can kill the women and girls who are forced to undergo FGM.

Now, since May 1997 female genital mutilation has been against the law in Canada and is in the Criminal Code of Canada. I would point out to this Assembly – and I believe that it has been stated by the mover of the bill. Let me pause to simply say thank you to the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore for bringing forward this bill, for the work that she has been doing on this issue. I know that she has spoken with hundreds of women and has been consulting and raising awareness on this issue for quite some time. Certainly, for the seven years that we've been colleagues in the Legislative Assembly, I know that this has been a topic that she has been incredibly passionate about and has been speaking about. That member has done an incredible amount of work on this as well as not just Bill 10 but also in creating and recognizing the International Day of Zero Tolerance for Female Genital Mutilation on February 6, a day to recognize the practice, to raise awareness, to commit to efforts to prevent further victims of FGM. And now today we have the legislation in front of us for debate.

I mentioned the Criminal Code of Canada, before I was struck that I needed to thank the mover of the bill, because my understanding is that we have not seen cases of physicians practising in Alberta. But one of the things that we know happens is young girls being sent out of Canada for FGM to be performed and then being brought back here, where certainly health professionals need to know how to support them. I also want to mention that I understand the Criminal Code of Canada can be used to control the transportation of female children who are being moved out of the country for the purposes of obtaining FGM. Knowing that the Criminal Code of Canada has provisions that have been protecting women and girls from this I think is very, very important. Anyone in Canada who is convicted of mutilating female genitalia faces a prison sentence of up to 14 years.

As my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View mentioned, particularly when we're trying to curb behaviour, we're trying to eliminate a dangerous practice that threatens the health of women and girls: having multiple legislative avenues to do that. So while the Criminal Code of Canada exists and does make illegal these practices, including transporting women and girls out of the country to have this done, we know that the practice still does exist and does happen. We need to acknowledge that. I think Bill 10 moves us forward in the steps to preventing and supporting the women and girls who've had their human rights violated. Now, certainly, female genital mutilation is primarily a method of sexual control. We see it quite often as a manifestation of deeply entrenched gender inequality.

With the changes that are in Bill 10, the requirement to have health profession regulatory colleges adopt standards of practice that include education, awareness, prevention, and sensitivity training to better support the physical and mental health of women and girls: I see this as a very positive thing. Now, I know that the College of Physicians & Surgeons of Alberta have had standards of practice forbidding the practice of FGM since, I believe, the '90s. Certainly, this is an issue that some of our health profession associations and regulatory colleges have been aware of. One of the questions that I have perhaps for the mover of the bill or one of the government ministers is that I'm curious if we've asked all of the health profession regulatory colleges that will be impacted by this bill what the current state of their awareness, prevention, and sensitivity training is.

I'm very curious on the size of the impact that Bill 10 will have. Will this assist to reinforce the importance of things that are already in place? Will regulatory colleges and others impacted be needing to create new procedures, practice, and materials from scratch? That's something that I hope to learn as we join in the debate through this process and particularly as we get into Committee of the Whole and we're able to do a bit more going back and forth. It's clear to me, in doing some initial research on Bill 10 and trying to understand the impact of this piece of legislation, that this is an issue that Canada and our Canadian health system has been aware of and taking steps to try to address for some time, and I'm very, very curious to know more about how that has impacted each of the different health profession regulatory colleges throughout Alberta.

Now, there are some additional questions that we have as we go into this debate, including: what tools and resources will be provided to women and their health providers when they identify a need for supports when they have experienced female genital cutting or genital mutilation? I note from research done by the opposition caucus that there have been guidelines provided for female genital cutting here in Canada through the Journal of Obstetrics and Gynaecology Canada, recommendations that include things like making sure that health care providers are careful not to stigmatize women who've undergone female genital cutting, even just things like making sure you understand the language that the person who's had this happen to is using and adapt to their language in talking about it.

As I read more about FGM and think about Bill 10, I think it's very clear that the stigma can be crippling and is a major factor when it comes to these women and girls seeking out health care, so it's really important that our health care professions and professionals are well trained and resourced and know how to support women and girls that this has happened to. Certainly, making sure that we are all advocating for the availability of and access to appropriate supports and counselling services, I think, should be a part of the conversation that we have around Bill 10. Some of my colleagues have talked about the challenges our health care system has been going through particularly with the pandemic. I'm curious under that context if women and girls impacted by FGM, I imagine as all of our health care system has been disrupted, if their access to health care may have been disrupted as well.

I am not aware of any cases where FGM has taken place in Alberta or any charges related to, but that is certainly something I'd be curious to hear more about as we go through the debate and find out more. Currently my understanding is that health care workers need to report cases of FGM to their professional regulatory body, and my understanding is that with Bill 10 we will now ensure that all the health professionals will be required to report to law enforcement as well, and certainly anyone found to have performed this will not be allowed to practise in Alberta going forward.

There's certainly a great deal of discussion about the issues around FGM and female genital cutting through the debate on Bill 10. I appreciate that everyone appears to be approaching this debate in a very sensitive way and to be trying to reflect the respect that we have for this conversation and the importance of the topic that is under debate. Again, I will reiterate my support for this piece of legislation.

That being said, I do want to echo some of the comments my colleagues have made around the important, critically important, need to support all aspects of women's health and the challenges that women have been experiencing through the COVID-19 pandemic when it comes to accessing important services, everything from basic health care to birth control to oncology supports. Certainly, we've seen a disruption to our health care system that's impacted women to a strong degree.

I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, the opportunity to speak to Bill 10, to offer my support, to put on the record some of the questions that I have for the mover of this bill and/or the government ministers who are working to support this move forward. I thank those within the government of Alberta who've worked on this issue, and I look forward to hearing more debate as this bill continues to proceed. I hope that it is going to have the positive impact with which it was drafted and introduced.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I would move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate lost]

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to join debate?

Mr. Rutherford: Mr. Speaker, as we continue on with this debate, I actually was wondering: am I able now to move to adjourn debate? Can we do that again successively? I move to adjourn debate.

The Acting Speaker: Actually, as is sometimes the case in Committee of the Whole, often there is an intervening proceeding with regard to this; therefore, no, you cannot, but you may speak to it. Then perhaps somebody after would look to adjourn debate. I see the deputy government whip has risen.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate all the debate this afternoon as we work through a topic around female genital mutilation or, what Edmonton-Whitemud brought up, female genital cutting, and make sure that we are not only identifying . . .

Mr. Turton: Intervention.

Mr. Rutherford: Yes.

Mr. Turton: Thank you very much to my good friend speaking. I was just hoping that perhaps he can elaborate on some of his experience and contacts in his professional environment before and tell a little bit about his experience working, obviously, with some of these more critical female issues in his previous line of work.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and for the intervention and the question around my 10 years in law enforcement. Yes, I did respond to a number of calls regarding human trafficking, domestic violence, people who were sexually assaulted, abused, child abuse, you name it, everything that could exist, unfortunately. I am not going to get into those personal stories or details as they are, you know, for those individuals a sensitive matter. They can be talked about broadly, but I would resist wanting to bring up their personal stories that they shared with me and expected me to treat respectfully as well. I thank you for the intervention and for asking about that.

Mr. Speaker, I will relinquish the rest of my time.

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland has risen.

Mr. Getson: Yeah. Thank you for recognizing me, Mr. Speaker. To the prior speaker here as well: I appreciate that. As a father of three young girls I think that this legislation – I think every group can agree to this, that it's very important. It's terrible that these things have to take place, but it's good that we can come together on items like this in the House and close it.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to close debate.

An Hon. Member: Move to adjourn debate.

Mr. Getson: Move to adjourn debate.

The Acting Speaker: I think I knew what you were getting at.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 11 Continuing Care Act

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Minister of Health has risen.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to rise and move second reading of Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act.

Mr. Speaker, for years now Albertans have asked the Ministry of Health to re-examine our continuing care legislation and address challenges in the system. We made a commitment in early 2020 that we would review the legislation and address those concerns. This review led to the development of the new Continuing Care Act, which I am proud to move forward today. The proposed legislation establishes a framework, a much-needed first step, to transform our province's entire continuing care system. It will enable a modern, flexible approach to home and community care, supportive living accommodations, and continuing care homes that will serve Albertans now and into the future. It will provide a foundation for enhancing the quality of life Albertans have in continuing care. The act will create system-wide efficiency and improve service delivery for Albertans. It will also support the health system's accountability and sustainability.

Without this new act we risk gaps and inconsistencies that remain in current legislation, and we would be unable to make transformational shifts required for system improvement. Our current continuing care legislation dates back, in some cases, to 1985 and includes content in six acts, six regulations, and three sets of standards. As of today, what we know about continuing care service delivery is that it has evolved over time. Our legislation needs to catch up to a modern world. Existing legislative requirements do not effectively reflect present-day practices, services, or settings, nor does it adequately reflect the changing needs and expectations of Albertans. Albertans have told us that they want new, client-focused models of care. The act would enable this to happen going forward.

Provisions in our existing legislation are outdated and fragmented. They add layers of complexity and inconsistency to how the continuing care system is governed. The COVID-19 pandemic also revealed these system gaps. The proposed legislation will address these limitations in our existing laws and bring them up to date in one streamlined act. This new legislation will help transform the continuing care system to reflect the importance of resident and client quality of life and a person-centred approach to care and services. It will enable shifts to expand home and community care, improve care within continuing care homes and in other settings as well. The intent is to create enduring legislation that will enable and support responsiveness to changing system demands and contexts now and into the future.

While much of the detail will be in the regulation and standards with respect to service provision as it is done today, staffing, and other operational content, the act itself contains significant content on compliance, monitoring, and enforcement. The intent is that while there will be flexibility in the continuing care system through regulations and standards, there is strong oversight and authority for the ministry to ensure compliance to legislative requirements, including standards, and that will be in the act.

Having one overarching piece of legislation will provide consistency and alignment across our entire continuing care system. It will establish clear and consistent authority and oversight for licensing, accommodations, and delivery of publicly funded health care in the continuing care system, and it will allow us to support the implementation of recommended actions identified in our reviews of continuing care homes and palliative and end-of-life care. The proposed legislation will strengthen system sustainability for years to come. I'm also proud to say that if this act is passed, Alberta will be the only province in the country with integrated legislation for its entire continuing care system.

But, more importantly, we are doing this for Albertans. The new legislation supports our larger commitment to Albertans to increase access to continuing care and meet demands on the system over the next decade and beyond. As indicated in Budget '22, Mr. Speaker, we're creating 1,500 new spaces in the coming year alone with that funding increase, but we need to do much more. Our review of continuing care showed that the demand on our system will increase by 60 per cent by 2030.

At the same time, we should be helping more clients live independently for longer to avoid or delay admission to a facility. That's better care for the client. It's a better use of resources so we can serve more clients. The review recommended increasing long-term home care from the current 30 per cent of total clients to 40 per cent by 2030. We're starting that strategic shift now with more funding for home care this year, and it is just the beginning.

We're strengthening our continuing care system to meet the challenges of the next decade and beyond through this legislation, the review, and the funding in Budget '22. Therefore, I move second reading of the Continuing Care Act.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has risen.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to second reading of Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, and I appreciate the brief synopsis from the minister laying out what he is looking to achieve with this legislation. Certainly, I think all of us as members in this House have heard from constituents about concerns with the continuing care system and indeed care for seniors in the province of Alberta. As the minister noted, this is a growing concern. We have an aging population. We are expecting to see an increasing demand on capacity in that system. Certainly, we have all seen that there are real concerns with some respects in how that care is provided and what is available and what is accessible, and certainly we have seen some of those cracks in that system in much more vivid detail under the pressure that's been put on it through the COVID-19 pandemic.

Certainly, this government has been ambitious in its promises and the commitments that it has put forward and said it was going to make and the action that it said it was going to take. This is the first opportunity that we have to review actual action from this government in terms of following through on those commitments. Now, the minister talked about the facility-based continuing care review, a review that was completed in April 2021 and then made public in May 2021. That report laid out 11 policy directions, 42 recommendations.

As the minister noted, one of the key commitments, recommendations in that review was to shift the current share of 61 per cent long-term care residents and 39 per cent in facility-based care to be a ratio instead of 70 per cent home care and 30 per cent facility care. Certainly, that is an incredibly ambitious goal, Mr. Speaker, but certainly one I understand and support. As the minister just said, certainly, supporting more seniors to live independently in the community as opposed to in a facility provides a better quality of life for those seniors. Absolutely. That in turn will have a significant impact on their continuing health. It certainly should be achievable at a lower cost to the system overall. Certainly, I am in agreement there. Indeed, that report projected that the shift could save about $452 million annually, which it then recommended should be redirected to increasing direct hours of care in long-term care to four and a half hours a day and also increasing the hours of direct care for designated supportive living as well.

Now, the former Minister of Health said that of those 42 recommendations there were some he could act on immediately, others that would need to develop an action plan, others that would require some further study, but the commitment we heard from the government at that time was that the recommendations on staffing and hours of direct care would be reviewed over the summer and acted on in the fall. Things were delayed. Admittedly, I recognize, of course, that the COVID-19 pandemic likely had some impacts on that. Certainly, we have had robust debate, and I have made much comment about what role the government played in the severity of that and the, I guess, length of that delay and how that might have played out in this, but I'm not going to go into that again here.

What I can say is that we find ourselves here now with this government's piece of legislation specifically to follow through on these commitments, but we see nothing here about those particular issues. We see nothing about the recommendations on staffing. We see nothing here about the recommendations on hours of direct care. Now, I recognize, in listening to the minister as he just opened second reading here, that he stated that staffing and other operational content will be in the regulations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate that indeed there are many things that need to be done through regulations. Indeed, for example, I know that with my own private member's bill, which I am bringing forward, certainly there is a lot that I've got in there to say that would be taken care of in the regulations, say, around setting data standards for the collection of race-based data, the reason for that being that that would require considerable consultation, certainly with racialized communities in particular, who do not have a long history of trust in government in handling information about them.

In this case we have had the entire review which was conducted and the recommendations that have come forward, and indeed the government has had time since then to do some robust consultation, yet we see nothing here about the specifics on that. We see that the government does not seem to be in a position to actually make any statements or take any action or indeed make any commitments on a significant piece of what's required, I think, to make reforms in our continuing care system and indeed on an area that has been the subject of, I think, the majority of the concerns that I've certainly heard brought forward. [interjection] I see the minister would like to intervene. I'm happy to give way.

Mr. Copping: Thank you very much to the hon. member. The hon. member raises some very good questions. I just want to take a moment to respond to some of those, and I'm sure we'll have the opportunity for more debate as we actually talk about Bill 11. The hon. member is quite correct that the FBCC review was done. My predecessor was examining through that. Changes happened. The hon. member also . . .

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. minister. However, it's come to my attention that this is actually only just the second speaker. The second speaker is given the opportunity for the full 20 minutes themselves, so I will pass it back to the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Thank you.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for that clarification. I look forward to the opportunity for some more collegial interaction, I guess, at further stages of debate on the bill.

As I was saying, certainly, I have some concerns that we are not seeing clear information here about what the government's intentions are in terms of fulfilling some of these extremely important aspects, I think, of the review. As I was saying, the concerns that have been brought forward to me as an MLA have certainly often been around the direct number of hours of care that residents of continuing care and designated supportive living are receiving. Indeed, the concern has been that, particularly in privately owned and operated facilities, the drive to ensure the profit that's needed to be for the stakeholders can often come at the expense of care for the residents.

Certainly, I think a number of Albertans would really like to see some more robust information from this government about their intent. Again, putting things in the regulation: I can appreciate when that is necessary and functional at times but also recognize that that means those pieces are much more easy for government to make changes to without having to come before the Legislature, without having to even necessarily be overly transparent about doing so. When it comes to things like staffing ratios or hours of care and other things that are of very real concern to many Albertans about their loved ones in care, those are things I think that Albertans would like to see very clearly codified and requiring perhaps more scrutiny for government to make future changes to once those commitments have been enshrined.

But I won't belabour that point, certainly, particularly given that the minister is not able to rise and respond at this time, and I will look forward perhaps to an opportunity to hear from him further on his reasoning for doing this within the regulation process. I'd be interested to hear what is going to be involved in that, indeed if there is further consultation that will be required, then, before they can move forward with those regulations and the timelines that might be involved in that. I think those would be some of the pieces that Albertans would be interested in hearing about as they consider what this government's actions and steps in regard to this legislation are going to be.

I appreciate that the minister spoke of additional funding that they are providing for home care. Certainly, again, that is incredibly important. I would note that also within the legislation it spoke of the need to increase staffing. The review mentions that close to 6,000 more staff would need to be hired in order to meet what they are recommending for proper staffing to provide the level of care that should be provided for Albertans within the continuing care system. That is a significant number of staff, Mr. Speaker.

We know already that we are still facing constraints within our system, I think for a number of reasons, certainly, a large part of that being the exhaustion of our health care staff throughout the COVID-19 pandemic. We saw the effects of that beginning last spring as we were still just coming out of the third wave, before we went into the best summer ever and the deep, deep impacts of this government's neglect in the fourth wave. Certainly, we know that we have had care facilities such as the Galahad seniors' care centre, which still remains closed – 20 seniors have been displaced for coming up now on one year – because of a lack of nursing staff to be able to provide care. As we are looking forward, I think we need to hear more from the government about what their intents are to meet this need.

Certainly, I appreciated the opportunity I had to discuss this with the minister to some extent during the estimates process and also with the Minister of Advanced Education, and I am pleased to hear that they are indeed taking some action to try to open up more nursing seats and opportunities for that training around the province. I certainly appreciate their efforts to consider how that could be done in rural communities, as was brought forward by the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul in his motion on Monday, recognizing that that is an essential part of ensuring that as we train these folks, we have the folks to help provide that care in rural areas. Indeed, recognizing that we have seniors across the province, we certainly, again, want to ensure that those seniors can remain in their communities as long as possible, whether that's independently or whether that's in the continuing care system.

[The Speaker in the chair]

But, certainly, I think a number of the other actions that have been taken by this government are not going to help with hiring those nearly 6,000 full-time equivalents that are going to be required to be able to provide the level of care that's going to be needed. While I certainly appreciate that they eventually arrived at a mediated settlement, which provided some increases for nurses in the province of Alberta, that was hard fought and hard won and came as this government spent a significant period attempting to grind nurses down, requesting wage rollbacks of up to 5 per cent in the midst of the ramp up of the fourth wave.

I have to say, Mr. Speaker, that while, again, I appreciate how legislation functions, I appreciate the need of regulation, I appreciate the complexity of the pieces that are moving here, there is a significant deficit of trust between Albertans and this government when it comes to the operation of our health care system. Certainly, on something so important and so essential as the care of seniors, our elders, our family, our loved ones, Albertans are going to have a lot of questions for what this government intends to do.

Certainly, this is a government that we know has had a serious deficit of transparency. We have seen them attempt to move things through quietly in regulation in the dead of night, as we saw with coal mining in the eastern slopes, which the government then spent well over a year and a half or so attempting to tap dance around before half-heartedly finally accepting the results of the committee that they put together to try to take the heat off the issue, and they still, Mr. Speaker, have refused to actually put that in legislation because they are rather fond of always leaving themselves a back door to try to get around what Albertans actually want them to do and exit from their commitments. Again, a reason why, while I can appreciate some of the steps that they are looking to take within this legislation, Albertans have good reason to question and want to see a lot more specifics up front.

I have nothing against the overall housekeeping intent of the bill, and I recognize that Alberta is taking leadership, as the minister noted, in integrating the legislation, certainly, having everything together in one place. I have no issue with that. That is reasonable and practical, but that does not in and of itself address some very real and concrete issues that we know exist within our long-term care system. Certainly, I can appreciate why, I think, indeed many health care providers would be questioning this government on their intent and what their plans are when we consider even just through the pandemic the impacts that had on our long-term care system.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that one of the biggest challenges we have in access to continuing care is indeed that access to beds, which leaves individuals stuck in beds in acute care in hospital because the beds in continuing care are not available, and I know from speaking with front-line health care professionals that during several stages of the pandemic that problem was deeply exacerbated by the fact that we had outbreaks and other situations, which made it impossible to transfer people out of acute care into continuing care or other seniors' facilities. Again, as I have gone on at length – and I'm sure members would appreciate if I did not go into detail on it again – this government repeatedly chose to act last and act least on this pandemic, which made those waves worse, which exacerbated the pressure on all aspects of our health care system, including long-term care.

I think there will be a number of questions that we'll be continuing to ask, and certainly I do look forward to the opportunity, when the minister is able to intervene, to hear his thoughts on the record. Certainly, we will be, I think, asking about the other recommendations from the facility-based continuing care review, why this government is choosing to delay on taking actions on those or choosing to do these pieces in regulation, particularly given, Mr. Speaker, that we know we are approaching the next election. We have to recognize the reality that as we get closer to an election, governments in general are able to do less in terms of concrete details, significant action. We have seen how caught up this government and its members are in their own internal political drama already, so one has to question how much capacity this government is actually going to have to follow through on the commitments that it says are going to be in the regulation but, again, which we do not have in any significant detail for the actual scrutiny of this House.

We will have questions indeed about the amounts, what actions are going to be taken to increase the amount of home care provided to work towards that ratio that has been laid out in the facility care review. We will certainly have some questions about what steps this government intends to bring into place to improve the working conditions for continuing care staff. Mr. Speaker, one of the big issues we have had – and, again, this is largely in the privately owned and operated seniors' care facilities – is that we have a large number of staff who are unable to get full-time hours at a single position, so they are left having to cobble together an assortment of part-time hours with no benefits, at low wages, which, as we saw in the midst of the COVID-19 pandemic, significantly compromised the safety and health of seniors in the province of Alberta.

We have seen this government take no action to address this. We have seen the government make no comment on the record so far if they intend to take any steps to address that. Indeed, what we have seen from this government instead is that they have a seeming drive to increase the amount of private profit in our public health care system, which would, I believe, only exacerbate this problem further. Certainly, we would be interested to hear more from the government about their intent there and how they intend to go about increasing the number of full-time staff because, Mr. Speaker, I think we all in this House should be in agreement that the folks who provide care to the elders in the province of Alberta, those who built this province, our own family and loved ones, deserve to be able to make a full-time wage with benefits.

We're certainly going to have some questions. You know, I think some of these questions – it would be helpful if the government simply shared the consultation report on this bill itself given that there are these moving pieces, that there are all of these commitments this government has made. Indeed, at some point, I imagine, when the minister is able to intervene or speak again, he will likely lay out why he feels this needs to go to regulation or at least that so many pieces of it do or other actions, but certainly having access to the actual feedback he received, the consultations he undertook that brought him here would help, I think, in debate and consideration of this bill, in building trust in this government and their intent as it moves forward.

That said, we are in early stages of debate on this bill, and as I said, there is a lot of information that isn't quite here. There's certainly a lot of broader commitments that have been made by the minister, and he has so far only had a brief introduction in second reading to lay out his intent. So I look forward to hearing from him further and having the opportunity to dig further into this bill myself. We'll be doing some of our own consultation with our stakeholders. I look forward to further debate on Bill 11.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on second reading of Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. A pleasure to rise to speak to the Continuing Care Act. I'll note off the top that all of us have had or do have parents and grandparents, and all of us in the House are at least of a certain age where they may be getting on in age. It's a piece of legislation that is germane to everybody's life in this province, and it's something we hold very dear to all our hearts, and that is the long-term care of our senior population.

5:30

But not only that, Mr. Speaker, in our long-term care facilities often not spoken about very much is the number of individuals who are there at a younger age receiving care for any number of long-term or chronic issues that they might face and that require them to be in a long-term care facility or require long-term care on an ongoing basis from a younger age. Let us not forget that it is not only seniors who form the bulk of the individuals who receive long-term care; it is also a significant number of younger people who are also involved in receiving the benefits under the Continuing Care Act, that is contemplated by Bill 11.

I'm wondering, Mr. Speaker, as we continue debate on Bill 11, if we might always keep in mind what the minister stated as the central and core objective of the legislation. An underlying approach would be, as he termed it, a person-centred approach, which was their objective or goal in framing this legislation. We'll put this legislation to that test, Mr. Speaker, as we continue on debate in second reading and in future readings as well. It comes to my mind that there are, I think, a number of things that anyone in this province who has an elderly parent or someone who is in care – that is the person-centred care approach that one would always like to see put in place.

I had spoken in this House about some of my earlier involvement in the long-term care world as a nursing orderly trainee at the young age of 17, working in the geriatric ward of the old Colonel Mewburn nursing home, as we would call it then. Also, of course, now later on in life I'm looking after now passed on grandparents and great-grandparents. Every family will face this prospect as we see our loved ones grow in age or if we have somebody who requires permanent long-term care assistance.

The amalgamation of various different components of long-term care into this Continuing Care Act and under the one rubric is not something necessarily that one would oppose in and of itself, but it certainly bears scrutiny. Whether or not the amalgamation process that this act undertakes is in and of itself something that was necessary is, I think, a question that is fair to ask.

You know, the UCP during the pandemic has failed our long-term care residents, and 1,600 continuing care residents passed away from COVID-19. That's a tragedy that is not lost on anybody in this province, Mr. Speaker. Just doing a short calculation, it's a horrendous amount of people who passed away unnecessarily and probably as a direct result of COVID-19, many of whom would still be alive even if they had other chronic conditions.

That is one of the reasons, I believe, that the government is undertaking a close look at continuing care in this province, and rightly so. Whether or not this bill will address the failings of the long-term care situation in this province during the pandemic is something that we'll try to ascertain in our discussions throughout the debate of this bill.

Now, one of the major elements, Mr. Speaker, that I have seen and that jumped out at me is something that maybe contravenes the minister's claim that this is a person-centred approach to long-term care. It's found in the transition, let's say, or the stated objective or the goal the government has to increase the number of individuals who are receiving care in long-term situations versus through home care. The minister's stated goal is that they would be looking to have a shift, a significant shift, of about 9 per cent, an overarching goal to have a shift from continuing care to home care. Specifically, the goal is to shift the current share of 61 per cent long-term home care residents and 39 per cent family-based care residents to become 70 per cent home care and 30 per cent facility care, a 9 per cent shift.

Now, on the face of it, Mr. Speaker, that may be something that's a laudable goal. Of course, most people want to live at home as long as they possibly can, provided their physical functions and mental capacities and so forth and family abilities allow them to do that or even, you know, with assistance and help that may be provided through government home care. That's a significant number of people, though: a 9 per cent shift from the current 70 per cent home care to 30 per cent facility care.

In looking at that, the government has said that there would be a saving of $452 million a year, close to half a billion dollars a year, that they say would redirect to long-term care, increasing direct hours of long-term care, a laudable goal in and of itself. However, indeed, the devil is often in the details. If you're looking at extracting $452 million and having that money available, it's coming from somewhere. So is it actually something that's going to be a saving to the government, or is it just a download onto the families of individuals who will now be expected to pay the difference in the long-term care of their loved one at home?

It will most likely end up being a significant privatization effort on the part of the government, and this is where they expect, I believe, their savings to come through. It will come through the lower wages that individuals might receive working in home care versus what you'll see in a long-term care facility, where you may have public servants working and serving the individual family members who happen to be in the long-term care.

I really have a significant amount of concern, Mr. Speaker, about this so-called shift of residents from long-term care facilities, or government facilities, into a home-care situation. I don't imagine that the government is going to be looking to move people who are in long-term care right now into a family situation unless, you know, that is something that's possible to do. But over time and gradually this is their effort, to shift away from a long-term care situation. My concern is that this is being done with the priority in mind of saving money and not necessarily realizing or giving full value to the burden that it may be placing on families.

Indeed, I'd be concerned if the government was looking to counsel families to opt for a situation of home care, which may save the government money but may not necessarily be a workable solution for a family who would dearly love to have their loved one live with them but doesn't necessarily trust that they're going to end up being supported as well as they need to be if the family member does actually stay at home receiving home care. Once again, the devil is in the details. There is an assessment that will be done, of course, to determine how much money an individual in home care receives in supports so that they are assisted and they're able to function in the home. It's a debatable point, Mr. Speaker, as to whether or not the rules will be tilted in such a way that it makes it difficult for the hours of care that an individual needs at home to be actually adequate and that the shortfall, the extra burden of care, will be shifted onto the family members in a way that they are really not capable of adopting, but the government is encouraging that to save money.

I think a valid question, Mr. Speaker, to ask is: will family members be faced with a difficult situation where the government is hoping to encourage them to avoid a long-term care institutional situation and opt for a home-care situation? Yet until that family actually experiences the amount of money they'll get in support or how many hours of care they can expect in support or how much indeed it's useful – I think it's something useful to ask. [interjection] I see the minister wishing to intervene. I happily give way.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the hon. member for raising some of those issues. Some of them I'm happy to speak to as we go through the debate. I recognize this is a new act that's just being seen and assessed by members of this House. I greatly appreciate the members on all sides understanding the importance as we move forward for this.

On a couple of issues, you know, I fully appreciate that the act is just that; it's a framework. It's just that: a framework. A lot of the items that the hon. member is speaking to in regard to the specific levels of care, the hours of care, how that care specifically is going to be provided: that will be in the regulations, Mr. Speaker. We've already started working through the regulations with continuing care providers and community care and home-care providers, all of the above, recognizing that we need to make the transformation, and this is the first step.

One of the advantages – oh, I'd like to point out to the hon. member that in the preamble there's a lot of detail which actually focuses on what's important.

The Speaker: Maybe perhaps the hon. member would offer you the opportunity to intervene again, in which you would have another additional minute.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd invite the input of the minister at a future point in debate as well should he have other interventions to make and bring some greater detail to the subject at hand.

I once again will express my concerns, though. I realize that there will be regulations governing much of the questions that I'm asking about, but these are concerns, Mr. Speaker, that are something that any Minister of Health, when bringing in such a piece of legislation regarding the care of our seniors in particular, had better pay attention to. It's a very, very sensitive matter and something that every voter in this province and their grandchildren will want to know is very, very carefully being treated as a person-centred matter, as the minister claims.

If indeed there is a hint that services are being downloaded to families who are possibly ill equipped to handle them or will be unfairly burdened or won't be properly compensated to allow them to provide the services in a home-care situation that their family member needs, there will be a huge outcry, Mr. Speaker. We all know that there's a plethora of studies that are done to show how burned out, particularly now, home-care providers and family members who are providers of services to individuals who need care at home are feeling. It's not a situation that is – it needs the compassion of everybody here in this Legislature to understand that certainly everybody wants to be living at home, where we're with family members as long as possible, but that costs money there, too, and it shouldn't be something just downloaded. [interjection] The minister indicates he wishes to intervene. I happily give way.

Mr. Copping: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'll try to keep my comments within a 60-second time frame. I greatly appreciate the comments of the hon. member, who is raising concerns about, you know, the support of family members and friends, who are critical to supporting our seniors and those with needs who are going to be looked after in this space. I'd like to point out the preamble where, you know, one of the key elements is: "whereas family and friends who act as caregivers play a significant role in the lives of continuing care residents." Mr. Speaker, we are recognizing that in the preamble.

One thing about this act: what it does is that it actually pulls in not only continuing care but home care and designated service living, all these acts in different places into one place. Now, much of the detail that the hon. member is looking for is in regulations. I would like to point out that they're already in regulations today, but as part of our commitment to additional home care we see in Budget '22 and our response to the FBCC, we'll be able to provide more details at that point in time.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the minister for that information. Now, given the $452 million in savings that the minister is claiming that the shift would save annually, I'm certainly looking forward to a breakdown of that number, to see exactly where those savings occur and what the shortfall, if any, in care is the result of those savings, of that $452 million, nearly half a billion dollars, taken out of the system. Who's making that up? Is the burden being placed on families, or are there going to be fewer services offered? Will there be criteria that make it difficult for a family member to qualify for the same level of services that they've received while in long-term care? It begs the question: if there are savings of that amount, what is the breakdown? How are those savings happening? Is it because you're not using a professional labour force in the long-term care facility that costs more than somebody you might hire in your home? Is that indeed where that saving happens? That's something I think the public would like to know. [interjection] The minister may intervene.

Mr. Copping: If I could provide a direct answer to that question. You know, I assume you're referring to the FBCC report. Really, what it is, you know, so the hon. member knows, is that there is currently about 20 per cent, ballpark, of individuals who go into a continuing care setting, into a congregate care setting who don't actually need to be there if they had more support at home. It is actually more expensive for them to be in a continuing care setting because, quite frankly, the reason that they're there is because they either don't have supports for providing food, shovelling snow, that type of thing. They don't actually quite need the level of health care supports, so if we can keep them at home longer, then there will actually be savings.

But so that the hon. member knows, the overall cost to the system will actually be going up, right? It's savings of – if we don't change the model, those costs are actually going to be higher, but the reality is that we'll need to put more money into this model for continuing care and to provide care for individuals at home, but the savings are by shifting the model, and we're going to reinvest that into health for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. member has a minute and 40 seconds remaining.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the minister's remarks, and I do believe he does have the best interests of humanity at heart, of our seniors and those in long-term care under his jurisdiction. However, sometimes, when creating new mechanisms, it's not the minister's heart that's involved in it; it's the Treasury Board and Finance minister's knife that gets involved. Those two can act at crosspurposes. I want to make sure that the minister knows that for those family members who are receiving care right now or other family members of those who are receiving the care, there's no wrath that is greater than a family member who sees that their senior citizen has been wronged. I think that we can count on the minister keeping that uppermost in mind, and we certainly will do so as we look forward to more details and debate on this incredibly important piece of legislation that touches every family in this province.

You know, as far as the nuts and bolts of the operational side of things, I'll certainly get into more detail as we progress in various stages of debate. We can look at how the government handled the outbreaks in some of the continuing care facilities, which resulted in significant deaths, what the fines for operators were, what reporting responsibilities there were, but there's lots more to dig into.

Thank you.

Statement by the Speaker

Interventions

The Speaker: Hon. members, if I could indulge the House just for one brief moment, I would like to thank the hon. Minister of Health and the Member for Edmonton-McClung. It is so nice when interventions can actually help raise the level of decorum. [some applause] I'm not sure it was that good, but I do appreciate it when interventions are used in the most appropriate way and the level of decorum is raised.

I saw the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore rising.

Debate Continued

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps if that keeps going, I will attempt to keep that momentum moving around interventions.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I must admit, as our time winds down here this afternoon, that I do rise in a little bit of frustration with Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I'm always interested in reading the legislation. What does it say? What doesn't it say? And, more importantly, what are we saying about it? So I was listening very intently when the Minister of Health gave his opening remarks on the bill. One of the first things I heard was that these are some of the first steps towards changing things.

Well, I know that my colleague and critic for seniors kind of brought this up a little bit earlier: there was some touting before this bill was brought to us around some transformational changes. I'll be honest. Bill 11 is not transformational – okay? – especially since the minister started with the opening comments of, you know, first steps.

The other comment that I caught that, you know, I'll be honest, always tends to give me some concerns is around the word "efficiencies." That tends to sometimes be an excuse to do as little as possible, and when we're talking about our seniors, the folks that built this province – and we get to enjoy everything that they have built – I think we should be striving at every opportunity to be able to provide them a level of care that they deserve, that they've earned. So when I hear that word, "efficiency," I must admit that I get a little nervous.

You know, as my colleague from Edmonton-McClung was talking a little bit earlier about, some of the money that might become available as a result of some of these changes, it's just part of my nature to ask: well, how did we get there? What did we do to be able to free up this money, and what were maybe some of the consequences of that? I certainly hear – you know, Edmonton-Decore is blessed with six different facilities of different levels. I have a very significant seniors population. I get a chance to try to interact with them as much as I humanly can, and I always hear a little bit about some of the shortcomings, you know: well, it would be great if we got that.

I know the pandemic has certainly shown a level of shortcomings, I guess, in terms of how we need to be looking at things. You can certainly look, from an economic perspective, around just simply the health care workers that are at these facilities and some of the only part-time positions that are available. You know, as the pandemic progressed, we saw where we literally had to shut the door on employees being able to work at multiple facilities. I've always said that when a person has a full-time job, they're paid reasonably well and they have benefits, things like that, the economic argument for that, but there's also that safety argument. You have workers simply at one facility. Does that mean, then, that we have to be able to provide those facilities the type of funding that they need to be able to maintain that type of workforce?

As my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre talked about earlier, you know, our seniors population is going to be growing. There's going to be a larger need for that in the future, and we have to be able to provide that level of service. We certainly heard in news reports over the course of the pandemic where, you know, maybe seniors were only getting one bath a week. I really think that we can do better than one bath a week.

I've certainly heard concerns that have come into my office over the years where, you know, a resident has needed something, and because of a lack of staffing it was several hours before they were actually able to get to that individual. I'm certainly not blaming the employees. They're doing whatever they possibly can, but as they say, there's only one of them with two hands and there's only so much that they can handle. I think we really need to look at that.

One of the other comments through the intervention that I listened to was about rolling out through the regulations in terms of how things will go. Now, I'm not necessarily going to beat up on the minister on this one, but I certainly heard in the past from members of the government and the government caucus who served in the 29th Legislature, when roles were reversed, who were very, very, very critical of the government at the time when they would say: well, you'll see these changes come out through regulations. And here we now have the shoe on the other foot, and we certainly see a lot of things that are coming out in regulations. I suppose that's just me getting a little bit hung up again on the language. Again, it just always gives me pause, because once the legislation is passed, there's not much that I can do in terms of, you know, a regulation coming out, and maybe that's not exactly going to fit, and I'm not able to really address that matter going forward.

One of the things that I did key in on with my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre, of course, was the review that was completed in 2021. He brought up a number of points about what was in that review. I hate to say this, Mr. Speaker, but I have seen a little bit of a pattern here, you know: how many more panels do we need to strike? How many more reports do we need to commission, to then have them get placed on a shelf to collect dust, and we don't do anything with them? When we're looking at that review, I'm not seeing that reflected in the bill in terms of, you know, the things that we need to do.

Frankly, I can't remember if this was in that review or not, but one of the things that I've heard loud and clear, through people and organizations, is around a seniors advocate. I know we rolled that into the Health Advocate, but that position has fallen significantly short of what seniors need. Because that position now is basically – there's too much to try to pay attention to around that whereas an individual specifically dedicated to advocating for seniors is able to focus in on that. Unfortunately, I think the position as a whole has kind of drowned that voice out. You know, I really would have liked to have seen – and I certainly know that the government has heard about this – a move towards reintroducing a seniors advocate as an independent office. They have the ability to be able to advocate for the rights of seniors and not be held back in their comments.

At the end of the day, this is about creating a living standard that we can offer to our seniors, again, who built our province. So I'm hoping that that call has been heard and that perhaps we might get an opportunity to be able to have a discussion maybe during Bill 11. Maybe there's something that we can look at putting in there. I know that I would certainly work with the minister on that to recreate that seniors advocate . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt; however, pursuant to Standing Order 4(1)(c) the House stands adjourned until this evening at 7:30.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Wednesday, March 30, 2022

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Good evening, hon. members. Please be seated.

Government Motions

Federal Carbon Tax Increase

18. Mr. Kenney moved on behalf of Mr. Jason Nixon:
Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly call on the government of Canada to stop its planned April 1, 2022, increase of the carbon tax to $50 per tonne and its further plan to increase the carbon tax to $170 per tonne given that Canadian families are struggling with the highest inflation in 30 years.

[Adjourned debate March 29: Mr. Nicolaides]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to Government Motion 18? The hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to speak on Motion 18 and to add to the comments of my colleagues on just how damaging a carbon tax is to the lives of everyday Albertans. I'm proud of the many things that our government has done, but our first act as government is on top of that list. Our first act, as promised to Albertans, was to repeal the NDP's job-killing, investment-crushing carbon tax. Promise made, promise kept.

Now here we are three years later with a carbon tax forced on Albertans once again by a government even more out of touch with everyday families than the NDP were. The audacity of the federal Liberals to raise this tax now when the cost of everything in Canada is going up. Record inflation, just inflation, and their response? "Let's make it more expensive," Madam Speaker.

Now, I just want to make it clear: climate change is real. Human activity has contributed to the changing of the climates. There is no dispute on that; what there is dispute on is how we approach it. You can be pragmatic or you can be ideological, but make no mistake; there is a huge difference between pragmatic and ideological. They're not the same. If you're pragmatic, you're a practical individual. That means you're solution focused. Examples of this are what we've done in the oil sands. We have seen innovation and technology come together to reduce emissions in meaningful ways. Those are pragmatic solutions, Madam Speaker. Some examples are carbon capture, utilization, and storage. We are global leaders in CCUS technology. That is a solution to climate change. That is a real, meaningful, actionable solution, carbon capture, utilization, and storage.

Some other exciting things that we've done to demonstrate this pragmatic approach to climate change are the partial upgrading to avoid diluting the bitumen, resulting in reduced greenhouse gas emissions; advanced oil sands recovery to utilize less natural gas. This is what responsible energy producers do. This is what Alberta energy producers do, Madam Speaker. You know what else we do? You know what else is a practical solution? Taxing real emitters. You see, Alberta was actually the first jurisdiction to tax carbon. The difference was that we did not tax Martha and Henry for heating their home in February. That is so dysfunctionally wrong. But what they did do is tax the real emitters, and that's how Albertans and Conservatives put a price on carbon. That's a practical solution.

But you know what's not practical? That which is ideological. Ideologues embrace the cult of personality, and in the course of doing so they end up worshipping on the altar of a teenage girl from Europe, idealizing and living vicariously through every tweet. That's what ideologues do, Madam Speaker. [interjection] I'd like to defer to the hon. member.

Mr. McIver: Thanks, Madam Speaker and to the hon. member. I was enjoying your remarks, and the difference between being practical and ideological: that makes sense to me. I know that you know that the folks across the way haven't seemed to have learned a thing. One of the big reasons they got fired after one term in office was because of the carbon tax, and they seem to be a big fan of it still, so they haven't learned a lot. I mean, you can talk about whatever you want, but I would like to hear about something that you have spent a good part of the last couple of years on: your area of expertise, your ministry, how this affects natural gas and electricity prices and just how the carbon tax works into that. I think it's a matter of great interest for whatever Albertans are watching, and maybe the rest of us will learn something.

The Deputy Speaker: A quick interjection from the Speaker. Just a reminder to all members that even on interjections you are to speak through the Speaker, not directly to another member.

The hon. member.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you for the intervention. Yeah. This is a great question because, in fact, it is this childlike enthusiasm for a carbon tax that has been extremely detrimental to the natural gas and electricity industry. I'll tell you why, and I can sum it up in one statement, one question. Do you know who loves a carbon tax? Vladimir Putin. He loves a carbon tax. Do you know who else loves a carbon tax? The dictators in Saudi Arabia, the dictators in Venezuela, the dictators in Syria. They love a carbon tax because that makes companies in western democracies reluctant to invest in thermal energy, because of, like I said, this childlike enthusiasm for job-crushing carbon taxes. That then makes us tied into autocrats like Putin. In fact, this is – you know, it is Ukrainian blood that flows through those pipelines, because Europe is addicted to Russian oil. We can't get off Russian oil because we don't have global energy security, and we don't have global energy security because of the radical left. That's why we're here today, and that's why I ask everybody to embrace supporting Motion 18.

You know, I want to go back to where I was on the ideologues. There are some other things we have to talk about. When you're an ideologue, you do things like invite Extinction Rebellion into the classroom. That's what an ideologue does. By the way, the Member for ...

An Hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Nally: Exactly. Shame.

... Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood said that ideologically radical activist groups like Extinction Rebellion have a place in the classroom. Ideologues want Extinction Rebellion teaching our children. Well, here's what they teach our children, Madam Speaker. They would teach them how to block rail lines. They would teach them how to shut down air travel with drones. They would teach them how to shut down subways, how to vandalize public buildings with red paint. Bringing Extinction Rebellion does not move the needle on climate change.

It also brings us to the question of – ideologues think that we should charge Martha and Henry to heat their home in the winter, and we think this is so fundamentally wrong.

That brings us to the whole question of utilities. We've seen some exciting conversations in here. You know, everybody in Alberta knows that the NDP raised the price of everything when they were in government, and nowhere was that more true than electricity. Everything that they did had the unintended consequence of raising prices. They got rid of coal.

Mr. Reid: Intended.

Mr. Nally: Intended. Thank you.

They got rid of coal. And what was the consequence there? Well, the price of electricity went up. I won't dispute the fact that there are benefits to getting out of coal. What I would dispute is the pace at which they made us get out of coal. It was a pace which Albertans could not handle.

Then they come in here, Madam Speaker, and gaslight us. They stand up in this House, after bringing in the carbon tax and making utilities more expensive, and they gaslight us by saying: how can you drive up electricity prices? They try to blame the members on this side of the House. Well, I've done a lot of door-knocking. Apparently, so have the NDP. If the NDP did half as much door-knocking as they do talking about it, they would actually know that Albertans have good memories. Albertans know who brought in the carbon tax. Albertans know who made everything more expensive, the Alberta NDP.

Now, when I was younger – I don't talk about this piece very much. I was 21 years old. I was a single dad. I was raising a little girl on my own. I went to school full-time. I worked part-time. I didn't live paycheque to paycheque, Madam Speaker; I lived hand to mouth. I remember the humiliation of having $16 in the bank. You can't take that out at an ATM, so I had to go in to the teller, and I had to say: how much can I take out without closing the account? And she said: $15. So I took out 15 bucks, and I went to IGA. Remember, IGA wasn't the cheapest grocery store. But I could walk there. I didn't have to start a vehicle and spend gas driving to the cheaper location.

I remember what it's like to live hand to mouth. I remember the difference that $50 on your utility bill because of a carbon tax makes. You know, Madam Speaker, I don't think that they remember on that side of the House, and part of the reason is because there are too many champagne socialists.

Now, if you're sitting here wondering what a champagne socialist is, I actually looked it up in Wikipedia.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Wikipedia?

Mr. Nally: I know. I know. Unassailable are the definitions in Wikipedia.

Now, "it is a popular epithet that implies a degree of hypocrisy, and it is closely related to the concept of the liberal elite." Does that sound familiar?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Google the socialism.

Mr. Nally: Well, one and the same: that's them.

Now, we're talking about individuals that like to wear $15,000 watches. I know you're thinking of Jagmeet Singh, and you're also thinking about his expensive rocking chair. In what world is it acceptable for a politician to accept a gift of an extremely overpriced and expensive rocking chair? But that is the fallacy of the champagne socialists.

Mr. Jason Nixon: That's the leader of their party.

Mr. Nally: Exactly. That's who they take their marching orders from. And let me tell you: that leader, while he sits in his overpriced rocking chair, supports the carbon tax, because he wants to make it more expensive for everyone.

Now, on April 1 it's April Fool's Day, and we will see another increase to the carbon tax courtesy of the Alberta NDP and their friends and allies Justin Trudeau and Jagmeet Singh. Let me tell you: it's not going to be a joke, Madam Speaker. It is going to make everything more expensive for Albertans.

Now, this is awkward for the NDP. This is awkward because they try to champion themselves as the champion of the everyday Albertan, and they're trying to bring up the cause of inflation and cost of living. Well, this is their opportunity to demonstrate that they represent Albertans, but if they support our motion, then they will effectively be admitting that their carbon tax was wrong and ineffective. But the other side of the coin is that if they vote against our motion, then they'll be talking through both sides of their mouth because they'll be standing up in the Chamber saying, "Why are you making everything more expensive?" but they'll be voting to support a carbon tax. Madam Speaker, where is the manufactured outrage that we know they're good at? Where is it? The silence is deafening.

Let's be very clear. The very intent of a carbon tax is to monetarily incentivize different behaviour. Now, I don't know about you, but when it's cold in February, you can't monetarily incentivize me to turn the heat down, and you can't monetarily incentivize Martha and Henry to turn the heat down. It simply is a broken policy, and it doesn't work.

I'm all for seeing emissions reduced, which is why our government does have additional charges on large emitters. That's the pragmatic solution that I mentioned, Madam Speaker. But what I do not and never will stand for is taxing a single parent for heating their home in winter or taxing seniors to heat their home in winter. The irony: claiming to care about the affordability for families while backing a policy that at its very core is meant to make life more expensive.

Now, I'm going to take you back to the last campaign, Madam Speaker. If you recall, it was buried somewhere in our campaign commitments that we were willing to support tolls in appropriate situations, where it made sense. The NDP took that message of being pragmatic and using tolls where it made sense, and they went on – I think they were on Minister Schweitzer's tour bus. They rode across the province . . .

Speaker's Ruling Referring to a Member by Name

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I'll just remind you that names are certainly not appropriate in this Chamber. I'm sure you'll just apologize and withdraw.

Mr. Nally: I apologize and withdraw.

Debate Continued

Mr. Nally: They were on that tour bus, and they were driving around the province, Madam Speaker, and they were talking – and they were actually doing more of the gaslighting, because instead of telling Albertans that, you know, we supported it where it made sense, they were telling Albertans that they were going to have to pay tolls to take their kids to play soccer. Do you remember that? Soccer moms were going to be tolled to go to soccer practice.

Hockey dads were going to be tolled every time they went to hockey practice.

Mr. Jason Nixon: It's the carbon tax.

Mr. Nally: Absolutely. You nailed it. That's exactly what they did. What the Leader of the Opposition forecasted at the time was the carbon tax, because Albertans are currently tolled. We're tolled when we start the car. We're tolled when we turn the heat up. Madam Speaker, everything is more expensive because the NDP implemented a toll on everything that we do.

Madam Speaker, we'll go back to the discussion of energy security. The truth is that this raise could not come at a worse time. In fact, along with this raise comes more of the ideology from this angry left, and they have actually – the federal NDP have adopted the same policy that the provincial NDP are supporting, which is a net-zero electricity grid by 2035. It's really quite disturbing.

I'm going to share a story with you. Minister Guilbeault was actually in Calgary consulting with the generators on a clean energy future, and Minister Guilbeault said: what can the federal government do to incent more renewable energy to come to Alberta? Do you know what the generators said? "You can do nothing – do nothing – but get out of the way because there is literally a tsunami of renewable energy coming at this province. They're coming here because of our market-based approach, and the worst thing that you could do is take away that incentive for them to come here."

Well, guess what, Madam Speaker. That's exactly what they did, their ideologically driven agenda. They will take away the incentive. They will get rid of the market-based approach that we have. The one thing that Minister Guilbeault should not have done to incentivize renewable energy he did by bringing forward the net-zero 2035 electricity grid, which, by the way, is the exact same policy that the NDP brought forward. There is no path forward for a net-zero electricity grid except through higher prices and decreased reliability.

Madam Speaker, I cannot support this left-wing, ideologically driven agenda to support a carbon tax that makes everything in this province more expensive for Albertans. I encourage everyone on this side of the House to support Motion 18, and I would like to encourage the NDP to support Motion 18. I would encourage you. Stop looking at your feet. Stop looking at your screens. Look up and engage and embrace Motion 18, because you will send the message . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt. Your time is done. However, just a reminder that you are to direct your comments through the chair and not to other members of the Assembly.

Are there any other members wishing to join the debate on Government Motion 18? The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak in support of Motion 18, which reads:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly call on the government of Canada to stop its planned April 1, 2022, increase of the carbon tax to $50 per tonne and its further plan to increase the carbon tax to $170 per tonne given that Canadian families are struggling with the highest inflation in 30 years.

Thanks to the minister for sponsoring this motion.

Madam Speaker, Albertans have been faced with numerous challenges, especially over the past two years from the world-wide pandemic. The increase of the federally imposed carbon tax by the Prime Minister of Canada will only hurt families and businesses even further. Calgary-East constituents will be ever so devastated by this action and the imposition of new and additional taxes. Many members that are supported by provincial programs and benefits will be mainly affected by this decision.

Madam Speaker, the increasing carbon tax is going to result in inflation, which will have a significantly negative impact on households and businesses who are already stressed to make ends meet. In this time of increasing inflation caused by the federal government's inflationary policies, the economic and fiscal costs of this planned carbon tax increase will be significant for all Albertans. It's unacceptable that our federal government is thinking of increasing the carbon taxes, especially when families are recovering from the effects of the pandemic. The anticipated 25 per cent carbon tax hike will no doubt harm Albertans and the economy at a time when the province is still recovering.

Madam Speaker, the Parliamentary Budget Officer recently revealed the terrible impact of the Liberal-NDP government's growing carbon tax on Alberta's households, demonstrating that once the impact of the carbon price hits the economy, the majority of Albertans will be faced with financial challenges. The rise in the carbon price is mainly a penalty for Albertans who heat their homes in our cold winters, drive their kids to school, run a business, and contribute greatly to the economy.

This goes to show that the majority of Albertans will end up paying much more for their bills and daily expenses, which is unacceptable. A greater carbon price will cause the Canadian economy to decline by 2 per cent, resulting in the loss of approximately 184,000 jobs in Canadian employment as well as a $1,540 income loss for the majority of Canadians. A higher carbon price in Alberta will mean a 2.4 per cent drop in Alberta's GDP, which is an $8.3 billion loss and anticipated 30,139 job losses by 2030.

The carbon tax hike of $50 per tonne of carbon dioxide from April 1 will add around 2 cents per litre to pump prices and will rise yearly to $170 per tonne in 2030. According to the Bank of Canada the projected rise in the carbon tax to $50 per tonne would boost inflation by an estimate of .5 per cent despite the fact that inflation is already at a 30-year high. The federal government and their cohorts from the NDP must abolish their carbon tax hike and stop adding more challenges for Albertans.

Madam Speaker, just recently it has been announced that beginning April 1, 2022, Albertans will see the price of gas and diesel drop by 13.6 cents per litre with the removal of the provincial tax. Furthermore, the Climate Leadership Act has been repealed by the provincial government as an act to remove spending restrictions on the existing carbon tax revenue.

Through the introduction of this motion we want the federal government to know that we are fully opposed to the proposed carbon tax hike. The Alberta government is not ready to slow down the economic progress that we are seeing. Our balanced budget and striving to support all Albertans will not be defeated by this insane tax hike.

Budget 2022 provides funding for an energy rebate program to help Albertans manage higher natural gas prices. An increase in the budget for the next three years will support teachers and address cost pressures in transportation as well as growth in enrolment. Most importantly, Albertans will be provided education and training opportunities they need to prepare for the workforce and for postsecondary operations.

Madam Speaker, we can clearly see that Budget 2022 ensures that Alberta remains one of the most affordable provinces in Canada to live and work in. Alberta's lower cost of living, combined with relatively high average earnings and the lowest overall taxes, means Albertans keep more money in their pockets. We want the federal government to hear our message loud and clear, that what Alberta needs right now is not additional carbon taxes but to focus on Alberta's economic recovery and find ways to make it possible for Albertans to have more money in their pockets.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to Government Motion 18?

Seeing none, the hon. Minister of Environment and Parks to close debate.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to rise to talk about my motion today. Thank you to the hon. members who've taken some time to speak about this important motion. I do appreciate the opportunity to quickly close debate on it, and I do hope that it will enjoy the support of the Legislature shortly to send a clear message to the federal Liberal government, particularly Justin Trudeau and some of the extreme environmentalists that are around him, that it is not acceptable to the people of Alberta for them to increase the carbon tax on Friday and to recognize the consequences of that on the people of this province.

Most importantly, though, Madam Speaker, I do think it is an opportunity for the NDP to be able to rise also inside this Chamber and show that they stand with Albertans and not their close ally Justin Trudeau. I understand that for them the carbon tax issue has been a significant ideological issue for their party. It's something, unfortunately, that they hid from Albertans when they ran in the 2015 election campaign but then became a major part of their government and the policy that came from their government in 2015.

It would be hard, of course, as the hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity said, for the NDP to completely walk away from it. But, at the end of the day, the NDP have to take a moment to recognize – and based on some of the questions that they've asked in question period and the letters that they present on behalf of their constituents, we do know that they know that the cost of living, particularly the costs of fuel, electricity, and heating, are having an impact on Albertans, including the NDP's constituents, and that they want to see action from the Alberta Legislature.

Certainly, sending a clear message to the federal government at the very least that they should stop with their consumer carbon tax increase this Friday and try to provide some relief – similar to what the Alberta government has done on the same day, when the Alberta government will remove the Alberta fuel tax to try to help as much as we can. But, unfortunately, I suspect, Madam Speaker – we'll see what happens – that the NDP will continue with their ideological approach when it comes to carbon taxes, which were, frankly, a disaster.

When the NDP was in power, as I said, they hid from Albertans that they intended to do this tax, then came in and rammed it through despite the fact that the vast majority of Albertans were against it. Certainly, the Official Opposition of the day was against it and was sounding the alarm. Some of the consequences that we see right now as far as the cost increase and the impact of the costs of everything going up: as the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity just said, it has a significant impact on heat, on fuel for transportation costs, and on electricity. But it also increases the cost of everything in daily life, from when you go grocery shopping to any product that you may buy to your Christmas presents that you may buy. Everything in our society comes by train or car or airplane, all of which require fuel and all of which are impacted by the decisions of the NDP and their Liberal alliance inside Ottawa to bring in a carbon tax.

But if, Madam Speaker, there had been any environmental gain as a result of that decision by the NDP in Alberta or the leader of their party in Ottawa, Mr. Singh, or, again, their close ally Justin Trudeau and the Liberal government, from those policies, that would at least be something that could be pointed to. I don't know if some of the members who were not here in the last Legislature will recall this, but the NDP leader, who was then the Premier, the now Leader of the Opposition, had an interview at the end of the year, after bringing forward the carbon tax, the signature policy of her government, and was asked by reporters at year-end interviews how much in GHG emissions, how much in emissions, how much impact there had been on the environment as a result of the decision to bring in the carbon tax, and she could not state a number. She could not state a number on her signature policy. You know why? Because their policy had no impact.

B.C., that brought in a carbon tax in the early 2000s, has not seen any decrease in GHG emissions as a result of that carbon tax. Transportation emissions continue to go up inside the province because people have to drive despite the fact that the NDP leader, the then Premier, told them to take the bus. My constituents don't have buses in rural Alberta. But there was no environmental impact as a result of that, none at all. Their leader couldn't even say it. I mean, can you imagine? Your signature policy, that you put onto the people of Alberta, that has raised their expenses on everything, and in a year-end interview – I mean, a year-end interview. It's not like it's a press conference. You're sitting down there and you're prepared to talk about all your accomplishments of the year, and the Premier, the now NDP leader, could not even point to GHG reductions that had happened as a result of that. It's shockingly disappointing, and it has not worked. It has not worked.

Now, what we see is that this government ran on a platform to get rid of the NDP carbon tax, and unfortunately the federal government is continuing to force a carbon tax on our citizens. Their carbon tax, frankly, is a little better than what the NDP carbon tax was, at least as far as rebates to Albertans. The NDP certainly took more money from Alberta pockets than the federal government is doing. Nevertheless, the federal government is still taking money out of Albertans' pockets at the very moment when Albertans and all Canadians are crying out for relief on areas like fuel and heating costs and electricity. The federal government could at the very least not raise it this year and sit back and see if they could help.

Now, do you know what the NDP spent it on? Some of you may not know this. The NDP spent a tremendous – in fact, when I became environment minister, I had to clean up a lot of this mess. They focused their time on buying people light bulbs and buying them shower heads. As rural Albertans we were very frustrated. I see the hon. member from Athabasca. He'll know. He lives in a pretty remote community, like myself.

Mr. van Dijken: They even came to install it.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Correct. Yeah, they would come and install them. They paid an Ontario company to come and install the light bulbs and shower heads.

But the problem in rural Alberta – by the way, we were comfortable buying our own light bulbs and shower heads – was that the shower heads did not work under well water pressure. The NDP were so disconnected with large portions of this province that they didn't know that we have wells and there would be different pressure issues on that. So they would install these shower heads, and they wouldn't work at all.

That's what they were doing with Alberta's climate change money. That's what they were doing when they stuck on fixed-income seniors increased heating costs, stuck on single moms increased electricity prices on top of the boondoggle that they already created with the electricity system. It made it so that hockey moms and hockey dads had to pay more money to drive their kids to hockey. All that with no benefit at all to the environment. You can't make this stuff up. It's absolutely shocking.

Nevertheless, I will give the NDP this. It was different circumstances at the time as far as inflation and some of the cost impacts that we're seeing right now as a result of the changing economy, what we're seeing take place in Europe. So at the very least the NDP should have the courage today to stand up and send a message to Ottawa today to say that this is not acceptable to Albertans, and they should join with us in making costs easier for Albertans as we navigate through this tough time that the world is facing, our country is facing, and our province is facing. But they won't do that. I think – we're going to know in a few moments – the reason they won't do that, Madam Speaker, is that, at the end of the day, the NDP Party provincially and the NDP Party federally are the same party. They are the same party. The members across from me: the leader of their party is Mr. Singh.

Mr. McIver: Well, Justin Trudeau, really, now.

Mr. Jason Nixon: And now, ultimately, Justin Trudeau, who has signed a coalition pact to be able to keep a minority Liberal government, held up by the socialists in Ottawa, in power to continue to ram through these job-killing policies and make things more expensive for Albertans.

Now, the NDP don't like it when we raise that. You see it during question period, how animated often you will see the Official Opposition get when this is pointed out. I don't blame them. I don't think I would be part of Mr. Singh's party, but they are. They need to explain to Albertans why they would choose to support their federal leader, the Prime Minister, and not Albertans when it comes to a simple motion like this inside the Chamber.

Sadly, we're going to continue, Madam Speaker, to see some of the unfortunate policies that we get from an NDP-Liberal alliance, that are going to continue to make life expensive for the people that we represent. For the NDP, as the hon. associate minister of natural gas said earlier, to be able to stand inside this Chamber and in any way pretend like they're a champion of the people of Alberta and not stand up to what we see coming from the federal government when it comes to climate policy is hypocritical and unacceptable. I do know that Albertans will eventually call on that.

Their friend, close ally Justin Trudeau, who has been shored up now by the leader of their party – leader of their party – unleashed a new climate plan, emissions projection plan yesterday. It's a shocking plan. In fact, I described it to the media as insane. It is completely unachievable. It would reduce economic activity in our province by up to 40 per cent. It would see things like the electricity grid have to remove 80 per cent of GHG emissions by 2030. Eighty per cent. There's no way technologically to do that. The only way that could end up working would increase the cost drastically for Albertans as they are trying to pay their electricity bills, and all Canadians, frankly, with that.

Mr. van Dijken: They're trying to increase electricity . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: Exactly. I appreciate the thoughts from the hon. Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock.

The NDP, in question period, was talking about wanting to lower the prices and demanding the government do something to lower the prices beyond some of the stuff we're trying at the moment, which is to bring in rebates and try to help Albertans. The single biggest thing the NDP could do to make sure that we can help Albertans on their electricity bills and other bills is to stand with us and tell Ottawa to drop the ridiculous climate policies and their carbon taxes.

You know, one of the things inside the document that was presented by the minister of environment federally, a well-known former member of Greenpeace, who has illegally blockaded buildings before, climbed buildings illegally, and, frankly, has acted completely against the interests of this country when it comes to environmental policy, one of the things that he presented in this, that's supported by the NDP, was the full phase-out of the combustion engine by 2036. What are we going to be? Like Cuba, where we're trading gas lawn mower parts trying to make sure that our cars can work? Madam Speaker, I want you to think about that. The NDP's partner in Ottawa is bringing forward policies to phase out the combustion engine by 2036. It's not that far away.

In fact, they've said that they are going to go so far as to legislate and dictate to Canadians what cars they can buy and what dealerships could sell, starting in just a couple of years, starting with 20 per cent – all the sales from dealerships will have to be 20 per cent electric cars. First of all, it takes six months to even get an electric car right now; second of all, they're not cheap; and third of all, that's insane.

And it's just one of the policies that we see coming forward. No money for oil and gas. No path forward for the energy industry. Most of the investment announced by the federal government in the last 36 hours on this issue is about, quote, investing in transitioning energy workers out of the energy industry, at the same time that we see some of the largest prices for oil and gas anywhere in the world, that the world cries out for our energy resources. The NDP and the Prime Minister should be standing up and saying: Alberta has the solution not only to the energy problems but to the environmental problems right here. But they won't do that.

Instead, they focus on their ideological beliefs, not on Albertans – not on Albertans – and have supported a federal government who is now trying to dictate a target, which this province will not stand for, Madam Speaker, of reducing our economy by up to 40 per cent. Unacceptable. And the NDP has to decide: are they with Albertans, or are they with their leader Mr. Singh in Ottawa and ultimately their now leader Justin Trudeau of their party? Or can they be pragmatic enough to say, "You know what? We may have gotten this one wrong," and at the very least listen to Albertans. I can tell you that the vast majority of Albertans certainly want to see the carbon tax increase stopped this Friday or not happen at all and, frankly, want to see the carbon tax gone once and for all inside this country because it does not work.

Now, the NDP, often when we talk about this, will – actually, I just want to back up real quick, Madam Speaker. We talk about 3 cents on Friday; that's what it would be, the increase per litre, roughly. The plan that the NDP has supported with their friend Mr. Trudeau will result in a 40 – 40; four zero – cent increase a litre for gas inside this country and in our province. Forty cents, Madam Speaker. I don't know what it was when you started driving. It was a little more than that for me but not much more. Forty cents a litre from that. That's where we're headed. So at the very least the NDP should be able to support a pause for some rational thought about what the impact would be of this on Albertans, but sadly I think we'll continue to see the NDP abandon the people of this province and not stand with them today.

[Government Motion 18 carried]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, 2022

The Chair: Are there members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this particular piece of legislation. I know it's not the biggest piece that we have before us, but it's still an interesting piece. I'd like to just share with the House a little bit about some of the Blackfoot history around the gem which we are making the official gemstone of the province of Alberta. In the Blackfoot community it is frequently referred to as the buffalo stone, but of course in Blackfoot it's called iniskim. It is a stone which is really the fossilized remains of an ammonite, which is a creature that lived 71 million years ago, or baculite, as it may be called.

There are very interesting stories about the history of the stone that I think are worth talking about. As I mentioned, the stones themselves are somewhere in the neighbourhood of about 71 million years old, and they typically are really only sourced here in the southwestern corner of Alberta and some area around, but it is actually quite unique to this area of the world and has had a very important role in Blackfoot history and is still used in ceremony on a regular basis. I know I received some ammolite from the Blackfoot community when I was Minister of Indigenous Relations and was given a little, little bit of instruction on it, but I have taken some time to make sure I learned a little bit more so I could talk about that today.

In this particular case people, I'm sure, are quite used to seeing the coiled-type ammolite that comes out of the Rocky Mountains on a regular basis. They're quite beautiful. I mean, I certainly know many people that have bought pieces of it and had them polished or bought polished pieces and displayed them in their homes or in their offices, because they're actually quite engaging. In this case, while it's the same sort of creature, what typically makes the buffalo stone are the linear ones rather than the coiled ones but the same nature. If you look carefully, you can see that there is a creature with cell divisions in it that result in some things.

But if you were to actually try to go look for ammolite in the mountains, you would not recognize it unless you actually had some skill. That's one of the things that the Blackfoot community quite pride themselves on. When you look at the stones, you know, as they exist in nature today, they typically just look like many other stones, because over 71 million years, of course, the outside of the stone has been kind of bled of colour, so you need to have some skill to be able to recognize it. There's a certain pride in the Blackfoot community to be one of the people who can identify and recognize this stone in its natural state.

Of course, when you scrape off the outside and cut it deep and then polish it, you get the quite engaging, multicoloured, rainbowlike, iridescent stone that we recognize and that you can buy in many places in the world, you know, as ammolite. The stone itself, because it is linear, can sometimes actually have the look as if there is a buffalo in it because the little cell divisions kind of can look like legs in a large-headed animal, so it is often referred to as the buffalo stone.

More than, of course, the appearance, there is a lot to be said about the actual relevance of the stone in the Blackfoot community. One of the elders in the Piikani First Nation, a man by the name of Troy Nolton, has publicly shared this story, so I'm going to share some of it with you. It's not my story, and I don't claim ownership of it. I really do want to recognize Troy Nolton for this story. I was referred to Troy when I was, you know, asking a little bit about the understanding.

Troy's story is that over 1,000 years ago there was a particular Blackfoot clan in the area that we now refer to as southwestern Alberta that was going through an extremely difficult wintertime. The buffalo just weren't accessible, and of course other animals like deer and rabbits and so on were scarce and hard to find. The snow was very deep, and it was very difficult. Then one night one of the members of what we refer to now as the Piikani First Nations – of course, they were all Blackfoot at the time – a young woman, had a dream, and in the dream a spirit visits her and tells her that the Creator has heard her prayers about the starvation of her people, sees the struggle, and has sent to the community a gift and that this gift would come in the form of a stone called iniskim, or buffalo stone, as I've said.

Then the spirit gave her instructions about where to go, where she could obtain the stone and, of course, also instructions about how to obtain the stone and what to do with the stone when it was obtained so that it would be obtained in ceremony and used in ceremony. The spirit indicated that the young woman would be able to hear the stone singing to her. Often in the Indigenous community, knowledge is shared in song, and this is one of those occasions. She woke up in the morning and told her partner, her husband, that she had this dream, and he told her that she must go and find the stone and bring it back to the people because it was a gift of the Creator and would help them in their plight of starvation at the time.

So she headed out, and indeed she did hear the stone as she headed down the valley and followed it and followed it until it got louder and louder and louder and finally brought her to a small stone just sitting there waiting for her. She picked up the stone, brought it back to the camp, presented it to her husband, and told her husband: this is the gift. And then they had to make some decisions about what to do now. Of course, immediately they then prepared ceremony to accept the gift of the stone into their community through prayer, as she had been instructed by the spirit who visited her.

She said that there were two particular signs that the gift of the stone was in fact going to resolve their problem. The first was that there was going to be a storm that came in from the north. As a result, the community was told to tether down their teepees and to take all their personal belongings in because there was going to be this horrendous storm coming in from the north. The second sign was that the buffalo was going to come in and wander into the camp at night, but they were not to harm the buffalo that night: wait until the storm had come in.

Obedying all of the strictures given to them by the spirit, they did as they were instructed, brought the stone in through ceremony, waited, and indeed the buffalo did come through camp, and the snowstorm did come. In fact, the next morning a large number of buffalo were trapped in a large drift section of snow, and then it was possible, because the buffalo had been trapped by the snow, for the community to go out and hunt the buffalo and to feed their families and to sustain themselves through that terrible, difficult winter.

So you can see that there is a lot of history to this stone for the Blackfoot community, the Blackfoot First Nations in this province, and even to this day it is very important to the community because it is still used in ceremony and often given as a gift to show some respect to the people it is given to and to share Blackfoot history, tradition, and culture with the guests who receive the stone.

I keep my copy of the stone on my desk at the Federal Building alongside other natural stones from the Rocky Mountains and the North Saskatchewan River because all of these represent to me the fantastic land of the province of Alberta and the great benevolence that we have been given to share with each other. As a result, I am quite happy to be able to stand up tonight and to speak to this bill, in which we will be making the decision, although there's been some history of this already in the province, to officially make ammolite the official gemstone of the province of Alberta.

I encourage everybody in the room to go out, learn a little bit more about ammolite, spend some time at the Blackfoot community and share with them the incredible culture and traditions and ceremony which they have sustained through very difficult times, imposed on them through the colonization of North America, yet they have found themselves in this very positive place of respect and self-respect and pride of their future. I certainly would, you know, hope that all the people in this Legislature would share with the Blackfoot community their culture and their expectations of a good future ahead.

Just as happened with the spirit sending the stone to the Blackfoot community in order to sustain the community through rough times, I think that we as members of this province need to reflect on how we help to sustain the Blackfoot community and indeed, of course, all First Nations communities through the difficult times, particularly the difficult times that we have imposed on them as a colonialist society, and seek to pursue some reconciliation with the Blackfoot community so that we can come to a better place, a place of mutual respect, a place based on ceremony, and a place based on achieving a fair, equal, and respectful relationship into the future.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: Are there any other members that wish to join the debate on Bill 6? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford for sharing that story. It's interesting to see how the Blackfoot culture has integrated the ammolite into stories. You know, stories often, of course, are instructive, right? Part of what I gathered from that story you just shared with us is that by listening to the world as it unfolds around you and being present and able to take the time to know those things, then you should be rewarded and could be rewarded with, in that case, sustenance and so forth. It's interesting to not see the story as looking at the stone itself as something to covet – right? – but, rather, to listen to what the story that goes through the stone entails instead.

I mean, we have a slightly different version of ammolite here in 2022, which is still quite, I think, fair and reasonable. It's been recognized as quite a beautiful gemstone, right? If it's properly cut and polished, it looks very much like an opal, or maybe opals look like ammolite, I guess we could say. The value of it intrinsically and as a commodity, as a jewel, is growing quite a lot. I found it interesting just talking to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview yesterday, and he told me that when he was the economic development minister, they'd had a trade mission to China, and one of the members that came on the trade mission was an ammolite broker from Calgary. I found that quite interesting.

I remember as well, just reflecting right now, while door-knocking that one of my former constituents in the Wellington neighbourhood – so I guess that would be yours . . .

Mr. Carson: West Henday.

Mr. Eggen: Yes. West Henday now.

. . . was also an ammolite broker – I'll tell you where he lives later, okay? – and was very interested in sharing that as a way to develop some commercial operation around Stand Off, Alberta, I believe, if I'm remembering correctly.

In fact, that's where a lot of the ammolite comes from, around the St. Mary River. It takes care of the excavation into the layers between, like, 30 to 60 or even 80 metres down in the strata to them. That's where these ammolite fossils are, right? In fact, that's what they are, from an ancient seabed or a series of seabeds that would have existed tens of millions of years ago, I guess. I don't really know.

Anyway, you know, it's nice for us to look for ways to expand people's knowledge about the natural world when we do choose these emblems. I think that it's instructive in the widest possible way. I think that the importance of including a very strong First Nations element in our curriculum in the province of Alberta must include not just facts and memorizing lists of all the emblems of Alberta but some of the cultural stories and significance, as the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford pointed out, looking for that wider meaning for young people to look at our world and see and help us to animate that world around us. I think that is part of what emblems should do. Yeah.

I mean, we certainly are supportive of this initiative, and I hope that we will be able to create an education component to this, a cultural element to it, and indeed an economic element, too. There is, I think, potential for careful, sustainable harvesting and development of ammolite here in the province, and I know there's certainly a good market for it not just in North America but around the world as well, as I had mentioned last night. You know, I saw it being bought and traded in Thailand – right? – and people were very interested in it because of its inherent beauty and rarity and novelty as well. Lots of ways by which we can approach this emblem. I'm certainly happy to support the bill.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak to this important piece of legislation, and let me thank both my learned colleagues, the MLA for Edmonton-Rutherford and the MLA for Edmonton-North West, for their remarks. I haven't heard the government side participating in this debate, or I would have recognized those colleagues as well. It's my first opportunity to speak to this piece of legislation.

When we designate something as official, we can talk about that in many different ways. I think, one, it highlights that particular thing, that it is important to the cultural, economic, social life of the province. It can highlight the significance of that particular thing to the life of the province, to the heritage of the province, to the culture of the province. In this case this bill designates ammolite as the official gemstone of Alberta. When we look into the history and background and its cultural significance, I think it's quite appropriate that we are doing this, and my colleagues highlighted the sacred nature of ammolite in the lands of Blackfoot territory, especially along the St. Mary River of southern Alberta.

I've seen the stone in many places. I may have seen it in my colleague's office. I think that before hearing this debate, before thinking about this bill, I didn't know and think about the 700-million-year-old history of the stone, its official status as a gemstone, that history, where it's found in Alberta, why it's referred to as the buffalo stone, and how Indigenous communities were able to even recognize these stones without this modern technology so many years back. So this provides us with an opportunity to highlight the rich Indigenous heritage. This is one way of doing it.

There are so many other ways that we can do that, and in the spirit of this bill we can inform the work that we need to do in order to implement the recommendations of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. We know that Indigenous people were here from time immemorial. They have a rich history, they have rich traditions, they have wisdom, they have knowledge, and they have skills that we can all learn and benefit from. At the same time, we do know that we have a long history of colonization, that we have a long history of injustices that were imposed upon the Indigenous people. As we move towards a common and prosperous future, we need to think about how we can reconcile with the past, what we can do to make good on the wrongs that were committed during that colonization, what we can do to highlight and revitalize those rich Indigenous cultures and traditions, how we can help them gather that historical evidence, gather that history that we can all learn and benefit from.

For instance, as my colleague from Edmonton-Rutherford mentioned, Indigenous communities were able to recognize this stone's formation without modern technology. Now, I understand that in mining, I guess in the gemstone area, there is commercial development. There is so much development in terms of how we mine them, how we recognize them, how we grade them. There are so many technological developments which were not present, for instance, 100, 200, or 300 years ago. Certainly, there was some wisdom, there were some skill sets within Indigenous communities, within Indigenous people that they used, that they relied on to recognize these things, to collect these things.

Not only that, but I think there is a spiritual significance attached to it. The name "buffalo stone," I guess, represents that in Indigenous communities they have long been hunting, they have long been using buffalo as a source of food, as a source of prosperity, as a source of survival. So these symbolic gestures, these symbolic designations, in fact, do mean a lot, do create and open opportunities for all of us to learn about Indigenous cultures and traditions. There are so many things that we can do as a government, that we can do as a Legislature to highlight those traditions, to highlight that forgotten history, that often ignored history. We can start essentially from implementing the recommendations of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission.

But I guess the attitude that this government had from the very beginning, when they became government, towards Indigenous cultures and communities was – the first thing that they stated their position on was that it's not really important to recognize treaty land. That was recommended by the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. Those recommendations, I think, were made in the same spirit that this bill is put forward, that we recognize Indigenous communities, we recognize their presence, we recognize our relationship with those communities, their treaties, their rights.

In the four years when we were in government, I think the then Premier, now the Leader of the Official Opposition, made sure that at all public events where government representatives, where ministers of the Crown were speaking, they started their speech, started their remarks by recognizing the treaty lands. Again, it was symbolic, but it has deep meaning for why we do that and why we need to do that, and this government completely abandoned that.

Today, while we are talking about an important gemstone that has significance to Indigenous communities, I hope all members of this House will take this opportunity to recommit themselves to work for, to use their position to further reconciliation, to use their voice at every opportunity to highlight Indigenous culture, Indigenous traditions, and those injustices that were imposed on them, and stand up to voice their support for the implementation of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's recommendations.

I think this bill is a good piece of legislation. It's a good gesture that we are recognizing ammolite as Alberta's official gemstone, because Alberta's history is Indigenous history. Alberta's culture is Indigenous culture. These communities, these tribes, these First Nations were here long before any of us immigrants were here.

Then a couple of other things that it would have been helpful had the minister made some comments around that. I understand that designating this as the official gemstone highlights the significance of this gemstone. It will also impact how it's viewed by Albertans. It will create relevance in their minds, and it may increase demand for this gemstone in Alberta. Has the government considered how demand will be impacted, and have they consulted with Indigenous communities, Albertans at large about that, how that will be managed?

I think another thing that I want to mention as well is that its designation will certainly highlight its significance, so whatever the decisions we make respecting this, we include Indigenous communities and their voices and we try to educate all Albertans about this and Indigenous history, Indigenous culture, Indigenous traditions, in particular those First Nations who are part of our province.

Again, thank you for listening to me, and thank you to the minister for bringing forward this piece of legislation. On this side of the House we will be supporting this legislation.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate March 29: Mr. Nally]

The Deputy Speaker: Any members wishing to join the debate on Bill 2? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 2. I think that we need to take this as an opportunity to talk a little bit about the government's record in terms of finances in this province. I am very concerned that they seem to take delight in having lucked into an international event of rising oil prices. At the same time, they chastise others for the rising costs of inflation, which doesn't make much sense, that you would celebrate one and chastise the other, because, of course, they're quite closely tied together.

I know that, for example, this government has, you know, complained that some of the decisions being made by governments in Canada and indeed around the world around trying to reduce carbon in our atmosphere are such that they feel that we should not be trying to reduce carbon at this time because of inflation. Yet analysis done by people like Trevor Tombe, a professor at the University of Calgary, demonstrated that while, for example, the price of food has gone up 19 per cent over the last seven years, only .4 per cent of that is actually attributable to carbon levies and that, really, what's happening in our world is that we have a situation where certain individuals are gaining more and more wealth, but that wealth is not being shared widely in the public, and the average person doesn't have that kind of wealth.

[The Speaker in the chair]

You know, I think that we need to carefully look at what this government should be doing and take some time to challenge what it is that they are not doing. They are not actually addressing the issues of inflation. I know they sort of make claims that somehow they're going to try to make life cheaper for Albertans, but the vast majority of their actions have actually been to increase prices on Albertans in this province. For example, we have seen a dramatic increase in utility bills in this province, and this is directly related to the removal of the electricity cap that was put in place by the previous government. We see people's bills go up in many cases by multiples of what they used to pay, people suddenly having to pay $300, $400, $500 more than they used to.

We know, of course, that the government has suggested that they will, for three months only, give $50 compensation to people in the province. But, of course, if you are paying $500 a month, $1,500, and you get $150 back, that's a pittance. Or, as one member of the government side actually described it, it is paltry and, of course, does not address the inherent issue at all.

You know, we have a government that has just sort of allowed people in the province of Alberta to be victims to the treacherous winds of change that have been occurring over the last little while. We've seen them take the cap off not only utilities but also, for example, insurance, where we see the vast majority of people experiencing dramatic changes in their car and home insurance.

I know that the Minister of Finance has suggested that this year a few of the many companies have started to reduce their rates, but that is only after last year, when they put the rates up dramatically. If you put something up by 10-fold and then you reduce it down by onefold, you still have a ninefold increase. You can celebrate that temporary or late-to-the-game decrease of a little bit by only a few, only a minority of the insurance companies, by the way, a significant minority. It's not like it's even close to being half. It's not even close to being a tenth of the companies in this province.

And they all benefited from this dramatic increase over the last year, which seems a little bit ironic given the fact that things like motor vehicle accidents actually decreased over the last year because people were staying home a lot more than they were in the past. So while actual costs were going down, the price of insurance was going up. You know, it certainly is the kind of thing this government should be complaining about. They like to complain about a .4 per cent increase on our food, but they are not prepared to complain about a 400 per cent increase on our car insurance. You know, it's very problematic that this government has made the decision just to allow people to be subject to these kinds of dramatic changes when we know that the only people that are benefiting are a very small segment of society, and many of those people provide little or no return.

Many of the companies that have made great fortunes over the last couple of years have been companies that pay little and often zero tax here in the province of Alberta, and this government has done nothing to try to resolve that problem. Companies that are not contributing to the well-being of citizens, that do not help us to build our health care, do not help us to build our education yet take huge amounts of money away from our local businesses: I think that that's a big problem. I've spoken about this in the House before. This government really seems to celebrate large, successful international corporations, constantly gives them money, $4.7 billion in their first year and subsequent monies ever since, and allows them to increase their prices and, quite simply, gouge the citizens of the province of Alberta on a regular basis.

And, at the same time, often those very same companies are actually taking business away from small businesses here in Alberta. One of the things we want people to remember is that small businesses in Alberta actually employ more people than large corporations do, if you add them all up throughout the province. But they're suffering greatly under this government and this government's total lack of action. I've had many small-business people call me and complain about the difficulties they have with this government. I've had people complain about the fact that when they try to get contracts with this government, the government tells them, "No; we're going to go with a large multinational or large corporation because we can get some kind of a better deal,” which, of course, means that small businesses never will have a chance to actually move forward.

In one case a small local company – it actually wasn’t even all that small – a local Alberta company, found out that they couldn’t even apply for a contract unless they had been receiving other contracts from the government sometime in the last five years. So they actually made a condition. [interjection] Oh, I’m sorry.

Member Loyola: Do you mind?

Mr. Feehan: No. Please go ahead.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Member for Edmonton-Rutherford. As you know, I’ve done a lot of advocacy for small businesses in the community of Edmonton-Ellerslie as well as throughout Alberta, and, yes, the members on the other side like to pretend as if they’re the ones who are doing all they possibly can to help small business here in the province of Alberta, yet throughout the entire pandemic they did absolutely nothing – absolutely nothing – to curb the costs and the economic crisis that small businesses were going through.

Not only that, Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, but I do believe that when we were in government, we actually lowered the tax rate for small businesses here in the province of Alberta. Now, I wouldn’t mind knowing how your constituents and the people that you interact with actually feel about this.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much for the intervention. Sorry; I didn’t see you behind me there.

No. I think what you’ve said is absolutely true, and it continues. Clearly, the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has a similar experience that I do, and that is that small businesses are telling us repeatedly that this government is not helping them at a very difficult time and has done nothing in terms of legislation in order to make their lives better.

As I was just speaking to a little while ago, they’re actually putting in rules that make it impossible for them to actually get contracts so that they can actually be successful. If the rule is that you had to have received a contract from the government within the last five years, inevitably all of the small businesses will lose out because they all will be with big companies that have received contracts in five years, and eventually we’ll get to a place where no small business can ever enter in because that five-year period has passed. You know, that’s the kind of thing that I think is just absolutely terrible for this government to allow to happen, in fact for this government to impose.

I want to give some credit here, by the way. I did make numerous phone calls and had numerous conversations with a member of the civil service around the particular incident I’m talking about. They themselves were extremely helpful and responsive, and I really want to congratulate them for being good public servants and helping me to understand, you know, what the problem was and why this company was not getting the contracts that they should get.

Ultimately, we just came to the point where the poor civil servant just had to say: I am sorry; there is nothing we can do; I must tell you I fundamentally agree with your concern about the problem that you’ve identified, but the rules are the rules, and I can’t change anything. So I would like to thank the civil service for trying and making sure that I fully understood what was going on. But they were not able to actually change the rule, and I think that that’s very problematic.

I have had other businesses come to me, for example, and say that they were supposed to be receiving some monies during the COVID crisis. They made the appropriate applications and did receive money on the first round, but on the second round, without knowing it, they filled in the form and sent it in using an iPad, and it turns out that the government system would not recognize an iPad. I don’t understand the technical reasons why, but it didn’t recognize it, so officially they had not applied when indeed they had applied. So when it was discovered that this was actually a problem with the government’s program – there were multiple small businesses that did not receive the grants that they were supposed to get – even though it was identified as a government issue in terms of their program, the small businesses were still told: well, sorry; you didn’t apply at the time that you were supposed to, so you miss out on the second stage of the grant application.

Even though they clearly were eligible because they had received the first round of the grant application and they had indeed filled in the form but happened to fill it in on an iPad, which many people would, of course, because that’s a functional tool for many small businesses to be carried around while you’re doing your work at the small business and so on, they were still told they were not eligible because they didn’t apply, when, in fact, they had; it’s just that the government did not acknowledge the application. This is the kind of experience I have small businesses coming to me with constantly in this House. It’s become very evident that small businesses do not see this government as pro business. They see this government as pro corporation, which is very different than pro business. These same companies are now coming to me saying that their utility bills are getting to the point where they may drive many of them right out of business.

Here we have, again, a situation where time after time I have members of the business community, the small-business community coming to me in my constituency office and talking about the fact that this government is making life more difficult for them and, in fact, is surrendering local small businesses to the greater power of the large international corporations. You know, it is very much an anti-Alberta kind of stance that this government has taken.

Of course, average families have seen similar kinds of issues in terms of their own personal budget. Of course, they’re all paying more for school fees now because of the changes this government has made to funding schools. They are paying more on their insurance and on their utilities, as I’ve mentioned before. They’re paying more for even their recreation, like going to parks and using Alberta’s great wilderness. All of these kinds of things are happening, and now that we’re getting very close to tax time in this province, they’re finding out that they are paying more than they would have if the government had not deindexed the tax rolls.

Every time they turn around, they’re being slapped down by this provincial government. The only people that are doing well under this provincial government are the people who were doing well before, the international corporations. It certainly is a government that is in favour of wealth accumulation but is not in favour of, you know, average people trying to make a decent living for themselves. We certainly need to see this change, and we need to see this government change in 2023.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on second reading of Bill 2, are there others wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It’s an honour to rise this evening and, particularly following the previous member, the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, is always a privilege to be able to do so and hear those comments. I share many of the concerns brought forward by that member and other members of my caucus on this side of the House, particularly around the idea that we see in this bill, Bill 2, Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, the continuation of this government's decisions to go forward with the $1 billion tax grab.

Of course, this is a move to tax inflation at a time when we are seeing rates of inflation that recently Statistics Canada measured at around a 30-year high of 5.7 per cent. Of course, that's quite a bit higher than what this UCP government's Budget 2022 actually estimated inflation at; they had said about 3.2 per cent. Again, when we look at this idea of bracket creep, we've heard time and time again that the Premier, when with the Canadian Taxpayers Federation, when that Premier was a member of the federal Parliament, railed against this idea of bracket creep and called it a pernicious and insidious tax grab, and unfortunately we find ourselves in a situation here where now what he once railed against so often is potentially one of the largest tax grabs that we've seen in some time.

It's interesting to see how we've gotten here, especially and particularly when we find ourselves in a situation with inflation at a 30-year high, a government continuing down this path of putting more and more costs on working Albertans at a time when the cost of everything is going up for them. Again, as the previous member stated, we see utility bills day in and day out, stories coming in from our constituents to our offices – we've had the opportunity to share just some of them that we've heard – you know, utility bills going up by hundreds and hundreds of dollars. Unfortunately, this government's idea to fix that is not really a solution at all, by any means, and barely a Band-Aid, Mr. Speaker.

Again, the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford brought forward the idea of insurance costs increasing so much. We saw last year many Albertans seeing increases of upwards of 30 per cent at a time when they are driving far less, often having their vehicle parked for the majority of the time, but still having to pay increasing costs because this government has been so unwilling to take any action.

Again, on one hand, we see this UCP government lowering the corporate tax rate for the largest, most profitable corporations to the tune of $4.7 billion coming out of the pockets of Albertans, and at that same time they're turning around and telling those Albertans that at a time with such cost increases they're also going to take another billion dollars out of their pockets to use as the government sees fit. That's truly unfortunate, Mr. Speaker. I think that if at all we were to consider this, I couldn't imagine a worse time.

You may recollect, Mr. Speaker, that it wasn't too long ago, I believe in 2020, that we saw this government move forward with new rules that allowed employers to average hours worked by employees over 52 weeks rather than 12 weeks. We saw this change because it took massive amounts of money from employees that quite often were working overtime, very likely working shifts of over 44 hours per week. This was particularly felt by those in the oil and gas industry who may be working these extended weeks and potentially on for a few weeks, off for a few weeks. These kinds of changes that this government has made have been devastating for workers in our province. At the same time as we see overtime dollars being reduced for employees across the province, for those who may be lucky enough to have seen an increase, even a modest one, this UCP government is now going to be taxing them more through the idea of bracket creep.

By no means do I see myself being able to support Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, because this is, in reality, the decision to move forward with the idea of bracket creep, and it's truly disappointing. Again, I truly hope that the government might reconsider. Very doubtful, Mr. Speaker. I think that now is not the time to move forward with this. I question why, again, the Premier, a member who has been quite outspoken about the idea of bracket creep being an insidious and pernicious tax grab, in his own words, is now going back on that idea and moving forward to tax Albertans so much more.

Again, when we look at some of the other changes that this government has made at a time when inflation is at a 30-year high, particularly around the Alberta child and family benefit, we're seeing families losing upwards of $450. We brought up the idea of those trying to take care of their families as well as those receiving funds through AISH and Alberta Works, other programs, that this government has moved forward with essentially drawing back the buying power and the purchasing power of Albertans who find themselves on these programs. I just have to question why, Mr. Speaker.

You know, this government has found itself in a situation based on oil prices being over $100 at this time. That's great. Unfortunately, the Albertans who are depending on this government to support them are not seeing the benefits of that balanced budget. It goes past those that are receiving AISH, that are receiving the seniors' benefit, that are receiving the Alberta child benefit. It goes to every single Albertan across this province when we look at the decisions of this government regarding education property taxes. We've seen those forced to increase, and those have real impacts on not just those, again, that are accessing government programs but every Albertan who is paying property taxes in the province.

Again, it goes past that, Mr. Speaker, when we look at the decisions that this government has made and their inability to form strong relationships with municipalities. We see this government and this minister making decisions that are going to increase the borrowing cost to our municipalities. We recognize that through these hardships municipalities have to find themselves in a balanced budget situation, which is understandable. But, again, the government is making decisions that are going to increase the interest on their borrowing rate, that is only going to be downloaded onto every Albertan, Albertans of all stripes. So when we look through this legislation, while there are sections that are less consequential than others – you know, to some extent, we see this as an omnibus bill that is affecting many acts, but unfortunately, specific to the $1 billion bracket creep tax increase that we're seeing put forward by this government, it makes it impossible to support this legislation.

Now, just a couple of other things that I specifically had questions around. We do see some changes to the Tourism Levy Act, some changes to the language, which is understandable, but we are also seeing that it will become mandatory for organizations like Airbnb to charge the tourism levy and remit that to the government of Alberta. So I'd be interested to find out if the minister or any members can potentially let us know what kinds of costs are going to be associated with that to those organizations or what kind of revenue the government expects to see from that, or maybe it's not much of a change across the board. I would be interested in hearing more about that.

We do also see some changes to the tobacco act which are going to reduce the tax rate for chewing tobacco. I found that interesting when I first saw it. I have seen that we were taxing this product quite a bit higher than other provinces, so this is going to bring it more in line. I think that there was the idea that Albertans are leaving to other jurisdictions to actually buy this product, so I'd be interested to find out if the government has any numbers on how that might be reflected with the changes, if there is going to be an increase in tax revenue from that, what that increase might be. If it's negligible, if it's substantial, I would be interested to hear more about that.

Again, while we are seeing acts amended in here, sometimes just basic language changes that are needed to modernize that, there is, at the end of the day, this massive increase to the tax burden on everyday Albertans put forward by this government, and it's truly disastrous at any time but specifically as we find ourselves continuing through the COVID pandemic. When Albertans are simply trying to make it day to day, this government is telling them that it is going to cost more to live in this province, essentially, no matter who you are. Unfortunately, for those Albertans who find themselves on programs like I mentioned earlier – the AISH program, Alberta Works – this government is truly leaving those Albertans behind.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I think that I will conclude my comments. Again, I do not see myself supporting this legislation. I think that the Premier has done a complete one-eighty on where he once stood on issues of bracket creep, and I think it's deeply unfortunate. I think the idea of it, especially right now, is deeply flawed, and I don't know how we found ourselves in this position. I hope that he will at some point soon, before this legislation passes, reconsider.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on Bill 2 at second reading, the hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and speak on Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. I've been listening to the comments from the other side of the House, and I guess, first of all, I'd like to say that we should probably give some lessons on how to do a Google search, because if one did one, one could find Bill 2. While the folks spent a bunch of time just now talking about stuff, I struggled to find anything that I heard that was true, and I struggled even harder to find anything that was in Bill 2.

What I heard was a list of NDP talking points, things that they know aren't true. You know, the Finance minister has pointed out that there are several car insurance companies that actually have lowered their rates this year. He gave those details in the House the other day. Yet the folks on the other side just can't bring themselves to acknowledge what is true. Mr. Speaker, again, I suppose there could have been several points of order just for not talking about the bill at all. I could be wrong, but I would be challenged to find anything I heard in the last set of speakers that actually touched on Bill 2. It just wasn't there. The folks on the other side are just not doing their homework, just not paying attention, just not serving their constituents by talking about the legislation that the House is actually considering right now. It's really sad.

A lot of things that they talked about they know aren't true. I mean, nobody took away more jobs than the NDP did when they were in government in this province.

Mr. Sabir: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order has been called.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Sabir: Under 23(h), (i), and (j). The minister is making comments such as there was no truth and whatnot that will cause disorder in the House. Members from this side were speaking to Bill 2, which is the budget implementation act, not amendment act, as the minister said. Anything that this bill will implement is in the budget, and whatever colleagues were saying was well within the purview of this legislation. I think it will be better if the minister keeps his comments to the bill.

Thank you.

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's clearly a matter of debate, what we have here. I stand by it. I appreciate that the hon. member doesn't like to hear his members corrected, but I stuck with the rules of the House. I didn't point to any particular member. I certainly disagreed with what the folks there said. That's what we do here. We debate. These are all matters of debate, every single matter raised by the other side first. I was just correcting the record, which I think is the definition of debate. It's not a point of order. It's just a matter of debate.

The Speaker: Well, are there others?

I do agree and I am prepared to rule that this is a matter of debate. I'll just provide a little bit of caution that the minister is getting very close to being creative about language around what may or may not be factual inside the Chamber. He's getting very close to implying that members were lying, which, of course, would be a point of order if that was the case, so just a slight caution there for him. This is not a point of order. I consider the matter dealt with and concluded.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is Bill 2 that we're talking about here. The hon. members on the other side – frankly, I will stand by what I just said. You made it clear that I was on the right side, and I will take your caution to make sure I remain on the right side of what the rules are. But the fact is that the folks haven't talked about the bill, and so far I haven't either because I've been busy correcting the misinformation that came from the other side in between just pointing out the fact that virtually nothing that was talked about from the other side is about this bill.

Now that I've spent no time talking about the bill and all my time correcting the misinformation from the other side, I'll just take a minute for those people watching that might actually be interested in what's in this bill. I'm going to spend a few minutes, if you don't mind, Mr. Speaker, talking about what's in the bill that's actually before the Legislative Assembly of Alberta right now, which will be the first time in this evening's debate that that has been touched upon, because it hasn't been touched upon from the other side of the House. [interjections] They can't stand talking about the bill. They're just chirping and yelling. I listened quietly to all the stuff that didn't have anything to do with the bill, but they just can't stand now trying to move to talking about what's in the bill. Nonetheless, we shall persevere. We shall move forward.

Budget 2022's implementation measures support responsible fiscal management. It integrates financial responsibility across the government, which will lead to better outcomes for Albertans and a strong financial position for Alberta. The bill introduces policies which support the better use of public funds, improving cost certainty and eliminating financial risks. It enacts several specific tax changes and supports red tape reduction by harmonizing federal and provincial tax legislation. These measures will help ensure efficient use of Alberta tax dollars and protect valuable public services today and well into the future, and that is important, Mr. Speaker. Consistent with our government's goal of having an efficient government, that will allow us to balance the budget, which makes the services that we provide to Albertans sustainable, something that never happened during the four dark years previous to our government being here.

The changes to the government's cash management system in this bill will reduce taxpayer-supported debt for future generations. The amendments to the Financial Administration Act will allow the government to use surplus cash held by provincial entities to help reduce provincial debt. The government replaces an outdated and administratively complex cash-pooling structure with a more efficient and flexible structure that uses surplus cash held in pooled bank accounts to help pay down provincial debt and lower debt-servicing costs. The new cash-pooling structure will reduce the amount of money the government has to borrow by at least a billion dollars – a billion dollars, Mr. Speaker; not chump change, a billion dollars – and lower debt-servicing costs by a minimum of $25 million a year.

These changes also respond, Mr. Speaker – now, this is important, and the other side, rather than interrupting me, should probably listen to this next little bit – to the Auditor General's recommendation. We all ought to listen to the Auditor General, and whoever is in government should because while the Auditor General's job is on one hand, in my opinion, to embarrass whoever is in government by pointing out publicly when they can do things better, a smart and mature government would say, "Wow, we maybe should listen carefully to what the Auditor General said and learn how we can do things better," because that's what a good government does. No government is perfect, and the Auditor General is there to make us less imperfect, and if we are wise, we should all listen to what the Auditor General says. The recommendations were that the government should examine its current cash-pooling structure and make better use of the surplus cash to reduce debt, and this bill responds to that Auditor General recommendation.

Mr. Speaker, what you'll notice is that there's a disconnect here – a big disconnect – between what I have talked about in this bill and what we heard previously from the other side, and what you'll find is almost no similarity between what was heard from the other side and what I've said. Why? Because I've been talking about the bill. I don't know what the word salad was that came from the other side, but it wasn't about the bill that is before this House. My advice, as I prepare to sit down, is that if the other side wants to debate this, they ought to probably do their homework, find out what's before the House, and let's talk about it.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-East, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie if he still chooses to do so.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity given to me to rise and express my support for Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. First of all, I would like to applaud the Premier and all the ministers for coming up with a budget that will fulfill our promises to Albertans. It is aimed to have financial stability as the government maintained all the needed services with an assurance of creating jobs and more businesses in the province.

If passed, Bill 2 will implement many measures introduced by Budget 2022 that will make better use of public funds, improve cost certainty, and eliminate financial risk. Bill 2 will amend the Emissions Management and Climate Resilience Act, Mr. Speaker, by removing the authority for the minister to issue loan guarantees under the TIER loan guarantee program as the program no longer exists, so the function is obsolete. The changes will also uphold overall government direction prohibiting the issuance of loan guarantees as they created undesirable financial risk to government.

Bill 2 also introduces changes to the Alberta Health Care Insurance Act that will strengthen the local legal framework and give government flexibility to make decisions in an ever-changing health environment by establishing a new regulation-making authority for health benefits for services provided by allied health professionals. The changes will also increase financial accountability in physician claims, audits, and other compliance activities, and it will clarify wording for the creation of benefit review committees.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 2 also introduces amendments that will change the end date for the government of Alberta's financial commitment to align with a revised business case for the green line LRT project in Calgary. It will extend the period of time for provincial funding by two years, to 2029-2030.

Also, the amendments carried by Bill 2 in the Financial Administration Act will authorize the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance to mandate provincial corporations, regulated funds, and other consolidated entities to participate and hold their surplus cash in the new cash-pooling structure. This will enable government to implement a new, flexible cash-pooling structure that will use this surplus cash held in pooled accounts to pay down provincial debt and lower debt-servicing costs. This will reduce the amount of money the government has to borrow by at least $1 billion and lower debt-servicing costs by a minimum of $25 million per year. It will replace an outdated, administratively complex cash-pooling structure. This change also responds to the Auditor General's recommendation to examine the government's current cash-pooling structure and make better use of surplus cash to reduce debt.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 2 includes provisions that will implement the Budget 2022 decision to establish a new tax category for smokeless tobacco – for example, chewing tobacco – with the rate set at 27.5 per cent per gram. Most amendments to tax statutes in this bill are annual technical updates intended to ensure that Alberta's tax statutes are clear, consistent with the federal tax system, and, overall, effective in supporting administration of the provincial tax system.

Mr. Speaker, this government had planned to balance the budget from day one. It is a wise and thoughtful plan to eliminate the largest deficit in Alberta's history. In fact, during the start of this government into administration, the deficit has decreased even faster than initially planned. Through the well-thought-out strategy of the government our economy is showing encouraging signs of recovery and growth, but there is a lot more to be done to further diversify, strengthen our workforce, grow our resources, and extend the needed help for all Albertans.

What is the importance of balancing the budget? The question, Mr. Speaker, never crossed the thoughts of the previous government. Balancing the budget would mean a lot to Albertans as it would give us the ability to reduce the debt-servicing charge and eventually pay the debt. It would remove the burden to future generations, a debt that they did not incur. When the previous government assumed governance of this province, debt servicing was under $800 million a year. When they were ousted from office, it was about $2.3 billion a year. Balancing the budget will put an end to a spending spree path being asserted continuously by the NDP so that we can go to a path of redirecting this debt-servicing amount to more useful services that Albertans rely on, including health care, infrastructure, social programs, child care, and education.

After many challenging years of economic and pandemic hardship Alberta is finally moving forward once again. The government's focus, responsible fiscal management, and relentless pursuit of economic growth have put the province on a more sustainable fiscal trajectory, creating expanded financial capacity, resulting in additional government revenues. The job-creating corporate tax cut introduced by this government, Mr. Speaker, is proving to be a more sensible approach than the increasing of taxes imposed by the previous government. Through this approach we will collect roughly $400 million more in annual corporate tax revenue at an 8 per cent rate than the previous government did at 12 per cent, demonstrating the huge investment framework established since this government took office as multibillion-dollar investments are expected to come to Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, the Conference Board of Canada, Desjardins, RBC, and TD forecast that Alberta will be leading the country in economic growth in this year. Amazon Web Services announced the plan to establish a second cloud computing hub in Calgary, amounting to $4.3 billion, while Infosys and Mphasis are to create thousands of tech jobs in the province. RBC is also creating a tech hub in Calgary, with about 300 jobs, while EY will create a new finance hub, with about 200 jobs in Calgary, impressed with the talented workforce.

Northern Petrochemical also announced a $2.5 billion project in the municipal district of Greenview, and Dow Chemical plans to work on a project that would be the world's first net-zero carbon emissions petrochemical plant, which is predicted to cost about $10 billion.

Another huge investment that has landed in Alberta is Lynx Air, Mr. Speaker, Canada's newest low-cost airline. It joins Flair and WestJet as Alberta-based airlines. These are just some of the many investments creating jobs in Alberta and boosting our economy, Mr. Speaker.

We saw the unemployment rate hit prepandemic levels in December 2021 by gaining about 130,000 jobs for the year, including 6,100 to the oil and gas industry. Moreover, in January this year we heard that Canada lost 200,000 jobs, but Alberta's economy gained over 7,000 jobs. Our unemployment rate continues to drop, and unemployment is at its lowest since September 2019. In February 8,200 jobs were created, which means more Albertans are continuing to work and receiving a regular paycheque.

Let me also add that Alberta continues to be a world leader in sustainable and responsible resource development among oil-producing jurisdictions. This shows that while we recognize that Canada's largest export is still the oil and gas industry, we're experiencing broad-based investment and economic diversification in our province.

Nonetheless, this investment climate and composition does not mean that the government's approach of carefully handling the province's finances will twist. Alberta's government continues to discipline spending to maintain balance. Budget 2022, as implemented partly by Bill 2, is moving Alberta forward by strengthening our health care system, getting more Albertans working, and bringing our finances back into the black.

As we move forward, Albertans need a strong health care system with the capacity to manage extraordinary surges and provide an excellent standard of care to all. Mr. Speaker, Budget 2022 provides more than $22 billion in Health's operating budget, a $515 million, or 2.4 per cent, increase from the 2021-2022 forecast. Excluding COVID-19 cost, it will grow by a total of $1.8 billion by 2024-2025 in order to scale up capacity, another year of record-high investment for health care in Alberta. Record investments in health care mean that Albertans will see expanded access through additional ICU beds, new facilities in their communities, and more mental health and addictions care around the province. These record investments also ensure that Albertans across the province have access to the highest quality in most . . . [interjection]

Mr. Sabir: Thank you to the member for giving way. While the member was talking about the impact of this budget on his constituents, the question I have for the member is that this budget in Bill 2 also continues to implement that bracket creep, which will take $1 billion out of Albertans' pockets, which the Premier used to refer to as insidious and whatnot. I'm just wondering if the member would like to comment on how bracket creep impacts residents and Albertans in his riding.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, hon. member, for the excellent question. The 2022 balanced budget propels Alberta ahead. With a balanced budget: more attention and spending on amenities that will benefit all Albertans, and opportunities in health care, employment, and better quality of life will allow every Albertan to grow and expand. By balancing the budget, we will not incur additional debt or borrowing, and we should not incur surpluses. We are able to more progressively pay off the provincial debt and maximize the debt-servicing fee.

New infrastructure projects like affordable housing, community service programs, and employment opportunities will grow this charge. Alberta cities and towns are where many families look for opportunity. In addition, the province's natural beauty, including vast forest and the Rocky Mountains, contributes to our desirable environment. Albertans that live in Calgary's constituency will have more opportunity to find employment, improve their quality of life, and enjoy the benefits that come along with having a balanced budget.

Over the next three years Alberta will invest $100 million per year to provide additional health care capacity on a permanent basis, including any new intensive care unit beds. The budget also includes a $750 million COVID-19 contingency this year, which will help address the surgical backlog and ensure the province can cover evolving pandemic-related costs. To expand continuing care programs and services for seniors and vulnerable Albertans, Budget 2022 provides nearly $3.7 billion . . . [Mr. Singh's speaking time expired]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for staying so on message. That was very impressive.

Mr. Speaker, you know, I completely understand that the minister of – of course, through you to the Minister of Municipal Affairs, I completely understand that he likes to dictate to other orders of government and, on that same note, in character, likes to dictate what can be debated in the House perhaps. But on this side of the House we believe in having an opinion and listening to our constituents and what are the issues and concerns that are impacting them, their lives, and their ability to actually put food on the table.

Now, Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, clearly identifies the priorities of the government when it comes to the fiscal plan of the province. They as the government are then identifying which priorities they have when it comes to, you know, presenting their budget and perspective to the people of Alberta. Now, it's commonly known that the members on the other side like to boast that their ideological perspective is what's really necessary to bring more investment to the province. By way of the Financial Statutes Amendment Act that's exactly what they're doing. They're demonstrating what their priorities are, so this is an opportunity for us on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, to actually get up and debate what amendments we believe should actually be inside of this proposed piece of legislation. Through you to the Minister of Municipal Affairs: thank you very much for your opinion, but no thank you, right? We're going to debate the things that we want to debate in this House as pertain to our constituents, actually.

Now, when it comes to conservative ideology, it's well known that the members on the other side, the conservatives in general, like to believe that less government is actually better for the economy. It is better for the wealthy, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to making sure that corporations get more benefits. When the members on the other side get up and talk about the Alberta advantage, what they're really talking about in terms of the financial statutes amendment is actually giving more privileges to corporations within the province of Alberta. That is coupled – I mean, just to be clear, in case the members on the other side don't know, what I'm referring to is actually reducing the corporate tax rate on corporations.

You know, if it would stop there, at least I could understand that they were trying to do what's best, because they believe that corporations are going to come here, they're going to make more jobs, but as the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford clearly stated in debate this evening, it's actually small and medium-sized businesses that employ more Albertans than corporations do. I'm not saying, "Let's not have corporations," Mr. Speaker. I'm just saying that there has to be a good balance and that we have to find ways of creating a more sustainable economy moving forward by having that balance between corporations and small and medium-sized enterprises in the province of Alberta.

Now, I would be remiss to not actually cover the numbers, right? As I did during my opportunity to give a member's statement today, I actually went over some of those numbers, Mr. Speaker, and I wouldn't mind covering those numbers again. When it actually came to capital investment in Alberta year over year, in 2018 there was $62.3 billion invested in Alberta. That was 2018. In 2019 it was $59.4 billion. Okay; so now we have a change of government. What do we see? In 2020 it goes down to $48.6 billion. It does a little bit better in 2021. It goes up to $54 billion but not $62.3 billion, like in 2018. So when members on the other side of the House get up and say that they're the ones that, because of their ideological perspective and their ideological approach, are bringing more capital investment to the province of Alberta, it doesn't add up. Numbers don't lie, and Albertans know very well that numbers don't lie. Here we have 2022, and it's projected that we'll have $56.7 billion, which is still shy of the 2018 amount of $62.3 billion.

Now, what the members on the other side of the House fail to realize is that in order to have a sustainable economy moving forward, Albertans need to have advantage of that economy. People aren't there to serve your political ideology and the way that you think the economy should function. The economy is there to serve the people of Alberta.

Now, because of the laissez-faire approach of the members on the other side of the House – and they know very well how supply and demand works – what they fail to realize is that in the equation, in the approach of supply and demand there are going to be people who are priced out of the economy, and those are the Albertans that we care about, at the end of the day, Mr. Speaker. What they fail to realize is that the economic externalities of the people who are priced out of the market end up having a real economic cost, and it ends up costing our economy more in the long run. That's what the members on the other side fail to realize. And then, on top of lowering the corporate tax rate, they even take it a step further to create their so-called Alberta advantage, and they actually take benefits away from workers.

Now, I understand that the members on the other side don't like unions, but unions fought hard and long for workers' rights: the eight-hour workday, making sure that they had weekends off. You know, back in the day children actually used to work in factories. They fought to make sure that children wouldn't have to work in factories. Workers organized and worked so that they could have their rights defended, and it was to create a balance. The members on the other side like to create this fantasy world where workers are somehow lazy and they've got to be pushed to do their work. It's almost like – maybe I won't go there. But nothing could be further from the truth. All of the workers want to make sure that our economy functions, but they just want to make sure that they're getting benefits out of it, just like everybody else is.

Now, when you couple all these Conservative ideological economic policies together, what you actually see are Albertans getting a disadvantage by this ideological approach. Corporations actually look at that, too, and then capital investment actually looks at that. Let's look at the numbers of venture capital. In 2021 in Canada overall: $14.2 billion in venture capital invested; that's a 222 per cent increase year over year. Ontario got $7.4 billion of that; that's a hike of 270 per cent. British Columbia got $2.9 billion; that's 224 per cent. Quebec even got $2.8 billion; that's 180 per cent year over year. What did Alberta have? Mr. Speaker, $561 million; that's only 23 per cent year over year. At the end of the day, when you look at the numbers, when you look at the amount of venture capital being invested or capital investment overall, you don't see the numbers. The ideological approach that you're presenting isn't working, and we've said it before. I've said it so many times in this House. These are outdated, antiquated beliefs, and people need an economy that's going to be there for them.

I'm telling you, Mr. Speaker, that I can only hope that in 2023 Albertans put us back on that side of the House so that we can get back to the numbers like in 2018, when there was $26.3 billion of capital investment invested under our government, when we were governing this province for the benefit of all Albertans.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Bill 4

Municipal Government (Face Mask and Proof of COVID-19 Vaccination Bylaws) Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my privilege to rise and introduce third reading of Bill 4, the Municipal Government (Face Mask and Proof of COVID-19 Vaccination Bylaws) Amendment Act, 2022.

There has been a significant debate on these proposed changes, but I believe this bill is important to achieve consistent COVID-19 public health policy in the province, something that is most certainly within the province's jurisdiction, which is the point. If passed, the bill will ensure municipal bylaws align with the province's approach to public health issues. They would require any municipal bylaws related to COVID-19 vaccines or masking requirements only to prevent the spread of communicable diseases to be approved by the Minister of Municipal Affairs and would require the Minister of Municipal Affairs to consult with the Alberta chief medical officer of health before making a decision on any of those bylaws that should come forward.

This bill does not affect the day-to-day operations of municipal governments, who can continue to implement masking bylaws in municipal facilities such as recreation centres, public transit, municipal buildings. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this bill is extremely narrow. It will ensure there is one clear policy for COVID-19 measures across the province. This is important to provide consistency and clarity for all Albertans and Alberta municipalities as we move forward together toward a path to normal.

Mr. Speaker, I'm hopeful that all members of the House see the wisdom in supporting this bill. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, before the Assembly is Bill 4, third reading. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning has risen.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will rise and speak to Bill 4. I've been on the record already previously on other areas of debate when it comes to this bill, but I do feel like I need to reinforce the comments that I have made previously in regard to the way that we as legislators, as individuals that are making policies, are working with our counterparts, that this government seriously give their head a shake.

I find this bill extremely disingenuous as to how municipalities should be dealt with and worked with. I think that maybe when this was introduced, there was a reason that the government felt that it was appropriate. However, we have seen, across the whole province at this point, that the very things that the minister is talking about – face masks and proof of vaccinations – are not an issue across the province. There is no municipality that is currently trying to enforce a bylaw such as those two.

This was a direct posturing, I would say, to the municipality of Edmonton even though – and some of your rural MLAs may agree on the government side of the House – there were other things going on in other municipalities that maybe should have been under consideration when it was related to COVID-19 that may not have directly related to masks or proof of vaccinations. Other things were happening in municipalities that were related to how municipalities were choosing to deal with COVID, yet we don't see that reflected in this piece of legislation. So it was very narrow and very select about how it was drafted and how this piece of legislation has been chosen to be used.

The issue that I have with it is that it could have been rescinded once the direction was clear that there were no municipalities across the province that were engaging in creating bylaws around face masks and COVID-19 vaccination, proof of vaccines. It could have been rescinded, and in fact it might have been an opportunity for the minister and the government to start creating and rebuilding bridges with the municipalities that this was directly focused on. We have heard from Alberta municipalities, AM's president about how concerned they are about this precedent of this government choosing to overreach into municipal jurisdiction and to impede, with their authority, when it comes to the creation of bylaws. That is a very, very scary precedent.

It should be something that the government takes quite seriously, but again what we see is that ego overrides common sense in this Chamber when it comes to how the government chooses to interact with different levels of government. We see it federally. We see it when this government chooses to deal with municipalities, where the ego becomes the driving force of the conversation and the common sense and reality of how we interact and how the engagement happens in negotiation, in policy creation, in regulation, and just the ability to sit down and negotiate at a table completely goes out the window.

It is a very shameful way to govern, I would say, because it is not about collaboration. It is not about setting good policy and regulation and legislation on behalf of the people. It is truly about the power of a government to make choices, and what is clearly becoming clearer and clearer, as we move through the years of this government, is that power is the ultimate priority for everything that they do. It is all about power. It's not about making good decisions. It's not about making sure that the people of this province are protected and are treated fairly and that their health is the utmost priority. It is about, "We have the power, and we are going to wield it and use it when we choose to," and this piece of legislation clearly dictates to that.

I'm going to be very careful with my words. It is a very inappropriate piece of legislation. That will be the word that I will use, Mr. Speaker: it is inappropriate. It is inappropriate because it's not needed, and it needs to be rescinded because there is no need for it. My hope is that there will be no future need for it as we move forward through dealing with whatever the next future COVID concerns may be, but at the same time the municipalities actually get to decide what makes sense for their citizens. What is the next thing going to be? The government is going to decide that they don't like some other bylaw, and the next thing you know, the government is going to come in and decide they're going to make another piece of legislation that says: "Well, I don't know. The city of Calgary lets too many people swim in the river, so that bylaw has got to go. We're going to rewrite that bylaw."

Like, this just doesn't even make any sense. If we all want to recall, 18 months ago or two years ago, when COVID happened, we had the Premier saying that it is up to the municipalities to enforce these very health measures and make the decisions, that they need to decide if they're going to be having masking bylaws, that they need to decide whether or not they're going to have vaccine passports and what all those regulations look like, that it is up to the municipalities because we don't want to be held responsible for those decisions. But now that the government doesn't like the decision, it's no longer the purview and the responsibility of the municipality, because the province doesn't like it, and therefore they're going to wield their power and take away what they clearly told the municipalities to do two years ago.

It's so inconsistent, which is pretty consistent, actually, with the government's inconsistencies, with everything that they do at this point. I guess we should just know that it is constantly going to be inconsistent. I have not seen a clear sign of leadership through this whole process when it comes to COVID, to begin with, or also a clear sign of leadership when it comes to any decision-making processes over the last three years when it comes to any pieces of legislation and how this government chooses to interact with different levels of government.

It is frustrating for me, not only as an opposition member but as an Albertan, to see the direction that this government has chosen to take this province, because they've forgotten the people of the province. They've forgotten – the government has forgotten – why they were elected and why they are supposed to be here, and that is to make sure that Albertans are taken care of and that we have a responsibility to make sure that legislation and policy actually do something for the betterment of our society. Yet when we see inflation and the cost of living and all of these things going through the roof, we have spent most of the session talking about bills that have nothing to do with the economy whatsoever. They actually don't have, really, any forward-looking vision for the economic future of Alberta, for how it's going to help the people of Alberta, just a lot of pomp and circumstance – that is what I would say – and it’s disappointing.

One good step would be, first, to rescind this piece of legislation, and then my hope would be that maybe we will see this government finally decide to stop worrying about their own personal power and whatever is going on within the government’s issues of the day, refocus, and start serving the people of this province. I’m getting really frustrated as an Albertan with the direction that this government has decided to take, and I am frustrated as an opposition member on behalf of the people of Alberta that once again this government is so busy with their power politics that they can’t focus on the fact that they actually need to govern for the people of this province.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-East has risen.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased today to rise and have this opportunity to express the importance of Bill 4, the Municipal Government (Face Mask and Proof of COVID-19 Vaccination Bylaws) Amendment Act, 2022. I want to express my appreciation to the minister for introducing this bill, which will ensure that the municipal bylaws align with the provincial public health policy.

As well, Mr. Speaker, I wholeheartedly thank the Premier, health care professionals, government leaders, and all Albertans for supporting each other during times of uncertainty and challenges. Furthermore, I would like to extend my appreciation to the stakeholders and hundreds of essential workers that have voiced their opinion on the challenging gaps faced in our system as well as to every single Albertan that was affected in the pandemic. Your resiliency and support to the community are commendable.

In the past two years not just Albertans but the entire nation had been faced with the challenges of the COVID-19 pandemic. Citizens of Alberta had experienced a total upheaval in lifestyle and routine, from closed schools, balancing work, challenges for businesses, job uncertainty, and rising rates of death and sickness. In addition to all of these, COVID-19 has created gaps in Alberta’s health care system, which continues to deliver health services to millions of Albertans.

Since the beginning of the pandemic the health sector has navigated a difficult situation to deliver health services while protecting Albertans. Even with one of the best universal health care systems, Alberta had been faced with its own unique challenges. Mr. Speaker, now that the conditions of the pandemic have settled after two long, frustrating years, it is time for Alberta to move forward together towards a path to recovery.

All Albertans deserve clear and consistent public health policies throughout the province. Therefore, Bill 4 is appropriate since at a time when Alberta is still improving from the pandemic’s consequences, what the province needs today is a consolidation of health procedures that remove the uncertainty and aggravation regarding the masking requirements.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 4 will introduce changes to the Municipal Government Act that are very narrow and strictly focused on the public health requirements related to COVID-19. Currently section 7(a) of the existing MGA provides municipal councils with the authority to pass bylaws for municipal purposes as well as gives them the authority to pass bylaws regarding the safety, health, and welfare of people and the protection of people and property. This present provision is conflicting with the current public health policies implemented by the provincial government, which is creating confusion in the province of Alberta.

Bill 4 will propose changes that will require the Minister of Municipal Affairs to consult with Alberta’s chief medical officer of health to approve the bylaw. This approach will restrict the ability of local governments to pass bylaws that contradict public health policies and rules enacted by the province. Mr. Speaker, the proposed changes would prevent local governments from imposing masking bylaws on private-sector operators such as grocery stores, retail businesses, and other operations.

The Alberta government appreciates the significance of local autonomy, which is why the proposed modifications to the MGA will have no effect on the Alberta communities’ day-to-day operations. Because most towns currently meet COVID-19 public health regulations, the proposed modifications will have little effect on them. These changes will not apply to municipal facilities such as leisure centres, public transportation, municipal buildings, and municipalities will retain the power to enact masking rules for the operation of municipal facilities as they deem fit. In Alberta, Mr. Speaker, Albertans and Alberta companies should have the option of wearing masks or requiring their customers to wear masks, and the proposed MGA modifications will provide them that option.

The municipalities in Alberta are doing a wonderful job of working with the province to stop the spread of COVID-19, and we commend them for this. However, the task in front of us is for every level of government to continue to work together with a common focus and objective; that is, to ensure that Albertans are protected and supported. Mr. Speaker, once the municipal bylaws align with the provincial public health policy, Albertans will have more freedom and autonomy to make decisions based on the situation of the pandemic.

There is nothing wrong with municipalities imposing their own public health limitations, and the government has completely backed them. This stands. However, it creates challenges once policies start to conflict. Municipalities have every right to make decisions in their jurisdictions, but we must appreciate the genuine concern that has led to the introduction of this bill. The scope of the bill is too narrow to suggest that municipalities are being denied their law-making rights. Mr. Speaker, we must not assume that the bill is trying to eliminate the power of municipalities to pass bylaws related to public health, as guaranteed under section 7(a), but it is to work together with the municipalities when decisions are contradicting.

Mr. Speaker, amendments in Bill 4 will ensure Albertans have clear public health guidelines. As the minister said, the impact of this bill will be very minimal on the operations of Alberta municipalities. When enacted into law, Bill 4 will remove the confusion that often takes place with provincial laws and municipal bylaws and public health requirements related to COVID-19.

In a nutshell, the immediate effect of Bill 4 will impact minimally on municipalities in Alberta because most municipalities are already complying with COVID-19 public health requirements. Local governments are also able to continue to implement mask bylaws within their jurisdictions with due consultation with the ministry. More importantly, let me reiterate, Albertans and Alberta businesses will have the choice of deciding whether or not to wear masks. The bill will also give Albertans a clear public health policy on the COVID-19 public health requirements of Alberta and ensure that masking and vaccine mandates in the province follow the up-to-date data. It is on this basis that I support this bill, because I believe it will take away the frustrations of Albertans and all the constituents in the Calgary-East riding.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. [some applause]

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm glad to see that the members on the other side of the House have a . . .

Mr. Williams: A sense of humour.

Member Loyola: No, not necessarily a sense of humour. It's, like, a creative sense of drama. Yeah. But, of course, you know, no, I wouldn't want to offend the member who just spoke. His comments were absolutely riveting. Riveting. Riveting.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to Bill 4 – you know, we were just debating this in the House last night – and to complement the remarks that I was making yesterday and also the remarks made by the Member for Edmonton-Manning, I think what's truly concerning about this piece of legislation is the fact that this minister and cabinet have decided to just take more power onto themselves. That's essentially what's happening, right? I mean, don't just take it from me, Mr. Speaker. Alberta Municipalities' President Cathy Heron said to the media, "We are concerned that the government of Alberta is setting a troubling precedent by amending the MGA – Alberta's principal piece of legislation governing municipalities – without prior consultation."

Now, I know that the members on the other side, you know, like to claim that they're listening to all Albertans, but I've got to wonder: where was the Minister of Municipal Affairs that he didn't hear the president of Alberta Municipalities and actually take this into consideration when he was bringing this proposed piece of legislation into the House? And many like the president of the Alberta Municipalities share the same perspective. They want to know why they weren't consulted.

As I was saying last night, Mr. Speaker, the concern here really is that this is setting a dangerous precedent, that this is a slippery slope, that if the minister does that in this circumstance, in what other circumstances is the minister going to decide that he can simply open . . . [interjection] By all means. Go ahead.

Mr. Williams: Thank you for taking my intervention, to the hon. member. So if this is a question of a slippery slope, I assume, in my understanding of the slippery slope argument, that you have no problem with the content itself; it's what might happen down the line with the precedent set. So I ask the member: will you please vote for this piece of legislation now and stop any future slipping down the line?

Member Loyola: Well, that would completely contradict and bring this debate to a close. Why would I do that? Like, it just doesn't make sense. I'm here actually saying that this is setting a dangerous precedent. Do you not realize that the logic behind my argument is that if we do it for this piece of legislation, of course, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the member, then what other pieces of legislation are going to be expected where we do the exact same thing? I don't understand why that is so difficult to understand for the member. [interjection] But, of course, I'll let him explain. Go ahead.

Mr. Williams: I appreciate this because I think this back and forth is helpful. The purpose of this body is to examine individual pieces of legislation as they come up, with the ability to amend in Committee of the Whole. If there's a problem with a future piece of legislation, raise that then. My understanding of your argument is that you don't have a problem with this legislation. You think it's fine, but "What if down the line?" can be dealt with down the line. I ask you again: please vote for this legislation.

Member Loyola: Mr. Speaker, through you to the member, he is completely mistaken. I'll state it again. I do have a problem with this piece of legislation. The problem with this piece of legislation, again, through you to the member and to all members on the other side of the House, Mr. Speaker, is that it is setting dangerous precedent. There was no consultation taken up with stakeholders and, specifically, Alberta Municipalities. So how can I agree to the piece of legislation? Don't get me wrong. I think that, yeah, absolutely, every piece of legislation that comes through this House: we're supposed to debate it. I get it. But I specifically have a problem with this one, Mr. Speaker, because it didn't go through a thorough process of actually consulting with stakeholders.

What we really have here, Mr. Speaker – and I would venture out on a limb here, but I don't think I'm going too far – is that this cabinet decided that they were going to listen to their convoy buddies and take their truth as the only perspective in the province of Alberta and that they were listening specifically to the people that were committing the illegal act of blocking a highway in the province of Alberta. That is what's happening here. But, thank goodness for Albertans and thank goodness for the rest of Canada, we here in Alberta are not a homogeneous population that all believe in the same thing. We all have different perspectives.

That is the real problem behind this piece of legislation. When the Minister of Municipal Affairs brings a piece of legislation where he's only listening to one group of Albertans, didn't even take the time to consult with stakeholders as it relates to their specific mandates, their responsibilities, and then goes further than that and even tramples on the liberty of a different order of government, we need to ask questions. Mr. Speaker, through you to the member: I don't agree with this piece of legislation because I firmly believe that, again, this government has decided that they're going to listen to just one group of Albertans.

Understandably, I will protect every Albertan's right to the opinion that they want to have – every Albertan's right – unlike the members opposite, who like to shut us down inside of this House in debate. We just saw it from the Minister of Municipal Affairs saying: oh, well, we're debating this; you can't say that; you can't say the other. Pardon me, but we live in a democracy, and all the opinions matter. All the opinions matter and all are valid because they're perspectives of different people – and I see, Mr. Speaker, you're kind of giving a little bit of a head nod; maybe I'm mistaken – of course, not those that are preaching hate, because that I'm completely against. Those we have to be very careful of.

I would even go a step further because some of the opinions that were being shared at that illegal blockade of a highway by some – not all; some – Albertans were right on the cusp of hatred, discrimination, injustice. There were some pretty extreme opinions being shared on that blockade line by some people. Those ones I am completely against, and they shouldn't be permitted in our democracy.

Here we have an example of the Minister of Municipal Affairs caving to just one group of people, and I don't think that's fair to the rest of Albertans, Mr. Speaker, especially since he didn't go out and actually consult with one of the most important stakeholder groups, Alberta Municipalities. We have it right here, and I'll read it again. Cathy Heron, president, said to the media, "We are concerned that the government of Alberta is setting a troubling precedent by amending the MGA – Alberta's principal piece of legislation governing municipalities – without prior consultation." My big question to the Minister of Municipal Affairs, of course, through you, Mr. Speaker, is why he didn't consult on a piece of legislation that he's bringing before this House. By what authority?

Mr. Williams: The Queen's, I guess.

Member Loyola: Okay. So by the very remarks coming from the other side being heckled, then we shouldn't care about stakeholders, we shouldn't care about other Albertans; we should only listen to a select few Albertans and base all of our legislation on just those people that happen to agree with the ideological perspective of those in government. Is that what I'm hearing?

Mr. Williams: Well, that's how you govern.

Member Loyola: Go ahead.

Mr. Williams: The authority on which we will pass this law will be the authority granted to us by Her Majesty the Queen with the majority of votes in the Legislature, and if Albertans disagree with that, they're welcome to go to the polls and say: "We disagree with Bill 4. These members tried to pass it, and we disagree." We can be voted out. This is a democracy.

Member Loyola: Well, I'm glad you mentioned that, Mr. Speaker, of course, through you to the member, because I can't wait till 2023. I really can't. You know, I am out there door-knocking. I'm out there talking to so many Albertans. They are so incredibly fed up with this government. Things are getting more and more expensive.

You know, like, the Minister of Municipal Affairs got up and was talking about the fact that, "Oh, yeah, insurance prices have come back down," but that's a half-truth, Mr. Speaker, because when they go up by 30 per cent and then come back down just a little bit, that's still an increase, Minister. Through you to the minister, of course, Mr. Speaker, that's still an increase, and that increase is what Albertans are feeling. It's not just on insurance; it's on utility fees, it's on postsecondary education, additional fees, on you name it. This government has made life more expensive for Albertans, and that's what I'm hearing on the doorsteps when I'm out in the community. That's what I'm hearing time and time and time again.

The members on the other side like to, you know, talk about how they're the best ones for the economy, Mr. Speaker, and this is the biggest fairy tale. When you look at jurisdictions all across this land, you see that the advantage that they give corporations is a real disadvantage for average working people in the province of Alberta and all other provinces across Canada. Through you to the members on the other side, again, I can't wait for 2023 because I'm out there day in, day out talking to Albertans and talking about how a real economy that serves people is one that takes care of those that are marginalized. What we're seeing under this government is that even middle-class – even middle-class – Albertans are getting priced out of the supply-demand equation, and life is getting more expensive for them.

I've talked to so many people, Mr. Speaker, who tell me that they're just one paycheque away from not being able to make the mortgage payment, and then they have to put it on credit. They have a line of credit with their bank, and then they're going to have to use money from their line of credit to actually pay for their mortgage. [interjection]

The Speaker: Order.

Member Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

As the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford was debating earlier tonight, the members on the other side like to make it seem like the carbon tax is the sole reason of this incredible amount of inflation that we've seen, and it's just not true, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: You know what? I am having a hard time making the connection to is how the remarks are specifically related to a masking bylaw for municipalities. I'm sure you were just about to make the connection so that I could understand how the remarks were relevant, but at present they certainly weren't.

Member Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, what we have before us is the fact that Albertans can just not trust this government. Members of Alberta Municipalities can't trust this Minister of Municipal Affairs because he didn't even take the time to consult them on this piece of legislation that we have here before us. Nothing can be more evident than the fact that this cabinet caved to their COVID buddies that were making this illegal blockade on the Alberta highway at the entrance to Coumts. This is what the real problem is that we have before us, and I can tell you that I, for one, am voting against this piece of legislation.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill in the last possible time that we have available to us. Of course, I oppose this bill, and I certainly wish the government would reconsider this. You know, we have talked about the particulars of this bill on a number of occasions, so the government has heard the reasons why the bill is inappropriate. But since we're on third, certainly, I think that we need to take the time to talk about the overarching concern that is inherent here.

It was only a year or so ago or perhaps a bit more that the Premier himself was suggesting that municipalities actually impose their own masking bylaw. We know that that is a part of the history of this conversation that we're having today. We have to ask ourselves what happened in the last little while that would have the government go from suggesting that, in fact, municipalities impose a masking bylaw, if they chose to do so, of course, to taking away that choice that he was suggesting they had at one time and imposing a requirement that is against their choice today. The only thing that is different, of course, is the leadership race that's happening in the party that is running this government for the next little while, not too much longer. You know, I think it's quite disappointing that a piece of legislation would actually be constructed in order to appease people who the Premier himself has recently referred to as lunatics. I think it's a cynical piece of legislation.

Unfortunately, it's in kind of a long series of pieces of disrespect for municipalities. That's really what we're talking about here. I quote Cathy Heron, who is the mayor of St. Albert and who, of course, is now the president of Alberta Municipalities – it used to be referred to as AUMA for anybody who is following – when she said about this particular legislation, quote, I believe in a collaborative approach to government, and I believe that this was the exact opposite. She also says: it sets a precedent for future legislative changes when all of a sudden a municipality and the government of Alberta disagree, and that's a precedent we don't appreciate.

This is why we're trying to use this last moment that we have to suggest that this really is wrong-headed legislation because it does almost nothing, well, really does nothing to provide any services to the citizens of Alberta. It doesn't improve their lives in any way whatsoever, but what it does do is it undermines dramatically the relationship between the provincial government and the municipalities, which is what we've seen as a consistent legacy of this government, an attack on municipalities.

We have many other examples: the increased costs that they have caused municipalities across this province by suggesting that they would increase the number of RCMP officers and then not providing any dollars to go with it so that the costs went up in the municipalities; the decision to actually charge municipalities extra money whenever they take out a loan instead of using the provincial government's loan rate, which is going to increase costs across every municipality; the decision to give a tax holiday to companies involved in paying taxation to municipalities, again increasing the expenses for municipalities; the decrease in grants such as MSI that this government has proposed over the next number of years, rightly described by the minister as front loaded to look good and then, of course, being terrible for the municipalities ever after that; attacking them so that all these municipalities now have reached the point where they must increase taxation in order to just pay the bills because of the decisions of the provincial government here.

You know, it was just last year that we had mayors and reeves from across the province out in front of this Legislature protesting the financial decisions that have been imposed on them by this provincial government, attacking them consistently over time. There's just been series after series of insults to the government, as expressed by the mayor of St. Albert here, Cathy Heron, that this is a noncollaborative government, that this is bad for the relationship between the province and the municipalities.

There have been many other times and ways in which the municipalities have felt insulted and hurt and wounded by this government, and, you know, this is just another one that actually doesn't do anything to protect or help people. All it does is help a government in crisis, and we know this government is in crisis. We know they spend all of their time on their internal conflicts, that they really are not paying attention to the province of Alberta, that they constantly are infighting. They can't agree with themselves. They call each other names like "lunatic," apparently, and now here we are in this situation, where they're really disrespecting other elected officials throughout the province.

We know that in the past, for example, this government made a decision to take some of their issues and put them on the ballot during the municipal election, were asked repeatedly, over and over again, by municipalities to please not interfere with the municipal elections, not to distract from the important issues that need to be discussed during the municipal elections, and this government just ignored them and went ahead with it, again for their own purposes, not because it provided any greater service to the province of Alberta but because they wanted to be able to raise some false flags and influence people running, people going to the polls, for their own purposes. Again, it's all about the government wanting to maintain power when they know that they're in crisis and that there is a serious possibility that they will lose that power.

We also know that this government recently has had a very lucky windfall in terms of international oil prices, that they brought in some extra dollars, the same as every other jurisdiction that has oil has also brought in those dollars, not based on anything this government did. It was just lucky that they happen to exist at the time when the international situation has resulted in a dramatic increase in oil prices. So they had this extra money, and they had an opportunity to be able to perhaps do something good for municipalities. Did they do anything for municipalities during that time? No, they did not. They didn't do anything for them.

In fact, the city of Calgary, for example, had made a very specific request because they have had a dramatically difficult time during the last number of years. They are a city that's experiencing some of the highest unemployment rates in the country under this UCP government. They're a city that has also had a dramatic loss of head offices in their community, has many office towers that are empty, and has really experienced some pretty rough years the last couple of years. The last two, maybe almost three years now have been very rough for the city of Calgary, so they made a very specific request to this government to help them. What happened in return? They got less than 10 per cent of what their request was from this provincial government, who was lucky enough to have a windfall from the international price of oil and wouldn't share that with our largest municipality.

This is the legacy of this government. This government has at every opportunity undermined and disrespected the municipal governments, made their lives more difficult, caused them to have difficulties with their budgets, difficulties with their revenues, and of course they now will have to impose significant increases on their citizens for municipal taxes as a result directly of the choices made by this UCP government. All across this province people are going to experience a worse life as a result of decisions made by this cabinet, as they have in so many other areas.

Thank you very much for my time. Thank you. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 4, and let me say at the beginning that it doesn't matter how many times anyone will ask, I will not be accepting any interventions. I will make my comments to the point and very brief.

While listening to the Minister of Municipal Affairs introduce this third reading, I guess it was rich coming from that side, that they are bringing forward this piece of legislation to have a consistent COVID-19 policy – a consistent COVID-19 policy – coming from a government who was on vacation during Christmas, when they asked Albertans to stay put, coming from a government that was caught dining at the sky palace. Now they come here and bring this piece of legislation, and they want us to believe that somehow it's about a consistent COVID-19 policy.

Earlier in the pandemic, when this government was asked to respond to the threats of COVID-19 by bringing forward a mask mandate province-wide, they said, the Premier said, and I quote, that these decisions are best taken locally. End quote. Now the Minister of Municipal Affairs comes up with this legislation purely for some political reasons and wants us to believe that it has something to do with a consistent COVID-19 policy. I think the Minister of Municipal Affairs . . . [interjection]

The Speaker: Order. The hon. member already said that he wouldn't be taking interventions.

Mr. Williams: Oh. I apologize. I didn't hear that.

The Speaker: If you're not paying attention, you ought to be.

The hon. member.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. What I was saying is that now somehow the government is bringing this piece of legislation and wants us to believe it's about a consistent COVID-19 policy. It is clearly not, as evidenced by this government's position at the beginning of this pandemic, where they thought that these decisions are best taken locally, and now they think that, no, they need consistency in these decisions. I think the government should be ashamed of peddling these double standards in this Legislature and wasting members' time. The minister should be ashamed of that.

They get up and they talk about their platform. They talk about consultation. We didn't see, no municipality was able to see if there was something in their platform that they will be reducing municipal government power. I do understand that municipalities are creatures of statute and that their powers can be increased and reduced, but there was no such commitment made by this government during their election campaign.

They have shown through their actions that they are incapable of working collaboratively with other orders of government. That's what municipal leaders are saying. I'm sure that the Minister of Municipal Affairs and other MLAs and ministers heard that directly from municipal leaders a couple of weeks ago. They told this government that there was no municipality who was bringing forward such laws. At least this is not an issue for now.

They warned this government: don't encroach on municipal jurisdiction unnecessarily and for political needs and reasons. Maybe it may help the Premier survive his leadership review. They told this government that municipalities across this province are against the Alberta provincial police force idea, but still this government is pushing full speed ahead on those things. They do not listen, they do not consult, and they are completely incapable of working collaboratively with other orders of government, and that is deeply concerning.

The Minister of Municipal Affairs mentioned that it's a very narrow bill. It matters less whether a bill is narrow in scope or broad. What's at stake here is that this government is willing to override municipal powers, that this government is willing to walk roughshod over municipal jurisdictions if it suits their political needs. That's the precedent this legislation is setting, that's the trend that we will be voting against, that's the precedent municipalities are against, and we stand with municipalities on this piece of legislation.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Peace River.

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I know we're here late, so I promise not to take my full time. Happy to accept interventions. I really wanted to set the record straight and make it abundantly clear why this legislation, I believe, is appropriate, is consistent.

I think I want to start with some fundamentals here. Municipalities are creatures of this Assembly. They're creatures of the province. They are created by legislation that we pass. That's not trying to be arrogant or dismissive of them; that's just the state of play. That's how things are. Contrarily, the province is not a creature of the federal government. Both the province and the federal government are established in the Constitution, have supremacy over their areas of jurisdiction to pass any law that they see fit, and no past parliament can bind a future parliament when it comes to what we do in this Chamber. That is not true of municipalities.

If the NDP feels otherwise, they're welcome to follow the amending formula of the Constitution, petition the other provinces, get two-thirds of the provinces onside and more than half the population, and change the Constitution to say that municipalities are constitutionally entitled to change the laws that they see fit. I, on the other hand, believe that municipalities are a function and a creature of this Legislature and the province.

Importantly, with that context, it needs to be understood as well that, for example, in my constituency we had a number of disasters and emergencies happen before COVID. Fort Vermilion, for example: we had a state of emergency when the ice jams happened on the Peace River and were wiping out the town. Quite literally, icebergs were wiping out the town. During that time, understandably, they enacted a local state of emergency, and that town was evacuated. We had another crisis before, in High Level, La Crête, Paddle Prairie, with the Chuckegg Creek fire. During that local state of emergency they also evacuated many of these municipalities. Municipalities made these local decisions. That was right.

If my municipalities were evacuating town months after the fire and in the middle of summer, when there was no ice on the Peace River, I'd be concerned. I'd be concerned that they were abusing the ability to set up local states of emergency. This Chamber would have an obligation to say: no, no, no, no; you can't go treating our citizens in that way, because ultimately you answer to your electorate, but your municipality as an entity, as an institution, answers to this body. Now, we have an example here of municipalities that are making decisions that are contrary to the public scientific information provided. We have an example of them abusing, in my mind, the good-natured compliance of the people in these communities, and we as one province get to say: no, no, no, no; you're not allowed to do that; you're not allowed to continue to use that authority in a way that is not in concordance with the facts.

So I think it's absolutely consistent. It's our obligation in this Chamber, and if we were to not pass this law, I think we'd effectively be doing the same thing, setting a very dangerous precedent to say that municipalities can abuse these privileges that they have, granted by this body. It's our obligation as this body to make sure they are not abused and not used in inappropriate ways, because if the folks of Peace River were getting evacuated for an ice jam on a plus-30 day in the middle of August, I'd be concerned. That, ladies and gentlemen, is the equivalent of what I see happen here if we do not as a province move forward and ask municipalities to pay attention to exactly what our chief medical officer is saying and the best public data we have.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday is next.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a privilege to rise this evening to speak to Bill 4, Municipal Government (Face Mask and Proof of COVID-19 Vaccination Bylaws) Amendment Act, 2022. I've appreciated the conversation that I've heard so far on this debate, and I will let you know that at this time I won't be accepting any interjections. Thank you.

Just a few points I want to make here. I think the one that has resonated most with me, not only from what we've heard in the debate this evening and before that but also from municipalities and Albertans alike: the fact that as we've gone through this process of trying to deal with COVID, the provincial response has been nothing less than a mess, is probably the best way I could put that, Mr. Speaker.

The fact is that, again, we heard last year the Premier abdicating responsibility for making these decisions, leaving them with municipalities, saying, quote: these decisions are best taken locally. Again, as we've heard, the Premier has done a complete one-eighty on this issue, just like many other issues that he and his caucus have had to deal with, and I would say that that is, again, one of the reasons why he is the least trusted politician in the country. Heck, Mr. Speaker, he might even be one of the least trusted politicians in his own caucus.

The fact is that when we look at what we see in this legislation and look at the initial responses, as we've heard, municipalities in the beginning of this process were asking for the province to take action. The Premier said, "Absolutely will not; it's up to you." At that time the municipalities said, “If you are expecting us to make these important health decisions, then you need to give us the data.” Unfortunately, to this day, Mr. Speaker, those calls for experts to come forward from the province to present to municipalities have by and large gone unheard. They continue to ask for those experts to come forward to them as they try to make these decisions even in the face of this government trying to take those powers away from them through Bill 4.

I would argue that this legislation before us is a mechanism for this government in the future to not have to take any action, just like we saw in the beginning of the pandemic, because today, with the presentation of this legislation, they will say that municipalities don’t have the right to make these decisions as narrow as or as broad as the minister might like to argue. But the fact is that tomorrow, if we find ourselves in another wave and municipalities have to make these considerations, the provincial government is going to say, “Oh, we aren’t taking any action; you have this power now,” but they are now going to have to go through more regulatory red tape to actually make those decisions. Again, it’s an abdication of responsibility from this province, because they will say: “Oh, well, your municipality has to make these decisions. We’re not making them for you.” Yet here we are with Bill 4, and they’re exactly saying that.

Mr. Speaker, really, on both hands it’s quite hypocritical. The fact is that Bill 4 is putting barriers in place for municipalities regarding the decision to make health measures, and it truly is about the Premier trying to hold any semblance of power. It is the only way that this Premier sees a path to holding on to power within his caucus, a group of people who are increasingly believing that he is doing not such a good job, and I would agree with them for different reasons, potentially regarding COVID-19. But the fact remains that we, all Albertans expected much better from this Premier and from this UCP government through the COVID-19 pandemic, and unfortunately we, again through Bill 4, have not had that.

With that being said, Mr. Speaker, I will take my seat, but I appreciate the opportunity to hear this. I also appreciate the many municipal partners who have come forward to raise their concerns regarding Bill 4, to raise their concerns regarding the absolute failure of this UCP government to take action from the beginning to put supports in place when they made decisions around vaccine passports and the enforcement of those, because by and large Alberta municipalities were left without supports in the first place to make those important decisions, and unfortunately that meant consequences for the health and well-being of many Albertans.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call on the minister to close debate.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that. I will try to correct some of the mass of misinformation that came from the other side. A lot of things have happened. What people need to remember is that COVID started two years and about three weeks ago, so 18 months ago we had about six months of experience. Everybody in the world didn’t know what was going on because the virus was so new. It was changing. No one in the world really knew, and we were all doing our best.

The difference between 18 months ago and now is that we actually have four times as much experience with COVID, and during that 18 months, apparently, the other side hasn’t learned a blessed thing, but on this side of the House we were paying attention, which is why we made a different decision now with four times the experience than the decision that we made 18 months ago. That would make sense to most Albertans, I think. I think Albertans expect their people that are in this place to learn. On this side of the House we did learn, Mr. Speaker. We gained more evidence, more experience, more knowledge about what would happen, yet at the end of the day we still don’t know a hundred per cent for sure what the virus will do next, but with four times the experience one should not be surprised that a responsible government would have learned something and changed perhaps some of their decisions with new information.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that some of the debate from the other side was hilarious. The first member that spoke talked about how it was about power and it was about: this shouldn’t be changing things for municipalities. But then in the same debate the same member said: why didn’t you make other municipalities do different things differently? So I guess it really wasn’t about whether there were rules about municipalities. It was about whether the other side – the other side apparently wanted to tell municipalities what to do, unlike us.

In fact, what’s clear here is that Edmonton kind of forced us to defend our own legislative territory, our turf, if you will. Again, this is a stay-in-your-lane bill. The fact is that members of Edmonton’s council went public saying that they were going to go against the provincial health rules in an area of provincial, clear jurisdiction. In fact . . . [interjection] I know they don’t want to hear the facts over there, but I’m going to carry on. Mr. Speaker, in fact, even after we introduced this legislation, the city of Edmonton actually brought a motion to their council meeting to override our legislation. Now, it was defeated; nonetheless, five members of that council voted for it.

So the argument that there was no reason to bring this forward just doesn’t hold water, because history does not support that argument. [interjections] The city council in this town brought forward a piece of business to override the proper health jurisdiction of the province, and, Mr. Speaker, we defended our jurisdiction. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. It’s after 11 o’clock. I think we can allow the minister to conclude his remarks in closing debate in some sense of order.

The hon. member.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Maybe some of the folks will notice that I was quiet when they were speaking despite how much I disagreed with what they said.

Mr. Speaker, here it is. The province is doing the right thing defending our proper area of jurisdiction. Really, the city of Edmonton forced us into it. I’m going to give them the benefit of the doubt and say that those members of Edmonton city council that wanted to override the provincial jurisdiction, in their minds, were doing what they thought was best for their citizens, but really a responsible provincial government can’t let the municipalities try to take over municipal responsibility. That’s just not how it’s done.

We’ve discharged our responsibilities. We did it in the most narrow way possible. The municipalities still have all the authority they had before this bill to protect the health and safety of their citizens, as they ought to have, as our legislation gives them. Really, at the end of the day, nothing has changed unless some municipality wants to override provincial health regulations. [interjections] It’s unfortunate that the member from the other side tries to shout down the truth, but shouting down the truth doesn’t change the truth.

The fact is that all the arguments essentially made on the other side: they know they’re wrong; they made them anyways. What’s really funny is that they all voted for this bill at Committee of the Whole. I don’t know what revelation they had in the last day, but somehow they’ve changed. They can vote whatever way they want.

They ought to vote for this, but on this side of the House we will be, because defending provincial legislation in the area of health is this government's responsibility. This government will discharge its duties and its responsibilities, and part of that will be passing Bill 4.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for third reading carried]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, March 31, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power or desire to please but, laying aside all private interest and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Hon. members, please remain standing as we will be led in the singing of God Save the Queen by Ms Brooklyn Elhard.

Hon. Members:

God save our gracious Queen,
Long live our noble Queen,
God save the Queen!
Send her victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us,
God save the Queen!

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have a number of very special guests with us today. First of all, it's my pleasure to introduce a visiting Member of the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba, seated in the Speaker's gallery, Ms Bernadette Smith, the Member for Point Douglas.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Members, today is a happy day for some and a sad day for others as I have the pleasure of introducing four of eight retiring Legislative Assembly security service members and their families. Hon. members, each of these LASS members have faithfully served this Assembly for many, many years, most of them over a decade, and we're sad to see them go. We're so grateful for the work that they've done to maintain the safety and security of all members, and we certainly will miss their smiling faces as we enter the Chamber, but of course we wish you the best in your retirement. I would ask each of you to rise as I call your names: Lance Dealy, accompanied by daughters Erin Dealy and Kristin Dealy and granddaughter Olivia Dealy; Ken MacInnis; Terry Briscoe; Larry Ahl, accompanied by his wife, Kathy Ahl, son David Ahl, and Becca Kelly.

Also seated in the Speaker's gallery are family of the minister of seniors that I had the pleasure of meeting this morning. Her sister Joanna Leung and a friend, Marek Kotkowski, are joining us in the Speaker's gallery.

So many special guests today. Perhaps my favourite of the Pancholi family and guests of the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud, please welcome her husband, Owen Young, son Bodhi Pancholi-Young, and daughter Leela Pancholi-Young. Please rise and receive a welcome.

I'm pleased to welcome a guest of the Minister of Education, Todd Snow.

And, finally, hon. members, it's my great pleasure to introduce to you a group of 14 teachers from Edmonton area who are guests of the Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

I invite you all to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Teachers

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, take a minute and try to remember grade 1. The first image that comes to my mind is Miss Sproll. She helped us make sense of the symbols we saw on paper and transformed them into words, into stories, and into a love of learning. Thank you to the teachers in the gallery who are here today because they believe in public education. They are here during their spring break to help us remember that no profession impacts all of society's children in the way that teaching does. They make me think of Miss Sproll and the passion for learning that she inspired in me.

Teachers use their expertise and professionalism to support students to become their best selves. Unfortunately, for the last three years this government has chosen to undermine teachers. They attacked their profession when they tore up the agreement to create curriculum together, they cut funding meant to help disabled preschool children prepare for success in grade 1, they attacked their pensions, and now they want to disband their professional association.

I am proud to be the daughter of teachers. I'm proud that I was trained as a math teacher and did a master's in educational policy studies. I'm proud that I served for Edmonton public, and I am proud that that inspiring grade 1 year lives on in the work that I do in this place fighting for every child in Alberta to achieve their full potential.

Mr. Speaker, rather than treating teachers as the enemy, this government should support them in their mission to help kids succeed. The government should show teachers the respect that they so rightfully deserve, and if they won't, the UCP will be held accountable in the next election by teachers and by all Albertans who care about education. Don't believe me? I have a feeling that the Miss Sprolls across Alberta will come together to help create a government that we can all trust and that we can be proud of, one that works with teachers instead of against them and one that gives kids the opportunity to achieve their dreams and that puts Albertans first.

Fuel Prices and Federal Carbon Pricing

Mr. Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is April 1, and while for many Canadians it will be a day for pulling pranks and jokes on your friends, in Alberta it will be a day of tax relief. As people across the country are suffering from the Liberal-NDP affordability crisis, a crisis caused by runaway deficits and money printing, a crisis worsened by more taxes by Ottawa, Alberta's government will be providing a massive tax cut to Alberta families. Starting tomorrow, the 13-cent provincial fuel tax will be eliminated from gas and diesel bills. On an annual basis this means that more than a billion dollars will stay in the pockets of Albertans. This means that life will get a little easier for Alberta parents taking their kids to hockey practice, a little easier for hard-working Albertans commuting to the office or a job site, and life will be a little less expensive for Alberta farmers, who continue to feed our families.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta is the only province that is providing this relief on fuel prices. Unlike the NDP and their coalition partners in the Trudeau government, we do not believe that people should be punished for living normal lives. We believe that activities like work and recreation, which involve using fuel, are critical and necessary to all Canadians. Unfortunately, the members opposite do not share this view. It's why they are on record in this House supporting the NDP-Trudeau carbon tax, on record in this House also supporting a 25 per cent carbon tax hike next month, and also on record supporting more than a 400 per cent increase in the years to come.

Mr. Speaker, Conservatives on this side are working to make life more affordable for Alberta families while the NDP-Trudeau alliance on the other side is trying to stick their hands even deeper into people's pockets at the worst time possible.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Ramadan

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. April marks the beginning of a very special month for Muslims in my constituency and 1.8 billion more across the globe. The first few days of April mark the beginning of Ramadan, a deeply spiritual and holy time for Muslims everywhere. Ramadan begins when the new moon is sighted in the night sky, after which the holy observance begins. Ramadan also marks the anniversary of when the first verses of the Quran were revealed to the Prophet Muhammad, peace be upon Him, over 1,400 years ago.

During Ramadan individuals will fast from sunrise to sunset, abstaining from food and drink and strengthening their devotion to faith and family. Fasting is meant to enable someone to achieve taqwa, or consciousness of God. Every Muslim will break their fast with the iftar, where community members gather with food and drink and reflect upon their faith and their beliefs. Fasting is one of the five pillars of the Muslim religion. The four other pillars are Muslim declaration of faith, daily prayers, charity, and performing the pilgrimage to Mecca. At the end of this month-long observance Muslim communities will gather and celebrate Eid al-Fitr. In Arabic this means: festival of breaking of the fast.

While Muslim communities across the world begin to observe Ramadan, I invite other members of this Assembly to learn about this significant event within the Muslim community. Alberta is a province that is rich in culture and religion and continues to be a shining beacon of hope for anyone who wishes to practise their religion freely without persecution or violence. To all Muslim individuals across Alberta, Canada, and the rest of the globe I say: Ramadan Mubarak, and I hope your Ramadan journey brings you joy and closeness to God.

Thank you.

Transgender Day of Visibility

Member Irwin: Today, March 31, is the International Transgender Day of Visibility, and this year it feels more important than ever that we talk about trans issues, that we celebrate trans folks, and that we elevate trans rights at a time when trans people across the world are facing significant barriers and discrimination. In the U.S. there is rising violence against trans women of colour. There are incredibly dangerous bills being forced through state Legislatures by right-wing politicians that would deny trans folks health care and that would prevent schools from being safe spaces for trans kids and more. Today I'm thinking of all the queer and trans people who are experiencing so much right now. We know that queer and trans Ukrainians are being held at borders, and we send our love to them.

We send our love to those in countries around the world who are still not safe to be who they are and love who they love, in countries where being gay is a crime and where being trans is most certainly a death sentence.

Yet here at home we still have work to do, much work to do. I think about trans health care barriers that I hear about often: long wait-lists; lack of physicians, psychiatrists; discrimination in the health care system; transphobia. I think about proposed legislation like Bill 207 from this government, that would have very much threatened trans health care access, a bill from the not-so-distant past that would've allowed for health professionals to deny essential health care. I think about conversion therapy, a horrific practice that many in the trans community have had to endure. While banned federally and in countless Alberta communities, it's still happening.

I also think about hope and about the incredible trans people I know. I can't imagine just how hard their journeys have been for some to have gotten to a place where they're finally free to live their own true lives yet to still face hate. To every trans person: know that you are loved, you are seen. To trans kids: I know it's hard. It might feel harder than it's ever been. You're not alone. You're loved. Don't let your light be dimmed by those who can't see how bright you shine. To all of you: trans rights . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Teacher Discipline Process

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to share the story of Todd Snow, a parent from the constituency of Taber-Warner who is with us today. Since the Minister of Education announced in December that she intends to bring legislation to this House to alter the discipline process for the teaching profession, many Albertans like Todd have expressed concerns about the way teacher discipline is handled in Alberta.

I'm sad to say that Todd has shared the struggle of his family's experience in getting a professional conduct hearing for a case involving his daughter. Mr. Speaker, it took the ATA five years to hold this hearing. Unfortunately, this is not the only instance of its kind. As more cases started coming to the surface, it became clear that more needed to be done. Todd has questioned how a union-slash-professional association could fairly adjudicate professional conduct hearings for their own teachers and remain unbiased, the same teachers that pay union dues to protect their interests.

Mr. Speaker, as a former teacher I understood that Albertans outside of the teaching profession could struggle with this disciplinary structure. There are times when a problem has no clear answer and when the question at hand is riddled with grey areas. A perceived conflict of interest within the disciplinary process should not contribute to a lack of clarity or create questions regarding the legitimacy of any ruling. Alberta needs a process in place that sets aside what could be a conflict of interest and puts student safety first and addresses the needs of those who have been the potential victim of teacher misconduct.

The students first act has been brought forward to address the inconsistencies and gaps in the teacher discipline process, and I'm proud of this government for taking a stand to do what is in the best interest of students. I applaud the Minister of Education for her promise to continue the difficult but necessary work to protect our students, and I look forward to seeing what comes next.

Ramadan

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, Albertans of Islamic faith will start observing Ramadan this weekend. It's my honour to rise today to recognize Ramadan and wish everyone observing it a peaceful and blessed Ramadan.

Ramadan is observed by the Muslim umma world-wide, and the act of fasting during this month is one of the five fundamental pillars of Islamic faith. It's a special time for deep prayers and for strengthening bonds with the Creator and His creation. The act of fasting is also an exercise in self-restraint and self-reflection. It involves abstaining from eating or drinking anything from dawn to dusk. It puts a special significance to reflect and act on the plight of those who are less fortunate among us, who are sick and elderly, and those who are struggling to make ends meet. The last two years have been very difficult for everyone and have disrupted many of these activities. I'm pleased that this year the community will be able to come together for prayers, visit friends and neighbours, and be able to observe Ramadan in its true spirit.

Mr. Speaker, Ramadan is also an opportunity for all Albertans to learn about Muslim faith and, broadly, about the diversity of faith, cultures, and traditions in our province. As of late we have witnessed a rise in Islamophobia and attacks on hijab-wearing Muslim women. We have witnessed an increase in incidents of racism and prejudice, and we have witnessed a rise in intolerance and hatred against Albertans with visible articles of faith. It is more important than ever before that we come together as a province to push back against intolerance, hatred, and discrimination in all its forms. It's more important than ever before that we come together as a province to build a society that understands, respects, and embraces its diversity.

To all those observing Ramadan: Ramadan Mubarak.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie is next.

Scarboro Community in Calgary-Currie

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to talk about the wonderful constituency of Calgary-Currie and, specifically, the community of Scarboro. To those familiar with Calgary, you may think you already know Scarboro; however, there is much more to it than most people realize. Scarboro is one of only three suburbs in all of Canada that exemplify an Olmsted design. What does that mean, you ask? Good question. It means it is associated with one of the most celebrated landscape architects in North American history, Mr. Frederick Olmsted. Olmsted used his distinct design to challenge the ideas of the mid-1800s, which he considered "a display of novelty, of fashion, of scientific or virtuosic inclinations and of decoration." This quote comments on the trends of the time of developing landscapes without consideration for local environment.

His response was to develop his own style, called pastoral, which emphasizes protecting and enhancing natural scenery while promoting social engagement and community. Key to this is the effective organization of space. Olmsted worked to create the perspective effect, which increases "the sense of space [by] contrasting dark [forms in the foreground] with lighter, less distinct ones further away." The culmination of these concepts first came to fruition in 1857 with Olmsted's first project, which was the design of Central Park in New York City.

Frederick Olmsted's nephew and adopted son John Olmsted would continue to spread the pastoral style. The community of Scarboro was designed by John in 1909, incorporating these bold, new ideas. Anyone who visits Scarboro can see for themselves the unity of these Olmsted principles. In fact, this year marks the 200th anniversary of the birth of Frederick Olmsted, and Scarboro is a unique part of that wonderful legacy and history.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has question 1.

Insurance Company Profits and Premium Costs

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are struggling as their car insurance bills keep going up and up and up. This Premier took the cap off their premiums, and now insurance companies are cashing in. The last report from the Alberta superintendent of insurance found that companies brought in $1 billion more in premiums than they paid out in claims. Now, that was 2019, the last report, because the UCP chose not to release the data for 2020 or 2021. Why won't the UCP at least tell us how much big insurance companies are profiting off regular Alberta families? What are they hiding?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I find this pretty rich coming from a member and from a party across the aisle who ultimately refused to oppose the carbon tax increase that will be implemented on all Albertans effective tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker, what I can say is that the changes we made in Bill 41 are in fact reducing the systemic costs driving up automobile insurance premiums, and those premiums are beginning to come down.

Ms Hoffman: If the government is really proud of what they've done, why won't they actually release the report and let the data speak for itself? Mr. Speaker, this report has been published every year to ensure full disclosure of transparency for the people of Alberta for 107 years. One year under the UCP and it's in the ditch. They want to hide the fact that auto insurance companies are making out like bandits; massive premium increases after the UCP caved to their lobbyist friends. Why is the UCP hiding the truth about how much car insurance companies are profiting off the people of Alberta? [some applause]

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board is the only one with the call.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We're not hiding a thing. Our department is publishing all of the details of that report online. Here's the fact. There has not been a request for that report for over two years. This is simply a matter of streamlining and ensuring that Albertans continue to have access to all the information.

The member talks about insurance premiums. Mr. Speaker, again, we took real action, action that members opposite were not courageous enough to take. Insurance premiums are not going up; they're coming down.

Ms Hoffman: Nobody believes that, Mr. Speaker. If the minister is so proud of that, why doesn't he actually present the data in this House? What is he hiding? The uncomfortable truth is that the Premier is a shill for his big buddies in the insurance industry. His former staffer Nick Koolsbergen lobbied this government to take the cap off, and now they want to keep Albertans in the dark about how much they're profiteering. Saskatchewan, Manitoba, B.C., and Quebec: they all offered rebates and cut premiums during COVID. Why is the UCP letting large profitable corporations pile more costs onto Alberta families?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, all of the data in the report is available online, and we encourage every Albertan to pursue that and find it. It is all available.

Mr. Speaker, again, the members opposite simply put a rate cap in as insurance prices started to go up. Insurance premiums were going up by 5 per cent plus per year under the members opposite. We dealt with the systemic issues driving up those costs. Not only have rates flattened; they're starting to come down. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Fuel Prices

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow Albertans expect the price at the pump to drop 13 cents and stay down. Not the fuel tax; the price. The problem is that this UCP government failed to put in place any guarantee that the tax reduction would reach drivers. Yesterday the Premier said that he would be, quote, watching like a hawk but refused to commit to an audit. Watching isn't an action. What exactly, if anything, is the Premier actually doing to make sure these savings reach Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board has risen.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We've certainly been in touch with retailers, and they have every intention to drop the price. We have a very competitive environment, a competitive environment that will ultimately result in all of the tax savings being passed to consumers, and we will be watching on the ground to ensure that that happens. When the members implemented a carbon tax in this province, that raised the cost on every Albertan, I know one thing: the retail price went up for every Albertan at every pump.

Ms Ganley: Oh, good, Mr. Speaker. "Trust us."

As usual, that answer was heavy on rhetoric but light on solutions. Albertans can't trust this UCP government. They promised a natural gas rebate, and it turned out to be fake. They promised an electricity rebate, and it turned out to be $50, an amount even their UCP members call paltry. Now they're promising money back at the pumps, but they can't provide any sort of guarantee. One more time: can the Premier tell us how he will make sure that that money gets to Alberta families?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We're providing real relief to Alberta families and businesses with the natural gas rebate should prices go high, with an electricity rebate for every Alberta electricity consumer, and by suspending the fuel tax for every consumer in Alberta, unlike the members opposite, who implemented a carbon tax, jacked up the cost of fuel utilities and the cost of just about everything in this province.

Ms Ganley: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's no wonder no one trusts the UCP to make life more affordable. Yesterday I called on the government to commit to an independent, third-party audit to find out if these savings are actually passed along to Albertans. This is a thoroughly reasonable idea. Did the government's plan work in the way they said it would? Did the money they promised Albertans actually reach Albertans? Albertans deserve an answer. Will the Premier commit to a third-party audit of his gas tax program? Yes or no?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, we're going to be watching to ensure that retailers pass on this tax saving to consumers. We're very confident that they will.

But I want to ask the members opposite: why did they vote against the government motion asking the federal government to suspend raising the carbon tax, a tax that pushes up the costs for every Albertan? Why did they not support the motion?

An Hon. Member: Hypocrites.

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order. No one in this Assembly is a hypocrite.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Health Sciences Association Contract Negotiations

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, global energy prices are soaring, and this means a windfall revenue for the provincial government. We've all heard about the massive pay increases executives at AIMCo are getting, and the Minister of Finance has approved pay increases for public servants across the government of Alberta. But at the same time this minister is proposing deep pay cuts to front-line health care workers, as deep as 11 per cent in some cases. If there's money available for raises, why is the minister seeking to cut the pay of critical health care workers?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Firstly, there's a bargaining process going on between the Health Sciences Association of Alberta and Alberta Health Services. I'm confident that the two will bargain in good faith and will ultimately realize an agreement that's mutually beneficial, an agreement similar to the agreement with the United Nurses of Alberta, similar to the agreement with the Alberta public service.

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, there's a crisis in Alberta health care. On top of the UCP's ongoing war with doctors, this minister is attacking an entire care team that Albertans rely on when they're sick or injured or struggling with a chronic condition. There are 19 Alberta communities with partial hospital closures today because they don't have enough staff to operate safely, and many of the job categories that they are seeking to cut pay in have increasing vacancy rates. Why is the minister chasing health care professionals out of Alberta with these brutal cuts to their pay?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. There are no cuts to pay. Again, we settled on a very good agreement with the United Nurses of Alberta. We've settled on a very good agreement with the Alberta public service. I have every confidence that both AHS and HSAA will settle on a good agreement for both parties. In terms of picking a fight, we're not picking a fight with anybody. I have great respect and appreciation for health care workers, that have delivered so admirably and professionally and sacrificially to Albertans in the last six months.

Ms Gray: The minister is showing his respect and admiration by seeking rollbacks as high as 11 per cent for respiratory therapists, lab technicians, occupational therapists, pharmacy technicians, speech-language pathologists, social workers, Mr. Speaker. All of these Albertans have spent their career helping their neighbours in our province. Many have worked at the bedside throughout the pandemic or were deployed to testing facilities. They've put themselves in harm's way. Will the minister commit to abandoning his plan to cut these Albertans' wages, or will they prove yet again that Albertans cannot trust this UCP government?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, it never ceases to amaze me how the members opposite simply generate unfounded fear amongst Albertans and amongst Alberta health care workers. Again, there's a bargaining process in place. AHS, HSAA are working collectively. I have great faith that they will bargain in good faith and ultimately resolve the issue and agree on a collective bargaining agreement that's mutually beneficial.

Workplace Conduct of Ministers and Staff

Member Irwin: On November 3 this Premier announced that Edmonton's Integrity Commissioner, Jamie Pytel, had been retained to conduct a review of HR policies for government staff following serious allegations of misconduct. These allegations led to the resignation of a cabinet minister. It's now been over 140 days since this announcement was made, so a simple question to the Minister of Finance, the person responsible for the public service: has Ms Pytel delivered her report to the government?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women and chief government whip.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The report by Ms Pytel will be brought to the government when she's completed it. It will be soon, I understand, and when it is brought forward, the recommendations will be made public. We've said this many times.

Member Irwin: Almost five months have passed since these allegations came to light after a former staff member raised serious allegations of harassment. Is the Minister of Finance aware of any preliminary findings or recommendations from Ms Pytel, or has he provided any interim direction to cabinet ministers or to staff about appropriate workplace conduct? Has anything changed in the last five months?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I've previously said, the report will be, I'm sure, brought to the government soon, to the Premier's office, and the recommendations will be made public at that time. The report is in the hands of Ms Pytel, and it will be brought forward when she's completed it.

Member Irwin: Every Albertan has a right to a safe workplace, including here in this Legislature, and anyone reporting harassment should be confident that their employer takes these matters seriously, holds people accountable for their actions, and holds the organization as a whole accountable for its workplace culture. Will the Minister of Finance commit to releasing the Pytel report in its entirety, redacted only where necessary to protect the privacy of those reporting harassment?

Ms Issik: As I previously mentioned, the report, when completed, will be presented to the Premier's office. As we've said from the beginning, the recommendations will be made public. I can tell you that sexual harassment is not acceptable in any workplace anywhere in Alberta, period, full stop, end of sentence. I can tell you that as the chief government whip I have put a program in place for our caucus staff called moments matter, that was brought forward by the Alberta sexual assault centres. We're working that program, and I'm pleased with the progress on it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon has a question to ask.

Federal Climate Plan

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The federal government announced an insane and unrealistic climate plan bent on destroying Alberta's economy. It's ironic, considering that the day before the federal government announced at the International Energy Agency that Canada would be increasing oil production. Albertans are sick of these hypocritical government announcements, especially considering that the Constitution says that natural resources belong to Albertans and in this House, not the Liberal-NDP coalition. To the Minister of Environment and Parks: what is your response to the federal government's insane climate plan and attack on Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. I did meet with the federal minister of environment earlier today, and I made clear to him that the federal plan is insane and impossible and that this province will not be co-operating in any way with the federal government in any attempt to stop us from being able to produce our own resources, and I made very clear that this government will use every tool available to us to fight the federal government's attack on our largest industry and on this province. But, sadly, we still continue to see the Official Opposition, even as early as last night, voting with the federal Liberals to destroy our largest industry. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that some Canadians are already paying over $2 per litre to fill up and that seniors are struggling to heat their homes and pay their bills and given that the reduction cap that Trudeau's insane climate plan wants to force down Albertans' throats will do nothing but destroy Albertan livelihoods and make life more unaffordable across this country, to the Minister of Environment and Parks: can you tell this House and all Albertans about your meeting with Steven Guilbeault and the message you delivered to him on behalf of Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Environment and Parks and Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, I delivered a clear message to the minister today that his plan was impossible, insane, and absolutely unacceptable for this province. Let me be very clear. Alberta will not be working with the federal government on this emissions plan. We will continue with our plan, which is working, which is creating jobs and saving Albertans money while meeting our environmental obligations. It's important not just for Albertans to know but for all Canadians to know that the federal Liberal-NDP climate plan is going to raise the cost of everything inside our society, and this province is never ever going to accept that.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the federal government's plan is out of touch and nonsensical and given that the Liberal-NDP coalition is grasping at straws to show the world that they are woke and supportive of cancelling out our oil and gas sector, which is outright comical and highly irresponsible, and further given that this Trudeau-Notley plan will make life harder and more unaffordable for Albertans, to the Minister of Energy: can you tell this House and all Albertans what a production cap would actually mean for Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon has been in this Assembly quite a while, and he knows that the use of any proper name in the Assembly is unparliamentary.

The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. They try to call it an emissions cap out of Ottawa, but we know that they intend it to be a production cap to phase out our oil and gas industry. A production cap will mean the loss of billions of dollars of revenue in this province. It'll mean the loss of tens of thousands of jobs. It'll make suffering for every single family, every single Albertan, and every single Canadian. It is insane that the federal government is trying to block the development of our resources when the rest of the world is trying to get more of our resources. We'll fight every step of the way to make sure they . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

COVID-19 Information Updates

Mr. Sabir: Yesterday the Health minister announced that signs of increasing transmission had been seen in Calgary and Edmonton. He also stated that the average positivity rate had increased from last week to 24.5 per cent. He also announced the tragic news of 30 Albertans who lost their lives to COVID-19 last week. I know that many Albertans are concerned at the prospect of rising transmission. Does the Minister of Health think that it is time to consider increasing the number of COVID-19 updates to ensure that Albertans have all the information they need?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I know that the Minister of Health and the chief medical officer of health and all of her officials are closely monitoring the increases. That being said, we also are seeing that the BA.2 variant, while it is more transmissible, is not actually causing an increase in the hospitalization rates or ICU rates. In fact, those continue to decline.

Mr. Sabir: Given that last summer Albertans were blindsided when this government announced they were shutting down testing and tracing weeks before the fourth wave hammered Alberta, costing hundreds of lives and nearly collapsing our health care system, and given that since then Albertans simply can't trust the UCP, will the minister commit to, at the very least, going back to the twice-a-week update to assure Albertans that the government is not asleep at the wheel, like they were last summer?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education has risen.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We will commit to continuing to follow it closely, follow the numbers closely, follow the infection rates closely. The chief medical officer of health and her officials will continue to do the work that they need to do. I am happy that our government is continuing to make a priority the rapid tests available. To date there are 13.8 million tests that have been distributed to pharmacies. That number continues to rise, and please make available use of all of that for anyone who wants to.

Mr. Sabir: Given that providing information to Albertans on a disease that is, tragically, taking four lives a day should not be onerous or partisan and given that, again, with the false promise of the best summer ever, this government should go above and beyond when it comes to transparency and accountability to Albertans, will the minister commit to bringing an official from the office of the chief medical officer of health to each briefing to provide a nonpartisan description of the situation?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. While the members opposite want to continue to live in a COVID world, we're continuing to move forward based on the evidence, with the support of the vast majority of Albertans and other Canadians and in line with the view of the Council of Chief Medical Officers of Health of Canada. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Member LaGrange: As I was saying, the chief medical officer of Canada as well as the chief medical officer of Alberta and her officials continue to provide us valuable input that we will continue to follow.

United Conservative Party Membership Recruitment

Mr. Dach: Recently Albertans heard disturbing allegations that reflect on the conduct of the UCP leadership review and how that ultimately might affect government policy, allegations that campaign teams have been accessing or trying to access the personal identification of Albertans working in trucking companies to attach to membership forms, potentially to be used to create fake memberships or even potentially to cast fake votes in the contest that will determine who is the Premier of Alberta. Will the Minister of Transportation or anybody else on that side who actually ascribes to democracy join with me in clearly condemning this practice and commit to taking action if these allegations are proven?

The Speaker: I provide a very wide swath with respect to questions about government policy or not. It's my hope that in the supplements the member will make an attempt to make the question about government policy. If the Government House Leader chooses to respond, he's welcome to do so. If not, we'll move to question 2.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, I will do so, Mr. Speaker. Clearly, the member has jumped the shark, if you will, wanting to talk about the violation of privacy when his own ethics critic, the Member for Edmonton-South, has violated the Premier's privacy and tried to violate many members of this House's privacy. What did that member know about what that ethics critic was up to?

Mr. Dang: Point of order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Has there been a search warrant served on his house as well? What other things did the NDP know about the violation of the privacy of members of this Assembly? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. A point of order is called at 2:12.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Clearly, this is about government policy and the use of government identity.

Given that the RCMP is already investigating the last UCP leadership race for identity fraud and even questioned the Premier last month in regard to this investigation and given that media reports show that there were votes cast in that contest by people who do not even remember voting and given this recent allegation that trucking companies might have been approached by campaigns to get access to personal information using government ID that was scanned, can the Minister of Transportation tell me exactly what protections are in place to protect truck drivers and other Albertans from this type of unethical campaigning and unprofessional use of government documents?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, what is unethical is continuing the tactics, that you see from the NDP, of fear and smear, their party continuing to make things up about people. It is absolutely outrageous. It's all the NDP have, and I expect you'll continue to see it as their poll numbers continue to drop. But the reality is that that member has no business standing in this place asking about privacy violations or RCMP investigations when a member of their own caucus has had a search warrant served on their place, on their house. What did that member know about those privacy breaches, and did he support hacking the Premier? Yes or no?

Mr. Dach: Given, Mr. Speaker, that I've got every right to ask about fraudulent use of government documentation, given that over $200,000 in fines were issued by the Election Commissioner around this UCP leadership race, given that with the passage of Bill 81 anyone in this room could be a member of the UCP without even knowing it, and given the concern around the possibility that personal ID may have been accessed by trucking companies, will the Minister of Transportation commit to introducing legislation to ensure that there are severe consequences to this type of unethical and immoral campaigning? And I have every right to ask that question.

The Speaker: I think that the Speaker gets to determine what's in order and out of order, not the hon. member.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, again, these issues have been addressed already by Elections Alberta, who found that what the NDP is saying is completely and utterly false. What is more outrageous, though, is for that member, again, to rise in this Assembly and talk about privacy breaches when he is a member of a caucus who has been confirmed by the caucus to be under investigation for violating the privacy of members of this very Chamber, who has admitted in their own documents that they're under investigation for that. Yet, again: did that member know about the hacking? Yes or no?

Federal Equalization Program

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, it has now been 164 days since Albertans voted 61.7 per cent in favour of removing equalization from the Constitution. Nothing has changed. The government has taken no action to press Ottawa. Given that this Premier appointed himself as intergovernmental affairs minister and given that he failed to take any action to respect the democratically expressed wishes of Albertans, my question for Alberta's do-nothing minister of intergovernmental affairs is this: after nearly six months of inaction, why should Albertans believe that you will ever stand up for us?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this government is standing up for Albertans, unlike that member, who's put himself in a corner, unable to even stand up for his constituents, which is disappointing for the people of Medicine Hat. This government continues to lead the way in economic recovery inside this country, bringing forward some of the best years that we've seen in all of our industries, restoring the jobs that were lost underneath the NDP, and yet again today standing up to the federal government for their ridiculous climate policies. That's a sharp contrast to that member, who is getting nothing done for the people of Medicine Hat inside this Chamber. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that following the equalization referendum the members of this Assembly approved Motion 101, officially recognizing the results of the referendum and directing the government of Alberta to take action, and given that the government has now failed to comply with this call for action for 149 days and given that the people of Alberta have done their part and given that the members of this Assembly have done their part, my question for Alberta's do-nothing minister of intergovernmental affairs is this: when will you take real action for Alberta families?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board has risen.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We're certainly moving forward on the issue of equalization because there's unfairness that needs to be dealt with there, but we're taking action on a number of other items as well, items around positioning this economy for disproportionate investment attraction and growth, balancing the budget. I would ask, through you to the member opposite for Cypress-Medicine Hat: where was he when we approved the first balanced budget in eight years?

Mr. Barnes: Given that when the Premier announced the equalization referendum, in July 2021, he stated that it would, and I quote, elevate Alberta's fight for fairness to the top of the national agenda, that in a sense it takes a page out of Quebec's playbook and given that, whether it is protecting its seats in the House of Commons or bypassing religious freedoms in the Constitution, Quebec never seems to have any problem getting its issues addressed, again to the Premier: are you now willing to admit that your promise – your promise – to push equalization to the top of the national agenda has been another complete failure?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, you want to talk about complete failures? I was just down in Medicine Hat the other day, and every constituent I spoke to expressed their complete disappointment in the inability of their member of the Legislature to represent them. Today, as we speak, down in Medicine Hat significant announcements are taking place around HALO and emergency services, just one example of the success of this government, while that member has a temper tantrum and plays junior high politics and hides himself in the corner. He can't even be bothered to support a balanced budget. Shame on him. [interjections]

An Hon. Member: You are going to lose. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order. I want to caution all members when using personal attacks or insults inside the Assembly.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Marked Fuel Prices

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. For generations Albertans have had marked fuel for agriculture vehicles, which is priced 9 cents lower than regular. This is intended to be a comparative advantage for the industry. The UCP's plan takes 13 cents off unmarked fuel but only 4 cents off marked fuel . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader will come to order.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: . . . making the prices equal. There is no longer a comparative advantage. Four cents is a drop in the bucket when compared to the rising costs facing farmers and ranchers. Why is this government not implementing another strategy to help them out with the high cost of fuel during this time of financial stress?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We're suspending the fuel tax right now to zero – to zero – and that will provide relief for every Albertan, provide relief for every Alberta rancher and farmer. Again I would ask the members opposite: they're so concerned about affordability all of a sudden, yet they failed to support the motion, that we had in front of the House yesterday, calling on the federal government to pause the increase in the carbon tax, a cost that will affect every Albertan, every Alberta farmer.

Ms Sweet: Well, given the fact that there's no longer a competitive advantage for farmers and given that there are costs to having marked fuels such as transportation to the farm and the maintenance of dye and given that all these pressures and rising costs farmers are facing are an increase, including the price of feed and fertilizer, and given that a mere 4-cent fuel reduction, especially when everyone else is getting 13 cents, lacked insight and didn't solve the problem, to the minister: with all the pressures farmers are facing, why isn't the government doing more to protect the industry's comparative advantage on fuel?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really appreciate the member opposite's concern for agriculture because members on this side of the House believe in a great future for the agriculture industry in this province, a great future for the great farmers and ranchers out there, that provide every day for this province. That's one reason why we are eliminating the fuel tax for farmers and ranchers and every Albertan. Again I ask the members opposite: why do they not support us in calling on the federal government to halt the increase in the carbon tax?

Ms Sweet: Well, given that regular price and dyed fuel is now the same price and given that the UCP is driving up Albertans' electricity, gas bills, school fees, auto insurance, property taxes, tuition, and interest on student loans and given that Albertans in agriculture may already be paying these fees as well as the extra costs specific to the sector and given that the UCP also decided to tack on an extra 10 per cent increase to premiums for livestock and crop insurance, how can the minister seriously justify forcing this increase in premiums while so many other costs are also spiking?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. What we hear so often from the members opposite is the gospel of envy, the gospel of socialism. What I can say is that farmers and ranchers will not begrudge other Albertans who receive 13 cents of relief on every litre of fuel they purchase.

Child and Youth Advocate Recommendation

Ms Pancholi: Mr. Speaker, in this week's mandatory child death review report, which outlines the circumstances that led to the death of 18 children in this government's care in the last six months, the Child and Youth Advocate repeatedly pointed to the lack of collaboration between government ministries. The report is full of stories of overwhelmed family members and caregivers who weren't able to access supports. The advocate recommends that the ministries of Health, Education, and Community and Social Services develop a process to ensure co-ordinated service delivery. Will the UCP listen to the advocate and accept this recommendation?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I said yesterday, the death of any child in care who has received services through the child intervention system is a tragedy. We do work very closely not only to review each and every case but also to work with the office of the Child and Youth Advocate and to discuss things that we're seeing and the recommendations that are being made. I can assure you that we're also not waiting to take action. Much of this is because of the collaboration between ministries like mine, mental health and addictions, Health, Education, and Community and Social Services, and there's more to come.

Ms Pancholi: Given that staffing shortages and turnover were noted specifically in cases of some of the young people in this report, like Joseph, who had a specialized liaison caseworker redeployed, and given that this minister has shown that she doesn't understand the critical importance of consistent support workers in these young people's lives – it can mean life or death for them – as she removed these supports for youth transitioning out of care when she cut SFAA supports two years ago and given that staffing problems start and end with the Minister of Children's Services and there are no new front-line staff for child intervention, how does the minister plan to improve support to children in care with no new staff?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This is something that we watch very closely. Staffing concerns are not unique to this ministry. We have been working over the past number of years not only for recruitment and retention strategies specifically in rural, remote, and northern communities, where we do see some greater staff turnover; however, we have also worked to redirect ministry FTEs towards the front lines so that we have those support services in place. Many of our services are also offered by community organizations, who work very hard to keep kids safe and supported.

Ms Pancholi: Given that the Albertans addressed in this report were 12 to 19 years old – five died from drug poisoning, three died by suicide, three were victims of homicide, three young people died from medical causes, and one died in a motor vehicle accident – and given that the advocate said that his call to require ministries to provide regular public updates on how they've addressed past recommendations is more important now than ever, rather than making Albertans wait another 75 days for a response, I'm asking the minister for a straightforward response right now, yes or no: will the minister accept the advocate's recommendation to have ministries report on their work to a committee of the Legislature?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Now, the process that we go through to report on our progress was actually set up fairly recently, after the all-party panel on child intervention, which was overseen by the members opposite. It is transparent, there is accountability, and in fact we will not wait 75 days to act. We, in the coming days and weeks, do expect reports from the ministry not based on speculation from the members opposite but based on what we actually saw in each and any one of these cases, and changes will absolutely be made. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order.
The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Inflation

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The statistics on inflation in Canada and in Alberta show that the cost has gone up for food, shelter, and gas. Although our inflation rate of 5.1 per cent is less than the national average, the last time similar figures were recorded was in October 2007. Albertans continue to grapple with the challenges of inflation caused largely by poor fiscal policy from Ottawa's Liberal government. To the minister: how is the ministry reducing the impacts of inflation on Alberta households and businesses?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance has risen.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We certainly are in a time of inflation, brought on by a number of issues, including, I would suggest, irresponsible fiscal management by the federal government. We are bringing real relief to Albertans. We are offering every electricity consumer a $150 rebate on this spring's electricity bill. We're also suspending the fuel tax, which will save all Albertans 13 cents a litre at the pumps.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, Minister. Given that the cost of energy is often controlled by international demands – increased energy costs are also exacerbated by the federal government's carbon tax – and given that the inflation and supply chain issues are likely to affect gas and commodities in Alberta, the UCP government's balanced budget has put in place measures to address some of these problems. What is the minister doing to ensure that the supply chain, the very system that affects the pricing of goods and services in Alberta, is addressed?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, irresponsible federal fiscal policy is ultimately assisting in driving this high inflation. I believe the best response from government during times of inflation is to spend less, borrow less, and tax less, and that's why we are providing relief at the pumps in suspending the fuel tax for every Albertan. That will save our heavy transport truck drivers $190 on a tank of fuel. That will provide relief on the supply chain for every Alberta grocery store and for all Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, Minister. Given that the federal government plans to increase the carbon tax and the fact that this will have severe economic consequences for Albertans and given that Alberta's economy is already dealing with high inflation rates, which might be worsened by the hike in federal tax, to the minister: what relief measures are being taken to ensure that the burden of Ottawa's carbon tax doesn't affect the competitiveness of Alberta's economy?

Mr. Toews: Well, Mr. Speaker, again, I've identified the various consumer relief measures that we're implementing, but on top of that we're calling on the federal government to not increase the carbon tax effective tomorrow, a tax that will increase the costs on all Albertans, all Alberta families, every Alberta business. And we're calling on the opposition to support us in our motion asking the federal government to suspend the increase in the carbon tax because the whole concept of the carbon tax is to increase costs for Albertans and for consumers. I call on the opposition to support us.

Technology Industry Development and Tax Credits

Ms Goehring: The Alberta tech sector has been reaching out to this government in any way possible to highlight the need to bring back Alberta's interactive digital media tax credit, and it was clear that this government turned a blind eye. Budget 2022 was a chance to listen to industry leaders and restore the faith of investors that took advantage of the digital media tax credit before it was cancelled but are now looking at other jurisdictions. Can the minister explain why he's passing up on this surefire job-creation tactic? Is it ideology, or is it that this sector cannot trust this government?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The tech sector is going to be an important sector in Alberta; in fact, is an important sector today. We're doing all we can to position it for investment attraction and growth. That's why we introduced the innovation employment grant, a grant that ultimately rewards incremental research and development activity by every Canadian small business. That's why we have, again, recapitalized Alberta Enterprise Corporation. That's why this budget devotes $600 million for skills, talent, and jobs, ensuring that every Albertan has the opportunity to get the skills and talent needed to participate in the tech sector.

Ms Goehring: Given that the Premier calls the digital media tax credit a boutique program but given that the previous iteration of the digital media tax credit was directly designed with industry feedback to give Alberta a competitive advantage, an advantage that was working, and given that Alberta became more attractive for investment than other provinces like Quebec, Ontario, and B.C., to the Premier: does he not understand that the digital media tax credit was not a boutique tax credit but a successful, targeted program that kept and created jobs in Alberta?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, the tech sector has a great future in this province, and we're seeing so many companies choose Alberta as their home, as their home for their head office, as their home for expanded capacity. In fact, we can take a look at Amazon Web Services, a $4.2 billion investment in a web data services business just outside of Calgary. It's going to create over a thousand jobs. We can look at Infosys and Mphasis, both expanding in Alberta, creating thousands of jobs. We're working with the tech sector, we take advice from the tech sector, and the tech sector is booming.

Ms Goehring: Given that Accenture released a study last year that found the gaming industry alone generates $300 billion in revenue and given that companies like Beamdog have been hiring workers and creating jobs outside of Alberta but won't hire here because of the elimination of the digital media tax credit, to the minister: will he finally listen to industry experts and investors who are choosing to put their money in other jurisdictions and finally bring back the digital media tax credit?

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. What we're seeing in the province: as we position this province to be most competitive in every sector, including the tech and innovation sector, we're seeing venture capital, which is the jet fuel of tech and innovation, increase in this province year over year, doubling many years year over year. In fact, Unity 3-D, one of the largest gaming companies of the world, just recently announced that they're opening an office – where? – in Calgary.

Government Policies and Cost of Living

Mr. Feehan: The UCP has done everything in their power to make life more expensive for my constituents in Edmonton-Rutherford. The UCP, without warning, lifted the cap on insurance prices, causing prices to massively jump by, in some cases, up to 30 per cent. Earlier this week the Finance minister did not know how much insurance rates had gone up, showing that despite his bluster he is completely out of touch with the problems that he created. Can the minister tell me today exactly how much his insurance policies have cost my constituents, and why do you refuse to release the report on insurance profits?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, this government took real action to deal with the systemic, the root causes that were creating cost escalation in the automobile insurance industry. The members opposite simply put a rate cap on the issue, didn't deal with one systemic issue. After Bill 41 we're seeing automobile insurance actually flatten and even go down. Intact: their rates are dropping by 2 per cent. Belair: their rates are dropping by 7 per cent. Alberta motor vehicle association are dropping their rates by over 7 per cent.

Mr. Feehan: Given that the families of Edmonton-Rutherford have been hit hard with school fee hikes caused by this government, tuition hikes caused by this government, and even hikes to the interest on student loans caused by this government and given that the families that I represent are telling me that it feels like the UCP government is making it more and more expensive to access education, can either the Education minister or the Advanced Education minister explain to the families that I represent why their mission is to take more from Albertans while doing less for them?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Another opportunity for me to remind the Assembly that tuition in Alberta remains below the national average. You know, apart from that, I've heard loud and clear from student leaders the need to do more to support . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. I heard the question, and I will hear the answer.

The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, I've heard loud and clear from students the need to do more when it comes to student assistance, which is why Budget 2022 includes $12 million over three years in new spending to support our existing scholarships. As well, it includes $15 million over three years to create new bursaries specifically for low-income students to ensure everyone can access . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Feehan: Given that UCP policies have resulted in the hiking of utility bills and their follow-up policy of doing nothing about them is making it harder for the constituents that I represent to make ends meet and given that I've been hearing stories of $700 utility bills and the UCP is only responding with $50, which even a UCP MLA described as paltry, and given that our caucus has proposed a sensible solution to protect Albertans from the UCP cost-of-living crisis, all of which have been rejected by the members opposite, Albertans can't trust the UCP. Will the associate minister attempt to change that by offering Albertans anything at all?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, it's ironic when the caucus that doesn't even know the price of electricity is complaining about the price of electricity. Now, it's true; Albertans have a hangover from the NDP because everything they did on the electricity grid rose prices. I've said it before, and I'll say it again. They broke the electricity grid; we're going to fix it. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order.

The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Oil and Gas Export

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The world watches with horror the tragic events happening in Ukraine and continues to apply punishing sanctions against the Russian aggressor. Many countries are now banning Russian oil and gas. Others continue to rely heavily on Russia to fulfill their oil and gas needs. As a result, many of the same countries that are standing up against Russian aggression in Ukraine are also funding it by buying Russian oil. Can the Minister of Energy advise the House what role Alberta can play to help foreign countries weed out Russian oil?

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you for that question. Alberta can be the solution. We sit on top of the third-largest reserves of oil on the planet, and we produce it responsibly, reliably. We produce it with the highest environmental standards, and we're addressing climate change. In fact, our oil sands is moving to net zero. But most importantly, we do not use our resources to fund wars against innocent civilians. We intend to do everything we can to increase production of oil and gas here in Alberta to supply markets globally and in the U.S. that want more of our oil and gas.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that the United States was importing an average of 209 barrels a day of crude oil and 500,000 barrels a day of other petroleum products from Russia and given that the U.S. has banned import of oil, gas, oil and petroleum products, and coal from Russia and given that support amongst Americans for the Keystone XL pipeline is now rising, can the Minister of Energy tell this House what efforts are being made to export more Alberta oil and gas to the U.S.?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We can squeeze out every single drop of Russian oil in North America. We're able to displace Russian oil, Russian heavy oil, going into the U.S. Gulf coast, with our oil. We're able to replace Russian light oil, going into the west coast of the U.S., with our oil. We can do that now using existing pipeline capacity that is not being fully utilized and using spare private-sector rail capacity. That's why we're advocating in the United States for a continental energy security program and our look north advocacy campaign.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again, Minister. Given that Justin Trudeau has continuously been hostile to Alberta's oil and gas industry and given that he has created rules and regulations which prevent the building of pipelines to increase our oil and gas supply to the world and given that these obstacles have prevented the Energy East and Keystone XL pipelines from moving forward, can the Minister of Energy advise this House what work would need to be done to bring these pipelines to fruition?

The Speaker: The minister.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We need to start by resetting energy policy in this country and in North America. For the last several years energy policy has focused exclusively on climate change. While it's important and while we need to address emissions and lower them, we also need to address energy affordability, energy security, reliability. Those things are just as important, and we need to start treating our energy as an asset to be a proud of, not a liability to be phased out.

2:40 Rural Physicians and Surgery Wait Times

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, access to health care in rural Alberta has been an issue for as long as anyone can remember. My constituency is dealing with insufficiencies so extreme that the Whitecourt health care centre currently has a shortage of physicians with surgical skills. This shortage has led to the AHS north zone letting my constituents know that the hospital will temporarily be unable to offer Caesarean sections from March 15 to April 13, almost a month without access to life-saving surgery. To the Minister of Health: with only limited obstetrical services available at Whitecourt health care centre during this time, how can my constituents feel safe during their childbirth journey?

Member LaGrange: Thank you to the member for the question. As a mother myself I know that pregnancy and childbirth are indeed stressful times for expectant mothers. To ensure the safety of all mothers, obstetrical services in Whitecourt will be limited to low-risk maternity services until April 13. AHS is working with all expecting mothers to ensure that they have the support plan in place to safely deliver their babies. I want to assure the member, our colleague here, that we're doing everything we can to ensure patients receive the care they need when they need it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, Minister. Given that there is also currently a shortage of general physicians in Grande Cache and given that these shortages have been going on for quite a while now, given that doctors are able to practise in Alberta wherever they choose to live, to the same minister: please tell the members of my community what is being done to augment the efforts of AHS to recruit doctors in Grande Cache.

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to my colleague. Given that there is also currently a shortage of general physicians in Grande Cache and given that these shortages – oh, sorry. My apologies. The good news is that Grande Cache will receive new doctors this year under the rural education supplement and integrated doctor experience, or RESIDE, program. Under RESIDE 20 new family physicians will be attracted to the communities in need for each of the next three years. Budget '22 spends a total of $90 million to help recruit and retain rural doctors.

Mr. Long: Thank you again, Minister. Given that doctor shortages aren't the only health concerns for the residents of West Yellowhead, given that some of my constituents have been waiting for months even for out-patient surgeries like knee surgeries and given that because of extreme pains and medical concerns my constituents have had to seek medical attention in other jurisdictions, where they've had to pay out of pocket, and given that many of those wait times were pushed even further because of the COVID-19 pandemic, once again to the Minister of Health: is there anything being done to address wait times for those in need of surgeries?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government was elected on a platform to lower surgical wait times. COVID-19 has impacted our ability on those timelines; however, we continue to provide more surgeries than ever before via the Alberta surgical initiative. More procedures like hip, knee, and cataract surgeries are being done within the publicly funded system for Albertans. To support the ASI, Budget 2022 provides $133 million in capital spending to expand or build new operating rooms in many hospitals right across the province over the next three years. We remain committed to ensuring all Albertans receive quality health care no matter where they . . .

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. As we are heading into a constituency break, I encourage you to take some time with your family, drive safely, and be kind to one another. In 30 seconds or less we will continue to the remainder of the daily Routine.

Premier's Leadership

Mr. Barnes: The late novelist Ken Kesey once wrote, "The secret of being a top-notch con man is being able to know what the mark wants, and how to make him think he's getting it." Albertans have seen their share of flim-flams over the years, but never like the current Premier. When running for leader, the current Premier rejected the idea of subsidies for solar power on a radio show, rebuffing the request by stating: no; we're broke. The statement became a slogan printed on T-shirts proudly worn by Albertans tired of green corporate welfare.

Of course, once in power the new Premier increased public debt, well over $100 billion, while handing out billions in corporate welfare. Of course, he wasn't done pushing bad merchandise. He went on to promise no vaccine passports or mandates in Alberta and printed up Best Summer Ever hats for all his prospective marks. I think we all know how that ended up.

Well, folks, he's at it again. Last week the flim-flam man posted an antigreen energy meme on social media even as his government complies with Ottawa's just transition policies, scrambling to meet

Paris accord targets, and brags about speeding up the NDP's accelerated coal phase-out. Now, this week, the flim-flam man is attacking the federal government's carbon tax increase even while increasing his own carbon tax on industrial emitters.

He actually thinks he has Albertans fooled once again, but the problem with trying to play both sides of every issue is that eventually people realize that you are never on their side. Just like Justin Trudeau, who calls conservatives extremists, Alberta's Premier has ramped up the disgusting, dehumanizing rhetoric by calling conservatives lunatics and comparing them to insects. It reminds me of the time back in 2017 when the former Deputy Premier called Albertans sewer rats. At least she apologized. Albertans have had enough of this flim-flam man. It's time for him to resign, move back to Ontario, and find some new marks to work on.

Thank you. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

My apologies to the hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis for getting the order incorrect, but now the hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Tourism

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Tourism is the business of memory making, and millions of people from all over the world hold their fondest memories right where I come from. I've said it a million times in this House, but there are few places to whom a thriving tourism economy comes so naturally. Countless places pride themselves on man-made attractions, but in Banff-Kananaskis our industry is rooted in the God-given beauty all around us.

Prepandemic, tourism represented $8.4 billion of GDP and 80,000 jobs, but when borders closed and visitations ceased, restaurants shut early and venues closed down, revenues plummeted nearly half and unemployment rates peaked above 85 per cent. Even in the most difficult of times our small businesses did what they could to minimize the layoffs, house their staff, and keep things running, but it came at a cost.

They say that it takes just three weeks to form a habit. After two years of fear and pandemic restrictions the security that many once felt about travel is long gone. Now more than ever Alberta's tourism industry needs a co-ordinated bipartisan effort to spread the word that our province is open and that we are excited to welcome the world back. That is why this government passed a motion last week calling on Ottawa to drop their senseless and unscientific vaccination travel requirement. The first step to welcoming people back to our province, after all, is letting them in. But the NDP voted against it. If you listen to House debates, you'd think the NDP were obsessed with Banff-Kananaskis, but, Mr. Speaker, if you look at their voting record, you consistently find the exact opposite.

In 2019 the NDP left tourism out of their election platform entirely, and, well, I'm a testament to how well that worked out for them. Three years later you'd think they would have perhaps learned their lesson about supporting tourism rather than ignoring it in the best of times, then working actively against it in the worst, but it appears that they have not.

Mr. Speaker, I'm proud of this government for recognizing and working with Alberta's tourism operators, and I'll always be proud to represent the most beautiful place on Earth.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Bill 15 Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am honoured to rise today to introduce Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022.

This important legislation will reform the discipline process for all teachers and teacher leaders to make the education system safer for students, their families, and teachers. Bill 15 would create the Alberta teaching commission and appoint a commissioner to oversee teacher and teacher leader conduct and competency complaints for the profession. Mr. Speaker, one teaching profession, one discipline process.

Mr. Speaker, I committed in December to bringing legislation to this House. Promise made, promise kept. I hereby move first reading of Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 15 read a first time]

The Speaker: The Member for Highwood.

Bill 205 Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to request leave to introduce Bill 205, Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022.

Organ and tissue donations are medical processes that save and transform lives. One organ donation can save up to eight lives, and a tissue donation can make life better for up to 75 other people. Approval of the proposed amendments will establish a mandatory referral process and increase donor opportunities throughout the province. This bill will also help strengthen education and build a culture around organ and tissue donation within the province of Alberta.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I move first reading of Bill 205. Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 205 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Are there tablings? The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley has a tabling.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have several tablings today to support the questions I've been asking and also to rebut some of the outright misinformation I received in my answers.

My first tabling is a news article that quotes the Premier calling people that are against his leadership kooks, bugs, lunatics and having extreme, hateful, intolerant, bigoted, and crazy views.

For those like the minister of parks that don't believe that he could say such things, I'm tabling another news article where the Premier doubles down on his comments.

In sharp contrast, I have a quote from a video from back when the Premier condemned name-calling, where he says to the left: stop blaming the voters for your inability to get support; stop the vicious name-calling, end quote.

I also have another quote from another video of the Premier condemning name-calling, where he says, quote, that kind of bigotry and this kind of intimidation has no place in Alberta; stop the bully tactics.

One more contrasting video quote to table, where the Premier says, quote: so let's have a debate on the issues; let's not have a race to the bottom by name-calling. End quote.

I also brought up recall legislation in my question, so I'm tabling documents to show that recall passed in this House on June 15, 2021, and received royal assent on June 17, 2021.

I'm tabling the Premier's remarks from the November 20, 2021, UCP AGM, where he says, quote: we passed the recall law, which will be brought into force in the next few weeks. End quote.

I'm also tabling the Premier's plan for enacting recall on April 7, 2022. Not a few weeks but actually several months later and 10 months after it was passed, just in time for it to be unusable.

I'm also tabling Monday, March 28 Alberta Hansard, page 428. The minister of parks misinformed the House, accusing me of wanting door-to-door vaccinations. Totally untrue.

Next I have a list of people on the so-called COVID cabinet committee, of which I believe the minister of parks is the deputy chair, and that committee, which I am not a part of, did mandate vaccines.

In fact, I spoke out against vaccine mandates right from the start, as witnessed in my September 1, 2021, Facebook post, that I'm tabling here.

On Monday, March 28 Alberta Hansard, page 427, the minister of parks again tried to dupe the House by accusing me of wanting the Leader of the Opposition in cabinet, which is absolutely false.

So I'm tabling the 2019 election results showing that I ran as a Conservative against an NDP cabinet minister. In fact . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the guy just called me a fucking liar in the middle of the damn Legislature.

The Speaker: Order. If the Minister of Environment and Parks wants to call a point of order, he's welcome to rise to his feet. Using language that's unparliamentary, including an F-bomb directed at the Speaker, is wildly inappropriate. If you don't like his remarks, call a point of order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is called.

Point of Order Tabling Documents Parliamentary Language

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this is, first of all, tablings. I rise on 23(h), (i), and (j). As well as the long-standing practice of not calling people liars inside this Chamber, that member just rose in this Chamber and said that the Minister of Environment and Parks was duping this House. Just before that, while trying to speed through the Orders of the Day – I ignored it – he accused me of misleading this House as well. You have many rulings on the table in regard to that. That is completely inappropriate and certainly should not be how tablings are used. Frankly, if that's how the member is going to continue to use it, I'll bring a standing order package back here right after the break to make sure you can't use tablings like that no more.

Mr. Loewen: Well, Mr. Speaker, the term I used was "misinformed." I didn't say, "mislead the House," so the hon. minister is actually totally incorrect. I didn't call anybody a liar. I didn't use the word "liar" at all. I am making my tablings here. I find it absolutely incredulous that the minister would threaten to take away this House's opportunity to table documents in an attempt to save his own credibility, I guess, because obviously what I'm bringing forward in these documents is the truth, and I believe that the hon. minister does not want to hear the truth, is the problem.

Mr. Jason Nixon: What a joke. That's why your career is over, Todd.

The Speaker: Hon. Government House Leader, first of all, you used an F-bomb in the Assembly. Then you used a proper name. I appreciate that you're upset at the process, but he has the right to defend a point of order just like you called one.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Agreed.

The Speaker: Then don't use a proper name. Don't use an F-bomb. It's easy.

Hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley, the minister is correct. I have made several comments with respect to using the word "misled." While I can accept the use of the terminology around misinformation, specifically referring to a member of the Assembly as misleading the Assembly is a point of order. I have provided significant swath for members to say that the government or the opposition has misled, but you cannot say that the member misled the Assembly. For that you will apologize and withdraw.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much. I will apologize and withdraw those comments.

The Speaker: The Government House Leader will apologize for using unparliamentary language inside the Assembly as well as the use of proper names.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Absolutely, Mr. Speaker. I apologize and withdraw.

The Speaker: The member has one tabling remaining.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Again, the last tabling here is the 2019 election results, showing that I ran as a Conservative against an NDP cabinet minister. In fact, I ran as a Conservative against the NDP and the rest of the left-wing parties in the last four general elections.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Now, to be clear, there were many periods of time during your significant length of tablings where you kept the tablings to a sentence or two, which is the practice of the Assembly. The last tabling was too long.

Hon. members, we are at points of order, and at 2:12 the Member for Edmonton-South rose on a point of order.

Point of Order Accepting a Member's Word

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will attempt to keep this brief. At approximately 2:12 – I do not have the benefit of the Blues – the hon. Government House Leader stated something to the effect of: tried to violate the privacy of multiple members of this House. He made a similar claim in his response to the second supplemental question. I think it is very clear in both the documents that have been tabled in this place by the Government House Leader as well as my statements in the media that that is untrue and that I've not attempted to violate the privacy of multiple members of this House.

I believe that's an allegation under 23(h) and also (i), "imputes false or unavowed motives to another Member." Pursuant to your guidance on March 22 in which you said that "remarks which question a Member's integrity, honesty, or character are not in order" and also that, according to Beauchesne's 494, "statements by members respecting themselves must be accepted," you said that you would give additional guidance if this was to continue to be a problem. I ask for your additional guidance today.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. the Government House Leader? The deputy whip? The associate minister of mental health.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I have to say that, if anything, this is just a matter of debate. I mean, the member opposite has written an entire paper outlining his offence. Let me just say this, just for the knowledge of the House and anybody who might be watching. The RCMP do not (a) randomly or (b) without cause enter somebody's home, especially an elected member's home, if they do not have, I would say, more than reasonable belief that they will be laying charges.

Mr. Speaker, if anything, this is just a matter of debate.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others?

I am prepared to rule. I believe that there are a number of issues here before the Assembly which are a matter of debate, particularly around the difference between a member or members. No one knows the facts on that although we do accept members' words respecting themselves as fact. I would say that I did provide caution previously around this issue. I continue to provide caution with respect to making accusations against another member. I don't find this is a point of order, however. Matters that are potentially before the courts: of course, those are sensitive issues in which members have their responsibility as members of the Assembly not to take that responsibility lightly. I consider this matter dealt with and concluded.

Third Reading

Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Culture.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to move third reading of Bill 6, the Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, 2022.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta has a distinct and unique culture and heritage, one that we should all treasure. It is built into who we are as a people and as a province. It's as deep as our geology and in the very expressions of who we are as people. I'm often in awe of the beauty of the landscapes, the kindness of the people, the history that surrounds us, the vast geological ages, even, included there. It truly is unlike anywhere on Earth.

Mr. Speaker, I think it's important that we do our best to celebrate some of the uniquely Albertan items that are important to our culture and our history and the understanding of who we are as people, and we have an opportunity to do that today.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

I am again asking all members of this House for their support of Bill 6, the Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act. This piece of legislation would enshrine ammolite as the official gemstone of our province. Gem-quality ammolite is totally unique to Alberta. Its beauty and iridescence are the result of southern Alberta's unique geography and geology, which cannot be duplicated elsewhere in Canada or in the world. Furthermore, ammolite has been an important part of this landscape for millennia. Long before Alberta was a province, plains First Nations have been collecting this gemstone, and the practice continues today in Blackfoot communities.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank all members of this Assembly for the debate on Bill 6 up to this point. I encourage all members to once again support this legislation so that we are able to officially recognize ammolite as an emblem of this great province of Alberta.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to stand this afternoon in recognition of Bill 6 and the important designation of ammolite as the official gemstone of Alberta, that's embodied in the bill. I appreciate the minister's desire to create recognition of ammolite as our official gemstone in an effort to perhaps create another tool that we can use to demonstrate to the world the benefits of coming to Alberta and visiting our wonderful province. I think local Albertans, residents will find their way to various different shops that might now decide to carry ammolite jewellery and gemstones and purchase it as a collection item, either as a tourist or just simply because it's their pride in the province, now that the designation under Bill 6, if the bill is passed, has been made.

It brings to mind, Mr. Speaker, one store in particular that might have been very, very proud to carry the ammolite gemstone, a store that we're all familiar with as members of the Legislature but which no longer exists. Of course, I'm speaking about the Alberta Branded store, that was in the Federal Building and carried items of Alberta-branded artistry, let's say, creations made by Alberta artists that were sold very proudly in that store. It gave a place for Alberta artists to have their wares displayed and sold, and it was a great showcase for those artists. It gave them a great source of income and also managed to create a platform for them to spread their name and gain greater recognition on a wider stage.

Unfortunately, that Alberta Branded store, which would have been a great place to market ammolite, is no longer there. There are a few paltry showcases so that you can buy tie clips and small brooches and trinkets that are in the Legislature Building, which is a far lesser display than what was available for residents and tourists alike to go to and buy Alberta Branded merchandise. Artists made pieces in the store that was in the Federal Building, and I, for one, really bemoan the loss of that store. It was a great opportunity for Alberta artists, and it would have been a wonderful opportunity for ammolite to have been marketed and sold in our provincial capital here.

I know that as a tourist, while onboard a ship cruising around the world, I used to really start to bemoan the fact that I had to follow my mother, who was a fellow traveller, into far-flung, different types of stores and souvenir shops to buy things such as tea towels and fridge magnets. It also included trips to find certain small gemstones which were local gemstones famous in a particular area. You know what, Mr. Speaker? Those trips actually got me into some of the places that I never would have dreamed of going to before. Now, when I pass her fridge or see the things that she's bought, it brings to mind the places that we visited in a way that I otherwise wouldn't have had memories of.

Gemstones are something that are purchased as a souvenir item by many, many tourists, and they are a higher value item than the tea towels and fridge magnets, which might be produced outside of the country and then brought in to be sold as souvenirs.

So I endorse the adoption of the gemstone ammolite to become our official gemstone in Alberta. It would have been wonderful to know that it was available in gemstone quality in more places throughout Alberta. Unfortunately, it's mostly in southern Alberta where gemstone-quality ammolite is found. However, I certainly am proud to recognize the sacred nature of ammolite in the lands of the Blackfoot people. It's especially found along the St. Mary River in southern Alberta, and we'll herald it for the historical importance that it has for the Blackfoot people and be proud to adopt it as our official gemstone in the province of Alberta and look forward to having every tourist who comes to Alberta know that our gemstone is ammolite.

It should be something that manufacturers in this province – and there are a few of them who make gemstone jewellery already out of ammolite – should be willing to adopt, and I would expect to see many more pieces available throughout their local retail operations if not through the local Assembly office, through the good offices of the Speaker perhaps, to include items made by Alberta artists made out of ammolite. Hopefully, they'll be found in whatever display case is left after the loss of the Alberta Branded store, let's say.

I'm wondering, though, if indeed the mining of ammolite will be increased as a result of this and if indeed that will put pressure on the local deposits and if indeed there are going to be perhaps more leases that will be applied for and if there are more locations available where this gemstone is possibly able to be found and if there have been inquiries about perhaps further mining of this gemstone and if indeed it's going to be something that the government will allow to be opened up to more than one mining distributor.

I don't want to see the mining of ammolite become sort of the new diamond of the world in that only one or two companies control it. Hopefully, this new opportunity is something that's spread far and wide to more than one major player in the mining industry who might be interested in mining ammolite for use in the gemstone industry.

Obviously, it's found in southern Alberta, primarily, as a gemstone. I know that there are others who may wish to talk about the mining of this gemstone and about the souvenir opportunities in ammolite in Alberta. Once again, we look forward to seeing the provincial government adopt ways of encouraging the marketing of ammolite and maybe doing something to negate the loss of stores such as Alberta Branded, that we proudly had for many years in this Federal Building and that we used a lot as MLAs to promote Alberta products and artistry made by Albertans. Hopefully, ammolite becomes something that is well known as a gemstone and a souvenir item that every Albertan and every tourist to this province wants to buy some of.

With that, I look forward to supporting this piece of legislation, and I'll allow some of my colleagues and other members across the way to make their own comments.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next joining debate I see the hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, for those following along at home, Bill 6, the Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, 2022, doesn't get much shorter. I think this is, honestly, the shortest law or act that's ever been passed, and I thank the minister for that. It simply reads: "The gemstone known as ammolite is hereby adopted as the official gemstone of Alberta." I'm proudly wearing this on my chest, the ammolite itself, and I have a bit of a story to share with the group.

I'd heard about it before, but I never really saw it in any opportunities. It was my very first debate, Mr. Speaker, so I was pretty nervous. I was going to be going up against a sitting Member of the Legislative Assembly, an Ag and Forestry minister, and a local councillor from Sturgeon whose name was Wayne Bokenfohr. He came up and he kind of saw that I was nervous about this. He said, "Here," and he pinned this on my chest. I'm not using a prop, so you're not getting me that way. He pinned this on my chest and said: "You're going to represent us. This is the gemstone of Alberta. You're going to do Alberta proud and go up and do your best for us." That totally calmed down my nerves, and I haven't taken it off since. I have worn it proudly in this Assembly for the last three years. Some of my colleagues have noticed what I had as well, and we ended up sharing them around. The fact that we brought this around full circle is kind of a neat thing.

Councillor Bokenfohr travelled over to Shanghai, and he had done a bunch of different presentations, and that was always his gift to dignitaries, the Alberta gemstone, especially in the shape of Alberta. So hats off to a local guy that's doing that, and his mine, obviously, is in southern Alberta. It's something that we can share with pride, and many of my colleagues have it on their lapels. I strongly encourage members from the opposition as well now that it's the official gemstone. It's not just pretty in blue; there are some orange shades for one of my colleagues, Edmonton-Rutherford, that he might want to take. He and I have an ongoing joke about what the better colour shades are.

People of the province of Alberta can show something truly patriotic, something that is really from our province that's unique and, again, has been around for a long time and has a lot of value and also can bridge some of those gaps that we might have on the political spectrum.

With that, I'll close my remarks. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I strongly encourage everyone to vote in favour.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Are there any members? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise in the House to speak to Bill 6, emblems of Alberta, and I'm very happy to support this bill, that designates ammolite as the official gemstone of Alberta. We are proud to recognize the sacred nature of ammolites in the lands of the Blackfoot people and especially along the St. Mary River of southern Alberta. It has a cultural relevance to the people of the Blackfoot. The Blackfoot refer to ammolite as iniskim, the buffalo-calling stone. It connects to a cultural myth about the stone being used to call buffalo and feed a starving community for a winter. It symbolizes wealth, abundance, good health, and stamina and is still collected for ceremonial purposes.

While saying this, I would also like to take the opportunity to remind this House and the Minister of Culture that I appreciate his effort, his initiative on this, but we have a long way to go. The simplest, simplest thing when it comes to dealing in helping Indigenous communities – and we failed those people. It's not long ago. I remember that the government declined to take the call of the TRC to call a national day for truth and reconciliation. That was a simple call to action from the TRC. It has over 90 recommendations, and that was the simplest thing to do. We have a lot more to do when it comes to addressing the issues related to drinking water on-reserve in those areas and protecting our eastern slopes and environment and more of this in this bill.

In the past years the government has removed the human rights education fund. The government has removed the antiracism community group programs and reduced the funding. I appreciate this initiative. I support this, the spirit of this bill and this action, but we have a long way to go when it comes to doing a real service to our Indigenous communities. We see the government has been failing over the last three years on many, many different aspects. I will seek the opportunity going forward, as a representative of my constituents from Edmonton-Meadows, to advocate on behalf of not only my constituents; also of those communities, to advocate on these issues specifically related to multiculturalism and antiracism, to keep raising the voices on behalf of this community.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity this afternoon just to add a few quick comments here to – actually, I think I'm going to just call it the discussion, because there's really no debate about this whatsoever. Thanks to the Minister of Culture for bringing Bill 6 forward to declare ammolite the official gemstone of Alberta. You know, I think I'll echo some of the comments that my friend from Edmonton-Meadows said. I think the road to reconciliation is still quite long. There's a lot of work to be able to do to rebuild the relationship and the partnership with Indigenous peoples. This is certainly a really, really good opportunity to show something, but like he said, I think there's more we could do.

As we know, many of the provinces, the federal government also declared a statutory holiday around truth and reconciliation. If I could take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to maybe even place more than a bug in the ear of the Minister of Culture, there's another opportunity for him to be able to advocate within the government to really seriously consider revisiting that decision around creating a statutory holiday for truth and reconciliation. I think that is going to be a very, very meaningful offering, that we could do. Again, we've seen all the other provinces, we've seen the federal government do this. Alberta needs to now step up and do the same thing.

I did notice one comment from my friend from Edmonton-McClung around the mining, possibly, of ammolite. Maybe the suggestion that I would put out there for the government: should something like this start to increase around that, we should definitely take the step of consulting with Indigenous peoples around any type of expansion of this gem. You know, certainly, maybe there could be some business opportunities there, but I would definitely want to see Indigenous peoples get those first opportunities to be able to do that.

I am definitely thrilled to be able to support this bill. Of course, my friend from Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland, we can certainly have that discussion about, you know, which colour perhaps would be more preferable. I might suggest that it could be more towards a brighter colour, but we can always have that debate for another day. Again, thank you to the minister for bringing this forward. Happy to support the bill, and I look forward to hopefully getting to support other opportunities to really start heading down the road to truth and reconciliation and rebuilding that partnership that needs to be rebuilt with Indigenous peoples.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you very much.

Hon. members, next I believe I see – the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise at third reading of Bill 6, the Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, 2022, and to have the opportunity to speak to the beauty, actually, of ammolite. I'll be quite honest. I was not very familiar with it until recently, and having the opportunity to explore a little bit, learn a little bit about it – it is, honestly, a beautiful gemstone. It's absolutely gorgeous. I can tell you that my daughter, who – I just will comment – I had the pleasure of having here in this Assembly today along with my son and husband, which is a rare joy in this House, to have that kind of close family connection in this House, you know, saw the picture of ammolite as I was doing a little bit of research. She said, "Mama, that is so pretty," and it absolutely is. It is a truly rainbow gemstone. The rainbow is also a lovely symbol of love. It's a truly beautiful gemstone, and I think it is something that we should be proud to have represented as our official gemstone here in Alberta.

Of course, I haven't had the opportunity to hear a lot of the debate on this bill so far, but I'm sure that many of the speakers have spoken to the origins of ammolite and what its meaning is, of course, for the Blackfoot in Alberta and that it holds such great, special meaning for them. Of course, as I understand it, the Blackfoot refer to ammolite as iniskim – I hope I'm pronouncing that correctly – and it's known as the buffalo-calling stone.

There's the legend, of course. The legend of ammolite is essentially that, you know, people were starving, a very, very cold winter, and one woman had a dream about being called to a cave and seeing this beautiful gem, woke up, and was out searching and found this gemstone, and then the buffalo came. That's why it's considered a calling stone for the buffalo, which therefore has a deep connection to Indigenous peoples in our province. It's a wonderful thing to be able to commemorate that by giving ammolite this official gemstone status.

I will acknowledge as well that in preparation for this bill I also took a look at other emblems of Alberta, because I didn't know there were so many. Of course, we're all very familiar with the crest that we see on the flag of Alberta, and we know that it symbolizes the beauty of our province. I am pointing to the flag. The Speaker looks a little confused. I was pointing to the Alberta flag next to the Speaker. It is a beautiful flag that well represents the beauty of this province.

But I wasn't aware of some of the other emblems of Alberta. Honestly, it was a little bit of an education for myself. I have grown up in Alberta, of course, knowing about the wild rose as the official flower, floral emblem of Alberta. But I'll be honest. I did not know that we had an official grass and that our grass emblem was the rough fescue. I didn't know that, but of course when I saw pictures of it, yes, this is a grass that I've seen frequently in my travels in Alberta.

I did know that our official bird was the great horned owl. Of course, who doesn't know that?

Member Irwin: I didn't know that.

Ms Pancholi: Oh. You didn't know that? The Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood did not know that. I feel like I learned that learning about Owls in the Family, Farley Mowat. You learn about the great horned owls, and then you talk about it. Okay. The member didn't know about that.

But in school when I was learning, which was a time earlier than the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, I do recall having a great discussion about the great horned owl and its significance to Alberta.

I did not know – I thought this was very interesting – that the official stone of Alberta is petrified wood. That was new information to me. I would not actually, to be quite honest, have known that petrified wood is considered a stone. My mother used to collect petrified wood when we would go out travelling in the mountains of Alberta. That was something that used to drive my father crazy, that my mother would want to stop and pull over and collect petrified wood, but now I know she was actually collecting stones. Very interesting.

You know, again, this has been an education for me to learn about some of the great emblems of Alberta and to learn about ammolite. Actually, I think I had seen it before but had not recognized exactly what it was. To now have this recognized as our official gemstone is a wonderful thing to do. I stand in support of that.

I appreciate the comments from my colleague the Member for Edmonton-McClung, who spoke about, you know, opportunities to promote ammolite as a symbol of Alberta and the things that we value here. I miss the Capital Gifts, that we used to have right here in the Federal Building, actually, close by, which really highlighted not only Alberta artists but those things that are unique to Alberta and are special to Alberta, and ammolite – I'm certain perhaps they did sell ammolite already. [interjection] Oh. I guess I'll give way.

Member Irwin: Yeah. You know, I just wanted to intervene on the fine member and mention, too – I won't refer to his presence or absence, but perhaps I would be curious to actually hear from the minister as well on that, because what an opportunity we had with Capital Gifts to really highlight Alberta artists. I know I actually stood with our critic for Culture after it was closed. We went and we visited some of the artists there. For many of them that was a really critical source of income. I really appreciate the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud as well as the Member for Edmonton-McClung for raising that because it was really a place that would highlight artists, and people would come to the Federal Building to check out that store. Like I said, I would hope the minister might even comment on that as well.

Thank you for letting me intervene.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you to my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood for that intervention. You know, at the time that that Capital Gifts store closed, I mean, that was pre-pandemic. Of course, I recall that we did stand and speak out for Alberta artists and the lost opportunity and income – let's be quite honest – for many of these artists. We had no idea what was even to come – right? – in terms of the pandemic. I mean, there are many, many Albertans who have been hit hard by the pandemic, but artists in particular have lost a lot of opportunities to showcase their work, to perform work, and to sell their work. I was very proud, and I actually recall going down to that Capital Gifts store and really learning about some Alberta artists that I was not aware of before and purchasing some items, actually, as well.

I think it's a loss. I know it's probably not a big thing in the grand scheme of things, certainly, for this government. It was just, I guess, business as usual, but it certainly did – when I think of ammolite, when I look at the jewellery that has been created by ammolite, I can't think of a better place to showcase that than Capital Gifts. I hope those artists are finding other opportunities to showcase their work in a province that has become increasingly hostile towards supporting artists. You know, I know that many of my colleagues have spoken about the history of ammolite, the importance of emblems to unite people and also to showcase who we are as Albertans.

As I mentioned, I think this is a particularly lovely gemstone. I say this as somebody who once had a very unnatural – I don't know – obsession almost with gemstones when I was younger. I always felt a little bit shortchanged by the fact that I was born in August and my official gemstone was the peridot, which was one that always seemed to be far, far lacklustre compared to, like, a diamond or an emerald or a ruby, that so many other months seemed to get as their official gemstone. I got stuck with peridot. No offence to people who love peridot. It's a really pale green stone that is quite disappointing.

So I have to say that I wish ammolite was an option. It's probably because it's unique to Alberta. It's not, you know, on that official gemstone list for the months of the year, but maybe – I don't know who I could actually advocate to to change the official gemstone for August to be ammolite instead of peridot. Sorry. Sorry to peridot lovers.

Okay. With that, Mr. Speaker, I'll close my comments on Bill 6.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 6 in third reading, Emblems of Alberta Amendment Act, 2022. You know, my colleagues have covered a lot of ground, and I likely will repeat some of their very interesting facts as this is a really skimpy piece of legislation. That doesn't mean it's not important – it certainly is – that ammolite will become the official gemstone of Alberta. We do know that it's actually a gemstone formed from an ancient marine fossil called ammonite. I think when I spoke to this in second reading, I talked a little bit about the field of paleontology and why it's so important here in Alberta.

Anyway, this fossil, ammonite, is actually found predominantly in southern Alberta. I talked a little bit in second reading about how it's actually found on the eastern slopes and talked about how important it was that we protect the eastern slopes as much as possible. I know that the government hasn't done a great job doing that. It was really unfortunate that they chose not to support, or, you know, not to further the debate around the private member's bill to protect the eastern slopes, Bill 214, which is unfortunate. They claim to do a lot of things, and to protect the eastern slopes was one of those things, but their actions actually don't back that up very often.

Anyway, recognizing ammolite, I think, is a great thing. I do appreciate the fact that there was consultation with Indigenous communities. I think that's, you know – if I'm going to give the government props, I'll give them props for doing that in this case. I don't give them a lot of props very often. But I think that for far too long – and I don't just mean right now; I mean for far too long – we have imposed legislation and made changes without consulting really important communities, and in this case those would be Indigenous communities. That extends to so much of what we do. I think that very often we pass legislation or we debate legislation and we just, unfortunately, haven't taken the time to consult properly, and then, not surprisingly, we don't get it right, and then we have to go back and correct it. Happily, in this case that doesn't seem to be the case.

So as my colleagues have said, ammolite: it's wonderful. It's very colourful. It's quite lovely. I actually was given a pin made of ammolite. It's in the shape of Alberta, the province, and it's actually quite pretty. It's got lots of different colours. I'm sure we all own a piece of this lovely gemstone. It actually only officially became a gemstone, I think, in the '80s if I'm not – 1981, actually. [interjection] I will let my colleague intervene.

Member Irwin: One of the things I really appreciated from my colleague from St. Albert: when she spoke to this at second, I believe, she actually talked a lot about just her own family, her son, who's in paleontology. You know, again, we've obviously spoken in support of this bill, so I'll be cautious in how I frame this, but I just think it should really compel us as legislators to think about the message we're sending about our larger cultural industries.

She talked about brain drain. She talked about young people in the arts and culture, in sciences – the list goes on – potentially leaving our province. So while this is, you know, an important bill that we are going to support, I hope that the minister responsible for Culture really thinks about what other pieces of legislation he could be bringing forward or what kind of advocating he could be doing as a minister of the Crown to very much support and strengthen arts and culture in this province moving forward so that Albertans, young people are choosing this place to live.

Ms Renaud: Thank you very much. I actually wasn't going to bring up paleontology and my kid again, because I do that all the time and I'm sure I bore the heck out of everyone, but of course I will talk about that. You know, I think that when I hear the Minister of Advanced Education talk about, say, “Well, there's no such thing as brain drain; it's not happening; we're doing this; we're great,” it actually is happening, and I know it's happening because it happened to my family. I know that it happened in one case, and I know it happens in many others.

I can tell you that ever since my son was about five years old, that's when he decided he wanted to – he called it dinosaur hunter at the time, but he decided that that was going to be what he did. Now, of course, like a lot of mothers, you know, I patted him on the head and said, “Sure, honey; that's great,” but he ended up doing it and pursuing his passion and is now, I think, a leading researcher and expert in an area that I never thought he would be. It's dinosaur teeth, actually. That's what he does. But he was born and raised in Alberta. He did the majority of his research and studies here in Alberta. He's a proud Albertan, and he's no longer here, and sadly the chances of him ever coming back here and working in his field here are slim, because he's now in Europe.

Paleontology is a big thing in Alberta, and I've said this again and again. We are known the world over for our incredible fossils, not just ammolite but our incredible fossils. I mean, we've got little dinosaurs on our licence plates now. I think that says a lot. We have world-class museums, world-class digs, world-class researchers, but they're not all staying here, because they don't see themselves here in this place.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I am going to take my seat and just say that I support this piece of legislation and will proudly wear ammolite in the future.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate? The hon. Minister of Culture to close debate should he so choose.

Mr. Orr: I'll waive. Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 6 read a third time]

The Acting Speaker: I see the deputy government whip.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Everybody is looking forward to a couple weeks back in their constituency, so I move that the Assembly be adjourned until 10 a.m. Tuesday, April 19, 2022.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 3:38 p.m. to Tuesday, April 19, 2022]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Hon. members, please be seated.

Presentation to the Assembly of Mr. Brian Jean Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche

The Speaker: Hon. members, I now invite the hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women to proceed to the main doors of the Chamber.

Members, I have received word from the Chief Electoral Officer of Alberta of the report of the returning officer for the constituency Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche containing the results of the by-election conducted on March 15, 2022, which states that the by-election was conducted in the constituency of Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche and that Mr. Brian Jean was duly elected as the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche.

[Preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms, Ms Issik escorted Mr. Jean to the Mace]

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, I introduce to you and to this Chamber Mr. Brian Jean, the new Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche, who has taken his oath as a member of the Assembly, has inscribed the roll, and now claims his right to take his seat.

The Speaker: Hon. members, let the hon. member take his seat.
Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 2

Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate March 30: Member Loyola]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has five minutes remaining should he choose to use it.

Are there others wishing to join in the debate for second reading, Bill 2, Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning has risen.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise and welcome everybody back, after our Easter weekend, to speak to the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, in second reading. As we know, this is a financial bill, and it is speaking specifically to the budget that the government has put forward for the people of Alberta. Now, when the budget was drafted, as we all know, it was drafted previously to what we were seeing with the increase in inflation, the spending within COVID, and the increase in the oil revenue that the province is now benefiting from. What we have not seen, however, is this government responding to those factors.

Obviously, within this statutes amendment act there are pieces that I think many Albertans are concerned with, and those concerns, I think, are valid. As we look at what is happening across the province and, of course, happening across the country, inflation has significantly increased over the last two years. What we've seen is that on average it's raised about 5.7 per cent, a significant increase, I would say, in regard to the cost of living, not only in Alberta but across Canada. Now, what we haven't seen, obviously, are wages keeping up with that inflation. The wage right now officially would be at about 3.1 per cent over the last year and, of course, again, like I said, inflation being 5.7 per cent.

Now, because of that, what we know is that the people of Alberta's wages are not able to keep up with the cost of living that is happening across the province. We have seen utility rates substantially increase. Yesterday natural gas was on a tear. I think it's up to 8 cents a kilojoule right now. We've seen the price of fuel increase substantially. We've seen the price of looking at our basic needs such as our food costs increasing substantially, yet we've seen nothing within this bill or this budget that is addressing any of those cost pressures.

Now, the major concern around that, as we all know, is that when inflation continues to increase and our wages aren't able to keep up with that, our purchasing power also substantially decreases, so Albertans are at a place right now where they're not able to take their earnings and reinvest that into our economy.

Now, to have a budget introduced into this Legislature that is purely based on the price of oil, for the government to be applauding the fact that they have a balanced budget, again, on the price of oil, which is a resource that all Albertans own and should have some form of benefit from – we have not seen that same respect for that resource and the value of that resource reinvested into the needs of Albertans.

Now, the government could have done a couple of things, and I've spoken about those repeatedly since this budget has been introduced. One of the major ones would be the fact that they should have looked at the inflation. They should have looked at the fact that Albertans' incomes are not keeping up with the cost of inflation, and they should have reversed their decision when it comes to taxing personal income tax because, of course, what we know is that the average family is now going to lose about $500 alone on their basic personal exemptions when it comes to their income tax. That's pretty substantial at a time where the discrepancy between inflation and wages is significant, and we know inflation is going to continue to go up. We saw the Bank of Canada already, just recently in the last couple of days, increasing the interest rates in relation to mortgage payments, in relation to car payments. That will put more stress on the average Albertan.

Now, that $500 could have been part of the basic personal exemption, could have been put back into the pockets of Albertans to help them address the increased costs that we're now seeing, but the government chose not to do that, which I believe they should still reconsider, given the fact that we're still in second reading to be able to look at this bill, reconsider the decisions that have been made and support Albertans by giving that $500 back. That's one simple solution.

Now, of course, the other piece of that is that we saw this government promise a $150 rebate, which Albertans have not seen yet, at a time where, as I said, not only yesterday we saw the price of natural gas significantly increase pretty much overnight, knowing that those bills now at the end of this month are going to be substantially higher. Again, the promise that this government made to help bring down those costs has not been presented to the people of Alberta, nor have they received any type of relief in regard to that.

Now, there were other things that this government chose to do, which was basically looking at, again, another tax on inflation for AISH recipients, because they're going to lose about $3,000 in real purchasing power with the changes that have been made to AISH. Senior couples that are on the Alberta seniors' benefit plan are also going to lose about $750 given the fact that this government has not kept up with inflation. Of course, there are other hidden fees that were introduced within this budget: tuition increases, park fees, insurance costs, utility bills. All of those things that the government has the ability to create policy that would help bring down those costs this government has chosen to ignore and not introduce anything in regard to this particular bill.

I think it's disingenuous to Albertans to say that we should be celebrating this budget, because, as I've said, a balanced budget is only good if it helps the people of Alberta, and there's a way to do it. I mean, we look at the budget and we look at the projected value of oil, which I think was at a very low number of $70 a barrel, I believe – it might have been a little bit less – and we're already over $100 a barrel. There is going to be a significant amount of revenue coming into the province that was never budgeted within this piece of legislation.

Because it wasn't budgeted, the government will come out next quarter and try to celebrate how they've done even better than what they told Albertans they initially thought they were going to do, yet there will be no policy changes, no legislation that we have seen that will actually speak to the pressures that Albertans are facing.

You can balance a budget and still make sure that you're providing services. The significant cuts to health care, the conflict within the bargaining process between our health care workers and the government right now, the request to take substantial wage decreases at a time where this government is talking about the amount of revenue . . . [interjection] I will accept an interjection.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, through you, to the Member for Edmonton-Manning. I think it's particularly worth noting, not just in this House but, you know, for Albertans in general, that this budget, this UCP budget, in fact, was underestimating the revenue from oil and gas quite dramatically, and while we don't have to calculate the exact amount now, because this is an unfolding story as we speak – right? – I think the government tabled in this budget a $500 million surplus, something like that. It's considerably more than that. It's exponentially more than that. You know, what I fear is that, cynically, this UCP government will try to buy Albertans off in the next election by suddenly appearing with billions of dollars of surplus in a matter of months. In fact, we probably have that right now.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the interjection. He is correct. As of right now with the tax on inflation, in fact, what the government of Alberta will be doing is getting a $1 billion surplus in just income taxes alone, a billion dollars off of Albertans just by the fact that they did not remove their decision to tax personal income tax.

It's a billion dollars. Now, of course, that is a billion-dollar tax grab. By taxing inflation and failing to index the income tax system, all of our constituents should be very concerned. I know that I have constituents in my own riding whose bills alone on utilities have doubled. That $500 that they would have received back on their income taxes would have paid at least one month of their utility bills, yet we haven't seen a shift or a change by this government to move that back and look at making sure that Albertans have their income tax returned to their pockets at a time when they don't need to be doing it.

Now, of course, the other piece of that, as the hon. member did say, is that this is one of those things where this government continues to try to position themselves to go into another election where they can start celebrating surpluses, talk about how great they did fiscally. We see that even with the 13-cent rebate on the provincial tax this government has put on fuel. Now, it's not a balanced 13 cents. I've talked about this already in the House a few times. We know for our agricultural industry specifically that they used to have a tax exemption on their dyed fuel. Part of the reason for that was to make sure that our agricultural industry still had a competitive advantage and a comparative advantage across jurisdictions so that those costs that they were incurring were able to be off-set, and it was one way to look at decreasing some of the input costs that were going to be required to get, you know, crops ready, to do aerial spraying, all of those things. Yet we didn't see the government make an adjustment there. Dyed fuel, regular fuel: they're now the same.

Why the government chose not to do that I don't understand, especially at a time where we continuously hear from our agricultural sector the stressors that they have when it comes to the increase in input costs. Fertilizer is going up. Feed costs are going up. Fuel is going up. Their transportation costs are going to go up. The demand on the supply chain is going to be extreme come harvest. Yet we saw nothing within this piece of legislation that would address that.

Now, again, at a time where we see many of our corporations doing quite well, our oil and gas industry doing very well, we again saw this government hold fast on keeping the corporate taxes low yet increasing every Albertans' taxes. It doesn't make sense. Why does this government feel that Albertans should continuously have to keep paying more out of their pockets at a time when they're cutting the corporate income tax? It's one more tax on Albertans and a complete disregard for the corporations that are benefiting from the natural resources of our province that are owned by the people of this province.

There should be a balance between what this government expects from corporate income tax and what they expect from personal income tax, yet they didn't index corporate taxes; they left it flat. That, I think, is a real concern because, again, we're talking about a resource that is owned by the people of Alberta, a resource that corporations are benefiting from, yet they're not paying the taxes back to the very people that own that resource at a time when this government feels like Albertans should have to pay more, at a time where inflation goes up, at a time where their wages are not matching the cost of inflation.

We know, and this government will continuously talk about the fact that: well, this is about job creation and reinvesting into the job market, but we haven't seen the evidence that these corporations, that haven't had to pay the income tax at the same rate as personal income tax, haven't had to keep up with inflation, are actually creating or reinvesting into the market. If they were, we would have way more jobs. What we are seeing is that the revenue that many of these corporations are benefiting from, the profits that they're making, are actually just being put back into their dividends, they're paying their shareholders, and they're not actually reinvesting it into the employment market.

That is another big concern, because when this government continuously talks about employment and the jobs that are being created in Alberta, one, we're behind the rest of the country still, but on top of that, the jobs that this government continuously talks about are part-time positions; they're not full-time. They're not positions that are paying mortgages and that are high paying; they're lower earning part-time positions.

The government should have an expectation that when you give a corporate income tax cut, because that's what it is, and when you're trying to give corporations a benefit to be job creators, that they would create full-time, long-term, mortgage-paying positions, yet we haven't seen that. So, then, why are they continuously getting a tax cut? Why are Albertans having to pay more in their personal income taxes when corporations don't have to?

Mr. Speaker, I do believe that this piece of legislation has fallen short. I believe that the government could have been far more in tune to the realities of the markets and what was going on with inflation and the cost of living and the fact that we know that our wages aren't keeping up in this province to those demands. They could have created policy, and they could have done that within their legislation to ensure that all Albertans are able to pay their bills, are able to pay their mortgages, and that we are successful as we move forward, and that that purchasing power that we need Albertans to have to keep our economy moving forward is there.

Right now we don't have that, and people are worried about whether or not they're going to be able to pay their next utility bill. They're worried about whether or not they're going to pay their next mortgage payment. So I would encourage this government to go back and reconsider the decisions they've made and help to support Albertans with this increased cost of living.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on second reading of Bill 2 are there others? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday has risen.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to be back here in the House and have an opportunity to speak to Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, and much like . . .

The Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt; however, I believe that the hon. member has spoken to second reading of Bill 2 previously.

Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

10:20

Mr. Eggen: Am I good on that one?

The Speaker: Yup, you're okay.

Mr. Eggen: Okay. Good.

I have a mask on. See; it really is me.

Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words in regard to the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. Again, I will refer back to some very excellent analysis by the member previous from Edmonton-Manning, you know, just talking about priorities and perception and expectations and responsibilities of a government to the population that does elect it. I think we see a pretty good case of the application of that responsibility and the dashing of expectations and, really, a lack of direction that this budget kind of points to.

We know that it's important to be fiscally prudent, but this has to be balanced with a sense of what you are responsible for, right? When it comes down to the provincial budget here and anywhere, really, the lion's share of that expenditure is to the responsibility to health care and education and the safety of the population in general. What I see, and I think what Albertans see across the province – and I've been travelling around the last couple of weeks quite a lot, Mr. Speaker, to different parts of the province: to Red Deer; to Camrose; to Canmore; Calgary, several times; Edmonton, of course, I just wake up and I'm in Edmonton, and what I'm seeing as I've been door-knocking, obviously, is that there's a real gap between what people are seeing on the ground and what this government is saying in regard to not just their budget but their style and choices around governance in general.

One of the most striking things that I see, and I hear it on the ground in all of those places and more, is that health care and access to health care is severely curtailed, especially in smaller centres, where you literally have places like Boyle and Edson and southern Alberta – different towns – having to close down their emergencies or the equivalent of their emergencies in a town because they have inadequate staff for those services, you know?

The reason I mentioned health care and then safety and security is that the two, Mr. Speaker, go hand in hand, right? If you live in an area where you have an expectation that, you know, within 30, 40, 50 kilometres even you can access emergency care and suddenly that's not there, it literally undermines the safety and the security of your family even if you don't happen to have an emergency at that moment. You know that it could be there and it might not be there. That devalues the ability for people to live in a place. It devalues the property value as well. People say, you know: "We're going to move here; it looks like a nice place, a nice town. How's the local hospital?" and you say, "Well, actually, it's shut down half the time because we don't have enough doctors or nurses." That literally puts pressure on the economic development and the habitability of a place, right?

Mr. Speaker, when I look at this budget and the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, I'm looking at those things. Another element that I talked about: about the lion's share of any given provincial budget being, of course, in regard to education. What my particular responsibility is as the official opposition critic for postsecondary education, for colleges, universities, polytechnics around the province – again, we've seen generational cuts, probably some of the biggest cuts in the history of this province, to this sector, and here we are in 2022 with a surplus and we don't see that turning around, right? At least approaching $700 million taken out of the system in the previous three budgets, and those colleges, universities, and polytechnics are suffering. They're reeling with layoffs, with program closures, and just a real lack of direction for the future.

When you take a certain percentage of money from a facility like the University of Alberta in Edmonton or the University of Calgary and so forth, you know, it takes longer for those cuts to be felt, but in some places . . . [interjection] I'd be happy to take the intervention. Thank you.

Ms Goehring: Thank you. I just want to acknowledge some of the incredible work that you've been doing travelling the province, talking to our postsecondary, whether it's instructors or students or families that are deciding to go into postsecondary. You talk about the incredible impacts, and I've heard you share some powerful stories here in this House about what's happening with those that are wanting to get into postsecondary but aren't able to because of the cuts that have happened. I mean, you see it every day when you're talking to Albertans and advocating on behalf of them. You hear their personal struggles and the impacts of the finances and the devastating cuts that this government has made. I would love it if you could share some of that again in this House because I don't feel that this government is taking into consideration the personal impact that's being had across the province with so many families, students, that are really struggling with the horrible decisions that financially this government is making.

Thank you.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you. I appreciate that. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs, you know, we've been sharing that information and talking about it, but sometimes stories are the most powerful way by which to really understand what's going on. The story that I hear, compelling, over and over again from Fort McMurray down to Lethbridge – right? – and the colleges there is that any time you're increasing the tuition rate by 20 to 23 per cent, for example, across the province and then, on top of that, extraordinary tuition increases between 20 to 40 per cent, even up to 103 per cent for a certain counselling program at the University of Alberta, then you are literally shutting the door for a certain sector of the population that just can't afford it. If you move from here to here, you're literally disenfranchising thousands of people from being able to even consider going to university or college or a polytechnic or upgrading themselves as well.

I mean, I know a certain person in my own family that was accepted to the nurse practitioner program, which is a fantastic program. It really helps with our health care system, Mr. Speaker. It really helps to diversify critical care, and I think that this government at least on paper and in words does support using more nurse practitioners in our health system, right? But the words on paper are quite different from what actions do project, and the action is that they've increased the tuition for nurse practitioners such that many people just are not going to go. They literally will not go because they can't afford it, right?

These are usually registered nurses that are already working. They probably, maybe have a family and so forth, so they're already having to budget their time and their money and consider advancing themselves in postsecondary. That's the target for a nurse practitioner, but that program is going to be in trouble because for a whole lot of the many people that were considering it, including my own daughter, it just isn't possible anymore, right? There's a story right there.

I think that we could lose a lot of people. And the extension of that story, Mr. Speaker, is that for the first time since the early 1980s we have a net migration of people between 18 and 25 years old out of this province, right? Again, that is a loss that is irreparable and has long-standing effects to our population. If you're losing that critical group of people – right? – those young people that we educated through K to 12 and set them up and had an expectation for that generation to be here to work and to prosper, if we're losing that, again, we're in big trouble, don't you think, Mr. MLA?

Mr. Bilous: Thank you.

Mr. Eggen: I was going to call you minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much. That's twice today.

You know, I appreciate your comments, and I just wanted to talk a little bit about – you're talking about the cuts to our postsecondaries, the impact it's having on driving students out of the province, which is very, very bad for our province, for our economy, for the future. I was hoping you could also touch on the fact that we know technology companies that are looking to relocate across this country or internationally rely on a strong talent pipeline. That's something that we support very much. This budget has fallen short on funding our postsecondaries, so I was hoping the member can comment on the impact not just it'll have on the outflow or outmigration of young people, but what will that do for Alberta companies or for Alberta trying to attract these major players?

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you. I appreciate that. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, you know, strikes on an important synergy that was just starting to take root between postsecondary and technology here in the province. Yeah, we've seen growth in technology investment across the country. Again, if you are looking at these things as a competition between the 10 provinces and three territories, then everybody is kind of moving up on this pretty much, and Alberta is still lagging behind. At that very particular moment, Mr. Speaker, when we need to diversify our economy and work together to try to keep those young people in the province, then, again, this choice around our budget and supplementary supply and the money we have and resources that we own together – it's not being invested in the right place. Simple as that, right?

If you lose those people, young people, they probably don't come back, right? If a company sees that the universities or colleges or polytechnics are in any way compromised on long-term, stable, predictable funding, then, again, people – they vote with their feet, quite frankly, or they just never even come. You know, it takes a generation or many generations, in some cases, to build the reputation and the integrity of a postsecondary institution, but it only takes a few months to lose it. Lose your reputation: it's gone, very hard to get back. That's what's happening now. Between the lack of investment in postsecondary and a lack of, I guess, let's say, certainty or security and affordability for young people, I think that's a pretty toxic combination, and we certainly could do better.

I know that an investment in postsecondary pays exponential returns. There are no two ways about it. We saw the University of Calgary calculating the literally billions of dollars that the University of Calgary contributes to the city of Calgary's GDP, if we could call it that, right? I mean, it's a bit fluid. I met with the president again during these last couple of weeks down in Calgary, and he calculated, you know, a $5 billion or $6 billion contribution to the overall economy of the city of Calgary, and we could expect that there's some equivalency to that in Edmonton with the University of Alberta and Lethbridge with the University of Lethbridge and Olds with Olds College and Vermilion with Lakeland. I could go on, Mr. Speaker. There are 26 colleges, universities, and polytechnics scattered across this province. It's a unique situation that no other province has, really, that geographic mix of small, medium, and large polytechnics and trades and universities.

You know, Mr. Speaker, you don't know what you've got until it's gone sometimes, and when a place like Lakeland College or Concordia takes a cut – I was there as well last week or 10 days ago – they're having to lay off staff, close programs. Concordia is losing its nursing program, for example, which was an important part of servicing not just Camrose but the whole region all the way up the highway, to social workers as well. I mean, if people train in a certain place, they're more likely to stay there, too.

Mr. Speaker, you know that because, of course, you have Olds College, which really helps to backstop the town of Olds' economy. Simple as that, right? Things might see an economic downturn through energy or whatever, but, hey, we've always got the college. You can see people playing off the synergy there, with the hotel and the brewing program – I definitely took a tour and tasted some of the beer; it was really good – and the abattoir that they have there, the synergy of having the high school in the same campus as the college. I mean, these are all things that happened with a long-term, sustainable investment in funding from the province of Alberta to colleges and universities and polytechnics here in Alberta.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you. I have appreciated the member's comments so far in terms of budgeting priorities and how it impacts Albertans when we look at the bill before us. I think it's important to again note that when we compare the work of the NDP government from 2015 to 2019 and the investments that we did make in postsecondary education to properly freeze postsecondary tuition for Albertans to what we've seen under the UCP, where institutions have now actually had to come to the minister and ask for increases of upwards of a 100 per cent on some programs, I think it clearly shows the difference in values between the NDP and the UCP and clearly shows the difference in an understanding of how we support our economy and diversification of our provincial economy, especially when we made those decisions when the price of oil was so much lower, recognizing that no matter what the price of oil is, Mr. Speaker, we have to ensure that we're supporting Albertans. It's rich, for lack of a better term, that while we have the price of oil now where it is, we've seen the UCP making these decisions.

Mr. Eggen: Yes. Thank you for that. Thank you for bringing me back to, of course, the political realm – right? – which is an important part. People like to denigrate, you know, political elements to policy and so forth, but it's all about that, really. I mean, at least we have, Mr. Speaker, a democratic way by which we can choose and to constructively engage a population and have alternatives, quite frankly. Again, that's a good reminder. I don't know what the price of oil is today, but it's got to be close to a hundred bucks. We were dealing with a $25 barrel back when we were continuing to invest in postsecondary, as just one example. You've got to do that.

I mean, you see it in other jurisdictions, for sure, right? Ireland: it's always tenuous, their economy. They ebb and flow and manage. But they realized a long time ago that their biggest asset is their young people and trying to keep them there, so they have a very affordable college and university program where many of the basic operations and basic tuition are free. The Germans do the same thing, knowing full well that, you know, it's not the coal mines of Germany that keep the country going, but it's the auto industry and their technology industry and so forth and their medical, biomedical industry. Those are the things that move an economy and are some things you can be sustainably pointing to for now and the future.

I mean, those are the kinds of things we need to do here in the province of Alberta, right? I always get a head nod when I talk about these things. The Calgary Chamber of commerce had put it as their top priority to invest in the city of Calgary, and it's a critical element of a redevelopment policy and program to the downtown especially, to have the universities and colleges being invested much more integrally in downtown Calgary.

It goes on from there, right? You can't find a place that – you know, Keyano College: when I was in Fort McMurray a couple of times in the last few months, again, people just really want that as an anchor to the community so that it's not just a place to work and go but a place where people can buy houses and start families and have their kids go to college and get a trade education and things like that.

The whole point here, Mr. Speaker, is that, you know, budgets are the enabling tool for all of these other things, for education and health care, for safety and security, for building the infrastructure that we need to grow, all of those things. Albertans are looking for that, right? Of course, we want to be prudent with our money, and we want to make sure that we're investing and saving for the future as well. People like to equate the provincial budget with a household budget, and right now household budgets in Alberta are suffering. Albertans demand and expect more, and we will be here to help deliver that for them.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, an important piece of legislation that helps this government implement some of the terrible decisions they have made through Budget 2022. In the last two weeks I had the pleasure of attending many different events in my constituency and had the opportunity to talk to many people about the issues facing them. While the government is busy patting themselves on the back for the increase in the WTI price, people are hurting. Their budgets are not balanced, and they're struggling to make ends meet.

In my riding in particular northeast Calgary represents some of the neighbourhoods that are among the neighbourhoods with the lowest per capita income in comparison to many other neighbourhoods in the city of Calgary: Taradale, Martindale, Saddle Ridge. All of them have average household incomes around $29,000, $30,000 as compared to the average in Calgary of $42,000 to $45,000, which means that increases in their insurance costs, increases to their utility bills impact them way harder than some people in other neighbourhoods. I mean, these impacts are difficult to digest for many Albertans across this province, but because I represent some of those neighbourhoods with people who have been impacted already a fair bit by this government's policies, they have been particularly hit hard.

While they have income tax open, what this government could have done to help Albertans was that they could have reversed the changes they have made to income tax exemption brackets, that bracket creep that the Premier used to call while in Ottawa an insidious and pernicious tax grab. That decision alone is taking almost $500 from those Albertans' pockets at a time when they need that money the most. It's costing Albertans across this province almost a billion dollars, and government is working overtime to do everything that doesn't help people in my riding and people across this province at a time when cost of living is going up, like, from utility bills, insurance costs, tuition fees, and even park fees. This government is bending backwards to find more ways to tax Albertans and especially to tax those Albertans who are in the lowest tax brackets, all the while giving billions of dollars – billions of dollars – to the most profitable corporations.

For instance, when we talk about insurance, the first step that this government took was to remove the 5 per cent increase cap on the premiums. I remember the government trying to convince us that unless they do so, insurance companies will leave the province, the insurance business won't be viable, and whatnot. They were standing with the insurance companies and not with Albertans. They then even tried to hide the annual report detailing the premiums, claims, payouts, all those things so that Albertans won't find out that their decision was not based on facts. Their decision was to please their friends, lobbyists, and insiders.

Last week we found out that insurance companies made over a billion dollars in the last two years even during the pandemic, where every business was hurting, every small business was hurting. Albertans were hurting. They were struggling to make ends meet . . . [interjection] I'll take the intervention.

Ms Goehring: Thank you. I think it's important to highlight how some of these decisions are being made. You talked about a government that makes decisions based on what their friends need, not what the average Albertan needs. You talk about businesses struggling. You talk about families struggling. There are so many examples of decisions that this government has made that are based on supporting their friends, the insurance companies, for example, that you highlighted.

When we talk about how the financial decisions made by this government impact families, what are those implications? What happens to a family in Alberta when they're looking at their budget and they see that this government is making decisions to support their friends and not the average Albertan? What does that family budget look like because of the financial decisions that this government has made, because of the decision that they've made to support their friends, not Albertans? I'd like to hear a little bit more about what that means for a family who's struggling to cover the cost of insurance.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you for this important question. Last weekend I was in Banff, and I went out door-knocking with my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora, and we stopped at a house where a single mom spoke to us. She was a barber, and she shared her story with us. Her business is not doing well. She was barely making ends meet throughout the pandemic, and now her utilities have gone up almost double, from $300 to $650. Her insurance has gone up, and basically she wasn't able to pay the rent because she was worried that her utilities would be cut off. These are real people. These are real Albertans who are impacted by this government's decision not to take action, not to do anything to make life affordable for Albertans. They promised relief of $50 on utilities, and on the gas that relief hasn't kicked in yet. If Albertans' bills are going up, like, from $300 to $600 or $700, $50 a month does not make much of a difference.

These increases are a direct result of this government removing the 6.8 cent per kilowatt hour cap that we had in place. That's the direct result of government removing that cap in favour of the corporations, in favour of their friends, and leaving Albertans on their own to fend for themselves. That's how out of touch this government is from Albertans and issues facing them. [interjection] I'll take another intervention.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you. I appreciate the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall. We all have critic areas, and what I'm curious to know is: how is this budget affecting your critic area specifically? I know that we've seen a lot of delays in the execution of justice here in the province of Alberta, and I know just anecdotally from my neighbour I was talking to yesterday – right? – who said that, you know, “I have cases that get deferred so many times that they're lost. They literally are gone.” Whatever transaction or whatever issue it is, after a certain period of time without the timely intervention and a court date or appearance and so forth you lose that case.

Mr. Sabir: Well, thank you. That's a really important question. Over the last three budgets this UCP government has cut over $200 million from the justice system – over $200 million from the justice system – and they have not done anything to address backlogs, to address Jordan delays, and to address the delays that have and will result from the pandemic. People who want to have a day in court are seeing their perpetrators walk scot-free, their cases being dropped in front of them. It's the government that claims they're tough on crimes and whatnot. They have not done anything to address those delays.

They had their opportunity in this budget to make up for those cuts, talk to the stakeholders and the justice system, listen to their needs, and provide for what they need so that Albertans can get justice, so Albertans can access the court system in a timely manner. Instead, what's happening: prosecutors are not happy with them.

They are even thinking of strike action. Some of those stakeholders can't even get a meeting with government ministers so that they can discuss and share their concerns. That's how bad the situation is.

Back to what I was talking about. I was talking about how government had this opportunity to fix many things and fix at least the rising costs that are resulting directly from this government's policies, but they chose not to do that. Instead, this government is piling on the costs for average Albertans. Just one simple policy, bracket creep, is costing Albertans $500 a month. And when you're working on minimum wage, when you're a single income earner, that $500 makes a huge difference. Albertans are also losing around $450 because the Alberta child tax benefit isn't being indexed by this government. Albertans on senior benefits – again, these are Albertans who are on fixed incomes – are losing $750. Under this government plan and with this Budget 2022 an AISH recipient will lose $3,000 in real purchasing power.

Mr. Speaker, these are the decisions that this government could have reversed in this budget, in this piece of legislation, but they are choosing not to because they do not care; they do not listen. The only people who have access to government and their ears are big, profitable corporations. Even when they were giving them billions of dollars, they promised that that will create jobs, that that will bring prosperity back to Alberta, that that will help us fill downtown Calgary. None of that happened.

Those corporations got hundreds of millions of dollars. And what they did? They laid off people right here in Alberta, in downtown Calgary. Downtown Calgary is still sitting at a 30 per cent vacancy rate, and the government solution is that they're giving $500 million to the city of Calgary to fill it up. That's how bad, that's how out of touch they are from the reality.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I move that we adjourn debate on Bill 2.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 10 Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate March 30: Mr. Getson]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm sure we'll have time for everyone to have a few words in regard to Bill 10, Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022. I see this bill as following quite closely federal legislation from some time ago that criminalized this activity and, in fact, criminalized the aiding and abetting of this practice as well. So, you know, that is the main domain of the abolition and the criminalization of this practice. We should keep that in mind, of course, when we are debating this bill.

[Mrs. Frey in the chair]

I mean, that being said, I'm always an advocate of, Madam Speaker, ensuring that we are providing some supports for federal legislation that we do agree with and providing an educative component to federal legislation that is the main driver of this particular practice. I guess that's what, you know, we're doing with Bill 10, and I do support that as such.

I think it's important for us to realize, really, what – my understanding is that we're aiming to send a message to people who otherwise would consider sending a woman or a girl to another place to have these operations, or these cuts, to take place and just to reinforce the message to anybody considering that that, one, it's against the Canadian law and, two, any aiding and abetting of an individual to engage in this practice is against the law, too, right?

If we can get that message to people from various cultures that might consider this, I think that's a worthwhile thing to do, right? You know, although I don't have a great deal of knowledge about female genital mutilation here in this country, I know that in many countries in Africa this is something that governments, federal governments and state governments of various republics and countries around Africa, are taking a sharp focus on, this problem, again, trying to, yeah, certainly criminalize and recognize the . . .

An Hon. Member: Your colleague . . .

Mr. Eggen: Sorry?

An Hon. Member: . . . wants to intervene.

Mr. Eggen: Oh. Sure. Oh, I'm sorry.

Ms Goehring: That's okay.

Mr. Eggen: Here I am standing right beside you.

Ms Goehring: Thank you for the intervention. I think that you raise a really good point, hon. member, that there is a lack of understanding about this practice, and I think a key part of that could be an education component, especially when it comes to the health care professionals in how they support women in this process and support those to help destigmatize what's happening.

I mean, you come from a postsecondary lens, and I think that by talking about, you know, some of the supports that could be provided at the postsecondary level, when those that are entering the health care practice should be educated on this very, very harmful practice – so when we're looking at the postsecondary lens, what health care professionals do you think should be educated about female genital cutting, and how can that impact the education of those that are serving women going forward?

I think that when we're talking about something that is not well known, it's important to consider education. Thank you.

Mr. Eggen: Yeah. I appreciate that, hon. member. You know, I think that that is our purview here, considering it is a federal law that we're dealing with. Part of moving cultural practices away from dangerous situations and so forth is to not just bring down the full hammer of the law and try to put somebody in jail and throw away the key kind of thing – right? – but, rather, for people to understand that not just in Canada but perhaps in their place of origin this process of education, moving away from female genital mutilation, is happening as well. So in a place like Kenya, for example, there are active programs for health.

It's a question of power, too, I think, that if you are imposing this on women and girls, it's an imposition of dominance and of gendered dominance as well, right? So when you're trying to build a modern society in a place like Kenya or in Mozambique or in Tanzania or in Zimbabwe, you must address these things full on. I think that for us as part of different cultural communities in Alberta, let's say, this might have some residual activity still, that you can work with people and educators and with doctors and public health people as well.

Part of the message is that we're trying to move away from this not just, of course, in Canada, by criminalization, but this is also happening perhaps in your country of origin, right? So, you know, it's better to not do this, and it's better for the health of women and girls and the overall equality and sense of justice in this society, which you can follow from that angle as well. These are things that I think we can do.

You know, I must say, though, Madam Speaker, that we need to address a larger issue here, which is that we have adequate access to health care, especially community health care, that can best provide this combination of medical advice and culturally sensitive intervention. Like, you can't do that at the emergency room at the Alex, right? I mean, there are other things going on. Where you can perhaps effect positive change the best through preventative medicine, of which I think this should fall under – preventative medicine, for sure, to dissuade people from this practice – is where community health comes in and having that reach and that trust, that sensitivity, and perhaps even language capacity to talk to people and to work with them to move away from these kinds of activities, right? I mean, that's where you can actually be effective.

What I see in my own community and right across the province is that those community health programs are being cut, right? They're being cut by this UCP government, and they are losing their effectiveness by lack of staffing and by, you know, a sort of bad relationship with the health care professionals that staff and actually make community health centres work and function. Madam Speaker, again, we can't talk about specific procedures and so forth without discussing the support system that actually makes those things work, right? We can say, again, on paper, like with my last discussion around postsecondary, that we support education and postsecondary. You write it down on a piece of paper and you say it out loud here in this Chamber or outside, but if you were literally cutting with the other hand at the same time that same program, the actual critical infrastructure that supports it, then it doesn't make any sense, right?

You know, Madam Speaker, again, we can certainly help through the criminalization of this cultural practice and to support it through education. I mean, you can have a one-two combination on that, but our job here in Alberta is to educate – education takes resources – to use community health outreach to know that people and women and girls and families that are choosing not to do this are supported and encouraged, in fact. Again, you can't just do that with words and on paper; you have to do it with actual supports. Lo and behold, if you do invest in community health, there are all kinds of ancillary benefits that come from that. People are more conscious about preventative parts of their health care and know that they have the security of a community health unit that is there when they need it for themselves and for their families. All of those things are good.

Yeah. Again, I certainly support Bill 10, and I just wanted to point out that it doesn't exist in isolation; it has to be in concert with community health initiatives that all Albertans want and need for themselves and for their families. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I will be supporting this bill, as my colleague has articulated previously. I do have some thoughts in regard to the legislation and just what it will look like once passed in relation to implementation.

I do want to echo the importance of education in ensuring that women and girls have the understanding and the knowledge when it comes to female genital mutilation and their rights as women. I think that, again, this speaks to a variety of concerns when it comes to women being put into positions where they may be vulnerable or there may be power differentials between the relationships that they're part of.

Again, you know, working as a social worker previously to this and working with youth, I continuously had concerns about the young women and the girls that I was working with and those relationships that they were having within their communities. I think that there is a need to ensure that as women are growing up, they understand their rights, they understand their sexual reproductive health and their options, and they understand what a healthy relationship looks like and that the people that are around them also are respectful of those positions and the autonomy of a woman's body.

When I worked in this profession, one of my major concerns was always around ensuring that the women and girls that I worked with weren't being victimized, weren't being trafficked, weren't being brought into situations and coerced into environments where they were being put into environments like sex trafficking or human trafficking.

I think, again, we have a responsibility, when we talk about pieces of legislation like this, that we are ensuring that as much education and support is being provided to women and girls so that they have that understanding and they have those supports in place.

I believe that, you know, because it isn't something that is discussed very often, our health care professionals also need to be aware of those conversations, the requests being made, and then: how do they work with families and how do they work within communities to ensure that the rights of women are being protected and that there isn't pressure being put on young girls to have this procedure done and that their personal health is being protected as much as possible?

I guess some of the questions that I would have when this bill is passed in this Chamber, if that is to happen, are: what is the government doing to ensure that our health professionals have the resources available to them to be able to manage situations such as this? [interjection] Oh, I see an intervention.

Ms Goehring: Thank you to the hon. member. I know in the work that we've done as social workers, it's often a multidisciplinary approach that we take to working with families. I know that when we look at the cuts, specifically to social work of 11 per cent, from this government, that also has an impact when we're talking about how we best support the women and girls specific to Bill 10. I think that there is an importance to understand that when we're working in community and we're working with the well-being of individuals, we need to look at it from a community best practice. Part of that best practice is using a multidisciplinary approach. I know this member has the same background as I with social work, and we often worked very closely with health care providers. We were often the first point of contact when it came to some of these young, vulnerable women when they were being victimized, so having that importance of that education piece when it comes to not just health care workers but the multidisciplinary team is important.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, hon. member. I appreciate the comments. I think, you know, again, looking at that multidisciplinary approach, one of the things that we do know in other jurisdictions in relation to female genital mutilation is that the Society of Obstetricians and Gynecologists of Canada states that it is mandatory for its members to report if they suspect that a female child has been subjected to FGM or is going to be subjected. It is considered a child welfare protection issue. Now, of course, because of that, that speaks to the importance of having a multidisciplinary approach. You want your pediatricians to be able to be educated and understand the signs and the concerns, the behaviours that you may see within a family in relation to this. You want to make sure that you have social workers available that are able to respond to the child protection matters if there is a flag or an identification of this.

But not only just within the medical profession; I think we also see this in the education system as well as our child care system. Many people who are engaging with children at all different stages of life need to have the education and understanding of what signs and indications there may be in relation to a child that may be at risk of having this procedure happen or has had it happen.

Again, I think because it isn't something that is necessarily discussed often – I mean, I'll be honest; as a child intervention worker this wouldn't have been something that I would have had on my radar as a concern that would have been brought forward to me. In fact, I have never had this issue flagged to me as a risk factor for a young girl or a female child. So even my knowledge and understanding would have been very limited had I had a referral made to me as a child intervention worker. I would have required some understanding and some education to be able to work through the different factors that would relate to the family that we would be working with.

So I do think that, you know, it is definitely something that the government, as they move forward with this piece of legislation, must make sure communities are aware of and that they understand. It's one thing to have a piece of legislation introduced into the Chamber, but the policies and the regulations that will be created because of it need to be ensured to be passed along to the people that will be managing and working within this legislation. I don't particularly see, to be honest, within the legislation how this would transfer to some of those multidisciplinary professions and ensure that people, for one, are even aware that this legislation is happening.

And what does that look like in best practice? Where do health providers go to develop the skills that they'll need to be able to manage this? What kind of cultural awareness practices will be required? What kind of ability to be able to have conversation and dialogue around this issue to ensure the best outcome for the child? I don't see how that is happening. I mean, I trust that our medical professionals are very capable of having conversations when it comes to medical procedures, but we're dealing with other complexities when we speak to this very issue.

So, for me, it's not the legislation that I have questions about; it's just the way that we speak about it. It's the terminology that is used, it's the engagement with communities, it's ensuring that all health care professionals and multidisciplinary professionals have an understanding and an ability to work through this so that, one, they know how to report if there is a concern; two, how, if there is a report of a protection issue, social workers like myself would have an understanding to even be able to engage in the conversation; and then, of course, all the other factors that would surround this practice in the sense of risk factors in relation to vulnerable populations. How do we ensure that there aren't types of human trafficking occurring, all the other matters that relate to the overall health of young women that may be involved in child intervention services?

I would like to hear from the government at some point around what the next step would be if this bill were to pass. Will there be experts? Will there be funding available for medical professionals to have an understanding or an expertise in this area? What will that look like? It's one thing to have a piece of legislation, but if it's not actually going to have the outcome, then I guess the question would be: what is the intent? I mean, we know that we can create legislation in this place, but if it doesn't actually transfer to a workable policy or a regulation that Albertans are able to use, it's kind of a moot point.

My hope is that this bill is not going to be something that is potentially approved or passed within this Chamber and then forgotten about. Hopefully, someone on the government side at some point can give a little bit more information, I guess would be the best word, about how this will then be used as best practice. With that, I will take my seat.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I want to thank all of my friends here from the Official Opposition for offering some comments on Bill 10. I hope that I can build on some of the issues that my friend from Edmonton-Manning raised in her comments on this bill. This is around her requests for providing education to new Canadian communities and better supports for those communities. I really want to underline this point, Mr. Speaker, because I do support the bill, and I want to thank the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore for her work in bringing forward this piece of legislation, but although I do support the bill, I am not entirely convinced that the requirements for health care professionals to report instances of female genital mutilation to law enforcement bodies will be sufficient to curtail the practice here in the province of Alberta.

In her comments when she introduced the bill, Mr. Speaker, the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore admitted that the practice doesn't happen here in Alberta – and I sincerely hope that that's true – but that there are communities of people who send their girls to their home countries or to the countries of origin, rather, to have this practice performed on them. I guess I don't see the link between requiring health care professionals to report these cases to law enforcement and actually preventing this from happening because health care professionals presumably won't know that some little girl has had this done to her until it's too late. Then law enforcement will be informed, and then they can step in and carry out whatever punishments are available to them under the Criminal Code, but it doesn't fully explain to me how that will prevent this from happening in the future other than, you know, perhaps other members of that family will be spared from being sent abroad to have this done.

One of the things that I've seen over and over again as the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar for the last seven years is the lack of appropriate cultural supports to help new Canadians raise their families here in an entirely new cultural context that they find themselves in. I represent a riding that is the home to a number of organizations dedicated to advancing the interests and well-being of francophone-African communities primarily, and one of the things that I've heard over and over again from organizations that work with these francophone-African communities is the lack of appropriate cultural supports to families in learning how to raise their children in a Canadian context.

My friend from Edmonton-Manning talked about that in her comments. She mentioned that, in her time as a child intervention worker, she was not aware that this was even a practice, didn't have the education, I guess, or the knowledge to potentially even have the conversation with families that she might be working with. I think that if we want to be successful in preventing this practice from being carried out on children who are currently living in Alberta, then we need to provide the appropriate cultural supports, and they're not there.

The communities that are present and that live and work in Gold Bar tell me over and over again how frustrated they are to deal with the Children's Services department when there are very few people of African origin working in the department. There is nobody who speaks French who can talk to them. I think this is a critical piece that needs to be in place if we want to prevent this practice from happening. [interjection] I see that I've generated an intervention from my friend from Edmonton-Castle Downs, so I'd entertain that now.

Ms Goehring: Thank you very much, hon. member. I think it's really important, the discussion that we're having here in the Chamber, especially when it comes to the lack of understanding with the professionals that are working within these communities of newcomers. I know that you were the previous minister of postsecondary, and you had that hands-on approach with talking with students around what their needs are. Do you see a place within the postsecondary system to start that education process? You know, we have a piece of legislation here that really does nothing to actually provide support to those that need it, to provide support to those in their first language, to provide support to those with a cultural context. Is there an opportunity within the postsecondary system to perhaps provide that education piece, to talk to the families of newcomers, to say: "What do you need? What is missing in the services that you're trying to access? Where are the gaps, and how can the postsecondary institutions perhaps provide a liaison to those gaps?"

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you to my friend from Edmonton-Castle Downs for asking the question. I think that there are a couple of things that I would like postsecondary education or the Ministry of Advanced Education, broadly speaking, to address. Now, I understand that the Ministry of Advanced Education doesn't dictate curriculum to postsecondary education institutions the same way that the Minister of Education is intent on dictating a 50-year-old curriculum to the primary and secondary education systems here in the province, but I would encourage all of the postsecondary education institutions to have a look at their curricula for social work students, for example, or other people who will be entering this field to see if the education contains the appropriate cultural components that those students will be dealing with when they go to work. I certainly think that the ministry has an important role to play in terms of providing adequate financial support for institutions to undertake those reviews and make those changes to the curricula.

I think where the Ministry of Advanced Education could play a much more proactive role is in at least providing adequate English language learning services to new Canadians. This is something that was identified as an issue, that we began working on when I was minister, but there are thousands of new Canadians who just don't have access to appropriate English language learning lessons because their benefits are cut off before they can reach an appropriate level of English language proficiency, and I think that that's something that the government would be well able to address. We have to admit that language barrier is a significant issue when we're dealing with these incredible cultural gaps that we have to cross in order to address this issue, so we literally need to be speaking the same language, I think, in order to be able to address the issue. I think English language learning would help us go a long way.

I want to wrap up my point by just urging the government to take meaningful and immediate action on providing French language services to francophone-African communities in the province of Alberta to prevent these kinds of things from happening.

Now, I honestly don't know. This isn't something that the francophone-African communities have raised with me. Part of the issue is that I am a man and the people that I'm speaking to in the communities are often men, and this kind of issue, as the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore indicated when she introduced the legislation, is something that is talked about between women and that is passed on from grandmother to grandmother, as she said in her speech.

The point is that we need child intervention workers who come from an African background and can speak French so that they can deal with the families in an appropriate cultural context and work with them to explain to them the Canadian context for raising children, and I think that if we provided that, we would go a long way to preventing this practice from being carried out in the future.

The other piece that touches on the intervention from my friend from Edmonton-Castle Downs is that we need to improve the representation in the faculties of the health care professionals who will be working with these communities. You know, I will say that med schools, by and large, have very diverse populations, and they should be a model for other health care professional faculties, but I don't think that we have the same kind of diversity in associated health care professions, and I think that that's something that also needs to be addressed. We need to have more health care workers coming from different cultural backgrounds so that they understand what families are dealing with when they're making these decisions to send their children to their countries of origin to undergo these practices and to help prevent them from engaging in those practices.

There is a lot that needs to be done, in addition to the measures that are in this bill, to take meaningful action to prevent this kind of practice from being carried out in the future, and I really urge all government members to look at what additional supports and practices can be put in place both in the child intervention system and in the health care education system to address this issue meaningfully.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my remarks. Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others on second reading to Bill 10? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my privilege to rise and speak to Bill 10, the Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022, you know, and to speak to this very serious matter. I'll start off by thanking the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore for introducing this piece of legislation on this very, very important topic.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I know that female genital mutilation is illegal under the Criminal Code, as it should be. Performance of FGM is also already an offence under the Health Professions Act and, as such, as well with the College of Physicians & Surgeons.

Now, I appreciate the opportunity that this bill is giving all members of the Chamber to talk about women's health, the importance of women's health, and I also want to touch on a number of points that my colleagues have made. I really appreciated hearing from my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar on his references to a number of points but specifically talking about his experience over the past six-plus years representing the people of Edmonton-Gold Bar and some of the challenges that his diverse group of constituents have raised over the past several years and, you know, a number of ways that the government could enhance this piece of legislation that we are discussing before us today.

First of all, I think it's becoming clear from a number of points that colleagues have made that, yes, this bill does address the legal consequences and ramifications for our health care professionals when it comes to FGM, but what is missing in the legislation is that really important piece around education. You know, I appreciate the fact – my understanding is that the government has indicated that that will come through regulations, but I think, Mr. Speaker, the educational component is absolutely paramount to changing and preventing future cases or instances of FGM.

You know, for that reason, it should be debated in this Chamber. It should be open to the public. We should be engaging with our health care professionals to ensure that they have a voice in what that education looks like. I appreciate that colleagues of mine have spoken about the role of our postsecondary institutions and how they play a critical role in that education. It should start as young professionals are working their way through earning their credentials, not waiting for them as graduates.

Now, granted, for those that obviously have already graduated, it's important that they also have an opportunity for education in a number of different areas from, again, being trained to recognize the different signs to providing supports for women and girls who have gone through this. Now, you know, I won't pretend to be an expert or even to have a thorough knowledge of this area, but I do think it's important that we provide our health care professionals with all of the tools that they need to be successful and to support the very women and girls that we are trying to protect and support through this piece of legislation.

You know, the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar brought up some very good points around language services and ensuring that our new Canadians and folks who have come from other countries have all of the supports that they need to be successful, whether that's through English language learning services – I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that years ago I had an opportunity to attend an ELL class that was being taught in, or the classes occurred in, the Clareview rec centre. It was incredible to participate in just one short class, the impact that that has. I know that those kinds of services require government support, maybe not government to deliver but at least through not-for-profits or community organizations that are on the ground in local communities who know exactly who their clientele are and can tailor those classes to the very folks that are participating in them, but that requires support. [interjection] I see I have a friendly intervention. I will kindly accept it.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, hon. member. I think you made a really good point in your comments in that there is nothing in this legislation that actually addresses the support of women and girls. The title of this bill talks about women and girls, and that is glaringly obvious, that that is missing. To me, not having the voice of those that are impacted is huge. I know that your background is education and that you worked with vulnerable youth. I just think of the importance of your experience working with youth and being able to hear their voice – right? – like, being able to hear what they need and having that perspective of actually those that we're trying to help and support, having them share their voice. As an educator, having hands-on experience with vulnerable youth – you worked with high-risk youth – you were able to see what they needed because they told you. Having that is essential, I think.

Mr. Bilous: Yeah. Thank you very much to the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs for that really important point. It is absolutely critical to ensure that the very people that we are trying to help have a voice and participate in the solution that we're trying to get to.

You know, I was very privileged to work at Edmonton's Inner City High School for six years, working with very high-risk youth.

I mean, I like to describe them as young people who have been unsuccessful in the traditional system for a number of reasons. They face barriers. In my experience, they face more barriers than the average student does and for a myriad of reasons. This is no fault to our public system, but the services that are provided currently through many of our public schools are insufficient. We often talk about wraparound services, but I can tell you that these young people face incredible odds – I can only imagine – yet show up to school every day because they want to change their circumstances, and they do so voluntarily, which is absolutely incredible. Quite frankly, part of the reason I decided to run more than 15 years ago was because I saw that the system needed to be improved and that we needed to get more supports to young people, ironically, not less, which is where we are today with the current UCP government.

When it comes to this bill, I think the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs raised a really good point, that at the moment, the way the bill is currently written, I don't see how the very women and girls that this bill is meant to help, how their voices are reflected in this piece of legislation. Again, I think, quite frankly, if members of the government were in the opposition benches, they would be asking our government the exact same question of: where is that reflected, and can we get that in the legislation? Let's not wait for the regulations, which, of course, are done by cabinet behind closed doors. You know, let's engage with folks to ensure that all voices are represented. I don't know, honestly, who the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore engaged with and consulted with in drafting this legislation. I would hope that she has engaged with those who have experienced this first-hand.

Again, you know, the two pieces that I think could strengthen this legislation are ensuring that women and girls have a voice through this legislation and, as well, a critical piece, that educational piece, to ensure that we are doing everything we can to provide our health care professionals and educators with the tools and education that they need to be able to identify when these practices have occurred, to support the very victims of these practices.

My hope is that the government is open not just to robust debate but to ideas and, potentially, amendments from the opposition but equally from government members as well in order to ensure that we have the strongest piece of legislation that we can moving forward to do what I believe the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore has stated in this Chamber: to prevent these practices from happening. With that, Mr. Speaker, I will take my seat and listen to the rest of the debate on this bill as we move forward.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a privilege to rise to speak to Bill 10, the Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022. I've appreciated the conversations that we've heard so far, the thoughts and comments, especially from the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore, who obviously finds this issue very important, and it shows through the discussions that they've brought forward in the Legislature regarding this important and very sensitive issue. I thank that member in their responsibility as the previous minister handling this issue as well as as a private member, more recently, for bringing this issue and giving us all the opportunity to speak to it.

I think that we've heard from many members at this point that, you know, in some cases or as far as female genital mutilation goes, it is currently illegal under the Criminal Code, and that makes sense. It should be the case. Again, when we look at the Health Professions Act, performing this type of FGM procedure is a criminal act through that association as well. There are codes in place that are dealing with this already on a federal level and from a health professions standpoint. But I think, with that being said – excuse me; from a College of Physicians & Surgeons standpoint. The fact that the member wants to bring this into the Health Professions Act, I think, is a reasonable step forward.

You know, I think that we have heard a lot of important conversations around: while this being a valuable step forward, it's important to recognize that this should just be one step in that direction and not necessarily the last step. I think that the member who brought this legislation forward has made it clear that there are more regulations to come from this. I'm very interested to see how the consultation process moving forward will take shape and what we might expect to see after those regulations and further consultations are happening. Again, this is important, that we get this right not only through this step but also through what's to come in regard to: will we see proposals for ensuring that this is taught on an educational level to health care professionals as they are going through postsecondary or even before, Mr. Speaker, ensuring that education is in place to recognize when this might be taking place and for ensuring that those physicians and surgeons understand the steps following that from the law perspective and from ensuring sensitivity on the issue and so on and so forth?

I think, again, as we've heard from many members on this side of the House, the fact is that we can put this type of legislation forward, but if we aren't ensuring that there are health care providers in communities who are prepared to address this and, Mr. Speaker, are there in the first place, this legislation won't do as much as the member might expect it to. We've heard again and again that many communities across the province are currently without primary care networks, potentially without physicians and family GPs, so we need to ensure that we are doing everything we can to provide those wraparound services to ensure that there are supports in place to tackle this issue and many other issues regarding such services.

We continue to be very concerned that, you know, Mr. Speaker, hundreds of millions of dollars have gone unspent when it comes to the health care system, especially as we move through the pandemic, and even more so it is an even bigger concern when we look at rural communities and communities outside of the major centres while it's, of course, an issue inside our urban communities as well.

Mr. Speaker, again, I have appreciated the conversations that we've heard about this. I think that there is more that we can do on this issue, but I appreciate the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore for bringing this forward, for beginning those conversations, ones on an issue that is quite clearly very important to that member. I thank all members for taking part in this debate and discussion.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 10, Health Professions (Protecting Women and Girls) Amendment Act, 2022. I'd like to begin by thanking the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore for bringing forward this piece of legislation. We don't hear about this very often, and I think this piece of legislation will certainly help us raise awareness about an issue that's not very often talked about.

I went to social work school with a diverse group of students back in 2007-2008, and that's the first time that I heard about it. I think that, as was said in this House, it's outside the Criminal Code and it's currently not being practised in Canada, so we don't hear a whole lot about it. I was looking up on the World Health Organization website, and I was shocked that there are 200 million women and girls that are subjected to this practice. That's 200 million girls and women. That's a brutal violation of rights of girls and women.

As this bill was moved from a private member's bill to a government bill, I hope that at the later stages the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore or other members of this House will be able to bring forward amendments and government will be willing to attach some money to this bill so that this bill can carry out its intended purpose, it can raise awareness about this important issue, and it can take steps to make sure that, directly or indirectly, this practice is not happening in any way, shape, or manner in our society.

When this bill was last before the House – that was before the constituency break – I did take some notes, and the Member for Lethbridge-East mentioned that it was not within our jurisdiction. Well, the Criminal Code is also not within our jurisdiction, but the Alberta Health Professions Act does prohibit it, and the provisions contained in this legislation will further strengthen those prohibitions and make sure that if health professionals come to know about this, there are proper procedures in place and there is a reporting mechanism.

What I really want to talk about is when the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore was speaking to this bill, she mentioned that it's not happening in Canada but that there are girls, there are women that were sent to their countries to perform this procedure, and then they are brought back to Canada. I think it's deeply concerning if this is happening in Alberta, in Canada in this day and age. We do not have – I tried to research as much as I could, but we do not have any information, any data, to show how often that's happening, where that is happening, which communities it's happening in, and this bill does not address whether we will be doing anything to make sure that it's not happening and that girls are not sent to the countries to be subjected to this inhumane practice.

My hope is that at a later state the government will look into it – now that it's a government bill, the government certainly has resources at their disposal – that they will put in some effort and share with the House any information that they can gather about the extent of this practice happening here in Canada indirectly.

I think we also need to find ways that we can work with the communities where this practice is happening and provide them with the supports that they need, provide them with the information they need so that we can put an end to this practice. As my colleague from Edmonton-Gold Bar mentioned, people who come here as newcomers often face many barriers, from cultural understanding to language barriers. I think one way of supporting those communities will be that we are able to provide language supports so that they can learn about the systems here, learn about the culture here, learn about the laws here, and be able to adjust themselves accordingly. In the absence of those supports that becomes very difficult.

I represent a constituency that has quite a high number of people with English as a second language, and what this government has done in the last couple of months, in this budget in particular – they've even completely cut a program called learners support, that was providing language support to newcomers. They replaced that with a new program that is completely at the discretion of the Minister of Advanced Education, and people will only get supports if there is money and the Minister of Advanced Education decides to provide support for that program. With one hand the government wants to raise awareness about this practice, the government wants to put an end to this practice, but at the same time the government is also cutting those vital supports that will help us raise awareness of this practice and put an end to this.

The Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but pursuant to Standing Order 4(2.1) the House stands adjourned until this afternoon at 1:30.

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, we will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by Ms Brooklyn Elhard. I'd invite you to join in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all of us command.
With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
The True North strong and free!
From far and wide, O Canada,
We stand on guard for thee.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, seated in the Speaker's gallery today is Ms Tina Beaudry-Mellor, a former member and cabinet minister from the province of Saskatchewan. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have a number of guests joining us today in the galleries. I would invite those guests, when I call your name, to please rise and remain standing until the conclusion of the introductions. Hon. members, this afternoon we have one School at the Leg. I had the pleasure of meeting them in the hallway today. They are joining us from the constituency of Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock. Please welcome Eleanor Hall school.

Joining us in the gallery are two guests of the Minister of Health, who are here in recognition of the 101st anniversary of optometry as a regulated practice: Dr. Gordon Hensel, registrar of the Alberta College of Optometrists; Mr. Brian Wik, CEO of the Association of Optometrists.

Also joining us are Frances Wright along with four guests from the Famous 5 Foundation, who are here to commemorate the 106th anniversary of equal suffrage in Alberta. They are guests of the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Also joining us in the gallery today – I'm not sure if they've joined us yet – seven guests of the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood who are here. They are well known to the Assembly. They are the Imperial Sovereign Court of the Wild Rose.

Finally, members, it is my pleasure to introduce to you Scott Smulski and Alan Smulski, who are guests of the Member for Grande Prairie. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Educational Curriculum Redesign

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, last year I was incredibly lucky to become a father to a wonderful baby boy, Clark Aaron Carson. As a new father I am excited to watch him grow, learn, and develop. I want my son to be able to get the same great Alberta education taught by world-class teachers that I was lucky to have, but if this government has its way, I am worried about the education system he might enter.

Instead of a balanced curriculum that will teach and guide the future leaders, innovators, educators of Alberta, this government is maintaining their decision to double down on their Dumpster fire of a curriculum. From one corner of this province to another, teachers, principals, school divisions, Indigenous communities, racialized communities, francophone communities, academics, previous Conservative Education ministers, and other provinces and territories have rejected this curriculum and told this government to start again. This curriculum, written in part by the Premier's racist friend, condemned even by members of the UCP caucus, has failed and cannot be recovered.

A government that was motivated by the best interests of the students of Alberta would act with humility and understanding, pull this draft, and start over. Instead, we have the Premier and the Education minister, who choose to wear earplugs and make false claims about the previous curriculum, playing politics rather than working with Albertans to get the best for our children.

As a representative for Edmonton-West Henday I will stand in opposition to this curriculum, as my constituents have asked me to, but as a new father and someone who wants to ensure that my son has the best opportunities to succeed, I also oppose this curriculum and urge this government to finally, at long last, listen. Like all parents, I want my child to have the best, to be afforded every opportunity, and to have a government and education system on his side, something that won't happen if the Premier is allowed to force his failed, disgraceful curriculum into our schools. Our children deserve better than the UCP and this failed curriculum.

Thank you.

Educational Curriculum Redesign

Mr. Neudorf: Alberta students have waited a long time for an updated and revamped curriculum. After years of declining scores in math and reading, Albertans asked us to bring kids back to the basics. They asked us to ensure that their kids are given a strong foundation so that they can succeed.

Mr. Speaker, there are some who are calling to scrap the draft and bring back the draft curriculum that the previous NDP government failed to finish. They had four years in government, four years to get the job done, and they failed, and who paid the price? Students.

This government promised a transparent, open engagement that allowed all Albertans to have their say, and that's exactly what we did. Mr. Speaker, we engaged with teachers, parents, and education experts. We hosted online engagement sessions, telephone town halls, regular meetings with piloting teachers, and created a public survey for Albertans to give their feedback.

All of the feedback received was used to make changes and even delay implementation of some subjects. We want to get this right for our children. This government is listening to Albertans, and what we heard is that students have been falling further behind in reading and math, especially due to the pandemic, and that they are struggling with mental health. Parents have also been loud and clear that they want their children to learn about financial literacy and consent.

The three new subjects being implemented in the fall – math, phys ed and wellness, and English language arts – will help get our students back on the right track with reading, writing, math, wellness, financial literacy, and consent.

Mr. Speaker, the Education critic on the other side of the aisle admitted that she didn't even read the finalized curriculum before criticizing it. She would ignore the remarkable results seen in school divisions like Fort Vermilion, where students improved three full years in literacy and two years in numeracy using this curriculum and assessment interventions provided by this government last fall.

I ask that, for once, the opposition focus on what matters. This is real life, Mr. Speaker, and we can't ignore the progress for political theatre. Our children deserve better. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. Member for Grande Prairie is next. However, before calling upon her to make her member's statement, I might just remind all members of the Assembly – and I know you're all very excited to see each other after an extended break – that if you can keep any side conversations to a minimum, that way the member with the floor can be heard the best.

The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Support for Small Business

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise, and, as you already mentioned, I have guests joining us in the gallery today. It's my pleasure to personally welcome my friend Scott Smulski and his father, Alan Smulski.

I first met Scott a few months ago when I needed a plumber at my condo here in Edmonton. I had the fortune of meeting Scott Smulski during that service call, and I received great service and had such an interesting conversation with him about being a family man with young children, running his own small business, and the pressures of life, balancing those responsibilities.

Mr. Smulski was sincerely interested in my work as an MLA and was curious about why I ran for public office, my background, and what led me to leave my private life. All of this got me thinking back to my why, Mr. Speaker. Why did I choose this very public role that was so outside my comfort zone? In short, to make life better for all Albertans, to restore the Alberta advantage, and to serve families like the Smulskis.

Mr. Speaker, I come from humble beginnings, and I'm proud of that. I'm grateful for my hard-working and entrepreneurial family, and I'm grateful for my parents, who gave me the example of commitment and dedication running their own small business for almost 50 years. My parents taught me not to complain; rather, to stand up for what I believe in and to be dedicated, to use my abilities to make a difference.

Don't complain about it; do something, Mr. Speaker, and so I did. I ran for office because the trajectory of this province under the NDP was untenable. It was costing small-business people and young families; small-business people like Scott and families like the Smulskis.

With all of the challenges of the last few years, the economic downturn, the world oil crash, COVID, I'm proud to be part of a government that is standing up for hard-working Albertans. I'm proud to be part of a government that remained focused and, despite all odds, brought in a balanced budget. I want to thank Scott and Alan Smulski today for being here and for reminding me why this fiscal discipline matters. I want to leave this province in better shape after my time in office, and I want families like the Smulskis to know that we aren't funding today's projects by leaving a debt burden for their children to carry.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Official Opposition and Government Policies

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta's NDP will deliver for Alberta communities. It's simple: because we listen. We listen to municipal leaders when they call for sustainable funding. We listened when they told this Premier that establishing an Alberta police force was a waste of money and would do nothing to improve the justice system.

We listened to school boards when they said that they needed more help to combat rising COVID-19 cases in schools, and we listened to them when they told us the Premier's Dumpster-fire curriculum was backwards-looking, racist, regressive, and had no place in Alberta classrooms.

We listened to local health care workers when they said that their hospitals were overwhelmed and that there weren't enough beds to put patients in and that there weren't enough staff to provide proper care, and we're listening to our constituents when they tell us that this government should be working to make life more affordable, to put more money in their pockets. We're listening when they tell the Premier to keep his hands off their pensions, and we're listening when they tell us that we need a real plan to diversify the economy and create new, sustainable jobs.

Mr. Speaker, I'm proud to spend so much of my time listening to Albertans and engaging with them. I heard the concerns from Athabasca about the need to upgrade highway 55, and I was honoured to table a petition on behalf of residents demanding better for the community. Guess what? Now that road is being upgraded. Even in opposition, Alberta's NDP delivers for rural communities.

That's not me speaking, Mr. Speaker, but the people of Athabasca. Imagine what we will do for all Albertans and the communities they love and live in once we form the government once again.

Thank you.

Teacher Disciplinary Process

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, when parents send their children to school, they should be able to do so with peace of mind knowing that their children are growing and learning in a supportive environment. They shouldn't have to worry about teachers exhibiting inappropriate behaviour with children.

Unfortunately, this was not the case for constituents of mine, Todd and Loni Snow, whose daughter was a victim of professional misconduct by her teacher. In their case the current Alberta Teachers' Association teacher discipline process took five years and left the Snow family feeling completely let down by the system.

Mr. Speaker, the current ATA process is a huge conflict of interest as the ATA acts as both the union and the body responsible for adjudicating professional conduct hearings for their union due paying members. In the Snow's situation it was disturbing to learn that the ATA felt they had no duty to report criminal acts involving children to the police because it might jeopardize their own hearing process.

It is clear that this process has to change. That is why this government is reforming the teacher disciplinary process for all teachers and teacher leaders. All regulated health professionals in Alberta except the ATA have a regulatory body, like the College of Physicians & Surgeons, whose function is to serve and protect the public's health and well-being. Alberta is currently the only province where the teachers' union has sole responsibility to pay and deal with discipline for their active members.

Our constituents are telling us that this process needs to be reformed. That is why our government is replacing this outdated model. We will do this by creating the Alberta teaching profession commission. The commission will be responsible for overseeing conduct and competency complaints for all teachers and teacher leaders. This legislation will also reaffirm and strengthen the duty to report to police the criminal acts involving children. This is a best practice that will further protect our children from a few bad actors.

Automobile and Trucking Industry Insurance Costs

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, like many Albertans, so many of my constituents in Calgary-Bhullar-McCall rely on their vehicles to get to and from work. In fact, for many their vehicle is their livelihood. They deliver goods, they shuttle passengers in cabs, they drive long-haul trucks. I could go on and on. They need to insure those vehicles. Their businesses run tight margins as it is. They were so grateful to the NDP government when it put in place a 5 per cent cap on auto insurance premiums. This allowed them to plan their finances. It made things more affordable.

But this government doesn't care about any of that. Instead, they listened to their friends and former campaign managers who are now lobbyists for the insurance industry. They paid out political favours by stripping away the rate cap. What happened? Insurance costs shot up by 30 per cent in some cases. The industry as a whole raked in $385 million more in 2020 than they did the year prior. The profits industry wide were more than $1.3 billion. A profitable industry, indeed.

But who suffers? It's my constituents. In fact, it's every Albertan suffering that relies on their vehicle to get to and from work, that relies on their vehicle to pick up their kids from school and soccer practice. My constituents and Albertans are fed up. They're tired of this government ignoring them. They did nothing when a record hailstorm hit northeast Calgary in 2020, and they're actually going out of their way to make things harder for them now by driving up costs and taking money out of their pockets.

The Alberta NDP will be there for my constituents and for all Albertans relying on their vehicles. We will stand up for families, and if we form government, we will put more money back in their pockets, no matter what it takes.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Cancer Awareness

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Spring is finally here. Spring is a time of renewed life, activity, and hope. We all need hope, but for those battling cancer and their loved ones, it is what sustains them on their arduous journey. Every April the Canadian Cancer Society launches its Daffodil Campaign. The daffodil, the first flower to bloom in spring, symbolizes hope for those battling this dreadful disease. The campaign raises awareness for support programs and services for patients, families, and caregivers and advances cancer research to prevent, detect, and treat cancer, giving hope for brighter and longer days, an optimism that soon we can find cures for every form of this devastating disease.

Cancer touches everyone. Sadly, the odds are that 1 in 2 will develop a form of cancer over their lifetime. That means that 54 Albertans receive the gut-wrenching news every day, beginning some of the most difficult, challenging, and painful times of their lives. Fortunately, there continue to be breakthroughs in the prevention, detection, and treatment of many forms of cancer, progress that is as welcome as the blooming of daffodils in spring.

Since about 4 in 10 cases of cancer are preventable, Albertans should talk with their doctors about steps they can take to lower their risks.

Combined with awareness and early detection, these actions dramatically increase the chances of survival. When caught early, there are more cancer treatment options available and more opportunities and hope for a positive outcome. Early treatment is vital to beating cancer, and I am so glad this government prioritized cancer surgeries throughout the COVID-19 pandemic to provide Albertans with the care they needed.

Please join me, Mr. Speaker, in extending your best wishes to every Albertan living with cancer and their loved ones and helping provide hope for those who need it. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Unity

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There is too much division. Albertans need more unity. Some say: of course we can have unity, if only you will agree with me. That's not unity. Unity does not require us to always agree. Unity means disagreeing without being disagreeable. Conflict is inevitable; contention is a choice. What about labelling and calling people names? Is that going to produce unity? No.

Some say that unity requires you to follow the leader, but, Mr. Speaker, what if you're being led over a cliff? Should you fall like a lemming? No. If you're a member of a team and there is cheating, are you supposed to look the other way for the sake of unity? No. Winning does not justify cheating. Unity without integrity makes unity unvirtuous. Unity cannot be forced or coerced. Albertans see it, feel it, and will not unite with it.

But what if the truth angers some? Should we forsake truth for the sake of unity? No. But we should speak the truth in love. Honesty is the best policy. Without trust there is no unity. It is better to unite with honesty even if the truth disrupts the status quo. Mr. Speaker, can we sow disunity and expect to reap unity? No. Unity requires listening, valuing, and respecting others. There is great unity when men and women share a commitment to do what is right, letting the consequences follow. Albertans see it, feel it, and will embrace it and will unite with it.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Insurance Company Profits and Premium Costs

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, let's start today with some good news and some bad news. The good news: the UCP government finally stopped hiding the report that describes car insurance company profits. The bad news: it shows that the Premier took the cap off premiums, and once he did, Albertans got absolutely side-swiped. In 2020 the car insurance industry forced Albertans to pay an extra $385 million in premiums. Why is this UCP government so focused on shoring up insurance profits at the expense of Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. What we're focused on is ensuring that Albertans have a long-term, sustainable automobile insurance industry and market available to them. We are dealing with the systemic issues that are increasing costs, resulting in higher premiums. That's why we introduced and passed Bill 41. The result of that piece of legislation is reducing costs, which is resulting in lower premiums for Alberta motorists.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, let's talk about what the minister's sustainability looks like for families when that insurance bill goes up. It means pulling kids from after school activities, it means putting off critical home repairs, it means less groceries in the cart at the checkout. Why doesn't this Premier listen to those families who are struggling instead of his close friend and campaign manager Nick Koolsbergen, the lobbyist for big insurance? Quite good at his job, I must say.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The members opposite, the NDP, when they were governing, didn't have the courage to deal with the systemic issues that were creating cost pressures in the insurance industry. They just put a Band-Aid on the problem, a rate cap on the problem, that ultimately was resulting in Alberta consumers having fewer options. Insurance companies, predictably, were pulling options back because of their exposure. This government is dealing with the systemic issues. We passed Bill 41. Insurance premiums are levelling off and, in fact, coming down.

Ms Notley: Levelling off, Mr. Speaker: Intact, up 10 per cent; Wawanesa, up 20 per cent; Co-operators, up 22 per cent; Aviva, up 23 per cent. Is that levelling off?

Mr. Speaker, these companies collected a billion dollars more in premiums than they paid out in claims in a pandemic year when lots of Albertans had parked their cars. I think the Premier ought to be sympathetic. His truck sat for so long that he forgot how to put gas in it, for heaven's sake. Does the Premier really think it's fair that insurance companies profited so heavily off Albertans during a pandemic?

Mr. Toews: Well, Mr. Speaker, again, the members opposite, when they were governing, didn't have the courage, didn't really deal with the issue at hand. They simply put a Band-Aid on the problem, which was a rate cap. That was resulting in an unsustainable industry. Products were being pulled from Alberta consumers. We have dealt with the systemic issues that are driving up costs. That's resulting in seven insurers applying for – what? – rate reductions since late 2021. In fact, the AMA is leading the charge and has applied for a 7 per cent reduction in premiums. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. the Leader of the Opposition for her second set of questions.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, after 30 per cent I'm pretty sure they can afford a year of no increases.

Government Policies and Cost of Living

Ms Notley: Right now Albertans are paying more for car insurance, for utilities, school fees, groceries, and more. Everyone can see costs going up. In fact, the Bank of Canada revised their inflation forecast upward again to 5.3 per cent. Let's be clear. The UCP budget doesn't help Albertans fight inflation; it actually makes it worse. By the end of their fiscal plan Alberta families will lose $700 every year because of the Premier's pernicious bracket creep policy. Why is the Premier's plan to deal with the rising cost of living to make Albertans pay for it?

Mr. Toews: Well, Mr. Speaker, that's simply not true. I can tell you that the folks in this House who have raised costs on Albertans are the members opposite. When they were in government, they brought in the largest tax increase in the province's history in the carbon tax. They raised the tax on every business in the province. They added regulatory burden to every Albertan, every nonprofit, and every household, chasing out tens of billions of dollars of investment. The members opposite have no right to ask these kinds of questions with respect . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition.

Ms Notley: After inflation the second-largest contributor to the rising cost of living in this province is this government. It's simple. The greater the inflation shoots up, the less Albertans get back in benefits. The average family of four will get $125 less every year from the child and family benefit, low-income seniors lose $900 a year on the seniors' benefit, and Albertans on AISH get $3,500 less. Why doesn't the Premier help Albertans fight the rising cost of living by giving them the benefits that they are entitled to?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we are working at dealing with the issues around the cost of living. We inherited a fiscal train wreck from the members opposite, and we embarked on a four-year plan to bring fiscal responsibility to this government and to this province. In spite of that and in spite of having support payments for our severely handicapped much higher than other provinces, we did not reduce those payments. [interjections] We've maintained those payments well above . . .

The Speaker: Oh, it's so unfortunate. You didn't have the opportunity to provide a heckle that may have been unparliamentary.

The Minister of Finance is the one with the call.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have maintained those payment amounts well above any other province's levels of supports, and on top of that, we've brought in a balanced budget.

Ms Notley: Well, that might sound just great if they hadn't ran in the last election, Mr. Speaker, on the promise of indexing AISH and then suddenly turned around and broke their promise. Now, yesterday MNP released a consumer price index, and it warns that Albertans are in the worst shape to cope with the spike in the cost of living in the country. Bankruptcy filings have jumped 18 per cent, and half of Alberta households reported they are $200 away from not meeting their monthly bills. The Premier could help today. Will he commit to stopping his pernicious bracket creep tax on inflation right here, right now? Just keep that one promise.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The members opposite talk about affordability concerns. Had they not brought in their carbon tax, the price Albertans pay for everything would be lower, and that's a fact. We're doing more than that. We brought in an electricity rebate program that will provide utilities relief for every household. We have eliminated the fuel tax at a time when energy prices are high. That will reduce the costs for every Alberta motorist, every Alberta business that uses fuel, every nonprofit that drives.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition for her third set of questions.

Alberta Health Services CEO Departure

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, Albertans deserve high-quality health care that's there for them when they need it so that if their children are diagnosed with a severe disease, they can see a specialist; if they are in an accident, they can get surgery; if their parents need mental health support or some kind of support after a fall, they don't have to wait for hours or days in ER. Yet, instead of support and stability, the UCP plan has been nothing but chaos and upheaval, and the firing of Dr. Verna Yiu is just the latest example. Why is this Premier kick-starting his health care agenda by canning a well-respected doctor who defends public health care?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the hon. member for the question. First of all, I want to thank Dr. Yiu for her years of service. She committed, provided stability for our system for a period of time. As I indicated two weeks ago, when an agreement was reached between Dr. Yiu and AHS that she would be leaving, this wasn't about the past six years; this is about the next five years. We are embarking on a transformation agenda. We've already started that, but it was delayed through COVID. We are focused on providing this service for Albertans, and we need a leader in there that can get in there as quickly as possible and lead the change over the next five years.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, here's the real reason. In the middle of a global pandemic Dr. Yiu led with honesty, with respect, and with the principle that universal public health care is a basic human right. Meanwhile this UCP government chased away doctors, pushed front-line workers to exhaustion, and drove hospitals to near collapse in their best summer ever. Unlike the UCP, Dr. Yiu is well respected by the front-line health care workers who keep this system going. At a time when the health care system needs more stability, not less, to the Premier: why in heaven's name did your government fire her?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, that is simply not the case. As I indicated earlier and as we indicated two weeks ago and again last week, the reason for the change was, quite frankly, to ensure that we have a leader in place to be able to make the transformation over the next five years and to do this as quickly as possible. I thank Dr. Yiu for all the work.

Our government is investing in health care. Mr. Speaker, in the last budget we invested $600 million, additional dollars, this year, $600 million next year, $600 million the year after that. That's $1.8 billion in additional funding, the highest levels ever, plus we're investing in capital. We are going to provide for the health of Albertans.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, the truth is that this Premier is trying to kill two birds with one stone. He's now trying to shift the blame for his government's botched pandemic response onto Dr. Yiu and AHS in order to please his antiscience, antivaccine wing of his caucus and party, one that doesn't support him right now. It's brutally obvious that Dr. Yiu is the sacrificial lamb, the scapegoat in yet another episode of the UCP soap opera. Who loses? The Albertans who need a well-functioning, stable health care system. Why does the health of Albertans always come second to UCP politics?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, that is simply not the case. We are investing in health care. The last budget: $600 million. What does that include? It also includes billions of dollars in regard to additional infrastructure. That includes an additional $100 million each and every year to expand ICU. That includes investing it in continuing care, in home care. That includes over 1,500 new spaces this year for continuing care and another $200 million for more continuing care spaces next year. We are investing in health care, we are providing stability, and we're going to deliver for Albertans. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Seniors' Drug Coverage

Ms Sigurdson: Seniors cannot trust this government. Three years ago one of this government's first actions was to, without warning, remove tens of thousands of Albertans from health benefits, forcing them to scramble to find new benefits. Today I stood with Gord Colwell, a 30-year veteran of the Calgary fire department, whose wife was forced to find new health benefits after the government removed her from his plan. Can the Premier explain to Gord and his wife, Mary Anne, why he decided to kick them from the benefits they had been relying on for years?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. As the hon. member knows, this stems from a change that we made two years ago. The reason for the change was to be able to manage costs so that we can not only manage the cost but reinvest into our drug care plan. I can tell you that we are spending more on our drug care plan than ever, over $2 billion this year, more than last year and more than the previous government as well. We made decisions to manage growth and to target those so that we can actually continue to provide for seniors. This change was to ensure that seniors who are eligible for the program would actually get . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: As a direct result of this government, 40,126 Albertans lost their insurance. This meant that families like Gord and Mary Anne were forced to spend an extra $200 a month to ensure that they could have their essential medications covered. They are far from the only people who this government forced to scramble to find health insurance. Does the Premier have any idea what the out-of-pocket costs incurred by Alberta seniors are because of this horrendous policy? Does he know? Does he even care?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to be clear for Albertans that the seniors drug plan is that: it's a plan for seniors. The change we made was that dependents who are not seniors would no longer be on the plan. However, they could actually apply for Blue Cross. This change brought us in alignment with every single province across the country, and we have one of the most generous benefits for our seniors. We continue to invest in our health care program, and we're going to deliver not only for seniors but for all Albertans.

Ms Sigurdson: Forty thousand one hundred and twenty-six Albertans were removed from their health plans with little warning. Those are the facts, whether the government likes them or not. This government spends thousands on private plane flights for their friends, millions on an embarrassment of a war room, billions on a nonexistent pipeline but refuses to take action and acknowledge the hardship this policy has caused. Does the Premier agree that the seniors who built this province deserve better? Will he apologize today for the hardship he's putting them through, and will he reverse this terrible policy that has taken money directly out of seniors' pockets?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I just want to be crystal clear about this. You know, the hon. member on the other side suggests that we're taking money out of seniors' pockets. That is simply not the case. The change we made to this plan was that individuals who were dependents who were not seniors would no longer be eligible for the plan, but instead, you know, a government-sponsored Alberta Blue Cross plan. They could actually invest in that and continue to get coverage. Why did we do this? We did this to be able to manage costs so that we can reinvest all the savings associated with this into our health system. We are spending $2 billion on our drug plan, more than any time in the history of Alberta. We will continue to support Alberta's seniors.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod is next.

Federal Emissions Reduction Plan

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In releasing its third insane climate plan in as many years, the Trudeau government has fully embraced Soviet market mechanisms beyond the ever-increasing carbon tax. Not only does the plan include a cap on internal combustion engines as soon as 2026 but now also a tax on pickup trucks. It turns out that the ever-increasing carbon tax, the second carbon tax on clean fuel standards, cash rebates for electric vehicles, and even a cap on internal combustion engines are not enough to convince Canadians to stop buying pickup trucks. Would the Minister of Environment and Parks please tell the Assembly how the Alberta government has communicated its opposition to this plan?

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you to the member for the question. Mr. Speaker, the federal government's carbon plan and emissions reduction plan is insane. It's unachievable, it's unaffordable, and it's unconstitutional. Our government wanted answers immediately after it was introduced on March 29, and Alberta government officials were offered a two-hour briefing. Over two hours after the media got a briefing, our minister of environment was offered a 15-minute briefing at the airport. In the meantime the federal government – the minister of environment does not even seem to be aware of what's in his own plan.

Mr. Reid: Given that transportation is the largest source of emissions in most provinces outside of Alberta and given that we were told a carbon tax would change consumer behaviour and was a market mechanism and given that car sales have been cut in half across this country since Trudeau brought in the federal carbon tax while the sale of light trucks, including vans and SUVs, has exponentially increased, again, can the Minister of Environment and Parks please tell this Assembly if he told the federal minister of the environment to stop this ineffective carbon tax?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the meeting with the federal environment minister, our Minister of Environment and Parks did raise concerns about the rising costs of everything, including $2 per litre for gas and diesel, to all Canadians, including seniors, who are finding it hard to even heat their homes or fill their cars, and how this insane climate plan made things even worse. The world needs more oil and gas, and it should come from a place from Alberta. The federal government does not seem to understand that the question is one of the above, either do they want to export more oil and gas, or do they want to export the jobs?

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the carbon taxes have not been the market mechanism fantasy that the Liberal-NDP coalition has sold it as and given that the other market mechanisms that the Soviet commissars in Ottawa continue to dream up will likely fail as well and given that Alberta common sense can lead the way to tangible outcomes, can the Minister of Environment and Parks tell this Assembly how transportation emissions can be reduced?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can tell you what won't work, and that's taxing pickup trucks. Alberta's been the wealth creation engine of the nation, and there's a lot of wealth created out of the back of a pickup truck. Whether that's in energy, forestry, or agriculture, pickup trucks are essential, and we will defend pickup truck owners in the province from undue taxes. But if we really want to punch above our weight as a nation, as the country of Canada we should be building five more LNG plants, exporting our clean LNG to Asia to off-set coal-fired electricity.

2:10 Insurance Company Profits and Premium Costs (continued)

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, no one elected the UCP to be a handmaiden of the insurance industry, but a report, that the UCP tried to hide, showed that insurance companies charged us $385 million more in premiums in 2020 than they did in 2019 and had bigger profits than ever. Albertans deserve answers. Today we'll ask that a committee of the Legislature investigate these obscene profits and take real action to reduce car insurance costs. Will the Finance minister support this motion, or does he need to go and get his marching orders from the insurance lobbyists first?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, that's ridiculous. We did not hide a report. My department, because there had not been a request for that report for two years, chose to just ensure the information was available online. When I found that out, I asked for them to publish the report, they moved forward ASAP, and the report was made public.

Mr. Speaker, this government is dealing with the systemic issues driving up insurance costs. We're seeing those costs start to level out. In fact, we're seeing those costs start to come down. We'll continue to monitor it.

Ms Phillips: Well, given that without warning the government removed the 5 per cent rate cap that the NDP used to keep costs under control and given the UCP claim that there wasn't a problem because the Premier personally got a rebate – oh, what a relief – and given that despite the claims by the Finance minister and government costs have been going up for Alberta drivers, sometimes to the tune of 30 per cent, why doesn't the Finance minister think that Albertans deserve an in-depth investigation by the Legislature into why people's car insurance costs are skyrocketing during a pandemic?

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, the members opposite keep talking about their rate cap. Effectively, they brought in a rate cap, which limited premiums for our insurance providers, but they didn't deal with the systemic issues. Ultimately, what that would result in is insurance product offerings being pulled back. Ultimately, if taken to its end, it would result in the nationalization of the automobile insurance industry. That's what the members want. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, given that life is getting less affordable under the UCP as income taxes go up, utility bills are going up, property taxes are going up, and in 2020 Albertans' premiums went through the roof and insurance companies collected $1.3 billion in profit and given that the UCP tried to hide the proof of this by withholding the report, will the Finance minister commit that he won't try and play games with the 2021 report, and will he make sure that Albertans can see exactly how much his policies enriched his friends in the insurance industry at our expense?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, unlike the members opposite, again, we're dealing with the systemic issues driving up costs and the issues that are increasing premiums for Alberta motorists. That's why we introduced Bill 41. Bill 41 has resulted in a cost reduction across the board. It's resulting in lower premiums. Seven insurers have applied for premium reductions in the last number of months. Our plan is working.

Utility Disconnection Restrictions

Ms Ganley: As of last Friday Albertans unable to afford their skyrocketing utility prices now risk having their heat and electricity shut off entirely. It's snowing, Mr. Speaker. It's inhumane for struggling families to have no ability to heat their homes, leaving them sitting and freezing in the dark. We drafted legislation to extend the shut-off period for six months. Will the associate minister show some compassion and agree to work with us to extend the utility shut-off? It's the humane thing to do.

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are empathetic to all Albertans that are struggling with the high cost of electricity. I want to assure you that we are working and staying very close with the utilities. They assure me that the number of Albertans that are struggling with utility insecurity is comparable to other years. They also tell me that they will work with all Albertans that are struggling. I would encourage any Albertans struggling with utility insecurity to stay in contact with the utility provider. They will keep the lights on for everyone that is willing to work with them. [interjection]

Thank you.

The Speaker: Order.

Ms Ganley: Given that it has been estimated that up to a thousand Enmax customers could be affected by the government's decision to allow the moratorium on shut-offs to expire and given that one family losing their heat and electricity is too many – this is Alberta; we look out for each other – what is the associate minister's message to the thousand families in Calgary who may end up with no heat and electricity? This is his responsibility.

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, it must be frustrating to be part of a one-term NDP caucus that made everything more expensive for all Albertans, including utility customers. It was their very short-sighted energy policies that caused the price of electricity to skyrocket in the first place. We are bringing short-term relief to Albertans, but the best thing that we can do is to NDP-proof the electricity grid and make sure that they never get near the electricity grid ever again.

Ms Ganley: Given that the minister claims that he is, quote, extremely empathetic with the challenges being faced by Albertans but given that he's done absolutely nothing to protect them except a fake natural gas rebate and an electricity rebate that's woefully inadequate and has yet to even materialize, is that what the minister thinks empathy looks like, leaving Albertans freezing in the dark and telling them to call the companies that cut them off?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, it's ironic when the member who doesn't know the actual price of electricity complains about the price of electricity. You know what's even more ironic? It was that caucus over there whose short-term energy policies caused the price of electricity to spike in the first place. It was the carbon tax that they brought in, the biggest tax in our province's history. They also got rid of the cheapest form of electricity generation, and in addition they spent $7.5 billion on the electricity grid, continuing the overbuild in the system. The best thing we can do to keep prices low is to keep them away from electricity. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

United Conservative Party Meeting Processes

Mr. Loewen: In the lead-up to the UCP AGM last November the Election Commissioner clarified that only individuals who are ordinarily resident in Alberta can make contributions to registered parties, clarifying that registration fees for the UCP's AGM qualify as a contribution if the event turns a profit. Given that the Premier has defended the use of third-party money to pay for AGM tickets and given that the annual returns confirm that the UCP's AGM did in fact turn a profit, to the Premier: are you confident that the Election Finances and Contributions Disclosure Act hasn't been violated?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a little disturbing that members in this House are against democracy. With the system that we have with the SGM, about 58,000 members are going to be able to vote, not just the ones that can afford to pay the fees to go there. I think we'll stand by the fact that we are more democratic. Every member gets to vote on the future of the leadership. This is good news. The hon. member across should get onboard.

Mr. Loewen: Given that that was a serious question to which I received no answer and given that section 34(1)(b) of the Election Finances and Contributions Disclosure Act was designed to prevent groups, including corporations and trade unions, from funnelling contributions to any party and given that Albertans expect any such third parties who seek to circumvent the Election Finances and Contributions Disclosure Act will be held to account, will the Premier commit right now, today, to a full and independent audit of the UCP's 2021 AGM to ensure all aspects of its funding follow Alberta's election finance legislation?

The Speaker: I think the member made an attempt at the very end of the question to tie it to government policy, but it was a loose string at best.

The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, as you rightly point out, that question had nothing to do with government policy, but I'll tell you what it does speak to. It does speak to the fact that we are a democratic party. All of our members are going to get to vote, and the hon. member knows that we file financial reports every single year. Now, if he just paid a little bit of attention, was a little less angry, and tried to play well with other children, he would probably know all of these things. He'd probably be over here if he could play well with other children. The fact is that we are running a democratic process, and this is good news.

Mr. Loewen: Given that I guess it's telling that the minister doesn't think that following legislation of this Legislature is relevant and given that in addition to directly funding tickets for the AGM, it has been alleged that third parties also sought to reimburse individuals for expenses incurred at this event and given that there were also allegations in the days leading up to the UCP AGM of the Premier's office staff actively contacting businesses to coerce attendance and that similar allegations continue to swirl around the upcoming leadership review, to the Premier: is it government policy or just current practice to be seen as having little regard for the legislation governing conflicts of interests, election finance, and just plain old respect for the taxpayer?

The Speaker: That's better.

The hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know what? We follow the rules. We work with the Election Commissioner. We follow the rules. Shock of shocks, we invited people to participate in our electoral process. Shock of shocks, politics broke out at a political process. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. minister was asked a question. He has a right to answer it.

Mr. McIver: Shock of shocks, we invited people to participate in our political process. We're a big-tent party. We'd like all Albertans to participate in our party. That's their choice, but they're all welcome to, Mr. Speaker.

Deaths of Children in Care and Youth Transitioning out of Care

Ms Pancholi: Mr. Speaker, just before the long weekend the UCP released a report promised months ago reviewing the alarming rise of deaths of children and youth receiving child intervention services. Alberta has never seen a crisis like this. The rate of children dying in care is the highest it's ever been, and 80 per cent of the children and youth that died are Indigenous, yet this report includes no evidence that the minister consulted with families, elders, or Indigenous leaders about the crisis. Why did the Minister of Children's Services propose actions that directly impact Indigenous families without consulting with them?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The death of any child but especially one who has been involved with the child intervention system is an absolute tragedy, and unlike the members opposite, this is not an issue to be managed. This is a call to action. I committed to transparency, and that is why I asked for this report. It's also why I committed to making it public. There are recommendations in this report that go through our policy and practice areas where we can do better to support kids and families, and I am accepting them all.

Ms Pancholi: Given that many of these youth died as a result of drug poisoning and that the Child and Youth Advocate recommended that the government establish a specific youth opioid strategy and given that this government has had three years to develop that strategy while drug poisoning deaths have been on the rise under their watch but that the advocate has said that he saw no progress made on this recommendation and given that the UCP has shut down all attempts at accountability on this issue, why has the UCP still failed to develop a crossministry strategy to specifically address the deaths of young people in their care from drug poisoning?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This is an issue that we take very seriously. It's why I've been working very closely with other government ministries, specifically the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions, because we know this is something that we need to deliver on. I'm glad the member opposite raised the office of the Child and Youth Advocate. In fact, the Child and Youth Advocate was my first call last week when I received this final report, and with the previous OCYA we had those discussions as well about how we can do better, what we're hearing from young people, how we can better address the opioid crisis that we're seeing here in Alberta. Let me tell you that we are investing $3 million in the youth suicide prevention program. We are creating addiction treatment beds.

Ms Pancholi: Given that the report ignores the systemic issues that have caused or contributed to these children's deaths and shifts blame onto external service agencies and given that it also fails to address what is in the direct responsibility of this government, overworked and understaffed front-line caseworkers, and given that the report states that the minister failed to direct her ministry to return to in-person visits between caseworkers and families long after the initial shutdown of the pandemic, leaving many children and youth removed from their main support systems, will the minister explain why she failed to staff up her own department and allowed vulnerable families to rely on Zoom visits during this crisis?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I saw the member opposite's response last week, and I was confused by a couple of the things that she had put forward. I think she had maybe misread some of the pieces about policy during COVID. In-person visits were in fact prioritized throughout the pandemic. I'd encourage the member opposite to reach out if she has some questions. COVID was definitely difficult for caseworkers. It did present them with some challenges in reaching out to families, but, again, caseworkers did exceptional work throughout the pandemic. In these recommendations there are recommendations for us as government, for our community partners who do half our work, and we are going to deliver.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert has a question.

Appeals Secretariat

Ms Renaud: Last week Alberta's Ombudsman issued a scathing report stating that the Appeals Secretariat, meant to hear concerns of some of the most vulnerable, is unfair and troubling. The Ombudsman found that there was no policy to accommodate those with disabilities and that there was no clear system to address code of conduct complaints. This follows a two-year investigation by the Ombudsman into a case where a man's disability was not accommodated. He couldn't hear the director and was accused of being disruptive. Can the Minister of Community and Social Services tell us right now exactly what he's doing to address these deeply troubling findings?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services has risen.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The member opposite is correct, and I do want to thank her for this important question. Under the NDP, under the former government, the appeals process was chaotic, and policy was rarely followed. There were recommendations put forward from the Alberta Ombudsman. Our government has accepted all of those recommendations, and the department also, after extensive reviews of the AISH program, had amended the appeals process in December 2021, with those changes starting to take place in April of this year.

Ms Renaud: Given that out-of-control inflation combined with the Premier's decision to end the indexation of AISH is hurting Albertans with disabilities by taking $3,000 a year out of their pockets, money they need to live, and given that Albertans with disabilities already struggling are unable to get a fair hearing when forced to appeal decisions and given that as Albertans with disabilities have had to cope with these horrific policies, this government can't expect them to work through this ableist system, to the minister: what emergency steps will he commit to right now to ensure vulnerable Albertans get a fair hearing right now?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services has risen.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to again thank the member for that question. Specifically when she asks about the Citizens' Appeal Panel, we know that this panel is committed to providing fair, impartial, and timely hearings. To help ensure this, appeal panel staff undergo extensive training such as effective decision writing, administrative justice, and interpreting legislation. Public agencies and their respective departments are also required to incorporate orientation into the onboarding process for new members. Again, I do want to point out for the member opposite that all of the Ombudsman's recommendations are being accepted by government.

Ms Renaud: Given that this government's actions since taking office have made life harder for those living with disabilities, from breaking their promise to maintain the NDP's indexation of AISH to changing payment dates to cook their books to the Premier's threat to kick people off AISH, and given that now we see that further unfair treatment of vulnerable Albertans extends to appeal panels and processes, will the minister commit to doing the right thing, start by apologizing for this government's poor treatment of Albertans with disabilities, and commit to real transformation of the system to ensure it is fair, accessible, and compassionate? It is not that right now.

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 2:27.

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, this government in this budget has $1.4 billion dedicated. This is the highest AISH budget in the history of the province. I'm going to just reiterate this a third time for the member opposite, who asked for actions on these recommendations, to say yes. Please, Mr. Speaker, encourage her to take yes for an answer. This government is accepting every single one of the recommendations put forward by the Ombudsman. We are taking action. A number of the changes just took place or were implemented to start taking place in April of this year. That means establishing procedures for reviewing complaints under the code of conduct and addressing all of the issues that the member opposite has just raised.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Camrose is next.

Health Care Professionals in Rural Alberta

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Camrose constituents have graciously shared their feedback with me as their Member of the Legislative Assembly regarding their concerns over the growing demand for health care professionals. Health facilities in my community were closed due to a lack of registered nurses. To the minister: how does Budget 2022 help expand health care capacity and attract new professionals to rural Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. We're moving forward with our commitment to ensure Albertans have access to health professionals no matter where they live. Budget '22 invests $90 million to recruit and retain doctors in rural areas. We continued this from last year and into this year. We're also working with Alberta's learning institutions to train those who will return home after finishing their studies. I am very happy the member was able to work with AHS on reopening the Galahad care centre in Camrose last week. I'd like to thank the AHS team for their recruitment efforts to make sure Camrose residents can continue to live, work, and age in place.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Camrose.

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that we've been advised that the provincial government has signed an agreement with both registered nurses and licensed practical nurses recently and given that some areas of the province have experienced a higher strain and a loss of these crucial health care professionals, to the minister: what is the government doing to expand the province's supply of nurses and the care that they provide? [interjections]

2:30

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks again to the hon. member. I was glad to see that AHS and the United Nurses of Alberta came to an agreement this year. This contract provides stability for Alberta's nurses and AHS over four years. AHS is currently working to increase the number of RNs in the province and has hired about 600 nursing students to complete their final practicum in areas of particular need. My department is also working to develop independent nurse practitioner funding in primary care, including improving recruitment to areas where health care is limited.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that I have also heard from members of the Alberta College of Optometrists informing me that they are seeking to perform more work with an expanded scope of practice in order to provide laser and superficial skin procedures that are safely offered in other jurisdictions under similar purview and given that expanding scopes of practice can increase the care provided to Albertans, particularly in rural and remote areas, can the minister tell the House if it will better meet our rural Albertans' health care needs by expanding optometrists' scope of practice?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and once again thanks to the hon. member for the question. For 101 years optometrists have delivered exceptional services to Albertans. In fact, the regulation of optometrists in Alberta dates back to April 19, 1921, when the optometry profession act in Alberta was proclaimed. Alberta optometrists also provide the broadest range of optometry services in the country and want to do more, as indicated by the member. Alberta Health has conducted a 10-week consultation regarding potential scope of practice expansion for the Alberta College of Optometrists. We'll be developing an advisory committee later this year to further examine this change.

Educational Curriculum Redesign

Member Irwin: "The UCP curriculum is a 'UCP dumpster fire'." Those aren't the words of an NDP partisan hack. They're not even my words. No, they are the words of former Alberta Progressive Conservative Minister of Education David King. He notes that when he was minister and for decades after, including under the NDP government, curriculum was solidly developed. All that changed when this UCP government came to power. My question, a simple one, to the current minister: why won't you finally admit that your curriculum is just that, a raging Dumpster fire?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. We have brought in a draft curriculum. We then listened to every Albertan. It has been the most open, transparent engagement process possible. In fact, I'm not sure what the members opposite have against us aligning with the top jurisdictions not only in Canada but around the whole globe. We want our students to learn more and be able to be more successful when they leave school.

Member Irwin: Given that it's not just a former Minister of Education rejecting the UCP's Dumpster fire of a curriculum, that you can actually add him to an ever-growing list of Albertans, including school districts representing more than 95 per cent of Alberta's students, Indigenous communities, francophones, 91 per cent of teachers, academics, racialized Albertans, tens of thousands of parents, a whole lot of students – I'm running out of fingers; the list goes on – my question is simple: who does support this government's Dumpster-fire curriculum? Don't name the Premier. He doesn't count.

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, I'm happy to say that last week I was at Fort Vermilion school division and, in fact, at Florence MacDougall community school, where they have been implementing the draft curriculum since last September . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: . . . in all three subjects that we will be bringing forward in September. In fact, they saw incredible results. Students in mathematics grew by two full years; in English language arts and literature, three full years. Why don't the members opposite want this for every child?

Member Irwin: Given that students deserve a modern, inclusive, evidence-based curriculum, one that tackles the challenges of today, including reconciliation, climate change, racism, and more, one that equips students for the Alberta of tomorrow – not only does this horrible curriculum take our province backwards; the impacts will be long lasting. It will fail to prepare Alberta students for success at postsecondary and the world of work. It will drive families away. Will the minister finally – finally – commit to doing what's best for our students? Go back to the drawing board and stop forcing this useless, regressive, racist Dumpster fire of a curriculum on our students.

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, did the member opposite even bother to read the curriculum? I know the critic from the members opposite didn't bother last week to read it before they commented on it. In fact, we have a world-class, research-based literacy program that is embedded into our curriculum. Dr. George Georgiou, who helped develop the English language arts curriculum, led the research and did a pilot project on literacy intervention. In fact, he's been asked to participate in a Canadian Commission for UNESCO working group to examine pandemic impacts on elementary schools in Canada. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Avian Influenza

Ms Sweet: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Food Inspection Agency has detected avian influenza in poultry flocks in Mountain View county, Warner county, Cardston county, and in neighbouring municipalities in Saskatchewan. It expects that this flu will spread. In the United States 27 million chickens and turkeys have been euthanized in an attempt to limit the spread across 26 states. There is no insurance in place to cover the potential massive losses due to slaughter in prevention of the avian flu. Farmers are worried. What will the government do today, immediately, to help these farmers?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. Yeah. For the last two weeks, since our first confirmed case, we've been dealing with avian influenza in the province. We currently have 12 confirmed cases on different sites across the province, and to give the House an idea of the speed at which this is moving, on those 12 confirmed sites 10 have already been depopulated; eight have already begun to trigger federal compensation. So the system is working. It's working swiftly.

Ms Sweet: Well, given that preventing the spread of avian influenza will require barns and equipment where positive cases have been detected to be thoroughly cleaned and sterilized and given that this will drive up costs for farmers, who have already struggled a great deal and have already repeatedly been failed by this government, who never seems to provide compensation, quick and necessary supports, what is the government doing to provide funding, expertise, and real relief to help cover a massive increase in cleaning costs for Alberta farmers attempting to handle the avian influenza?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, CFIA is the lead on this file. We do have a role working with industry, with CFIA, with the Chief Veterinary Officer, with the individual stakeholders, and the costs that the member is speaking about are covered by CFIA. They're not just compensated for the birds that are ordered destroyed; they are also compensated for the cleaning costs, the disposal costs. I've been through this with bovine tuberculosis, and this seems to be going a lot faster. I know it's stressful for the producers, but the system is working.

The Speaker: The hon. the member.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that all producers I've spoken to say that the federal inspection agency has been helpful and that the federal insurance programs will also be helpful in addressing the financial pressures due to the loss of inventory and given that this government has dragged its heels in helping to address the financial costs for the agriculture sector in the past and given that the time for action is now and that the government needs to sign on to the remaining federal dollars for insurance, will the minister finally step up and sign on to the remaining federal insurance programs and commit to not leaving federal dollars on the table?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the BRM programs that we're part of with the federal government on a 60-40 cost share are so important to mitigate the risks across all sectors in the agriculture industry. We have upcoming FPT meetings in June. I'll be in Ottawa in two weeks. It's on the agenda with our neighbouring provinces and the federal agriculture minister. Those conversations are ongoing.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Recreational Use of Crown Grazing Lands

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, last week I travelled across Alberta as part of the Real Property Rights on the road show. A common theme that I heard was that provincial grazing lease holders are often blocking access to regular Alberta hunters while allowing access to outfitters and guides that are sometimes even related to the leaseholder. To the Minister of Environment and Parks: are you hearing the same thing in your office, and does your department support the leaseholders or the regular Albertans and their access to our public lands?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy has risen.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans do enjoy using our Crown land, and we're fortunate to live in such a beautiful province with access to these beautiful, scenic landscapes. If the member has heard from someone who has been unrightfully blocked from access to a grazing lease, the department and the minister would be more than happy to work with them to resolve their dispute about conflicting land use. Environment and Parks always encourages reasonable access to recreation for grazing lease, and for grazing lease holders who unreasonably deny recreational access, they can see those leases shortened, renewed, or even cancelled.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Minister, and thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the parks department has recently shut down areas like the Marie Lake campground due to the Public Lands Act mandating that no permanent structures can be built on Crown lease land and given that the Athabasca Fish & Game Association also can't have overnight camping at their league place along Long Lake, to the Minister of Environment and Parks: are guides and outfitters allowed to overnight camp on public grazing leases or build structures on public leases, and will they be held to the same standards under the Public Lands Act?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Public lands staff in the Department of Environment and Parks have to ensure the good stewardship of our resources. That means properly evaluating proposed uses and ensuring that they do not conflict with existing uses. Again, almost all recreational access disputes are resolved through existing, established processes, and we encourage all land-use users to continue to report any sort of conflict through the existing dispute process.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that section 49 of the Wildlife Act states that "no person shall directly or indirectly buy or sell, trade or barter or offer to buy or sell access to any land for the purpose of hunting any big game or any fur-bearing animals [or game birds] on any land," to the Minister of Environment and Parks: if these leaseholders are denying access to regular Albertans but allowing profitable outfitters and guides that same access, are they not in contravention of the Wildlife Act?

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you for that question. If the member has any information about a violation of the Wildlife Act or any other act, I would encourage him to contact the appropriate enforcement officials. I know that many Albertans will be enjoying Crown lands as the weather continues to warm up, and that means there will be more conflicts in use that arise between users and even with the wildlife. I want to encourage everyone to report any violations on public land and public safety incidents to the new consolidated reporting line at 310.LAND. They can easily report it. We expect all Crown users will follow the law.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will return to the remainder of the daily Routine.

Medical School Graduates and Rural Health Care

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's no secret that the recruitment of family doctors in rural Alberta is a challenge, and it's no different in Lethbridge and the surrounding communities.

Let me tell you a little bit about Madeline Szabo. Madeline's lifelong dream is to be a physician and use her passion for science, leadership, and community to serve the people of southern Alberta. She wrote the MCAT and the DAT last year and applied to numerous universities across Canada for medical school. Although Madeline has a near-perfect GPA, research experience, countless hours and awards for volunteering and leadership and participates in the university's sports program, Madeline was unable to obtain even an interview with any Alberta university for medical school. Madeline wants to complete her education and practise medicine in Alberta, but she cannot even get her foot in the door at the U of C or the U of A through her medical application process.

Since access to health care is so important, I had a look at some of the interesting statistics from the Cumming School of Medicine at the U of C. In Calgary 491 resident students graduated from the family medicine program between 2012 and 2019. Over 81 per cent of those graduates were still in Alberta two years after completing their studies. What worries me is that only 24 of them, under 5 per cent of those graduates, are practising in rural communities, and only two of them are in Lethbridge.

[The Speaker in the chair]

What is encouraging is that over 70 per cent of graduates in our rural towns and counties stay there long after they've earned their degrees. Who can blame them? Rural communities in Alberta are beautiful and welcoming places. Once doctors have put down roots and their families have had a taste of these communities, the beauty of the outdoors, and the character and pioneering spirit of the people, it can become home. We just need to get them there.

A little-known fact is that many postsecondary institutions lose money training medical students, but instead of allowing supply and demand to work by raising tuition to cover this cost and allowing more access to Alberta students, many students like Madeline will have to pick the alternative, studying abroad at huge expense, and possibly never return to Alberta. Madeline, keep following your dreams. We need you and your generation to succeed.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The hon. the Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to give oral notice of Bill 18, Utility Commodity Rebate Act, sponsored by the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. For the benefit of the House this is the notice I sent the Speaker prior to 11:15 today. I also notified the person in question and the Opposition House Leader. Please take this as my written notice that I intend to raise a question of privilege pursuant to Standing Order 15 during this afternoon's sitting.

The question of privilege relates to statements made by the Government House Leader that constituted a prima facie breach of privilege to the Assembly during Tabling Returns and Reports on Thursday, March 31, 2022. These statements violated the rights of the Assembly collectively by attempting to intimidate the House or the Assembly with a threat to change the standing orders. The Government House Leader also obstructed the Speaker by refusing to stop interrupting when the Speaker called for order. This notice is being provided to you in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 15 in advance of the daily Routine for April 19, 2022, our earliest opportunity to address this matter.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to give notice that at the appropriate time under Standing Order 42 I intend to move the following motion.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly acknowledge that following the government's removal of the cap on insurance rate increases, as shown in the superintendent of insurance 2020 annual report, Albertans have paid approximately $385 million more in premiums to profitable insurance companies in 2020 than in the previous year and that during the same period the difference between the premiums that insurance companies collected and the claims that insurance companies paid out increased from $1.151 billion to $1.324 billion. Be it further resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to immediately establish a committee of the Assembly to examine the reasons causing these increases to insurance premiums and claims and to provide recommendations to the Assembly in respect of the government's options that it could undertake to reduce these costs for Albertans.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Bill 16 Insurance Amendment Act, 2022

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 16 proposes measures that would help ensure an efficient regulatory framework, support growth of Alberta's insurance industry, and advance our government's efforts to modernize Alberta's financial services sector.

Mr. Speaker, I move first reading of Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022.

[Motion carried; Bill 16 read a first time]

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the Clerk. On behalf of hon. Mr. Wilson, Minister of Indigenous Relations, pursuant to the Metis Settlements Act the Metis Settlements Appeal Tribunal annual report 2021.

On behalf of hon. Mr. Glubish, Minister of Service Alberta, pursuant to the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act the freedom of information and protection of privacy annual report 2020-2021.

On behalf of hon. Ms Schulz, Minister of Children's Services, responses to questions raised by Ms Pancholi, hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud, and Mr. Loewen, hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley, March 8, 2022, Ministry of Children's Services 2022-23 main estimates debate.

The Speaker: Hon. members, at 2:27 the Deputy Government House Leader rose on a point of order.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order, 23(h), (i), and (j). At the time in question, around 2:27, the Member for St. Albert was asking a question, and if I'm not mistaken, that question was going – I forget who it went to, but in that question the member specifically said: the government is cooking the books. Now, while I know that this was not directed at an individual in particular, you cannot do indirectly what you cannot do directly, and for that reason, to suggest that the government is cooking the books, certainly in a legal accounting practice, I think, would be unparliamentary and certainly, I believe, meets the threshold of creating disorder in this Chamber. I ask that that member apologize and withdraw as I hope you would find it a point of order.

The Speaker: The Opposition House Leader.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise on this point of order. I do not believe this is a point of order; I believe this is a matter of debate. The question in context was about a number of decisions this government has taken, actions they have made that have made life harder for those living with disabilities, including something that has been debated at length in this House, which was changing payment dates and the impact that it had on a particular budget year. Making sure that we are aware of what this government has done and how it has impacted those with disabilities in our province, I think, is a priority. I would argue that this is a point of debate, not a point of order.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Hon. members, I am prepared to rule on whether or not the use of the language around cooking the books is in order or not in order. I am reminded of November 28, 1990, on page 2496 of Hansard. Well, this particular issue had been raised by hon. members during that time, and the Speaker of the day said the following:

While the Chair will allow the phrase to stand in this instance, the Chair also cautions the House to be much more careful in terms of phrases that are used.

He went on to say:

The word “lie” was not there; the phrase was “cooking the books.” But having now declared that kind of statement, I still admonish the House to please be much more careful in [their] terminology. Thank you.

I think that day was a very good day in the Assembly. The Speaker was wise then, as I hope your Speaker is wise today. While I won't find it as a point of order, I will admonish the House to be much more careful in the use of the terminologies which they use. I consider this matter dealt with and concluded.

Hon. members, at the appropriate time the Member for Central Peace-Notley rose in the Assembly to give notice of a Standing Order 15. However, pursuant to Standing Order 15(4), that all members will know, if the Member whose conduct is called into question is not present, the matter shall be deferred to the next day that the Member is present unless the Speaker rules that, in the circumstances, the matter may be dealt with in the Member's absence,

I think it's reasonable that we allow some time for the member whose conduct has been called into question to be present. However, if they are not present for an extended period of time, I will hear the point of privilege by Thursday if the member isn't present prior to then. I consider the matter dealt with and concluded for now, but we will hear this very important point of privilege at some point in time later in the week.

I might provide some caution to the Member for Central Peace-Notley with respect to the point of privilege. There is never a need to defend if the Speaker has been intimidated because the Speaker is well and truly capable on his own of defending himself or herself.

Motions under Standing Order 42

The Speaker: At the appropriate time the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West provided notice of her desire to raise a Standing Order 42.

Insurance Company Profits and Premium Costs

Ms Phillips:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly acknowledge that following the government's removal of the cap on insurance rate increases, as shown in the superintendent of insurance 2020 annual report, Albertans have paid approximately $385 million more in premiums to profitable insurance companies in 2020 than in the previous year and that during the same period the difference between the premiums that insurance companies collected and the claims that insurance companies paid out increased from $1.151 billion to $1.324 billion. Be it further resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to immediately establish a committee of the Assembly to examine the reasons causing these increases to insurance premiums and claims and to provide recommendations to the Assembly in respect of the government's options that it could undertake to reduce these costs for Albertans.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise pursuant to Standing Order 42 to request that the ordinary business of the Legislative Assembly be adjourned to debate a motion that is urgent and pressing and which I read out under Notices of Motions. I would like to acknowledge that pursuant to SO 42 I have provided the members of the Assembly with the appropriate number of copies, and I have provided your office notice of my intention to move this motion as well as notified the government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is our duty as representatives in this Assembly to debate matters of the highest importance to the lives and well-being of Albertans. The Legislature must address issues that affect all Albertans and certainly issues that hurt them directly by taking money out of their pockets. Now, last week we saw the Bank of Canada announce decades-high levels of inflation, and that same week we saw the government bury a report on rising insurance costs to Albertans. This is a report that had been released for 107 years prior. Taking this kind of money out of Albertans' pockets at this time is certainly pressing business given the urgency of the cost-of-living increases that Albertans are now facing. Members of this Assembly must urgently acknowledge the effects that rising automobile insurance costs are having on Albertans and their families in light of this new information, and we must seek solutions together to reduce those costs.

Now, as a matter of background, in 2019 the UCP removed the cap limiting auto insurance premium increases to 5 per cent. We heard loud and clear from Albertans at that time that car insurance premiums were having a negative effect on people's pocketbooks. Starting in the winter of 2019, Albertans began receiving notifications from their insurance providers that their 2020 rates would increase drastically, some as high as 30 per cent. We were told that this was necessary as insurance companies were losing money. The Minister of Finance regaled the House with tales of tough times for those companies, but there was no information or evidence to support those claims.

Then, for the first time in 107 years, there was no superintendent of insurance annual report to the public, because the same minister said that the report was not needed, until Thursday after close of business on the Easter long weekend, when that report was released right as Albertans were getting ready to head out and spend time with their families for the long weekend. As many turn their attention to very meaningful religious holidays, the confluence of both Ramadan, Passover, and Easter this year, while people's attention was diverted, the 2020 superintendent of insurance report was dropped at the end of the day at the end of the work week, a report that normally comes out in January. Oh, what a report it was. It showed that in 2020 the car insurance industry charged Alberta drivers $385 million more in premiums than they did in 2019, boosting their profits and expanding their gross margins. It showed that the difference between premiums collected rose from $1.151 billion in 2019 to $1.324 billion in 2020.

That is why I am bringing forward this motion today. Now that we have this information – it was released on Thursday after the close of business – this has been our earliest available opportunity to discuss this matter. That is why the motion calls for an acknowledgement of the increased amounts that Albertans are paying to insurance companies, boosting the bottom lines of these companies. It calls for the creation of a standing committee of the Assembly to investigate these increases in insurance premiums and to provide recommendations on how to reduce these costs to Albertans. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, it allows the Legislature to consider this report. As I indicated, generally speaking, it comes out in January, but in this case it was suppressed until after the normal budget estimates debate and other considerations of this Legislature.

Here we have an opportunity, though, with the creation of a committee to study the matter, to do something positive and propositional for Albertans. Albertans want action. They don't want reference to some obscure bill. They don't want, Mr. Speaker, to hear more excuses. They want to know that we are listening. They want to know that MLAs care about their bottom line and about the reality that they deal with, and that is why I encourage members of this Assembly to provide unanimous consent to put aside the ordinary business of the day in order to debate this motion.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, a member of Executive Council has up to five minutes to respond. I see the hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm going to speak against this motion. I certainly acknowledge that Alberta has what insurance experts refer to as a hard insurance market. It's a market where, effectively, insurance companies have – and this is broadly beyond automobile and broadly beyond even the province of Alberta. But within the context of North America and even globally insurance companies are recapitalizing, and that results in higher premiums, less flexibility perhaps, you know, fewer rebates than might have historically occurred. We're aware of that, and we recognize that higher insurance premiums have created some hardship for Albertans, but we're taking action. That's why we brought forward Bill 41, to deal with, again, the deep root causes of increasing costs in the automobile insurance industry. Mr. Speaker, included in that bill ultimately were additional benefits for injured motorists. We wanted to ensure that there would be more care for Albertans who were involved in an accident. At the same time, we brought in a number of initiatives within that bill and associated regulations that ultimately would deal with some of the systemic issues that were pushing up costs.

All that to say, Mr. Speaker, that we introduced the bill, we passed the bill, and I'm very pleased today to report that we're starting to see some early indications that premiums are beginning to come down. In fact, over the last number of months seven insurers have recently filed for rate reductions. That matters. These rate reduction requests have varied from between around 2 per cent to over 7 per cent, so this is meaningful relief around automobile insurance premiums.

We believe it's government's role to create the market conditions, the business environment that encourages competition. In this province we have over 45 automobile insurers. We believe that constitutes enough players to create competition. As we, again, deal with the regulatory issues that were creating cost pressures, Mr. Speaker, we're starting to see those premiums come down.

I would like to take this time to note that if there are Albertans that are facing significantly higher automobile insurance premiums than they have in the past, they should shop around, because I'm hearing out there right now in the marketplace that many insurers are trying to get a competitive advantage and take up market share, and they're doing that with reduced premiums.

Mr. Speaker, we often hear about the importance of the rate cap that the members opposite implemented in this province. Again, I've said it before, but it bears repeating: the rate cap did not deal with the systemic issues driving up costs. The rate cap simply limited returns for insurers, and the results were predictable. In a competitive business environment those insurance providers began to pull back products from motorists. If left long enough, it would have completely undermined the sustainability of Alberta's automobile insurance industry. I had my own ideas on what the members opposite's long-term plan would be: to ultimately undermine Alberta's automobile insurance system and propose a nationalized system, which we know would not result in lower premiums. It would result in bigger government, and that's what those folks are about.

Mr. Speaker, we're aware of this hard insurance market. We're taking concrete action to deal with the systemic issues driving up costs. We did that in Bill 41. We also introduced the captive insurance corporations act, which provides additional flexibility for insurance providers, and there's more to come.

Again, I urge all members of this House to vote against this motion.

The Speaker: Hon. members, this motion is a request for unanimous consent. It will require unanimous consent for the Assembly to set aside the regular business of the day and proceed immediately to the Standing Order 42.

[Unanimous consent denied]

The Speaker: Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 13 Financial Innovation Act

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to move second reading of Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act.

If passed, the proposed legislation would create a regulatory sandbox that makes it easier for finance and fintech companies to develop new products and services in Alberta and will work to diversify Alberta's economy. The regulatory sandbox would offer companies time-limited relief from certain legislative and regulatory requirements, making it simpler for them to research and adapt their new technologies to Alberta's market.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

It would also help companies collect information on new products and services to determine if those specific products have value for consumers. Madam Speaker, a regulatory sandbox would drive increased innovation and competition in Alberta, potentially giving Albertans greater access to more products and services at a lower cost.

In Canada there is currently a regulatory sandbox in place for the securities industry. Other countries are also using regulatory sandboxes as tools to drive innovation and economic growth, but Alberta would be the first province in Canada to establish a regulatory sandbox for the finance and fintech sector, giving companies additional ways to grow their business and create jobs. It will help financial-related companies expand their offerings, to create new jobs in Alberta while preparing for Canada's launch of open banking.

A regulatory sandbox would provide time-limited exemptions from the following legislation and the related regulations: the Loan and Trust Corporations Act, the Credit Union Act, the ATB Financial Act, the Financial Consumers Act, the Consumer Protection Act, and the Personal Information Protection Act. Specific exemptions would depend on what kind of relief each applicant is seeking and whether or not the government can safely provide that relief. This would be determined on a case-by-case basis as the government needs the flexibility to weigh the merits and risks of each application. All legislative exemptions would be disclosed publicly.

To help review applications, the government has formed a working group, including officials from Treasury Board and Finance; Jobs, Economy and Innovation; and Service Alberta as the ministry responsible for some of the related acts. The office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner would also be consulted on exemptions to the Personal Information Protection Act, and their approval would be required for exemptions to proceed. The office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner was consulted during the development of the legislation, and, Madam Speaker, I can say that the commissioner is supportive.

Successful applicants would have to meet all of the following main criteria. First, they would be required to maintain a physical presence in Alberta. In other words, they would need to have an office in Alberta or staff living in the province. Second, the regulatory sandbox would only be for companies that offer financial products or services. Third, applicants must adequately explain why the product or service should be considered new, novel, or a material improvement to the existing product or service offered. Applicants would not receive exemptions for products or services that are already offered in Alberta by other companies. Lastly, applicants would have to provide a sound and viable business plan for the testing of a financial product or service. The plan must also demonstrate how they plan to exit the sandbox given that participation would be time limited.

I want to assure all members that consumer protection is strongly represented in this legislation, which is specifically designed to ensure that companies participating in the regulatory sandbox are held to high professional standards and meet specified eligibility criteria. For example, participating companies may be subject to additional terms, conditions, and restrictions such as consulting a qualified expert or auditor, limiting the number of customers who could purchase the product or service being tested, having adequate capital on hand to support the venture, providing proof of appropriate insurance coverage, implementing specific financial security or surety requirements to mitigate risk and losses, developing new risk management policies and procedures, and/or having a way for customers to voice concerns and have those concerns resolved.

Madam Speaker, the Financial Innovation Act signals that Alberta is willing to work with innovators and businesses seeking to offer innovative products and technologies. Alberta's regulatory sandbox would provide a strong incentive for financial services and fintech companies to move to Alberta. This would add to Alberta's many other advantages in attracting new investment and attracting new businesses and diversifying the economy, and it would do so without compromising consumer protection or government oversight. In fact, the sandbox would foster open and constructive dialogue between the government and companies seeking to enter the market. This would help those companies get a better sense of the rules and regulations and open a new pathway for them to become fully regulated market participants. It would also benefit Albertans by opening the door to a wider variety of financial products and services, which could lead to more competition and ultimately lower costs for Alberta consumers.

Madam Speaker, the world of finance is rapidly evolving, and our government understands that we need to partner with businesses, entrepreneurs if Alberta is going to stay ahead of the curve. Regulatory modernization, cutting red tape, and making it easier to do business in Alberta is a crucial part of our strategy to grow the economy, support job creation, and make Alberta the best place to live, work, and raise a family.

I encourage all members of this Assembly to support Bill 13. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there other members wishing to join the debate on Bill 13? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to provide a few initial comments at this stage of debate on Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act. I thank the minister and the Treasury Board and Finance officials for bringing forward the legislation. Certainly, the financial services sector employs more than 60,000 Albertans, and of course we on this side of the House support innovation in this space to grow and diversify the economy in addition to the very important services that are perhaps a lot more established and older but just as important to our financial lives; that is to say, the important role that ATB plays in our rural communities with those bricks-and-mortar banking options, in particular for farms and small businesses.

Now, there are many positive aspects to this bill, and it builds off a previous regulatory sandbox initiative that the minister referenced that started under our government through the Alberta Securities Commission. We have some broad agreement on the overall policy approach here with some of these new products and services that we should make sure that we are open to. We do have, you know, a relatively small population of 4.5 million people but a great deal of sophistication in a number of these areas, and certainly Alberta is a good place for various fintech companies and various financial services to find a way that they can ensure that people are in fact protected and their money is protected and that some of these innovations are taken advantage of while not putting people at risk.

Certainly, the overall resources and sophistication of the Alberta Securities Commission indicate that we do have some of those tools in place to protect people, but as we know, the legislation gives enormous powers to the minister. Those powers may assist a regulatory sandbox to work, but those powers also require the Assembly and the public to trust the government and to trust that this government can competently protect consumers when they are being sold new financial products or services or technology while being exempted from some very, very important pieces of legislation such as the Consumer Protection Act and, in fact, the Personal Information Protection Act and other acts such as the Credit Union Act and the legislation governing loans in the province.

The key issue here is trust, and Albertans have very little of it in this government. Now, to be clear, one of the biggest concerns with this legislation is, in fact, that the Minister of Finance is asking us to trust him, someone who burned $1.3 billion on a pipeline that doesn't exist and someone who has consistently had billions of dollars in accounting errors in the budget.

Now, on the substance of the legislation – I want to focus on that – there are a few points to make at this stage of debate. First, the power to exempt new financial products from consumer protection laws can be easily abused. I have to say that this, along with the PIPA exemptions, is the one that causes me the most cause for concern given that we still have the federal Bank Act in place. That is, in fact, federal jurisdiction, but the consumer protection laws in particular I really worry about. Consumer protection is critical, particularly when the traditional safeguards are not in place. That's the whole point of a sandbox.

You know, I don't think we've seen commensurate with this bill an appropriately detailed plan for the government to show us how they're going to protect people when they exempt fintech companies or financial services companies from consumer protection measures. For this plan to work, we need the appropriate resources in place, with the technical capacity and sophistication to understand how these applications, how these money flows actually affect people and what types of regulations are necessary and absolutely cannot be subjected to any exemption and others where, if companies are in that sandbox, consumers will not be taken for a ride anyway.

Now, we heard during our technical briefing from officials that it might very well be the case that the Treasury Board and Finance department does not currently have the expertise they need, but if required, they have indicated they could put someone on contract. Okay. This is beyond the scope of the legislation, but we urge the minister to do this now. Maybe we'll put someone on contract: that is not a great answer to questions around consumer protection when it comes to our savings, when it comes to our investments, and when it comes to messing around with both our consumer protections but also our personal information and privacy.

That was the piece. I heard the minister just talk about how the OIPC indicated that they support this regulatory sandbox approach. I will, however, flag for the government that the OIPC is consistently stretched with resources. I know, for myself, I have an appeal in to the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner for records withheld from me by the Lethbridge police service, and they are reviewing it sometime before 2025. That doesn't sound to me like there's a whole lot of necessary horsepower and resources in there.

So unless the government plans to also provide those resources to the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner, which I think would be entirely appropriate in this case – the point of a sandbox, as I said, is to exempt people from regulations, but the point of fintech and for new financial services is that sometimes they're really, really complex. Ask anyone in this Legislature to explain cryptocurrency to you. You might find two or three. It's pretty complex stuff. You do have to have the requisite level of legal expertise but also expertise in how these products are developed now and how they are changing over time and how people are actually making money with them, how the companies themselves are making money, and how people's investments are trucking along in them. People deserve that information. So when the minister reports to the House that the OIPC is supportive of this, I'm going to trust, but I would like some verification that that's actually the case and that they have the requisite resources.

Now, I'm also quite concerned that this legislation, if not properly conceived and executed, could chip away at the trust that Albertans and indeed Canadians have in their financial institutions. Not only our big banks but also our ATB and our credit union system are part of our competitive advantage, Madam Speaker. People make investments from all over the world in this jurisdiction and in others because they know that we have an appropriately regulated Alberta Securities Commission. They know that it has the investigative resources that it needs. They know that we have good FOIA and PIPA legislation. They know that we have good consumer protection legislation. They understand, when investors make investments in Canada, that we have the overall Canadian securities commission umbrella and that then we have appropriately resourced provincial regulators located in each province and that there's a tremendous level of co-ordination between jurisdictions.

It's really, really important that we not take steps to jeopardize that trust that Albertans and Canadians have in our financial institutions. We, in fact, did not suffer in the same ways that the Americans did during the financial crises of 2008 and '09, and one of the reasons was the strength of our financial institutions and the overall oversight of them and indeed those lending requirements, for example, which we did see changed considerably in the United States. There was a massive draining of hundreds of billions of dollars out of the global economy overnight with the collapse of Lehman Brothers and others.

But more down on the ground of what matters to ordinary people, if you go to bed with $5,000 in your savings account, Madam Speaker, virtually everyone is confident that when they wake up in the morning, the bank won't have gone bankrupt, and that $5,000 will still be there. Simply put, many Albertans consider dealing with financial services companies to be safe, which is exactly how they should feel. The risks are low, and in large part those risks are low because the companies are tightly regulated, which is how it should be. We want to know that our money is going to be there when we wake up in the morning.

A legitimate concern with this legislation, I think, is that people will assume that any new financial product comes with that same level of risk-free proposition, but with companies operating in the sandbox, that will not in fact be the case. That's the point of having this legislation. I understand that there is a need to have this, but what those on-ramps are into the sandbox and the off-ramps out should be more clearly articulated to the public in a way that the public can exercise the necessary caution and buyer beware.

So we do need additional measures and transparency to ensure that risks are never passed on to Albertans and consumers, in particular in the context of inflation increases and a great deal of instability that has, you know, been inserted into markets as a result of some of the sort of COVID resettling, if you will, Madam Speaker, where we're dealing still with supply chain issues, global inflation pressures.

Certainly, people were quite used, in the last few years in a low-inflation and low-interest-rate environment, to kind of putting things in ETFs and having a passive investment strategy because people were getting really good returns out of that. In fact, they were using financial technology to do that. Many people are using Wealthsimple and Qtrade and all of these direct-investor applications now in order to make those trades and do them themselves. There's no question that many of those trades now come without fees associated with them, and it has been a good way for people to exercise a bit more control over their own RRSP and TFSA savings to ensure that they are lowering their management expense ratio. Certainly, in years past Canadians have paid some of the highest management expense ratios in mutual funds and other actively managed funds, and there's been a real revolution in that, where people are simply taking care of business on their own end.

I will say that we have done that without some of these fintech companies south of the border that are quite a bit less regulated. I'm thinking here of outfits like Robinhood, which is, you know, a broker-dealer. Certainly, there have been many questions raised with regulators on how they sort of gamify investments. Robinhood has in fact responded to many of those by changing some of the ways that they have sort of incented more of a gambling mentality into investments, with a great deal of human suffering that has come along with that. There are now competing fintech products. I think there's one called Public, where there's a lot more consumer protection and buyer beware associated with that form of direct investing.

This is where, Madam Speaker, I'm not at all convinced that that level of sophistication resides within the bureaucracy currently given that this is new. We see just flatlined investments in the civil service. We have seen, really, no indication that there are specific resources put towards this either in Service Alberta around the Consumer Protection Act or in the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner. We've seen no movement in terms of how there might be this so-called contract that TBF officials discussed within the bill briefing, how that might materialize.

This is the sort of horsepower that we would need assurances on, and maybe the minister can come and provide those assurances at the committee stage. That would be the appropriate place to address some of those questions around consumer protection. I think those are fair good-faith questions. Like I said, Madam Speaker, the overall public policy approach is one that we took while we were in government with respect to the Alberta Securities Commission, so there's nothing inherently wrong with how this legislation has been structured.

The question here is whether we can trust this government as stewards of our own money or stewards of our own interests when it comes to protecting the little guy, and we have seen nothing but example after example of a government that is blissfully unaware and fundamentally uninterested in protecting the interests of the little guy, whether it's your car insurance, that's gone up by 30 per cent; whether it's your property insurance, that has gone up because of the cuts to municipalities and the fact that the government hasn't cracked down on companies not paying their taxes; whether it's the rise in one's personal income taxes; whether it's the rise in school fees or camping fees or any of these other ways that Albertans have been far more than nickel and dined. Some of these costs are up in the hundreds and thousands of dollars, Madam Speaker, particularly the personal income tax as inflation eats away at more and more of our income.

You know, the notion that we are to then turn around and say, "Oh, okay; yeah, absolutely, Albertans trust this government with protecting their investments" is a bit of a bridge too far, I think, for a lot of Albertans, so that remains the fundamental concern with this legislation, not the structure of it itself. I think there's no question that we would want to see at least examples from the minister at the committee stage, for the benefit of the public to actually understand what's at stake here in this legislation, of what types of consumer protection exemptions the government will consider, for example.

This is not the first time that fintech and the financial services industry have come to governments asking for these kinds of exemptions, so that's fine. What kinds of examples have they given to the minister and to officials? What is actually being considered here? What are some possible fences that the government can put around some of these requests so that the public can be assured that they are not in fact going to be gambling with their own savings and investment and future?

I think it would be very, very important for the government, when it comes to protection of the privacy of Albertans, to, in fact, ask the OIPC to release whatever analysis they've done of this or whatever analysis TBF provided to the OIPC so that we can see the parameters of what's actually being discussed here and, again, with that trust but verify to the minister's claim that the OIPC was, in fact, supportive of such a thing.

I think what would also be really helpful for folks to understand here is: how will consumers know when they're using a new product, service, or technology that is operating in the sandbox and therefore is regulated at a much lower level? When people go on and use, you know, Wealthsimple or Qtrade or whatever, they know that this is regulated under the current legislation. When they go to use one of these new products, how will they know, and how will they know which of the pieces of legislation this particular company was exempted from? Is it going to be, like, one of those big, long terms and conditions that nobody ever reads and just scrolls to the bottom of and presses to accept and moves on? Is it going to be one of those? In that case, I don't know if that's good enough, and I don't think that Albertans should settle for that.

Again, I'm going to trust that this is the right approach. In fact, I'm quite convinced that under normal circumstances it might be, but I'm going to want to see more detail there, and I think that the Minister of Finance and his officials owe that to Albertans, particularly after all of the public trust and public confidence that they have shredded over the last three years in terms of the stewardship of the finances of the province and, in fact, looking out for just ordinary people's best interests in terms of their pocketbooks.

I'd also, at the committee stage, be interested to hear what kind of analysis TBF provided to credit unions, the ATB, and other players in that space to just get an understanding of how this was presented to them and if the minister could report back on what the tone and tenor of those consultations was and if there were any concerns that were raised by them and how this legislation meets those concerns. I think that would be also a very helpful addition to the public debate on this legislation.

With that, at this second reading stage, Madam Speaker, I will conclude my comments. I look forward to the rest of the debate on this legislation. I look forward to the minister's responses and to a little bit more detail and commitment to consumer protection beyond "Just trust us," because no one does.

Thank you.

3:30

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members to join the debate on Bill 13? Seeing the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and offer a few comments on Bill 13. Let me first start off by saying thank you to the minister for his explanatory remarks when he introduced this bill, and a special thank you to my colleague from Lethbridge-West for her comments, that I hope to build upon in my speech today.

I will have to say that the one theme that I picked up on in the Member for Lethbridge-West's comments was the issue of trust. I have to say that I have deep concerns around both the activity that's being regulated and the government's ability to regulate it, as we're discussing here in this bill. I come from the old school of the New Democratic Party, where we have a deep skepticism of the financial industry, and I think that Albertans in general have a history of deep skepticism of the financial industry. In fact, that's how we ended up with the Alberta Treasury Branch as one of only two public banking institutions in the entire continent of North America, because landowners, average citizens here in the province of Alberta during the economic depression realized that they were being taken advantage of by the traditional financial institutions, and the government of the day acted to defend their interests and created a public bank that was designed to serve them and not their financial masters on Bay Street. I think it's a testament to the service that Alberta Treasury Branch provides that it remains one of only two public banks in the country.

So not only does our party have a traditional skepticism of financial institutions; Albertans broadly speaking have a traditional skepticism of financial institutions. Even religious traditions have a skepticism of financial institutions and moneylenders. My favourite story from the Bible, Madam Speaker – I'm sure one that you're familiar with – comes from the time when Jesus entered the temple and drove the moneylenders out because they were turning the temple into a den of robbers. So whenever people ask me the question, "What would Jesus do?" I always say that he would grab a bullwhip and drive the bankers out of the building. That's what Jesus would do.

But I know that Christianity is not the only religious tradition that holds the financial industry in deep skepticism. I had the privilege of attending a forum at King's University in my riding a number of years ago that looked at reforms to the banking industry that were based on tenets of religious faith. They had presenters from the Islamic faith talking about the Islamic tradition of not allowing people to charge interest. I hope that maybe some of my colleagues who are much more versed in that religious tradition can help me understand better that tradition's position on the financial service industry.

All of these things, our history here in Alberta, our religious traditions, tell us that we need to regard the financial industry with a healthy dose of skepticism, that extending them trust is a pathway to danger, and that's why I'm very troubled with this bill, because essentially the minister is writing a blank cheque to the financial industry to do whatever it wants within the exemptions that the minister is granting them. I think that Albertans are right to regard that position skeptically because we've seen that the history of financial industry innovation is littered with cautionary tales.

My friend from Lethbridge-West talked about the mortgage debt crisis that the United States found itself in in 2008, 2009. That was the result of so-called financial innovation, and the regulatory agencies in the United States were either asleep at the switch or intent on encouraging innovation in that space, winding up with millions of Americans losing their houses, losing billions of dollars of equity in their houses. To add insult to injury, Madam Speaker, to get out of that mess, who did the government bail out? They bailed out the banks. There was no bailout for the average Americans who lost their homes or lost significant value in their homes. That's one example, I think, of so-called financial innovation that has led to significant problems for people without proper oversight and trust in the regulatory agencies tasked with providing that oversight.

You know, a little bit closer to home, Madam Speaker, members in this House who were here for the 29th Legislature will remember well the work that we did to regulate the payday loan industry. For years the payday loan industry had been trapping people who had very limited financial means into an endless cycle of debt with no way to get out. It was up to our government. We were the ones who finally took the action required to bring the payday loan industry to heel and act in the public interest rather than in their own financial interest, a move, Madam Speaker, that – I think it's important to remind everybody – all parties in this House voted in favour of if I remember correctly. Certainly, I remember members of the Wildrose opposition at the time speaking up in favour of effectively regulating the payday loan industry.

I say all of this, Madam Speaker, because we need to be extremely skeptical when some silk-suited banker comes to the minister's office talking about a fancy financial innovation that will apparently be in the consumers' interest and the public interest when, in fact, the only interest it's likely to serve is his or her own.

We need to regard the motivations and the actions of the financial industry with a deep sense of skepticism.

We also need to regard the minister's actions with that similar sense of skepticism because, as my friend from Lethbridge-West has said in her comments, we cannot trust the minister to do the things that he will say he will do. We heard it a number of times today in question period and in response to the members opposite's request for an emergency debate on the issue of skyrocketing car insurance premiums. He claimed that he absolutely had no choice but to lift the cap on car insurance premiums because insurance companies were withdrawing services and pulling out of the province. He's never ever once actually brought proof to the Legislature that that has happened. I suspect that he may be coming up with justifications for his actions that aren't in line with the truth on the ground.

He says that apparently seven insurance companies have applied to his office to reduce premiums. Well, show us the applications. I don't trust the minister when he says that any insurance company has applied for permission to reduce their premiums. Certainly, I haven't heard any stories from the citizens of Edmonton-Gold Bar that their insurance premiums are going down or that their insurance companies are even considering reducing insurance premiums.

You know, it's not just on the issue of car insurance that we can't trust the minister. We can't trust him with our pensions, Madam Speaker. This Finance minister has done more to meddle with Albertans' pensions than any other Finance minister in the history of this province. He's taken away governance of the Alberta teachers' pension fund from the teachers. He's moved it into AIMCo. AIMCo, of course, has shown colossal incompetence managing the pensions of hundreds of thousands of Albertans, showing losses or a performance that is subpar when compared to other industry comparators, particularly the Canada pension plan. The Canada pension plan has performed remarkably well for the people of this country, and AIMCo can't even duplicate their management success.

So how on earth can the people of Alberta trust this minister to allow some upstart financial innovator, somebody who has come up with some allegedly new product – how can we trust the minister to act in the public interest when he's demonstrated not once in his term in office that he's acted in the public interest? I don't think that many Albertans are willing to extend him the benefit of the doubt that he maybe would have gotten had he introduced similar legislation at the very beginning of his term.

Moreover, Madam Speaker, on this issue of the inability to trust the minister to effectively oversee the actions of the financial industry in this province, in his own briefing with the opposition he admitted that his own department doesn't have the expertise necessary to provide solid advice on whether or not the exemptions that they're seeking are appropriate and will not lead to poor outcomes for consumers. So not only do we have a track record of a minister who is not acting in the public interest; by his own department's admission they don't have the skill set needed to earn that trust and properly provide oversight in this financial space.

Madam Speaker, it's quite clear to me and to many Albertans that allowing this bill to pass and allowing this minister to create this so-called regulatory sandbox is rife with potential for disaster for average consumers. I think it's fair for any Albertan to be extremely skeptical of the government's motivations for bringing forward this legislation, and I don't think any Albertan is looking forward to – they won't see a material benefit to their own standard of living, their own quality of life, their own income because of the actions of this government. In fact, I bet they think they're probably more likely to fall prey to some bad actors in this space who cannot be trusted to act in the public interest and who won't be reined in by a minister who can't be trusted to act in the public interest.

Those are the comments that I have on this piece of legislation. I'm looking forward to what other members have to say. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there other members wishing to join the debate on Bill 13? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 13, a bill that I'm quite curious to learn more about from the minister. Financial innovation is an interesting direction that this government has made a priority, and the reason that I say that is that there are lots of questions when it comes to what is now being called a regulatory sandbox – who is going to be able to create products within that sandbox? – and then, of course, the specifics around the consumer protections that will exist within this regulatory sandbox. Now, I'm more than interested to hear from the minister, as we move forward and as we are able to ask questions and, hopefully, get some answers, about how the government sees this moving forward.

[Mrs. Frey in the chair]

But before I get too far into some of the thoughts and questions that I have about the actual bill in the context of where we're headed, I guess one of the things that I'm still struggling to understand by this government is why the priorities that are being set – when it comes to being able to create innovation, to create investment, and to try to stimulate the economy, why would this be the priority that the government would choose to go down? This is, I would say, one of the first economic bills we've seen in this session since we've returned, one of the first fiscal policies outside of the budget that this government has decided to introduce into this Chamber since we've returned, yet there are a lot of unknowns. There isn't a lot of understanding, from what the government has said so far, about what kind of investment this would look like, what kind of companies would want to be engaging in this sandbox, and what the return for the economic benefit of Albertans would be. Now, I'm sure there's potential here, and I am more than happy to learn about it.

I guess that when we're looking at the direction that the Minister of Finance has decided to take when it comes to looking at and opening up the Alberta Securities Commission and looking at creating exemptions within the Securities Commission, I don't know if I would have made this the number one priority when looking at trying to update and encourage investments. There are many opportunities that even my hon. colleague from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has put forward in this Chamber most recently, in the last couple of weeks, in regard to ways to encourage innovation, ways to encourage investments, ways that Albertans are able to use their hard-earned dollars to help stimulate the economy, that this government has chosen to ignore and, in fact, has hindered the process in being able to create some of those changes within regulatory processes, that do have an immediate, clear, and secure way of creating innovation in tech, jobs in tech, a return on investment for Albertans but also exist within a system that is already protected, that ensures that the consumer who is deciding to invest knows and understands the risks of those investments.

This does not do that. This has quite a few unknowns around how setting up a regulatory sandbox actually supports consumer protections and works within the consumer protection laws and ensures that when these regulatory sandboxes are being built and are being marketed, they're not being abused.

I guess my question to the government in regard to this would be: why choose to do this? It's innovative; it doesn't exist anywhere else in the country. I mean, if you want to be first and if this is the government's direction, to be first, sure. But at a time where we are looking at trying to stimulate the economy, trying to ensure that Albertans have access to good-paying jobs, trying to encourage reinvestment into the province, I don't know if this would have been the strategy that I would have made my number one strategy. There were other strategies.

Again, the bill that my hon. colleague introduced: one strategy. Opening up the Alberta Securities Commission to allow investment into other projects across the province – agriculture, for example – another strategy.

There are mechanisms that could have been used, adjusted, that would have been able to stimulate investment, leverage capital, create projects, create employment, that already have a structure in place that protects the investment opportunities not only for the companies that are trying to build but also for the consumer that's going to be investing.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

I guess, for me, Bill 13 – I mean, I'm not saying that there's anything wrong with Bill 13 in the context of going ahead and doing it. I think, though, that it's disappointing for a government that likes to talk about the recovery strategy that they've created and wants to talk about opportunities in Alberta, wants to talk about bringing in investment and all of these things in a session where we're on Bill 13 now, and I believe we're almost up to 16, maybe even more, 18 – there have been a couple of bills introduced in this Legislature. So we have 18 bills currently sitting in front of the House to be debated, to be turned into legislation, and this would be the one economic bill that this government has created.

Out of 18 bills, we have one that actually speaks directly to promotion of investment, leveraging capital, creating jobs, and creating opportunities for Albertans. That's pretty sad, I would say, that that would be the direction that this government would take at a time where we're coming out of COVID and we're looking for an economic recovery, to have a piece of legislation that could potentially, if not implemented appropriately, actually impact and have some pretty detrimental effects on consumer protections.

How do we trust this government, then, to ensure that this structure, that this regulatory sandbox is going to have the regulation and policy in place that is going to protect those who invest? In fact, the argument that we heard from the government not only a week or two ago, when my colleague introduced his bill, was the very concern and questions from the government members around: how do you insure the risk? How do you protect people from the risk of the investment?

Clearly, because it already exists under the Securities Act, my colleague was able to answer the question and say: "Well, you know, it would be no different than doing an investment within the stock market with your RRSP or whatever you're using. You are very aware of your risk index, and you get to make that decision, that choice. You do a high-risk investment or a low-risk investment." Sure. Fair enough.

This bill doesn't clarify whether or not those protections are going to be in place, and in fact right now, based on the structure that this is going to have, the companies, and the intent of this bill, we know that currently the Alberta Treasury Board and Finance staff don't have the expertise to even be able to make sure that those mechanisms are in place. They've never worked in this space before. This space doesn't currently exist in Canada.

Because of that, there would have to be some kind of mechanism or hiring process or contracting out to ensure that we have that expertise and those people that understand this structure to be able to support the province in building it. Those people don't currently exist, though. There's no structure within the ministry to ensure that these investments will be protected.

My hope would be that the minister is working on that and that this isn't going to be something that will be rolled out and that the government just says: "Ah. Just trust us. It'll be fine. There won't be any negative rollouts or negative impacts based on what we're going to do. We'll make sure it works. We'll make sure that it is going to meet the threshold that is required for investments." That's great. The unfortunate part about that right now, though, is that it's really hard to trust this government to make good decisions. We've seen this historically. So I would be concerned.

You know, we find, when we talk about things in this House, that it takes a lot to get that openness and transparency from this government when it comes to any sort of financial accountability. It's the: "Just read the budget. Just trust us. Insurance premiums aren't going up. Just trust us. Oh, wait. The report says that they are. That report: don't read that. We're not going to release that. There's no reason to make any of that public. Just trust us." And the reality of it is that Albertans can't because every time they turn around, there's a new fee in place or their taxes are going up. But then they'll say: "Your taxes aren't going up. That's not our fault. Municipal taxes are going up. That's not our fault even though we've cut municipal funding. Just trust us."

So when it comes to being able to trust this government when it comes to financial reporting and the interpretation of the financial data that this government has access to, I would say that there is a wide spectrum of what would be considered accurate fact because, depending on who's reading that particular page in that document at that given time, it gets interpreted quite differently depending on who you're asking the question to.

I do think that there needs to be some clear explanation, education, I would say, when it comes to this piece of legislation ensuring that those who are investing or who are looking at becoming investors into these types of products are aware of the potential risk, that Albertans are protected under this piece of legislation in the context of: there will be no financial fallout that could somehow impact Albertans, that the province is not somehow tied to the liability when it comes to some of these products. I think, too, from a competitiveness piece, we have to ensure that whatever this government does decide to create within regulation or policy under the Alberta Securities Commission, it aligns with other jurisdictions. Of course, as we know, this has been something that has been discussed with me in the past. If it doesn't align with other jurisdictions, it becomes a trade barrier, so we have to be careful that we're not creating something that would negatively impact business within the province.

Now, there are some questions, obviously, that I think my colleagues have probably already brought up, when it comes to protecting the privacy of Albertans and ensuring that we're not doing anything within this legislation or these regulations that would breach the privacy laws. Obviously, within an institutional bank those structures are very rigid. They are regulated. Your personal banking information cannot be provided to your neighbours or to anybody else. Those structures need to be in place and ensured within these structures and also need to be monitored.

I think the other question would also be, when we're looking at this piece of legislation: what are the consequences if something were to happen? What is the regulation going to look like? How is the government going to ensure that there is appropriate insurance coverage, that there are appropriate risk management procedures and policies, that people don't just get wiped out if they invest in these or if their money goes missing and nobody knows where it went, and that there's an ability to track any type of transaction in the context of not the individual but just making sure the money goes where it should go, basically being able to do that forensic audit?

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's always an honour and a privilege to rise in this House and speak to the bills put forward by this government. With this particular bill, I would honestly say that it's something that I'm excited about. Having worked in the financial industry with RBC Dominion Securities for a while, I know that this is something that will be highly welcomed by many of the people that work in the industry. Of course, part of any economy that is trying to modernize and move forward and build opportunities: it's important that we move at the pace that innovators would like us to move, especially when it comes to financial markets. Of course, as a reminder, you know, financial markets are really based upon an old-school market.

Like, one of my favourite pastimes, whenever I'm travelling abroad or even here at home, is visiting a farmers' market or, when I visit South America, going to the market on a Sunday, which are very typical, where people are selling all kinds of goods. Of course, financial markets are based upon this, and that's why we have things like futures and derivatives. Before these were actually introduced, people were pretty skeptical about how they would actually work. You're actually saying, "Okay; well, in the future, in two months' time, I'm willing to pay this certain amount or price for a kilo of corn," for example, or coffee, or whatever the case may be. These were quite innovative steps taken by financial markets at that time.

That being said, you know, I agree with the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar that people are very skeptical about financial vehicles, and the reason for that is because they don't know how they work. I would strongly suggest to this government that moving in this direction is really important. I'm going to take a step back here, Madam Speaker. Taking this step is really important for a number of reasons, but, for me, one of the most important reasons is that we're actually experiencing the introduction of newer technologies to financial markets. We're actually experiencing a democratization of the marketplace where more people are getting access to making financial investments. Of course, this is a very good thing, but the downside of it is the fact that people need more information, and they definitely need more education when it comes to new financial vehicles and how they're being introduced into the market.

It's happened so many times in the past where, you know, you do have good financial players that do their best to educate people as much as they possibly can on financial vehicles and access to them, whether it could be anything from life insurance to, as I was talking about before, futures, right? But the problem is that not all financial players disclose all the information.

As the Member for Lethbridge-West was saying, you know, you could be investing in something, and the fine print at the bottom of the contract is so fine and so tiny and so long that you really don't have the time to actually go into it. People feel – how can I put it? – pressured, is the best word that I could use. People feel pressured just to sign on the bottom line and then read the fine print afterwards. Once they do have the opportunity to actually read that fine print, they realize that there are a number of risks that go with this financial investment that they've just made, that, in the long term, may not be the best use of their money.

Now, of course, I know that people are encouraged to invest beyond what they get through the Canada pension plan or old age security or all these kinds of benefits that people get in their retirement years by investing in a registered retirement savings plan or, for example, investing in a registered educational savings plan for their children. All these kinds of investments are really great and really needed by people, especially in terms of how the economy is moving. I think it's so important that at the same time that we encourage people to invest privately in these registered retirement savings plans, though, Canadians also have an opportunity to make sure that they know that they're going to have a bare minimum of a retirement plan to build upon by having that Canada pension plan at their disposal once they retire.

Now, a lot of people don't know how to make these investments, and that's why the Canada pension plan is so important, so that people – you know, you have a lot of Albertans out there that just don't have the information at their disposal, and it's good that the government actually provides the Canada pension plan. They put money away, their employer puts money away so that once they do retire, they can rely on a bare minimum, right? I know that the members across the way – well, not all of them, because I've heard some of them make the argument that we should just scrap the Canada pension plan altogether and that people should just be able to invest their own money in RRSPs. I don't personally believe in that, Madam Speaker. I think that government has a role and a responsibility to its citizens to actually help them out in making sure that they have a retirement nest egg at their disposal. They can also be encouraged to actually invest on their own, if they want to, over and above and beyond that if they want to make sure that they have a higher standard of living in their retirement, but that's up to them.

What I'm getting at here is that, alongside this piece of legislation, I would urge the government to actually provide more education on financial investment, especially when it comes to people investing in these new types of financial vehicles that will be provided by financial institutions, private companies through this piece of legislation, because we don't want to see people who have spent 20, 30 years putting money into an RRSP, and then they decide, "Okay, well, I'm going to play with a little bit of my RRSP," and they actually take some of this money, and then they start putting it into these new types of investments where they could risk everything and lose everything.

There has to be a certain level of protection, Madam Speaker, and on this side of the House this is what we're most concerned about when it comes to this particular bill. We want to make sure that the government, through this new regulatory sandbox – and we don't have any of the details. I actually read through the entire bill. I read through the entire bill, and . . . [some applause] You're very welcome. Nowhere in the bill is there actually – you know, it's a funny thing. It's like: I take the time to, like, read through these bills, and I have to ask, you know, I wonder if some of the members on the other side actually read through their own bills because when they get up in the House and speak on some of the bills that the government has presented, it doesn't sound like they actually read the bill, right?

Anyways, on that note, I read the bill from cover to cover, and nowhere does it actually talk about consumer protections. It says that these will be developed in the regulations, of course, right? So the problem then becomes: okay; well, if they're going to be developed in regulations later on, then how are we going to know? The truth is that we're not going to know. So when it comes to members on this side of the House who have spoken significantly on the issue of trust and not being able to trust the Minister of Finance when it comes to – well, the Minister of Finance has introduced a number of bills in this House, but by and large the one that has impacted not only my own constituents but all Albertans across this province is the fact that they decided to take the cap off insurance.

A funny thing: I was listening really carefully to the Minister of Finance as he was opening debate on Bill 13, and the Conservatives tend to have this innate hope that the invisible hand will truly, truly bring down prices. This is what they think. You know, they believe in this invisible hand approach, that if the market is left up to its own devices to just work out through supply and demand, somehow costs of goods and services will actually come down.

What the minister said – and I don't have the Blues in front of me, Madam Speaker, but he said it very well. He said that this could bring down prices. Now, I would make the argument that many of the Crown corporations not just here in Alberta but across Canada, as they were dismantled, at any order of government, provincial and even municipal – and, you know, I applaud the municipalities around Alberta who have actually maintained collective ownership of distribution of services like electricity here in the province, because they are actually getting lower prices for the people in those jurisdictions.

Medicine Hat is a fantastic example of actually that, and Conservatives all across this land have moved people away from that collective ownership towards these private companies and privatizing services, so much so, and what ends up happening is that people end up paying higher prices for that particular service. Now, of course, Conservatives are saying: well, it could bring down the price; it could bring down the price. But as we saw in just the months of December and January, as prices of natural gas and electricity started to go up, people started realizing that it's not just the electricity that they're paying. These private companies have actually tacked on a number of fees, and I can't tell you how many times I've heard it from constituents coming to me or even sending me e-mails or calling me on the phone saying, like: why do I have to pay a fee for this and a fee for that and a fee for this in here and a fee for over here? That's what ended up happening with privatization.

I think that the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar is right. People are very skeptical when it comes to the actions of this government when it comes to them saying: well, it could bring down the price. People, Madam Speaker, Albertans want a guarantee. Albertans want to know that they can trust their government and that their government is working for the common good, in the public interest, and unfortunately in jurisdiction after jurisdiction after jurisdiction not only in Canada but across North America and even throughout the world privatization ends up happening, and rarely – rarely – does it lead to lower prices for goods that were previously being offered through a collective system. I invite the members on the other side to look at the numbers. Look at the numbers.

Now, my big issue with this, Madam Speaker, is the fact that . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to join the debate on Bill 13? Seeing the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford – Edmonton-Riverview; my apologies.

Ms Sigurdson: Yes. Riverview. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Yeah. It's my pleasure to join the debate on this bill to look at creating a regulatory sandbox where financial services companies and financial technology companies could test new products, services, technology. This is kind of an innovative, new idea. This legislation currently is not anywhere else in Canada. Certainly, this legislation builds on work that our government did to – you know, an initiative that started with our government in the security space, which is regulated by the Alberta Securities Commission in Alberta. I mean, this is important legislation, and it will support innovation in this regulatory sandbox.

However, there are some concerns, as, certainly, my hon. colleagues have shared with the members, because there are some broad legislative powers. There's broad control, and of course there always need to be checks and balances in government. We need to make sure that things are being done in the public interest, that people are supported, and that people aren't excluded from these kinds of things, and that decisions aren't made that are really going to hurt Albertans. Of course, that is a concern. We certainly have a current government that has a track record of seeming to not really take the public interest into mind. A lot of this legislation is based on trusting the minister, trusting this government to do what they need to, but there are some concerns with that, as I've said. I mean, we could have – I could go through many, many examples of that, but I'll certainly just sort of stick to the critic areas that I am representing.

One of the very first things that this government did and that I find extremely disturbing, and it makes me and many people that I've spoken to know that this government isn't trustworthy, is that they immediately, in 2019, closed the office of the Seniors Advocate. They said at the time that that was going to be actually rolled into the Health Advocate office and that seniors would be supported through that office, which sadly, Madam Speaker, was completely untrue. That did not happen. You know, I ask at each estimates, I've asked the minister many times in this House: can we see the annual report of the Health Advocate? No report has been created or published, so none of us can see it. We don't know what she's doing. Certainly, seniors tell me that they have no access to her, that there aren't any supports for them. Yet that's clearly what the minister said, that this advocate would be rolled into the Health Advocate and that certainly they would be supported. I guess this question of trust is so key, because with this kind of legislation we are needing the government to be trustworthy.

You know, just even continuing on with this issue of the Seniors Advocate, sadly, the Health Advocate did leave her post shortly after the UCP became government, and instead of having a public competition for that position, the new Health Advocate was simply appointed by the Minister of Health. It's Janice Harrington. She is the former executive director of the Conservative Party and really has no expertise at all in this area. Again, this is another significant trust issue for this government. That's why this legislation could be problematic, Madam Speaker. We do need to rely on the assessment of the government and make sure that they are making decisions in the best interests of Albertans. I think that the examples that I've shown, where there have been questions and concerns, do demonstrate that that is really a concern and a valid concern. Certainly, I've heard from many Albertans about that.

I mean, I do support this type of regulatory sandbox, but there are about four key risks that are important for us to look at in this legislation. Government competency is one. There's a risk that Treasury Board and Finance might not have the expertise to properly regulate a new product idea because it lacks the expertise. So how will that be mitigated? This is just something that the government should look at to make sure that the legislation does support the government to be competent in these areas.

As I've already talked about, another risk is just the trust in the minister and the government. As I said, my example of the Seniors Advocate and the closure of that office and the appointment of a partisan, someone with little expertise in this area, just shows how we can't trust the government to make decisions in the public interest. This legislation gives a lot of power to the minister, and a key risk is that the power will be abused. Again, I just offer those comments to the government so that we make sure that this legislation is for the betterment of Albertans.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Also, a third key risk is that we have too much trust right now in the financial institutions. You know, this is a riskier venture that is being presented. Will Albertans fully understand that? Making sure that they do: again, this is incumbent on the government, to make sure that Albertans are protected and that they're not naive to these risks. So again I just counsel the government to make sure that Albertans know the risks involved in going into this sandbox.

The fourth one is sufficient public disclosure. It would be incumbent on the government to ensure that any company in the sandbox and offering new services or products alerts the public that they're dealing with something novel and potentially risky. Again, this is another sort of red flag that the government needs to really make sure that Albertans know about and can be supported to make the right level of risk for themselves. We don't want them to get themselves into some hot water that they can't get out of. We want this, obviously, to be value-added.

The legislation itself is, you know, creative. It's something that our government began, and we do not stand in opposition to that. But there are so many red flags, so many risks that Albertans could be exposed to that they may not understand about it, so it's really incumbent on the government to make sure that Albertans understand that.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I'll take my seat.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act. I've got, as probably no surprise to anyone in the Chamber, quite a few comments to make about this proposed bill.

I'll start off at the onset. I believe I actually told this to the Minister of Finance directly. Again, as I have stated over my time in this place, I have no problems giving credit where credit is due, and I've said to the Finance minister that I'm behind the spirit of this bill in what we're trying to do here in Alberta. I know the government has often talked about Alberta as an incredibly innovative province, which we are, full of incredible entrepreneurs. However, their actions haven't always followed on those words, where we've seen a number of initiatives that were supporting Alberta's entrepreneurs and innovators, and under this UCP government they literally yanked the carpet from underneath them.

Now, in this bill, Mr. Speaker, I believe Alberta will be the first jurisdiction to set up this type of regulatory framework or, really, to establish an Alberta sandbox, which, of course, everyone is using, which is, you know, an adequate description of what we're doing, essentially putting the many different regulations that govern our securities and financial sector on pause or on hold so that companies can experiment with different products.

Now, as my colleagues have so aptly put it, that's exciting, on the one hand, to give our financial innovators – of course, Mr. Speaker, you know that the financial sector in Alberta employs more than 60,000 Albertans. It is a very large sector when we look at our economy as a whole. We also have some institutions to be incredibly proud of, from the fact that Alberta is the sole province that has a Crown corporation as a lender and bank, ATB. We have a number of incredible credit unions and other financial institutions. I don't mean to leave anybody out, so, you know, I'll put them all into that category. Many of them have offices here in Alberta. Some of them have head offices here in Alberta.

You know, I think this is and falls under a bold new initiative, but the concerns my colleagues have raised I think are really valid, and the Chamber ought to take some time to hear the words of the opposition as far as concerns that my colleagues have raised and a number that I will raise. Again, Mr. Speaker, every member was elected to this Chamber by Albertans to do a job, and our job is to hold the government to account and to offer solutions and amendments to legislation to try to strengthen it.

You know, upon reading this bill, I don't know if the Finance minister wrote this hastily or if it was intentional in that there is quite a broad swath of exemptions that are written into this bill and that are framed as: the minister will decide. Now, I appreciate that the government probably didn't want to make this bill overly prescriptive.

Mr. Speaker, for the handful of Albertans that are very interested in legislation that's being debated in this Chamber, there are going to be a number of references I'm going to make to a bill that I introduced a couple of weeks ago called the Technology Innovation and Alberta Venture Fund Act, which has some similarities to this bill. In fact, members of this Chamber in committee raised a number of concerns with my bill, that are written in this bill that the government has now tabled. So, you know, if people are thinking, "Well, this is a little ironic," yeah, they should be.

I know that my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Riverview spoke about some of the risks. Again, I appreciate that in order to create a sandbox and to provide companies with the ability to innovate, the current Securities Commission or Securities Act and a number of other acts, including the financial services act, would need to be amended. If we're talking about creating an innovative space, the easiest mechanism is to put those on pause. I don't disagree with that, Mr. Speaker, because you don't know what you don't know, so companies or the government won't know which acts to amend and how to amend them to allow for new innovative products because those products haven't been developed yet. You know, I appreciate that.

A concern that was raised by my colleagues, that I share, is: how do we ensure that consumers will be protected? This was a very concern that government members raised when asking me about my bill. How do we mitigate risk? How do we ensure that Albertans aren't going to be put into a position that could place either their savings or investment dollars at risk? I would love to hear from the Minister of Finance on: what are those protections in this bill? You know, as the members of that committee know, those decisions to participate in a venture fund are, first of all, the decision of individual Albertans. There are no government dollars being invested or at risk. But there was and is in Bill 203 an educational component. There is part of the bill that mandates that the government educates Albertans on the inherent risks involved with investing in that type of venture fund. I don't see that oversight or protection in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I don't think Albertans, rightly, trust this current government when they say: trust us. I mean, first of all, I don't think Albertans trust any government that says, "Trust us," but the list of examples or the list of times this government has said, "Trust us" and then done the opposite is growing. It's quite incredible.

This government said: trust us on income taxes. We now know that Albertans are losing a billion dollars on bracket creep. The irony is that the Premier not 20 years ago railed against the federal government for bracket creep, yet somehow now it's okay. There is a word for that. I won't use that in this Chamber, but when a person does the opposite of what they're calling on past governments to do, you know, it's a clear indication that their words and actions are incongruent. That's probably the kindest way that I can frame that. There's the first example.

The second example, which my colleagues have been talking about today – and every Albertan has felt this, myself included – is the spike in premiums on car insurance while the industry has made out with a billion dollars more. The part that really caught my attention, Mr. Speaker, when my colleagues were raising this point today: this wasn't that they're making out with a billion-dollar profit – companies need to be profitable to survive; we want companies to be profitable – but a billion dollars more profit than what they were already making at a time when the majority of Albertans were working from home. For a government that says, "We're looking out for Albertans and consumers," no, you're not. The proof is in, well, these many examples. I'm going to give more. That example on the auto insurance industry is baffling to many Albertans because our rates spiked.

We have another example where this government was about to allow companies to strip-mine the Rockies. Again, Albertans stood up and pushed back on this government to say: oh, no; don't you dare. Albertans value and love our terrain, our backyard, our wilderness, you know, the majesty of the Rocky Mountains. We have millions of tourists who come every year just to enjoy them. This government was about to sell them off to the highest bidder.

The irony in that is that this government thinks: yeah, we're pro business. Well, you know what? Every tech company that has come to Alberta in the last five years: none of them that I've spoken with have ever mentioned corporate taxes. None. None have mentioned the tax rate. You know why? Because Alberta already had the most competitive corporate tax rate in Canada before the UCP came in. With the carbon tax – I don't know if members know this, but Albertans paid $7 billion less in taxes with the carbon tax than the next lowest tax jurisdiction, which is Saskatchewan. You know why? Because we don't have a PST, we don't have health care premiums, and we don't have a payroll tax.

So why did these companies come to Alberta? The top two reasons: first one, talent – again, the irony is that you have a government that is blowing up our postsecondary institutions, gutting them by hundreds of millions of dollars – and number two, they came for quality of life. What does that mean? Why do companies often choose southern Alberta and the region of Calgary? Because of its close proximity to the Rocky Mountains and the quality of life that many people are attracted to the city of Calgary for. Strip-mining the Rockies would probably be a deterrent to other companies coming and, in fact, even those staying here, yet this current government said: no, no; trust us. Actions speak louder than words, Mr. Speaker.

I'll jump back to this bill. I will wrap up my comments to say that the bill does enable companies to be innovative and creative, which is what we want and what I support, but there are questions around ensuring that Albertans are protected, that we're protecting privacy. I know in this bill there's an exemption from PIPA, from the privacy of Albertans, which causes me some concern. I'd love to hear from the minister as to why, you know, the applications of PIPA had to be suspended in the legislation. I appreciate it probably couldn't be in regulation.

I'd like to know who and which companies the minister consulted with from industry. Again, I think it's great that there are a number of companies. I mean, I'm guessing that ATB was one of them, to be honest, just from knowing some of their former executives and the many innovative products that they have put forward, but I'm curious to know who else the government has consulted with.

I look forward, Mr. Speaker, to a robust debate in Committee of the Whole, and I look forward to seeing the outcome of this bill.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I move that we adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 11 Continuing Care Act

[Debate adjourned March 30: Mr. Nielsen speaking]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has approximately five minutes remaining should he choose to use them.

Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to join debate on Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act. You know, we've been through a very, very difficult time these last few years. We know that over 1,600 residents of continuing care have died in our province. That is a significant tragedy, and my heart goes out to the loved ones, friends, and family of those who lost their lives during the pandemic. It is also something that's very disturbing.

I believe some of the reason that this bill was created is that we had the largest outbreak in facilities across Canada. We had the most outbreaks in Alberta. So there's something wrong – there's something wrong, Mr. Speaker – in the system that we have here in Alberta in that so many vulnerable residents of continuing care lost their lives during the pandemic. Sadly, so many of these were preventable deaths. These were preventable deaths if there had been measures put into place earlier, if our system had been different, if we were able to have more value and support for residents of continuing care. I'm not sure how many, but I would say that that number of over 1,600 seniors would be considerably lower. Certainly, one of the major reasons, I think, that many people have identified – and this isn't, like, new information; this is information that we've had even before the pandemic – is that there are issues with staffing in continuing care, that there's insufficient staff.

Often the staff are – we call them precarious because oftentimes they're women. There are low wages. They're oftentimes newcomers to our country, and oftentimes they don't have a full-time job. They have to cobble together a job. They might not work at only one continuing care facility, but they work at maybe two or three, or maybe they also work in the fast food industry plus their part-time job with no benefits. No benefits. These are the people who are supposed to during COVID, you know, do the gargantuan task of so much extra care and responsibilities in terms of supporting residents of continuing care. Guess what happened. They didn't have the support they needed because of the precarious nature of their employment working at either many different facilities or in other low-wage jobs. We know that the virus, COVID-19, spread like wildfire amongst very vulnerable residents.

This, you know, staffing issue predates COVID, but COVID, of course, shone the light so, so brightly on the issues in continuing care. Very sadly, we have these deadly consequences of over 1,600 people dying in continuing care. It didn't have to be this way, Mr. Speaker, but because of, I'd say, the private, for-profit model of a lot of continuing care facilities this is what happened. They hire precarious workers who get paid low wages, they give them no benefits, and it's all to increase the profit for their shareholders.

You know, there's a significant example of that. AgeCare has several facilities in Alberta. Four of them in Calgary were sold back in 2020 to a big financial company called Axium. Its purpose is wealth generation for its shareholders. It doesn't care about seniors' care. It doesn't care about that at all. It cares about making money for its shareholders. Four of these properties of AgeCare were sold to Axium. Guess what now is happening. Those workers, those precarious workers already, are even being tasked with more responsibilities, with more pressure on them, less support because, of course, we have to make sure that – the bottom line is that they are spending as little as possible so those profits for their shareholders can be as high as they can. So it's not about seniors' care. It's about wealth generation, and that's why this whole financialization of the continuing care sector doesn't work.

We know from, you know, research report after research report that the best outcomes are in public facilities, the next best are in nonprofits, and the worst outcomes are in private facilities. This legislation that's before us today, Bill 11, was coming out of the facility-based continuing care review looking at: what can we do to improve the care of seniors, and what can we do to make the facilities run better? Hopefully, it's all in the public good and that this is why Bill 11 came forward. This is pretty serious stuff that I've just shared with you and very tragic stuff, too. As I said, so many of these deaths were preventable.

Sadly, Bill 11 kind of is missing an action. It's not making any kind of big changes regarding staffing, which is the key issue. I have heard from so many Albertans who have reached out to me just, you know, broken hearted and upset about the lack of care their loved one is receiving or indeed that their loved one has passed on because they had gotten COVID. This bill before us today really is just an administrative bill. It's kind of a housekeeping bill. It's bringing all sorts of legislation together that were in disparate parts of legislation. I mean, that's not a bad thing, but that's not dealing with the key issue, which, of course, as I've identified, is staffing. The thing is that when I was part of the technical briefing for this, we asked lots of questions about staffing. We talked about hours of care, where all the – what's the information for this? "Well, it's in regulations. It's in regulations. Oh, those aren't created yet. This will all come in time." They're talking about spring of 2023.

I mean, you know, I think, if anything, the COVID-19 pandemic has taught us about the urgency of these issues, not to push it away again to 2023. These need to be dealt with now, and this bill, sadly, is not doing that. They are again delaying. So it's really a bill that is kind of empty. It is not doing the fundamental things that it needs to, and it is a significant tragedy that the government doesn't see this as important enough, that they haven't seen enough of what is going on to realize the urgency of this, the importance of this, that there are still vulnerable Albertans that need significant support and that we do need, for example, the staffing issues to be dealt with.

You know, if we go back to the early part of the COVID-19 pandemic, the government was reticent to get too involved. They kind of dragged their heels about doing anything that would really make a difference. Eventually, after we in the Official Opposition pushed and yelled and screamed at them and wanted them to make sure that workers were just in one site because we knew that that was making COVID-19 spread like wildfire – the residents are vulnerable people, and we know that they're the most likely to die from that. Sadly, the government moved very slowly on this one-work-site order from the chief medical officer of health, and then when it was put in, there were so many exemptions to it that it was almost like it was useless, because this employer needed this exemption, and that employer needed that one. It wasn't about the best interests of the residents. This government sort of did too little too late, and sadly they are continuing with that behaviour in Bill 11, without really making substantive changes and showing us what's important.

I just will say once again that staffing is a key issue, and certainly they heard that loud and clear in the facility-based continuing care review. In fact, they said that that review said that we should be hiring 6,000 – 6,000 – additional workers, because there are, you know, obviously, not enough people working in that sector to support them. How do you attract people to that? Well, of course, you give them jobs that are full-time, that have benefits, that aren't the lowest wages, and you have reasonable expectations of them so that they're not having responsibilities that are beyond their ability to fulfill on.

I've certainly heard that when I've spoken with health care aides, where they're given such a small amount of time to do something that really takes quite a bit of time, you know, whether it be feeding somebody, bathing somebody. Of course, relationships are so crucial to the care of residents of continuing care. The health care aides, the staff need to have time to connect with people, but if they're always being told, "Okay; you've got five more people you have to feed; you have to get going over there" and sort of really unrealistic expectations in terms of what they need to do – again, I just want to remind people that these workers are precarious workers. They're maybe newcomers to Canada. They aren't feeling – they may not understand some aspects of it. They're not getting the support they need. They're stressed in their own lives, perhaps, because they have to work these multiple part-time jobs with no benefits. They're concerned themselves because the pandemic is on, and will they be bringing it home to their family? So sometimes they're scared to go into work. What supports can the government give these workers?

Certainly, we were hoping Bill 11 was going to actually give us some answers to those questions, but it doesn't. As I said, it's empty legislation. It's not, you know, talking about full-time workers. It's not talking about making sure that they have good working conditions. It's not talking about any of that. Certainly, they're suggesting it's going to come in the regulations, but, I mean, it really needs to be in the legislation.

We know that certainly the facility-based continuing care report, like, besides saying, you know, that we need 6,000 more staff, which is a significant increase, and the government really needs to work with postsecondary institutions to make sure that people are being supported to go into that work and then, again, that those workers are supported when they're in that sector, so improving working conditions, increasing – also, another thing is the amount of home care that's being provided, and another key issue is just the minimum hours of service. Certainly, it's well understood that 4.1 hours of service to each resident is needed.

Again, there's nothing in this bill about any of that. It's kind of an empty bill, housekeeping, so it's very tragic the government has decided not to deal with this very important issue. I shake my head at knowing what would make them step up. You know, over 1,600 Albertans have died in continuing care, and there needs to be fundamental change. Sadly, Mr. Speaker, that is not in this bill, and certainly that is why I will not be supporting the bill. I would encourage all members of the Legislature to not support it, because we know that so much more needs to be done, and I think it starts with staffing regarding the people in continuing care.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others who wish to join in the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has caught my eye.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. When it comes to Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, analysis, we see before us, as was very well explained by the Member for Edmonton-Riverview, a piece of legislation that really just addresses administrative issues as they relate to continuing care, which is for us a very – well, how can I put it? It's just heartbreaking given the reality that we faced over the last two years here in the province of Alberta with the fact that more than 1,600 people who are continuing care residents actually passed away because of COVID.

We were really hoping that the government was going to be able to address some of the shortfalls that are currently being experienced in continuing care. Of course, the Member for Edmonton-Riverview described those in great detail, and I have to say that I confirm, because I've heard it myself from especially people that are new Canadians, that work in this field, and of which are from many different, you know, ethnic backgrounds. They have complained about the fact that in this particular industry there just doesn't seem to be the attention required to make sure that people's health is first and foremost when it comes to the care of the residents of these continuing care facilities.

It's shocking, to be quite honest. It's shocking the stories that you hear from families, for example, of how they've gone to check in on a family member that's in continuing care and they see that they're not getting the appropriate care at all. We've heard stories of, because of the fact that those who are actually working in the field are so hard pressed, like, there is not enough staff to cover all of the residents in a particular continuing care facility. So, yes, you know, it's been unfortunate. We hear stories of people not getting the appropriate amount of care and dedication, and sometimes they're left for an entire day to sit in their own stool. This is not by any means dignified at all. For me, I find it unfathomable that here we have an opportunity to actually address these particular issues when it comes to the industry, specifically about issues about staffing, yet none of that is presented here before us in this particular bill.

We feel like the UCP is absolutely not taking any action. In fact, instead of making things better, they're creating more chaos in the system. That goes to the health care system as a whole, Mr. Speaker. Rather than improving health care here in the province of Alberta, what we've actually seen this UCP government do is dismantle it, reduce the quality of care, and throw the whole health care system into chaos. We heard it right from the minister's mouth today during question period. That is, of course, the fact that they have a different approach to health care, so much so that they had to fire Verna Yiu because she was not going to put herself at the access of this government to actually move in the direction that they want to move. Therefore, they had to go and find somebody else that was going to do their bidding.

Of course, Albertans know that what's really on the mind of this government is to privatize, privatize the entire health care system, and what we see in the continuing care industry – we can only ask ourselves: okay; is this more of the same that they're going to move, that they're going to create in the health care system here in the province of Alberta, where they're going to drastically decrease the quality of care for people here in the province? The UCP has proven that they're incapable of managing this complex health care system and putting the needs of Albertans first. This is what we are actively seeing from this government.

This bill does not even fulfill the UCP's own promise from a year ago to increase home care for the amount of hours of care that residents would receive and, of course, increase the proportion of full-time staff. This was a promise made by this government just one year ago, that they were actually going to move forward on all these three aspects when it comes to continuing care, but of course we see nothing from this government on that in this particular bill.

The bill consolidates many pieces of legislation and associated regulations but fails to make substantive and meaningful changes. All the substantive changes that will come through regulation, which the UCP are saying that they expect in the spring of – they say that they are going to come in 2023. Perhaps the minister could shed some light on that.

Waiting for this government, for us just to trust them that they're going to deal with these issues, of course, is way too big a risk for the residents of these continuing care facilities, for the people that work in them. Of course, already we've demonstrated a number of times, Mr. Speaker, that Albertans feel that they just cannot trust this government, and here we see more of the same. They know what the problem is. They've even said that they're going to address it, yet here before us we have a piece of legislation where they're not doing anything to commit to the promise, that they made a year ago, that they were actually going to address when it comes to continuing care.

Of course, this is all part and parcel of the fact that, as I said before, they fired the CEO of Alberta Health Services to move on their agenda to privatize health care here in the province of Alberta. I think that's one of the biggest reasons why Albertans are starting to get very worried about this government. We'll see, with the application of this proposed piece of legislation and others related to it from this particular minister, that Albertans are going to completely lose trust. Albertans happen to feel very attached and associated to the fact that here in the province of Alberta and across the Canadian jurisdiction they actually identify with universal health care.

I see that the minister would like to say some words, so I'll give way.

Mr. Copping: I thank the hon. member for accepting my comments. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to talk briefly – how much time do I have? One minute. Good Lord. In one moment I just want to make one comment. I appreciate that the member opposite, raising issues in regard to this proposed legislation, does not have details in regard to hours, does not have details in regard to staffing. I just wanted to point out to the hon. member that the current legislation doesn't have details in regard to hours, doesn't have details in regard to staffing. That's in the regulation. Those are in the policies. Our intent is actually to develop those over the coming months and work with the industry. More importantly, I'd ask the hon. member to look to the industry, which is, you know, private, not-for-profit, and public, who is supportive of our framework. This is the first step, and we are committed to be actually fixing this but recognize that the other items that he's looking for are in policies and regulation now.

Member Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Of course, the issue that we have before us, Minister, is the fact that you yourself, this cabinet have identified that there are certain problems with the continuing care industry. I highlighted those, and I'll go through them again just to refresh your memory. Of course, I don't want to make a comment about where the minister was when I said it before, so I'll just review them.

Those were – and the promise made a year ago by your government and yourself, Minister, through the chair, of course, is the fact that there needs to be an increase in home care, the amount of hours of care that residents would receive, and then increase the proportion of full-time staff. This was a promise that was made by your government, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the minister, and it's something that drastically needs to be addressed. That's why we're, on this side of the House, asking ourselves: you made the promise a year ago that you were going to address it, yet here we have ample opportunity for you to actually do that through this particular bill, and we're not seeing it happen, right? Really, we would like to see and hear from the minister about how this is going to be addressed. This is the primary concern. As was well stated by the Member for Edmonton-Riverview, the conditions of these continuing care facilities are the primary concern of Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, I see that the minister would like to interject, so I will give way.

Mr. Copping: Well, thank you again to the hon. member. I just want to be able to respond to his question in terms of increase in home care and addressing the staffing issue. We recognize that. This was identified through the FBCC, and we will respond to that.

What this act does: it provides the framework to be able to address it, putting all the pieces together. We'll need to address it in regulation. We'll need to address it in policy. And the reason why that's important, Mr. Speaker, is that locking in a certain item in legislation doesn't allow for us to be more flexible down the road, because things will change down the road. We know that. Today it already is in policy. It already is in regulation. That's where we propose to put that and then look at different ways that we can supply that, providing flexibility not only for not-for-profits, for private care operators, for public operators. We have all of them, and they're all very supportive of this. So I'd ask the hon. member: you know, when doing the assessment of the act, look at what it is, which is a framework. This is a framework to allow us to actually make the changes. The changes will go in regulation and in policies, and that's the appropriate place for them.

Member Loyola: I appreciate that it's a framework. Of course, we've heard from a number of advocates, for example, Mr. Speaker, on why a ratio couldn't be established in legislation, because a ratio would be flexible. It would make sure that a certain amount of people are getting care, and then the home-care facilities would have to hire staff in order to meet that particular ratio, right? Now, advocates have asked for this. I'm sure that you've heard it. Through you, Mr. Speaker, to the minister, I'm sure that you've heard advocates ask for this particular approach when it comes to the care of their loved ones. Of course, people who represent workers in that particular industry as well have advocated for such ratios.

Now, of course, what this government decides to do with that information – and, you know, I've debated at length in this House. With all due respect, in my humblest opinion – and I say it to the members across the way – often what we see in legislation is them responding to the people that actually agree with their own ideology. And what this is, what this debate is really about, is moving Alberta down the road on a more privatized approach to health care here in the province of Alberta. That's what we see, and that's what our concern is.

Before the hon. minister actually got up to interject the first time, I was actually speaking about that and how Albertans identify specifically with universal health care and the fact that health care is a human right – right? – established in the Charter, is internationally recognized. For us to move in the opposite direction – now, I'm talking about quality of health care. This is the primary concern of Albertans. Albertans want to maintain a universal health care approach, but they do want it to improve. Of course, we all want it to improve. We all want to see the quality of health care being provided in our hospitals across the province improve and for people to get the care that they need when they need it and not have to pay for it, right? This is what this debate is really about.

When previous Conservative governments decided to move continuing care further down the path of privatization by allowing, you know, private companies to actually come in – again, as I was debating earlier this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, we constantly get from Conservatives, and this government is no exception, that they said: well, if you introduce privatization, it could bring the price down.

Now, I'm telling you that I've heard from so many people who have loved ones in continuing care, and they just say that the prices for care are just astronomical – astronomical – like, people having to pay $6,000, $7,000, $8,000 a month for care of their loved one. Now, wrap your head around that. Wrap your head around a $7,000 to $8,000 bill. You know, there are some people who just can't afford that. Again, Mr. Speaker, I go back to the whole supply and demand, the curve of supply of demand. It's going to price certain people out of the market. What's going to happen to those people? Will those people end up having to take care of their loved one at home? They have a full-time job. Some of them go to a part-time job just so that they can take care of somebody at home, but these are real pressures on families all across Alberta.

This is what Albertans want this government to address. Rather than actually provide fixes or opportunities for actually lowering the price of continuing care or coming up with options for Albertans, this government is actually making the situation all that much worse. Again, we don't see that by introducing privatization – especially when it comes to continuing care, the privatization isn't driving the cost down.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to join in the debate on Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, analysis. You know, I've been listening intently and appreciate comments from my colleagues on this bill, and I also appreciate the minister engaged in this dialogue, recognizing that often, due to scheduling, ministers aren't able to be present for all parts of a bill in bill debate, so that's wonderful.

You know, my comments on this bill are that – and I appreciate that it's a framework, as the minister recently articulated – for me, I think this bill misses an incredible opportunity to address a system that is woefully inadequate. Now, that's not a comment against the minister. I think the province has had a shortage of beds for many years. In fact, when I was first elected to this Chamber, I remember speaking back then, in 2012, to the lack of number of beds.

You know, that's been exacerbated, Madam Speaker, by, of course, the number of baby boomers who are retiring and the first batch of baby boomers moving through this system, needing continuing care or needing care. I know that under our government we created 2,000 new beds, and that's a great start, but once again we're far from being completed. I know that in my riding in northeast Edmonton of Beverly-Clareview there is a shortage of beds. We often hear really sad stories of couples who've been married for many, many years. Each of them needs a different level of care or has different needs, and our system often cannot accommodate two people with two very differing needs. Now, I know that there are some operators and builders that have built some incredible spaces.

I can tell you a story. I mean, I sat down with Greg Christenson many years ago to talk about a proposed facility in Beverly that, sadly, never ended up moving forward because they couldn't get enough seniors to make a down payment to commit to the project for it then to be viable for them to build. But the aspect that I really liked about it was giving seniors – it was a four-part facility. The first part was going to be independent living. Then there was supportive living. Then there was – I can't think of the term – basically full care, and then there was also an Alzheimer's unit. The four buildings were going to be connected so that a person in the middle of winter or on an afternoon like today in Edmonton – and I've heard Calgary has similar weather – wouldn't have to go outside to move from one building to the next. Unfortunately, that facility never ended up getting built, which is really too bad. I know many of the seniors that I represent in Beverly were excited about the prospect of having more choices, that, again, a new facility would have helped build.

I think some of the challenges with, and where this bill could have addressed a number of issues – and I'll appreciate that, likely, the minister at some point will jump up and talk about how some of the concerns that I'm going to raise will be dealt with in regulation. Now, Madam Speaker, the issue I have with regulations is the same issue that the members opposite, when they were opposition, had when we were government, which is, of course, that regulations are done by cabinet behind closed doors. There is no public debate. There is no public oversight or accountability, and those decisions can be changed. Regulations can be expedient. I agree on that point, but, you know, my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Riverview brought up a number of issues that our current system faces. Enshrining it in legislation would ensure that it cannot just be quickly dealt with or quickly changed, but I would say to members of this Assembly that forcing a future government to bring through legislation to make certain changes is also not a bad thing because it does provide that extra oversight.

I know one issue is the number of hours that are required for proper care. Madam Speaker, you know, we've heard, sadly, the challenges and some horrendous circumstances that many seniors have had to live through largely due to a lack of adequate care. Now, I want to couch that comment by saying that there are some incredible service providers that do take care of their seniors and don't refer to them as clients, you know, that ensure that they are well looked after. Again, I'm not trying to paint the whole industry, but we've also heard of some really awful examples of seniors being left in their own feces for hours if not days of neglect, of poor treatment. We want to ensure that our seniors are well looked after. I mean, these are the very Albertans who helped build this great province, and they not only deserve to be treated with respect, but they absolutely should live in dignity and not be put through either mistreatment or neglect.

You know, expanding the ability to provide greater care is something that I would have liked to have seen in this current legislation. I don't think it's satisfactory to have that put into regulations. [interjection] I'll give way to the minister in a second; I just want to finish this thought. So here's an opportunity to ensure that minimum standards, minimum hours of care are enshrined in legislation so that they can't just be changed in the dead of night and that there is stronger oversight and protection for our seniors.

At this point I'll give way to the minister.

5:20

Mr. Copping: I want to thank the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview for his comments. I just want to touch on a couple of items. You know, I fully appreciate the lack of the number of beds. Part of that's not addressed through the legislation; it's actually addressed through the funding. We put funding in, and then we have 1,500 additional beds that are coming online this year. We have also another $200 million for beds over the next three years.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I can comment – and this is one example. You made a comment, you know, that the system is not able to accommodate two different needs and, actually, the model of being able to have people go from SL 3 to SL 4, SL 4 with dementia, full continuing care, and then assisted living. The one thing that this does solve is that by putting all the legislation into one book – like, right now, because it's in different legislation, if you want to go from an SL 4 to continuing care, you actually have to move rooms in the same facility according to the rules. That's crazy, and we need to change that. So this does that. I agree full heartedly that this doesn't address all the issues, but quite frankly I would argue later about regulations.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Minister, for your comments. No. You know what? To respond to your comment: having, you know, multiple pieces of legislation in one act I do agree with. I think that does make sense, to be able to do that. I'll take your word, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the minister, that if a person did transition from – and I'm using a layperson's terms as opposed to the SL 2, 3, and 4 – an independent to a more dependent or supportive housing or even to where they need even further supports if they have dementia or memory issues for memory care, they don't physically need to either change rooms or whichever. So on that point I am supportive.

Again, I think I had a note written down here that addressed another concern that I have, which, of course, I'm not going to be able to find as quickly as I would like, Mr. Speaker. Oh. Yes. It was comments about – so there was a continuing care review that was done. It was made public last year that there are a number of recommendations that were made. Again, I mean, maybe this legislation isn't necessarily the place for allocating dollars, but I know that the report had projected that a shift to more continuing care done through home care could result in hundreds of millions in savings.

Now, I'm a big fan, Mr. Speaker, of giving seniors the option where, if they want to stay in their home, they can as long as possible. My parents just sold their home a couple of weeks ago that they had lived in for 43 years and have moved to a seniors' living complex. I know that they stayed in their home as long as they could, and I know that many seniors would live all of their days in their home if they could, so, you know, for lack of a better term, beefing up or providing more support so that more seniors can have that choice I think is a positive thing.

But one of the things that the report, I believe, touched on was not only the savings, but if those savings of about $450 million could get moved over to increase the number of hours that seniors get per day in care up to, I think – increasing direct hours of care in long-term care facilities to four and a half hours. Now, I don't have the number with me of what it is currently, but I know that reports that my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Riverview has cited indicate that, you know, a minimum of hours of care is about 4.1 per senior to ensure that they have adequate care.

You know, I think it's safe to say that every member in this Chamber wants to ensure that our seniors – our parents, our grandparents – are well looked after, and when we hear of these stories where they're not, it strikes a chord with all of us because that is someone's parent or grandparent.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

You know, I would argue that more can be done, and I appreciate that the minister in his previous response had indicated that the government is going to go out and consult now on this, but I would question the minister on: do we not already have this data? Do we not already have the information on what is required? Really, where we're at today, is government committing not only the dollars – I appreciate that the minister, I believe, had said $200 million over the next few years to build more beds and that the current government has built 1,500 beds. I applaud the government for doing that. Again, we know that we have a shortage, and we're trying to play catch-up from, quite frankly, decades of inadequate investment in building new facilities.

Again, in Beverly, in my riding, there are a couple of facilities that are public – so they're for low-income seniors – that are in dire need of new dollars to at least either refurbish or refresh. I mean, they haven't had substantial investment since they were built, and I believe that they were built many, many years ago. So there is a dire need, Madam Speaker, but part of the challenge that I have with this bill is that I think we're missing out on some opportunities where, again, I believe that there are a number of industry reports on best practices and what we could and should be doing.

Now, you know, I was speaking with my colleague about what is the number one . . . [interjection] I was going to talk about the number one recommendation that facilities are making, and I will do that after I give way to the minister.

Mr. Copping: Thanks again for giving way and allowing me to provide comment. Two comments. One is on earlier talk about regulation first. I fully appreciate that if it's in the legislation, it's harder to change, but that's also part of the challenge, because as things evolve over time and the needs – and in this House we agree that we actually need to serve the needs of our seniors and that they're going to change over time. Having that in regulation allows us to be able to do that and be more effective, and then by doing consultation with, quite frankly, the industry – those are the people who actually have to deliver the services – we can actually provide more flexibility so we can get better service and, quite frankly, manage the cost so that we can reinvest this back into continuing care, and we're already putting more money into it.

I fully appreciate that the home-care shift is something necessary, and I'd like to point back to the Continuing Care Act, which includes home care as part of this so we can be seamless from home care to assisted living to continuing care as required. This is just a first step. I appreciate, you know, that more work needs to be done. This is the first step that gets it all in one place so that we can actually go to the regulation and then move forward.

Thank you.

Mr. Bilous: Yeah. Thank you, through you, Madam Speaker, to the minister for your comments. I appreciate that there will be changing needs over time, and I acknowledge that. I guess where I disagree is that legislation can also be updated and refreshed from time to time. In fact, I believe it was this UCP government that introduced a bill in the spring, ended up getting it wrong – you know, we might have said that – and then introduced amendments, like, brought back that legislation in the fall sitting. So in the same calendar year this current government brought the same legislation to the Legislature twice.

What I'm trying to showcase here, Madam Speaker, is that there's nothing stopping this government or any future government from bringing legislation through the Chamber as often as they wish. The difference between regulations and legislation is that legislation is more time consuming, but it also enables and allows all members and the public to weigh in, to peer into the conversation and to involve themselves through their MLAs and their representatives on that legislation. So, you know, I appreciate that some things are better left to regulation, but when it comes to the care of our parents and grandparents, I'd rather see it in legislation.

5:30

I'm not even sure how much time I have left, Madam Speaker, but another point that my colleague had made was about the fact that studies have been done – and I will have to dig up said studies because I haven't looked at them myself; I'm listening to colleagues of mine who are much better versed on this topic than I am – that have shown that nonprofits are able to deliver a higher quality of care.

Now, for me, the difference between – and, obviously, businesses go into business to make a profit. A hundred per cent I'm behind that. But when it comes to taking care of our most vulnerable, those that are not-for-profit will take what would have been a profit, distribute it to their shareholders, and reinvest every single penny back into their facility whereas the for-profit providers have to show their shareholders that there is a profit. Otherwise, nobody would invest in them, and their business would go under.

Now, I appreciate that for-profit facilities would say: well, we're still investing what we need to into the facility, into the care, and it's kind of the cream at the top that is then being taken out.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members to speak to Bill 11? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill. You know, this is one of those bills – I've actually had a number of them in this last year or so – where I sort of receive the bill and get kind of excited about the possibility of supporting it. As I've mentioned a number of times in this House, the things I will comment on are not what's in the bill as much as what's not in the bill, because, unfortunately, this government has a bit of a habit of bringing bills in that do pieces of work, often pieces of work that I'd like to support, but have failed to address some of the more substantive issues. I think that's maybe a bit different than some of the others, but with this one I certainly appreciate some aspects, and I really wish there was more in here and look forward to it.

You know, I reflect on the fact that when the current Health minister was previously minister of labour, we had a very reasonable exchange about foreign credentials, and I was promised at the time that more would be coming forward, and it hasn't. Now I'm back in this place where I'm hearing from the minister that more will come forward in time. I'm worried that unless I demand it today, I will never see it. I guess that's why I'm wanting to address sort of what's missing, what I'm concerned about today. It's just my own experience that I can't leave it in the hands of the government, because I'm afraid that it will not come to fruition.

Let me just start by saying that there are certainly things about this bill that the minister has spoken to that I appreciate. I mean, I appreciate the desire to have a single, overarching piece of legislation that helps in a transition from home care right through to the highest level of care. Certainly, if I can support that, I will do that, because that is fundamental in terms of a need for change in the industry, and I've seen that myself. But I'll speak to my own experiences about this in a bit.

I certainly also like the fact that there are increasing fines for when employers are clearly liable for issues, so, you know, another piece – I think that's section 48 – that I appreciate and would love to support. Section 49 creates a provision on vicarious liability for the employer, again another piece that I think is completely appropriate although these last two sections, the fines and section 49 on vicarious liability, are somewhat undermined by the government's previous decision to actually take away the rights of families to sue employers in circumstances that they would normally have had in any other consumer situation in this province. We kind of see a little bit of the giving on the one hand and the taking away on the other, but I support the fact that these pieces are in this legislation. I just wish they'd go back and change the one where they took away residents' rights to sue.

I also appreciate the fact that inspectors, for example, in section 20 can inspect unlicensed facilities and not just licensed facilities. I really think that we have to make sure that we are trying to capture the full lived experience of people who are elders and who are receiving care and not just some subset of them.

Having said, you know, what it is I appreciate about this bill, I want to take some time to talk a little bit about where my concerns lie. My concerns lie with, I guess, the statement that I seem to have made in this House repeatedly over the last two years, that it's not what you did, that it's what you failed to do, how you haven't gone far enough. Why do we bring in the thin gruel? Now, in this case, it's not a thin piece of legislation – I respect that – but it is probably one of the most substantive areas of concern for any government, health care. Of course, all legislation is going to be quite significant, and I appreciate that there's really some important administrative work happening here in bringing some of these things together, so I just want to be really clear that there are pieces of this I really want to support.

My concern is based on a number of kind of everyday life experiences here, and I'll kind of go through a few of them, depending on how much time I happen to have. One of them is that there seems to be an intent by the government – and it seemed to be supported by the facility-based continuing care review that came out last year and was filed in this House – that we should be moving more toward home care and less and less institutionalized care. Now, as a statement by itself, I certainly support that. In fact, when I was vice-president of Catholic Social Services here in Edmonton, I was on the committee that was looking at that exact same thing around the year 2000. Here we are 22 years later, again, not really having made much progress – not, of course, on this minister or this government for the whole 22 years – but having seen this bill, I was hoping we'd see some of that.

The thing that I'm concerned about in terms of home care is that there needs to be some fairly substantive work done to bring home care up to a level of professional care that doesn't currently exist or hasn't over time. Too often, particularly with Conservative governments, when they talk about home care, what they're actually suggesting is just that, well, people stay home and the family will take care of them, you know, the sort of belief that the family is the centre of these things. I'm not going to argue that. But what happens too often, the same as with other situations like daycare and stuff: if you just simply take the governmental position that we will take this responsibility and send it back to families and then not do anything to enhance the likelihood that the families are going to be successful, it's problematic.

I can see that there is a goal. There is a goal here to actually increase the number of people that are in their homes. Of course, the minister has addressed the fact that the money saved from people being in their homes rather than in long-term care will be reinvested. I've heard numbers of well over $400 million a year, for example, that could be saved. What I don't see, then, is all of the infrastructure to ensure that sending the situations back to a home-care situation will not result in a decrease in actual care. The people stay at home, but they don't receive the types of care that they need.

I know this government has an Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction, and I certainly think this is a place that the minister could have been involved. In my work at Catholic Social Services we actually ran a program that had people provide in-home services in people's homes in order to keep them in their homes so that they didn't end up in care. I was responsible for that program when I was there. We had numerous problems with what I would consider to be essentially red tape. From my conversations with some of my peers who I worked with at that time, who are now working in other long-term care settings in the province, some even in my own riding, who I go to see regularly, nothing has changed in those areas. We don't actually have the ability for someone to go into another person's house and provide the full, rounded sets of services that are necessary to keep them at home.

Now, part of the problem is that there has been a tendency to believe that the home-care providers, when they come into the home, can only provide certain types of medical assistance like giving you your pill, putting on your stockings, those kinds of things. But those are often not the types of things that keep somebody in their home. Certainly, you know, making sure that they take the appropriate medication at the appropriate time every day is appropriate, but sometimes what you need is somebody to turn on the dishwasher.

If we truly are going to have an expanded home-care service, we need to actually have people who can come in and do substantive work, the type of work that would happen if you were living in a home with family members: the provision of meals, the cleaning up of the residence, the ensuring of the bathing, and so on.

Many of those types of tasks are not covered under current home-care provisions. What happens, then, is that if we move people out of longer term care situations, move them into home care, while we may ensure some basic health coverage such as taking your pills at the appropriate time, we often are not providing the kinds of services that are provided by other people in long-term care settings such as the housekeepers, who make sure that the residence itself is appropriate for the person who is receiving services. That doesn't happen in home-care services. That's just one example. I could certainly spend a long period of time . . . [interjection] I see the minister wanting to interject, and I will certainly give way.

Mr. Copping: Thanks, hon. member, for raising some issues and questions. Once again, I fully appreciate that this is a framework act. I'd like to point you to the definitions on page 5, 1(i):

"home and community care" means the prescribed health goods and services and prescribed other goods and services that are provided by a home and community care provider to an eligible individual.

The reason that I point that out is because I fully appreciate that as we do a transformation, we need to support people in their homes. This is a place where they want to be. It's not just about providing health services; it's about a bucket of services that we can provide so that they can stay home.

Quite frankly, as seen in the FBCC, roughly 20 per cent of people who are going into congregate care services don't actually need to be there if we actually supported them at home. This gives us the ability to be able to, again, as we go into our programs and services, do this through regulation and do this through policy as we work through this. But there is certainly more work that needs to be done, so I fully appreciate it. It was identified at FBCC. We also have provided more funding to increase home care in our current budget.

Mr. Feehan: I'd like to thank the minister for these comments because it tells me that we agree on the intent to some degree, and I think that that's appropriate. This is one of these bills that I would really like to be able to support because I certainly agree with the statements that the minister has given. What I am left with, however, is this sort of: well, just sit back and trust me that we'll do the things that you're hoping will happen. It's always problematic for the opposition when that happens, because we certainly have seen that that has not been what's happened in the past.

I mean, we've just gone through COVID. We certainly should learn some lessons from that. We know that what happened, after making literally dozens of recommendations, both here in the House and on albertasfuture.ca, regarding COVID, is that this government really did the very least at the very last minute. It seems to be their way of going about doing things. The result here, of course, in the province of Alberta is that we had a significant number of people who died during COVID and more proportionately to our population than in other provinces. So the consequences are real, and the fact that the government wants to do the least at the last possible time is something that gives us pause and makes us really worried.

I certainly would love to see the government take on home care and build, in legislation, a much more robust determination to move in the direction that the minister is suggesting that maybe they perhaps might move in. I certainly can see the one line there that says: and other services might be provided. But, of course, none of that is laid out in the legislation as to what those services are and so on. That's the problem, for me, in this case. It's not that I distrust the intent of where we're going with this. Rather, I don't see the action being taken to substantially build a robust infrastructure that will actually provide the services that we wish to see to ensure that people can live in their homes and so that they don't have to stay in long-term care. I would certainly like to see that.

Of course, we know that the biggest issue is actually the employees themselves. This is an area in which we cannot trust the government because they have continuously established a horrible, negative relationship with all health care providers. They've been fighting with doctors for three years, after cancelling their contract. They have been fighting with nurses. They've been asking for 10 per cent rollbacks from other, you know, health care providers such as respiratory therapists. What we see is the government wishing to constantly privatize, and of course they constantly say really negative things about unions, all of whom provide the services in hospitals and in long-term care settings around this province. So we know that they're antagonistic.

As the facility-based continuing care review points out and as many members of this side of the House have pointed out, one of the primary issues in this case is the fact that we do not have full-time workers working where they receive all the benefits of being a full-time worker, which usually comes with unionization, which is why most of us support unions. That is, they do not get contracts that say: we will give you 40 hours of work a week. Instead – and I know this as I was that employer at one time at Catholic Social Services – contracts came in bit by piece. You go to this house, and you provide this one service. You give them their pill, and you leave. The task should take 15 minutes. You get paid for one hour of time because of travel, and you're travelling around. And then you kind of – the workers try to cobble together enough to turn that into a full-day job. That's true in long-term care all over the place. We know that part of the reason why COVID did spread is because so many people were attending multiple facilities on the same day or at the very least the same week, and that is a problem.

I do not see a direction here in this bill that will ensure that we hire on that 6,000 plus full-time care staff that the facility-based continuing care review suggested we needed. I mean, I don't see them making sure that they get competitive wages, competitive wages with what they would earn were they to be working in a facility like a major hospital, like the University of Alberta hospital or any of the other ones in the province. We don't see them getting the pensions and the benefits that would allow them to live full, complete lives and do so by providing good, substantive care to the people in our facilities.

These are the kinds of things that we really need to see some movement on. This is clearly an area we cannot just leave for the government as they have absolutely taken the position that they are antagonistic to the provision of those kinds of services.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thanks, Madam Speaker. I'm going to rise to provide a few comments at this second reading stage of Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act. I may get cut off, and that is unfortunate, but I did want to make sure that I provided some comments on this legislation given that 20 per cent of the population in Lethbridge are seniors, in both seats. We have, obviously, a crisis in primary care and family medicine. I have had a number of interactions with people over the last seven years around improvements to Alzheimer's and dementia care, expansion of housing affordability, and accessibility for our seniors population.

There's no question that just the affordable housing stock and how accessible it is in general to older people is something to – in order to, you know, meet those goals of expansion of home care, that we have heard discussed this evening, sometimes there need to be homes that are appropriately affordable and accessible. Of course, there's the home adaptation grants and loans and those sorts of programs. But, in the first instance, sometimes especially lower income folks do need access to that affordability and accessibility. It's been an ongoing priority of the housing authority, for example.

I have also had a number of interactions with constituents around COVID protocols and COVID policies within long-term care and the continuing care sector, particularly in the early days, when Alberta was quite late to the game to have one facility where workers were working in, and some of the very serious concerns that family members brought to me around making sure that we had the appropriate policies in place to limit the spread of the virus and how long it took for Alberta to act on that. I certainly have had constituents talk to me about that and a number of families at that time reach out.

I have certainly – around the issues related to home care, there is no question that when nurses came up to me in great numbers over the summer, when the government was contemplating the wage rollbacks, a number of them were home-care nurses, and the extent to which they were communicating to me that the system is extremely stressed and teetering on the brink of crisis was something that really struck home to me. This was not just, you know, people communicating small, little tweaks or fixes to the system. The extent to which those nurses do not feel, both RNs and LPNs, that they are able to give the kind of care that is expected and the complexity within long-term care was alarming to me when they described the kinds of challenges that they were facing in order to take care of people.

I'm always very pleased when I hear about people wanting to, you know, fund and resource home care. I worry that the appropriate resources – health care is expensive. It's kind of like democracy, you know? It's the worst system except for all of the others. That is the way that I view, in many cases, public health care. There is no question that it is our largest budgetary disbursement. This is not a matter of opinion; it's a fact. There's no question that some of these additions, fixes, innovations even within public health care are extremely expensive. There is no question about that. The question is: how expensive is it to not do it? The question is, "How expensive is it to contract out to the private sector to skim a profit?" as my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview described earlier. The question is: how are we appropriately regulating this? How are we making those investments? How are we undertaking our discussions with various regulated professions and labour groups in a way that properly stewards the public purse but makes sure that resources are there for people?

The other piece that I will note – it isn't specifically in here – is around that family-managed care has also seen a number of reductions within AHS, and that is also a system that keeps people out of long-term care facilities, and they're not necessarily seniors, those folks, so folks who are living with chronic illness, perhaps not quite palliative but getting to the point of palliative. Families often manage that care through the AHS family-managed care system, and there were a number of cuts in the first sort of round of them in '19 and '20 that I've had a number of constituents talk to me about. That's the first thing I wanted to do, put all of those concerns from the people of Lethbridge that have come to me over the years.

The second thing I want to do here is to, as I've discussed – you know, health care is our largest budget disbursement. It is expensive to do it right. There is no question about this, but having that right care in the right place by the right person and the right kind of professional care is, in fact, not only the lowest cost to do it in the public sector, generally speaking, in some form of public delivery even though it's – for example, in the continuing care sector we see a number of nonprofits delivering these services. There's no question about that, but there is also no question that it takes people. There's really no, quote, innovating. There's no synergizing your synergies around the fact that you need human beings to care for other human beings. You can't. There's not an app for that. It is simply paying people a decent hourly wage with some decent benefits and a reasonable pension to want to go into this field and to care for other people.

When I look at the facility-based review, I see 5,500 FTEs required in order to meet some of the recommendations of that facility-based review. We do not see in this legislation – I can appreciate that this legislation is quite lengthy, and it is well considered, but we do not see here the mention of those kinds of resourcing questions. You know, a person can, or one can, a government can put some of that in legislation such as things like staffing ratios, things like ensuring capacity and resources such as supports for being able to navigate the system. In that bucket I would put the independent Seniors Advocate, but there are other ways that that can be resourced as well: you know, legislated metrics, goals, amounts, fee schedules, all of those sorts of things that in some cases are, but we could see that piece, I think, in here as well.

Really, the question when people are trying to navigate long-term care and continuing care isn't, "What is the legislative framework?" necessarily although I can appreciate that the minister pointed out some instances where the legislative framework maybe didn't make a lot of sense. It's generally: how do I navigate the system for the best outcome for my elderly relative or, generally speaking, an elderly parent or the people that I know that have begun to navigate this system? And it's not the legislative framework; it's the resourcing, it's the ratios, it's the standards, it's the expectations. Those are the things that – you know, I have seen people now in the last year, people with a master's degree in public policy, navigating this system on behalf of an elderly, very frail parent and having significant challenges with making sure that that person got the right care in the right place at the right time, particularly when they're really, really frail, particularly layering on the challenges of COVID-19.

Now, on that, I do notice that in the facility-based review it does recommend learning from COVID-19, and in fact the Auditor General has done a report on this matter, Madam Speaker, and he asked to present that report in June to the Public Accounts Committee and was blocked by the government side members from doing so. So one would think – well, one would hope, in fact, that there are amendments coming to this legislation at the government's first available opportunity to make good on the recommendations that the Auditor General is preparing, and they have in fact blocked him from speaking about it to the public in June, when he asked to do so, and told him that he could maybe show up sometime in November, which is entirely inappropriate. It was actually quite an astonishing misuse of procedure at the Public Accounts level. I'll just flag that for the minister because there are probably some really good recommendations in there. In fact, the facility-based review said: hey, learn from COVID. The AG went and did an audit and learned from COVID in long-term care, and now we're not going to hear about it until November.

I want to talk a little bit about moving folks out of hospital and keeping them in home care and the amount of family support that is often required when you have very, very frail people who are moved out of the hospital system. Sometimes they're very ungraciously and unkindly referred to as, you know, bed blockers or this kind of thing. We heard the former Minister of Health discuss this early last fall in response to the COVID delta wave, wave 4, saying: oh, we're going to create these other continuing care spaces; we're going to move these people out of hospital. What one ends up doing there is that extremely frail people are not getting that kind of continuous care that they would get in a hospital acute-care setting, and then they're going out to a long-term care setting, and there are no guarantees that, without constant family intervention and advocacy, those folks who are so frail are getting what they need.

I watched it up close over the last year when my partner's mother had a stroke, and it was really quite difficult to watch that constant moving back and forth from hospital over to long-term care and bouncing back and forth. It was very, very difficult to essentially trust the assessment that when she was leaving that acute-care setting, that was, in fact, in her best interests, but, you know, that's what families are left to do, and, quite frankly, families had less ability and a very, very frail spouse had less ability to interact with that person when they were in the acute-care setting because of the COVID restrictions, and on and on and on.

Again, this comes down to resources. You can put some of them in legislation, but really what you have to do is put those resources in a budget, and then you have to hold yourself to the metrics and to the expectations within that budget. You can't expect to keep those budgets constant with an aging population not adjusted for population and inflation over a period of two or three years. It's not going to work. You're not going to be able to do what you want to do in continuing care and home care. It is just a mathematical impossibility.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but the clock strikes 6. The House now stands adjourned until 7:30 this evening.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 9 Public's Right to Know Act

[Adjourned debate March 28: Mr. Eggen]

The Acting Speaker: Thank you. Are there any members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise on second reading of Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act. I've not yet had the opportunity to speak to this bill, so I look forward to the opportunity to do that tonight. I also welcome back my fellow colleagues in the House today after a short break. I hope everybody had a restful time and spent some good time in their constituencies hearing from Albertans. Interesting to see new faces, or some old faces in new spaces. Let's put it that way. It's amazing how a new member in this House really mixes up the dynamic, right? Welcome to our new Member of the Legislative Assembly. It's a pleasure to rise and speak tonight.

I've had an opportunity to take a look at Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act, as tabled by the Minister of Justice. I think it's important for Albertans, as we are considering this bill, to reflect upon the reason why it is before us. As many may know, this was part of the United Conservative Party's campaign platform commitment, a very lengthy document, for those who may have had the opportunity to read it. It included a commitment around the public's right to know. Of course, we also heard this promise repeated in the Speech from the Throne earlier this year.

Now, I think it's important, when we look at what the commitment was in the campaign platform, to compare it against what we see before us in Bill 9. In the platform commitment from the United Conservative Party page 65 referenced enacting the Public's Right to Know Act which will require annual reporting, by judicial district on a wide number of measurements such as the number of crimes committed by persons on bail, probation, parole, subject to a deportation order for criminality, or previously removed for criminality.

As I mentioned, in the Speech from the Throne we also saw reference to this piece of legislation that is before us now. The Speech from the Throne indicated that "right-to-know legislation will allow more information to be shared with the public about individuals on bail, probation and parole, and criminals pending deportation."

I think that upon hearing and receiving Bill 9 under first reading, many Albertans would expect to see that the legislation would mirror this commitment – right? – that there would be a clear requirement for reporting by judicial district on specific individuals, addressing the number of crimes they've committed by persons on bail, deportation, all the things I just listed. That's the kind of detail that was in the platform promise as well as in the Speech from the Throne, so I think perhaps, like myself, many Albertans may be surprised to actually review the contents of Bill

9 and see that it does not make such a detailed commitment. It doesn't actually commit to providing to Albertans the information that was promised in both the platform and in the Speech from the Throne.

In fact, the key provision, for those who are following in great interest, of the right to know act – it's not a very large piece of legislation. It is pretty easy to read, but unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, there's not a whole lot of content here. The key provision within this bill is section 2, and it describes the purposes of the act, which is to, again, "increase transparency and accountability" and "help Albertans better understand the criminal justice system" and "ensure Albertans have information about the safety of their communities." That's the purpose of the bill.

However, when we get to the only mandatory provision, or compulsory provision, of the bill, which is section 3(1), it says that the Minister shall prepare a report respecting data and information relating to the criminal justice system in Alberta, including data and information in respect of the year immediately preceding the year in which the report is prepared, that the Minister considers necessary or advisable to carry out the purposes of this Act.

If you're following along carefully, Mr. Speaker, the report simply requires the minister on an annual basis to prepare a report respecting, quote, data and information related to the criminal justice system. That's it. That's what it says: data and information about the criminal justice system.

Now, arguably, of course, the Minister of Justice and all ministers with the responsibilities of their ministries have the ability to publish data and information regarding the ministry that they're responsible for. It's a little bit unusual why this section is even required. Certainly, the Minister of Justice has the ability to publish all kinds of reports related to data and information from that ministry. In fact, I believe the Ministry of Justice regularly issues reports, annual reporting, reports on various issues. There are various task forces and committees that come together, and the Ministry of Justice produces reports, so this actually doesn't contain any new requirement for the Minister of Justice.

In fact, I think my colleague the Member for Calgary-Mountain View really said: what is the point of this? This doesn't seem to actually – and I'm paraphrasing for her, Mr. Speaker. I'm sure if she was here, she would say, "That's not actually what I'm saying," and she said it much more eloquently. However, the point was that she was saying: "Well, what's new here? What new data and information is actually being produced by the Minister of Justice as a result of Bill 9?" I think we would find that there is no real commitment here to any specific data. If this is about ensuring that Albertans have the right to know information about specific individuals and any bail conditions or their issues related to their deportation, that's not actually set out in this bill.

Now, it's possible, of course, that that kind of detail could be provided in regulations. The regulation-making authority in this bill is also quite broad. It doesn't actually say much about what will be specified as data and information, only that, you know, they can collect data from municipalities, from police services, and of course the minister can decide what to disclose and what not to disclose. It is clear in the bill in section 5 that the minister would not disclose public information that could readily identify the individual, which I think is important and, quite frankly, required by law, not to identify individuals in that way. However, there's not a whole lot new here.

So I think for those United Conservative Party members – and there are quite a few more this year, Mr. Speaker, I understand, than there were previously. Lots of great interest in becoming a member of the party right now.

Mr. McIver: That's because you lost the election. That's why there's more.

Ms Pancholi: I'm sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the minister of municipal services likes to heckle.

Certainly, a lot of those members will be looking at this platform and saying: well, where is this commitment to actually providing the information promised in that campaign platform? It's really just a very generalized ability.

Now, with that said, Mr. Speaker, you know, it is quite general. I support the idea that the Minister of Justice should be able to submit reports annually that contain data and information. I would really like it if this ministry and perhaps this entire government would focus a little bit more on data and information rather than conjecture and name-calling and ideology and all the other things they're very skilled at. It would be great if this government focused a little bit more on data, so by all means I encourage and I generally support the notion of this bill and the idea that the Minister of Justice – please, please do issue reports based on data and information.

Then, when we're looking at those reports, I think that there are a number of things that we would like to see, and I sincerely hope that when the current Minister of Justice – it's also a rotating position in this government, so we'll see who's actually going to be the one developing these regulations, but let's say the current Minister of Justice for the sake of argument, something he also likes to do at the end of driveways. He actually will maybe produce reports containing data and information that actually speak to some really key issues related to our criminal justice system.

For example, Mr. Speaker, I'm very proud that my colleague the Member for Edmonton-City Centre has brought forward a private member's bill, Bill 204, that will be before, I believe, the private members' bills committee shortly, to address the issue of the collection of race-based data. That's critically important, particularly as it relates to the criminal justice system. In fact, the Alberta NDP Official Opposition caucus conducted a months-long consultation last year with Albertans, hundreds of Albertans, on antiracism policies and ideas on a number of issues, not just about the criminal justice system although that was a key element of our consultation, but we also talked about antiracism work in education, in health care, in democratic participation, in economic participation, in access to community supports.

As a result of those hours and hours and hours of consultation and feedback and engagement with Albertans, we were very proud to develop an antiracism policy, which includes – part of the provisions included what the Member for Edmonton-City Centre has brought forward, which is a private member's bill to collect race-based data. Now, that would apply to all ministries and all programs that deliver services and require them, put a positive obligation on those ministries, no matter what service they provide, no matter what programs they deliver, to actually collect race-based information.

That's important, Mr. Speaker, for a couple of reasons. One, of course, is that it's important to really get at the root of systemic inequality and systemic racism because it very much underlies many of our systems and programs in our province. Alberta is not unique. It implies that there's systemic racism that exists in many institutions, but our criminal justice system is a key one. It's important to collect that information to be able to identify, for example, overrepresentation of certain racialized groups, perhaps of Black Albertans, of Indigenous Albertans, persons of colour, to identify where they may be accessing services more, whether they may be subject to things such as the criminal justice system more.

Collecting that data is important to identify systemic racism, but it's also critically important to address it. Once we have that data, we can start to develop policies and practices and legislation and financial supports that really get to the root of that systemic racism.

When I see that Bill 9 allows for the Minister of Justice to collect data and information, I hope that actually reflects a commitment to the principles set out in Bill 204 by my colleague the Member for Edmonton-City Centre. I hope that means that the Minister of Justice and, in fact, any of the government caucus members that intend to support Bill 9 will also support Bill 204, because it is incredibly important information, and I think, most obvious when we think of systemic racism, Mr. Speaker, many Albertans are right to think of the criminal justice system. We know that, for example, Indigenous Albertans represent only 6 per cent of our population yet, I believe, based on the most recent information that I saw, represent about 40 per cent of incarcerated individuals in this province. We know that that means that there is inequity taking place.

Of course, if we're going to look at the overrepresentation of individuals in the criminal justice system, it does mean that we have to look at the failures or the lack of supports or the institutional and structural inequalities that exist in the delivery of so many other services such as education and an issue that I've been speaking about in this House quite a bit, Mr. Speaker, which is the overrepresentation of Indigenous young people in the child intervention system. When we talk about data that's going to be collected by the Ministry of Justice and reported publicly to Albertans, I would love to see a fulsome analysis and collection of data of why young people who were in the child intervention system may have received child intervention services, may be overrepresented in the criminal justice system, and how actually the failure to properly support Indigenous young people in particular in the child intervention system, which, by the way, is also related to failure to support Indigenous families and parents and communities and elders – how that ends up being reflected in our criminal justice system. That, to me, is incredibly important information.

We also know that investments, for example, Mr. Speaker, in early intervention, both for families but also early childhood education for all children, actually correlate with a lower interaction with the criminal justice system. I would love to see data and information reported publicly by this ministry that looks at that, that looks at the relationship between early childhood education and access to quality early childhood education and the impacts on the criminal justice system down the road, because we know those correlations do exist. The data produced annually by this ministry would be incredibly important. You know, there are a number of other issues, when I think about the child intervention system, where I think that the Ministry of Justice and the data and information that they collect and produce would be very important.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in this House the members of the opposition have been repeatedly calling on the government ministries to provide accountability in response to recommendations that have been made repeatedly by the office of the Child and Youth Advocate. In fact, when I say that the members of the opposition have made that call, we're really supporting the call that's been made repeatedly by the advocate himself, the former advocate now, as we do now have a new advocate that's been appointed. The former advocate, Mr. Del Graff, was very clear and very vocal, particularly in the last year, about requiring more accountability from government ministries in how they are improving outcomes for children and young people in care and particularly how they're responding to recommendations that the advocate has made around improving outcomes for children and youth in care.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the advocate regularly does what we call mandatory death reviews, where they evaluate the circumstances leading to the tragic deaths of children and young people in the child intervention system and then go on to make recommendations.

The advocate has actually made specific recommendations for the Ministry of Justice. For example, just last year, in the most recent annual report, the advocate asked for the Ministry of Justice to report on more information to families when no-contact orders are issued or removed or revised and how they affect families. I'd like to see that information publicly reported because that's critically important for Albertans to see.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for St. Albert has risen.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act. Just quickly, in summary, this is not a very detailed piece of legislation. In any event, this bill will require the minister to publish an annual report with data and information relating to the criminal justice system. Clearly. It gives the minister the power to make regulation with regard to the disclosure of information such as personal information. The bill states that the information should not identify the individual. Great. The bill does not specify which data will be collected or disclosed, nor does it set any criteria the reports have to meet. Now, what's interesting about this is that the minister likely already had the ability to publish these reports. Interesting.

Now, I know that some of my colleagues have already raised these questions that I'm going to repeat, but I think they bear repeating on the record. I'm really hopeful that perhaps the Justice minister or someone that previously was the Justice minister has some answers for this. I think it's really important. The first question is: could the minister today, without this bill, publish a report on individuals on bail or parole as promised in the UCP platform? I understand that this piece of legislation is specifically geared at ticking off a box of some of the to-do list that was on the UCP platform, and that's fine, but it'd be great to know a little bit more about that.

Two, why did the minister choose to not specify which data will be included or disclosed? I think that's important. I know we tend to hear in this place, you know, not to worry, that it'll all come out in the regulation. Well, I think that if Albertans had any level of trust with this government, it wouldn't be such a problem, but it has not been the experience of Albertans to be able to trust the word of this government. They will say one thing and do another. The example that I always go to, because it was just so glaring and happened so quickly after the election, is that I can remember the now Premier actually making fun of somebody on this side for suggesting that the UCP would immediately deindex benefits like AISH, making fun of us, actually. Then that was one of the first things that happened, with an omnibus bill, not to mention some of the really nasty things that were said: "It's not a big deal. Don't worry about it."

Now, I will give them some credit. I'm sure that they didn't know a couple of years ago that inflation would be as bad as it is right now. I understand. I'm pretty sure they didn't know a pandemic would be coming. But they still haven't corrected that. All of this adds to the fact that Albertans just don't trust this government. They don't trust what they say, and they certainly don't trust what they do. Anyway, you get where I'm going with this.

The next question is: what would stop the minister from annually picking and choosing which data suits them best? It would be nice to know right up front: what can we expect?

Will the minister support the collection of race-based data? My colleague mentioned private member's Bill 204, which is currently, you know, under discussion before the House. I would like to add – and my colleague did mention and talk about some of the work that was done in the creation of Bill 204. I wasn't able to attend all of the consultations, but I did attend one that was specifically geared – and I thought it was really quite interesting – at people with disabilities as it relates to this topic. I can remember thinking to myself – you know, I didn't really understand, I couldn't really envision sort of how many people this would attract or why this would be top of mind for them. But it was, and they had so many things to say. What it taught me is that that is the real value of consultation. When you do things, even if you're not sure what people are going to have to add, you do all of the work. My colleague from Edmonton-City Centre has certainly done that and has certainly continued to be an advocate for some of the things he's asking for in this bill.

In any event, one of the things, you know: just the name of this particular piece of legislation. I always find the choice of titles quite interesting: the public's right to know. I think that there are a lot of things that the public have a right to know, and I don't think they're all covered in this particular piece of legislation. This legislation does very little to address the priorities of Albertans.

When I think about some of the issues around justice, I think about some of the things that have very clearly come out, one of those being the changes that are being proposed around policing and law enforcement. I think municipalities have been very, very clear that this is not something they want to change right now. They're happy with the way things are with the RCMP. In fact, I think they've been quite specific about saying: if you're going to invest some time and money, that's not where to invest the time and money. But, of course, Mr. Speaker, as we've seen time and time again, this government always acts as if they know better, that they know better than the municipalities, who are actually far closer to their constituents than this government is.

It also does very little to address key issues. It certainly doesn't restore the victims of crime fund. You know, I can remember – I think it was in 2020 when the changes were made – all of the things that we talked about that could potentially happen, and sadly I think we've seen a lot of those changes happen.

Earlier this morning we had a meeting of Public Accounts. Not that it relates to this piece of legislation, but there is a phrase in one of the reports, the annual report for Municipal Affairs, strangely enough, and it talked about their approach to managing COVID-19. The phrase that they used was: it was a "whole-of-society" approach to address COVID-19. Of course, just that phrase makes you think about what that looks like, a whole-of-society approach. It wasn't sort of targeted here and targeted there, you know, trying to patch little holes; it was an approach that looked at: what is the problem, and what is an approach that will encompass all of the anticipated or expected or real problems that we see? That phrase really stuck with me when I read it. As I look at this piece of legislation, this piece of legislation is not that. It's not that at all. Not at all. If you're going to look at crime and if you're going to look at the reduction of crime and if you're going to look at ultimately making Alberta a safer place for Albertans, this piece of legislation falls far, far short.

We know some of the problems that were created with the changes for victims of crime, whether it was, you know, changes to caps on counselling. I don't know about you, but for any of the people that I've met that have survived some of the crimes – I don't even want to talk about them – some of the very serious crimes, I'm sorry, but five counselling sessions aren't going to cut it, and not everybody has access to resources to augment that. That's just one example.

I think the other thing that this piece of legislation doesn't do – I mean, it's all fine and good if you're only comparing it to your platform document and checking off boxes. What it doesn't address are some of the very root causes of crime and of situations that create really unsafe environments.

I'm going to go back to, you know, one of the things that I mentioned a little bit earlier, one of the broken promises – actually, I don't think it was a promise – that this government made not to deindex benefits. Well, you get it. One of the things that that inadvertently did was create a lot of hardships for a lot of people. By deindexing benefits, it may not have caused a lot of pain the first year. It started to cause a lot more pain the second year. As inflation started to escalate, it caused a lot more pain, not to mention – throw in there a global pandemic, and it's a recipe for disaster.

By deindexing benefits like AISH and income support – and I'm going to explain this again. AISH, which is $1,685 a month – that's the maximum that people can get – is not the highest in this country, just so we're clear. The government continues to say that it is the most generous in Canada; it is not. You know better. I would expect the government to do better. It is not. The Northwest Territories and the Yukon have higher benefits. It is not the most generous in Canada. But even at that, it is below the poverty line, so why on earth would you go there and say that it's generous? People are still living in poverty. Anyway, that's AISH.

Income support is about half of what AISH is, and I can tell that there are thousands of people that are on income support that have really serious disabilities. Because of the way the AISH legislation is written, they don't qualify for AISH, not to mention some of the processes and appeals. But there are huge problems. I am not saying that poverty is a direct link to increasing crime, but it certainly has an impact. I can only tell you what I know anecdotally. It's that, sadly, I've known far too many people that are living in poverty, where crime becomes – sometimes it's a crime of opportunity, and sometimes it's about desperation or about not having the supports to show you a different way; you know, some of the very basic things like not having stable and secure housing, not having access to regular food and then knowing that you've already used up your trips to the food bank for the month in the first couple of weeks. So what do you do for the rest of the month? This creates opportunity. Sometimes crime is driven by desperation, and things escalate.

We know that there is a massive cost to not addressing poverty. There is a massive cost in health care. We know this. There is a massive cost to the justice system. You know, I can remember reading a report a while ago – and I wish I had some statistics for you tonight, but I don't – about the number of people in the criminal justice system who are undiagnosed, perhaps with fetal alcohol spectrum disorder or other disabilities. Perhaps it's brain injuries. There are so many people walking around, and sadly we've given them sort of this nickname that's awful, and it's called the walking wounded. They don't look disabled, they may not use a wheelchair, but they have incredible disabilities and incredible hurdles.

When you make life more difficult for this group of people – and this is not a small group. Just think about people on AISH – it's, like, over 70,000 people – and the tens of thousands of people on income support and then the many thousands of people that don't even get benefits that are living not even paycheque to paycheque.

They're working multiple jobs many times, and they're not stretching it month to month. They just can't make it. So with opportunity, sometimes crime is a reality.

I think that if, truly, a government wants to create an environment where you're reducing crime, where you're increasing the safety of Albertans, then you have to have a whole-of-society approach. This legislation could have been an opportunity to start to open that door, but instead what it is, I think, is an exercise in just ticking off a box on a platform document. I'm not saying that perhaps that information, the changes that would be made in this legislation, won't make a difference in people's lives. That's great if it does. I certainly hope it does. But it doesn't take a whole-of-society approach, and we have a huge problem in Alberta. It's escalating. We have a huge problem with rural crime. We have a huge problem with crime in cities.

It's unfortunate that we don't get a lot of opportunity to debate legislation. The government doesn't get unlimited opportunity to bring forward legislation. I would hope that every opportunity would be used as best as it can for a whole-of-society approach to address a very real problem. I know this government knows crime is a problem. When they were in opposition, I heard them talking about it endlessly. They don't talk about it with as much vigour; it's a little bit more targeted these days.

Anyway, I'm going to go back and talk a little bit about the Alberta provincial police force. You know, I feel like sometimes some of the legislation that this government brings forward is an attempt to distract from really large, significant issues. I don't think it can be understated just how much Alberta municipalities do not want the changes that this government is trying to push through. They absolutely do not want these changes. It's not for us to tell them that they're incorrect and that this government knows better. I think our job as legislators and as MLAs is to listen to our constituents. I think that just this very simple example demonstrates so clearly that this government is out of touch with the people they are supposed to be governing for and the people they are supposed to be . . .

Mr. McIver: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker: A point of order has been called. I see the hon. minister.

Point of Order Relevance

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, I hate to do this, but I've got to call a point of order under 23(b), "speaks to matters other than the question under discussion." Now, listen, I'm not suggesting in any way that the hon. member's debate wasn't scintillating and important, because it was both scintillating and important. It just wasn't on the topic of the bill that we're discussing right now. I would just respectfully ask you to coach the hon. member to talk about the bill before us.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. member, should you want to, the opportunity is yours, absolutely. Yes. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I would suggest to you that under 23(b) this is not a point of order given that we are at second reading of Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act, and that it is this member's first opportunity to speak generally to this piece of legislation, relating it to government business and other matters. I do not think there is a point of order here. I agree that the remarks were scintillating and relevant and interesting. They were excellent, and I hope that the member will be allowed to continue.

The Acting Speaker: I'm not sure the hon. minister necessarily called them relevant given his point of order. However, what I will say is that this is the hon. Member for St. Albert's first opportunity to speak on this at second reading, and I believe that historically there has been a little bit of a bigger berth with regard to what is spoken in here on second reading. I would invite the hon. Member for St. Albert to please continue with her comments.

Thank you.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, perhaps if it was a better piece of legislation, there would be more, you know, relevant things to talk about.

Anyway, you know, perhaps I'm going to go back to – my colleague the Justice critic actually released a statement about this piece of legislation that I thought was really terrific. Perhaps the minister of – I don't even recall anymore. There's been a lot of movement. What's his . . .

Member Irwin: Which one?

Ms Renaud: Transportation.

Some Hon. Members: Municipal Affairs.

Ms Renaud: Municipal Affairs. Okay. Sorry.

Mr. McIver: See, I was nice to her, but she's not nice to me.

Ms Renaud: I'm sorry. It's not nice that I can't remember his title. I apologize.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, the only person with the call right now is the hon. Member for St. Albert. If there are conversations to be had, there are lounges where you can have them.

Please continue.

Ms Renaud: Excellent. Thank you for pointing that out.

I'd just like to review some of the press release that actually went out. I thought it was really terrific, and I think my colleague across the way will enjoy it. "This legislation is incredibly vague and doesn't even specify which data will be collected or disclosed. Most importantly, it does nothing to help address crime." I could not agree more with my colleague's statement. It doesn't restore funding to the victims of crime fund that was raided by the UCP or prioritize the new victim of crime model they've been promising for the last two years.

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Taber-Warner, I believe, has caught my eye.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today in support of Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act. First, I want to thank the minister for all those involved in bringing this important bill forward. I know that many people are concerned about crime in their communities. In Alberta we are lucky to have many dedicated, local neighbourhood watch and patrol groups who do their best to protect our communities from crime, but the challenges with crime in rural Alberta are different than those in urban centres. Protecting our rural communities from crime is more of a difficult task. Local police are often set up in urban areas but are tasked to cover large swaths of surrounding rural communities, and it can take them a while to get there once dispatched.

Mr. Speaker, in 2019 the former Minister of Justice toured rural Alberta and talked to a number of citizens in our rural communities. During this tour the common feedback from the individuals in rural communities was their concerns with increasing rural crime. These individuals expressed a need for more information on crimes in their communities. This bill is a result of this engagement and fulfills yet another platform commitment from our government.

This legislation would make currently available metrics such as police-based crime data reportable annually. It will require the government to table a report on these metrics in the Legislature and publish them on the government of Alberta website. This legislation will be the first of its kind in Canada and will bring consistency in timing and a more user-friendly approach to crime statistics for all Albertans.

This government believes that people have a right to know what's going on in their communities. Readily available justice statistics can help improve public safety by giving Albertans the ability to make informed decisions about protecting themselves and their communities. This will help Albertans to better understand what is going on in their communities and support effective crime-fighting initiatives with evidence-based decisions for better outcomes and safer communities. Improving access to crime data will help communities and groups like Alberta Citizens on Patrol to understand what is going on in their communities in order for them to make decisions on patrols and volunteer efforts that would best serve them.

Mr. Speaker, there are also provisions in this legislation that enable the government to obtain and publish additional data through information-sharing agreements with the federal government, other provinces and territories, municipalities, and police services, among others. Additional metrics can be reported as they become available in the future.

In terms of costs, while there may be costs for the technology used to report the metrics and/or staff to collect and publish the information, these can be covered by the minister's existing budget. Giving the public access to information on crime statistics that they need without any additional cost makes this bill a no-brainer.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that provides Albertans transparency when it comes to crime data. It provides local groups, communities, and police the opportunity to adjust operations to make their communities safer, and it comes with no additional cost to government. For all these reasons, I will be supporting this bill and encourage all members in this House to do the same.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join the debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has risen.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise this evening to speak about Bill 9, Public's Right to Know Act. I know that some of my colleagues who've risen before me this evening have covered a lot of ground in a short amount of time and have eloquently spoken to the bill, so I hope to shed some light using some of my own perspectives and experience where I've come upon some past work and volunteer work in the criminal justice system, that I reflect upon now when I look at Bill 9 and what it attempts to accomplish.

What it shows me, Mr. Speaker, is that the government is simply trying to beat their chest and say: look, we're tough on crime. It speaks to, as others across the floor have talked to us this evening about, rural crime and how fearful people are in rural Alberta about criminal activity where they feel more at risk and vulnerable because of the distances involved and time in response involved, but really this seems to be simply a shout-out, an electoral platform opportunity to say, "Look, we're tough on crime because we are naming those categories of people who are going through the perennial revolving door of the justice system," as they like to say.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that revolving door is something that, unfortunately, has been ongoing for a long, long time, and the reason for that, in my view, in many ways is that the criminal justice system – justice departments, the Solicitor General's department but particularly Justice itself – has been underfunded not only in this province but right across the country, in every provincial and federal jurisdiction. It seems to me that when it comes to budget time, the Justice ministry is a convenient whipping boy and doesn't get the funding that it needs because prisoners don't have a lot of voice.

Indeed, individuals who revolve through the justice system do it for a reason. There's a reason for everything, Mr. Speaker, and this legislation does nothing to address the reasons behind that so-called revolving door that make it impossible for the government to bring forward a piece of legislation like this so they can claim that they're, you know, being tough on crime. But being tough on crime doesn't mean belittling or ostracizing or blaming the individuals who are at the mercy of the courts once they have been charged. It behooves us to go further and look behind the situation and ask: why are these individuals before the courts in the first place? That's the tough-on-crime approach that I'd like to see. Simply naming the groups of individuals, identifying through data and publishing reports on individuals who have committed other crimes while on bail or parole, as the UCP promised in their platform, doesn't accomplish anything towards actually getting us closer to reducing the recidivism rate or answering the question as to why people are involved in criminal activity in the first place.

We've looked at ways where we could identify further support mechanisms that we could use to assist groups of our population who are overrepresented in the criminal justice system. Our Bill 204, which the Member for Edmonton-City Centre has brought forward, which is currently before the House, purports to collect race-based data, which would be used to justify further supports for identifiable groups who are going through that revolving door on a regular basis, to identify the root causes to the criminal activity, looking at, if I might say so, the social determinants of crime, the social determinants of being on the margins of your society, not simply to boast that we're getting tough on crime but actually do something about it that is meaningful and that heals the issues that are at the surface in the courtroom. Really, there's a much larger iceberg below the surface that began much earlier in the lives of folks who are before the courts and the criminal justice system.

I mentioned, when I first began speaking this evening, Mr. Speaker, that I volunteered in the criminal justice system. You may have heard me say before that as a court intake worker with the Solicitor General's department I went for over two years in courtrooms 65 and 68, the court of first appearance, to sit as a court intake worker, and those individuals who were actually sentenced to a period of probation in that court become my responsibility before they left. It was my responsibility to have them sign their probation orders and assign them to a probation office. Sometimes the individual was incarcerated, and there I found them in city cells and was able to do that work before they took off. But it was a game of cat and mouse sometimes to get the notice from the judge, with the wink and a nod that he was about to pronounce a sentence of probation, so that I would be able to intercede and make sure that the individual didn't leave before he or she indeed got past me and into the public domain again. Otherwise, they would have to be rearrested and come before the courts for breaching probation.

In any case, my observation . . . [interjection] Yes, I see the hon. member. I'd be willing to hear your brief interjection.

Mr. Smith: Thank you to the Member for Edmonton-McClung for recognizing me tonight. Just a question. You were saying that you were involved in the bail hearings. I know that in my constituency we've been doing a lot of conversation with various county councillors and constituents about bail. I was wondering if he could have any comments on the bail ladder and the problems that the bail ladder system is creating with the revolving door of justice and whether he had any comments, from his experience, about how we could address that particular problem, because it is a particular problem and is creating a problem for the people of Alberta.

Thank you.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Sorry to disappoint the member. I won't comment on what he terms as "the bail ladder" because he has misheard me. I did not participate in bail hearings as a court intake worker. I simply processed and spoke with and interviewed individuals who had been sentenced to a period of probation. Certainly, at another occasion I might be willing to go into further detail on the particular details of bail, which, once again, I think, emphasizes the approach of this government to this whole piece of legislation, the Public's Right to Know Act, once again trying to highlight the harm that may or may not be done by an individual who breaches bail and perhaps recommits an offence while out on bail rather than looking at the whole and deeper problems and focusing on that as the approach to solving the issues of recidivism and generally crime and the fears that people have about crime in our society.

We can all agree that we all want to live peaceably. No one act of crime is acceptable. People want to feel safe and secure and do not wish to be in any way having their lives affected by somebody who's not willing to obey the law. That goes for demonstrations on our streets and on our highways as well as any other form of criminal activity that we might encounter.

But to get back to what I was saying, Mr. Speaker, about my observations as they evolved here with the court intake unit, it was a pattern of similar backgrounded individuals coming through those doors. They had in many cases been involved in a small crime and then escalated to larger and more serious crime, and then there was an incident perhaps involving a group or a gang as the person aged. Quite often early on it was simply a situation of a homeless youth stealing food.

Rather than being fully represented with their own lawyer, because they didn't have one, duty counsel would have met with them briefly to go over the summary of facts and quite often had to battle with the individual over their plea. Many of them, in the first time they've been in the court system, were simply listening to others they'd been incarcerated with in remand and would say: look, I just want to plead guilty and get it over with. That, of course, starts a criminal record and elevates that individual from a system of juvenile punishment to the criminal justice system and stigmatizes that person for the rest of their life.

This bill does nothing, in my view, to get to those on-the-street, root concerns that judges and duty counsel and lawyers and prosecutors and defence counsel face every day, and I don't know if indeed any of this legislation has been passed by the actual defence counsel and prosecutors who work every day in courtrooms like courtrooms 65 and 68 in downtown Edmonton, where they see on a daily basis the tragedy and the tragic situations of individuals going through that process. What instead we get here is a government wanting to point to a document they're calling Bill 9 and saying to the public: you've got a right to know about these bad people that are going through our system and how many of them are committing crimes again. It's a totally inappropriate approach, as far as I'm concerned, to solving the actual foundational and underlying problems that cause the criminal activity to be acted out in the first place.

Nuts-and-bolts standpoint: the bill itself gives the minister the power to make regulations with respect to disclosure of information such as personal information. But it also doesn't specify which data will be disclosed or not, and it gives wide discretion to the minister on an annual basis to have that list of data, that may or may not be disclosed, fluctuate annually. We're not going to even have consistency, Mr. Speaker, in the data that this bill hopes to collect. It will be an incomplete and perhaps even unusable database because of that fact, that on an annual basis the minister will be able to pick and choose which categories of data will be important on any given minister's agenda.

It begs the question of what usefulness this database might actually have other than as a political tool where the government can point to Bill 9 and suggest to a certain segment of the voting population that they actually, you know, got tough on crime with Bill 9 and they satisfied a promise in their platform in their Speech from the Throne. I don't think many Albertans are impressed by that. They are looking for much deeper solutions, much deeper thinking on issues such as solving crime in Alberta.

For example, when we're looking at the identification of individuals involved in crime, I think Albertans are looking to know who exactly is involved in some of the major demonstrations that are taking place or have taken place in the province. They're not looking for reactive data collection; they're looking for proactive police work so that individuals who are co-opting a protest group for their own more nefarious purpose are actually identified, so that White supremacists or racist organizations or groups or individuals who try to use the cover of a protest group to foment discontent and perhaps create disorder, those types of data, are collected. That may be an interesting piece of data to know. Perhaps the minister of the day might choose to collect that data. I'd be interested in knowing that.

That said, it still makes it questionable as to what value the data would have because there's no standard format that the minister needs to follow on an annual basis to collect the data. Ministers, hopefully, will see some value in going a little beyond just the data and just pointing to the identifiable individuals or groups who are going through that revolving door and are part of the recidivism rate. Hopefully, ministers will use that data to actually try to get at the root causes of crime, but I don't have a lot of confidence, Mr. Speaker, in the bill's ability to do that. Unlike Bill 9, Bill 204 would do more.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's always a privilege to stand and to speak in this House and to bring forward some of the thoughts of my constituents when it comes to the proposed legislation that we have before us. Well, it is an interesting topic that we address tonight, Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act. I kind of like the title because it reminds me of the fact that, you know, as a former teacher, understanding always starts with knowledge. If you want to understand the situation – and I don't care what the situation is – you first have to have the data. You first have to have the knowledge to be able to make a sound decision. It's once you have understanding based on knowledge that you then can make decisions that will allow for a productive action of some sort.

To agree in a small way, I think all of us understand that we've got issues within our justice system that need to be addressed, and it's a very complex puzzle. People are complex. Why we act the way we act and the things that we do in life, the decisions that we make: they're complex things. They're a product of our past, of our family life, of the situations that we find ourselves in, whether we have a job, whether we don't have a job. It's a very complex issue, so our justice system and how we deal with it and the answers are going to be complex as well. Today we're looking at Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act, and I think this is a small piece of the puzzle that puts us in a movement in the right direction.

You know, in section 3 it says, "The Minister shall prepare a report respecting data and information relating to the criminal justice system in Alberta." I think that's a wise thing to do. Let's have a report. Let's bring it forward and into the Legislature. As it says in the publication of reports in section 6 of the act, "The Minister shall lay a copy of a report before the Legislative Assembly." We're asking the minister to bring forward a report, and that report is going to be collected from a wide range of sources. It could come from the federal government. It could come from other departments or branches within the government. It could come from the Provincial Court or the Court of Queen's Bench or the Court of Appeal. This data and this information could come from another province or another territory. It could come from a band council. It could come from a police service as defined under the Police Act. We're going to be looking at a wide range of sources, which I think is wise, to build a database that's going to help us to be able to address how we move forward in our justice system in Alberta.

Its purpose:

For the purposes of preparing and publishing a report, the Minister may

- (a) collect and use data and information, including personal information, and
- (b) subject to the regulations, disclose data and information, including personal information.

Once we've collected that data, it now needs to be able to be published, to be able to be used by the justice system, by the Ministry of Justice, by the police departments across this province. So I'm looking at this, and I'm going: this may not be the be-all and end-all for solving the problems of our justice system, but it's at least a step in the right direction.

Yeah. I would agree with the members that have stood up on the opposite side of the House that, you know, there are a lot of things that we could be looking at when it comes to our justice system, but I'm not sure that because we're not looking at the whole wide range of the issues in the justice system but narrowing it down to one specific thing, it means that this bill isn't worthy of support. It's narrow. It brings it down to one particular piece of the puzzle when it comes down to our justice system.

You know, I would agree with the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung. Maybe I did misunderstand you earlier, when you were talking about being involved in bail. But I know that we've spent a significant amount of time in my constituency talking with staff sergeants from Drayton Valley, from Devon. We've met with rural crime people. We've been talking about: well, what is it that we can do?

You know, the people in my constituency, when they look at the problems that they're facing in a rural context, where they're trying to protect the property, where they're trying to make sure that their children and their families are safe from people coming in in the middle of the night, at 2 o'clock in the morning, breaking down garage doors, stealing gas, stealing vehicles, are looking at trying to find a way to protect their families and their livelihoods and their property. And what they really want is that they want to be able to hold the people that are doing this accountable for the actions by which they are breaking the law. If they're breaking the law, then they want them to be held accountable. That's not wrong. That seems pretty reasonable to me.

We've had the discussions about the Crown bail. For instance, you brought up the issue, on the other side of the House, that perhaps we could be looking at other areas that we need to fund more or less as we go forward. A fine conversation to have. One of the things I would suggest, in my conversations with the staff sergeants in my constituency, is that perhaps we need to look at funding more for the Crown bail office. It's not always open. It's not open 24 hours. Maybe we need to fund that better. But that's not what this bill is talking about. It doesn't denigrate from the bill. It's still a good bill. But the topic is much larger than just this particular issue in this bill.

The bail ladder: cash, no cash. No-cash bails: when the person does not live up to their bail expectations on a no-cash bail, nobody is now necessarily pushing him into the cash bail system or collecting on the cash system. The bail has begun to become almost a – it's not solving the problem, not helping to solve the problem. It's actually adding to the problem by that revolving door. We need to look at the cash/no-cash bail system. Don't you think it would be wise for all of our judges and our Crown prosecutors and the defence attorneys to actually look at the bail package that's come before them and maybe see whether this person is a first-time offender or whether this is the sixth or 26th or 46th time that they've come before the courts? That seems to me to be another piece of the little puzzle.

I don't have a – as a matter of fact, I think this is a good step forward. This bill helps us to start to gather data so that we can help to understand the problem so that we can move forward and have a better system of justice, so Bill 9 will have my support.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Prior to seeing the next member, I would just remind all members in the Legislature to please turn your electronic devices to silent.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity here this evening to add some of my first thoughts here on Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act. You know, I will actually thank the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon and the Member for Taber-Warner for jumping up and participating in discussion on this bill. Actually, some of your comments segue perfectly into what I want to talk about around Bill 9.

We talked about the title, Public's Right to Know Act, and I would agree; the public has a right to know information that concerns them just about on any subject, whether it be property rights or the justice system or labour laws, things like that. But it's funny because – you know, as I've mentioned, Mr. Speaker, there are times when you see language printed and what's being said, what's being done: sometimes they don't mesh up. They tend to butt heads, again. So we talk about the public's right to know, yet we've seen moves by this government to stifle the public's right to know.

The most recent example of that is the report on insurance, you know, delaying getting that out, the public's right to know. But that's not really what I want to focus on in my comments here today; it's just, again, when we start digging into the language, things aren't quite adding up.

I want to focus my comments here this evening on some of the language that the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon was talking about around – you know, we'll start on page 2, under report, in section 3(1), "The Minister shall prepare a report." I like that word "shall." It's funny because, of course, as everybody knows, I had that bit of an exchange, shall we say, with the former Justice minister about those three words: "may," "will," and "shall." Not all three of them are the same. I'm very, very firm on that position.

Reading through the legislation, as you'd mentioned, it was a little bit short. But that's okay; it's a quicker read that way. I loved seeing that word "shall" right out of the gate because that means it's going to happen. That is the type of language as legislators we should be putting forward so there's never any guesswork. So, you know, we're preparing that report respecting the data and information relating to the criminal justice system. Great. I'm completely onboard with that.

Then we get down to agreements. Of course, the member was mentioning about all the different areas that we can get information on. Here's the hitch. Right in section 4: "For the purposes of preparing a report, the Minister may enter into an agreement." Not shall, not will, which means that the minister could actually make the decision to not enter into any agreements with all those things that were mentioned by the member to get that information. That becomes a problem for me. Why did we insert that word "may"? May means we may do it. You know, if the moon is lined up and I got out on the right side of the bed here this morning, then maybe I'll look at getting that done.

When we transition on to page 3 of the bill, under collection, use, and disclosure of data and information, in section 5: "For the purposes of preparing and publishing a report, the Minister may". There's that word again, "may." It's what I like to call loosey-goosey language. It just allows all kinds of different outs for the minister instead of "will" or "shall." So according to this language – and, again, in all my experience in the labour sector and having to deal with contracts, everything always comes down to language there – the minister only may "collect and use data and information, including personal information." It's not actually saying that the minister has to do that.

When I start thinking back about this report that shall be prepared, I can't help but start to wonder: are we going to start making up information because we didn't actually have to go and get it from all of these different areas? You know, I certainly would never suggest that we would just, willy-nilly, see reports made up to suit a certain narrative. Although we've maybe seen some interesting things being said to suit narratives, I would never ever suggest that that's something that would happen.

Then we get further down, right into the next part, the publication of the report. "The Minister shall lay a copy". There's that "shall"; love it. That means it's going to happen. So we shall lay a report that was supposed to be prepared based on data we may possibly decide to get. You see how the information starts to conflict, Mr. Speaker? You know, this is the type of language where Albertans start to read this, they start to see their actions, and they start to distrust our government. Trust me, guys. You don't need any more help getting Albertans to distrust you.

I start to get a little bit further down here, down into the regulations and section 7 on page 3. “The Lieutenant Governor in Council may make regulations”. There’s that word again, “may.” This is the one that actually concerns me just a little bit, though, Mr. Speaker. You know, I guess I should be straightforward. I’m not really opposed to this bill. I’m just saying that there are things that – maybe we’ll see some corrections here throughout the debate. In Committee of the Whole we might get a chance to see some amendments or something like that taking out those words “may,” put in “will” or “shall,” things like that so that that actually absolutely happens. May make regulations “(a) respecting the preparation and publication of reports, including the frequency and timing of reports.” There’s my problem. Because you use the word “may” make regulations, you could start pushing that report off way, way into the future.

Again, you know, as I started with my opening comments around suppressing some of the information, like we’ve seen with the insurance report, like we’ve seen – my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud has talked about that report, that it seemed to take a while to get out. There was mention of my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre bringing forward Bill 204 around collecting race-based data. Okay. We’ve been waiting a very long time to see the report and the conclusions around problems such as collecting race-based data. Why did it take so long just to say that that was in the report?

When I look at that, that really does cause me a moment of pause, not enough to not support the bill. As I said, in general I don’t necessarily have a problem with it, but we could be doing better. You know, this leaves a lot up to the regulation end of things.

I remember that members of the government caucus and members of the government bench, when they sat in the 29th Legislature, complained greatly about the number of times they thought things should be put in legislation, not left to regulation. It’s funny how things have turned around. Again, conflicting information. We’ve consistently and persistently seen that throughout the course of the 30th Legislature. There are opportunities here with which to potentially strengthen Bill 9 if the government chose to do that. I mean, you know, I keep hearing this narrative about: well, we’re going to work hard to rebuild the trust of Albertans. Not with, as I said, the loosey-goosey language which is contained in Bill 9, because it allows too much leeway for things to either not happen or perhaps maybe even be manipulated a little bit. If you really do truly believe that Albertans deserve that right to know, just like in the title of Bill 9, it’s not enough to be able to just talk the walk; you need to walk it as well.

Again, going right back to my initial opening comments around suppressing information, suppressing reports, I mean, it was interesting. I think back to the Allan report that was delayed three different times at a cost to Albertans. We just kept allowing this to go on and on. You get the report, you do your review right now, quickly, ASAP, and get it out the door so that people get to see it if you do truly believe in the public’s right to know. My hope is that, you know, throughout the discussion we might get the opportunity to see some of those things.

I did catch some of my colleagues talking about the government’s, I guess, direction to explore its own provincial police force. There is a lot of data and information out there with which I think the government could make an informed decision, just like what we heard from a couple of members of the government caucus talking about just a short time ago. You’ve got, you know, the Alberta Municipalities, Rural Municipalities of Alberta, Albertans at large, of course, and even the RCMP themselves spent a considerable amount of time collecting data about the subject. You’re excited about collecting this data and getting this information. Well, when it’s available, you actually need put in that effort to read it, to accept it.

It’s very, very clear, Mr. Speaker. Albertans do not want to see a provincial police service. It’s way too expensive to change over. It was funny. I was actually at one of their public meetings, and I got a chance to talk to – probably wrong on this location, but it was one of the municipalities in B.C. that’s in this process. They thought it was going to take about four years to transfer over, and it was probably going to cost them – I’m trying to remember – I think they said somewhere in the neighbourhood of $10 million or $20 million over the course of four years to switch over. They’re only halfway through that mandate, and they’re already at something weird like $60 million in this changeover. If you can just imagine: if they’d had the data from what we saw there, we might have had the opportunity with which to make different decisions. But that information, that data is out there right now around that.

I think we have an opportunity to collect data and use it, so in the spirit of Bill 9, when we’re talking about the public’s right to know, to collect that information, to share that information, the government should be collecting this information and sharing it with Albertans. I mean, they’re already not onboard with this. Likely, if they get to read all of these figures, they’ll be even less onboard and maybe some of the folks that were before might be switching their minds.

You pair that with the loose language that’s contained in Bill 9, with the use of “may” – let’s get rid of those. Let’s start using “will” and “shall” and actually commit, if you do actually believe that the public has a right to know this information, actually commit to not only collecting it – and I’d like to see that data collected from all of these sources that are mentioned in here, you know, “another department, branch or agency of the Government of Alberta.” Great. “Provincial Court of Queen’s Bench or Court of Appeal.” Absolutely. “The Government of Canada; the government of another province or territory; a municipality . . . a council of a band . . . a police service.” Absolutely. Let’s get all of it, not maybe just necessarily the ones that we like to see or hear because it fits into our narrative. Sometimes the best decisions you can make are when you have information that maybe doesn’t necessarily make you feel comfortable.

We have a real opportunity here. But, again, it doesn’t absolutely allow us to go and get the data from that area. Could it potentially be a bunch of work? Absolutely it is, but that is the best information that you should be getting. Again, I’m not opposed to it. I’m happy to be supporting it, but we can do better.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members looking to join debate?

Seeing none, I am prepared to ask the question.

[Motion carried; Bill 9 read a second time]

Bill 12 Trustee Act

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Cross has risen.

Mr. Amery: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise this evening on behalf of the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General to move second reading of Bill 12, the Trustee Act.

This bill is about making it more efficient to manage trusts and lessen the need for Albertans to go to court. It also reflects the government's work to continue to reform legislation to better meet the needs of Albertans.

The new Trustee Act follows the Uniform Trustee Act proposed by the Uniform Law Conference of Canada. This internationally respected organization, Mr. Speaker, provides an independent analysis and recommendations for harmonization of laws in Canada. The Alberta Law Reform Institute has also recommended that Alberta update its trustee legislation by adopting the Uniform Trustee Act with some variations. The government reviewed the recommendations and adopted them with some variations.

Mr. Speaker, we used the recommendations to inform our work about the changes before the House tonight. We also extensively consulted with stakeholders on the proposed legislation, and there is widespread support for these changes. This is especially true of the Society of Trust and Estate Practitioners, charities, members of the legal profession, and experts in trusts who are supportive of the new act.

The current Trustee Act is significantly outdated and is based on mid-Victorian era legislation. The need for reform is clear. In addition, Mr. Speaker, the current Trustee Act is mainly concerned with trusts under wills. However, as the years have evolved, so have trusts. They have been adapted in modern business and applied to an increasingly broad range of property. Trusts are used in real estate investment funds, land development, and royalty trusts to finance the oil and gas sector.

To be clear, Bill 12 would replace the current but outdated Trustee Act. This new Trustee Act would clarify the trustees' roles and their administrative powers, outline specific processes so that in many instances trustees and beneficiaries do not need to go to court. It would set out provisions to support an improved day-to-day functioning of trusts and provide a basis for trusts that do not have extensive terms or do not cover all of the situations the provisions apply to while making sure that people can still set their own terms if they need to.

Mr. Speaker, as part of settling and clarifying trustee responsibilities, we are proposing to put into legislation that trustees are expected to be careful, to be diligent, and skilful in their decision-making aspects of a trust. Namely, a trustee must exercise the care, diligence, and skill that a person with good judgment would use in dealing with the property of another.

This new legislation would also increase transparency. A new duty for trustees would be to report and respond to beneficiary requests in the administration of a trust. This does seem somewhat self-evident, that trustees need to respond to beneficiaries, but this does not always happen, and it is a protection that needs to be clearly included in this new act.

Administering trusts would also improve as we are proposing to broaden trustees' administrative powers within the act. This would include buying and selling trust property and purchasing, renting, or building a residence for a beneficiary.

Mr. Speaker, at this juncture I would also like to clarify another point in how this new act would provide mechanisms for trusts that do not have extensive terms or that do not cover all of the situations that the provisions would apply to while making sure people can, again, set their own terms if they need to. For example, unlike the current act, the new act would provide a mechanism for choosing a temporary trustee, which would allow someone other than the original trustee to manage a trust for a short period of time. This means that the original trustee doesn't have to resign when they are ill or if they are away from the province for a bit or if they're unable to act for whatever reason temporarily. If the trust itself has no provisions to appoint a temporary trustee, this new act would apply.

Mr. Speaker, default rules essentially in place to fill the gaps where needed: some in this room will know exactly what I'm talking about. This is not a new concept. The Administration of Estates Act, for example, provides for automatic rules that deal with who has priority over the administration of an estate among applicants. Similarly, the Wills and Succession Act guides how estates are administered when someone dies without a will. These changes are needed now for trusts.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, Albertans setting up a trust can rely on the legislation rather than having to include all of the terms in the document itself. Rather than think of every type of contingency, this new act would provide for default rules that would allow for these things to be addressed if they weren't included in the trust itself. But I want to be clear. Despite all of that, Albertans can still add specific terms to the trust.

Mr. Speaker, the new Trustee Act would also provide processes to allow for the removal of an unfit trustee and allow a trustee to resign. All of these changes would result in more efficient management of trusts and less court involvement as typically one would otherwise have to go to court to make these changes. Ultimately, this would let trustees better serve beneficiaries and better manage trusts. For the legal community this new act would make dealing with trusts simpler and would result in less need to go to court to address minor administrative issues.

For trust and estate organizations such as the Society of Trust and Estate Practitioners the new act would clarify and set out the responsibilities and the duties of trustees, and it would also help families better plan their trusts.

For Albertans setting up a trust, the new act would make that process more efficient and simpler, and it would also be generally less expensive for Albertans to create a trust. This is because the new Trustee Act would reduce the legal and other costs and the complexities by lessening the number of matters that may be included in a document. For beneficiaries, Mr. Speaker, the new legislation would strengthen their protections. It would reduce their costs, and it would minimize the need to go to court for every single minor matter.

Charities would also benefit from the new proposed changes. This means that the new act contains provisions to allow for varying charitable trusts. This saves these charitable trusts from failing by making it easier for the court to apply the trust to a similar purpose when the original purpose fails. The court could also modify the purpose of a charitable trust even if the original purpose has not failed. For example, an Albertan may create a trust to provide for scholarships, which are usually based on academic standing. Under this proposed legislation the courts could vary the trust to provide for bursaries, which are usually based, instead, on financial need.

I want to highlight a point that I mentioned, and I want to hammer it home here today before you, Mr. Speaker. As I've said many times already, less need for involving the courts: that's ultimately what this act achieves. This would be a significant result of this new legislation. Less court time for trust matters means there is more court time and resources for other, more serious and more complex matters. Less court time means that trustees, beneficiaries, lawyers, and Albertans get time back in their day. Less court time means money is staying in the pockets of Albertans rather than having to pay to litigate trivial matters.

Now, while we are proposing an overall new piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, some provisions of the existing act would remain. For example, this includes the prudent investor rules that require a trustee to make investment decisions based on obtaining reasonable returns and avoiding undue risk. These rules should remain to guide any investment decision that a trustee should make.

We are also proposing to continue provisions that allow for the variation of trusts. This means that this new act would empower the court to vary the terms of a trust subject to specific terms in the trust document itself. This provides flexibility to address changing or unanticipated circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 12, the Trustee Act, brings trust legislation into the 21st century. From creating to managing trusts, strengthening protections for beneficiaries, increasing the accountability of trustees, and providing clear processes for trustees to use in managing trusts to reduce court involvement, this bill modernizes and improves all aspects of trust legislation, and by improving trust legislation, we are making life better for Albertans.

I hope Albertans on both sides of this House will support this legislation. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you to the hon. Member for Calgary-Cross for moving second reading of Bill 12, Trustee Act, on behalf of the Minister of Justice.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen to respond, with 20 minutes, should she choose to take it.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm not sure that I'll need the full 20 minutes to provide my comments at second reading on Bill 12, the Trustee Act, but I am pleased to rise and speak to this bill. I thank the Member for Calgary-Cross for introducing this bill at second reading on behalf of the Minister of Justice.

I want to begin by saying that I think, you know, I'm pleased to see this new framework for trusts in Alberta and to see that the recommendations coming from the Alberta Law Reform Institute seem to be substantively accepted and incorporated into this bill. As the Member for Calgary-Cross indicated, this does intend to modernize the system of trusts, and I believe the member gave a number of examples of real estate situations where there are trusts and for corporate examples. We also know that trusts are often commonly used for persons with disabilities. Their families might be planning for their future and how their assets and investments can be used to protect that individual's future. We know that there are other situations – as mentioned, charitable trusts – where they also, you know, use this trust model.

And for, you know, Albertans who are a little curious about sort of what a trust is or to get a better understanding of what it is, a trust is essentially a fiduciary duty and responsibility whereby an individual, generally referred to as the settlor, basically appoints an individual, who is the trustee, to manage assets and property, subject to certain conditions and requirements, in the interests of a beneficiary, so basically saying that somebody appoints somebody else to manage their business and assets for somebody else. But, of course, they may set out conditions on that and how those assets will be managed.

I'm sure many of us are familiar with, you know, what you hear the most in media and movies, the trust fund, right? You've got the wealthy parents who are planning for their children's future and saying, you know, this is how their assets can be used, and somebody else is going to manage it until that young person reaches a certain age, and then they get access to those things. That's the most commonly understood sort of idea of what a trust is, but of course, as I indicated, there are many other circumstances in which somebody else may be appointed to manage assets on behalf of somebody else.

It is true, as the Member for Calgary-Cross indicated, that this is – our current structure, our current Trustee Act is based on very old sort of English precedent of what a trust is, and the legislation was simply updated from, I believe, English legislation from the 1800s, really, and just simply setting out that concept of it, which primarily looked at trusts within the wills and estates context. But as we've described, there are many other circumstances, and I know that this has been a subject of some discussion and research and proposals for some time within the legal community and within many various other charitable institutions of individuals who are trying to modernize, essentially, the trust legislation, and that is what I believe we are seeing before us in Bill 12 with the Trustee Act.

Specifically, as we know, we believe that a number of the provisions of Bill 12 are based on recommendations that came from the Alberta Law Reform Institute report that was issued in January 2017. I want to go back a little bit to those recommendations and just some highlights because, actually, Mr. Speaker, as you may be aware, there are actually 90 detailed recommendations that came out of that Law Reform Institute report. I'm not going to go into detail about all 90 recommendations.

Member Irwin: You could.

Ms Pancholi: Certainly. I guess I have 20 minutes, and I am a fast talker, but I don't want to do that.

I will go over some of the key recommendations that were made. I believe the Member for Calgary-Cross outlined already a number of the changes, and, as he indicated, not all of the recommendations were either accepted, or maybe they were accepted but varied, and I would appreciate some discussion perhaps from the Minister of Justice to provide clarity as to where recommendations were varied from what was put forward by the Alberta Law Reform Institute and the reason why.

Certainly, we know that the recommendations that originally came in that 2017 report from the Law Reform Institute were based on essentially a uniform Trustee Act that was developed under the Uniform Law Conference of Canada. Basically, that set out what trustee legislation could look like in any jurisdiction, and it was sort of one uniform Trustee Act. The idea was that this is the act that could apply in any jurisdiction, and provinces, for example, could simply adopt that. I appreciate that there will be variations, though, between provinces, and perhaps that's what we're seeing in the proposed Bill 12, why there are variations, maybe Alberta-specific. But I think certainly what would be appreciated is to perhaps go through which recommendations were varied and why.

The member indicated that there was a consultation done with a number of stakeholders, and I think it would be interesting to know what the feedback was from the stakeholders and why specific recommendations were not accepted. I believe, if I recall correctly, that 80 out of the 90 recommendations were implemented. So I would appreciate to know why 10 were not and what the variations were.

I want to go over for this House just a bit of an overview of some of the key recommendations that came out of the Alberta Law Reform Institute. I think we've heard already from the Member for Calgary-Cross that some of those recommendations have been implemented, but I just want to lay out for Albertans sort of what those recommendations are and why it was important to modernize our Trustee Act to adapt and to apply to so many different circumstances. Some of the key recommendations that came out of the 2017 Law Reform Institute report 109 include that the "trustee legislation should establish that the trust instrument prevails, with specific exceptions set out in the legislation," simply saying that the instrument by which the trust has developed should prevail. That should apply to the relationship of the trust. However, there may be exceptions, and we want to see what those exceptions are within the legislation.

The report also recommended that it should be very clear in the legislation what the settlor's intent was and how to determine what that intent is because, as we indicated, a trust is really about the settlor appointing somebody to act as a trustee for the benefit of their beneficiaries. So what that settlor intended and how to determine that in a set of criteria within the legislation that's clearly applied and transparent but, you know, looks at the trust instrument itself, sets out the process for determining that intention is very important and can use and apply extrinsic evidence as well.

The Law Reform Institute report also recommended that trustee legislation should require court approval for a proposed variation to a trust that is not provided for in the trust instrument. It does still say, as much as we are looking at this Trustee Act as a way to sort of perhaps minimize interactions with the court, that variations to the trust instrument itself must be done with court approval. So there are circumstances in which going to court is still going to be necessary for a trust.

We know that one of the recommendations was that any trustee legislation should provide for temporary trustees to be appointed for a specified period of time to administer the trust, and I believe that that is something that the member indicated and Bill 12 does address. It actually does set out criteria as to how a temporary trustee could be appointed. Now, interestingly, I didn't quite hear this from the Member for Calgary-Cross, and in looking at the bill, it wasn't evident to me – and I say “interestingly” because I really do hope it is interesting to some people, but I will continue talking nevertheless.

One of the recommendations from the Law Reform Institute is that there should actually be a two-tier standard of care that applies. That means that somebody appointed as a trustee who maybe doesn't have specific experience, is not a professional investor, for example, would be held to one standard of care, which is to still exercise ordinary care and due diligence in dealing with the trust properly. There are still, absolutely, obligations on that individual to meet a certain standard of care.

But if there is a trustee who is of a professional designation and has special qualifications, they actually have a standard of care that's higher. They must exercise a greater degree of skill. So this basically says that professionals who perhaps, you know, manage trusts with their expertise and their background may be held to a different standard and a higher standard than just an average person who may be appointed as a trustee. I'm not sure if that is reflected in the bill. I couldn't see that, but I would be happy to take a better look or to hear from the Minister of Justice.

I was happy to hear, of course, that the prudent investor rule, which applied even under the existing trustee legislation – the Law Reform Institute has indicated they believe that should continue to apply. I think that makes logical sense. We all still expect, when somebody is appointed to manage a trust, that they do act in the way of a prudent investor. I understand that Bill 12 preserves that rule, and that's important.

The Law Reform Institute also talked about, you know, where there is more than one trustee – there are certainly circumstances where that would be the case – that those trustees must act as a majority rather than unanimously. It's not that all trustees must agree to the same action, but the majority of trustees must do so.

As well, the Law Reform Institute recommended that trustee legislation should define conflict of interest and provide a process by which to allow a trustee to act in certain ways despite a conflict. I think that's really important because they're being trusted to do something, but there is certainly the case where a trustee may have a conflict, may have an existing relationship with the beneficiary, perhaps as a family member, and there should be some acknowledgement that conflict of interest may apply but does not always have to rule out that that person is still a qualified trustee.

Another recommendation is that the provisions regarding trust compensation prevail over contrary terms in the trust instrument, so there should be fair compensation set out in the legislation that would prevail in circumstances where the trust instrument perhaps sets out a really low level of compensation in certain circumstances. Managing a trust can be onerous work, and a trustee should not be, I guess, discouraged or disincentivized from acting in a prudent way because of low compensation.

As well, trustee legislation to provide a mechanism to validate and regulate noncharitable purpose trusts: I understand that that is incorporated into Bill 12 and key, I believe, to what the member had spoken to and is perhaps the intent of this, that trustee situations in the case of a will or an estate should not apply to those circumstances. There's already legislation that applies. It's not necessary for trustee legislation to apply to that, and in that respect I believe the objective there is to minimize the amount of court action that occurs around a trust and thereby free up court time. Now, I just wanted to take a moment to comment, Mr. Speaker, that, you know, I would love some analysis or assessment from the Minister of Justice as to how much court time will be freed up by putting in this legislation. We certainly do support it.

I support the idea of modernizing our trust framework, but really that issue of freeing up court time is more important than ever. It was incredibly disheartening to hear that the current Minister of Justice was apparently unaware that more than 3,000 cases in the Provincial Court system are currently at risk of being thrown out for being over the Jordan time limit in terms of being assessed in court. You know, the current Minister of Justice went on record publicly and said that there were no cases at risk of being thrown out as a result of the Jordan decision, and in fact that was quickly just proven to be incorrect. There are actually more than 3,000 cases in the Alberta Provincial Court system right now that are at risk of being thrown out because of the length of time that the matter has taken in the court system.

Of course, actually, of those 3,000 cases, Mr. Speaker, over 1,200 of them are violent offences. You know, for a government that has predicated so much of its platform and its messaging in the area of justice around law and order, it is quite shocking to me that not only is the current Minister of Justice unaware of what's going on in the court system but that there are a significant number of cases that are at risk of being thrown out.

I seem to recall, Mr. Speaker, being in this Legislature, you know, in early 2019 and hearing this strong commitment to hiring all these new prosecutors, which hasn't happened. Very few new prosecutors have been hired. For some reason it appears that the current government of Alberta has difficulties attracting individuals to work for it right now. I wonder why that may be, but certainly we do have a shortage of prosecutors. We continue to have a shortage of prosecutors, and that is leading to a significant risk that many cases, including violent offences, may be thrown out of our court system as a result of this current government's failure to act and their never-ending – I don't know – Whac-A-Mole of Justice ministers.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Certainly, let's hope somebody can get the job done. I don't know that it's going to be anybody in this government, but I'm certainly confident that come the next provincial election Albertans will have a government that is committed and able to address these issues to make sure that we are dealing effectively with the criminal justice system, and that will be the members on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker.

When it comes to Bill 12, this is a moment where I think there can be agreement in this House that modernizing the trust system is certainly important. This seems to be, you know, well welcomed in terms of doing this and updating our Trustee Act. I do hope it does free up some court time because certainly we have a lot of cases to get through our courts, Mr. Speaker, but also I would be interested in hearing some feedback from the Minister of Justice or members from the government side as to which recommendations from the Alberta Law Reform Institute were not accepted, the reason that they were not accepted, and perhaps the feedback that came from stakeholders that led to those variations with respect to Bill 12.

I look forward to a spirited debate and discussion of Bill 12, the Trustee Act. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, before the Assembly is second reading of Bill 12. Is there anyone else wishing to join in the debate? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for that introduction. To continue on, my colleague left off with regard to Bill 12, Trustee Act. I just want to say that, you know, when we were government, we did work in this area, of course. We tried to look at modernizing aspects of this act. We met through Justice and Solicitor General at the time, met with the Alberta Law Reform Institute, and talked about consultations that would improve and modernize this act and talked about 23 new or modified recommendations. I don't know them all at this point in time, but I do know that the work that was done previously by our government had some benefit.

One of those clear benefits, Mr. Speaker, was – I think it's called the Henson trust. It was brought forward, I remember, by a member of our government to address the clear need for people with disabilities who were granted or who were gifted large financial gifts or inheritances. Previously, as I understand it, disabled people in those situations would have been cut off AISH until the proceeds from those gifts or inheritances were drawn down. What our government did in passing legislation in 2018 was to make possible that there could be a trust set up for that individual and they wouldn't have to draw down those funds. They wouldn't have to be cut off AISH until those funds were extinguished.

I was very pleased. I remember sitting in the House at that time, and the people who brought it forward were in the gallery, and they were very thankful that our government listened and made changes to this act at that time. The Member for – I'm just trying to remember where he was from – I think it was Calgary-Currie at the time was the sponsor of that bill, bringing that forward. That was a positive thing.

I, too, like my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud, wonder what has resulted in 10 of those recommendations that the Alberta Law Reform Institute proposed not coming forward at this time and wonder what difference they could have made in this act had they been subsequently approved and written into this act. I understand that this new framework will be of benefit, and I listened to, of course, the Member for Calgary-Cross talk about this bill in the introduction to second reading. We do need a more efficient court and judiciary, not the judiciary itself, Mr. Speaker, but efficiency around the kinds of things that are brought forward. We do need to lessen the need for conflicts that people feel only can be solved in court. I think that's a good thing to look at, improvements to this act, modernizing it in that respect, because that will better meet the needs of Albertans with respect to other significant issues that are before the courts.

My colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud talked about some of those; namely, the large number of cases that are potentially going to be thrown out of court. Three thousand cases are beyond the 18-month timeline established by the Jordan principle, the Jordan decision, and the fact that our current Justice minister was unaware of that is very concerning. We need to obviously focus court time and attention where appropriate on those kinds of cases so that we deal with the egregious crimes which people are alleged to have committed and not see those people walk from that situation as a result of the Jordan decision being levied.

I also know that when I was reading through the bill and listening to the Member for Calgary-Cross talk about it, he mentioned that it's adapted to modern business. Of course, my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud talked about 1893, I think, when the initial principles were laid out, the statute was laid out, that our previous act is based in part on. Just with respect to modernizing this act so that it relates to current business practices, I wonder how the whole area of real estate trusts is covered in this bill, Mr. Speaker. I have been reading through this bill, and on page 27 under items 34(1) and (2) it talks about investment powers of corporate trustee or agents. I think there's an aspect there of real estate investment trusts, and there are other parts of this bill that probably are reflective of real estate investment trusts. It would be helpful to hear from the sponsor, the Member for Calgary-Cross, where other parts in this bill talk about trusts.

I know that, you know, the area that I represent, Calgary-Buffalo – I don't think I'm incorrect in saying that I think the highest density of population in this province is in that community of Calgary-Buffalo, that riding of Calgary-Buffalo, basically the Beltline, the Mission district, the west end of downtown, the east end of downtown in the East Village, and Connaught. In those areas are predominantly apartment buildings, predominantly older apartment buildings, that were built in the '70s, '80s, and '90s in Calgary. There are a number of condominiums now that are coming up throughout the riding of Calgary-Buffalo. It's not the newer ones that are being built and condominiumized; it's the older ones that are four storeys to eight storeys that have caught the attention of real estate investment trusts.

We know, of course, that investors receive returns on their investments without needing the expertise to buy or manage any properties themselves. They pool capital. I just wonder in this Trustee Act, which, I understand, modernizes the situation for real estate investment trusts, how, in fact, it does that, and potentially the sponsor or the minister can make that more clear as we go forward in debate of this bill.

Real estate investment trusts are relatively new. In the 1990s they started to take off in this country as a result of the federal government and provincial government stepping back from investing in the creation of affordable housing, social housing in this country. So that phenomenon is a new one, and it has resulted in the consolidation of affordable housing in the control of real estate investment trusts. There is not necessarily the greatest track record. Many people, including those who are in long-term rental situations in older apartments, are concerned about their tenure in those apartments because of the desire of the REIT to get the most profit from those investments. The amount of actual affordable housing on the market and in Canada has decreased as a result of REITs being involved and making a greater profit as a result of increasing rents or shutting down their buildings so that they can be remodelled and rented at a higher level.

This Trustee Act, as the sponsor said, is being adapted so that modern business can work better, I guess, as a result of them being subsumed in this act. I think aspects of this bill certainly make sense to replace the existing Trustee Act with this act, but there are aspects of the impact of this bill on REITs and on those who need affordable housing throughout this province and this country that are unknown as a result of the effect of this bill. I want to raise that as an issue that I'd like to look more into, but anything that can help make trust legislation more effective for a broad number of people, setting aside REITs, of course, is a good thing.

Like this government has done with the insurance industry and essentially allowing lobbyists to dictate what the insurance industry profits should be in this province, I'm concerned that potentially the same was done to allow REITs to dictate how they should be treated under this act. We've seen that in the past with not only health care and insurance and now in the justice area, potentially through this trust act revision, that this government can't be trusted to work in the best interests of the broad number of Albertans. What it does work in the best interests of, unfortunately, are those insiders and people with specific interests who don't have the interests of the majority of Albertans at heart.

I'll sit down now at this point and listen to additional discussion with regard to the changes that are coming forward under this Trustee Act, though I would like to know other parts of this act that – for instance, real estate investment trusts – are potentially impacted, because it's not all that clear. Of course, reading through it, there are a number of content areas where potentially you could read into it that a REIT would be positively impacted. But not being a lawyer, some of this is very much in legalese and not in common language, so I will certainly sit down and benefit from listening to other people talk about this.

Just one more thing. Yeah. I think that I've covered everything I wanted to say with regard to REITs, the area that I represent, and recognizing that anything that increases the power of those companies over people who live in low-income housing is not a positive thing, in my view.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on second reading of Bill 12, the Trustee Act, are there others? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 12, the Trustee Act, in second reading. You know, let me just begin with – both of my colleagues have mentioned this, and I'm actually very curious. I understand that the vast majority of recommendations that were made by the Alberta Law Reform Institute – I think there were 90 of them. I'm just looking at them now. I believe this legislation addresses 80 of them, and I'm really curious which 10 were left out. I just had a quick look at all of them. Again, I'll preface this. I am not a lawyer. They all look quite reasonable, so I'm actually quite curious. I hope that somebody from the other side will just explain which 10 were not addressed and perhaps why maybe they weren't necessary. I think that would be quite helpful.

You learn something every day. I didn't realize until I started looking at this legislation that there have been amendments to the Trustee Act, but it's actually never comprehensively been reviewed. It's based on an 1893 English statute that certainly has fallen out of step with modern practices and issues, so it is great that this legislation will address some of those shortfalls.

The bill does develop a framework for all trusts, which is certainly an improvement, and establishes more provisions for the day-to-day management of the trust. It further clarifies the duties of trustees, and there are – well, it certainly does that. The old Trustee Act dealt mainly with trusts established under wills, and certainly as my colleague mentioned, there are far more trusts than those just established under wills. Other examples of trusts are charitable trusts, trusts benefiting people with disabilities or businesses. I think my colleague mentioned the Henson trust. Again, you know, I would also add to what my colleague said. [interjections] If the . . .

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order. I just might remind members that if they have private conversations that they'd like to have for whatever reason, if I'm able to hear them, perhaps the member speaking is as well, and it would be reasonable for us to take those into the lobbies.

The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you. The government has argued – and I hope this is the case, Mr. Speaker – that this new framework will free up court time as it will add more clarity, hence reducing instances where beneficiaries and trustees have to go to court. That would be great. I think my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud sort of underlined the current problem that we're having right now. You know, this is all happening at the same time that there are over 3,000 cases that are beyond the 18-month timeline as established by the Jordan decision, the 18 months referring to the time since charges were laid.

9:30

When I did first get this piece of legislation, yeah, it was a lot to go through and to digest. Again, I am glad that it is being updated, but there were a few things that drew my attention. Because we're in second reading, I'm actually going to talk about something that I didn't really see covered in this but sort of referred to the Public Trustee. For example, on page 36:

- 50(1) If a minor is entitled to trust money or trust securities, a trustee must pay the money to or transfer securities to
- (a) the trustee appointed by court under the Minors' Property Act, or
 - (b) the Public Trustee.
- (2) If an incapacitated person is entitled to trust money or trust securities, a trustee must pay the money to or transfer the securities to
- (a) the attorney acting under the Powers of Attorney Act, or
 - (b) the trustee appointed by court order under the Adult Guardianship and Trustee Act.
- (3) If an attorney or trustee is not appointed for an incapacitated person, then an attorney or trustee must be appointed for payment of the money or transfer of the securities.

That seemed fine. I understood that part.

But then I looked through the legislation for other references to public trustees. It did talk about incapacitated persons, and we all know that there is a need. There are actually thousands of people that are in need of both a public guardian and a public trustee, so as we know, there is the office of the public guardian and trustee in Alberta. They are essential to people, for example, that – a good example is people that are dependent adults or require assistance with decision-making. For example, a public guardian which is not a trustee, but very often they are both, will be involved in decisions, like, around health care, where the person lives, who to associate with, if they can work, where they can work, legal proceedings, of course, employment, all of those things. Very often they have a trustee that can be a private trustee or a public trustee.

I think I read in the most recent annual report for the office of the public guardian and trustee that there was a trend going away from public trustees to private trustees. Now, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that that's a great trend if that's happening. This may be due to the pandemic. I'm not sure. We'll have to wait and see. But that is great because that means that there's somebody in that person's circle, whether it's a friend or a family member, that is able to assist them, and that's always better, to have someone that is knowledgeable about the person and can assist in that way, managing the trust.

But, unfortunately, there are too many cases where a public trustee is required, so I was really hoping to see something a little bit more in this act. Now, perhaps the minister at some point could explain to me. Maybe it was covered, and I didn't understand it. Maybe it was in some of the recommendations that weren't addressed. I'm not sure, but it would be helpful to know. Maybe there's something planned. I'm not sure, but there are some issues around public trustees.

Now, maybe members of this House don't know. I think there is a threshold that a person, like a dependent adult, who would require a public trustee – I think they have to have a minimum of assets of $5,000. Now, as you can imagine, somebody who's on CPPD, which is like a CPP pension with disability or AISH: the chances of them having $5,000 in assets are not great, you know, unless perhaps they've inherited or they've managed to save from a job if they're able to work. That's not the norm, that people have a lot of assets. But if they do, there is a process for them to have a public guardian if they're unable to find a private guardian.

I was hoping that maybe there would be a review of the fees that are charged. Now, you can imagine someone living on AISH, particularly AISH benefits that have been deindexed. For someone living on AISH benefits, you know, even fees, annual fees, of $100 make a difference. Fees, monthly fees, of even $10 are actually going to make a difference, so I was hoping that there would be something there, but there wasn't.

You know, the other thing that I wanted to talk about: there was another piece, and this is also under the office of the public guardian and trustee. I could see that maybe it wouldn't fit into legislation like this, but it would have been nice to see even mention of it, or perhaps there are plans in the future. There is another program. It used to be called – it was, I think, called the AISH or CPPD administration. What that was: it was a trustee that would actually help people – and it was voluntary – manage their money. People that were AISH recipients or CPPD recipients who didn't meet that threshold of $5,000 in assets could actually use this program. Now, it wouldn't manage, let's say, gifts they received or any kind of employment income. It would simply help manage AISH or CPPD monies.

What that would do: it would ensure that primary bills would be paid – for example, rent, utilities, things like that – and would actually help people. As you can imagine, people that are dependent adults, that require assistance with, you know, significant decisions, life decisions, are very often vulnerable to perhaps lending out money they don't have or making bad decisions about credit cards or getting credit cards they shouldn't have or getting phone plans they maybe didn't look through, things like that. So having assistance through a public trustee's office, in this case an informal trustee – and the program is now called the informal benefits administration program. It was actually a terrific program, and it gave some protection, some of the protection that we see outlined in this piece of legislation for people that don't have large trusts, that don't have a lot of assets. It would have been nice to see that, but I did not see that.

The other thing: you know, this legislation talks about conflict of interest and all of those things, and sadly there are many cases where private trustees – there are issues. For example, let's say that it's an extended family member – I'm going to give you a specific example, Mr. Speaker, and this is sort of where I'm coming from with this anecdotal information that I have. Many years ago we were helping to support a fellow – he's no longer with us – but his only source of income would have been AISH and perhaps if he received any kind of gifts or, like, a GST rebate, something like that. So this was not a wealthy man.

He had a pretty significant complex disability, and he had a nephew that had stepped up to be his private trustee. It wasn't required to get a public trustee to manage his nonexistent trust. We saw a pattern. Again, he would show us his bank statement, and we saw this drawing of, let's say, $150 every single month. After all the bills were paid, you know, there would be a little bit of money left over for an AISH recipient. It's not much, but it would be maybe $20 at Subway, $50 here. Every month it was happening, and it was this nephew at the time that was drawing down this money. He didn't have a lot of recourse because there wasn't a formal trust agreement; it was just a private trustee.

Now, there have been some legislative changes made since then, but it was really, really difficult to get anybody to investigate this because it was such a tiny amount of money. Really, this was a trust account, but it was a tiny, little amount of money.

I'm bringing this up because when I looked at the annual report of the office of the public guardian and trustee, they talked about complaints. This was in their annual report. Again, it's 2020-21. Now, I'm not saying that the pandemic hasn't impacted this – I'm quite sure it has – but they only screened a total of 109 complaints and launched 19 investigations. Now, I know investigations are timely and costly, so you want to be careful that you are investigating, you know, complaints that should be investigated. But at that same time period the report states that the office of the public guardian and trustee revisited the criteria, that prompted an investigation and resulted in a significant reduction in investigations in the year of the report, which was 2020-21. For comparison – and I'm not talking about hundreds here, Mr. Speaker. In 2019-20 there were 38 investigations, and then 2020-21, the most recent report, there were 19, so almost half. That's pretty significant. It would be great to hear perhaps: what is the criteria for investigating?

This piece of legislation is quite clear about what the rules are around conflict, around even the expertise of the trustee, yet there are people with trusts that are very small, and that's all they have. They're not large, they're not big inheritances, but I think I would suggest that they're equally important. So maybe this is an area that we could look at.

I'm glad to see that there is a new framework for trusts. It is good to see that the robust process by the Alberta Law Reform Institute is being implemented. I have no doubt that this will help make trust legislation more effective. You know, this is a good thing and perhaps a stable thing going forward and progress given the fact that we've got a lot of instability right now within the justice system. My colleagues have mentioned, you know, a few of those things, actually. In the previous debate on the previous piece of legislation – I think it was Bill 9 – we even mentioned some of the changes that have been made that have caused some instability, I would suggest.

Anyway, a couple of other questions that I think a couple of my colleagues or one of my colleagues may have mentioned, but I'm going to – in case she did not, I'm going to restate it. How much court time is the government estimating this act will save or add? I think that if this legislation, if the government is saying that one of the reasons that this work is being done – and I'm sure there are many reasons, but if one of the reasons is about the time savings, where will that be coming from, and what's the estimate? There must be an estimate. It would be great to know. I think Albertans would like to know, actually.

Who else did the government consult with since the final report of the Alberta Law Reform Institute? That would be helpful. It would also be good to hear the minister talk a little bit more about the recommendations, as I said earlier, that were not implemented. I think that we've all learned in this place that sometimes we focus a little bit on what isn't said because sometimes there's a lot of information there. Maybe this is not the case with this. There are a lot of recommendations that were made. I think there are 90, and if there are 80 that were covered in this legislation, it would be terrific to know what that is.

Let me just think. Hang on, Mr. Speaker. Oh, actually, I will take my seat. Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others on second reading of Bill 12? The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has the call.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak at second reading of Bill 12, the Trustee Act. Certainly, this is a fairly technical and involved piece of legislation, somewhat specialized. Certainly, I recognize it presents a bit of a challenge. There's quite a bit of material here and on a very specialized subject, but I would reflect that it is something that does impact a lot of everyday Albertans. Indeed, this is something that impacts my own family. I have a niece who is on the FAS spectrum, a beautiful young woman, very intelligent, very talented, very artistic, plays the drums, always had a natural knack for rhythm from the time that she was very young, loves to paint.

She's been through the child care program over at MacEwan University, audited the program, has worked for the YWCA here in Edmonton as a volunteer taking care of children, loves that work. But, indeed, she is in a position where some of the challenges that she has means that she is not able to manage her own money and her own finances. Indeed, there's a guardianship arrangement amongst members of my family to help look after her, look after her finances, take care of those aspects of her life and to provide her, then, with the support to be able to do all of the things that she enjoys and indeed make some real contributions to her community, to her church, indeed, to our family.

I think it is incredibly important that we have quality legislation overseeing that, and my understanding is that this is coming forward to modernize the legislation that we have that governs these sorts of trustee relationships, guardian relationships here in the province of Alberta, and certainly I welcome that.

We recognize that there are a lot of different kinds of trusts, so a lot of different ways that this can be set up. We've heard talk about real estate trusts. Indeed, the Member for Calgary-Buffalo spoke a bit about a new kind of trust that was set up during the time we were in government by one of my former colleagues and a friend of mine, Mr. Brian Malkinson, who was the MLA for Calgary-Currie. I know he was very passionate on this issue, Mr. Speaker, having spoken with a large number of folks across the province of Alberta who had family members who were on AISH and indeed were looking for the opportunity to be able to provide for those family members.

He worked to bring forward legislation to establish what is known as a Henson trust in the province of Alberta. It's used to hold an inheritance for the benefit of a handicapped individual which wouldn't affect their eligibility for income support programs like AISH. Alberta, at that time, was the only jurisdiction in Canada that did not allow for that kind of discretionary trust. I know that he worked very hard. He had many consultations with folks across the province of Alberta and then indeed brought forward and was a sponsor on Bill 5, allowing trusts for AISH recipients, a bill that passed, I think, with the support of all members of the Legislature at the time. It enabled that possibility for individuals then who are on AISH, an opportunity for their family, indeed, at times their trustee or guardian, to oversee a fund that would be available to them without affecting their ability to access AISH. That's extremely important, Mr. Speaker.

As we are considering Bill 12, the Trustee Act, it has caused me to reflect that, indeed, there are some real challenges for folks who are on AISH. Certainly, we know that under this government we have seen them make the decision to deindex AISH. That was despite a promise during their election campaign that they would maintain the indexing of AISH for individuals who rely on that. I guess you could say "promise made, promise broken," Mr. Speaker. That was indeed unfortunate. It is important, again, that we are observing how we can best set up these situations to be able to look after folks, particularly when, unfortunately, we have a government that in many respects is certainly not.

You know, in speaking about this bill, the Minister of Justice remarked that outdated trust laws are burdensome for Albertans, trustees, and the legal community. By modernizing these laws, trustees have greater accountability, and it will be simpler to create trusts for Albertans. Certainly, you know, Mr. Speaker, accountability is important. It has certainly been at many times, I think, a weak point for this government, but it is important when we are bringing forward this kind of legislation. Indeed, we want to strengthen accountability for those who are responsible in many respects for the well-being, for the assets of others.

The minister went on to say that these changes will also ensure that trust laws are current and reflect the needs of Albertans. Certainly, that's important to recognize, again, when we are talking about individuals who are reliant on AISH, and indeed, Mr. Speaker, may require having a trustee. Indeed, we know that there have been challenges with that system, certainly, with barriers and a system, I think, under the AISH appeal, in particular, as we saw in a news article today, that is somewhat out of date and in many respects is not working well for individuals in those situations.

Indeed, we know that there have been some changes made, and there were recommendations from the Ombudsman that came forward, some of which the government has committed to following through on. But, certainly, at other points we have seen, for example, the Minister of Community and Social Services has made changes in the appeals regulation that have made it more difficult for individuals. In fact, it is taking away their voice in being able to speak up and make themselves heard when they are appealing their AISH application, saying now that they may not consider any information other than that considered by the director in making the decision that is being appealed. He said that's to make it easier for people to get a result earlier, but frankly it makes it much more difficult.

When we are talking about Bill 12, the Trustee Act, and we're talking about making improvements to the system, I certainly appreciate that that is the direction of this bill, and certainly it seems that, in fact, the government is following through on the majority of the recommendations. But, certainly, it would be my hope that perhaps, more broadly, this government could take that to heart in many other aspects such as in the AISH appeals process.

You know, the Minister of Community and Social Services referred to the appeal procedure as being chaotic, a never-ending loop for finding fairness in judgment. Well, Mr. Speaker, much of that is within his power to correct and fix, and he is choosing not to. Indeed, the government in acting, I guess, in its role somewhat as a trustee over that system – as we are talking about Bill 12, the Trustee Act – is failing in many regards and indeed has made many of these processes far more difficult for people to access, has created far more hardship for the very people that they are responsible for trying to help. I've certainly heard about that clearly at my constituency office, with changes to income supports and accessibility to housing benefits and other portions under that.

Speaking of Bill 12 and the Trustee Act, it's suggested that one of the intents of the bill is to increase transparency, in fact, to reflect that the needs of Albertans are changing. So the proposed model here, that we have, introduced some new provisions to provide additional transparency, improve the administration of trusts by requiring trustees to exercise the care, diligence, and skill of a prudent person. It includes a duty to report to beneficiaries, to be responsive to beneficiary requests. It carries over some pieces of the previous legislation, is my understanding, such as the prudent investor rules, that require a trustee to make investment decisions based on reasonable returns while avoiding undue risk. Certainly, that seems appropriate, Mr. Speaker. That is in line with the recommendations that were brought forward for changes that should be made.

Now, it does cause me to think a bit about this government's own decisions in some respects, again, where it is responsible, particularly in terms of, you know, having taken the Alberta teachers' retirement fund, the special forces pension plan, the local authorities pension plan, the public-sector pension plan and legally requiring them to be managed by AIMCo, taking away choice and jurisdiction from the individuals who have their pensions within those plans, arguing that consolidation would allow for better economy of scale, lower costs overall.

But, frankly, the folks that were invested in those plans did not buy it. Indeed, you know, when we had a bill that came forward to try to increase transparency and to try to increase protection, a bill that was brought forward by the Member for Lethbridge-West, Bill 208, the Alberta Investment Management Corporation Amendment Act, 2020, this government's members voted it down, did not even allow it to come for debate on the floor of the Legislature. So, again, I appreciate that Bill 12 is indeed making some important changes to increase transparency, to ensure, when we are dealing with funds that belong to other people that are being managed on behalf of other people, that there is transparency and a requirement that there be demonstrated good and due diligence, something which we, unfortunately, often do not see from this government in its care of the public tax dollars of the people of Alberta.

Now, the minister, in speaking about this bill, also emphasized that this act would make the process of setting up a trust more efficient and less costly for Albertans. He noted that, in his view, judges will benefit from a reduced caseload because fewer trust-related applications will be brought to court, and dealing with trust cases will be simpler for lawyers. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate that being a valuable thing to do. We recognize that our court system is indeed under a significant amount of pressure. Certainly, COVID-19 and the pandemic amplified that and made it more challenging for us to be able to have cases and made it more challenging for court proceedings to be able to go forward and certainly created more impacts in the system, so finding a way that we can ease the pressure on our court system and at the same time provide other opportunities for people to resolve potential legal issues or, indeed, not even legal issues but simply to set up a trust, to go through the legal mechanisms of getting this established and providing this oversight and this support for Albertans who require a trustee, certainly seems like a reasonable step and an important thing.

One certainly hopes it will be more successful than some of the government's other attempts because, again, as we have seen recently, we know that our court system is under incredible strain. Indeed, just on April 6 we saw the Alberta Crown Attorneys' Association raise very serious concerns about the pressures in the justice system, in their view, accusing this government of what they said was chronic underfunding. Indeed, they said that chronic underfunding, in their words, was creating a crisis in the justice system. They highlighted the significant vacancies for Crown prosecutors, which indeed is, I suppose, a reason to enact pieces like we have here in Bill 12, to help ease the pressure on that system. But, probably, it would be better, Mr. Speaker, if we were actually filling those vacancies.

The association reached a point where they've actually even threatened to strike, Mr. Speaker, as we face over 3,000 cases beyond the 18-month time limit established by the Jordan decision. So there are real concerns. I'm sure the Crown prosecutors would welcome this step to ease pressure on the court system, but certainly they would like to see much more significant action from this government as well.

This will hopefully be more successful than one of this government's other attempts to ease pressure on the court system; that being, charging Albertans a nonrefundable fee of up to about $150 simply to appeal their traffic ticket. We heard a large outcry from many Albertans about this government attempting to make it more difficult for Albertans to simply access justice, have that opportunity to argue their case. It's unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that in so many situations where this government chooses to – is ostensibly trying to streamline the system, they are creating further burden and obstacles for Albertans, much as I spoke about with the changes that they have made to AISH to improve the administrative process, apparently, or income supports or many of these other things, but indeed they are doing that on the backs of Albertans who are struggling and are in need. When they are streamlining the systems, there is a good reason to ask whether they are doing that for the sake of Albertans or whether they are doing that for the sake of the systems, the processes, and the bureaucracy.

I know that we will have much opportunity for continued debate on Bill 12. I know that all members are of course following it with great interest, as I can see. But I'm sure we'll have many members who have the opportunity to address this and probably in more detail and perhaps with a bit more expertise than, admittedly, I'll personally be able to bring to bear. That said, I appreciate the opportunity to add a few thoughts on the record in this debate.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Bill 12 for second reading. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Happy to rise here this evening, add some other thoughts to Bill 12, Trustee Act. Like my friend from St. Albert, I too am not a lawyer, so I think I might be approaching some of my comments here this evening as the critic for Red Tape Reduction. Clearly, I definitely welcome some of the changes that I'm seeing here in Bill 12. I mean, when we're talking about language dating back, you know, a century, it's certainly time to update these things. When I think about, I guess, how long it's taken us to get to this point, I wonder perhaps, maybe why the former Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction didn't take a look at updating some of this. We certainly saw some moves around, for instance, the coal act, which only went back to the '70s, and the government trying to move on that, with a little bit of a narrative around red tape reduction for that. Of course, we know that that didn't exactly work out very well. So I guess I'm kind of surprised that perhaps we didn't tackle this a little bit sooner, looking at red tape.

In essence, when I'm looking here at Bill 12 – I mean, we're taking one act and swapping it out for the other – there is one question that kind of arises in my mind when we're doing that. You know, by this modernization: is it creating any kind of, I guess, red tape pressures? We've certainly seen this government on this quest to reduce red tape; sometimes not to the advantage of Albertans. And the reason I say that is because I think about one of the things that the government changed under the auspices of red tape reduction, and that was around changes to diagnostic imaging. They felt that chiropractors, physiotherapists, audiologists were ordering too many diagnostic imaging orders. Of course, there's been a report, that the college of chiropractors and the college of physiotherapists brought out, showing the negative impacts of that decision.

It's kind of interesting that earlier in the evening, Mr. Speaker, we were talking about the public's right to know and collecting information and being able to disclose that to Albertans so they know what's going on, yet here we are, sitting on a report that very clearly shows the negative impacts of the red tape reduction around diagnostic imaging, causing longer waits for patients to get care from their chiropractors or physiotherapists, and it's even costing the system more. I believe it's somewhere around $4 million more.

So when I'm looking at Bill 12, one of the questions that pops up because of that would be: how much court time is the government estimating that this act change will save or, what's even more important, will add? Hence why I made that reference to the diagnostic imaging, because it's added more time to Albertans being able to get timely care in terms of having to take extra steps to be able to get diagnostic imaging to diagnose their problems, being able to get that information in a timely manner, and then being able to actually get care, which has resulted in more expenses to the health care system, which could have been redirected elsewhere because of that. So, you know, are we actually going to save court time out of this, or is it going to be added? I'm hoping that throughout the discussion on Bill 12 and perhaps maybe even in Committee of the Whole, when we get a chance to kind of go back and forth a little bit, we'll be able to suss through some of that information and perhaps, maybe, not repeat the mistakes that were made around the changes to diagnostic imaging.

Of course, one of the big things that was even brought up earlier – I know my friend from Edmonton-Whitemud had made mention to this – was around funding of the system. We've seen significant cuts to Justice. You know, I'm certainly not saying that government is purposely trying to add more court time with the changes here in Bill 12, but if that is indeed a possibility, even though the changes are needed – as I mentioned in my comments right from the beginning, I mean, we're dealing with language from – what was the date? – something like 1893. We have to get it updated. But if that does indeed create more court time, is the government prepared to fund that in terms of more court space or more prosecutors, whatever the case may be?

We all know that when it comes to trusteeships, sometimes there are some fantastic stories out there with regard to how somebody's estate or affairs are managed, and we've also heard some very serious horror stories as well. I don't think there's one person in the House that hasn't heard both of those situations happening. So if we are going to add additional pressures to the court because of this, are you prepared to fund them? That's the critical piece here. Again referencing back to diagnostic imaging, the whole claim was: let's streamline the system. You know: let's cut waste; let's save money. And it did neither of those. None of that actually happened. Wait times increased, more steps to take, more taxpayer dollars being spent.

You know, perhaps if we had a little bit more public knowledge, information, data available to Albertans, we could find out, maybe, sort of what's going on, for instance, with that change. I mean, we know that anywhere between $10 million and $15 million is being spent on the red tape reduction ministry, and all we really have to show for it is a letter grade. That's how we're measuring that money well spent. It's great that we're getting this letter grade, but, as I said, there are Albertans that are waiting to get care, and they're paying more for it simply because we made a change under the guise of red tape reduction. So when I'm looking at Bill 12, I do have that concern.

With the changes and potentially any regulations that need to be changed, is that going to be measured on that red tape scale? Are there now going to be pressures to try to reduce something else because, you know, the whole need to reduce it by one-third by the end of the term, one in, one out? Even though we need to update the legislation – that is not in dispute here. But if we need to update that legislation, which creates new regulations because of it, are there now going to be pressures to quickly try to cut something else, possibly with negative consequences, just like the negative consequences I mentioned earlier around diagnostic imaging and the negative impacts that have come with it for Albertans?

I know that there were many recommendations that were made, I believe about 90 of them. This bill does encompass about 80 of those recommendations, so I'm really glad to see the great number that were considered within this bill, but I am curious about the other 10. Is that something that can't be done at this time? Is it on the list to get done going forward; you just need more time? It'd be nice to hear back a little bit around some of those things that weren't made.

I know, for instance, I guess to get specific, Mr. Speaker, around recommendation 11, how the institute recommends defining a represented adult and an incapacitated person in the different acts. You know, I understand that sometimes changes in one act can start to influence others, so hopefully we're taking a close look at those, keeping track of that and not missing anything, creating, you know, sort of little complications later on that we're going to have to try to adjust on the fly.

For the most part, like I said, I'm not necessarily opposed to this piece of legislation. It definitely needs to be done. It's just language that's way too outdated. We need to move forward on – hopefully, we'll get a chance to hear from some of the ministers around some of the questions that I have. I certainly would like to hear back on, you know, for instance, what the Alberta Law Reform Institute said about the final report. It's always great to go out, do those consultations, bring those changes forward, but at the end of the day does the act actually reflect what they were expecting to see being brought forward?

We've seen many examples where there have been claims of consultation with Albertans. Kind of that difference I make sometimes, Mr. Speaker, when I say: the difference between consult and consul-tell. Those are definitely not the same thing, and I think it does a very big disservice to Albertans when you're simply just telling them what the legislation should be. I would be interested to hear back on that, too. Again, I understand that here in second reading is not exactly the opportune time to be able to do that, so I'm more expecting to see some of those answers come across through Committee of the Whole.

Again, more or less, I'm willing to support Bill 12, Trustee Act, needing to update legislation that's definitely too old. We need something more modernized going forward. Hopefully, we'll get a chance to discuss any potential shortcomings or any concerns about some of the language moving forward. I look forward to that part of the debate.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would move to adjourn debate.

Bill 11

Continuing Care Act

[Debate adjourned April 19: Ms Phillips speaking]

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to join in the debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs has risen on this fine morning.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this morning to speak to Bill 11, Continuing Care Act. Before I start, I just wanted to express my sincere appreciation for all those working in seniors' care and the incredible hard work that they've been doing during this time. I know it's difficult, and we see you, and we hear you.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk about this piece of legislation that we have before us this morning. I think that there was some hope when we saw the title of this bill, the Continuing Care Act. We felt that there was a real opportunity for this government to really make some impactful changes to a system that they have failed during the pandemic. We saw too many perhaps preventable deaths during COVID; 1,600 continuing care residents tragically passed away from COVID-19. Truly, this tragedy should have been a call to action. This piece of legislation could have been an incredible opportunity for this government to look at the failings and to make some meaningful change to a system that they failed; however, there is absolutely no action in this bill.

We saw all across Canada individuals suffering from this pandemic, specifically when it came to continuing care and the treatment of seniors. We saw information come from the military about some of the horrific experiences that they had while working in continuing care, residents being left in soiled bedding for days. This is not how we should be treating human beings, especially seniors. I heard from so many family members that were pleading for something to happen to make change for their loved ones.

I'm fortunate in the sense that I have my mother, who is retired, living in my home. There's been talk about her wanting some independence and being out of my home and in her own space, but I can honestly tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there is absolutely no way that that would be an option under this government. Seeing how they've treated seniors, seeing how they've completely ignored the calls to action, in good conscience it was not a decision that I could make for my mom to leave my home. Now, I'm fortunate that I have the space and capacity for her to live with me, but not everybody has that.

We see so many devastating stories coming out, and I know that this government hears them because we share them in this House. We're CCed in the e-mails that are going to the Minister of Seniors and Housing, to the Premier, to the Minister of Health pleading for significant change, pleading for action. Now, when it comes to this piece of legislation, many of the things that we hear and that we continue to hear from this government are: don't worry; it'll be dealt with in the regulations; just trust us. Well, I think that it's fair to say that this government has proven time and again that they can't be trusted.

So to simply say, "The work that we're going to do is coming; it'll be in the regulations" is not acceptable. This time in this Chamber is for us to debate the actions that are needed and to be transparent with what the plan is. If you genuinely wanted to make a change and you wanted to analyze and contribute to action regarding the Continuing Care Act, this is the opportunity to do that. This UCP government has failed.

I know one of the things that was heavily discussed through my office was when this government created legislation that took grieving families' rights to seek justice away. There were deaths that happened while their loved ones were in continuing care that they no longer have the right to seek justice for. When that's happening, how can those family members trust this government that they're going to actually do something that is going to have a genuine impact going forward?

Throughout the pandemic there were continuous failures. One of them started with the vaccine rollouts. I had residents calling me. Because of their age they were eligible to receive the vaccination, but their spouse was under that age, so they weren't eligible. That meant that in their home their spouse wasn't allowed to engage in the group activities and the socializing that their loved one was able to do. There was absolutely no consideration for the reality that so many Albertans were facing. It seemed that this government just didn't care. It seemed like there was just no plan. There were arbitrary decisions made all throughout the pandemic that had tragic impacts on residents living in continuing care.

The other piece that I think is important to talk about is the staff that provides care to those individuals. Part of my experience as a social worker, Mr. Speaker, was that I was a staff member that worked in group care. While I worked with youth, I would say that it's similar to working in a continuing care facility because you're working in their home. This is where they reside, so there's a certain level of respect that needs to happen. There's an appreciation that this is their home and that you are essentially a guest, a paid guest, but you are a guest in their home. Your job is to make sure that all of their needs are being fulfilled, that they have the greatest possibility to achieve the life that they want to achieve.

When this government failed staff and was putting them at risk, which, in turn, put the residents at risk, that is a complete and utter failure. We heard from staff that were calling on this government for supports and resources and policy that could help them do their job safely to provide service and care to the residents that they served, and that didn't happen.

This legislation could have been a wonderful opportunity to make some substantial and meaningful changes; however, we don't see that. We don't see staff-to-patient ratios identified. We don't see hours of care identified. We've heard heartbreaking stories of family members calling, wanting to be able to go in and provide the service and care to their loved ones because there just simply weren't staff available to do that.

I have a former staff of mine that is doing her nursing program, and she's doing part of her practicum in a continuing care facility. She would call me at the end of the shift, devastated, crying, because her entire day was spent trying to prioritize the minimal amount of care that she could provide because of staff shortages. Now, the facility where she was at had an advantage because they had students there, and with the extra students that were in this facility, they still weren't able to meet the basic needs. Most of their day was spent showering and bathing residents, not being able to interact and do some of the positive things that the residents wanted to do.

When that's the kind of treatment that we have in this province, there is a huge failure, and I know this government is aware of it. This piece of legislation, while saying that it's doing something, actually isn't doing the call to action that's required to actually do the bare minimum to support seniors in this province.

When it comes to the health care of seniors and the health care in this province, there are some significant concerns when it comes to their ability to access health care. When we see decisions being made by this government to move towards privatization of health care, there are some devastating impacts on seniors. When we look at their ability to access dialysis, if you live in rural Alberta, there are some significant impacts that are going to delay your quality of life. There are life-changing treatments that should be available to every Albertan regardless of where you live. Our seniors are being impacted, and it's absolutely not okay.

We as government had an independent office of the Seniors Advocate that provided independent accountability. It was an opportunity for caregivers or the seniors themselves to call and raise concerns. Well, this government took that away, so what happens is that we have seniors and their loved ones calling their MLA to plead for supports and resources. This could have been a wonderful opportunity in Bill 11 to talk about some of that stuff, to actually make changes, to put back in place what Albertans are asking for, accountability for seniors' care, and that's not happening. We have zero accountability for the care of our seniors in this province.

I know that when I talk to seniors, they're feeling that they're being ignored. When we have a Premier that talks about age and implying that the age range in which seniors are dying because of COVID, that they had lived a long, good life – that is absolutely unacceptable. We see a government saying: "Here's a piece of legislation that we're going to bring forward, and it's going to do the things that we know we should do. It's not actually in this legislation. It's going to come in regulation." Nobody believes that, Mr. Speaker. Nobody believes that their call to action is actually going to be doing something that is creating more accountability in continuing care.

We have seen previous legislation do things like removing the ability for grieving families who feel that their loved ones were wronged to seek justice. So when that kind of legislation comes before this, what is there to trust? We've seen the intentions of this government, and they're not to do the right thing. The right thing would be to provide some concrete action that has been called upon by so many in this province to make sure that those that are living in continuing care are receiving a high quality of life, safe living accommodations, that the staff that provide service and work in those care facilities are safe when they do it, that they have the right ratios for staff to seniors. I think that this could have been a wonderful opportunity to provide some of that clarity and some of that concrete action. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that through this debate we might see some opportunity for some amendments to be accepted.

With that, I will take my seat, and I encourage all members to engage robustly in this debate. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for her comments around Bill 11 and, obviously, comments on reflection, I think, in terms of what we have just been through, one of the toughest, most challenging periods, I think, in the world's history and certainly in Alberta's history and most certainly for our seniors and our most vulnerable, this pandemic through this period.

Mr. Speaker, I first wanted to start out by just saying that I was very honoured and very proud to be able to chair the facility-based continuing care review, which was a really deep look into the seniors care system in Alberta and with reflection of what's happening not only across Canada but around the world. We had an incredible group of skilled experts on that panel that looked at that. We spoke to over a hundred individual groups, organizations that were represented and had very deep consultation with them. We had hundreds, even thousands, of consultations from individuals, from caregivers, from employees, from family members, from residents themselves, that helped to inform that review, which has been very instrumental in the development of Bill 11 and the changes, the update, the renewal, and the evolution of legislation, some of which has not been touched for close to 30 years.

Mr. Speaker, I just attended last week the ASCHA conference and had a chance there to connect with many of those responsible for delivering care to our seniors. There was a sense of hope and elation, I guess, that we are at least through some stages of this pandemic and that we are moving more to some normalcy, but of course I also sensed some concern from them. They've learned so much in the past two years. They've brought that information back to government. They've pushed that information through their own sector and shared information more broadly than I've ever, ever seen within any sector within Alberta.

Attending that was a great opportunity to sit down with those people and to see, again, what they've been through, what they've learned, what they're applying today and the concerns that they have as we face perhaps some additional challenges with COVID as we move forward. But they feel a bit empowered now that they've learned so much, made mistakes, and certainly had an opportunity to learn from those mistakes and to bring that information back to us so that we can work with them.

Mr. Speaker, I was blessed, I think honoured, in the early stages, probably for almost the first year, to do weekly calls with all the major associations across this province and to hear their concerns and their challenges that they were facing and the unknown as they moved towards the unknown. Something that we thought would maybe only be a challenge for us for a few weeks or a few months became a year and then two years.

I had an opportunity to hear from them and to hear the stress and the fear that they had, the fear that they had for the health and the well-being of their residents, Mr. Speaker. I felt that that compassion and that care was there. This is from the operators, from the staff, from the representatives. They were fighting hard to make sure that they had what they needed.

I was quite encouraged, Mr. Speaker, to hear from all those organizations that the health and well-being of their residents and people under their care was of the utmost importance, that they were doing what they needed to do. They were looking for support from government, and gratefully we were able to provide that not just to those contracted services but through a lot of looking back and forth and ensuring that we were caring for all seniors in Alberta irrespective of who owned the facility or who managed the facility or who paid for the accommodations that they were in, that they received the supports that they needed.

That was successful, Mr. Speaker. We were there to help them. We were there to help ensure that they had the PPEs that they needed, that they had the care that they needed, that they had the staffing levels that they needed, that they had the HZAs, and we worked with Labour and Immigration and various other regulatory bodies to ensure that we could move people through the responsibilities that they have and to ensure that we could empower people and provide the staffing required to care for those individuals in a time of very, very dire need.

I have to say that I saw some of the most incredible collaboration through that period. I went for weekly calls, and then it was twice a month, and then it was monthly, and then things flared up again and we went back to having them every two weeks. I continue to have some of those informal calls with those individuals. But what I was really impressed with, that continues to this day, are weekly calls with all of the major associations and representatives from various groups, resident groups and others, with members of our Ministry of Health and with Alberta Health Services, gathering feedback, sharing information, collaborating, talking about challenges that they were facing or challenges that they were anticipating.

Mr. Speaker, it was incredible. That continues to this day, and there are some people within Alberta Health and, again, Alberta Health Services who have gone the extra mile and listened intently and come back sometimes saying: you know, we don't have the answer to that, but we're going to get that answer for you. I'm not going to mention any names here, but there are some incredible people we have within the staff of Alberta Health and Alberta Health Services that have been there every step of the way in caring for Alberta's seniors. That, to me, was one of the most heartening things that I've seen and certainly one of the best examples of collaboration between government and any sector that I've ever seen within this province.

Was it perfect? No, it wasn't. We were all learning every step of the way, following the leadership of our medical experts. Were we listening? Yes. There was a constant feedback loop and a constant opportunity and a constant commitment to getting back to people so that they could make those decisions that they needed to do to care for their residents in the best way they knew how. Was it responsive? Yes, it was. Sometimes to the point where the people that were caring for those individuals were put in very difficult positions.

There were, obviously, differences of opinion with family members, even sometimes with the residents, but for the most part the residents said: "No; we want to be cared for. We want to be protected." But that wasn't always easy because we interface – those seniors' facilities, as I was reminded throughout the pandemic: not only are they an interface, not only are they a place where we care and where our seniors reside, the most vulnerable of our society through this pandemic reside, but it's also a place where you don't escape the community. You're part of the community, and what goes on outside in the broader community also comes into those buildings unless we put in special and extra protections, in which case we were able to deliver that.

And, yes, there were people who got COVID and there were people who died in our most vulnerable population through no fault of anyone other than the fact that we were facing a global pandemic. Was there constant feedback? Absolutely, there was. I was privy to that, and actually – right? – even to this day they do their weekly calls. Tuesday mornings at 8 o'clock. I listen in, and occasionally I'll pipe in and just say a sincere thank you to those people for their compassion and their care, their dedication, and, yes, the stress that they face through this. Trust me; in hearing their voices, it was evident that they were going through very difficult times. And, yes, there were staffing challenges. Everybody is facing staffing challenges. In today's world it looks like workforce challenges are going to be a challenge in almost every industry, so the seniors care sector is no different.

But what are we trying to do with this new legislation, Mr. Speaker, Bill 11? Well, those things that we highlighted in the facility-based continuing care review are embodied in this and really refocusing our seniors care sector. We talk more about quality of life as well as quality of care. It's not just about quality of care. It's not just a measurement. It's not just the metrics and the objective view of it, but there's a subjective side of this, which is the quality of life that we're delivering to our seniors. We've committed to ending the ward rooms, to getting rid of what's sort of euphemistically called divorce by nursing home, that couples can stay together as they age even though they may have different levels of care that they have to address.

It's a commitment to innovation and using technology. New technology will be a huge boon to how we care for our seniors in place, in community. Aging in place, aging in community: I always like aging in community better because it might be some new forms of housing. I've talked to the seniors sector. There's lots of innovation already going on in terms of building form, updating our facilities.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that my own father-in-law, when he was first moved from assisted living into hospital and then into long-term care, the first building he moved into: the bathroom doors wouldn't accommodate the width of a wheelchair. We need to refresh that. We need to empower our sector to move forward with innovation, new building forms, and refreshing the stock of housing and care facilities that we have. This legislation, Bill 11, will help to empower that.

A commitment to keeping our seniors in their homes, increasing home care funding to allow that, to allow us to transition so that we don't have to build bricks and mortar for everyone. They can keep in their homes, in their communities that they've lived in for years and years. They can still visit their local baker and hairdresser and things like that, that keep them connected to the community and to keep them focused on living a good and healthy life. Many people, Mr. Speaker, don't have the supports of family around them, so we need to make sure that the community and our services that we provide from a government perspective will support them in living those long and healthy lives.

Mr. Speaker, we've had a commitment to modernization, system modernization, and a focus on outcomes within the seniors care sector that is going to support, again, this evolution of a sector to empower it. The member opposite referenced that it's not all in the legislation. Guess what. It's because we need to make sure that this legislation will endure and be flexible for the coming 10 or 20 years. In fact, the current legislation that was in place before this: some of the terminology didn't even match the sector that it was set out to be responsible for.

As much as anything I am very, very convinced and very, very confident that the minister responsible, the Minister of Health, is not only deeply committed to this evolution, but he's compassionately committed to this evolution of this legislation to ensure that he empowers his people in the ministry and those organizations that they work with, Alberta Health Services and the entire continuing care sector, that they're empowered to focus on outcomes, Mr. Speaker, to focus not just on the metrics of, "You have to have this many hours of this and this many hours of care from this kind of health care professional” but to focus on the outcomes so that we can allow that flexibility within this sector to utilize doctors and nurse practitioners and registered nurses and LPNs and HCAs so that they can have a full scope of practice to take care of our seniors in the best way that we can, following the outcomes to ensure that we can deliver quality of life, not just quality of care, and that we can work together with our various sectors in supportive living and in long-term care to ensure that there is a continuum of care without displacement, sometimes maybe without even having to move, that we just up the level of care within a facility.

Those moves are very, very challenging, Mr. Speaker, on those seniors. If you talk to anybody who’s gone through that with family members, it’s that displacement, it’s that moving, it’s that change of routine that often is a catalyst, unfortunately, for something that is not a positive outcome for those individuals in terms of them adjusting to a new facility or a new routine. If we can deliver that, if we can empower the system to do that, that, to me, is where we should be focused.

When I hear criticism from the members opposite, Mr. Speaker, it gives me concern that we’re not all working together to focus on the opportunities here to take care of those people who are our most valued individuals in this province, our seniors, who have built the foundations of the province we live in.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to say that I will be supporting Bill 11. I encourage everyone in this House to support Bill 11 through to final reading. With that, I certainly would encourage anyone to speak in favour and to share their own experiences with respect to the seniors care sector and to long-term care and to this legislation, which I believe is a great step forward for the future of Alberta.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It’s an honour to rise and speak to this bill this morning. I appreciate the comments from the member opposite in regard to his involvement in this piece of legislation and the work that he has done in regard to trying to speak to stakeholders and speaking to different members that have been engaged within the continuing care space. Now, I was listening to some of the comments that he made in regard to the direction that the government wants to take. I appreciate that within legislation, of course, we don’t want to legislate everything. There is room for, obviously, the creation of regulation. But I think something that we need to acknowledge and look at is that we have learned and we have observed over the last few years that there is a need to re-evaluate, to support, and to ensure that there’s appropriate funding for our continuing care services.

I appreciate that the member opposite was speaking about the need for an expansion of home care, and I agree. I believe that if we can ensure that seniors have the ability to stay at home, to be with their spouses, family members, with the care supports that they need, that would be the best scenario that we could possibly offer. I think the major concern for me, the main concern, is the fact that we have a discrepancy within the quality of care within the continuing care space. People who have the financial means to have good quality of care, who can pay for higher accommodation, who can pay for those services, have an ability to have the supports at a higher level of care than those that do not have those financial means, and I think that that is a real concern when we look at how we evaluate quality of care.

As the member opposite said, that should be what it is about. It is about the quality of care that we are supporting our seniors to have. Yet you go into some long-term care facilities – and I’ve been in many – and you see some seniors sitting in wheelchairs in spaces where there’s no stimulation, there’s no staff; they’re just housed in a space in a room. I go to other continuing care facilities where there are dining halls and there are pool tables and there are cafés and there are all of these amazing environments, like, stimulating communal spaces where seniors are able to have that interaction with each other, to have that social connection, really the fundamental pieces that keep us healthy and connected to our neighbours and our society and that we know are best for mental health and keeping people healthy.

I appreciate that the government will say: well, we’re going to put some of this in regulation. My caution and my concern is that I don’t see a commitment from the government, nor have I really heard a commitment from the government around ensuring that the quality of care is consistent for all seniors accessing whatever level of service there is through the spectrum of supports. Home care is extremely difficult to access for many seniors. Being able to get those supports, that multidisciplinary team in place takes a long time. And if you don’t have a family advocate who understands the system, who makes the calls, who sometimes calls the MLA – I do get these calls – there is a concern that seniors won’t get the support that they need. The fact that seniors have to fight within the system to be able to access the medical needs and the supports that they need to either stay in their residence or to even have continued care within the supportive living facilities is a problem. It’s a problem that I don’t necessarily see being addressed within this legislation.

I see a lot of legislation being brought together to talk about what would be a collaborative approach, yet what we know is that – and as the member opposite spoke to, there was a review that was done. That review was completed in April of 2021, so actually exactly a year ago, and it was made public in May 2021, so we’ll give two more weeks and then a year ago. Now, there were 11 policy directions that were included, with 42 recommendations. The previous Health minister made a commitment that there was going to be an action plan created and that that action plan would help to guide the services that were going to be provided within these different programs. It’s been a year. A year. We haven’t seen an action plan, Mr. Speaker. We haven’t seen this government, who stands in this House, introduces a piece of legislation to speak to what the review is supposed to talk about, that was supposed to address the review that was done a year ago – we don’t see the action plan, yet we see a piece of legislation.

Again, as we see this government do repeatedly, they put the cart before the horse. We don’t have the clear direction. We don’t have the clear plan, but we have a piece of legislation the government would like us to trust them on and just vote on and be like: this is how it should be done. It’s very consistent. The government wants everybody to just trust them, say yes to everything, and then if you question everything, you’re not actually being a collaborator. You’re not actually working with the government. Oh, shame on anybody who actually challenges anything that we ask, because we should just all work together. Well, we can work together if we’re given all the information and if there’s a clear plan to move forward to work together on.

Asking questions and trying to clarify information from the government is not actually working against them. It’s not trying to not be a collaborator. It’s just clarifying information and bringing up concerns, and the concerns here are that this is a piece of legislation that collaborates a whole bunch of other pieces of legislation, where there’s no clear transparency from this government about what the future will look like. “Just trust us. We’re going to put it in regulation. Don’t worry about it. Just pass this bill, and away we go.” Where’s the action plan? Where is the information that a year ago the minister committed to providing to this Chamber, providing to Albertans to let them know that this is what we are actually going to do? It’s not here. A piece of information that directly relates to this legislation is missing.

Unfortunately, I can’t trust the government when it comes to this space because I know of the inconsistency. I know that this government is very keen on privatization of our health care. I know this government would like to move to trying to have more fees for services within the health care system. Seniors care is a prime example of if you can pay, your quality of care is substantially greater than if you cannot. There is a difference, a substantial difference in the equality and the equity in care.

Now, I also have concerns with the fact that I haven’t actually seen anything addressed in this piece of legislation that has acknowledged what seniors have gone through during the last two and a half years and the learnings that have come out of that. I don’t see this government taking it seriously when it comes to supporting seniors, because I don’t see the Seniors Advocate being put back in place.

Again, as I’ve said, I get phone calls often from family members who are trying to support their parents either to access home care, sometimes access different facilities, whether it be hospitals or, you know, rehab services, adaptations to their homes, those sorts of supports, where they are continuously facing barriers. I had a constituent in my riding who was in an apartment by herself, who had severe dementia, three children that would visit her every day to try to make sure she was okay, didn’t have the capacity to move her into their homes. I had to advocate for months to even get home care to start going in there to visit her. Within a very short period of time it was deemed that she couldn’t live on her own anymore because her mental health and her dementia had become so severe that she was actually a risk to herself.

It took an additional six months past that to get her into a facility, into a supportive facility. She actually ended up in hospital for a while because that was the only place that she could go because there was no space for her available within the city. Again, I’m north side. The options that were provided to this family were south side, a 45-minute commute to go visit their mother in a facility because that was the only space available, and it was still a hospital setting for a very long period of time.

Again, the only reason that their mother was able to actually even get into a hospital facility to start was given the fact that they called my office and we started advocating. If they didn’t know to call their MLA, if this woman didn’t have adult children who cared or were available or understood that there were mechanisms to advocate within, she would’ve still been in that apartment setting. There is a gap there. It shouldn’t take, to be clear, three adult siblings to have to advocate to be able to do that. It took all three of them. One was doing an advocacy over here, one was advocating in a different system, one was advocating in a different system until we finally got all three of them to advocate all together, to all systems at the same time.

I appreciate that the government thinks that by consolidating pieces of legislation, it’s going to fix the problem, but it’s not. When I don’t see clearly from the government where their plan is and what the plan is going to look like and how it’s going to be equitable access for all seniors and it’s not going to be based on if you can pay or if you can’t pay and that the quality of care is going to substantially increase across all service levels, I have a hard time understanding why we have this piece of legislation in front of us today. If the action plan had been presented and had been made available and we could see that these are the actionable items that the government is committing to, “This is how it relates to this piece of legislation that we’ve introduced into the Chamber, that gives Albertans the confidence to understand that by passing this piece of legislation things are going to get better,” I think there would be a different conversation happening in the Chamber. But there is information that is fundamentally missing.

Again, I’m not trying to dispute that they did a review, that the government did a review. What I’m asking for is: how come a year later we’re still waiting for the government to show what they’re going to do with the review? It’s really slow. The recommendations are there. So if the recommendations were provided a year ago to the government, how come it’s taken so long to create a report, and why do we have this legislation in front of us today without it?

I don’t think Albertans have faith in this government when it comes to long-term care and to health care. They fundamentally don’t. We see a shift, and we see a defunding of staffing, and we see conflicts within the bargaining process, and we see our health care professionals leaving the profession because of those conflicts. So until the government can come back to Albertans and say, “We want to have a better relationship with you as health care workers; we want to support you; we want to ensure that you are paid fairly and that the supports that you need to do your job are available to you to do that,” this legislation is not going to fix long-term care. We need the people, we need the resources, and we need to be able to ensure they can deliver that service and feel good about the service that they’re delivering. Without it, this legislation doesn’t mean anything.

I really would encourage the government to release the action plan, to show Albertans what they plan on doing, and ensure that they’re supporting our health care professionals by paying them fairly, by not fighting with them. That will be the beginning of fixing the long-term care issue in this province.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate an opportunity to speak on Bill 11 here this morning. It’s something that all of us, I think, have a responsibility to not just reflect on but act on in regard to continuing care here in the province of Alberta. We know that right across this country and indeed in so many jurisdictions around the world continuing care centres, or some version of that, were the single most lethal place to be during COVID over the last couple of years. Indeed, some of the scenes that we saw in Quebec, for example, and in southern Ontario and to some degree here as well are not just unfortunate tragedies but, I believe, a call to action for all of us to ensure that seniors are in a safe and secure and healthy place in various forms of continuing care.

Indeed, we know that more than 1,600 and counting residents in continuing care died of COVID over the last couple of years. You know, if we tried to contextualize that number with any other tragedy or mass loss of life, I mean, indeed this is a historic tragedy for Albertans. What we don’t see, though, is both a commensurate call to action and definable improvements that we could make so this kind of thing doesn’t happen again, right? We know that you can learn from very difficult circumstances like this and know that the loss of more than 1,600 seniors is unconscionable if we know that we could improve the circumstances in which they live and make that a safer place to be.

For example, I know that – well, we all know – COVID was travelling through populations between facilities here in Alberta and elsewhere, largely because while we did have shutdowns in all seniors' facilities, really, the workers were travelling between facilities, because, of course, many continuing care workers trying to make ends meet were compelled to work multiple jobs in multiple facilities. I think that that was curtailed for a time, but then we're back to doing that again here in the province, right? It's like we tried to mitigate that for an emergency, and now somehow, you know, we've gone back to our old ways where people are working in multiple facilities.

You know what, Mr. Speaker? Some people through sort of denial would think, "Oh, well, we're past that emergency stage," but we don't know that, right? We know that we don't have as much COVID data by which to analyze the situation right now. We can only look, really, to hospitalizations and, you know, severe outcomes and fatalities, but this is an evolving thing. We must presume that we might deal with this kind of emergency again in continuing care, in our facilities, and quite frankly it's our job right here in this House to do something about it.

So I appreciated the tone of the hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek in regard to, I think, quite sincerely emphasizing that we do need to do something, right? My question – and I need to know this – is: is Bill 11 what we need to do? You know, I have more questions than affirmations for this bill at this point. Like, maybe that's why we have three readings, I guess, of any given bill, but this one has a particular gravity attached to it because, of course, as I said before, in the last couple of years we had more than 1,600 people die in our continuing care facilities just from the pandemic alone.

The first question, amongst several that I have, Mr. Speaker, around Bill 11 is, you know: why is this UCP government not acting in its entirety from the recommendations of the facility-based continuing care review, right? There were several things that stood out in regard to this review that it seemed self-evident that we needed to do something about and do something about straight away.

Maybe I'm reading this bill – maybe I'm not catching the detail, but I mean are we in Bill 11 increasing the amount of home care being provided to people in Alberta, and how are we doing that? We know that having capacity in home care requires staffing and requires expertise, and it requires a long-term, stable commitment from the provincial government. So I'm just wondering if and how and are we, in fact, doing that, and is it somehow attached to this Bill 11?

The second question that I will ask in regard to the recommendations of the facility-based continuing care review is that it became obvious that the working conditions for continuing care staff need to be addressed immediately, right? Like I said before, lots of continuing care staff are compelled to hold down multiple jobs in multiple facilities in order to make ends meet, and that's just one indicator, I think, of a problem around working conditions or hours being available and the adequacy of pay or lack thereof for continuing care staff. Of course, this came back to be a painfully obvious fault line in our continuing care system here in Alberta because we could see that the transmission of COVID was aided and abetted by the staff working in multiple facilities. While we had any given place locked down, staff were entering through that lockdown, and you know then COVID continued to spread.

The other recommendation from the facility-based continuing care review that just I was wondering, you know, about – and again it's to do with staff – is to make and compel more of these jobs to be full-time so that, again, that same scenario that I just described, that we all saw unfold, would be mitigated somehow, right? If people could in fact have full-time options in a given facility, then they could dedicate themselves more to that place, and you have a better relationship with the residents of a continuing care facility if you have full-time staff that are there to get to know people and so forth.

Yeah. Those are some of the questions that I have, you know, and quite frankly I think that what we could do to help to hash these things out is to perhaps follow the amendment that I have here to offer this morning. If I could to drop that to . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. If you want to just pass that to the pages. Once I have a copy here, I'll ask you to proceed.

Hon. members, this amendment will be referred to as REF1.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West to proceed. You have six minutes remaining.

Mr. Eggen: Okay. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As everyone can see, this is a referral motion to refer Bill 11 to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2. I believe that this is a substantive and reasonable request, and the reason, the main one, I have is that, you know, I see quite a lot of consolidation of existing legislation in Bill 11. It's almost like you're setting the stage for doing something more substantive, but I think that we need to flesh out what, in fact, those further actions should be, right?

While it looks like, you know, Bill 11 consolidates, like, the Nursing Homes Act, the Hospitals Act, the Supportive Living Accommodation Licensing Act, co-ordinated home and community care legislation, so pulling some of this together, Mr. Speaker, it seems that the most substantial aspects of care, especially standards, like I said from the onset of my comments – right? – the standards that can literally save lives and create a quality of life for people and to protect from emergencies such as a pandemic, all come through regulation.

I mean, I know that we don't necessarily, you know, unroll, roll out regulations here, but we set the standard by which the staff in the Department of Health and Alberta Health and so forth – we set an expectation here in this Chamber of what those regulations should do, right? So in the absence of clear direction with Bill 11 as it stands – again, you can show me where it does do these things, but I don't think it does – setting standards around fees, staffing, and so forth, then I think it's incumbent upon us to take some time to, in fact, debate those things.

You know, continuing care, Mr. Speaker, sort of straddles the public and private system. You see nonprofits running continuing care facilities, which is fine – right? – and it's good. You have fully private facilities as well and then public and community-owned ones from the city or from the province or the town or municipality. That's all fine. I mean, this is the evolution of continuing care. But what we do need to do is make sure that there are standards that are right across the whole spectrum of the delivery of continuing care here in the province. I don't see that right now.

My concern, of course, partially is that as you see different elements break off – for people to, if they have more money, be able to pay for, you know, a better level of care and accommodation, well, that's one thing. I mean, certainly, you wouldn't begrudge someone to look for the best level of care for themselves and for their families and loved ones, especially when you're a senior. You want that to happen. But, again, this is a health issue, and we need to make sure that we're not leaving behind a whole other sector of the population with a lower standard or the absence of a standard.

I think that we saw those gaps just demonstrated as a natural chasm – right? – with COVID because, you know, again, it just really showed how if there's an absence of a standard or if there are different standards based on the ability for someone to pay, then it literally puts lives at risk and not just the people who can't afford it and have to stay in a place that's cheaper but for everybody. Of course, COVID showed that it doesn't recognize different amounts of money you have in your pocket and so forth. If you have a pandemic, then things spread from one thing to another, and we're all affected as a result.

So, again, I think my amendment here this morning is reasonable. I hope that, you know, we can hear about how people feel about that, and I expect that we will have a robust debate in that regard.

Thanks a lot, Mr. Speaker. I will cede the floor the next speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on amendment REF1 the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview is on his feet.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak in favour of this referral motion put forward before the House here by my colleague the Member for Edmonton-North West. I, too, have a number of questions on this bill.

[Mr. Reid in the chair]

I will say, Mr. Speaker, that there was quite a robust debate on this very bill yesterday afternoon, in which, you know, it was great to see the Minister of Health engaging with the members of the opposition, engaging early on in second reading, answering some questions that we have.

10:00

Now, you know, I'll state at the onset, Mr. Speaker, that I am in favour of some elements of this bill. First and foremost, the consolidation of what seems to be more than a handful of different pieces of legislation that all govern our different types of seniors' housing, our different structures that have been scattered throughout a myriad of legislation, is a positive step that will make it much more efficient. To put this into context, you know, the Minister of Health explained that previously, or before this bill passes through third reading, if a couple are in a facility that has different types of units, if they need to progress from, say, independent to supportive living – no. I'm going to mess up this example because I was going to say they have to move units, but it was an example where it seemed silly to force a couple to change units in the same building if they're receiving the same type of care. By consolidating, this will address that issue, and that is positive.

I appreciate as well that the current government is building more beds. We know that we have a chronic shortage of beds, Mr. Speaker. This is largely due to the fact that for many, many years previous governments did not act swiftly and build an adequate number of new beds for the aging population. Under our government we built 2,000 new beds. I know yesterday the Minister of Health indicated that the current government is on track to build 1,500 new beds, which is all positive.

Some of the issues that we have, you know – I think part of the reason you're going to hear from my colleagues as to why we support this referral is because this bill was a real opportunity to enhance the quality of care that our seniors are getting, and currently, the way the bill is written, it's not addressing some of those fundamental issues that we would have an opportunity to address.

Now, I know that my colleague the Member for Edmonton-North West did go through some of the recommendations from the facility-based continuing care review that took place last year. So very timely, Mr. Speaker. This is part of the reason why the Official Opposition were hopeful that this type of bill would have additional tools or additional supports for our seniors and then, quite frankly, as well, you know, supports for the very people who take care of our loved ones, that play such a critical role in the quality of life that our seniors either experience or the challenges that they face.

You know, Mr. Speaker, the other part that's disappointing in this bill is that we've had a great deal of learnings over the past couple of years. Now, it's come at a cost. It's extremely sad to know that we lost over 1,600 Albertans in our continuing care facilities during the COVID pandemic. That tragedy should be a call to action. You know, again, the Minister of Health had said: well, we're going to go out and consult and we'll come up with a plan. The reality is that we have already an adequate number of studies and reports. It's time for action. We've looked at the causes of some of those losses of 1,600 Albertans, and this bill, in its current iteration, doesn't increase the amount of home care. It doesn't increase the number of hours that residents could receive or should receive or increase the proportion of full-time staff.

You know, Mr. Speaker, my colleagues have very articulately expressed and laid out the challenge that many workers in our continuing care facilities face, and that is a patchwork of part-time hours, where they're scattered between a number of facilities, that they aren't being adequately taken care of, which will directly impact the quality of care that they're able to give to our loved ones. There was an opportunity in this bill to address some of those things.

Now, we know that, again, the government has claimed: well, the details of this bill and potential additional supports will come through regulations. You know, the opportunity to fix the issue regarding staffing hours can come through regulations, but the challenge with that, Mr. Speaker, is that regulations are drafted and decided upon behind closed doors, by cabinet, and they can be changed. They can be changed on a whim. They can be changed on a moment's notice whereas, you know, including it in legislation ensures that, one, there is robust debate not only in this Chamber but that Albertans have the ability and the opportunity to look at the proposed changes and to weigh in on them as opposed to reading about them on a Friday when they have already been done and decided. And it would enhance this legislation, which is another reason that I am speaking in favour of this referral motion.

You know, there are a number of changes that this current government has made previously, you know, which really call the government's judgment into question. I mean, we've recently seen the firing of AHS's CEO, you know, Dr. Yiu, who's done an incredible job trying to navigate Alberta and Albertans through an unrelenting pandemic, unrelenting in part because of failed actions of this current government to act decisively and swiftly at a number of different moments over the past two years.

You know, I believe it was last year, Mr. Speaker, that, again, the government brought through a bill in this Chamber removing the ability for grieving families to seek justice. You know, when a loved one is lost and it is due – and there is a process, but if it is determined that it was due to neglect on behalf of the facility or the care providers, there should be recourse for grieving families, and the government brought forward a bill to remove that.

You know, the government has also refused to create an independent office of a Seniors Advocate even though that is a recommendation that has come up time and time again, but this government has chosen to ignore it.

One of the questions that I have, Mr. Speaker – and I'm hopeful that there will be a robust debate in this Chamber. I think, quite frankly, if members chose to support this referral so that we can have these conversations, we can bring stakeholders in front of the committee and really work together to try to strengthen this bill so that we are not just consolidating legislation into one place but also looking at how we can provide additional supports for our seniors, our most vulnerable, and how we can also support the very front-line workers who provide that care and then, of course, the facilities that take care of them.

I'm curious to know why the government has not acted on the recommendations from that facility-based continuing care review. Again, the minister has stated that they will look, the government will look at those recommendations in the coming year, but the question that I have is the fact that this report came to government about a year ago. I think it was released about 10 or 11 months ago, and there has been no action taken. The government claims that, you know, these losses of life are a call to action, but the only action that we have is a consolidation of a number of different pieces of legislation into one. Now, as I stated at the onset, I support that, but our seniors deserve much better than merely an administrative bill that brings different sections of different acts together.

I'm curious if the government is interested in creating an independent Seniors Advocate. I know, Mr. Speaker, and I'm not sure how familiar you are with this review, but the review does mention or state that close to 6,000 more staff need to be hired in order to bring the level of care up to a standard that Albertans deserve, quite frankly. I'm curious to know where the government is on that, on making progress regarding hiring up.

I have questions around, you know, the different aspects of care on staffing and fees and standards. Again, the bill really points to regulations that will look at setting those fees or standards. Again, the challenge that I have is that the answer that we continue to get from this government is: "Trust us. It'll be in regulations." The reality is that few Albertans trust this current government on a number of issues, and – you know what, Mr. Speaker? – it's with good reason that this government has lost the trust of Albertans.

You just look at, you know, the actions of this Premier. You look at the actions of this government. I've lost trust in this government and won't take them at their word. Again, that's why there's an opportunity to put this in black and white, to put it into this piece of legislation, as opposed to waiting on regulations that will come. I mean, the other challenge, Mr. Speaker, is that we don't know when said regulations will even come into existence. You know, I mean, this bill has to go through its three stages and then it has to be proclaimed and then cabinet has to get around to regulations.

The other challenge, quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, is that this government is doing everything but governing. They are so distracted with their own internal politics, their party business, their leadership review that nobody is behind the wheel.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? I see the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the opportunity to speak to this referral amendment, which, I would like to say right off the bat, I think is very much misplaced given the amount of time and energy that's been put into Bill 11 by the minister, by so many people in his department. This has not been an overnight thing. This has been ongoing for years and years, since the mid-2000s; 2008, I think, was some early attempts to do this evolution of the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, in fact, I'm reflecting back, and I hear the talk of us not doing anything with respect for many, many years until the government of the member opposite was in place. I reflect back on the 2,000 units that keep being referenced, and then I have to have a little bit of a chuckle to myself because I recall that that ASLI program was actually put in place, which provided most of those spaces and funded most of those spaces, before their government was in place. In fact, it wasn't 2,000; 2,671, I think, was the number – I was trying to find the reference to that – so there was actually a reduction from the original ASLI. There were many people – in fact, I refer back to a question I asked to the then minister back in October about what was happening with the 2,600 Alberta seniors' units and why are 2,600 Alberta seniors continuing to be at risk due to continued NDP funding delays and that they had put it on hold and that there were people that were on that ASLI list who hadn't heard the status of their funding. Didn't know, in fact, were told that – let's see. I'm taking a look through the media. They were told that pending a review by that government of the day, which allowed us to miss an entire construction season.

I reflect back on that, and I look back on some further documentation which referenced a lot of initiatives going on before that. In fact, I've got a full list of all of the seniors' facilities, the long-term care facilities, the designated supportive living spots, and the other supportive living facilities in this province that have been built in what I think is a really healthy mix in our province, which is a mix of publicly owned and operated, not-for-profit, and faith-based operations and some private operations, Mr. Speaker, which has given us a great mix and an attraction of capital of various sorts as well as public funding to ensure that we have that in place for our seniors.

So when I hear that they want to send this back to committee, Mr. Speaker, it gives me a huge pause for not only concern but for some serious angst on where we're going with this. We do have a bit of a hurry up. We do have baby boomers, of which some of us in this room are, and the pressures of the baby boom. We know that the number of seniors in this province is going to increase significantly. In fact, it's going to represent about a quarter of Alberta's population over the coming decade or so, and that is a huge challenge for us. That is why the importance of this legislation being passed now and being passed in a way that empowers and leaves some flexibility for the future is in place.

When I reflect back, there's so much in the current legislation which is not even reflected in the realities of the sector today. Some of the references, DSL and other types of supportive living and some of the contracted care that we have, are not even reflected in the current legislation. We know that that's going to change going forward as well, Mr. Speaker. We know that there's going to be evolution. We know that we want this to be flexible legislation that we can really work with and change over time as – guess what – society and the sector will evolve and improve, quite frankly, because of what's in this legislation. The overarching work of this legislation is very, very much something that we need to focus upon.

When we look at the high level, the highlights of these key principles that we're moving towards with this new legislation, again, Mr. Speaker, I look at the keys here: quality of life, person-centred care, dignity and respect, importance and contributions of caregivers of all sorts, importance of staff to resident and quality care of life. How are we going to attract the people, the talent we need in this continuing care sector? That in itself is a challenge, and I know that the minister will be working with those in education, in advanced education so that they can ensure that we have that career path for professionals in that sector so that we can support, again, that bubble, the baby boomer bubble, that is coming very quickly here upon us, as we see in society.

The highlights, the key principles, again: enabling Albertans to age in place, Mr. Speaker. Age in place. Hence, some of our focus is on increasing the home care options and opportunities. Again, I talk to innovators across this province all the time giving us new options for smaller congregate living, ways that we can deliver more comfort, care, and quality of life to individuals.

Providing services in alignment with the Alberta Health Act: that's something we need to do. We need to be able to deliver those services where people live, Mr. Speaker, whether that's in larger congregate living facilities, whether that's in medium and new-sized ones in evolution of the care, in the form of housing that they choose to live in or in the homes that they've lived in, in some cases, for many years.

And, Mr. Speaker, respecting diversity: that's a new one that's come out, and I applaud so much that's going on in our province. I reflect on a facility that I've had the opportunity – Wing Kei nursing home in Calgary, which has expanded significantly through the support of the ASLI program and others. It's great. I go in there, and – guess what – I ran into a fellow who I knew from when I was a kid, Ken Jang, who's a resident there and actually a spokesperson in the facility. I knew him when I was five years old. He and his family ran a grocery store near where I grew up, and to see him in there is just like running into old friends. He's vibrant and he's healthy, but he's also getting appropriate care and culturally sensitive and culturally appropriate care and meals, too. As I've often said, you can't take somebody who's enjoyed rice and noodles their entire life and give them a ham sandwich and expect them to thrive. We've got to be culturally appropriate.

We're doing that, and this legislation will allow us to empower the sector to do so as we move forward in the future. So when I hear of referrals and “Let's study this more” and “Let's throw this back to committee,” Mr. Speaker, this legislation, through the hard work of the minister, through the facility-based continuing care review, through the input of so many people – residents, family members, caregivers, operators, the associations that represent the sector on both sides, from the individuals, from the seniors themselves but also those that are operating – has been incredibly robust, and I was very honoured to be part of that, thanks to the former minister, and be given the opportunity to continue to work with that sector and to find out what the priorities are and what the focus is.

When I hear that there was only one government that ever did anything – Mr. Speaker, I'm looking back, actually. I pulled up a report here and some information back from 2011, a gentleman that I know that is still working in the seniors' care sector, and that direction was well in place at that time as we were moving forward. The ASLI program was part of that at the time, and as we involved that, the noncapital ASLI programs that have been brought forward now and other innovative ways for us to bring more capacity into the system, into the facility-based side of it as well, knowing that we want to evolve it so that we can deliver those services, those health care services in different settings, that we can deliver that quality of life along with the quality of care: I see that these are all embedded in here but at a high level, giving us the latitude through regulation to ensure that this legislation meets the needs of a growing and diverse and pretty demanding group of seniors, as we see.

You know what? We've now gone past the era of Depression-era seniors. In fact, now we're into their kids. Depression-era seniors, I think, were taught: if you have a roof over your head and three squares a day, you're supposed to be happy. Then we got into the current generation, who's going, “No, actually, I want better; I saw my parents; I'm cut from that cloth of frugality,” but they wanted something more. Guess what. The new generation, the baby boomers, are going to go: hold on here a minute; we've worked hard. Some people will have means, some not. We need to make sure that those people are all receiving a high level of care, quality of care and quality of life.

Mr. Speaker, when I see this, when I hear this “Let's throw this back to committee,” it really irks me. It's time for us to move forward, for us to look at the people, the professionals in the ministry. I will not be supporting this amendment. I think it's, quite frankly, irresponsible for us to consider doing it. Now is the time for us to move forward bravely, boldly and to address the challenges and opportunities. There are going to be challenges, but there are opportunities for us to work together with a diverse sector, which we're blessed to have in this province, to work with them to build the housing, to create the facilities, to create the options to deliver the services where people choose to live, and to make sure that they can have that enduring quality of life as they move forward into their golden years.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment REF1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to address this. I think the referral motion is one that was brought forward with good intention and not as an attack on the government. In fact, this is one of those bills that I think the underlying intent for both the government side and the opposition side is very much in line. The reason why we feel like this could be deferred at this particular time is the fact that the promise of this bill was so much greater than the bill itself.

I know that the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek has talked a number of times, quite well, about the incredible amount of work that has been put into the review, the facility-based continuing care review, and, of course, the subsequent legislation. That's the very reason why we have concerns, because we actually believe everything he says about that, that there were people who are quite dedicated to bringing things forward, issues forward, and brought forward quite a comprehensive report, that we were quite excited about. There were 42 recommendations in that report that we were looking to see, yet when we look at the legislation, we don't even see most of the aspects of that report even mentioned, let alone actual, you know, construction of overarching legislative pieces to enable the recommendations to be moved forward. I think that's the concern here. We do not seek this referral in this amendment because we wish to quash the bill; rather, we wish to enhance it and to bring it to life.

You know, when I look at the facility-based continuing care review, I see a number of things just in their overall policy list that I really feel like I can get behind. Policy direction 2, for example, is “Enhance overall Quality of Care with emphasis on residents living with dementia.” Certainly, I think that there's a need for that. It's an area that is going to require a fair amount of structural establishment here of systems to allow people to deal with dementia.

Right now what's happening in people's homes is that they're finding themselves unable to care in their homes for people with dementia because they don't have the level of support services that they need, and as a result, people with dementia are going into care for the safety of the family members, very often, because living with someone with dementia becomes a 24-hour-a-day responsibility. Unfortunately, because the resources aren't there, people are having family members go into care when they would prefer to take care of them at home but they know they simply cannot do that 24 hours a day, and they become fearful themselves that they'll fall asleep at the wrong time, that they'll just be exhausted and not be able to tend to the issues.

You know, what we needed to see in this bill, in that particular case, for example, is some legislation that would establish a new process for ensuring that dementia care would be created and deliverable in in-family-home situations in a way that it is not today. I think that would have required some legislative work, and I just don't see all of that work being done.

I look at the next policy direction, policy direction 3, and it talks about "culturally appropriate continuing care services." I don't even see the word "cultural" in the bill at all. Now, I may have missed it once, but in my review I don't see an emphasis on: what does it mean to bring in cultural services? What are the systems that are going to ensure that that is going to happen? I can go through all of those pieces of the continuing care review act and tell you that what we saw in that review, as the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek has indicated, was some really good work being done by people who clearly knew what was happening on the ground.

What we do not see are these policy directions and these recommendations actually coming forward. Now, what the government is saying is, "Well, we have an overarching bill here," and I understand that. But even if you have an overarching bill, you should have some sections that deal specifically with the recommendations to establish the processes by which those recommendations will be fulfilled, and we don't see that. We just don't see that the work is going forward.

Now, we're always left with this statement: well, that'll come out in regulations. It's always bothersome to me when I see that happening because if it is an issue of regulation, then you're saying that it does not require legislation; it just requires a decision by government, and that decision by government will happen in the regulations. Well, that could happen without the bill, so why aren't we seeing any progress then without the bill? We should have been seeing the implementation of many of these things anyways in spite of the bill because the government is saying that they don't need to be in the bill, that they can be done outside of the bill. Why haven't we seen any progress on that? That's the frustration that we have. They either have to decide that the bill is necessary or it's not. If it's necessary, can we please have the bill substantially do what it is the government promised to do in their own facility-based continuing care review?

You know, yesterday I talked about some of the other pieces, like the staffing hours, which certainly, I think, could have been included in legislation. Absolutely, there could be rules about the percentage of staff that must be there on full-time, ongoing contracts. That could be in legislation without any problem at all, and I don't see any emphasis on that here.

I've certainly talked about the things that I appreciate and I like about this bill. I mentioned at least four things yesterday just off the top to make sure that people know that, you know, we've kind of gone through it, we see some really positive things here, and we want to be encouraging as much as we possibly can. It's these other pieces that I get very concerned about.

I noticed that policy direction 8 talks about: to "consolidate monitoring processes and improve the coordination of inspections, while enhancing accountability and public reporting." I think that that's a really important area that certainly should have been enhanced in this bill in terms of the legislation. You know, we would certainly like to see that there is greater accountability and that there is some increase in fines, which I mentioned yesterday I appreciate, and the ability of inspectors to inspect unlicensed facilities, again which I appreciate, but what we don't have is a recognition that the families themselves need to have rights. We know that the rights of families to sue many institutions were taken away by this government, so I was very disappointed not to see that.

I could go through a number of specific things. You know, when I talk to the facilities in my area, one of the things that comes up fairly regularly is the fact that they are constantly having to pull staffing away from front-line care into meeting their accreditation requirement processes. Of course, those processes are extremely important. Many of these facilities, because of the nature of the facilities, have to do these accreditation pieces time and time again, sometimes four or five different accreditations at a single institution.

It often means that in September you've satisfied a requirement that is asked by the second accreditation group in November, but you can't give your September results to the second group even though it's only two months old because it has to be done newly for each of the new accreditations. I would have loved to have seen something that talked about: how do we make sure that the accreditation process itself is not pulling people away from the front-line work, those kinds of things, and how do we make it, you know, really sensible? I could go through in fine detail because I actually know many of these people and I worked with them.

I just wanted to summarize my comments by saying that the point here is that much more could have been done. I can give specific suggestions in basically every one of these areas of what should have been in this bill. As a result, we'd like to see this bill being deferred as per this amendment, but at this time I would like to ask that we adjourn debate on this bill.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 14 Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise today to move second reading of Bill 14, the Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022.

As the Associate Minister of Status of Women I'm so pleased to see this moving forward. You know, as society becomes more aware of sexual assault and other violence that has taken place against women, this is an important step in making sure that victims are comfortable coming forward. I think the more we talk about the realities of sexual violence, the more we realize how widespread the problem really is. I think society is moving in a healthy direction by learning to accept that there is a problem and that we need to take action.

Of course, it's one thing for us to raise awareness about sexual assault and other context issues, but we need to make sure that victims can come forward. I think that we've done well in encouraging victims to speak out, and I'm proud of the work that has been done by many of our stakeholders and society as a whole in helping to encourage this. But, Mr. Speaker, we can't end there. We cannot just encourage victims to come forward; we need to realize and address the challenges that exist when they do come forward.

Up until recently many of these victims would feel shame about what happened to them due to misinformed public judgment and stigmatization. Instead of this, victims need to know that they will be supported, heard, and understood. More than that, they need to be assured that there is a justice system waiting to help them. One of the biggest challenges for survivors of sexual assault is not just dealing with public opinions but dealing with the reliving of their trauma as they seek justice. In order for the process of our justice system to take its course, victims will need to provide statement and testimony of their assault. We're not talking about just any type of assault; we are talking about sexual assault, an assault on a person's most intimate, personal parts of themselves. These victims face reliving their experiences and often have to face their assailant in person in order to seek justice.

It's not something that's just forgotten; it has a lasting impact on victims' mental well-being. So what survivors of sexual assault need is confidence in their justice system. Confidence. Sadly, there are reasons for confidence to be shaken. In 2014 a court judge here in Alberta, who I'm sure most are well aware of, made headlines when he humiliated a victim of sexual assault by asking why she couldn't keep her knees together. This young Indigenous woman was brave enough to come forward. She was looking for justice. What instead she got was ridicule. With that comment and more, this woman was made to feel like the assault was her fault and that she should have done more to prevent it. During the same time a Nova Scotia judge told a courtroom regarding another case that clearly a drunk can consent.

These remarks came from past misconceptions about sexual assault that have been shown to lack any basis in reality. Instead of having judges that were there to impartially examine the facts, these judges showed highly damaging opinions. The Alberta judge's conduct, the Canadian Judicial Council said, was so "profoundly destructive of the concept of the impartiality, integrity and independence of the judicial role."

Now, we recognize that the actions of these judges were unreservedly wrong. We must also recognize that these opinions come from the past, where misconceptions about sexual assault were widely held and then passed down. One of the best tools to combat misinformation and stereotypes of the past is education and training. We all know this. In recognition of this, we have brought forward Bill 14 to make sure that our judges understand the nature of sexual assault and the humiliation experienced by victims. This is aimed to ensure that survivors of sexual assault are not revictimized by the very institution that is supposed to help them find justice.

We also need to remember that some victims of sexual assault never make it to court because they lose their lives during the assault. This leaves grieving families attending court and being traumatized all over again. This cannot be ignored by those running the courtroom. Many will know of the Cindy Gladue case. We must make sure that families never ever, ever again have to go through what the Gladue family went through. Bill 14 will help make sure of that.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, we can encourage victims to come forward all we want, but there needs to be a willingness to come forward and seek justice. We are seeing a lot of women victims coming forward with their stories. This is a good start and a good sign that culture is starting to change, but it's not good enough. By assuring victims that they will not be berated or accused for bringing forward allegations, we hope to see more engagement in the justice system by all survivors, including Indigenous people, minorities, and other vulnerable populations. All Albertans deserve a justice system that is unbiased, effective, fair, and respectful. As with many things that we implement into law, this won't happen overnight.

I know there are concerns about having individuals currently on the appointment eligibility list for becoming judges undertake to complete this training. This will take some time, but I am confident it will be done. The independence of the judiciary must be respected. Currently judges are provided with ongoing education and professional development, and that's derived from a number of sources, including third parties and, of course, the National Judicial Institute. The training for new judges is actually quite robust. What we are doing here is making sure that before a judge is even appointed or considered for appointment, they receive this very important education. This shows how seriously we take the issue of sexual assault.

Victim blaming and victim shaming must stop, period. We will only be able to prevent sexual assault when it is exposed to the light of day. This starts with victims feeling safe to report and feeling safe to proceed through the courts. I ask all members to show their commitment to ending sexual violence by supporting Bill 14.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to Bill 14? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this morning to speak to Bill 14, Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022. I want to thank the associate minister for her opening remarks. I think that there was a lot to be said on the importance of discussing sexual assaults and the importance of educating the justice system when it comes to that.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I think that there are some questions that I have regarding this piece of legislation. It's quite limited in what it's asking. There's a reference to – it's simply an appointment eligibility list, and there are two requirements, that the person being appointed as a judge "is a Canadian citizen" and "has completed education in sexual assault law and social context issues."

Now, I have a background in social work. I was a volunteer with the Sexual Assault Centre of Edmonton for quite a few years. I also, at the end of my career, prior to being elected, worked in the justice system with Children's Services as a specialist. I was a court coordinator, so I had the incredible privilege to work with Provincial Court judges under family law, and I had an incredible opportunity to sit on a committee with Provincial Court judges. In this committee it was the justice, the Chief Judge, for family court as well as defence counsel, members from family law, the native counselling centre – who else was there? It was a very diverse group of individuals that came forward to talk about the issues that were being faced in family law, and I can tell you that a lot of the solutions, because of the lack of ability to impede the independence of the judges, came from community.

We've seen, in Children's Services specifically, the creation of the Zebra centre. That was a space created that would allow an expert opportunity for the lawyers that were representing the victims to be specifically trained in issues related to child abuse, whether it's sexual abuse, emotional abuse, physical abuse, and it was an opportunity, what was intended, to create a space to educate through testimony to judges. It was real time, so it was happening during the trial. The experts that were there were the supporters of the victims. They were the lawyers themselves. They were defence that were, you know, quite versed in the issues regarding this, so the education component came from the lawyers and the witnesses, right? Whether it was the psychologist or therapists that responded to the victims, the approach was taken in an attempt to educate the justice in a way that was provided by testimony.

I can say that that has been somewhat successful when it comes to Children's Services. There has always been this discussion about what sort of education can be provided to judges because of their independence, so it's a grey area when it comes to what that would look like. I think that simply being a grey area doesn't mean it shouldn't happen. We have an opportunity here where we're providing an expectation that any judge that's going to be appointed have this education in sexual assault, sexual awareness training, and I think that that's a wonderful first step.

I think that when we look at the federal law, there's a component of ongoing education when it comes to their judges. There's an expectation that you're a sitting judge and you continue to educate yourself on issues that are coming up. I know that in social work something that is a standard for our practice is that we have continuing education. We have categories that are required in order for us to maintain our status as a registered social worker. Part of the profession expects that we are educated based on upcoming events, current issues. Some of those things for job requirements are, you know, taking suicide awareness training ongoing, because the context is continuously changing, as we know, as society changes, as new procedures and techniques come out.

There should be an expectation that all of the service providers that interact with an individual who is a victim have that same level of training, and it shouldn't stop at the justice level. It shouldn't stop at judges. Having an opportunity to create space for newly appointed judges is wonderful, but I think the majority of those that are seeing cases before them are current sitting judges. It's a slow process to get new judges appointed, and to be quite honest, judges can sit well past retirement. They're brought in, you know, some of them in their 70s, 80s, and that's not a unique experience in Children's Services. It happens in drug court. It happens in criminal court.

So I think that we're missing a huge opportunity when we talk about the importance of educating judges and how it can be done. We can look to the federal legislation, that talks about that education component, and how it is simply just a requirement of being a judge. I think so many professions that we have that work with people have that requirement. It's part of the job. It's an expectation that your education is maintained. You can't go to university, graduate, and then just continue to practise in the education that you learned, perhaps some of them in the '60s, in the '70s. Things have changed, and it is unrealistic to look to the social workers and to our lawyers and to our organizations to have the expectation put on them that they're the ones educating the court process, they're the ones educating the judges.

What happens is that you have individuals who are brave enough to, number one, report, because that simply is a very low statistic when it comes to those that have experienced sexual violence. They were brave enough to tell someone, and then they were brave enough to bring it before a police officer, and we hope that that police officer has been trained in how to receive that report and then take it to a place where they feel that there's enough evidence to actually prosecute. Then the police officer then has to convince a lawyer, the Crown, that this is something that's worth prosecuting, because there are so many barriers put in place even before it gets to the court system. This victim is so brave and vulnerable to be put in that position.

I'm happy to see the minister nodding and understanding this process. It's quite a complex system that, unfortunately, could fail on so many stages of it. I know it's a big task, but when I look at how much strength and support is required to get this to trial, the chances of it getting to trial with a new judge who's been trained is a very low per cent. I would question: have those conversations happened with current judges? Like, what could it look like in the province in ways of receiving education? I think it's absolutely unrealistic for the current sitting judges to say: no, we're not open to that. Well, you know, maybe you need to be.

We look at the federal government and that expectation of ongoing education. Why are Provincial Court judges left out of that?

Ms Issik: They're not.

Ms Goehring: I know the associate minister is saying that they're not, but there isn't a set expectation that they have to follow. There isn't a guideline that says: you must comply with sexual assault training, a certain amount of education. It's all at their discretion. It's a slippery slope when we look at ways to educate a profession that needs it so desperately. Our victims need it desperately when they've taken that stance that they're prepared to tell someone what happened to them and then hope that that first person believes them and then supports them through this really daunting process.

I know part of the training that we give to social workers is to take what they see on TV and disregard all of that. When you're testifying, it's not like it is on TV. It's not an experience where a judge will simply say, you know, "You can come and sit down and give your evidence," and they're seated nicely. For most of Provincial Court testimony you're standing. That act itself is something that can throw a victim off or a witness off without knowing that the true life experience is so different from the court experience. Even the placement of a courtroom: the judge is quite high up. They're looking down on the victim. There are so many things that are so intimidating to someone who's never experienced that. To have to testify in this space about something that is so violating and then to not have empathy when you're looking over to the person who's making the decision is heart wrenching to watch.

I think that this legislation is so essential when it comes to making sure that newly appointed justices are given that awareness. But I think that this legislation doesn't show how that's going to look. What are the timelines? What's the potential for actually educating those current sitting judges? I know many of the judges want to learn. They would sit on that committee, where we would discuss current issues, ongoing concerns, and they would ask those questions. It was in a safe place because it wasn't on the record. There were no clerks. There was no public. It was just an opportunity to have an open discussion. But not all judges are in that space where they want to genuinely learn what's happening.

There were several judges, that I had experience with over the years, that, you know, when you walked into the courtroom and that was the judge that was sitting up there, you knew what the results were going to be. You knew that there was a bias. Despite them intending to be nonbiased and neutral, you knew that judge X was going to rule in a certain way because they weren't perhaps aware of whatever the dynamic was, whatever the situation was. I think it has to be something that is a requirement. It can't be: I hope you get educated on this; I hope that you will take that additional training. Some do but not all. It's those judges that you referenced in your opening statement that, I would argue, probably wouldn't be open to voluntarily taking training and taking education because they have a bias and they have an opinion on what that means.

I can think of an experience where I went before a judge to present an apprehension order of an infant. The information that I had gathered through interviewing the family was that the father of this infant was a sexual offender of children, with quite an extensive history. You know, to me and my team, when we discussed how we were going to present that, it seemed pretty straightforward: new baby, vulnerable, mom was low functioning, bio dad, who was in the picture, in the home, was a court-convicted sex offender of children. We put the information before the judge, and his statement was: "He served his time. He was released into the community. I have no concerns. This child is not at risk. People can change."

When you put information before a judge, they ultimately have the final decision, and you can only do so much. Perhaps if this judge had information on what sexual offenders' behaviour could be or sexual violence training, there might be some more probing questions that could have been asked. I could have come away with a better dialogue with this judge, but I wasn't given an opportunity to explain any more concerns. I wasn't provided any sort of opportunity to educate in that moment. It was just: no; this is my belief, and absolutely not.

So I've experienced attempting to provide information to a judge to perhaps educate in the moment, and not all are open to that. I would think that when you know better, you do better. Until you have that information – perhaps it's not that they're intending to be malicious or ignorant; it's just a lack of education and understanding. I think providing an opportunity to sitting judges is so wonderful if we could do that, come up with a way that the federal government does it. Provincial Court sexual awareness training is something that I'm so happy to see come forward. I know that there has been a lot of conversation over the years about the requirement of what does education – what are the standards for a person seeking to become a judge? What does that look like?

I think that when we look at some of the horrific stories that have come across our kitchen tables, when we're looking at some of the decisions and some of the disgusting comments made by those that make decisions, we have to do something. We have to start somewhere. I think that being able to look at the legislation and change it is a great first step. I would hope that when it comes to the type of training, that's something – that the victim's perspective is all throughout this training. I know that when you are hearing first-hand from a victim and what their experience was like in a courtroom, they're able to identify those little things that I talked about, just the simple staging of where the judge sits and that eye contact and not being able to sit. A judge doesn't consider those things when they walk into a courtroom.

Hearing first-hand from the person that had a horrible experience and also the positive experience – because there are some wonderful experiences where I've seen victims provide testimony, and the judge was so compassionate and so caring and so kind. Take those experiences as part of that education as well, not just what not to do, but: here's what it could look like to really support a victim who's coming forward and being so brave.

I know that one of the examples that we could look at is how we work with Children's Services and the way that we support children in testifying. There are support dogs that are provided through the Zebra centre. You know, they have a support animal with them. It's things that we've learned over the years that people need in order to get over that anxiety, that stress, and that simple acknowledgement that what they're about to do is hard. It's so hard. To be able to talk about the violence that you experienced in an open setting is terrifying, and unfortunately when it comes to a trial, you're not only sharing your story, but you're often made to feel like you're defending it. You're questioned on so many of the facts.

Defence lawyers use tactics that are horrible. You know, the minister mentioned the question of being sober. It's a strategy that we see over and over and over, so when we start getting to a place where judges are saying, "That is absolutely not acceptable; that's not an appropriate line of questioning," that culture, hopefully, will shift and will change. But until then we have a system that has existing judges that don't have that training. I'm so appreciative to see this start of what's happening, but I'm just hopeful that there's opportunity to make it so much better.

With that, I will take my seat. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to rise and speak to Bill 14, the Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022. There are some thoughts that I have in regard to – and to build a little bit on what my colleague from Edmonton-Castle Downs was also speaking about, obviously, we have similar backgrounds. The member worked in court services, and I worked with high-risk youth. Sexual assaults, grooming into gangs, things like that were the areas that I worked in and, of course, was engaging with youth that, unfortunately, were often being either sexually assaulted, abused, things like that.

Now, I agree that this piece of legislation is important. I think that when we are looking at our court systems – and how we're supporting victims is extremely important, and as my colleague mentioned, the training and understanding of that is very, very important. And the reason that I speak to that is the fact that I've had scenarios where I've had to work with youth that I've gone through this process with, and I think one of the biggest frustrations that I had through the whole process of trying to get to a court date and support a youth taking the stand and actually being a witness was the time that it took to get there. From the time that the first report was made, through the interview process, to the gathering of evidence, and then getting an actual court date, we were at about two years.

This youth that I was working with was assaulted at 14. We didn't have a court date till 16, and by that time her life had changed significantly. She was, at 14, living on the streets. She'd been groomed into a gang. Many horrible things happened in that process. By the time she was 16, she was living in an independent living environment, had gone back to school – her life was significantly different – and had gone to counselling, so she had processed what had happened to her to the point where going to court was not on her priority list. She didn't want to relive what had happened to her when she was 14, and she didn't want to have to tell her story again because she told her story already so many times, whether it be in her interviews, whether it be the officer that she had to talk to, whether it be the social worker that she had to explain. Like, the reliving and retelling of that story over and over and over again is a deficit, to be honest, in all of our systems.

The court date was set. We sat down. We talked about: what did she want to do? Again, because she had been supported through Zebra, she knew what was going to happen because we did the practice. She knew she was going to have a screen and that she'd have the support dogs and all the things. The day came, and her youth worker went to pick her up, and she didn't go. That court case failed. That individual was never convicted. We had enough evidence where I could confidently say that we would have definitely won that case, but because she wasn't able to attend as a witness, the case died.

Is training important for judges? Absolutely. Do we have a fundamental problem within the justice system of how we get to these court cases? To me, it's just as big of an issue. We are underfunded in the justice system. The access to judges that understand these cases is limited. The retelling of stories and having to expect individuals that have been sexually assaulted to have to tell that story over and over and over again is a problem.

And how we interact in these conversations is a problem. I will admit that when my first disclosure happened to me from a youth, I was unprepared to engage in that conversation. I acknowledge that in my practice as a social worker I could have handled that way better. I had training, and I had all of the things, but when you're taught something and then you have to actually practise it, it is very, very different. Luckily, again, as my colleague mentioned, we had the Zebra centre, so I was able to get support. There are experts there that were able to do the interview appropriately, and we were able to support that youth. Then I obviously spent more time at Zebra and, unfortunately, got better at being able to do that interview. But it was through that training and that expertise and engagement and being surrounded by people that understood what needed to be done and how to do it properly that I was able to be better.

Sexual assaults are extremely difficult to talk about, and they are also very easy to, unfortunately, mess up in an interview, with leading questions, with how you engage, so I think one of the strengths that we have in the province is that partnership that we have with Children's Services and our police partners and the fact that we have joint training. Social workers and officers go to the Zebra centre together; we do our training together. We get the justice perspective from an officer's perspective. You get the social worker's perspective of what we engage with: who gets first disclosure? What does that look like? How do we work in a collaborative partnership to ensure that we are doing the best practice we can do?

I would encourage the minister, when looking at this piece of legislation, "What does training look like?" that judges participate in that same process, that they come with us to the Zebra centre and they sit with the social workers and they sit with the officers and they learn about, one, how the Zebra centre works – in Calgary they call it something else; it's slipping my mind, but it's set up the same way – and that judges actually learn, from the moment of disclosure, what that whole process looks like, and they see it.

I appreciate that this is very much from a children's perspective. However, I think that if you can be a good judge and go through a trial with a child that has been sexually assaulted, your likelihood of being successful with adults is probably higher, because it's far more complex with kids. But I also just think that it's a good practice to see the whole spectrum of how the systems need to work together to make sure we have the best outcome.

My other recommendation, obviously, as we're talking about this is that the ministers – ministers, to be clear – work together in the sense of how this legislation from the Associate Minister of Status of Women to the Minister of Justice gets those cases seen sooner and that we accelerate those processes, because two years after an assault is too long. It is an unrealistic expectation to ask a person to go to court two years after a traumatic event such as a sexual assault and ask them to relive and retell that story and expect that they're going to show up, for one, and then, when they show up, to not necessarily have those supports. We need to make sure those supports are there, so I agree that this needs to happen.

I do think, though, that I also would like to see a harmonization between the provincial requirements and the federal jurisdiction. There are more strengths in the requirements for federal judges, obviously. We wouldn't have this piece of legislation if there wasn't, but because there is a requirement for federal judges, it would make sense to me that the legislation aligns, and I do believe that the federal legislation is a little bit stronger. There is more of a continuation of a requirement for training. Everybody is required to have it.

I agree that I don't believe that it should just be new judges. I think that all judges should be required, and I think it should be a continuation, and there should be a requirement for updating of that training, no different than in Children's Services, where Indigenous training is required. You have to update it every two years. You know, there are courses that can be taken within sexual assault training that you can update. Suicide prevention: you can update. Well, you have to. Because it is such an unfortunately common interaction, to refresh your understanding and your ability to engage, I think, is important.

Unfortunately for me, because I worked with high-risk youth, I was dealing with sexual assault often, so my skills were constantly being tested. Other colleagues of mine may never ever have to deal with a sexual assault as a Children's Services worker. They may deal with neglect and abuse and all of the other things but may never ever in their caseload experience have to do an interview when it comes specifically to sexual assault, just based on what kind of family you're working with and demographicwise. So for those workers who never had to engage or are less likely to, having that refreshing training is very important because when the day comes, if it does come, you need to understand and be prepared.

I do think that there needs to be more clarity that it is an ongoing expectation. I mean, I would assume that it's not depending on what a judge's docket looks like. They may not necessarily have these cases coming across their desks very often, so they also need to make sure that they're up to date and aware.

I think, I mean, as my colleague from Edmonton-Castle Downs also mentioned, things like even courtroom structure changes, right? Like, we never used to put screens in front of victims so that they didn't actually have to see the perpetrator. We never thought of that. Then one day someone decided that that would be a good idea and maybe we should provide a screen so there was limited eye contact, lack of intimidation, limiting that feeling of threat. Put a chair down; have a support person that can sit beside the person while they're testifying: those things shifted significantly as we became better at talking about sexual assault. Then it was about training court workers and, like, "How do we set up those spaces, and what does that look like?" So there is an evolution as we move through our systems, and as we learn more and as we develop more and get better at our professions, things shift.

Those were just the considerations that I would ask the minister to think about. Again, I think we can just always do better in this space. Our intentions are always good, and the more we learn and the more we're able to look at how we support victims so that we can have successful outcomes at trial, I think that is what we all genuinely want to see happen.

With that, I will close my remarks.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to add additional comments? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has the call.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I welcome the opportunity to speak to this legislation. We seem to have our third social worker in a row speaking to it and maybe more yet to come. I guess I want to start by thanking the Associate Minister of Status of Women for bringing forward the legislation. It is very nice to be able to support a piece of legislation for what it does. I think my comments will be more around thoughts I have around this whole, you know, issue or area of sexual awareness training and some of the concerns I do have, but I can certainly tell you that I support the direction of this bill and support the work that's been put into bringing this forward.

I think that, you know, the evidence has been that our sort of nonexpert attitudes and experiences towards things like sexual assault have a huge effect on the decisions we make around sexual assault, and it turns out that judges are not immune to that in any way more than any other group in society. They are not experts in the area of sexual assault, and as such they make decisions based on the information that they have available to them, and that's typically their life experience. Unfortunately, that doesn't always lend judges to move in a direction which, I think, we need to see them moving in.

I know that in my many years of working in the area of child sexual abuse, I had, of course, many opportunities to deal with children that had been sexually assaulted, but also I did indeed provide counselling for or advice for and often training for people in the area of general sexual assault, including adult sexual assault. So this area is very meaningful to me, an area that I certainly dedicated a significant part of my life to and, of course, trained a lot of people on how to deal with this, both as a professor and in my work in private practice as an independent contractor providing services on training in the area of sexual assault for many years both to government and to nonprofits and other groups and agencies.

I certainly believe in the value of education, and I've certainly seen the negative effects of a lack of education in a particular area. It's really not to cast aspersions on the judiciary; it's just to point out the fact that one can only make decisions based on the information one has available to them. If you don't have it available to you, you tend to go fall back on things that are not, you know, really helpful, but it's what you know. I certainly experienced that a lot as I testified in cases of child sexual abuse.

I testified dozens and dozens of times. I was deemed an expert in both the Provincial Court and Queen's Bench in the area of child sexual assault and associated areas. I know I certainly tried to bring information with me when I presented all the time, but of course the courts want you to provide facts and not education in the courtroom as an expert witness, so it was a bit limited. Having a place where this could be done would be very appropriate.

I sort of reflect on some of the cases where I was, you know, particularly aggrieved at the decision-making that was done; a case, for example, of a child of three who was sexually assaulted by their father. When the decision was made, there was a reference by the judge that if we put this father in jail, this family is going to be without income and they'll be worse off. I can understand, from the judge's perspective, that that would be an important thing. A family needs to have funding and so on, but of course it totally neglected to bring into consideration the fact that, having been a sexual offender once, the likelihood of reoffending is significantly high. Of course, that young child was sexually abused continuously until they left home at the age of 18, and then it became a big issue again at that time. I was brought back to testify about it, this some 15 years later, and really was concerned that the decision why this man was left in this home was based not on the sexual assault aspects of the case but, rather, on some other aspects of the case.

Another one that, you know, really stuck with me – and some of these stay with you your whole life; you just never give them up – was a young woman that was abused by her father and, in fact, had become pregnant by her father and had an abortion by her father. But when it came time for the trial, unfortunately, nobody had thought to take evidence, DNA evidence, about the abortion from the time of the abortion to prove that it was the father. It was only at this point about a 16-, 17-year-old young woman testifying against her father.

One of the things that I was really aggrieved about was that the defence attorney brought in writings by this young girl, that she had written down, about how much she hated her father and so on and had the young girl admit on the stand that she did in fact hate her father, and then they used that as evidence: obviously, this is all fault; she just hates her father, and she's doing this to attack her father. You know, it was just a terrible, terrible outcome, and I've never been able to get over that. Again, it was because they were using the outcome to justify their decision that somehow the assault hadn't actually occurred. I think that judges, with appropriate training, would certainly have been able to understand that, of course, a child who'd been sexually abused to the point of having gotten pregnant and having an abortion by her father by the time she was, I think, 14 would be angry. The point of the anger was an outcome of the abuse, not a reason to believe that somehow it was a false accusation.

You know, those kinds of stories just hang with you for a very long time, and you certainly are happy to see a piece of legislation that's going to move us ahead, that's going to make the likelihood of decisions based on information that is irrelevant or secondary to the sexual assault piece of the criminal activity – I think it's really important that we see legislation that supports that kind of work.

I want to also add in some thoughts about things that I might like to see happen that could perhaps be part of this legislation, because I, of course, believe that it's not just simply sexual awareness training that is important for the judges; there are other aspects that could be included. Maybe this isn't the appropriate place to put them, but I know that there has been a recent review by Professor Jennifer Koshan at the University of Calgary's law school asking essentially: can we have this kind of legislation for intimate-partner violence as well that looks not only at understanding intimate-partner violence but also context and so on?

Of course, as in the case with the young woman I just spoke about, in many cases of intimate-partner violence we also see decisions being made based on – well, in the outcome what we see is somebody who's very angry and that therefore this is probably a false allegation by somebody who's just trying to attack. I know that Professor Koshan, you know, wants us to caution against that and to actually have judges go back and learn more about intimate-partner violence and not look at where we're at now in terms of a fight between people but, rather, at what the circumstance was at the time, to help us understand and understand that what's happening now is an outcome, a legitimate outcome, of that.

I guess I wonder if a bill like this might include something like intimate-partner violence – or perhaps another bill could be brought forward that would do the same thing – to ensure that anybody who wishes to sit on the Provincial Court also has training in that area. You know, again, I'm just saying: "I like what you're doing. Is there more that we could be doing to move things forward a bit?"

I guess I also just wonder – and it's because of my own lack of knowledge, so I'm going to acknowledge that right up front – about the decision to have this only for people who are applying to become judges. I wonder whether or not it should be more broadly done, as some of my colleagues have said, for people who are already sitting judges, because, of course, if they missed that opportunity to get the training and they're on the bench for 30 years, they're still going to be making the same decisions now that they were making 30 years ago. So it might be good to include them, and perhaps there's a way to do it. Perhaps there are legislative reasons why we don't do that. I don't know. It would certainly be something that would be considered.

I happen to come from a bit of a legal family, and I know that when both my father and my brother were appointed to the bench, both of them were required to go for various sets of training after they were appointed. I can see the minister sort of saying across the floor that not all these things are possible, and I kind of understood that that might be true. I'm just wanting to put that out there, that I certainly would like to see judges get information, whether they've been sitting for a long time or not, on these kinds of issues like sexual awareness or intimate-partner violence.

I wonder whether or not there might be some kind of work that could be done with the members of the Law Society, more commonly referred to as the benchers, who make these kinds of decisions about all lawyers. Should we be asking them to consider the possibility that all lawyers, particularly any lawyers who are going to be acting in the area of family violence and so on, should actually have some training, just as part of the course of their being able to practise law and stand before the bar at all? I realize, again, that that's not in the associate minister's hands. It would have to be a discussion with the Law Society and the benchers to do that.

You know, at this particular time I'm wanting the House to support this kind of legislation. There may be some things we can add to it as we go through the stages of the bill. I certainly would love to see some work done on the maintaining of statistics in this bill. As we have suggested in other situations, sometimes gathering statistics is important in understanding how differentially laws are applied. I know that our Member for Edmonton-City Centre has suggested in other situations in legislation that we keep race-based data on the outcomes of various things with regard to health and other areas like that.

It would also be interesting to know if there is a difference in this particular case in terms of sexual awareness training, whether or not that would have an influence on changing the nature or the application of law. But we'd only know if it needs to be changed if there were stats available. Are there cultural differences between who gets convicted and who doesn't, both in terms of the cultural status of the victim and the cultural status of the offender? It would be interesting to know if there is some difference there – I realize that it's just casting aspersions, so I want to be careful, but I suspect that we might find that there are some significant differences; we certainly do when we look at it from a social science perspective in many cases – so having some stats on that and having stats on the number of cases that are coming forward and the number of them that are actually resulting in convictions and the number that are not.

One of the things that you certainly have an experience of if you're a social worker, as I and many of my colleagues are, in terms of going to the courts is that the chance or likelihood of a conviction is very low.

We know that, in the statistics that have been done around, you know, adult sexual assault, for example, the conviction is the last of about four different stages, and in each stage the likelihood of progressing to the next stage goes down. Starting with the first stage of just even reporting that, in fact, something has happened, there is only a per cent of anybody who wants to report because they know the likelihood of a conviction is so little and the likelihood of sort of something negative happening to you as the victim through this process is likely to go on, and then, of course, having to report it. How often do charges get implemented, and how often are there convictions, all the stages along the way? I'd really like to see some stats on that end and see those used to bring us to a better place in terms of our legislation here in this House.

Thank you to the minister and the associate minister for this legislation.

The Speaker: Second reading of Bill 14. Is there a social worker in the House? Just teasing. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much. Yes, it's my pleasure to join the three social workers who previously spoke, to also add my voice to this. Although, I think it's pretty tough to be a social worker without having this part of your practice. Because I did a lot of macropractice – I didn't do so much micro, working with individual clients – I probably have perhaps the least experience directly working with this area of social work. Certainly, I also will say that I'm happy to see Bill 14 come forward.

You know, I just was looking at the legislation. It's a couple of pages. It's not an extensive bill, for sure. I think the section that's the substantive piece of it is section 3. It says:

- (2) No person may be appointed as a judge unless the person
 - (a) is a Canadian citizen, and
 - (b) has completed education in sexual assault law and social context issues.

That's basically what this bill is about, very specific to that and, of course, needed.

You know, we want this legislation in, and as my colleagues have all spoken about extensively, there's tremendous need. There are a lot of stereotypes. It's often referred to as rape mythology. Rape is sort of an old term. We don't even use it very much anymore, but it's still seen as this – a stereotype of often the victims of sexual assault as – I don't know – provoking it, wanting it. They gave false impressions of, you know, interest, so they were implying consent. A myriad of things. We can go on.

I mean, it's important that we do bring this legislation forward. Of course, you know, we're always wanting to give the government some advice, some suggestions on how to make it better. My colleagues have spoken about how it should be expanded to current judges sitting, and I would say that that's even probably more important almost than the judges that are newly appointed because it has a lot to do with age. I think that age and perhaps some of those stereotypes are correlated, and I would think, too, that there are just more people with lived experience of understanding what this is about.

You know, we have probably an appointment of more women judges now, so gender plays a role. I don't know the stats on how many judges are women or how many judges are men or things like that. But I would say that judges appointed in years past were more likely to be male and have less understanding of this issue. Certainly, they probably don't have lived experience at all.

But, as we know, 1 in 3 women have experienced sexual assault. That's a tremendous amount. You know, a third of women have had that happen, and only 1 in 10 actually report it, because of some of the things that we're trying to address today. It's not going to make a difference. They feel they'll be humiliated in a public setting. Nobody is really understanding. They don't understand the very significant trauma that, I'm sure, they experienced.

So it's very important that people be properly trained when they become judges and if they are already sitting judges. Certainly, I, as my other colleagues have shared, would like very much for sitting judges to also need to be trained in this way so that they, when they are presiding over these cases, have the knowledge, have looked at those myths and looked at themselves and done some reflection on what maybe are some of their biases that are unconscious, that they don't even know. That's why it's so important to have sitting judges be asked, required, mandated to do this training. I think this is very important.

Certainly, another thing that would help this legislation be stronger – and I am going to refer to some public comments by the MLA for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall. Of course, he said that mandating sexual awareness training for judges is very important and just encouraged also to follow the federal process, where the training is overseen and implemented by independent professional bodies, developed in consultation with sexual assault survivors. Again, I just offer this advice to the government, to make sure that it's done similarly to the federal process and, you know, making sure that the voices of people who have experienced this – these are the survivors. They understand it intimately. Of course, their voices are so important, and they must be honoured. That is another thing that the legislation doesn't speak to – it's silent on that – but is very important.

I mean, it always certainly makes me very happy to see legislation – and largely we would say that women and girls are usually the victims of sexual assault. Not that men and boys don't experience this, but I'd say that the majority are female. Of course, anything that we can do here in this Legislature to create policies that support females to live better, healthier lives here in our province: I am completely in support of that. I would say that this legislation is going towards that.

I think that in Alberta we have some very challenging issues here. I want to point to a study by the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives. It looks at five indicators regarding: what are the worst and best cities in Canada for women to live in? It's looking at a whole bunch of different indicators, you know, for their quality of life and what are the best places to live. You know what? Out of 25 of the major centres, Edmonton is 24, so that's bottom basement, right? That's very, very low. We're not 1; we're 24. And Calgary is 23. So there's a lot of work to do. There's a lot of work to do to make sure that women in our province are supported based on some very key indicators.

Certainly, this legislation touches on what the study talks about in terms of security. Security they define as intimate-partner violence, police-reported sexual assault, and police-reported criminal harassment. Alberta and, specifically, our two major cities have extremely high rates of these acts of, you know, violence that hurt women's security. Because of that one indicator but also the others in combination, we actually have a lot of work to do in this province. We have a lot of work to do to make sure that women are honoured and supported and treated fairly and justly.

This legislation does, you know, focus pretty specifically on an area that's important to do, but there's still so much significant work to do to really support women in our province. I mean, I think it's important just to identify the other indicators that this study looks at because I think we really need to think about this in Alberta, what we're doing here and that there is some pretty significant inequality, unfairness, lack of justice for women in our province.

Another indicator is economic security; for example, the measure of the income gap between men and women. Alberta has some of the widest gaps in all of Canada. Economic security, we know, is so important, and we know – there's the joke where a woman might say, like: I'm a divorce away from poverty. A lot of times women don't have their economic independence, and here in our province, sadly, that is another indicator that really creates inequality, unfairness, injustice for women.

Also, another measure is looking at women in leadership. They're not looking at provincial government; they're looking at municipal government, so representation and what percentage of people in elected office municipally, Edmonton and Calgary, are women. In industry: who is in leadership positions, who is in management positions? Again, Alberta, Calgary and Edmonton, ranks very low, so women aren't in those leadership positions. How come? You know, that is, again, because of gender bias a lot of times. So what can we do as a provincial government to actually enhance opportunities for women in those roles? That adds to their equality in our society.

Another is health and well-being. That's another measure. It's sort of about the stress they experience, and of course the reports of the stress for women in Alberta are high, likely to do with all these other indicators.

Then the fifth indicator is education level, so: do they have high school? Do they have, you know, a trade? Are they in postsecondary? Anyway, it is sort of some pretty damning statistics for women's equality in our province, women having the support.

Of course, Bill 14 does talk about the fourth indicator that this study references regarding security, women's security in terms of their rights to their person to not be violated, to not be assaulted, and when that does happen: what kind of justice can they seek? If they're going up against a judicial system that doesn't respect them or has all sorts of stereotypes and biases, then, of course, they're less likely to even bring forward their issue, and sometimes when they do, they're retraumatized.

This training is important and key that it go forward, so I'm pleased that the government is bringing that forward. I guess I just want to say that there is so much more to be done, as I said, referencing this study. I mean, the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives does amazing work, and I just really encourage other members of the House to look at the work they do. Certainly, this area that they've done research in really shows some very concrete ways we can make our society more just and fair. So I just encourage members to look at that. I think we all want people to be treated fairly and justly, so let's make that happen.

Early in my career as a social worker I did work in child welfare, and I had a myriad of cases. I guess I want to share a case where I was a supervisor in child welfare. Of course, we worked with legal aid when we had to go to court as social workers in child welfare cases, and my caseworker came to me and said to me: "I don't know what's going on, but the legal aid lawyer isn't listening to me. She's dismissing what I have to say." We had an understanding through work we'd done with the police that the father of the children who were in custody was actually grooming them and was a pimp, really, and was grooming his own children, who were under the age of six, to get involved in sexual activities. She said: "I've talked to our lawyer about this, but she just is always too busy to listen to me. She doesn't hear me. What can I do?" I said to her, "Okay; when is court again?" She said, "Tomorrow morning," so I said, "Okay; I'll go with you." So we're, you know, outside the courtroom. I go with my caseworker, and I tried to talk to the lawyer, and it's what she says. It's totally that. She dismisses what we say. She's had enough, and she's not listening to me. She's not fulfilling her responsibilities.

I'll have to conclude my story there, and I'll have to share some more later. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to start off by thanking all members of the Chamber that have engaged in discussion over this really important bill, and I want to thank the minister for bringing this forward. We've heard from four social workers on this side. Now we're moving to teachers.

[Mr. Jeremy Nixon in the chair]

You know, I've had the opportunity to take different sexual awareness training myself as a teacher working with some of Edmonton's most vulnerable youth, teaching at Inner City High School, and recognize the importance of this training. Again, I'm supportive of this bill and will make that clear at the onset, that this is important. We've seen other jurisdictions, Mr. Speaker, including at the federal level, that have in the recent past introduced legislation similar to this. I'm very happy to see Alberta is also bringing this forward.

The question that I have, and I hope that – I appreciate that the minister has been engaged this morning on this bill. When we move into committee, I'm just curious to know why – so this is great for new judges, but the first question that pops to mind is: what about existing judges that haven't had this type of training? What are some options that maybe the minister is thinking of as to why it wasn't included in this bill? I know that in other jurisdictions some have looked at providing this kind of training and social context training for judges as well as, as put by colleagues of mine who've talked about – you know, again, it's important to have that training for new judges. What is the plan for ongoing or continuous learning? When you think about those that work with youth or children that require first aid training, for example, we're required every so often to renew our credentials, to ensure that it's fresh in our minds and we know what to do. The question is around sexual awareness and context training. Is there a plan for ongoing training, or is this meant to be done once or through a series of workshops?

Again, Mr. Speaker, these are questions I have for the minister. What kind of training will be included, and who will be doing this training? Again, different jurisdictions in Canada have different bodies that are responsible for training their judges, so I'm curious, for Alberta here, what the minister's vision is around who's responsible for establishing these educational seminars in Alberta for provincial judges. Will this be found in a statute, or is this a policy? Will this be determined through regulations? These are questions that I hope the minister can answer when we get into Committee of the Whole.

You know, it's clear, Mr. Speaker, that this type of training is absolutely necessary. We have examples here in Alberta of judges that have quite frankly made some unbelievable comments and have blamed victims of sexual violence, which is abhorrent, quite frankly. So if this legislation will help to ensure that that never happens again, then this is a very positive step for the province of Alberta.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I appreciate, again, that, you know, right now, I believe, it's the Court of Queen's Bench that undertakes training for judges and new judges, including one of their committees, the education committee, so my understanding is that these types of conferences and training are paid for via grants from the government.

You know, my reading of this bill is that there are no legislated requirements for ongoing training, again, for sitting judges, which includes training for new judges for the first five years, so I'm curious to know what guarantees can be given to members, and how can the government guarantee that sexual assault law and social context training will continue and will not be at risk of potential future budget cuts?

Mr. Speaker, you know, we recognize the importance of this training and how it needs to continue on whether or not the province is in the middle of a boom or a bust. So what – not even assurances. As I've spoken to a number of times in the last couple of days, verbal assurances are not backed up through action or legislation. So this is where on this side of the House we're really looking for these types of commitments to be written into the legislation so that future ministers, future governments cannot make a decision to reduce funding for things like sexual awareness training and social context training based on the state of the economy. These are priorities that need to continue whether the province is experiencing $100 barrel of oil, as it is today, or experiencing $27 barrel of oil, as it did under our government.

I appreciate that this bill, again, will require that anyone seeking appointment as a provincial judge will be required to undertake sexual assault law and social context training. Again, as I've mentioned, you know, I'm curious to know who is responsible for that training.

You know, the other question is around – and maybe this is going to be left to these bodies – how do we guarantee that the pretraining and posttraining will line up to ensure that there's cohesiveness in the justice system, particularly for sexual assault and, again, for intimate-partner violence cases as well? That, I hope, the minister will comment on. Again, I'm curious to hear the measures and assurances that the minister will have to require training for sitting judges and if the minister has had an opportunity to speak with the bodies that represent sitting judges and what their proposals are. I would imagine that they're open to this training as well. I'm curious to know where that fits.

I do know, Mr. Speaker, that federally when a bill was introduced – actually, it was passed in third reading in May of 2017 by an Alberta MP. There were questions around, you know – because in the federal piece of legislation there also is missing training for current sitting judges, so there were questions that were asked by a couple of MPs. To my knowledge, there weren't adequate answers given as to why that was not included. Now, again, the minister, I hope, during Committee of the Whole will be able to address these questions.

As well, you know, Mr. Speaker, it's great to see a number of other provinces also bring forward legislation similar to this to ensure that we are doing everything we can to eliminate victims of sexual violence from being revictimized and, as well, ensure that our judicial system and judges have the adequate training to ensure that victims aren't revictimized.

Mr. Speaker, I will take my seat. Again, looking forward to this debate continuing. I appreciate that the minister has brought forward this piece of legislation.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? I felt like we were on a bit of a theme. Perhaps we want to go to the Member for Edmonton-North West?

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have to say that I'm very happy to see this piece of legislation come forward. As has been stated by many of my colleagues on this side of the House, of course, I think that it's great that this will be for new judges, but as has been stated by several of my colleagues, the concern is the existing judges.

The reality is that – you know, I'm going to tell you this. I remember having a discussion with my mom one time, and we were talking about feminism. She's a good Latina feminist, right? Like, since I was a little boy, she had me ironing my own clothes, washing my own clothes, all that kind of stuff. She's like, "I'm not your maid; you've got to do your own stuff," which I was happy to do. I mean, for me, I don't expect anybody to do those kinds of things for me, but she raised me that way.

I remember we were having a discussion about this kind of thing, similar, not this particular issue about judges, but it was in the same vein, Mr. Speaker. I had said to her, "You know, it's a good thing that times are changing and that these kinds of antiquated ways of looking at the world are starting to go away." And to that she responded, "I've been fighting these kinds of things for" – she said her whole entire life. She said that even during the time she was a young woman who had grown conscious about these kinds of issues, there have always been men who have agreed with this. So it's not necessarily that these are antiquated ways of looking at the world but people who have just firmly stood up and addressed injustice when it happens.

Even back then they knew it was wrong. They knew that these kinds of things were wrong, to treat people unjustly based on a person's gender or sex. It was just wrong. Now, what I would argue is that it's taken us this long to catch legislation up, to recognize that something has just been wrong for so long. You know, I'm so happy that I had that example, in my mother, to tell me that it takes courageous people to stand up and speak truth to power.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I hesitate to interrupt, but pursuant to Standing Order 4(2.1) the House stands adjourned until 1:30 p.m.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, April 20, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, seated in the Speaker's gallery today are two of my guests that I had the pleasure of having a chat with earlier this afternoon. Naslund Lazenby and his father, Mike Lazenby, are friends of mine, and they are special guests of the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon. Please welcome them to the Assembly.

Hon. members, also in the galleries this afternoon are Tim Schindel and Blair Nielsen from Leading Influence. They are guests of the hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville has the call.

Support for Ukraine and Ukrainian Refugees

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've been watching the situation in Ukraine closely. As the MLA for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville and chair of the Advisory Council on Alberta-Ukraine Relations I wrote the Prime Minister back in January asking for strong sanctions to deter Vladimir Putin and his evil imperial ambitions.

As the situation escalated, I was proud that Alberta acted quickly to provide aid for Ukraine. Our government gave $6 million to the Canada-Ukraine foundation for humanitarian aid and $5 million to the Ukrainian World Congress's Unite with Ukraine campaign, which will provide essential military equipment to the Ukrainian territorial defence force, and $350,000 for the Ukrainian Canadian Congress for their Alberta Stands with Ukraine campaign. This morning I was exceptionally proud to stand with the Premier and the minister of labour and the Minister of Advanced Education to announce more than $2 million in new funding that will be used to support Ukrainian refugees coming to Alberta. The money announced today will be used primarily for settlement and language services delivered by newcomer organizations across the province.

This brings Alberta's total assistance to Ukraine to more than $13 million, and for that I want to say thank you: thank you to the Premier, thank you to our government, and thank you to all the advocates who are working so hard to support Ukraine in its time of need.

Alberta has a long history of Ukrainian immigration and a population of more than 350,000 people of Ukrainian descent. Our history is everywhere, from the wonderful restaurants like Taste of Ukraine, where we were earlier today, to the Vegreville Pysanka Festival, to UFest and the giant pysanka in my riding of Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

These refugees have been through a lot, but I'm confident that our people in our newcomer organizations will be able to lessen their burden. I believe I speak for the entire Legislature when I say that my heart is with the people of Ukraine as they fight for their freedom and sovereignty. For those who are coming: welcome to Alberta. [Remarks in Ukrainian]

Health Care System Capacity and Front-line Workers

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, front-line health care workers in Alberta are crying for help. They're exhausted after two years of this UCP government's attacks, two years of being pushed to the limits by a government that repeatedly acted last and least to contain the spread of COVID-19 and put political interests ahead of public health.

Here's what those workers are saying. From a rural ER doctor:

I assessed a patient in their car in the parking lot today. Why? Because all of our isolation rooms were filled. Why? Because EMS is so short staffed it takes 20+ hours to get a sick kid and fractures transferred.

From a pediatric ER doctor:

Our waiting rooms in Alberta children's hospitals are packed to the gills by afternoon. 50 children in the waiting room is the norm, and has been for weeks... Most of my colleagues are so burnt out that they can't even see it... so very sad, and frightening for future healthcare.

From an anesthesiologist in northern Alberta:

ICU and hospital capacity appear steady in this wave of the pandemic... but 1000s of surgeries have still been cancelled, primary care capacity has fallen precipitously and healthcare worker burnout is worse than ever. Healthcare systems are still falling apart.

From a physician at the Royal Alex hospital in my constituency:

We are a collapsed healthcare system with overcapacity meeting us at every corner. Nurses are burnt out and short staffed. Physicians are not at their best. And we simply do not have beds... We are asking our teams to work with less resources... Patients wait hours and hours for an assessment in the ER, only to wait hours (days) to get an inpatient bed... we are now in a 6th wave where our wards are already crumbled... it's a wonder any of us are still standing. The trauma and memories of December 2020 flood back quickly... It's in every pair of eyes I see on the ward... I hope our government will listen to those of us screaming with hoarse voices.

Mr. Speaker, Albertans deserve a government that invests in and supports our public health care system and the workers who make it possible, that builds them up instead of tearing them down. That's our promise, to listen to and work with health care workers, to undo the damage done by the UCP, restore access to care across our province. That's what an Alberta NDP government will do.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod has a statement to make.

Nanton Grain Elevators

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Livingstone-Macleod is full of many great historical landmarks. Earlier this year I rose in this very House to highlight the history of the Crowsnest Pass, with train robberies, police shootouts, and the Roxy Theatre being added as a provincial historical resource.

I once again have a chance to speak about another historical landmark in my region being preserved and recognized for its ties to Alberta's rich history. The grain elevators in Nanton, which were recently featured on many news networks, are nearly 100 years old. In the early 2000s the abandonment of the Canadian Pacific Railway threatened these historic elevators, that stand along highway 2, with demolition. The town of Nanton formed a historical society with the original goal to save the largest of these remaining elevators. The Save One society has been working hard for over 10 years, putting in incredible effort, and thanks to the many volunteers and local businesses, they were able to save not one but all three of the remaining elevators.

On April 9 I joined the society and members of the community to celebrate the Nanton grain elevators' provincial historic resource designation. Thanks to the Minister of Culture and his work, these grain elevators continue to stand and tell the story of hard-working farmers in southern Alberta and will do so for years to come. It's because of the work of citizens of Nanton and the work they've done for years rallying together for the protection and preservation of the town's historic resources. As the MLA for Livingstone-Macleod I'm so proud of my constituents and their drive to save these historic landmarks in southern Alberta.

It's also my job to help in any way I can, so I've been speaking with the Minister of Culture and his office to confirm what funding is available to these organizations to help them in this initiative so they can continue to revitalize and maintain these historic landmarks in Nanton. I look forward to seeing the grain elevators stand tall for years to come, and I appreciate the hard work of the residents of Nanton. I thank them for their continued persistence to make sure they remain in the community and they're a towering reminder of Alberta's rich farming history.

Thank you.

Government Policies and Cost of Living

Ms Ganley: A decent place to live, food, family, a job that pays the bills, a warm place to sleep, a chance to contribute, a doctor when you're sick, education for your kids, a life, a government that enforces the law equally and tells the truth. Most Albertans don't ask for much. They care about their neighbours. They want to build a better world. They want their children to have access to the same opportunities they did or even better.

But this UCP government can't seem to understand that. They're so wrapped up in their ideology and their infighting that they have completely lost sight of the fact that Albertans are struggling, struggling with those basics, struggling to keep the lights and the heat on and food on the table. They have become so far removed from the everyday lives of the people they are supposed to serve that they think it's okay for people to have their heat turned off in a snowstorm. There are thousands of people in Calgary who have their power cut off, but this government: all they'll say is, "That's their problem; just call the company and hope."

Government is supposed to be there for the people. It is the people of this province we were elected to serve, not large, profitable corporations, not insurance companies. People. This government has billions for profitable corporations, but they need to cut a retired firefighter's wife off from her drug plan to save money. Insurance companies charge Albertans even more while they struggle. The UCP claims that it's necessary. Then they try to hide the facts. The people of this province aren't asking for much, just a decent life they can afford, schools for their kids, a curriculum to actually prepare them for the modern world, an ambulance in an emergency. They want a government they can trust. The UCP can't deliver: they can't be trusted, and, worse, they call people names for even daring to ask, the people they are supposed to serve.

Albertans deserve better. They deserve a government they can trust. Fortunately, they'll have the chance soon.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Sikh Heritage Month

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the month of April Albertans marked the beginning of Sikh Heritage Month. This is a great time for us to recognize the many past and current contributions of the Sikh community in making Alberta the province that it is today. Since the arrival of the first Sikh immigrants in the early 19th century, the Sikh community has helped make Canada a stronger country through its accomplishment in many parts of our society. Whether it's politics, sciences, arts, business or sports, the Sikh community has helped shape Canada's cultural fabric. Our country is the proud home of more than half a million members of the Sikh community, making Canada home to one of the largest Sikh diasporas in the world.

Mr. Speaker, sadly, a policy implemented in 2016 under the previous NDP government restricted many Sikhs from applying to work as a correctional peace officer. A policy that required all applicants to be clean shaven was recently removed, now allowing those of the Sikh religion an equal opportunity to pursue a career in that field. Our UCP government was elected as defenders of religious freedom and rights in Alberta. I'm proud to see our government taking steps as it further creates Alberta as a place of belonging for all individuals no matter what their religious beliefs may be.

The values of equality, selflessness, openness, and compassion are the core principles of Sikhism, and these values will be highlighted during Vaisakhi and Nagar Kirtan in Calgary and Edmonton next month. As a member of the Legislature I invite all people to participate. Have a great Sikh Heritage Month.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Southern Alberta Concerns

Ms Sweet: Mr. Speaker, during this break, while the government was focused on the internal drama and leadership issues, I had the opportunity to spend some time with the people of southern Alberta. I was able to travel to the communities of Medicine Hat, Claresholm, Fort Macleod, and Lethbridge, meeting with Albertans to hear their thoughts, concerns, and what they wanted to see for the future of this province.

The UCP talks about swagger. They paint a glowing picture of Alberta, but they are ignoring the very real concerns, the fears that Albertans are telling them and telling me. I have heard the fear of the future of health care and heard from the people who are scared about the prospect of nearly 90 job losses in Claresholm because of this government's health care privatization agenda. I heard concerns about education and how this curriculum doesn't support schools and students and the future that we need to get there. I heard deep concerns about affordability, concerns about the cost of fuel, and how this government isn't doing enough to bring down the cost of fuel for Alberta farmers and ranchers. I heard about skyrocketing utility costs that are hammering rural communities and how the UCP has done not nearly enough to provide relief to those struggling families.

This government may boast and brag about a balanced budget, but if they bothered to listen to the Albertans in the communities they claim to represent, they would hear that these people feel left behind, burdened by UCP policies that take more and leave them with less. But more than anything, I have heard that the people of rural Alberta are ready for change, how they are tired of this government that ignores their concerns, takes them for granted, and piles on more and more while delivering less and less.

Mr. Speaker, if this government was not so focused on themselves and on the upending drama of the UCP in its leadership race, they would hear the concerns that I've heard on my tour of southern Alberta and I hear every day. Southern Alberta deserves a voice, and they're not getting it from this UCP government.

Federal Emissions Reduction Plan

Mr. Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, on March 29, 2022, we heard Trudeau promise that Canada would have net-zero carbon emissions by 2050. And while we all know that Trudeau never keeps his promises, this announcement is very concerning. When we put a magnifying lens on this net-zero carbon emissions plan, we see that Trudeau's ideal target would mean cutting emissions equivalent to Canada's entire oil and gas sector, agriculture sector, and electricity sector combined. This is insane. But what's even more insane is that we've had pipeline after pipeline cancelled in the name of reducing emissions and moving towards renewable energy sources.

Then on April 6 Trudeau announces $12 billion in funding for a deep-water drilling site offshore Newfoundland and Labrador. Mr. Speaker, let me be clear. I'm in complete support of this energy project and its role in Canada's energy security, but I am completely baffled as to why the approval process for oil projects ends in such different results on the east side of Canada compared to here in Alberta.

This decision is just another example of federal government hypocrisy, and Albertans are starting to figure out that this hypocrisy is targeted. Why would he strike down Alberta pipelines, enforce massive carbon taxes, announce huge emissions reductions, decisions that adversely impact Alberta's oil sector, just to approve an oil project in eastern Canada? I mean, we all know that Trudeau's Greenpeace minister, who has spent most of his life protesting the oil and gas sector, even breaking the law to do so, is going to make terrible decisions, but this plan is just that, pure hypocrisy.

Mr. Speaker, at least now we all know that Trudeau is full of it when it comes to our pipelines and the emissions arguments. He's just shutting down our pipelines because they're tied to Alberta, so let me be clear. I will stand for Albertans, and I will stand for ethical Alberta oil.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Former Municipal Affairs Minister's Travel

Mr. Schmidt: Yesterday the Ministry of Municipal Affairs came to the Public Accounts Committee, and it was a remarkable meeting. It was a clear demonstration of the dysfunction and double standards of this government.

Let's rewind the tape back to the fall of 2020. The government was slow to act, and the second wave of COVID was hammering the province. Our health care system was at the brink of collapse. Finally, the government started to act. The Provincial Operations Centre was raised to status level 3, a state of emergency was declared, and the government told all Albertans that they were cancelling Christmas. No travel, they ordered. Don't visit your friends. Don't visit your family. It was too risky. And most Albertans listened.

But as we know, one of the key ministers at that time did not listen. The Minister of Municipal Affairs decided that she was special; the rules didn't apply to her. The minister responsible for emergency management and the vice-chair of the Emergency Management Cabinet Committee abandoned her post and left for Hawaii. This Albertans know, and they are still angry.

But what we learned yesterday at Public Accounts was even more remarkable. Apparently, the now fired minister who left the country didn't tell her department or the Emergency Management Agency that she was leaving. Let me say that again. We were in a state of emergency, the Provincial Operations Centre was operating at level 3, and of the 20 senior officials who came to Public Accounts yesterday, not one knew the minister had bolted for Hawaii. This is a profound failure of leadership and a profound failure in the machinery of government. Either the former minister was so useless that it didn't matter if she was around, or this government is so broken that during an emergency she could abandon her post without telling the 600 people who work for her that she was leaving.

One thing is crystal clear from yesterday's meeting. Albertans deserve better. They deserve a government that does its job, ministers that don't abandon their posts during tough times, and after the next election Albertans will get the government that they deserve.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Economic Recovery and Unemployment

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Unemployment is a scary thought for all Albertans and, of course, a reality for some. Albertans need to be able to work to provide for their families and to make a living. Alberta's unemployment rate has dropped to 6 and a half per cent, which is lower than when this government took office. Despite the challenges we have faced over the last two years, considering a world-wide pandemic as well as the 2020 energy price crash in oil, Alberta's unemployment rate has continued to drop.

Compare this to the NDP record of increasing unemployment and chasing away investment. Not only has our government been able to decrease the unemployment rate, Mr. Speaker, but Alberta is now leading the country with an employment rate of 64.7 per cent and a women's employment rate of 60.7 per cent. Alberta is coming back, and we're coming back stronger than ever. Just in the first quarter of this year Alberta has gained 22,000 new jobs and over 150,000 new jobs since January 2021.

As of now labour shortages are one of the things holding us back, and our government is addressing those issues through the Alberta at work program. Through Budget 2022 we are investing $600 million over three years in this program. Alberta at work is designed to help Albertans build the skills necessary to support themselves as well as their families. In a statement issued by our Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation following the March 2022 labour force survey, he said:

Our economy is turning a corner. After two extremely challenging years due to the COVID-19 pandemic, Alberta is returning to a more normal way of life. With the lifting of public health measures in the province in early March, more Albertans are returning to the workplace, getting back to work, and getting back to business.

Alberta's economy is coming back, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta recovery plan is proving its success.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Government Policies and Cost of Living

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, today's StatsCan report on sky-high inflation should be a wake-up call for this UCP government: 6.7 per cent. We know it's even worse when it comes to groceries. Alberta families will pay an extra thousand dollars this year alone. Why? Well, because breakfast cereal: up 12 per cent. Butter: up 16 per cent. Pasta: up 18 per cent. Now, the Premier could help today by reversing his pernicious, insidious bracket creep tax grab that's worth almost the same amount. Why won't he?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm glad to see that the NDP has finally discovered inflation as the number one issue facing Albertans right now, the rising cost of living made dramatically worse by their carbon tax. They conspired with Justin Trudeau to make the cost of everything more expensive. They supported his 25 per cent increase in that carbon tax on April Fool's Day, and they want to more than triple it from where it is today. That makes energy more expensive, groceries, food, home heating, and everything. When will the NDP finally come on the side of taxpayers and oppose these carbon taxes?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, way back in 2019 it used to be government policy that if inflation went up, Albertans got more back on their taxes, but the UCP broke their election promise and froze the basic personal exemption in what the Premier himself used to call a sneaky tax grab. Fast-forward to today. Inflation is exploding. Almost half of Alberta families are just $200 away from not being able to make ends meet. Simple question, again, to the Premier: why won't he reverse his sneaky tax grab? It's not about me; it's about the guy in the Premier's chair for the moment.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, first of all, 40 per cent of Albertans pay no provincial income tax. We have by far the most generous basic exemption in the country, the lowest income taxes, no sales tax. We're the only province with no land transfer tax, the only province with no capital tax, no payroll tax, the lowest business taxes. But the biggest tax increase that's driving inflation and the cost of living comes from the Liberal-NDP carbon tax. Why, three weeks ago, did the NDP stand up and vote in favour of Justin Trudeau's 25 per cent increase in the carbon tax?

Ms Notley: Not answering the question.

You know, Mr. Speaker, it gets worse. Economists talk about inflation inequality, where low-income people actually pay a higher inflation rate because inflation rises on necessities faster, but this government has chosen to pile onto these low-income families. They've frozen income support, kicked 40,000 people off their drug coverage, cut rental supplements, cut affordable housing. If the measure of a leader is how they treat the most vulnerable, then what does it say about a government whose policies are designed to hurt the most vulnerable?

Mr. Kenney: That's manifestly untrue. In fact, the budget for Community and Social Services and those various support programs is increasing in the budget that the NDP is opposing. This government is taking more action by far than any government in Canada to help people address the rising cost of living. That's why we have suspended the Alberta fuel tax. It's why we're providing the $150 rebate on electricity, and we're capping natural gas prices at $6.50. Altogether on an annual basis that amounts to about $2 billion of consumer relief from Alberta's government.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition for her second set of questions.

Education Funding and Curriculum Redesign

Ms Notley: Quote: this is the most difficult budget that we will have faced in my nine years as superintendent. Mr. Speaker, that's the Edmonton public schools district superintendent announcing that, thanks to this UCP budget, 1,700 students will not be funded in Edmonton this year alone. This decision means fewer teachers, fewer extracurriculars, and, worst of all, fewer supports for children with a range of learning challenges. Can the Premier explain why the UCP's plan for Edmonton includes watching 1,700 kids enter the school system with no new funding?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, in fact, in this balanced budget there is a 1.7 per cent increase, a $700 million increase for Education, but here's the difference. We've been able to increase support for vulnerable people, through Community and Social Services and Children's Services, for education and health care while maintaining Canada's lowest taxes and getting to a balanced budget. Why? Because this government has been focused on economic growth, on job creation, and that's why we're leading Canada in job growth and economic growth.

Ms Notley: Interesting story, Mr. Speaker.

You know, last night I got time to knock on some doors in Edmonton. In two hours I met two speech therapists who've seen the care they offer children cut back, a parent whose child lost the funding that helps her with her extra learning needs, a mom with kids whose classroom is overflowing, and a nurse so deeply concerned about the UCP curriculum, she may take her kids and leave Alberta. Why doesn't the Premier start listening to these Albertans, unlike his minister who is briefing him right now? They know the real consequences of UCP decisions on their kids, and they are not good ones.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the Edmonton public school board has a billion-dollar budget, and they have a $38 million reserve. They're receiving a 1.7 per cent increase in their per-pupil fund this year.

She says that it's a very interesting story, Alberta's economic growth. She couldn't be more right about that, to see the best year ever in exports, the best year ever in manufacturing, the best year ever in oil and gas, the best year ever in forestry, the highest revenues ever in agriculture, the best year ever in film and television, and billions more coming in hydrogen and petrochemicals, all of it turning into new jobs.

Ms Notley: And tens of thousands of kids with special learning needs without any of the support they need. That's the story.

This Premier is either uninformed, uninterested, or simply unable to grasp why Alberta families do not trust the UCP when it comes to education. They've cut RCSD. They've cut PUF funding. They refuse to fund enrolment growth. They've lost a thousand teachers, and their curriculum is an embarrassment. Why does this government care so little about our future generations? Why are they so quick to do everything they can to sacrifice our public education system?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, Alberta's government is investing $1.4 billion in support for special-needs kids in our education system. That funding went up last year; it's going up again this year. We can only increase investments in services like that if the economy is growing. We went through four years of economic devastation and a jobs crisis created by the NDP's high-tax, high-debt policies. Because we are now leading the country in growth, we've been able to balance the budget and invest in critical services like this.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Lethbridge-West.

Insurance Company Profits and Premium Costs

Ms Phillips: When asked about hundreds of millions more being billed to Albertans for car insurance, the Premier brushed off any suggestion of doing anything differently. Instead, he used scary words like "Soviet-style insurance system." The Albertans I talk to: all they want is cheaper car insurance. They're drowning in bills, and all this Premier has is tales of a bogeyman. Well, lo and behold, Premiers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba have public auto insurance. Is the Premier really declaring that his good friends Scott Moe, Brad Wall, and Brian Pallister are all Soviets in disguise?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, I know the NDP – I can't believe they're pretending to care about this, because they don't want people driving. That's why they have a carbon tax. You know, when it comes to driving, I have a question for the NDP: do they support Justin Trudeau's new tax on pickup trucks? He wants to add a thousand dollars to the cost of buying an F-150 . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The Premier is the one with the call.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, does the NDP support their ally Justin Trudeau's proposed pickup tax on pickups and SUVs? That would be between $1,000 and $4,000. That's a heck of a lot more. The reality is that insurance premiums are coming down and partly as a result of this government.

Ms Phillips: The Premier went on yesterday to say that he didn't recall meeting with any insurance lobbyists, but as Calgary Sun columnist Rick Bell points out, his own former campaign manager, Nick Koolsbergen, is now a hotshot consultant who lobbied the Premier's office and key advisers about lifting the insurance cap to give companies even bigger profits. The lifting of that cap shot insurance rates up by 30 per cent in a single year for some drivers. Has the Premier or any of his ministers or key advisers ever discussed removing the insurance cap with Nick Koolsbergen or any member of his Wellington Advocacy lobbyist firm?

Mr. Kenney: Well, no, I have not, Mr. Speaker. I've met with the insurance companies to ask them to reduce premiums and to ensure that we are providing financial services to the Alberta oil and gas industry, something the NDP never did.

Mr. Speaker, under the NDP more and more insurance companies were leaving the Alberta market, making it increasingly difficult for people to get insurance at all. Many people had to pay 100 per cent of their premiums up front. And now their solution is to replicate the disaster of ICBC and to nationalize the industry to remove any competition. That would be a disaster.

Ms Phillips: So here we have it straight from the Premier. He meets with insurance company lobbyists, and they get whatever profits they want, but the Premier is not listening to ordinary people just trying to drive their car and – I don't know – appropriately put gas in it.

The Premier and the Finance minister have claimed that insurance companies weren't making money and that that's why they had to jack people's rates, but the facts tell a different story. Even before the government lifted the cap, these companies were netting a billion dollars in profit. So when the Premier said that insurance companies weren't making any money, did he actually mean they needed more than a billion dollars in profit? Just how much more did Nick Koolsbergen tell the government to scoop from Albertans' pockets?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, I know the NDP hates all of the good news in this province. They hate the fact that we're leading Canada in economic growth and in job growth, and apparently they also don't like to hear the fact that insurance premiums are coming down. Right now seven insurers have filed for rate reductions since the fall of 2020 . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Okay. Okay. It's important for the Speaker to be able to hear the Premier. You might not like the answer, but he's entitled to give it.

Mr. Kenney: . . . including a 7 per cent proposed rate reduction from AMA. This government took action to limit certain soft injury personal issue awards that were driving up costs. What we need is a competitive marketplace, and that is resulting now, finally, in lower premiums.

Utility Costs and Rebates

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, while the UCP has been doing basically nothing about skyrocketing utility costs, Alberta families have been drowning in debt. But all the current government has for them are weak attempts to deflect responsibility. They point to everyone but themselves. They even try to blame others for a transmission overbuild created by Conservative legislation. But a new study from the University of Calgary has found that it is actually corporate profits that are driving up costs on Alberta families. This is a major issue for Albertans. Why is this government trying to hide the real reason for skyrocketing costs?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, once again, when the NDP cries crocodile tears about utility prices, it's like the arsonist being concerned about the fire that he set. They put 7 and a half billion dollars of additional costs on electricity consumers . . .

Ms Gray: Point of order.

Mr. Kenney: . . . by building more infrastructure for transmission. They costed $1.3 billion in their power purchasing agreement fiasco. They cost billions for ratepayers through their ideological rush to shut down our coal plants, the most reliable, low-cost form of energy production, and then they imposed their carbon tax on Albertans. Mr. Speaker, this government is providing nearly $2 billion of relief to . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View, and a point of order is noted at 2:03.

Ms Ganley: That overbuild was Conservative legislation we opposed. Check the Hansard, Premier.

The Premier gloats about forthcoming rebates, but they should have been in place months ago. The UCP has been promising, waffling, planning, and failing to deliver for months now while Albertans struggle. It snowed last night a lot. It was cold. Does the Premier really think that families should go without heat and be left to sit in the dark while he sorts out how to deliver his underwhelming rebates?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, 7 and a half billion dollars of additional transmission costs, $1.3 billion in penalties to the power corporations, billions of dollars to shut down the coal plants, and then billions of dollars out of consumers' pockets through their carbon taxes: that is why electricity prices have gone up. Thankfully, we have a government that is acting with our electricity rebate, our pause on the fuel tax, and our cap on gas prices, providing greater relief for consumers, the greatest relief of any provincial government in Canada by a country mile.

Ms Ganley: I think most Albertans will trust the U of C over this UCP government.

Mr. Speaker, the rebates are tiny; some would call them paltry. They don't even put a dent in the thousands owed by some Alberta families. Even the UCP MLA for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland admitted it in this House. All the UCP government has are excuses and attempts to shift blame. I'm going to ask one more time. Does the Premier think it's fair that power companies quintupled their profits while Alberta families owe thousands in outstanding utility bills and are being threatened with shut-offs?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the member knows perfectly well that utilities are heavily regulated in terms of what they can charge. But the NDP approved 7 and a half billion dollars of costs that have to be repaid by consumers. Their carbon tax: they want to quintuple the carbon tax. That will be the single biggest inflationary driver in electricity bills.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have some good news for the House. We promised an independent audit of the NDP's power purchasing agreement fiasco. Fasten your seat belts because that gets released tomorrow. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Alberta at Work Program

Mr. Rutherford: Mr. Speaker, Alberta has been through tough times with the pandemic and the crash in oil prices, but Alberta is also looking up, with great economic news that we've heard lately. Yesterday I was able to learn more about the good news for Alberta workers as part of the Alberta at work program. This is welcome news for my constituents and Albertans. To the Minister of Labour and Immigration: in what ways will these critical investments help Albertans share in the province's successful economic recovery, especially underrepresented groups, including women, Indigenous people, and newcomers to Canada?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Leduc-Beaumont for that very important question. Budget 2022 made a record investment of more than $600 million to help make sure that we have all kinds of programs that will help fellow citizens who are out of work, looking for employment, or help them to upgrade their skills. I am confident that the record investment that we are going to make with the Alberta jobs now program, the Alberta at work program, the Canada-Alberta job grant program will help Albertans who are looking for employment, especially youth, immigrants, and Indigenous people.

Mr. Rutherford: Mr. Speaker, given that knowledge and skills of workers are a key factor for economic growth and given that education increases the efficiency of each individual worker and helps them get the skills they need to participate in Alberta's recovery plan and given that businesses are looking for new skilled workers, to the Minister of Advanced Education: could you explain how our government is connecting students to fulfilling career paths that are key to Alberta's economic growth? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. Minister of Advanced Education is the only one with the call.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I appreciate the question from the member. You know, there are a number of initiatives that we're undertaking right now to do just that. In fact, we're investing $235 million over three years to help connect more Albertans and more students to meaningful job opportunities. As part of that, we're investing $171 million over three years to create 7,000 additional spaces at our postsecondary institutions in in-demand programs like tech, aviation, health care, and many more.

Mr. Rutherford: Mr. Speaker, given that vulnerable Albertans can and should be a part of Alberta's economic recovery plan and given that we also consider them to be involved in the workforce and support them in doing that and given that Alberta's government has always been the social safety net for Albertans and will continue to do so, to the Minister of Community and Social Services: what additional programs and services will be developed to support the most vulnerable and help them with employment? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for a great question. Yes, my ministry will invest an additional $20 million to support vulnerable Albertans so that we can get innovative, customized support to help them remove barriers from employment. Not only do we provide the social safety net for vulnerable Albertans; we want to empower them to reach their full potential.

Private Health Services Delivery

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are rightly worried about the UCP's plans to dismantle and privatize health care. Just this week we've seen how the privatization of labs has been a dismal failure, but the UCP see delays, inefficiency, and public dollars going to private profits instead of care as a success. I've heard concerns and worries from eye patients in Calgary that ophthalmology surgeries in the Rockyview hospital will be moved and contracted out at the Holy Cross Centre, bringing into question future access and quality of eye care. My question for the minister is simple. Are ophthalmology surgeries being moved from the Rockyview to be contracted out privately? Yes or no?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the hon. member for the question. You know, the hon. member raises the issue of privatization. Quite frankly, that is not the case. We need to get past the public-private delivery debate and focus on our need to make the system work better for all Alberta patients. That includes saving money so we can keep investing in services without going to the taxpayer for every dollar. It includes contracting more services using public dollars, publicly administered, like we're doing, like we have done for decades. While in power, members opposite used chartered surgical facilities. We'll be using those as well. There will be an announcement in the near future.

Mr. Shepherd: Now, given that the Ontario Conservative government's privatization of ophthalmology surgeries resulted in a 25 per cent increase in cost per surgery and loss of capacity in public hospitals for crucial and emergency eye care and given that previous Alberta Conservative government actions to contract and privatize eye surgeries resulted in longer wait times when they made those moves and given that Saskatchewan's surgical initiative, which the UCP have based their plan on, has not led to reductions in the surgery wait-list at all, how can the Minister of Health justify plowing forward with privatization when it's failed across this country for decades?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, that simply isn't the case. If we actually take a look at cataracts, wait times for cataract surgeries have dropped to the lowest levels in the last seven years. Why? Because during the pandemic we leveraged chartered surgical facilities to be able to get caught up. Our wait-lists are far too long. We're concerned about the Alberta patient. We're going to leverage not only the chartered surgical facilities but the public systems to be able to get more surgeries done so that we can actually provide the services that Albertans need and want. They're in pain, and we need to help them get healthy, and we're going to deliver that.

Mr. Shepherd: Now, given that reports and data that the UCP have built their plan to privatize on were released before the UCP threw our system into chaos by fighting with doctors and nurses, firing Dr. Yiu, and charging forward with a privatization agenda, all during a global pandemic, and given that the UCP should recognize, if they care about patients, that, following what they've put Albertans through with their chaos in health care, Albertans value stable and publicly funded care more than ever, will the Minister of Health commit today, here and now, in this House to pause all plans to privatize care till after the next election? Let Albertans decide the future of public health care.

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it absolutely clear: leveraging chartered surgical facilities is publicly funded health care. It is publicly funded. It is publicly delivered. What our approach is is actually addressing the issues that we had with tremendously huge wait-lists. We made a commitment in our platform that we would get that done. Unfortunately, we're not going to be able to get it done by next year, but we will get it done. We ran on a platform that we'd use chartered surgical facilities. We are going to deliver on that, and we're also increasing our capacity within our public hospitals. This is public health care.

Calgary Downtown Revitalization

Member Ceci: While the Premier was busy prepping a speech to his members to save his job, our caucus was focused on developing plans to revitalize and bring new energy to downtown Calgary. Our plan focuses on economic diversification, the creation of an innovation district, and direct funding to support the Calgary plan. We also propose small-business support, events and festivals, transit, more child care spaces, affordable housing units downtown, and support for mental health and addictions. Since the government has been too busy with infighting, we've done the work for them. Will they support our plan so we can restore vibrancy to downtown Calgary?

Mr. Schweitzer: Oh, Mr. Speaker, it's time for a little bit of NDP legacy here. When the NDP literally told people to go to the province of British Columbia for employment – but let me tell this right now. Do you know that two cities in the province of Alberta, Edmonton and Calgary, are in the top 10 for the most affordable cities in the entire world? That's big news, and people were starting to move back to the province of Alberta in the middle of last year. When will the NDP start cheerleading for Alberta?

Member Ceci: Given that they're affordable if you have a job and that we have the highest unemployment in Calgary at this time of all major Canadian cities and given that over a year ago our leader promised a plan to revitalize downtown and that we delivered and that over a year ago the Finance minister said that there'd be no help for downtown Calgary despite struggling . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order. This may be a first, but I am having a hard time hearing the question, and he does have a right to ask it. You might not like his question, but he has the right to ask it.

Member Ceci: . . . with vacancy rates not seen since the Great Depression, the highest unemployment rate among all Canadian cities – and, thankfully, we reversed that course when we were in government – to the minister: where's the plan? Why haven't you made it ready? Where is it? Would you like to read ours?

Mr. McIver: Well, here's the answer, Mr. Speaker. I'll have to talk fast: $59 million, University of Calgary; $41 million for SAIT; $38 million for the office of the chief medical officer; $22 million for a new interchange; $20 million for the Repsol centre; $5 million for the Calgary Stampede Foundation; $5 million for downtown revitalization; $474 million, Springbank off-stream reservoir; $466 million for three years as part of the $1.5 billion Calgary green line project; $387 million for the Calgary ring road project; $332 million for the Calgary cancer centre; $195 million for Calgary Deerfoot Trail upgrades; $99 million for Peter Lougheed Centre; $91 million for Bridgeland Riverside continuing care; $80 million for Glenbow revitalization; $73 million for Rockyview . . . [some applause]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Member Ceci: Given that he said $5 million for downtown revitalization and given that in the last election the Premier promised that his corporate handout would fill the office towers of downtown Calgary – he even accelerated the giveaway and said that companies would be irresponsible if they didn't relocate there; since then the number of head offices has dropped, Mr. Speaker – and given that in the UCP's budget all they could muster for downtown Calgary was a paltry $5 million, that only amounts to 2 per cent of what was requested by the city, and the Calgary Chamber president said that that's absolutely inadequate.

Mr. McIver: I've got more, Mr. Speaker: $80 million for Glenbow revitalization downtown; $73 million for Rockyview general hospital; $65 million for Foothills medical centre; $64 million for the Court of Appeal downtown; $45 million for Mount Royal University, repurposing existing facilities; $42 million for the cyclotron facility in Calgary. We are committed to every part of our province, but the question was about Calgary. We just ran out of time. We're doing more than they ever thought of. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Alberta 2030 Postsecondary Education Strategy

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, Budget 2022 will get Albertans back to work. This is ambitious given COVID-19, labour shortages in oil and gas, and digital disruption changing the nature of work. I've heard from constituents, especially those in trades, about how tough it is to gain new skills and explore other fields to earn a living. To the Advanced Education minister: how are the budget and the Alberta 2030 skills for jobs strategy going to support lifelong learning, and how can they help diversify skill sets that align better with the needs of the job market?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaidis: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a great question from my colleague. I appreciate that. As I was mentioning a moment ago, Budget 2022 contains $235 million in investment over three years to do precisely what the member is asking, to help ensure that our graduates are aligned with the skills and labour needs of our future economy. Specifically, we're providing $171 million to create 7,000 additional spaces in high-demand programs, in everything from veterinary medicine to aviation to tech to health care. As well, we're providing additional investment to support and bolster apprenticeship and trades training to help more Albertans find successful and rewarding careers in those areas, and there's more as well.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Alberta's economic prosperity is dependent on retaining talent both local and international and given that Budget 2022 seeks to improve talent retention by enhancing student skills via work-integrated learning opportunities, to the same minister: how will our government ensure accessibility to work-integrated learning and especially for international students who may be limited by work permits and perhaps some other legal requirements?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The topic of work-integrated learning is a very important one. The data is very clear. Students that have an opportunity to participate in an internship or a co-op opportunity are employed faster and earn higher incomes immediately after graduation than their counterparts. That's why Budget 2022 includes $6 million in new funding over three years to create additional work-integrated learning opportunities in the province. These opportunities help students get a foot in the door with an employer, help them to learn real-world work experience and be better prepared for the job market.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Budget 2022 will boost trades in Alberta by investing over $30 million to expand apprenticeship education and given that at the tabling of Bill 67, the Skilled Trades and Apprenticeship Education Act, one major sentiment was that the trades have been somehow treated historically as less worthy than other postsecondary options, to the same minister: how will this $30 million investment enhance the parity of esteem in the trades?

2:20

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, firstly, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that our government firmly believes that a trade certificate has the same value, merit, and worth as a university degree. That's precisely why we're investing $30 million over three years to support and bolster trades and apprenticeship education in the province. More specifically, we're providing $15 million over three years to work with our incredible trades partners, organizations like Women Building Futures and Careers: the Next Generation. We'll have more to say about that in the coming months. As well, Budget 2022 includes $15 million to help create new apprenticeships of the future.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Health Care Workforce Recruitment and Retention

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta is dealing with another wave of the COVID-19 pandemic. Despite this, I'm hearing again and again from Albertans and constituents who are saying it's getting harder and harder to find a family doctor or access emergency treatment without lengthy wait times, all while the policies and actions of this government are leading to record numbers of health care professionals leaving this province. To the Minister of Health: why does it seem that it's government policy to do everything it can to drive away public health care workers and doctors from this province?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the hon. member for the question. I'd like that member to check his facts. Actually, we have more health care professionals working in the province, not less. The most recent report from CPS has indicated that over Q1 last year we have 99 additional doctors, who actually came to work in Alberta. In addition, nurses: over the past two years we have hired 1,800 more nurses; paramedics: 230 additional paramedics; AHS staff in our budget: 2,300 additional AHS staff. We are focused on delivering health care.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the College of Physicians & Surgeons is reporting that nearly triple the number of physicians are leaving our province in 2022 compared to previous years and given that the Alberta Medical Association has suggested that the most important step in stopping physicians from leaving Alberta is negotiating agreements with doctors, after this government scrapped the previous agreement in 2019, and given that the former CEO of Alberta Health Services was fired by the UCP for standing up for public health care, to the same minister: what is the government doing to assure Albertans that this trajectory towards health care crisis cannot continue?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. As noted in my previous answer, we are actually expanding our health care capacity. We're focused on hiring more health care professionals in the province. In fact, the hon. member is right: there are doctors who actually do leave. However, there are more doctors coming in. That is normal. We are increasing, as I indicated before, Q1 versus Q1, an additional 99 doctors. We are doing more because we know that we need more health care professionals to deliver the services that Albertans need. We are investing an additional $600 million in operating expenses this year, $600 million next year, $600 million the year after that. In addition, we are investing in capital and infrastructure. We will build the system and . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that what the minister said only drives home the point that what they are doing is furthering American-style, chartered private medical facilities, that they're pushing forward these increased risks to our public health care system and given that Alberta's health care workers have worked so bravely in stepping up during this pandemic, putting their own health and safety at risk to ensure Albertans can remain safe and receive quality public health care, to the same minister: how can the government justify its push for wage rollbacks, laying off health care workers, firing the head of Alberta Health Services for standing up for public health care and still say they're upholding the public health guarantee?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I just want to be crystal clear: we are not laying off health care workers. I was very pleased that an agreement was reached between AHS and United Nurses of Alberta, which increased the wages and also provided incentives for nurses to be able to work in rural Alberta. We recognize that there are challenges in certain areas with certain professions for health care workers, particularly in rural Alberta. We have dedicated $90 million last year and another $90 million this year to be able to address this issue. We are focused on building our health care capacity. We are focused on ensuring that Albertans receive the health care we need. Our budget is delivering it, and we're going to continue to . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar is next.

Extreme Heat Mitigation

Mr. Schmidt: A report from the Intact centre on climate change at the University of Waterloo says that alarm bells should be ringing about the risk that intense heat poses. The report, entitled Irreversible Extreme Heat, calls on governments to consider extreme heat to be a natural disaster. We've already seen the consequences that intense heat can impose with news that the June 2021 heat wave resulted in the deaths of 66 Calgarians. Can the Minister of Environment and Parks state categorically what this government is doing to protect Albertans from extreme heat so that we don't see the same sort of tragedy again this year?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta continues to lead the way when it comes to investment in reduction of GHG technology inside this province, but I can tell you that what we will not do is join that member and his friends in Extinction Rebellion and the federal government and continue forward with an insane climate change plan that we've seen come from the federal government this last couple of weeks that would result in 150,000-plus jobs in this province going away. Shame on that member for supporting that type of argument going forward. When will he stand in this place and condemn the federal government's carbon tax?

Mr. Schmidt: Given that the report states that the prairies will feel the effects of extreme heat and urges governments to engage in better planning to incorporate heat concerns into city planning codes, address options like public shade, trees, artificial canopies, and incorporate water-based cooling systems like ponds and sprinklers, but given that this budget plans to cut and ultimately eliminate climate resilience projects, going from $50 million to zero, meaning that municipalities and Albertans are on their own in the event of future extreme heat events, will the minister rethink this senseless cut and make the investments needed to avoid future tragedies like we saw last year?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this government just announced $10 billion in project investments on GHG reduction technology that creates 16,000 jobs inside our province in partnership with our industry, a sharp contrast to that hon. member and his colleagues inside the federal government and the NDP-Liberal coalition, who announced a plan just the other day, supported by the NDP in Ottawa, that would result in production cuts inside this province and hundreds of thousands of jobs being lost inside this province. Shame on him for supporting that.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that this report is just the latest evidence that as a province we face more extreme weather events that put Albertans at risk and should be planning and investing to mitigate these as best we can but given that this government's priority, based on their own budget documents, is to invest less, if anything at all, and given that this government has already told municipalities that they won't see a cent of provincial support when it comes to future disasters, these extreme weather events pose a serious threat to Alberta's economy and our people. Will the minister reverse his truly senseless cuts and invest to protect Albertans from the threat of climate change?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, what a ridiculous question. This government just the other day announced the process for the Springbank dry dam, a major piece of flood mitigation, very important for the city of Calgary, that his government failed on; continues to work on the new Bow River dam and historical investments in irrigation all across this province that also help to mitigate flood events. That's the way forward, continuing to invest in real projects that also create economic wealth, unlike his new boss, Justin Trudeau, who continues to force his NDP allies to support insane climate plans that continue to devastate economies across the country.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Kindergarten to Grade 6 Draft Curriculum

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Contrary to the position of the NDP, it is time for a curriculum update. Seeing as it's not been updated in many years and considering that students' grades were declining in literacy, math, and reading, the current curriculum just isn't up to par anymore, but unfortunately due to social media misinformation a few of my constituents have expressed concerns about how our government consulted with experts, principals, and teachers. To the Minister of Education: can you set the record straight about the review process you went through on the K to 6 curriculum?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. This is the most transparent and open curriculum review process Alberta has ever seen. During the drafting process the K to 6 Curriculum Working Group included approximately a hundred teachers from right across the province. We opened a public survey, gave every Albertan an opportunity to share their feedback on this curriculum. We also hosted virtual engagement sessions, had ongoing conversations with education partners and piloting teachers, provided a million dollars in curriculum engagement grants to support partner groups conducting engagements with their communities.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that a common complaint we often hear is how little our students know about financial literacy and how, because of that, our students are not properly prepared for the future and given that in your announcement last week you mentioned that fundamental financial literacy is one priority of this new K to 6 curriculum and given that the NDP failed to update the curriculum to set our children up for the future, to the Minister of Education: how are you incorporating this financial literacy into the K to 6 curriculum? [interjections]

2:30

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Students will begin learning financial literacy skills starting in kindergarten and each year through to grade 6 and the physical education and wellness curriculum being implemented this September. We heard loud and clear from parents that they wanted their children to have the skills and the knowledge about finances, and the curriculum delivers on this. Students will learn about money and how to responsibly manage it so that they are financially secure and successful in their lives. We owe it to our kids to do this.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you to the minister for that answer. Given that we all want Alberta's education to be considered as a gold standard in Canada and given that there has been a review process with experts, teachers, and parents but given that some parents in my constituency have expressed previous concerns about the age appropriateness of certain parts of the curriculum, to the Minister of Education: can you please explain to Albertan parents how the revised curriculum is age appropriate?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Member LaGrange: Absolutely. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As we've stated many times, we have been listening to the feedback from all Albertans and education stakeholders on the draft K to 6 curriculum. We heard concerns about age appropriateness and content level in some of the subjects, and we listened by revising the drafts more than once to address these concerns. We've also scaled back the number of subjects that will be implemented this fall and made sure that the three subjects we are implementing are age appropriate and that the concerns with scope and sequence have been addressed.

Member Irwin: Phoebe lives in my neighbourhood, Parkdale. She's got a baby. She's recently back to work but is absolutely struggling to make ends meet. Her power bill last month: over $900. Phoebe is just one of my many constituents being hammered by a cost-of-living crisis created by this UCP government. While our government acted to protect Albertans from outrageous price spikes and the kind of crisis we're seeing today, the UCP lifted the caps on electricity and then sat back watching as life became more and more unaffordable. Minister, a $50 cheque won't keep Phoebe and her family afloat. Will you act?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, the NDP caucus, that tried to unionize the family farm, is now asking about the high cost of electricity, which is high because of their short-sighted energy policies. I've said it before: everything they did on the electricity grid caused prices to go up. The best way to keep prices down is to keep the NDP away from our electricity grid.

Member Irwin: Given that it's not just that minister who doesn't think that supporting struggling Albertans like Phoebe is in his job description – the Minister of Finance is sitting back and doing nothing to help my constituents either. He hiked their auto insurance rates by up to 30 per cent by lifting the cap with no warning and then called this price hike courageous. Wow. Can the Finance minister explain how my constituents are supposed to make ends meet when he keeps pulling the rug out from under them? And can he just admit that Albertans can't trust the UCP when it comes to helping them make ends meet? Do better, Minister.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The NDP, when they were governing, brought in a rate cap, simply put a Band-Aid on a problem in auto insurance that was resulting in insurance companies pulling back products, ultimately reducing capacity in the province, with the end goal to nationalize the insurance industry in the province. We're dealing with the systemic issues that are driving up costs. We brought in Bill 41. It's making a difference. Premiums are coming down.

Member Irwin: Let's try another minister. The Education minister ignored the needs for a new Delwood school in my constituency, and she refused my offer to join me and our Education critic to tour the building, and this minister refuses to listen to my constituents' concerns about her terrible Dumpster-fire curriculum, and at the same time our government is benefiting from high oil prices . . .

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

Member Irwin: . . . the Edmonton public school board is facing a dramatic funding shortfall. Can the Education minister answer just for once, please, the people of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood and explain why my constituents are paying more, getting less, and being ignored by her government.

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to share with the member opposite that I just have received an invitation for grand openings of seven new schools for Edmonton public school division in the next couple of months. Seven new schools: two in the southwest and the rest in the northwest. Edmonton public school division in 2020 had 4,700 fewer students than they predicted and last year 1,000 fewer students than they predicted, yet we were funding to the higher levels. If they're having problems with their budget, I can certainly help them. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order. [interjections] A point of order is noted at 2:34 by the Deputy Government House Leader.

Technology Industry Development

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, I had the honour of introducing Bill 203, that would have established a venture fund for Albertans to invest in Alberta's future. The fund was designed to directly invest in the growth of Alberta's tech and AI sectors and exclusively support early-stage companies, start-ups, and scale-ups. Initially members from the other side seemed to support the bill. In fact, a UCP MLA even called it, quote, the most Albertan concept ever. End quote. Two weeks later they did a complete one-eighty and killed the bill in committee. Did the Premier or minister instruct private members to kill this legislation, and why?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, to the sole member of the capitalist caucus on the other side, we on this side look at the best practices around when it comes to making sure that we use taxpayer dollars wisely. Now it's time to tell them why that was such a failed idea. All they have to do is take a look at the NDP in Manitoba and the crocus fund. Just google it: crocus, Manitoba. They will find the millions and millions of dollars that were lost with that exact scheme. We will not do that. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bilous: It would cost the government zero dollars.

Given that this government has cut several programs designed to support our tech sector, causing us to lose ground to other provinces, and given that investing in the fund would have restored competitiveness and supported economic growth, diversification, creation of jobs, and long-term economic well-being in the province and given that we had two very accomplished stakeholders present at committee in support of this bill but the UCP couldn't provide a single person from industry to speak against it – the bill actually came from industry. Why is this government ignoring entrepreneurs and job creators in the tech sector?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, again, to all the folks, the millions of people watching online: crocus, Manitoba. Just google it. That's why this is one of the worst ideas that we've seen.

But let's talk about diversification in Alberta's economy. Let's start with the film and television industry. The NDP failed – failed – the film and television industry while we've doubled that in one year. The tech sector in Alberta: thousands of positions. It's growing so fast, we had to increase enrolment at our postsecondary institutions.

Mr. Bilous: Given that the concept of a venture fund and an advisory panel on technology and innovation were proposed in the Innovation Capital Working Group, your group, Minister, in a report written by industry experts on ways to attract investment and grow the tech sector and given that I've been consistently hearing from these leaders and the need for both of these – the minister has previously said that this shouldn't be a partisan issue. Is this government so blinded by their own partisanship that they won't even take good ideas from industry if they're brought forward by us?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we are so proud of the tech and innovation space in this province. Under the previous government venture capital funding was $37 million; last year, $561 million. Thousands of jobs are being created in this province. We're attracting major investment. RBC's innovation hub is here; Mphasis; Infosys; the largest investment, with Amazon Web Services, in our province's history in the tech space. We have to create programs to fill these jobs. That's a winning record.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South has a question.

Teacher Disciplinary Process and Bill 15

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The ATA union is in conflict of interest running teacher discipline. Bill 15 takes teacher discipline away from the union. The ATA union does not like Bill 15. It reduces their power. The NDP also does not like Bill 15. Maybe this shows that the bill is a good idea. To the minister: why is Bill 15 a good idea?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Bill 15 will reform the teaching profession discipline process to make the education system safer for students, their families, and teachers. It will further protect students and give parents peace of mind by enhancing the accountability and transparency of the teaching profession, removing any perception of bias that comes from having a union oversee the discipline of its dues-paying members and bringing Alberta in line with comparable provinces and other regulated professions. It is absolutely a great idea.

Mr. Stephan: Given that there are over 45,000 teachers yet over the past 10 years, with the ATA union in charge, there was not a single hearing for teacher incompetence and given that nobody believes that in the past 10 years there was not a single incompetent teacher in Alberta, to the minister: does this show that the ATA union may be incompetent in identifying incompetence?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, the member is absolutely correct. No competency hearings have taken place since the ATA assumed responsibility for the matters of professional competence, in 2009. Under Bill 15 any individual would be able to file a competency complaint with the registrar, who would then confirm if the teacher holds a certificate and then send the complaint to the commissioner to be addressed. The commissioner would review the matter and may initially either dismiss the case, recommend a penalty under expedited process, or use consent resolution agreements, dispute resolutions, or mediation to resolve the issue. We need this process.

Mr. Stephan: Given that the majority of teachers are competent, seeking to be excellent to teach and serve children, and given that children are the heart of our education system, not the ATA union, and given that Bill 15 seeks to put the best interests of children first in the teacher discipline process, to the minister: how will Bill 15 both increase student safety and strengthen the teaching profession?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker – and thank you to the member for the question – the vast majority of teachers in the province are absolutely wonderful professionals, amazing, caring individuals that have the best interests of students at heart. But when cases of teacher misconduct do occur, it is important that the students and their families know that their cases will be taken seriously and reviewed by an unbiased party. Bill 15 will elevate the status of the entire teaching profession with the appointment of an arm's-length commissioner who would oversee professional conduct and competency complaints against teachers and teacher leaders across this province. This is so necessary.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will return to the remainder of the daily Routine.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills I am pleased to present the committee's final report on Bill 203, Technology Innovation and Alberta Venture Fund Act, sponsored by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. This bill was referred to the committee on March 17, 2022. The report recommends that Bill 203 not proceed, and I request concurrence of the Assembly in the final report on Bill 203.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the motion for concurrence is a debatable motion. I see that there are members in the Assembly who have already risen to provide notice that they, in fact, would like to provide comments on concurrence, which will take place on the next available Monday.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Bill 18 Utility Commodity Rebate Act

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is an honour to rise and move first reading of Bill 18, the Utility Commodity Rebate Act.

More than ever Alberta families, farmers, and entrepreneurs are struggling with high energy prices. These high energy prices are caused by the NDP's short-sighted policies when they were in government, that made everything more expensive in the utilities world. While we are embracing long-term solutions, Mr. Speaker, we're coming up with short-term supports, and I'm happy to say that this government is taking action. If passed, this legislation will protect Albertans during times of high energy prices with targeted rebates.

Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 18 read a first time]

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. At 2:03 the Opposition House Leader rose on a point of order.

Point of Order Insulting Language

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. While I do not have access to the Blues, around 2:03, in response to a question, the Premier used language something like: it's like the arsonist pretending to care about a fire he just set. Arson is a Criminal Code offence. It's a criminal offence. I rose under 23(j), which prohibits members from using insulting language, using that kind of language. I may refer you to House of Commons Procedure and Practice, page 623.

The proceedings of the House are based on a long-standing tradition of respect for the integrity of all Members. Thus, the use of offensive, provocative or threatening language in the House is strictly forbidden.

Although the Premier was referring to the opposition as a group, I believe, still I think that referring to the opposition or any member of the opposition as criminal, that kind of analogy, should be out of order. It's against the traditions of this Assembly, it's against the rules of this Assembly, and as such it should be ruled out of order.

The Speaker: The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to suggest that this is not a point of order but, rather, a matter of debate. I don't have the benefit of the Blues either, but if I recall correctly, the Premier at the time had said, "It's like the arsonist is worried about the fire," something to that effect. I know for a fact the Premier was not calling the members opposite arsonists though I would suggest that that caucus is a Dumpster fire. I would suggest that this is a matter of debate. If the Premier had actually said that a member of that caucus was an arsonist, that would certainly be out of order, and I acknowledge that. But he did not say that. Rather, he made an association of suggesting that they're actually worried about insurance rates when the reality is that they are the ones who jacked them up. Not a point of order but, rather, a matter of debate.

The Speaker: Are there others?

I am prepared to rule, and I do have the benefit of the Blues. The hon. the Premier at 2:03 said the following: "Well, Mr. Speaker, once again, when the NDP cries crocodile tears about utility prices, it's like the arsonist being concerned about the fire that he set." Then he went on to provide the answer to the rest of the question, and a point of order was called. I would agree that the hon. Premier was not referring to members of the opposition or individuals or even as a group but, more so, speaking to what an arsonist would do. This is not a point of order. It's a matter of debate. I consider the matter dealt with and concluded.

At 2:34 the Deputy Government House Leader rose on a point of order.

Point of Order Supplementary Questions

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order with regard to the use of supplementary questions. It is a tradition of this House that the first and second supplementals of a question are in some way related to the initial question. In the case of the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood that was not the case. That member also didn't even use the traditional use of the word "given." The first question was about utility prices; that went to the hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity. The second question went to the hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board, and the third, of course, was about curriculum. These matters are not related: curriculum, insurance rates, and utility prices. I would ask that member to try to abide by conventions of this Chamber by using supplementals in an appropriate manner.

The Speaker: The Deputy Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do have the set of questions before me that the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood asked. Certainly, she asked about utilities, she asked about insurance, and she went on to talk about education. She concluded her question with: why are my constituents "paying more, getting less, and being ignored by the UCP"? I think it was in the same context that in terms of education they are getting less. Education has become more expensive for them. The theme of the question in general was the cost of living, that is impacting Albertans. Whether that's utilities, insurance, education, under this government everything has been made more expensive. The question was following that theme.

The Speaker: I am prepared to rule, and I do have the benefit of the Blues.

Are there other submissions?

Seeing none, I agree with the Deputy Opposition House Leader with respect to that the three questions were about the utility costs, the insurance costs, and the education costs. The hon. member also made the submission that they were questions of constituents, and I think that there has been a significant amount of latitude for such questions. But in this case in particular, because of the theme of the costs, this is not a point of order. I consider the matter dealt with and concluded.

Hon. members, yesterday a point of privilege was raised by the Member for Central Peace-Notley. At that time I provided comments with respect to Standing Order 15(4) about a member who is subject to a point of privilege being raised being present in the Assembly. Earlier today I received correspondence from the Government House Leader indicating that their schedule may or may not allow for them to be present during debate and, as such, suggesting that the debate could proceed in their absence should the Speaker deem that appropriate. I have deemed that appropriate given the notice that the Government House Leader has provided to me. I'm happy to table that correspondence in the Assembly tomorrow at the appropriate time.

We will now hear the point of privilege that was raised by the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley. The hon. member.

Privilege Threatening a Member

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise today out of a necessity to fully conclude the unfortunate and disgraceful matter that occurred in this House during the most recent Thursday afternoon sitting. As my fellow members are aware, we bore witness to a new low for this Assembly during the final afternoon sitting before the break. The exchange I'm referring to includes words I cannot repeat here and, perhaps most shockingly, was conducted by the Government House Leader, as the title states, a leader in this Assembly, at a time when Albertans find themselves deeply concerned about the attitude of the upper echelons of the UCP government and how that trickles down into the general attitude of one of the most divisive governments in the history of our province.

I will do my best to describe the exchange and kindly ask for your latitude, Mr. Speaker, in my attempt to do so. For those looking for the exact exchange, please see Hansard for Thursday afternoon, March 31, 2022, day 19, page 593. While a retraction has occurred on two matters, two matters from the exchange remain unaddressed. The use of a proper name was withdrawn. The use of inappropriate parliamentary language – I'm referring to the swear word – was withdrawn.

But two issues remain unaddressed. Number one, the threat against all members of the Assembly, which was an act of intimidation. I quote the Government House Leader: "I'll bring a standing order package back here right after the break to make sure you can't use tablings like that no more." The second, the way the Government House Leader challenged the authority of the Speaker during the exchange, was never apologized for. But I respect the Speaker to deal with that issue the way he sees fit and will withdraw that concern from my point of privilege.

I believe that the threat is a prima facie breach of privilege to the Assembly. Upon review of the standing orders, you will find Standing Order 15, which covers privilege. The relevant section of that standing order reads:

15(1) A breach of the rights of the Assembly or of the parliamentary rights of any Member constitutes a question of privilege.

(2) A Member wishing to raise a question of privilege shall give written notice containing a brief statement of the question to the Speaker and, if practicable, to any person whose conduct may be called into question, at least 2 hours before the opening of the afternoon sitting and, before the Orders of the Day are called, shall call attention to the alleged breach of privilege and give a brief statement of the nature of the matter addressed in the complaint.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, I have given the written notice as required.

Under (6) it says:

The Speaker may allow such debate as he or she thinks appropriate in order to determine whether a prima facie case of breach of privilege has taken place and whether the matter is being raised at the earliest opportunity.

To prove this is a prima facie case of breach of privilege, first, I will address the earliest opportunity requirement. Mr. Speaker, without the benefit of the Blues it was impossible in that moment to account for all of the many infractions of our rules that were made by the Government House Leader. Yesterday was the first sitting since the incident, and we have the full Hansard exchange now, something that was not available to us at that moment.

To understand what a breach of privilege would consist of, Mr. Speaker, I refer the members of this House to the Legislative Assembly Act. I will highlight the sections I believe to be key to the understanding of why this is a breach that falls between sections 8 and 13 of the act.

First, section 8, Jurisdiction of the Assembly:

The Assembly has exclusive jurisdiction in respect of

- (a) the determination of the lawfulness of its proceedings, and
- (b) the regulation of its proceedings and the conduct of its business and affairs.

To have the Government House Leader threaten – unilaterally threaten – to bring changes to the standing orders in order to protect himself, not the Assembly, when it is clearly the Assembly that makes these decisions.

Next, in section 9, Privileges, Immunities and Powers Generally:

9(1) In addition to the privileges, immunities and powers respectively conferred on them by this Act, the Assembly and its Members, and the committees of the Assembly and their members, have the same privileges, immunities and powers as those held respectively by the House of Commons of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, the members of that House, the committees of that House and the members of committees of that House at the time of the passing of the Constitution Act, 1867.

Clearly, we are extended the same understandings of procedure as other jurisdictions in regard to privileges and breach of privileges.

Now, in section 10 we find the pertinent language on breaches of privilege and contempts.

10(1) The Assembly may inquire into, adjudicate and punish breaches of the privileges of the Assembly and contempts of the Assembly.

(2) Without restricting the generality of subsection (1), the following acts constitute breaches of privilege or contempts to which that subsection applies:

- (a) an assault, insult or libel on a Member;
- (b) obstructing, threatening or attempting to force or intimidate a Member in any matter relating to the Member's office;

Clearly, this incident was a threat and an attempt to intimidate members from using the rights they have to table documents.

Section 12 also makes it clear that the Assembly is a court in this matter.

12(1) The Assembly is a court for the purpose of exercising its powers and jurisdiction under sections 10 and 11 and its decisions and orders under those sections are final.

Section 10(2)(b) is, of course, of particular note as it makes it very clear that an act of intimidation like that which occurred when the Government House Leader threatened to alter the standing orders is a violation that represents a breach of privilege.

In House of Commons Procedure and Practice there are numerous references to the rights of the House as a collectivity not to be intimidated and interfered with and the rights and immunities of individual members, freedom from obstruction, interference, or intimidation.

Members of Parliament, by the nature of their office and the variety of work they are called upon to perform, come into contact with a wide range of individuals and groups. Members can, therefore, be subject to all manner of interference, obstruction and influences. Maingot states:

Members are entitled to go about their parliamentary business undisturbed. The assaulting, menacing, or insulting of any Member on the floor of the House or while he is coming or going to or from the House, or on account of his behaviour during a proceeding in Parliament, is a violation of the rights of Parliament. Any form of intimidation... of a person for or on account of his behaviour during a proceeding in Parliament could amount to contempt.

That was 218.

Speakers have consistently upheld the right of the House to services of its Members free from intimidation, obstruction and interference. Speaker Lamoureux stated in a 1973 ruling that he had "no hesitation in reaffirming the principle that parliamentary privilege includes the right of a member to discharge his responsibilities as a member of the House free from threats or attempts at intimidation." As Speaker Bosley noted in 1986:

If an Hon. Member is impeded or obstructed in the performance of his or her parliamentary duties through threats, intimidation, bribery attempts or other improper behaviour, such a case would fall within the limits of parliamentary privilege. Should an Hon. Member be able to say that something has happened which prevented him or her from performing functions, that he or she has been threatened, intimidated, or in any way unduly influenced, there would be a case for the Chair to consider.

Let's be clear. The Government House Leader's interruption did in fact stop the tablings for that day, and the threat and intimidation clearly makes a case for the point of privilege.

In ruling on another question of privilege, Speaker Bosley stated further that the threat or attempt at intimidation cannot be hypothetical, but must be real or have occurred.

I think we can clearly say that this threat and intimidation was not hypothetical. It was real, and it did occur.

In order to find a prima facie breach of privilege, the Speaker must be satisfied that there is evidence to support the Member's claim that he or she has been impeded in the performance of his or her parliamentary functions and that the matter is directly related to a proceeding in Parliament.

This has affected myself and all members who now worry about tabling documents in case the House leader finds further personal offence and does in fact bring forward changes stopping this important part of members' business. In less than two weeks the House is expected to vote on a government member's private member's motion to review the standing orders. It is alarming to think that the House leader could at any time bring forward changes to the standing orders or use this review to do the same.

Mr. Speaker, this matter is directly related to a proceeding in this Assembly. The Hansard shows clear as day the threat to all members to alter the standing orders if tablings are used in a manner that this House has ruled already that they may be used as. This is a clear attempt to prevent myself and others from carrying out their parliamentary duties. We need to be clear that the tabling of documents is often requested when members quote from documents, so it's not only an opportunity but a requirement.

Mr. Speaker, this Legislature is not a one-man show, and no, it doesn't revolve around a small group of people that feel it is their personal playground that they can manipulate. This Legislature belongs to Albertans, who have chosen people to represent them here. We have rules and processes, and members' rights are protected. The Assembly decides the standing orders, not the Government House Leader, and to suggest otherwise is an insult to this Assembly and the people that have sent us here, that rely on fair processes to be applied.

All members of this Assembly should be alarmed by these threats and should stand together against them. There is no place for threats, intimidation, or bullying, and yes, there are consequences for actions that fall outside these rules. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully ask that you find this incident of threat and intimidation a point of privilege so that the appropriate consequences can take place.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, a point of privilege, of course, is a very serious matter that members of the Assembly are all welcome to provide commentary to. I see the Deputy Government House Leader rising. I think it's appropriate to find out if there are other members of the Assembly that would like to speak to the issue prior to the response from yourself. Are you comfortable with that?

I see the Opposition House Leader. I also see the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat has risen. We'll hear from the Opposition House Leader prior to the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise to engage in the debate on this point of privilege. I will just begin by acknowledging, as has been acknowledged in this House many times, that rising on a point of privilege, the raising of such matters, is incredibly serious and, as mentioned in House of Commons Procedure and Practice, page 141, should not be "reckoned with lightly and accordingly ought to be rare, and thus rarely raised in the House of Commons" or here in the Alberta Legislature.

I rise because I agree with the Member for Central Peace-Notley that this is a serious point of privilege and to enter into the debate. As was argued by the Member for Central Peace-Notley while arguing the point of order on the day, which was March 31, when this occurred, the Government House Leader on that day, in my opinion, did threaten and intimidate not only the Member for Central Peace-Notley but the Assembly as a whole, threatening to change the standing orders to limit the actions of members of the Assembly once the House had resumed.

Now, as the Member for Central Peace-Notley just noted in his closing, the Government House Leader – when it comes to the changing of the standing orders, the standing orders are changed by the Assembly itself and by all members, but I must enter into debate that the Government House Leader has very real sway and power within this Chamber, within his own caucus, and is seen as a leader and someone who has influence in this place, so threats made by the Government House Leader come with very special weight in this place, and how that Government House Leader governs himself, I believe, has true impact in the business of this Assembly.

Now, as the member has recapped, this occurred while the member was making a number of tablings. The statements made by the Government House Leader captured on page 593 of Hansard, in my view, constitute a very real threat and a violation of both the statutes and precedents that govern the Assembly. Now, while the threat was directed at the Member for Central Peace-Notley, I will say that the threat to alter the standing orders, which are the rules with which the House regulates its proceedings, was considered by members of the Official Opposition caucus as a real and present threat, particularly in light of the tone and in light of previous changes to standing orders made by this government.

Tablings being a vital function for every member of this Assembly, all members of the Official Opposition took note of the threats that were being made because it is through tablings that we put the concerns of constituents on the record, back up statements made, and provide evidence.

Now, I would want to enter into this debate the Speaker's own words from November 3, 2020, found on page 2960 of that year's Hansard, that rulings "be guided by the precedent that is before us, the standing orders we have all agreed to, and the reference books that we all turn to." It's very clear to me that if the standing orders of the Assembly are to be used as a tool by the government to control and limit available actions of the opposition members and of independent members, how can this Assembly continue to function if the members exist in an environment of fear brought on by a Government House Leader whose actions exhibit not leadership but fear and intimidation? How can the Speaker continue to do his duty if these rules are subject to ire and the whims of the government and their House leader?

There are sources that are relevant to this matter, and while listening to the Member for Central Peace-Notley, I noted one or two sources that we found that were similar, so I will not repeat where I can avoid doing so. Certainly, chapter 1 of Beauchesne's states that “the principles of Canadian parliamentary law are: to protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority.”

The Legislative Assembly Act lists and constitutes the breaches of privilege, which I will not read in, but I will say that we agree with 10(2)(b), obstructing, threatening, or attempting. We would agree with the Member for Central Peace-Notley that the act of threatening here is the one of major concern for us.

In Erskine May paragraph 15.14: “To attempt to intimidate a Member in their parliamentary conduct by threats is also a contempt.”

House of Commons Procedure and Practice, items that are considered contempt, page 82:

assaulting, threatening, obstructing or intimidating a Member or officer of the House in the discharge of their duties . . . assaulting, threatening or disadvantaging a Member, or a former Member, on account of the Member's conduct in Parliament.

The last one being particularly relevant. The threat came as a direct result of the actions of the Member for Central Peace-Notley due to his actions here in the Assembly. The description and relevance of the items he is tabling, which is, again, as you turn to Hansard page 593, amount to one sentence per tabling. It's important to note that there is no limit on the number of tablings that may be done at any given time per the standing orders.

We did also note Speaker Bosley's ruling on page 108 in 1986, but I will not reread it into the record.

I believe it is clear that on March 31 the Government House Leader did make an actual threat to obstruct the Member for Central Peace-Notley from the future performance of his duties, the tabling of documents, which is a breach of his privilege, as well as extended that threat in something that would impact all members of this Assembly. This is further proven when considering the reference on page 91 of House of Commons, that lists “the presentation or submission of a document to a House or Committee” as a proceeding in Parliament. Specifically, page 91 of House of Commons shows that he was performing his duties through a procedure in the House.

Finally, on this point I turn to page 60 of the House of Commons Procedure and Practice. “Any conduct which offends the authority or dignity of the House . . . is referred to as a contempt . . . It does not have to actually obstruct or impede the House or a Member; it merely has to have the tendency to produce such results.”

I will suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that in conversations I've had with my Official Opposition colleagues, there has been a very chilling effect by the Government House Leader's words in this place. Through his action he has not only breached the privilege of the member but has committed a contempt against the entire Assembly and every member of this Assembly.

Certainly, we know this is not the first time we've addressed the threatening of another member as a breach of privilege in the Assembly, nor is it the first time a member of the Assembly has used threats against a member in an attempt to limit the actions of a member. For this, I'll just draw your attention to a point of privilege raised on September 22, 1993, ruled on by Speaker Schumacher. In this case a member of Executive Council threatened to withhold government programs from a member's constituency. There are similarities in these cases, and I would point to the ruling in that case. In a clarifying statement the Speaker ruled that a prima facie case of contempt did exist, and in that case the member in question withdrew and apologized prior to the point of privilege being finally raised.

In the case before us today, in this case, the Government House Leader potentially could try to use that argument. I would suggest that the Government House Leader did withdraw and apologize for the use of unparliamentary language as well as the use of proper names but did not for threatening the Member for Central Peace-Notley in the ongoing discharging of his duties. In my mind, this matter is very much still alive.

I urge the Speaker to look at Speaker Schumacher's rulings. I believe that a prima facie breach of privilege has occurred, and I urge the Speaker to provide the Assembly the opportunity to consider what actions would be appropriate.

I will leave this up to the Speaker and his ruling, but I do want to offer that in this instance we saw a pattern of behaviour that I believe will require more than an offer to apologize and withdraw. The members of this Assembly need assurances that these types of threats cannot and will not be tolerated in the Assembly or anywhere in this precinct.

Thank you very much for the opportunity to engage in this debate.

The Speaker: Thank you to the Opposition House Leader.

I might just mention to the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat that I appreciated the way that the Opposition House Leader attempted to not just repeat similar arguments, so I will encourage you to do the same. We don't want to set a precedent of violent agreement or matters of debate around points of privilege, but if you do have additional comments or content that may be beneficial for the Assembly as well as for the Deputy Government House Leader for them to conclude their arguments, it is reasonable for other members to provide additional submissions. I will call on you now, but if it is largely similar, I will likely intervene.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the chance, and I so appreciate what the two hon. members before me said. I feel it's so accurate for the level of intimidation, the level of threats. I'll do everything I can to have three new relevant points.

Absolutely, this is a question of privilege. It is directly related to the rights and privileges of this Assembly and every single member in here. The words “I'll bring,” the words “make sure that you can't [do that]” are very strong words. Mr. Speaker, it's maybe no coincidence that I didn't see any tablings today or yesterday. Is this threat hanging over our democracy?

I'll jump to, as both the hon. members for Edmonton-Mill Woods and Central Peace-Notley said, that we have a process for changing the standing orders. We have a process where all of us can go to those committees and argue, to make points, go to the media, do a dissenting opinion. The words “I'll bring” and “[I'll] make sure you can't” fly in the face of that.

Just quickly, it's so important, you know, for the 4.4 million Albertans that we're fortunate to represent. I think one of the phrases I've heard the most often in my 10 years here is: when you're first elected, it's like drinking from a firehose. So many Albertans rely on us to get their ideas, their tablings, their points to the floor, to the decision-makers. The fact that a key decision-maker, the Government House Leader, used the words “I'll bring” and “[I'll] make sure you can't” is egregious. It's horrifying.

I just want to remind you, Mr. Speaker, of the process. We have a Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, Standing Orders and Printing that meets to change the standing orders, that meets to discuss them, where any one of the 87 of us can go and put in our good ideas on behalf of the thousands of Albertans we represent. I wonder how the hon. members for Calgary-Mountain View, Edmonton-Meadows, Chestermere-Strathmore, Calgary-Fish Creek, and Red Deer-South feel. They're on that committee. Are they going to be swayed by the words of intimidation that so many of us felt? There are others on that committee, and again any one of us could go, and the fact is that we haven't seen tablings in two days.

The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley alluded to that two Mondays from now we're probably talking about Motion 506 from the hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis and – my goodness – the two things that she knew that the hon. Government House Leader's words fly right in the face of: "Be it resolved that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, Standing Orders and Printing." She doesn't say: I will; I will make sure. She's sending it to the committee, and the words she uses both in her point 1 and her point 2: increase collaboration and co-operation, "facilitate collaboration and cooperation among their members."

Mr. Speaker, absolutely, this is a question of privilege from a high-ranking government member in a position to control the process and the legalities. I'm sorry it happened because I think the perception of this and an obscenity that in 10 years I've never heard in here sets us all back, and that's why this is incredibly important.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others with new submissions or additional information that would be beneficial for the Assembly and the Speaker to make a decision?

Seeing none, as is common practice in the Assembly with respect to points of privilege, the member in question or the Government House Leader or their designate has the opportunity to respond to the arguments that have been made today or to delay that response to tomorrow or a future date. I'll provide the Deputy Government House Leader that opportunity now if he would like to respond. I'm welcome to hear the response, or we can delay till tomorrow. How would you see fit to proceed?

Mr. Schow: Mr. Speaker, you know what? I will probably go ahead and respond today.

The Speaker: The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Let me start off by saying in response to this point of privilege from the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley that I do not find that this is a clear point of privilege. I believe it is not.

Let's review some of the facts that occurred on Thursday, March 31. This can all be found on page 593 of Alberta Hansard. The Member for Central Peace-Notley rose to do a lengthy series of tablings. I would argue that in doing this, he also monopolized a large portion of the Assembly's time. Some might even say that he was wasting the time of the Assembly by abusing the standing orders, which allow tabling returns to operate. While doing these never-ending tablings, he made multiple drive-by smears of the Premier and the Minister of Environment and Parks, going as far as to directly accuse the Government House Leader of misinforming the House, and he also said that the minister of parks tried again "to dupe the House." This is clearly unparliamentary language although the Member for Central Peace-Notley only apologized for the first instance.

But the Member for Central Peace-Notley has a bit of history, Mr. Speaker, in this Chamber of trying to find new and clever ways to call people liars in the Assembly. He has been called to order and made to apologize multiple times for these infractions. For example, on April 6, 2017 – this can be found on page 547 of Alberta Hansard for that day – the Member for Central Peace-Notley said: "Given that the government lied." A point of order was called, and his first instinct was to then pivot to the following phrase: "Given that the government misled the people." This resulted in another point of order being called, and the Member for Central Peace-Notley had to apologize.

There are other examples of this as well. The Member for Central Peace-Notley is no stranger to the rules of the Assembly and has frequently sought to push the envelope. This isn't his first week. He knows the rules full well and what he is doing. Therefore, given that this member has a history of trying to abuse his position to call MLAs liars, then it should be no surprise that he was extremely frustrated to see him abuse the Assembly's time with nonstop tablings and using the tablings to call members of the Assembly liars.

Now, his letter yesterday raised two issues, Mr. Speaker. The first was that he alleges that the Government House Leader refused to come to order when called by the Speaker. There is nothing in Hansard that indicates that the Government House Leader did not come to order when called on by the Speaker. When reviewing Hansard, it is clear that the Government House Leader, when called on by the Speaker to raise a point of order, did so. When asked by the Speaker to apologize and withdraw the use of his unparliamentary language, the Government House Leader did so immediately and without reservation.

That is certainly not something that we've seen from the Leader of the Opposition, for example, who I've never seen apologize and withdraw for remarks made in this Chamber but, rather, makes the Opposition House Leader do that on her behalf.

I also know that the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud struggles with direction from the chair, when on March 14, when asked to withdraw and apologize, she only withdrew and then when pressed, apologized in offering this poor apology: "I apologize and withdraw for the sentiments of the members across the way." That was, of course, when the member accused members of this side of the House of condoning and engaging in rape culture.

Yet in all these instances the Speaker frequently states that the matter is either concluded or dealt with, so I don't think a point of privilege can be found with regard to the interaction between the Speaker and the Government House Leader, which leaves us the allegation that the Government House Leader intimidated the Assembly by indicating he was prepared to bring forward a change to the standing orders to prevent Tabling Returns and Reports from being misused by MLAs.

The Government House Leader said:

That is completely inappropriate and certainly should not be how tablings are used. Frankly, if that's how . . . member[s] [are] going to continue to use it, I'll bring a standing order package back here right after the break to make [it so] you can't use tablings like that [anymore].

First, let's establish that Tabling Returns and Reports has faced many iterations over the course of the Assembly's history. In the past an MLA was able to table a hamburger from the cafeteria. That's not permitted now under Standing Order 37(4). This meant that tablings are not some inviolate item of business that can't be altered by the majority of the Assembly.

Then, let's review how standing orders are changed in the Assembly. Any member may utilize the tools available to them to put forward substantive motions in the Assembly. These could be government motions, motions other than government motions, and motions under Standing Order 42. Any of these motions, if passed by a majority of the Assembly, can make changes to the standing orders. This occurred last session, when the private member Motion 518, sponsored by the hon. MLA for Peace River, saw the change from the previous question-and-comment period to the interventions we all know and dearly love.

The Government House Leader is frequently responsible for bringing forward government motions which propose changes to the standing orders. This government caucus is always looking to find ways to improve how the business of the Assembly is managed and how to prevent abusive behaviour. There is no threat or intimidation from any member of this Assembly putting forward motions or a member indicating that they are not.

So, very clearly, the Government House Leader did not threaten any member of the Assembly by suggesting that he was prepared, if necessary, to put forward a motion to change the standing orders if any member, and in particular the Member for Central Peace-Notley, were to persist in making nonstop tablings in order to make drive-by smears of members of this Assembly and, in doing so, delay the business of the Assembly.

Therefore, I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a prima facie breach of privilege and encourage the Member for Central Peace-Notley to quit playing games and to follow the rules and practices and procedures of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Hon. members, much has been said about the situation that did occur on the previous Thursday, prior to the break. I think it's reasonable that the Speaker take some time to consider what has been said today by both members of the opposition and by the Deputy Government House Leader, and I will report back to the Assembly at my convenience, possibly tomorrow but maybe Monday as well depending on the dialogue between the table and I and the considerations that will take place. I do take this matter seriously, and I do take the events of Thursday, March 31, seriously as well, and I'll consider all of those things when executing the decision that will take place.

Hon. members, we are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 2

Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Chair: There are no amendments on the floor. We are on the main bill. Are there members wishing to join in on the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to join debate on Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. We know that this is omnibus legislation, which is typical of a fiscal statutes amendment act. Nine separate acts are being looked at, and most of it is pretty straightforward and isn't, certainly, anything to be concerned about largely except for one significant piece, and that, of course, is the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act.

You know, even today in question period this question was asked by our leader to the Premier about the government's decision to really tax inflation, and that's that bracket creep. We know that the Premier, when he was in government in Ottawa – he was an MP in cabinet. At that time, when the personal income tax system wasn't indexed to inflation, he slammed – I guess he wasn't in cabinet at the time; he was in opposition – the Liberal government and said that that was insidious and a pernicious tax grab.

It's about a billion dollars of Albertans' hard-earned money that now, because the UCP is deciding not to index this to inflation, which is the norm – it is just the regular process for governments across Alberta and federal governments. They generally do this. It's just seen as the normal protocol because they want to support, you know, their constituents, their citizens to have the same amount of money or to be kept up with inflation. But the UCP government, even though they're flush with money from oil and gas revenues, decided that, no, that money needs to be in government coffers and out of the pockets of Albertans.

That's happening at a time when Albertans are struggling with affordability. Everything is so expensive, and people are really, really struggling. This is something that is, you know, a hill to die on, as they say, so I cannot support this bill because this regular process of the indexation of the tax brackets is not happening. I will be voting against Bill 2 because of this issue, and I think everyone in this Chamber should because it's taking away from Albertans, and Albertans need to be supported now. You know, we know that inflation is, I think, about 5.7 per cent. I think it might even be higher now. I haven't seen the latest stats on that, but that's the highest it's been in years and years. If this is not the time to do it, I don't know when it is in terms of indexation of the tax brackets.

I mean, it's really a significant mistake by this government to go ahead with this legislation because it's putting significant hardship on regular Albertans. I think that just once again shows how we cannot trust the UCP. They're not thinking about the best interests of Albertans; they are thinking of, you know, their elite friends and cutting corporate taxes, throwing money away to nonexistent pipelines based on huge risks of who becomes President in the U.S. Of course, they guessed wrong, and – guess what – Albertans have lost billions of dollars because of that. We just cannot trust the UCP government, and this is just another example of how clear that is.

You know, if we just reflect a little bit on even what happened today in question period, the trustworthiness of the UCP is just clearer and clearer every day. It's honestly, sincerely quite disturbing for me to sit in this Chamber and hear the ridiculous – ridiculous – things that are said. Today in question period – I just made some notes – the minister says: okay; the NDP is going to unionize farms. That's ridiculous. You can't trust what they're saying. It's not even anywhere close to truth.

All they're doing is having cheap shots, sort of base comments, that aren't based in reality at all. And this is the government? I mean, isn't the government supposed to be leading the people? Have vision? Instead, it seems like they're just backed into a corner and they're squirming and they're saying ridiculous things. Yet they're in charge now, or for the time being, and they're, you know, demonstrating that they're not thinking clearly. They're saying things that are ridiculous.

Oh, yeah. The Minister of Health said that we have to get over this difference between private and public health care. What? We have to get over that? No, no, no, no. There's a clear distinction between that – and of course we believe in public health care. The UCP's focus on giving public dollars to private clinics doesn't make that public health care; it erodes the public health care system. You know, that was another thing that was said today.

Another thing is calling – you know, there's a professional regulatory college that does manage teachers. They have a regulatory process, and it's distinct from the union activities, but this group of folks can't seem to get that, so they just pile it all into one and say that it's all unions that are addressing this. That's not true at all. That's not how the Alberta Teachers' Association works. But they like to say these things that aren't true. It's not based in reality, and it's ridiculous. You know, we just cannot trust at all what the UCP are doing.

And then they make – like, this is a cheap shot – that, you know, our Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview here is the sole member of the capitalist caucus in the New Democrats. They like to say that we don't know anything about business, that we don't know anything about financial management or anything like that, but I mean, again, it's just the furthest thing from the truth.

I mean, certainly, we supported small businesses when we were in government. We cut their taxes by a third. We asked profitable corporations, absolutely, to pay their fair share, and we did have their tax rate at a level that is commensurate with the rest of Canada, largely. It was nothing ridiculous. We didn't put undue hardship on them; it was just what's fair across Canada.

They also like to say that everybody ran away when we were government, but that's also not true. You know, I have some information here about capital investment in Alberta. In 2018 $62.3 billion was invested, and that was under our government. That's the highest it's been up until this year even. Like, $56.7 billion is what's projected by the UCP, but in 2018: $62.3 billion.

To listen to the other side, like, they don't bother to understand what actually happened. They just say stuff. I don't know. The integrity is nonexistent. It boggles my mind to think that this is the way governing is being done in our province. I certainly know, from talking to many constituents, talking to stakeholders, talking to people across our province, that nobody is trusting them. They know that they just say stuff and that they like to spin things, but it's not based in reality.

Also, in 2019 it was $59.4 billion, and then when the UCP came in, it was $48.6 billion in 2020, and then in 2021 it's $54 billion. So it's not what they say. They say: oh, nobody invested in Alberta when the NDP was government. Well, I'm reading you the facts here, and $62.3 billion in 2018 is far greater than any other year since the UCP have been elected. But they don't bother to actually base what they say in reality.

You know, everybody who paid corporate taxes just sort of took off or was run out of town by us if you listen to the UCP, which also isn't true. We know that the corporate income tax was $4.8 billion. That was the actual amount in 2018-19, and in 2022-23 – that's under the UCP, of course – it's projected to be $4 billion. So it's less – it's less – than what it was when we were government. Again, I just kind of shake my head. I don't know what gives them the authority to just sort of talk out of their hats as if they can just make things up.

It's disturbing to me. I feel like – I don't even want to use that. I know that many Albertans are suffering because of the policies, and the UCP are picking a few elite sections of our population to benefit like wildfire. They're doing great. But guess what. Many Albertans aren't. Certainly, we know that, for example, seniors, which is an area that I care very much about – I had the honour to be Minister of Seniors and Housing when we were government. This bracket creep is causing seniors who get the Alberta seniors' benefit to have $750 less – so this is, like, a couple – annually. That's a lot of money. That's a lot of money for many people. Maybe the UCP thinks: "Oh, it's a drop in the bucket. It doesn't matter. Whatever." It does matter, and it's creating some really significant hardship for people. You know, they have trouble paying their rent, with high utility costs now and groceries. I mean, we all know that things are getting much less affordable, and the UCP is making it worse.

Besides that, the UCP seems to like to say: "Oh, yes, we are supporting vulnerable seniors. We're supporting vulnerable people in Alberta. This is what we're doing here. This is what we're doing there." But you know what the reality is? They've cut significantly from seniors. For example, special needs assistance: this is, like, helping seniors pay for medical supports. Maybe they need a wheelchair. Maybe they need a walker. Maybe they get a little bit of money for laundry. Those programs are being cut. Actually, back in 2020 $8.6 million was cut from that budget. Just right off the – you know, easily, happily. The UCP seems to think that people didn't benefit, weren't supported by that. There are so many things. That's only one annual year, $8.6 million since 2020. So that continues.

Also, nonprofits. You know, the UCP talks about wanting seniors to age in their communities. For seniors to age in their communities, there need to be supports – there's just no question about that – many kinds of supports. Certainly, there need to be oftentimes home care, medical supports, those kind of things. But there also need to be nonmedical supports. Guess who does those kind of supports. That's the nonprofit agencies in communities. It can be, like, snow removal. It can be just supporting socialization. We know that that's a huge issue. Many seniors may become isolated, and that negatively impacts their mental health. Of course, we know that with COVID that was even more profound. There are so many challenges in that area for many people, not just seniors, right across this province.

Nonprofit grants. When we were government, we gave $2 million annually in nonprofit grants to agencies that support seniors to age in their communities; support them to be healthy; connect socially; some practical, nonmedical supports, as I said, like shovelling or maybe meal delivery. Meals on Wheels is an example of that. Quite quickly after the UCP became government, they cut those grants to less than $1 million. It's $900,000 now. It was during COVID that they cut that. That means that those supports aren't in place, especially at such a significant time. But, you know, seniors have to live within their means. That's what the Minister of Seniors and Housing said.

But – you know what? – it costs more in the long run. If people aren't supported, they can get more isolated, which can have more dire effects on their mental health. You know, our mental health affects our physical health. So that can cost our system more. I mean, there are the human rights and sort of supporting people to live in dignity. There are those kinds of compassionate arguments that, of course, are very important. But there's even an economic argument that the UCP is ignoring about why it's important to invest in these kind of public programs or public grants to nonprofit agencies.

I guess I'm appealing to more the economic aspects, which seem to be what the minister would always defend. We have to make sure that the, you know, finances are in order. That's the premier position. I'm just suggesting to her that she needs to look a little bit deeper to understand that indeed the government will save money if people aren't, you know, ending up in hospital or having some kind of an injury at home and then requiring much, much more supports.

It is challenging and, I think, very disturbing just how this UCP government operates and how sort of they're continuing to really put the burden on individuals, put the burden on Alberta families, and not support them. I mean, I think this bracket creep piece is very significant. This bill could shift that. It could be just in line with everything that other jurisdictions do. It's just a natural thing that's seen as sort of normal protocol, that the brackets be indexed.

I urge the government to not pass this legislation, because it does make it much harder for Albertans. They're taking a billion dollars out of Albertans' pockets.

I also, you know, just will say again that what they say matters, and it's important that they base what they say in reality. But in some of the examples that I gave today just in question period, it's really quite ridiculous. I don't feel very proud of this government, that they are actually respecting the offices they hold. They are government, and that, I believe, is what they should be doing, but sadly it is not what they're doing. Despite their words that they are supporting vulnerable people, that they are supporting seniors, they indeed are not. Actually, they're making it much harder for them. Certainly, I know that through many conversations that I've had with seniors across this province.

So I urge all members of the House to vote against this bill. I mean, it's not something that's worthy of support. It just makes life harder for Albertans. It makes it less affordable for Albertans, and it really is kind of a sneaky way to take money out of Albertans' pockets. I think the government should not pass this legislation. With that, I will take my seat.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to join the debate on Bill 2? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to rise at this stage of debate for Bill 2. Of course, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, allows the government to implement a number of aspects of the provincial budget that was introduced at the end of February. Now, it is no secret that we take great exception to this sneaky tax on inflation that is contained within this bill and that is projected within the government's budget papers to remain in effect until 2025. This pernicious and insidious tax on inflation – not my words; the words of the Premier when he used to oppose this sort of thing – will cost Albertans more than a billion dollars in additional income taxes, a fact that was not contained within the budget documents but was confirmed with us by the minister within budget estimates.

I will note that that figure was provided to the opposition in the first year that this change was made, but as is quite typical with this government over time, a government that was not particularly given to being on the level in the first place has become increasingly less so. So we had to push and push and push for that number, and they finally did give it to us, so at least there was that, I guess. Small silver linings. That is probably the most egregious part of this legislation.

The Financial Statutes Amendment Act and the other pieces of legislation that should have come alongside this budget should have given practical effect to the utility consumer rebate, but this House only received that piece of very vague and inadequate legislation this afternoon. Now, it was pretty clear that this government had no intention of really paying attention to what was happening to people's bills in November, December, January, when it was actually happening, because the paragraph where they actually make a sort of vague throw to this natural gas rebate business was stuck into the budget strategic plan, and you could tell. It was practically in a different font. It misspelled Ralph Klein's name; the sentence was quite clunky. Clearly, the editors hadn't had a chance to look at it because they just threw some spaghetti at the wall and said, "Okay; that's good; people are complaining about their bills; our work here is done," showing, I think, the level of bandwidth and actual serious public policy response to the tremendous suffering that people were undergoing at that time. Just absolutely no regard for that.

I think one of the bigger pieces in this legislation, first of all, is around trust. I've talked about the bracket creep piece and how, you know, this is a Premier that called this pernicious and insidious and maybe, I don't know, busted out a thesaurus – they used to have them in hard copy back in the '90s, when he made those comments. There's just a greatest hits reel. There's, like, a seven minutes' compilation on YouTube of him discussing this. But at the first available opportunity, in the fall budget of 2019, he went back on every single one of those words, and they were lengthy. It reminds me, quite frankly, of the time that this Premier was a minister in 2007 that brought in an excise tax on pickup trucks. It reminds me of the time this Premier was a minister in a government that phased out 12 of Alberta's 16 coal plants without associate regulations on coal-to-gas conversion back in 2012; said he'd reverse it during the leadership race and did not. It reminds me of the time this Premier was part of a government in which Harper gave a speech at the G-8 at the time, in 2007, in Berlin committing Canada to carbon pricing or the time that this Premier was part of a government that committed in 2010, by the time it was the G-7, to a net-zero policy or the many times that this Premier has railed about carbon pricing, yet in March here we have a ministerial order from his Minister of Environment and Parks raising the carbon tax to $50 per tonne for industrial emitters.

You know, there is apparently what is said, and then there is what is done, and I've just provided not just the tax increase, that certainly annoys people, but members of the Premier's own caucus, other ways that perhaps what is said and then what is done: there is a tremendous gulf between those two things.

But the other piece of this bill that is really – it could be pernicious and insidious if I wanted to, you know, sort of strut around using big words to cover for other things, but that is this business of cash management and pooling cash management. Now, this is, on the face of it, probably a decent piece of public policy. GOA will now have access to all the funds from agencies, boards, and commissions that fall under government control. More importantly, the minister will be able to set the interest rate that those ABCs receive. Now, the government has given themselves the power to charge lower than market rates to these ABCs, like AIMCo or postsecondary institutions or others. The government argues that by centrally pooling cash, they improve their overall liquidity and need less cash overall across all public entities, and that will save on debt-servicing costs. That's probably true, but the problem here is trust.

You know, the minister assured us in no uncertain terms that the changes he was making to the Alberta Capital Finance Authority would have no material effect on municipalities and their cost of borrowing. He said: "Oh, no, no. That's not going to happen." It absolutely did happen. They turned around and went back on their word and charged municipalities more. When we asked in estimates how much this would actually affect the GOA bottom line, they said: oh, it's really quite immaterial. But municipalities have said to us that it is quite material for them.

So this is just for kicks. It's just for fun to cause significant hardship to municipal borrowing costs, when it doesn't even really, you know, make us or save us that much money. And more to the point, the minister and the government cannot be trusted when they provide these assurances to folks, because they just go back on anything they say. "Oh, we'll keep indexing AISH. Oh, no. Sorry." "We'll keep indexing tax brackets. No, no, no. We're not going to do that." At some point people notice. People notice.

You know, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act also gives practical effect to a number of other budget pieces, and one of them I asked the minister about during estimates. He was gracious enough to go back and forth with me, unlike many of the ministers, who apparently do not have the courage of their convictions. It's very clear to me that this one does, and that's a good thing. He knows his files. But when I asked the minister about the management pay freeze in agencies, boards, and commissions, I asked him point blank: "This is being considered? We're going to lift the management pay freeze on ABCs?" The minister said, "Yes, it's under consideration." And we all nodded, and I said, "But it's actually happening, isn't it?" And he said, “Yes, it’s under consideration.” He didn’t say that it had already happened and he signed the ministerial order in February to make it happen at AIMCo.

Now, this is the kind of thing – like, why wouldn’t you just level? Why wouldn’t you just be on the level and just say: yeah, we did it. It’s not a big deal. I do not know why this government will not level with people. Just say what you’re going to do, and then go defend it and do it. This is just another reason why people just feel like they’re getting the runaround, and there’s no doubt in my mind that this has shredded public trust. So that’s why the government isn’t getting the political credit that perhaps they expected off of a balanced budget, because people do not trust the government. It’s contained within this legislation, one of the biggest reasons why they don’t, and that is that they have not restored the indexation of our tax brackets to inflation; that is to say, that we are paying more. We are paying a tax on inflation.

You know, at some point it goes to competence. It goes to intent. And, quite frankly, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act or one of the associated acts that came in should have given effect to this utility commodity rebate, this piece of whatever it is that just dropped on us this afternoon.

For a budget that brings in a commitment to a natural gas rebate, we’ve now gone back and forth and back and forth on when it’ll actually come in and at what price level. This bill doesn’t provide that. The budget should have. It was obvious to anyone last summer what was happening with both electricity and natural gas futures. It’s why I went on a contract. I went, “Whoa,” and I hectored all of my colleagues to do same, because we also teach financial literacy on the Official Opposition side.

But the fact of the matter is that anyone noticing what was happening in the power markets in response to the heat waves that we were having last year – there were already geopolitical instabilities. We already knew that this was happening, and if anyone was paying attention, I would assume that the government is paying attention because they pay an army of forecasters in the banks, in the private sector, and so on, to be that warning system. They knew what was happening with electricity and natural gas prices because we all knew, yet it is very clear that when they brought in this budget, they slapdashed a paragraph in there because, oh, sometime in early January before the thing went to print, somebody went: oh, I talked to one Albertan, and they seemed slightly concerned about their bills. That’s why there is not a substantive reckoning with affordability within this legislation, because folks were just not listening. It’s very clear that through the month of January people were really worried about their own palace intrigue and the ongoing tick-tock of the Days of Our Lives subplots rather than focusing on making life more affordable for Albertans.

With that, I think I have provided my comments. I am concerned about this business of that cash-on-hand pool and those central resources, very concerned about it, because the fact of the matter is that the province can provide whatever assurances to ABCs that they want. Those promises are empty at this point. Perhaps in 2019 those promises would’ve been taken at face value, but we are in 2022 now, and so many promises have been shredded, so much public confidence has been abused that there’s no way that we can take, short of a written guarantee – even still, you know, folks voted for the indexation of AISH, and that was promptly pulled. There is very little that the government can now do to restore that confidence, but they could do one thing, which is amend – at this stage could still do it . . .

Ms Phillips: . . . right now. Stand up and amend the personal income tax section of this act to reindex the brackets. Could have a nice, you know, response to folks who are worried about affordability. This is within the government’s purview. I fully appreciate that, you know, the price of bacon or tomatoes or pasta is not within their control. When people go to the grocery store, these are the things they notice. But their income tax: folks just filed. Could get a retroactive rebate. Would be pretty nice. Could actually do something to help people right now instead of misspelling Ralph Klein’s name when you bring in a natural gas rebate on the back of a napkin, this legislation, four weeks later, that may or may not apply and potentially charge below-market interest rates to postsecondaries as their reserves get raided, because that’s a real possibility out of this.

With that, I will conclude my comments.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I’m pleased to rise and respond to some of the assertions that the two prior speakers have made. I enjoyed the previous speaker, the Member for Lethbridge-West. Some of those comments: I found them entertaining. Always appreciate the vigour and passion that that member brings, but I have to correct a whole number of inaccuracies here this afternoon.

Firstly, the member noted that the question was raised around the pay freeze related to agencies, boards, and commissions in estimates, and I responded truthfully and honestly during that time that we were considering – and, legitimately, we were considering – our approach around lifting that pay freeze. What we did do is provided some exemptions to the pay freeze where the agency, board, or commission could clearly identify that due to market reasons they were having trouble retaining or attracting staff. But we did not lift the pay freeze. My answer at estimates was, in fact, genuine and accurate.

Madam Chair, I also just need to say again for the record that within Budget 2022 we have not raised personal income taxes. Personal income taxes are at the same rates that they were in 2021 and in 2020 and, in fact, in 2019. I will say this because I have said it publicly, and I’ll state it again. When we have more clarity, fiscal clarity, in this province – and let me say this, that we are gaining more fiscal clarity as the weeks go by – as we start to see the assumptions that we made in Budget 2022 actually come to pass in terms of economic assumptions, we will reconsider reindexing the personal tax exemption. I stand by that commitment today.

I want to also respond to the concern around moving to the consolidated liquidity solution, the CLS, mechanism to manage our cash. This is a mechanism that I believe will serve Albertans and agencies, boards, and commissions very well. It’s a mechanism that was spawned in part by a recommendation from the Auditor General in his 2016 report, where he recommended that we review our cash management methodology and mechanism and consider changing it if the results of that review would warrant it. Well, Madam Chair, that’s what we’re doing today. The consolidated liquidity solution mechanism will in fact reduce government’s borrowing. That is material. That matters. That reduces the exposure of the government’s balance sheet, the balance sheet of the people of Alberta. It will reduce debt-service costs, it will leave more money for program spending, and maybe most importantly, it will update a mechanism that’s in dire need of modernization. Yes, that’s included in Bill 2.

Madam Chair, I want to make a few high-level comments about the budget because Bill 2 is really the budget implementation bill. I want to make a few comments about this budget. This is a budget that turns the corner on fiscal responsibility. This is a budget that reports on our great fiscal progress over the last three years, and this is a budget that continues to position the province's economy for disproportionate investment attraction, economic growth, which result in expanded fiscal capacity.

That is reflected in our projections around the corporate income tax rate. The members opposite stated that, in fact, we were disingenuous with our assertion that corporate income tax revenues are projected to increase over where they were when the NDP was governing. Madam Chair, that is a true assertion because when the NDP was governing, over those four years, on average they collected approximately $4 billion in corporate income tax revenue. Over the next three years we're projecting to collect approximately $4.4 billion. That's on average $400 million more per year than the previous government collected. Again, I just want to correct the record. We have been transparent. We have been accurate in our communication around this budget.

Madam Chair, I want to get back to this budget because, again, this budget ultimately reports on expanded fiscal capacity, which is reflected in every revenue line in this budget, and this did not come about by accident. This was a result of intentional economic and tax policy implementation. We reduced the corporate income tax rate by one-third to ensure that Alberta had by far and away the most competitive business tax rate in the country, one of the most competitive rates in all of North America. Why? Because we know we don't compete for capital only in Canada. We compete for capital globally and certainly within the North American context. We've put a real focus on regulatory modernization. Again, that's reflected in this budget. It's reflected in the revenue lines in this budget. It's reflected in cost savings in this budget.

There were a number of initiatives that we've implemented, including the innovation employment grant recapitalizing the Alberta economic corporation, the AEC. This is reflected, Madam Chair, in the fact that we are enabling captive insurance in this province. It's reflected in a very recent announcement, in fact, in some legislation that we have before this House around enabling a regulatory sandbox for financial services, and there's more. This economic growth resulting in expanded fiscal capacity did not happen by accident. It was intentional. It's a result of implementing intentional policy.

Madam Chair, I need to also just make reference to the fiscal discipline and the fiscal progress that Budget 2022 reports on. We inherited – again, we inherited – a government spend that was increasing by 4 per cent per year, and on a per capita basis the government was spending $10 billion more than comparator provinces. This budget reports on our success at flattening that curve and, in fact, aligning our per capita spend by '22-23 with that of other provinces. We've done that thoughtfully and carefully and surgically in a way where we can still deliver high-quality services to Albertans but in a way that puts this province on a sustainable fiscal trajectory, which is critical to the well-being of Albertans today and in the future.

Madam Chair, one of the benefits of fiscal discipline is that it gives government an opportunity for reinvestment, and this budget reflects additional investment in health care: $1.8 billion over the next three years. To do what? To expand capacity, capacity that has been demonstrated over the last three years to be in deficit, to be deficient. Included in this budget is, in fact, additional investment in skills, talent, and jobs, $600 million over the next three years, investing in Albertans to ensure they have the skills they need, they require to participate in the new economy of tomorrow.

Madam Chair, Bill 2 assists us in implementing this budget, a budget that really positions this province for disproportionate investment attraction, economic growth, and expanded fiscal capacity, a budget that brings fiscal responsibility back to the province, a budget that ends an era of downloading debt onto future generations, a debt they did not incur, a budget that positions this province for opportunity and prosperity and a future.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members to join the debate on Bill 2? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 2 in committee. I found it interesting to hear the Finance minister, with his budget speech, essentially coming back here to defend different elements of Bill 2. I mean, don't get me wrong. Certainly, Bill 2 has some very ordinary and regular elements to it that you need to help to implement a budget. But in doing so, it also highlights some of the very worst aspects of this budget and, as we have said time and again, the insidious and pernicious tax grab that lies within both this budget and Bill 2, which helps to enable the implementation of this budget. I mean, that's a good starting point for our criticism of both this bill and this budget.

Madam Chair, I would suggest that, you know, we take a step back and just think for a time. How is it possible that a government continues to lose the confidence of the population here in the province of Alberta when you have $100 oil and a balanced budget, even with a modest surplus? I would suggest that it's quite a more significant surplus, really. It's just kind of tucked away for a rainy day when this government decides to call an election. But there are elements in this bill that provide clues as to why this UCP government is failing to gain the confidence of the people of Alberta at the same time when they've had this good fortune drop from the sky, right? Let's not forget that, really, this budget is balanced on the incredibly good fortune of a dramatic increase in the price of energy, an historic increase to the price of energy due to international events and demand around the world for both oil and gas.

You know, this whole nonsense about fiscal discipline and clever choices that this government made around this budget has absolutely nothing to do with the position that this budget is in now, which is a balanced or surplus position. In fact, where you can clearly see deficit: you don't have to look any further than this choice not to index tax brackets and to essentially tax inflation with this budget. The minister did mention that he would, upon reflection, think about changing the situation. I mean, obviously, it's there in the front window – or it wasn't in the front window. He was trying to hide it. Now everybody can see it, and it's having a serious effect of lack of confidence of our population towards this government and their ability to manage financial matters or any other things that they are responsible for in regard to health care, education, and the safety and the security of our population.

I was listening to the radio this morning, Madam Chair, on the way over here for the morning session. I confess that I sometimes do listen to radio stations that are firmly planted in the world of Def Leppard and April Wine, you know, long ago and far away. But it makes you feel good. It makes you feel young – right? – in a nostalgic sort of way. Lord knows that radio station I listen to from time to time, if it has a political bent to it, is decidedly conservative. You listen to Def Leppard and April Wine and Bachman-Turner Overdrive, and there's sort of a direct line you can follow to at least personally conservative thoughts. Again, it's a radio station that just plays music usually.

But, oh, no; from the time it took me to drive here, which only takes about 10 minutes because I live close by, they had a long rant about the UCP government. I couldn't believe it. They're saying:

you just can't trust what they have to say. I think his starting point – and I think it's a starting point of a lot of these kinds of conversations in between Def Leppard and April Wine – was talking about their car insurance, which has gone up upwards of 30 per cent for individuals across the province.

It's not like it's an option to have car insurance. It's the law. It's a law that's created here in this very Chamber to ensure that people have insurance. Thus, being a law that is required through this government, through this level of government, it should and must be made affordable, because it's not like you have a choice, right? You look at the design of Edmonton or Calgary or vast rural areas of this province. I mean, it's the size of western Europe. We need vehicles. You need to have an affordable way by which to keep that vehicle on the road. This government whipped that carpet right out from underneath everybody who has to have insurance, which is everybody who's driving legally in this province, and, for many people, simply made it unaffordable. I mean, that's something that people are talking about around the table.

You know, to suggest that it was a courageous thing to do – I heard the minister say that more than once. I was like: oh, my goodness; don't use that. I'm not going to give you free tips. But, Madam Chair, I think I'll give the minister: stop saying that it was a courageous thing to do, to increase people's car insurance by 30 per cent, because it has exactly the opposite effect of what people would think if the minister was being courageous. I would say otherwise. Just opening the barn door and letting everything run out – right? – that's kind of what it really amounts to. That adds up to a fiscal deficit for the vast majority of people who have to buy some form of car insurance here in the province of Alberta.

Again, other fiscal deficits on a personal level: they just keep adding up, Madam Chair. The increases to postsecondary tuition, say, for example, were absolutely unprecedented here in the province of Alberta, 21 to 23 per cent across the board, including extraordinary tuition increases that were approved by this government, by the Advanced Education minister, ranging from 20, 40, even up to 103 per cent increases for certain programs, right? That adds up not just as a deficit to families paying for tuition for their family members to go to school; it adds up to a hundred-foot brick wall around those institutions for people who simply can't raise that kind of money. Lots and lots of people just can't go because this UCP government chose to raise postsecondary education to unprecedented levels here in the province of Alberta.

I know what the argument is. It's the same argument that this Minister of Finance and the Premier uses, "Oh, we're just bringing it up to the national average; we had more or less, and now we're more like the rest of Canada," or something like that. You know, there are just so many ways, Madam Chair, by which you can play games with those kinds of numbers, right? I know for a fact that we have the very lowest student grant allowance for postsecondary, for example. That totally negates any idea that we pay less money for tuition here in the province of Alberta, which we don't.

I mean, this government has been, you know, dragging the same statistic around now for more than three years, right? We've got to remind this UCP government that you did not take power yesterday; it's been three years. Don't you feel a little older? I do. The numbers that you're using from 2018 or whatever are not accurate for today, so stop doing that. It's really not good fiscal management. That's a free tip. That's my second free tip of the afternoon.

Another issue is that when you're talking about, like, the public service – you know, there was some issue about lack of clarity of unfreezing the wages of the public service and so forth. I mean, be careful which rabbit hole you go down. While you may have done that or kept it frozen or whatever you did, you sure as heck did not do that, Madam Chair, with AIMCo's salary raises. They were very healthy indeed. Sitting on the heritage savings committee, I can see that they managed to slip through extraordinary wage increases for members of AIMCo, right? That was done quite happily by this government while other sectors had to just fight tooth and nail for pennies on the dollar, to try to fight for a fair wage. You've got to be careful where you go with these things. Quite frankly, people can see through it. It's as simple as that.

In regard to energy, again, you know, we would expect that the province of Alberta and a Conservative government in the province of Alberta would at least have the energy file somewhat sorted out. But, oh, no, right? What we learned today, for example, from the news is that, number one, we have a 6.7 per cent inflation rate here in the province of Alberta this month. It's the highest rate in 31 years. A lot of what is contributing to that is a wild increase in energy prices, of energy costs for families, from electricity to gasoline prices and natural gas prices to heat your home, because we still have our furnaces on because it's flipping snowing here in April on the 20th.

We learned today from a very credible study from the University of Calgary that the electricity profits went up by a factor of five here in the province of Alberta, a five-times increase in profits since this UCP government took power and removed rate caps. I know that you need to have, you know, some measure of profit to ensure the integrity of our electricity system.

I know that the last time we had a Conservative government here it lasted 40-some years. Good grief. They invested an awful lot of money in the electricity grid system. I mean, we fought tooth and nail when we were a mighty caucus of four, suggesting that making those wild investments in super high tension wires and DC lines – a lot of it, we suspected, was for them to export electricity to the United States, which I'm pretty sure was true, right? It caused a social rebellion in central Alberta. That was the birthplace of lots and lots of Wildrose activity, because they were trying to run these big DC lines through places like Sundre and Rocky Mountain House and so forth. You know, we made a big stink about it, too, so this whole notion – I don't know why the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity, or gassy behaviour of some kind, seems to love to pretend that it was the NDP that did that; of course, it was the Conservatives. They built these high-tension lines. You see them. Look up when you're driving on highway 2. Those are the ones they built. The Conservatives built them, probably to excess, but that's where we're at now.

Where we are still at now as well is having a responsibility to provide affordable electricity for domestic consumption and for industrial consumption, too. This UCP government, Madam Chair – you know it as well as I do – is not fulfilling that responsibility at all, right? A five-times profit increase for electricity companies: they're making out like bandits, for sure. We know they are. The numbers are clear. I read the report from the University of Calgary this morning, and lots of other people are reading that same report, too.

The price of gasoline: again, we saw the provincial government pull back on the provincial tax on a litre of gasoline. But, Madam Chair, I need a reminder, if someone can tell me, just randomly: how long is that good for? Is that forever? Are they just going to not put the provincial tax back on? They have to at some point. I mean, that's a pretty big revenue stream for running the province. You can't just pull back on tax revenues forever. It's like you're living on borrowed time, right? You can do it for a little while, but you can't do it forever because you have to pay for health care and education and health and security and roads and all of the things that the government and the province are responsible for.

This whole notion of, you know, pulling back on those revenues: we saw the same thing with the corporate tax giveaway, the $4.7 billion tax giveaway to profitable corporations. They said that this was going to be a trickle-down way by which we will build our economy. I mean, yeah, they laughed all the way to the bank, and – guess what, Madam Chair – those banks were located in the United States and in Europe and in small islands in the Caribbean. People took it as a chance to pay a dividend to their shareholders, and they said, “Thanks very much,” and away they went, right? I heard the Energy minister say some version of that very well: yes, of course, they had to pay a dividend because they weren’t making money for quite a long time when the price was only $27 a barrel for the energy companies, say, for example. We gave them a $4.7 billion shot in the arm, and yeah, they paid dividends. You bet they did. That money, by and large, just left town, left the province, and probably left the country, too. I mean, that’s the way these things work.

Yeah. I mean, you know, Bill 2 is just what it is. It has little different nooks and crannies, different elements that you need to do to implement the budget. Some of those things are fairly innocuous and so forth, but it shines a spotlight, once again, Madam Chair, on just: is this budget the best for what we need for right now for Albertans? Does it help Albertans to get ahead? Does it help to diversify our economy? Does it provide for a healthier Alberta, a better educated Alberta, and so forth? I would suggest that “no” is the answer to each of those challenges. What is the most important document that a government produces? An annual budget.

Again, it begs the question: how is it that through the miracle of energy prices going up so dramatically, $100 a barrel oil, a balanced budget, a modest surplus, that with all of those things this UCP government still has not won the trust of the people of Alberta? I think that the government needs to reflect on that and reflect on it hard and start working on not just helping Albertans but building the trust that Albertans want and need for their government, right? I would suggest, of course, that the best way to do that is to change the government, but we’ll wait and work hard to earn that trust from the people of this province.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: Any other members to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to rise to speak to Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. I’ve appreciated the conversation that we’ve had so far this afternoon. You know, for members on this side of the House as well, I appreciate the Finance minister rising to share his thoughts on what he called the budget implementation bill, kind of the act that will ensure that their budget is passed and everything that they’ve put forward in terms of ideas will be included in that.

Again, I appreciate that, and I took some notes on some of the Finance minister’s comments. As the previous member highlighted as well, it was interesting to hear some of those thoughts specifically around this idea that we’ve heard quite often at this point around the billion dollars that this UCP government is proposing get taken away from Alberta families in regard to the deindexing of personal income taxes. I find this issue incredibly frustrating in terms of the negative impacts that it’s going to have on Alberta families, particularly because of the history of this Premier around this specific issue. We’ve heard in the House before regarding that member’s work during his time with the Canadian Taxpayers Federation and as an MP and time and time again railing about this idea of bracket creep, but the tables have turned now that this member is the Premier of Alberta.

Again, when the Finance minister makes comments like, you know, depending on the fiscal situation into the future, if we have, quote, unquote, additional fiscal clarity, the Finance minister might consider reindexing personal income taxes – and before that, the minister made a comment along the lines of, “Well, it’s not affecting people this year.” Okay. Well, looking into the future, we’re going to see a billion dollars, one way or another, taken away from Alberta families. Again, it was interesting the way that the Finance minister worded that because it almost made it sound like on one hand, “Oh, this isn’t happening,” and then in the next sentence more along the lines of, “Well, it is happening, but maybe based on the price of oil into the future we’ll be able to reconsider this.”

First of all, I think it’s important that there’s clarity in the discussions that are being put forward by the Finance minister. I think it’s very clear from the budget and from those comments that there is indeed a billion dollars’ worth of deindexing that’s going to affect the bottom line for Alberta families. It will possibly get worse as inflation potentially continues to grow. I think that’s important for Alberta families to understand.

There have been some decisions that this government has made based on their budgeting and their policies, and we heard from the previous member, the Member for Edmonton-North West, regarding the $4.7 billion giveaway to the most profitable corporations in terms of the corporate tax cuts that this government not only put forward in the beginning but decided to fast-forward compared, I believe, to even what was in their platform. What we see again and again from this government is a decision to lower taxes for the most profitable corporations, which we continue to see are using those dollars from Alberta families to purchase stock buybacks, to use those funds to move their operations to other jurisdictions.

There are a variety of reasons for that, obviously, Madam Chair. Some of those reasons, as we’ve also heard, are reflected in the priorities of this government, specifically when we look at the idea that this government has continued to pull hundreds of millions of dollars out of the postsecondary institutions and at the same time increasing tuition for Alberta families. We heard it from the previous member regarding some of those increases in tuition, 21 to 23 per cent across the board regarding increases in tuition.

In some instances we see programs doubling, which is astounding, Madam Chair. I think that no matter what the original cost was or what the program of study was, to actually see a minister willing to fully support postsecondary institutions coming forward with doubling of tuition costs – of course, these institutions are having to do this because so much money has been scaled back from this minister and from this UCP government. It’s putting these institutions in a really hard place and, by extension, putting Albertans who are trying to access postsecondary studies in a tough place as well.

Further to that, Madam Chair, it’s putting corporations that are actually very interested and very invested in seeing the success of students and the success of our postsecondary institutions in a tough situation as well. Again, when we talk about retention and a skilled labour force, I think the ability of Albertans to obtain postsecondary studies in these emerging markets and technologies is a big part of that picture. I think that we’ve seen time and time again that it might even be a bigger part of the picture than the idea that this UCP government has put forward in regard to the massive tax giveaways that they’ve moved forward with.

It’s frustrating, in my opinion, that we continue down this path, especially at the same time that we are giving away this $4.7 billion to these most profitable corporations, that, on the other hand, we have the Finance minister saying: well, depending on how the books look, you know, next year or several years down the line we might reconsider the personal income tax bracket creep that we've included in this budget, that is going to take a billion dollars away from Alberta families at the same time as we're giving much more away to those profitable corporations.

I'll be interested to follow that conversation as we move forward. You know, as far as I might understand, the price of oil is going to be the differentiating factor on that. If it continues to stay above $100, then maybe Albertans will be lucky enough to receive their billions if not more dollars back into their pockets that this government is choosing to take away from them. I am concerned that if we see that number regarding the price of oil going down, this government actually might go farther and increase the amount that they are taking away from Albertans regarding that bracket creep and regarding the deindexing of personal income taxes.

We've heard discussions around the decisions of this government in this budget to provide very little substance in regard to utility benefits to Albertans and the increasing price of utilities as well as their gas bills. It's unfortunate because we saw even as recently as this week the NDP opposition raising the issue that, I believe, EPCOR had put forward that there are as many as 1,000 Albertans who are going to have their utilities cut off in the near future, if that hasn't happened already, with the government ending the moratorium on utility cut-offs. Unfortunately, we received no answers regarding that issue, so it seems very likely that within a short period of time thousands of Albertans are going to have their utilities cut off.

Again, this is in the middle of a continued pandemic, where Albertans are increasingly struggling to find work. This is in the midst of record levels of inflation, where this UCP government is not only taking more dollars out of their pockets through bracket creep but also letting insurance companies take more money out of their pockets simply for the fact of increasing those companies' profits.

We saw that from the report from the superintendent of insurance. Unfortunately, this government tried to hide this report as long as they could, a report that had been posted for over 100 years straight, I believe 107 years, Madam Chair, and this UCP government decided to finally release it the day before a long weekend to ensure that as few Albertans as possible would be able to see that, but I can tell you that whether Albertans read that report or not, it has been very clear from the massive increases that many Albertans have seen, in some instances upwards of 30 per cent, that whatever lobbying this UCP government is doing and apparently the Premier has been doing, as the Premier stated in question period – whatever lobbying the Premier is doing to lower those fees is clearly not working.

Even with the decisions of this government to reduce the payout benefits for Albertans who have been injured in collisions, in some cases concussions that are life altering, the decision to change the minor injury regulations around payouts and the ability of Albertans to be fairly represented and compensated, even the allowance of this minister to see such big changes in that, Albertans are paying more but getting less, and this at the same time, again, continuing through the pandemic, where they are, in many cases, driving less. This isn't, for the most part, because payouts are increasing, that Albertans are seeing higher benefits from their insurance coverage. This is simply, as the documents quite clearly lay out, that Alberta insurance companies, or insurance companies that operate in Alberta, are clearly seeing higher and higher profits while so many Albertans are struggling.

That continues to be my concern, looking through not only the budget but the priorities of this government and the willingness for the UCP to allow such massive and drastic increases to the cost of Albertans. Again, we have to look at the big picture, Madam Chair.

You know, these sorts of issues might not be specifically within this budget, but they are decisions that have impacted the bottom lines of Albertans, just like this budget has. We saw it very early, and it was an issue that I campaigned on and heard from many Albertans that they were very concerned about. One of those issues was the reduction of overtime opportunities for Alberta workers. Especially this issue affects those working less traditional hours. It affects those people potentially in the oil sands and in factories. Again, we've seen the clawback of this overtime wage for so many Albertans.

Madam Chair, I can't fail to also mention the decision of this government to reduce the minimum wage for students that are under 18 years old. Now, again, I go back to my own history and the story of my mother, who was 14 years old and raised me from that age as a single mother, and I simply can't take at face value the idea that this government has put forward that it's actually a good idea to lower minimum wage for Alberta students under the age of 18. Again, thinking back to that story, as hard as my mother worked to ensure that she was able to continue working and go to school and support our family, this government is saying, "Well, you're going to make $2 less unless you actually drop out of school." That is clearly how the legislation has been put forward, and I truly don't understand how we think this as a government and as a society is okay.

I will digress from that because, again, it's not specifically within Bill 2, but I think it continues this idea of piling on the costs and also the scaling back of income for Alberta families who are hurting so much through this pandemic.

Now, again, there are a number of issues that are affecting Alberta families, and I've had the opportunity to touch on a few of them, ones that are directly impacted by this budget, but I think it's also important to highlight some of the other changes that I've had the opportunity to talk about in previous readings of this legislation, a few of those issues concerning AISH benefits for Albertans with disabilities or who find themselves unable to work, also affecting the Alberta Works program.

I go back to the idea that the Finance minister raised regarding bracket creep and the deindexing of personal income taxes that this government has decided to move forward with. It almost seemed nonchalant, Madam Chair. I won't, you know, put any words or feelings in the member's mouth by any means, as best as I can, but it kind of seemed like maybe he hadn't necessarily had this conversation with his caucus, that as soon as possible we are going to move away from deindexing personal income taxes. But it does also remind me of the decisions that this government has made around deindexing AISH benefits and seniors' benefits even at the same time that this government actually campaigned on ensuring that that stayed in place.

With that, Madam Chair, I have many concerns with this legislation specific to the trust that this government expects Albertans to put in them, but I do not personally believe that they have earned that trust and especially not through this budget. Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'll keep my comments fairly brief regarding Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. You know, I appreciate that the minister has been engaged in debate this afternoon around this bill. But, for me, the part that I think frustrates Albertans and those of us in the Official Opposition is that the current Premier and leader of the UCP in the not-so-distant past spoke out vehemently against bracket creep, and there's lots of documentation of him attacking the government of the day federally on when they went to enact bracket creep. Yet here we have a bill that essentially enshrines this, yet we have a government that is dancing around the fact that the Premier, in his former role, attacked this concept and called it insidious. I know that my colleagues have quoted the Premier in his former role.

What this government is doing is taking a billion dollars of additional income out of the pockets of hard-working Albertans, the exact opposite of what they claim to do. I mean, this government has actually made the cost of living in this province more expensive for Albertans under their watch: increasing park fees, insurance rates going up, energy rates going up, reducing the Alberta child and family benefit, because it's not indexed to inflation. You know, in this Budget 2022 AISH recipients are going to lose $3,000 in real purchasing power. Seniors are losing $750.

You know, Madam Chair, at a time when inflation, as my colleague pointed out – in fact, when some of these notes were written on March 22, StatsCan measured inflation at a 30-year high of 5.7 per cent. I believe it was today or yesterday that that has gone up a full percentage to 6.7 per cent inflation in the month of March. And what we have are these, quite frankly, pathetic offerings from the government to help Albertans mitigate the rising costs. Of course, wages are not rising in tandem with inflation. Costs are going up all around us. Albertans are struggling to make ends meet. We know that many Albertans are a few hundred dollars away from being unable to pay their mortgage or their rents, and we have very little in the way of support from this government. Instead of leaving dollars in the pockets of hard-working Albertans, this government is picking their pockets through this inflation tax.

Madam Chair, it's disappointing that the government has the tools at their disposal to do much more. You know, I do want to highlight the fact that although this government continues to pat itself on the back, it basically hit the lottery. With the price of oil, western Canadian select, today hovering around $90 a barrel, we know that the government is going to be rolling in a surplus. They already are but will conveniently choose the time of when to announce the surplus instead of providing Albertans with real relief today.

This government has made choices, and some really bad choices, over the past three years. You know, the race to the bottom on the corporate tax giveaway has given hundreds of millions of dollars back to companies who have said: "Thank you very much. We will go invest it in other jurisdictions, either in Canada or we'll take that money and go invest it in other countries." It has not resulted in job creation. We have a government that pats itself on the back for companies that have moved to Alberta because of the previous government's efforts in working with entities like Calgary Economic Development to attract companies. In conversations that I've had with these companies, including Amazon's AWS, when I asked them point blank, "Why did you come to Alberta?" not once ever have the companies that I've spoken with mentioned the corporate tax rate. They talk about access to talent, and they talk about quality of life.

Unfortunately, this government has shown its true colours and is attacking both of those things. We know that under the previous government four years ago we announced 3,000 new tech spaces. This UCP government, upon forming government, eliminated that program. Had they kept that program, we would have grads already being produced from our world-class postsecondaries. Instead, they cancelled that because of pettiness and recently said: okay; now we're going to fund 7,000 spaces. Well, that's great. When are we going to see the first grads of those investments? Not for a long time, Madam Chair.

Meanwhile, when Amazon did a world bid for their HQ2, their second headquarters, Calgary put in a bid – I mean, a couple of other Canadian cities did, too – and we, our government, supported that bid. Calgary didn't make the final short list, and the reason that Amazon gave – because their headquarters were going to be hiring 50,000 people, scaling up over a 10-year period, they said: "Your talent pipeline simply isn't big enough. You don't have enough grads to be able to support the investment that we're looking at making." That's when our government acted very quickly to look at supporting our postsecondaries, but we've seen time and again actions of this current government gutting hundreds of millions of dollars from our postsecondary institutions and risking future potential investments that rely on a strong postsecondary system.

You know, Madam Chair, I will not be supporting this bill. It lacks meaningful action that would have real relief for Alberta families who are struggling to make ends meet right now. As opposed to providing real solutions, we have a hodgepodge of Band-Aid solutions by this government, scrambling, as we've seen today, with the announcement of a natural gas rebate that was written on the back of a napkin because it has zero details and will provide zero relief until maybe the fall – maybe – for some families.

An Hon. Member: Maybe.

Mr. Bilous: Maybe. That's not what families are looking for.

[Mrs. Frey in the chair]

Again, at a time when the government is bringing in unprecedented energy revenues, what we're calling for is for the government to pass some of those dollars on to Albertans, to put them back into the pockets of Albertans so that we can make their life more affordable. But this government is not, and for that reason I'll be opposing this bill.

The Acting Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak? Seeing none, I shall call the question.

[The clauses of Bill 2 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Acting Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Chair: Any opposed? This is carried.

Bill 9 Public's Right to Know Act

The Acting Chair: Are there any members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise this afternoon to speak to Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act. When this piece of legislation was introduced, it was certainly an opportunity to address many concerns that Albertans are facing when it comes to key issues within the justice system. Unfortunately, this piece of legislation does little to address the actual priorities of Albertans. We have a piece of legislation that does something that I believe the minister already has capacity to do, which is to complete reports on data. Yet that's all this legislation really does. It gives him permission to do something that already can be done.

There are some significant concerns, when it comes to this bill, about what information will be collected, what information will be reported on. It's quite concerning when we've seen some of the behaviours of the ministers from this government when it comes to confidential, private information. We've seen this minister, when he was under the Ministry of Health, collect personal phone numbers from physicians and then call them. He felt that he was entitled to that information and used it in what I would suggest is a very inappropriate manner. So I question: what type of information is going to be collected, and what information is going to be reported?

It's very, very vague when it comes to talking about who is going to be impacted by this. I know that it talks about individuals on bail or parole, but what crimes are we talking about? Is there potential for any sort of conviction to be part of this report that the minister is providing to Albertans?

I think that when it comes to the safety of Albertans, we, this side of the House, believe that that is absolutely essential. We need to make sure that Albertans feel supported and safe in their communities, in their homes, on their commutes to and from their homes. However, this piece of legislation doesn't actually do that.

There are significant concerns when a government has made cuts to the victims of crime fund. That's a fund that was essential in supporting victims of crime. It was essential in making sure that those who have been proven through the court system to be a victim of crime receive supports and resources that are necessary to address things such as, you know, mental health and stability and counselling, those types of things, but this government chose to cut that.

When we're talking about Albertans' safety, I think the bigger picture is: what do we do to actually prevent crime? What do we do to make sure that people that are experiencing crime, when it is reported, have a police officer attend? Municipalities have had their funding cut for police. We have talk about a provincial police program, which I've heard over and over is something that Albertans do not want. We have concerns that are happening that when the matter does get to court, trials are being delayed. Unfortunately, Madam Chair, some of these trials, because of the extensive delays, are being thrown out. How does that support Albertans? How does that reduce crime? None of this legislation actually addresses what the major concerns are.

We have heard from racialized individuals in the province, and there was a report completed that provided some recommendations from the Anti-Racism Advisory Council on ways that data could be collected. Unfortunately, this bill, Bill 9, does not provide any tools that would support the recommendations that were brought forward. I think that if this government was true in their intent to support Albertans, to be transparent, to collect data in a manner that's actually useful, those recommendations would have been an easy win. That work has been done. They provided recommendations. They did consultations. They easily could have implemented that and put this into this legislation. However, it wasn't done.

I think, having come from a background in social work and having worked with both offenders and victims, there is an incredible grey area between the time that someone is accused of a crime and when someone is charged with a crime and when that matter actually goes to court. Then there's a verdict, a decision on that crime, and then the sentencing. What's the outcome of that? There are so many phases in between where it's determined that perhaps that individual wasn't guilty, that perhaps there wasn't enough data, that perhaps the person completed significant rehabilitative courses and requirements such as counselling while serving their time. That could change the need to report. I wonder: who is making those decisions on who is being reported and at what point?

If someone is out on bail, they haven't been found guilty. They've been charged, but they're not actually guilty of a crime. There is a process in the province, in this country for what happens to an individual and what their rights are while they've been charged, out on bail, and have a trial. There's also something in this province and in this country called an appeal. So there could be a decision that's made, someone is found guilty, and they have the right to an appeal. It's not a new concept that people actually have been charged, found guilty, and are not.

I'm curious what the process is for gathering information, what information is going to be published. We have a system in the province of reporting violent offenders, high-risk reoffenders. When those individuals are determined by a panel of experts – not a minister; a panel of experts who have extensive knowledge of this individual's history, their crimes, their behaviour while incarcerated, their behaviour while in community – they are deemed a risk. A report is then distributed to the community, alerting them that this individual is a high-risk offender, and that information is made public for the safety of the community. Now, I know that that is an extensive process when it comes to making the decision to put this person's information out there. I don't see anything in this legislation that would indicate that such a robust process is going to occur. That to me is quite scary, Madam Chair. When we're talking about completing reports on individuals who are suspected or charged with a crime, that is a significantly grey area.

I know that when I was looking at buying a house, one of the things that the realtor had pointed my attention to was the city of Edmonton's crime map. I could click any community, and immediately all of the data would come up. It told me how many sexual offences, how many car break-ins, how many break and enters into homes. There were attempted murders. There was arson. Like, there was a complete list of data about that community. It didn't identify who did it, but it provided me as someone who wanted to move into that community a plethora of information about what was going on in real time in that community.

As a homebuyer I didn't need to know the name of the individual that did it. I didn't need to know the address of the individual that did it. I looked at the safety statistics that the city of Edmonton police had determined and put in that data. It was something that I trusted. I didn't need to know if they were out on bail, if they were out on parole. Those were things that weren't important.

I question what kind of information this ministry is going to be gathering and then who gets it. Are they going to be giving it to realtors when a realtor is showing homes in a community? They're doing a new build, so anybody who comes through that community can say, you know: "How many offenders live in this area? How many people are actually out on bail? Where do they live? Are they my neighbour?"

There's an idea and an understanding that there are people in the province that take on a belief and a value of being a vigilante. We have incredible access to information simply by just going on Facebook. There are groups all over the place that talk about, you know, "So-and-so did this, and so-and-so did that, and my neighbour has garbage piled up in their house, and I need to report it to bylaw," things that individuals believe are a crime that should be handled. If it's not being handled in the way that they believe, they want to report it and they want someone in the community to do something about it. There is an attempt to perhaps sway the police to maybe respond in the way that they hope.

Can you imagine what would occur if we're responsible as a minister relaying those reports? What if an individual is out on bail and we see their bail conditions and that's my neighbour and I don't think that they're complying with their bail conditions? They might have a bail condition that says no cellphones. It's a common condition of bail. That person is out on their phone, I call the police to report it, and nobody responds. What do I do? Do I put it in this chat and say, "Hey, so-and-so at this address has a bail condition"? No mention of what the crime is, just that they're out on bail and that they're a risk.

People overreact. People take this information and feel that, you know, because people aren't doing anything about it, perhaps they should. We've seen in Edmonton people that are accused of being sex offenders, where people will petition and line up. Truckloads of vehicles will go up and down their street with megaphones, with signs saying: a sex offender lives in this house; we don't want them in our community.

Why would they think that the information that is provided in this legislation is going to protect the community? When we look at someone out on bail, when we look at someone who's got significant charges, there absolutely is a right for the community to know about their safety, one hundred per cent. Those systems are already in place. I have a friend who works with the police who is responsible for monitoring high-risk offenders, whose job it is to make their lives difficult. They show up when they're getting gas. They show up when they're getting groceries just to say: hey, I'm watching you. The police are monitoring these people that are deemed to be high risk to the community.

There isn't a report on it. The police are doing their job. I trust that when we have these police officers that are highly trained, highly skilled, and equipped to deal with criminals and criminal behaviour, they can do their job. I don't think that a minister should be deciding from the start of bail that the public needs to know about this. There are absolutely no criteria in here about the type of information that's going to be gathered, how long it's going to be stored, where it's going to be stored, for how long.

If this person is on bail and a report goes out and says that this person is accused of these crimes, these are their conditions – I know of many times that when there are continuous bail hearings and perhaps continuous breaches of those bail hearings, their bail conditions change. They could change monthly. Is a new report going to be issued every time those bail conditions change? And then what if this individual goes to court, has their day in court, and they're found not guilty? Is a new report going to be released identifying to the public that the person that we did a report on two years ago has now been found not guilty, and is it going to explain why that person was found not guilty?

There are just so many areas of concern when it comes to the reporting and the disclosure when it comes to this piece of legislation. There are some significant things that this government could do to actually help reduce crime. I think that when we look at the legislation, at the public's right to know, I'm not sure that there are any stats that show a correlation between crime reduction and information. There's no information in here that talks to – who did they talk to to gather this, to come up with this idea that this is the best way to tackle crime? What's the intention of this piece of legislation, and does the intention actually lead to the results that they're looking for? I don't see that in this legislation.

There's nothing in here that talks about hiring more prosecutors. When you're a Crown prosecutor and you have a stack on your desk, how realistic is it that you're going to have an actual ability to go through in a timely manner all of the charges and all of the individuals that deserve their day in court? Those are some key things that need to happen in order to ensure that crime is reduced in the province and that Albertans are actually safe in their communities, and I don't see that in this bill. It's glaringly obvious that it's not there. There need to be concrete steps from this government to address crime.

None of the constituents that I've talked to have said that they sure wish the minister would report who's out on bail and what their charges are. That does nothing to speed up the process, to have an individual have their matter heard in court. That does nothing to support those that have been victims of crime. What we have seen in actions are cuts to those services, a lack of support and resources where it really matters, a threat to create a provincial police system. These are actions that don't match what they say their intended outcome is, Madam Chair. I look at this, and I question: what is the intent, and who are they listening to? It's not Albertans.

Albertans are asking for tangible action to support them in what they need. They need the ability to feel safe. They need the ability to make sure that when there is a crime, they have a police officer respond. They need to make sure that if they're a victim of that crime, they have supports and resources in place to help deal with the trauma of what happened. They need to make sure that once their matter gets to court, there's a prosecutor that has the time and ability to really sit through and make sure that whatever the charges are, they're actually dealt with so that an appeal doesn't happen if this individual is guilty. Those are some of the things that cause people to be found not guilty because of human error. Human error happens when you have way too many files.

Thank you.

The Acting Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Before I get started on my own comments, I just want to make it absolutely and abundantly clear, because I heard comments coming from the other side, that the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs was speaking specifically about error in the justice system and not about defending sex offenders. I want to make that absolutely, one hundred per cent clear. I heard comments coming from the other side, and I just want to make sure that... [interjection] No. It's offensive. It's incredibly offensive, the comments that I heard, okay? I just want to get it on the record, Madam Chair.

The Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs made incredibly good insights into this particular bill. Of course, this is an incredibly vague bill. Really, all of the things that are described in this bill: the actual minister already has the power to actually do them. It's basically like a job description, essentially, because the minister can already do these things. Why do we need a piece of legislation before us that basically gives us the minister's job, something that's within the purview of the minister already, when so many more important things could be addressed by this government when it comes to correcting the justice system?

One of the things that I'm very passionate about and very dedicated to when it comes to the justice system is how colonization has impacted specifically Indigenous people here in the province of Alberta and throughout Canada and how they're overrepresented in the prison system. Now, I've been on record before on this particular matter. What I find incredibly outstanding and quite concerning is that even though Indigenous people make up approximately 7 per cent of the Canadian population, we have 23 per cent of Indigenous men in prisons and then not only that; 27 per cent of Indigenous women in prisons. We have to ask ourselves: okay; why is this the case? What is the root of this in the first place?

I would suggest that what really needs to be looked into is how Indigenous people and their behaviour are sometimes criminalized.

It has to do with racism. It has to do with how they're being treated within the judicial system, how they have a lack of supports when it comes to fair representation within the judicial system, and these are things that this government could be concerned about. They like to talk a big talk about dealing with the calls to action of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, Madam Chair, but we don't see much action from this government. I'm really sorry. Like, to the minister of Indigenous affairs: planting a tree and making a little garden on the grounds of the Legislature, which is something nice, is symbolic, but it doesn't go to the root problems that we are facing in the province of Alberta. It doesn't do enough. Just like this bill doesn't do enough, the minister of Indigenous affairs, when it comes to reconciliation and the calls to action of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, is not doing enough. We see that over and over and over by this government, where they just – it's a lack of action.

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

Now, I think that so much could be done when it comes to making sure that Indigenous people get fair representation within the judicial system. You know, I have a friend who was commenting to me about this thing called justice circles within the judicial system. It's something relatively new that exists. They came up with it probably – you know, it's been in process for about five years, but a lot of people don't know that these justice circles actually exist. The Edmonton Police Service decided to pilot this particular project. It's been ongoing now for a few years, and I think it's the best invention and a way of reconciling two cultures and two peoples and actually to address the criminalization of Indigenous behaviour, as has been seen historically here in the province of Alberta and throughout Canada. This is, like, a real approach, a real alternative, to making sure that Indigenous people are treated fairly within the judicial system.

Now, within these justice circles you have elders from community, people who know the justice system very well, who are invited to – the individual who has committed a crime is actually invited to sit down with law enforcement, with people from their community, the actual person they actually committed the crime against, with elders, and they discuss what were the ramifications of that person's wrong decision and how it impacted the community, how it impacted the individual specifically. This is a real alternative to getting us moving forward as a province, and it is a real alternative for actually implementing the calls to justice of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, for making sure that Indigenous people are treated fairly.

When it comes to pieces of legislation coming out of the Ministry of Justice, I'm going to continue speaking about this because it's something that I think that we should investigate further, something – again, I stated that the Edmonton Police Service actually put these justice circles in, implemented them, pilot projected them. It's a real alternative out there rather than the traditional sentencing form that actually happens now within the Alberta judicial system and is actually providing real, substantive change in the community.

I can't remember the exact numbers off the top of my head because I don't have the report in front of me, but the actual incidents, the number of people who actually end up recommitting a crime after going through the justice circle alternative sentencing program is very, very, very low. I hope that I can bring this up in debate in future, and I will bring more information about these justice circles into the House and table the information because I honestly think that every member of this House, if they are truly dedicated to wanting to make sure that Indigenous people are fairly treated within our judicial system, will want this to be implemented on a grander scale throughout the province of Alberta, and I hope that it's something that, over the years to come, will be an alternative that is done throughout the entire country.

When speaking during second reading on this particular bill, I spoke significantly about the fact that the victims of crime fund was actually raided by the UCP, and we thought: okay; well, maybe there will be an alternative type of funding for victims of crime. That's what we were expecting to see from this government when they brought legislation forward on this particular topic, but here we see that this vague bill, which allows the minister to actually already do the things that he's doing, doesn't address committing any more funding to victims of crime and helping them out in any way. I think that that's something that members opposite should be asking themselves. Like, bring a real piece of legislation before us that is actually addressing the issues.

Now, there are a number of nonprofit organizations that actually help victims of crime, and they were at the forefront of actually calling this government on the fact that they were cutting the victims of crime fund. They advocated specifically to this government, and again I'll make the argument that so many times when we see the pieces of legislation brought forward by this particular government, we see that they only listen to the people that actually share their ideological perspective. And then what happens to the rest of Albertans? They like to say that they're listening to Albertans. They like to say that they're listening to Albertans, but in sad fact, Madam Chair, what we see is that they listen to people that share their ideology.

You know, as legislators in this House you would think that we would make decisions based on research, on data, and so often we hear from members on the other side of the House anecdotal information. You've heard the saying before – and it's one that I like to repeat – that the plural of anecdote is not data. I can understand that you may have this one experience or you heard about this one story or this one person brought up this issue to you and it was one experience, but you can't make legislation based on one experience. You have to look at the overall data of what's actually being demonstrated. What are the tendencies? What does research show about these things? Then you make informed decisions, and you propose legislation based on that rather than on anecdote.

Now, that's not to say that that one person doesn't deserve to be listened to, but you cannot let a small group of people drive the agenda of the entire province. You know, unfortunately, we saw that with the anti-COVID convoy. We saw a small group of people actually pressure this government, and this government bent – or the government caved, I should better say, caved to the call of this small group of people and decided to lift restrictions without looking at the data, I'll say, and look at us now. Look at us now. It's a shame, the number of deaths that have actually happened in this province as a result of COVID. And that's what happens when you're not making legislation or governing based on data.

You know, that's a perfect segue into another issue that I care about immensely when it comes to justice, not just justice but in general in terms of governance and democratic participation by individuals in our democracy here in Alberta, and that is the collection of race-based data. This could have been a bill dedicated to exactly that, and the Member for Edmonton-City Centre put a lot of time, dedication, as many members of our caucus did, in consulting with racialized people here in the province of Alberta to actually address the issues that they were most concerned about. But in order to address the issues that they're most concerned about, we need to collect data.

Like, I can't tell you how often individuals in my own constituency: they'd be asking me why racialized people are overrepresented at the lower levels of the government bureaucracy and how come not more racialized people are directors, executive directors, assistant deputy ministers, and deputy ministers of the government. This is a real concern, and the only way that we can attempt to even address this within government is to, first of all, collect the data so that we can actually see what the real data is when it comes to – and it doesn't have to be mandatory. You can make it voluntary.

Many of the individuals and organizations that we consulted when it came to issues of racial injustice here in the province of Alberta – when we did that as a caucus, I think we held six, if I'm not mistaken, in total, six consultations with racialized individuals here in the province of Alberta and organizations that they represent, people that care deeply about the systemic injustices related around racism here in the province, and there's so much work that needs to be done.

But that first step that we need to take is collecting the data, the race-based data. I want to applaud the Member for Edmonton-City Centre for leading us on that particular endeavour and making sure that people were being reached out to and hearing what the follow-up was. It's quite unfortunate, though, that we're not getting support from the other side of the House on this particular issue.

The member brought in the private member's Bill 204. Of course, I'm biased. In my humble opinion, it was an incredibly good bill, well written, identifying exactly what needed to happen here in the province of Alberta for us to move forward on dealing with issues of systemic racism, yet we see the members on the other side of the House wanting to squash this particular private member's bill.

I look out at members on the other side of the House, you know, and this is what I can't understand, Madam Chair. I'm just so curious to understand what's going through the heads of the members on the other side of the House, because I would think that this is not a partisan issue. I'm so curious to know what they're thinking. How can they be against the collection of race-based data if this is going to get us to where we want to be, making sure that all individuals, all Albertans, all people who call Alberta home are going to be treated more justly within our political system?

You know, this is another thing where I feel like we get lip service from the members of the other side of the House when it comes to multiculturalism, when it comes to actually communicating to Albertans that, yeah, we all want an Alberta where it doesn't matter what faith you are, it doesn't matter what ethnicity you are, it doesn't matter what nationality you had prior to coming here to this great province, but now you're an Albertan, and it doesn't matter what the colour of your skin is. We say that, but then when it comes down to every word in legislation, we're not seeing it come to fruition from this government. And you can bet that when I'm out in the communities talking with people, I speak about the fact that all we're getting is lip service from this particular government when it comes to these issues.

Don't get me wrong. I think it's really important to protect the private property of places of worship. It's important. Nobody wants a swastika or racist, negative terms being scrawled on places of . . .

The Chair: Are there other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise and provide a few comments at this committee stage on Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act. I'm trying to see if I can find a rename for this act. It might be: the public's right to ask the question as to whether this bill is even required and whether the minister already has the powers that are enumerated in this act. Or it might be: the public's right to ask the question if the minister does not have specific powers in order to report this data and needs to overstep even further, then perhaps it might be the public's right to ask the question of what the budgetary implications of a Charter challenge are. Might be a little long.

But this bill, reading it through, does not seem to solve any real problem. The minister can already publish this data. The minister could have reported on this data already. So here we are discussing this when we could be discussing far more substantive matters with respect to crime.

Now, I believe that people, regardless of any ideology or other priors, if you will, want to be financially secure, physically safe, and socially free. That's what people want. You go and talk to them. That's what they want, and they want the government to get out of the way and help them do the things to make them financially secure, physically safe, and socially free. So the extent to which this bill might do things like violate personal information or privacy, that violates the third principle here, which is socially free.

I would like to see the minister's opinion from the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner any time government brings forward legislation that has to do with the collection of information or private data or the dissemination of information such as this, especially with any identifying information. They run it past the OIPC, or at least they should. It is at the committee stage when this is the appropriate time for the minister to respond to those questions, for Executive Council to discuss those matters with the public, and I think they should.

There is no question that we do have law enforcement resourcing issues. Law enforcement, like health care, is a people-intensive service. Despite all of the technology and new ways that we find for people to be able to do their jobs, the fact of the matter is that boots on the ground, delivering the service, is the most expensive part of this service, and it is that part that has been cut. Those transfers to municipalities have been held constant now in the JSG budget for some three years, not adjusted for inflation, which is a real thing that we're learning, or population growth. The policing grants to municipalities have changed considerably. So the boots on the ground are, in fact, diminished. Even in the priority area of rural crime reduction, with the addition of what the province called RAPID, which was allowing fish and wildlife officers, for example, to respond to rural . . .

Mr. Bilous: RCMP.

Ms Phillips: Yeah. RCMP calls, I guess, is the way to put this. I don't want to characterize them as crimes, but do responses to calls for service. That's the right language. Even there, you know, the government's sort of crown jewel, signature piece of, "Oh, we're going to get tough on rural crime; we're going to do something about this," well, we just learned literally today, Madam Chair, that 10 of those fish and wildlife officers have been removed from that service. That is a lot of boots on the ground, especially if you are deploying them to specific problem areas. Ten of them just – after all of that training, which they do require, because you're not going to, you know, send a fish cop without proper training into an RCMP call for service, in a possibly very volatile situation. Yet those folks were – the Crown invested in that service, and that was cut, and we just learned that by a news release today. In the rural communities where those folks were responding to RCMP calls for service, there are 10 fewer pairs of boots on the ground to do that job for people who are victims of crime.

Now, I myself have seen quite a bit of increase in crime in my neighbourhood. I think in the last year or so I've had to file at least three reports. I am now the source of camera footage for all of my neighbours when something happens, which is frequently. It got dialled up so much over the summer that the community association began to engage much more fulsomely with the city council. My neighbours, who are, you know, the most granola-crunching lefties that you'll ever meet, are sick of it. We are all sick of it. In fact, I wasn't altogether pleased at 2 a.m. when somebody was trying to break into my house. It is not something that we want to wish on anyone, being a victim of any kind of crime.

In particular, when we see crimes that are of such severity that they, in fact, affect a person's ability to accomplish any of those three things that I talked about, being financial secure, physically safe, and socially free – for example, the kinds of egregious crimes like sexual assault or those kinds of other assaults that fundamentally alter the course of someone's life, someone's life chances, their ability to get any kind of postsecondary training, their ability to navigate the world without the scars and the constant mental presence of PTSD. And that's where the victims of crime fund was supposed to go for all of those years, towards that kind of healing so that people could in fact accomplish those overarching goals that I believe we all have. Yet there, what did the government do? They raided that victims of crime fund under the auspices of hiring more Crown prosecutors, said that they were going to return some of those benefits to victims of crime. But, really, the amount of supports were cut down to a point where they were, essentially, meaningless. Those kinds of supports that were there before are no longer there.

Where are the Crown prosecutors? I just noticed a couple of weeks ago the Crown prosecutors in the news saying that, you know, time to go on strike. The resources aren't there. This is the dead end that these constant cuts in Justice and Solicitor General have driven us into.

So the public has a right to know all right, the right to know: where are the resources for law enforcement, and how long is it going to take when I phone the police, when I do a call for service, for them to come to my house at 2 in the morning when someone's trying to break in? Whether there's going to be enough resources there to respond to – I was talking to some friends on the north side who own a liquor store, and they say they don't even bother calling anymore. That's not the police service's fault when there's not enough folks to be able to attend; that's the fault of the resources there.

The fact of the matter is that those challenges are real. They exist. Some of them are as a result of the budget legislation, that we just have been debating for the last couple of weeks, and some of them, which is what happens after that crime has gone through the justice system, are as a result of what the province did in 2020 around the victims of crime fund. That could have been fixed in this legislation; it could be fixed right now; we're in Committee of the Whole. Now, there's no question that other pieces of reporting, that are actually within the bounds of the Charter and our personal information protection of privacy act, could have also been included in this legislation.

Now, my colleague the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, I think, spoke in a far more erudite way than I could ever do on this topic; however, I will say this: the public does have the right to know where the response to the missing and murdered Indigenous women and girls inquiry is, which reported in June of 2019 with 231 recommendations. The minister received a report on January 5, 2022, saying, "We'll release our response to the report sometime," in due course, I guess. That's an answer that we sometimes get. It's not a good one, but it is one. The public has the right to know what's happening with that. These are big problems to solve. They require resources. They do, in fact, also require having good evidence and good data.

We have a bill in front of the House right now, again, that could be imported into this legislation at this stage of debate. It has happened in the past; private members' legislation has in fact been adopted by government, by Executive Council, as government legislation and then brought into the Chamber. I have a couple of memories of this happening in the Klein years. There's no question that this legislation would be significantly improved, because then it would actually give more practical effect to this legislation and probably help even the government accomplish its goals just a little bit more, because this legislation does not.

Now, I want to just return to a point that my hon. friend from Edmonton-Castle Downs made, which is: what is the point? What are we doing here? Why are we doing this? What would be the point of having more information by judicial district than is already contained within Statistics Canada's crime severity index or that the minister is not already empowered to do? So what is the point? What more information is this bill allowing the minister to cherry-pick? It's not really the public's right to know; the minister's right to decide what you get to know is maybe the better name for this bill. You know, what is accomplished by publishing this by judicial district? What will be published by judicial district? Will it be different information for different places? That's a question that I haven't seen articulated anywhere.

As the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs said, you know, there are crime severity index statistics and other things when you're buying a house, when you're deciding on your kid's school, that kind of thing. For sure, the public does pay attention to those things. I know I do. But I'm not sure what more information I actually need other than that I would like my property taxes to go towards fighting crime in my neighbourhood. I would like my provincial taxes to go with those municipal disbursements to appropriately fund a well-trained law enforcement service.

I would like public resources stewarded in a way that reflects both common sense and the will of the people with respect to how our law enforcement contract with the RCMP is developed and maintained, with appropriate consultation with municipalities and in a way that doesn't cost us an extra $300 million just because sometime 20 years ago Stephen Harper wrote a firewall letter. It doesn't really seem like a super solid reason to make a massive public policy change and put public safety at risk while we do it because we are just worried more about the colour of the uniforms or whatever than we are about making sure that our communities are safe.

Those are the kinds of things that – I mean, some of it is maybe legislative, but some of it's just: get up in the morning and go do the job. That's where we haven't seen that commitment to the physical safety of Albertans from what the government funds and what their priorities are.

You know, this is something of a husk of legislation. There's not much to it, and that's fine, I guess, if the job here is to kind of fill the agenda full of things that everybody on the government side can get behind so as to not risk a piece of legislation crashing on the rocks because the caucus is so divided. I mean, I guess that if that's what we're here to do, that's fine. It's the government's prerogative. But the fact of the matter is that there are serious problems to solve, and the government should get busy doing that instead.

The Chair: Are there others wishing to join the debate on Bill 9? I will go to the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East, followed by Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Madam Chair. First, I want to thank the Minister of Justice for creating this critical bill. I believe all Albertans want to have relevant and timely information provided to them about crime in their communities, and bills like these are vital to those communities and for the knowledge of all citizens about the state and safety of those communities in which they live, so I rise today to speak in support of Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act.

Madam Chair, Bill 9 is a bill meant to highlight the importance of transparency and accountability within the government of Alberta regarding the criminal justice system and crime in Alberta. The government of Alberta has sought to continue to do better in providing accountability and transparency in its relationship with the public, and these are critical pillars in our democracy. This bill will only strengthen the Alberta government's ability to provide relevant justice information to Albertans, increasing that accountability and transparency.

Bill 9 would ensure Albertans have relevant information about crime within their communities if passed. It will strengthen the public's ability to understand the Alberta justice system and increase awareness of activities and dangerous individuals within their communities. Passing this bill is common sense. I hope my colleagues in the opposition can push past any hesitations on their part and support this bill as it will only strengthen our communities, our democracy, and our criminal justice system no matter who is in government.

While our government has been moving forward on steps to decrease crime, rural crime is still a significant issue for many people living in rural Alberta, including constituents of mine in Lethbridge-East who have property or family who live outside the city proper. My constituents and all Albertans deserve and have the right to know about crime rates within their community and within Alberta. Providing Albertans with an annual report on crime will ensure that Albertans can make the correct choice on how to go about their lives within their community.

After the Premier toured rural communities in 2019, our government heard time and time again that there needs to be an improved system to increase the accessibility to crime data within rural communities. Madam Chair, these recommendations to disclose crime rates come straight from Albertans. Promise made, promise kept.

Bill 9 will ensure that Albertans from rural, metropolitan, or mid-sized cities will have up-to-date information about crime in their area provided to them in a user-friendly manner. Now, some may argue that this bill will increase the amount of red tape reporting. The last thing that our government wants to do is increase red tape, particularly around reporting on such vital statistics. That is the opposite of what this government plans to do, Madam Chair.

We will be committing to working closely with the RCMP, municipal police forces, multiple court systems within Alberta, the government of Canada, municipalities, and Indigenous councils and bands in streamlining, collecting, and delivering this needed and wanted data. The obligation of the government to provide reasonable and pertinent data to its citizens should not be construed as red tape even though it does require additional work on behalf of the ministry, which it should be its duty to do.

Some also may fear that this bill will place monetary burdens on municipal police forces and other entities within the judicial system of Alberta. That is an unwarranted fear, Madam Chair. The Ministry of Justice has available funds to produce the necessary infrastructure to ensure that the monetary cost of collecting and distributing this data does not fall onto police forces, municipalities, or other governing bodies. Any expenses attached to this bill are superseded by the importance of collecting and distributing data to the greater public as having easy access to this vital information is necessary for Albertans.

Madam Chair, I'm concerned that Albertans cannot already access data on crime within our communities. Families and citizens of Alberta rely on knowing what is going on within their community to ensure that children, spouses, and families are safe when moving through their day-to-day lives. Although this bill does not directly tackle the issue of crime rates in Alberta, it starts a process of ensuring that Albertans are up to speed on what is going on in our communities at large. The government must take the lead and the responsibility for providing relevant crime information to all Albertans. From there we can ensure that families feel safer within their respective communities and then continue to move forward on preventing crime in Alberta.

I'm extremely proud of Lethbridge's new police chief and the tremendous work he and his force have done and undertaken independently to provide some of this level of data within specific jurisdictions within Lethbridge to correct errors of the past and provide transparency, accountability, and stability to its citizens for the future. We must do more for our families and communities across the province.

For these reasons, I urge my fellow members of the Legislature to support Bill 9 and the lives and livelihoods of all Albertans. This piece of legislation is a strong step in the right direction.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Wednesday, April 20, 2022

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Good evening, hon. members. Please be seated.

The hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Sorry. Are you moving Bill 2 on behalf of the minister?

Mr. Nally: No.

The Deputy Speaker: Are you moving some sort of motion?

Mr. Nally: Yes.

The Deputy Speaker: Okay.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Given how important it is to provide support to Albertans facing higher utility bills, it's important for this Assembly to immediately pass Bill 18. Therefore, I rise to ask for unanimous consent to waive the necessary standing orders in order to proceed immediately to second reading of Bill 18, the Utility Commodity Rebate Act.

[Unanimous consent denied]

The Deputy Speaker: We'll proceed with the hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 2

Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise tonight to move third reading of Bill 2, the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

Bill 2 would implement many of the technical measures introduced in Budget 2022. Budget 2022 marks a fiscal turning point in the province. It marks a time when we stop adding to the debt burden of future generations of Albertans, and that's why, Madam Speaker, fiscal discipline remains the cornerstone of Alberta government's fiscal plan. Measures presented in Bill 2 will further integrate financial responsibility across government operations, leading to better outcomes for Albertans and a stronger financial position for the province.

I would encourage all members to support this bill. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to join in on the debate on Bill 2? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to rise and have another opportunity to speak to Bill 2. Bill 2 is an implementation act which implements a budget, a budget with which my colleagues and I disagree for multiple reasons, and I am happy to go on to talk about those.

This is a budget which, first off, it needs to be noted, has been balanced because oil prices are high. The UCP would love to run around and tell you about how this was because they punished

Albertans and they hurt working people and they punished families, and that's why the budget is balanced, but the truth is that this budget is balanced because oil prices have gone up.

Mr. Long: To 70 bucks.

Ms Ganley: Yeah. They're not 70 bucks. You might want to check that one out.

Mr. Long: It's balanced on $70 oil.

Ms Ganley: Oh, boy. Heckling that's wildly incorrect. Okay. [interjections] Yeah. I mean, you're welcome to stand up and join debate if you'd like to join debate, but maybe you just want to shout from the sidelines.

Mr. Shandro: How about through the chair?

Ms Ganley: Oh, boy. We're sure in a feisty mood this evening, aren't we? [interjection] Okay. Apparently, I'm going to spend the evening getting yelled at with misinformation about the price of oil and random insults.

Mr. Shandro: Just consider decorum.

Ms Ganley: I should consider decorum? You're the one shouting at me. I have the floor.

The Deputy Speaker: Order. Order.

We are not off to a great start, so let's reset everything here. The only person with the floor in this debate right now is the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, and I will thank the hon. Minister of Justice to keep his comments to himself.

We're here to discuss Bill 2. [interjections] I'm not really sure why this is so funny, but here we go. We're here to discuss Bill 2. Apparently, the members opposite think this bill is absolutely hilarious, or maybe he's actually looked up the price of oil and realized how wrong he got it. Anyway, Madam Speaker, the point is that this bill is bad. It's bad because it implements a budget that does nothing for Albertans.

I had the opportunity earlier today to speak about the priorities of my constituents and about the priorities of the people across this province, and those priorities are the ability to have a decent-paying job, to be able to pay for their mortgage, to be able to pay for their utilities, to be able to pay for the cost of living, to have a decent lifestyle. They would like as well to be able to . . . [interjections] Honestly, I don't really know what the Member for West Yellowhead's problem is this evening, but I have the floor.

An Hon. Member: She's wasting time.

Ms Ganley: Okay.

An Hon. Member: Carry on.

Ms Ganley: I'd be happy to carry on. Do you think you can maybe hold your comments? No? Okay. Fair. Well, apparently, this government isn't interested in hearing debate this evening, which is, I guess, pretty much in line with their general behaviour towards the people of this province, so I shouldn't be totally surprised that they have nothing but sneers and insults.

This government has brought forward a budget that doesn't respect those priorities, that doesn't respect the priorities of the people of Alberta. This budget is balanced off the backs of the people of Alberta. The average family will lose $500 just because of the changes in the basic personal exemption in the income tax act. This is something that the current Premier used to rail against when he was in opposition in the federal government. He called it pernicious, he called it insidious, he talked about nasty tax grabs, and now he brings forward a budget that does exactly that, that takes money out of the pockets of working Alberta families.

In addition, we're seeing families lose from the child tax benefit. Madam Speaker, I think one of my favourite things that we accomplished while in government was cutting child poverty in half. We cut child poverty in half in the province, and that was in large part because of the Alberta child tax benefit. It supported working families to make sure that they were able to provide a decent standard of living to their children, and I think that that was incredibly important.

I think it's also worth noting that this budget has deindexed a number of benefits that this government promised to keep indexed. When we were in government and we brought in an act that indexed things like AISH and seniors' benefits and a number of other benefits of which many Albertans rely, the UCP voted in favour of it. They said they would maintain it. They said they were in favour of it. They spoke at great length about the importance of that measure, yet as soon as they got into government, they repealed it. For a recipient on AISH: they lose about $3,000 in purchasing power. I mean, that's incredibly hard.

In addition, they've been altering the way the seniors' benefit works. They've altered who is eligible for the seniors drug plan. I know that they think it's hilarious to talk about how the seniors drug plan should only be for seniors, but, Madam Speaker, I think it's worth understanding who it is we talk about when we're saying that. I've certainly heard from families who are in situations where, whether through the devastating loss of a loved one or a loved one's struggles with mental health or addictions issues, the grandparents have taken on custody of the children. I think that's the right thing to do. I think that that's something they do out of love for their family, and I think that it's something that a government should respect and support. I think that throwing those children, those dependants, off the seniors' benefit is absolutely the wrong thing to do. We saw recently a report that came out that demonstrated just how many people were thrown off as a result of those decisions.

Those are a number of ways in which, you know, this government has been extremely problematic for families. It's worth talking as well, I think, about other costs that have been rising. Recently we saw a report released, very, very late, into insurance costs and demonstrating the hundreds of millions of dollars more that families were paying in insurance costs. Unfortunately, the government has sort of supported that happening by removing the cap, and that has been very, very challenging. Some people have seen it go up as much as 20 per cent or 30 per cent, and of course, you know, their incomes have not gone up with that. Add to that the fact that they're losing a lot of their purchasing power by this deindexation that the members over there used to rail against and now apparently support this year. A lot of families have had incredible struggles with that.

This is a government that tried to hide that report. They tried to keep it from Albertans. They claimed that the information was available online until we proved that that wasn't correct, and then they had to correct themselves and release the report. So it's no great wonder, I suppose, that no one trusts them.

Adding on to utilities is also the cost of tuition. Tuition is increasing. In some programs it's increasing by sort of massive percentages. This is incredibly challenging for people. The higher tuition gets, the more it is the case that someone who's entering university is entering based not on their merits, based not on their academic record or their abilities but instead based on the relative wealth of their parents. I think that that's wrong. I think that people who want to access education should get to access that education based on the work that they put in and the work that they did and their sort of ability to work hard for that and not based on the family into which they were born. People don't choose to be born rich or choose to be born poor; they're born where they're born. I really think that this government's choice to punish them by cutting off their access to education is just wrong. Those students deserve to learn just as much as any other students. I think that's incredibly problematic.

On top of increases in tuition fees, we have increases to the interest charged on student loans. The interesting thing about this is – so what happens is that the government borrows money; the government loans that money to students. It used to be the case that the government loaned that money to students at the same rate that they've borrowed it. They don't do that anymore. Now they add on an additional percentage. Essentially, what they're doing is making money off student borrowing. I also think that that is incredibly problematic.

As I'm sure many members of this House are aware, I've gone back to school a number of times. You know, I have talked to a lot of students, and particularly when I was in law school, where we're subject to differential tuition, a lot of people came out of that with a lot of debt, like, six-figure debt often, which is pretty hard to get out from under. It forces people to make choices in their career, where they may want to choose to go into a public interest pursuit, but they're not able to because they're having to pay off that debt. It forces them to choose what they're going to go on to do in terms of graduate work. It limits their choices. It limits their choices to pursue what contributions they can make to the world around them. I think that that is incredibly problematic.

First they get hit with tuition fees, and then they get hit with this increased interest. It just makes it harder and harder for those who have put in the work, who have the grades, but just didn't happen to be fortunate enough to be born into a rich family to make it through university, because it has just gotten out of reach. That's incredibly problematic as well.

Other things in this budget. I mean, certainly, the government seems to love to go on about the Education budget. I think it's worth noting that the thing we educate at the government of Alberta in Education are students. They're not capitas. They're not dollars. They're students. When there are more students in the system and the same amount of money, that means there's less money for each student. Most people would call that, I think, a cut. There have been a lot of years of cuts. I, personally, am incredibly aware of this because I have a daughter who's starting public school in September, and when she enters, she will enter a system in which there are tens of thousands of additional students and a thousand fewer teachers, not to mention the number of fewer educational assistants that will be available for those students.

This is all incredibly problematic. I think it is emblematic of a government and a caucus that doesn't understand the priorities of Albertans. Like I said, those priorities are generally pretty straightforward. They would like their children to have access to the same or better opportunities that they had access to. That requires education. It requires advanced education. It requires that everyone have access to a doctor.

There's another area in which this budget and this government have fallen down. You know, if you live in Lethbridge, it's next to impossible to access a primary care physician right now. That's challenging. It's genuinely challenging for people. They're having to drive several hours to access primary care in another location. It's all well and good for the government to tell them that they're thinking about working on a plan to someday have a plan to implement something to work on it. But it's been years like this, and that is an incredible challenge for individuals. They don't want to wait. When your kid is sick and you have to drive them two hours to see a doctor, that's not something you're willing to wait years for someone to fix. I think that that is incredibly problematic. What people want is access to education, access to doctors, to an ambulance when they need to call an ambulance. They want a job that can pay their bills. These priorities of Albertans just aren't reflected in this budget. They aren't reflected at all.

We see a government that has, you know, billions of dollars to give away to profitable corporations, that defends increases in insurance, that defends an Americanized health system, that takes away overtime pay from workers. This is problematic. This affects people. It affects the people around us in this province every day. I think, at the end of the day, this government would be well served by listening to those Albertans and by listening to what it is that they are going through and to what it is that they want and what it is that they need.

I think it's worth talking a little bit as well with respect to one of the bills – I guess I can't talk about another bill that's before the House. This government has indicated to folks that they want to come forward and assist them with the cost of their utilities. I think that's great. The problem is that this has sort of been delayed and delayed and delayed and delayed, and I think that fundamentally what they fail to understand is that this is urgent. It's genuinely urgent for people. I don't know. I mean, I sat in a government. I've seen a fair amount of legislation drafting happen. I'm, I've got to say, a little surprised that it takes five weeks to copy an act from 2001. But I think the situation is urgent.

You know, those are the things that I am primarily concerned about: people's access to education, to teachers, to a modern curriculum that will help them as they go forward in the world, people's access to health care, to doctors, and to an equitable health system. I think that that's worth pointing out as well.

You know, there's a lot of talk about publicly funded versus publicly delivered. It's worth noting that pretty much every credible study ever done has demonstrated that adding a private tier to a health care system assists everyone only in situations where more money is put into the system. If no more money is put into the system, if the same amount of money is put into the system, the addition of a private tier not only doesn't help people, but overall it drives metrics downwards. The reason that happens is that the private facility can take the simplest of the surgeries, the least complicated of the patients, that require, you know, less time, less stay in the hospital, probably less time in surgery, and they get the same amount of money, leaving the public system with patients that require more care, to be dealt with with the same amount of money. So instead of those who need the most care getting the most care, those who need the most care get the least care, and that sort of slows the entire system down. That's been, I would say, fairly heavily demonstrated, and I think it's problematic.

Ambulances: also another area. Nobody ever wants to call 911 because their kid is choking and hear that there's no ambulance available for them. Nobody wants to call for their loved one having a heart attack and hear that there's no ambulance available for them. That's incredibly problematic, and it's a problem that really ought to be treated with significantly more urgency than this government has treated it with. It's a huge challenge.

Other priorities include, you know, decent-paying jobs that are able to cover the cost of living. We talk a lot about the cost of living going up. It's going up for a number of reasons. Obviously, tuition and the servicing costs on that tuition are directly within the control of the government. Electricity and insurance rates were both subject to a cap that's been removed, so again government decisions. There are some other costs that, arguably, have other causes.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others wishing to join the debate on Bill 2? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to join debate on Bill 2. Like my colleague, I'll stand in opposition to this bill as well. It's difficult to have respect for a bill that does not continue the fight against child poverty that we started. We reduced child poverty by 50 per cent in two years as a result of the government programs that were there. This government has chosen to stop that and to let child poverty increase.

I was incredibly proud of the work we did, and my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View has talked about some of those programs, the Alberta family benefit, so that children can have at least an equal start from the get-go. What they make of that start becomes up to them further down the line, but at least they have the opportunity. This government, as I've said, has done the opposite with regard to that, so I will not be supporting this Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

You know, I also agree that it's fairly simple, the kind of focus, I think, of a government. There's a focus on the important things that governments can do around education, around access to health care, around respecting workers in this province, around doing their part to ensure there's a decent quality of life for every Albertan. Just on those four brief points that I've mentioned, my colleagues, both the critics for K to 12 education as well as PSE, have pointed out how the significant cuts to both of those programs have caused significant disruption across this province, hundreds of millions of dollars removed from both of those systems, which has left them scrambling.

Even today the superintendent of the Edmonton school board talked about how this is the most difficult budget. He's been there for nine years. He said that this budget is the most difficult one for the Edmonton school board that he has ever had to face. Now, he's not talking about the NDP years of '15 to '19. He's talking about this budget from this UCP government. It's corroboration there of the lack of interest and care this government has taken to ensure that important systems like the primary education system in this province stay strong and healthy and do the best job they can for our young future leaders.

With regard to health care we know that hundreds of millions of dollars, again, have been taken out of that system, that there has been open warfare between huge sectors of the health care system, whether you want to start with doctors, whether you want to go to nurses, whether you want to talk about allied health professionals. They have all suffered under this government and are exhausted, have worked through two years of COVID, and protected the people of this province. They get in return from this government the derision that comes across because of the ongoing fights with those sectors.

You know, you just have to look at the number of closures of health facilities or reduced services of health facilities across this province under this government. I saw a number of them were closed. I think it was up to 20 that I actually counted up that were either reduced services or closed, and the citizens in those areas could not go to them, or they had to wait incredible amounts of time to be seen. My colleague the critic for Health talked about – I think it was just earlier today – how one doctor had to see a patient in the parking lot, in that person's car, because there was no room in the emergency ward to see that person. Now, that's happened under this government, this government that talks about balancing the budget – balancing the budget – and I think we're making it very clear that it's balanced on the backs of Albertans and the services that they depend on.

Respect for workers in this province. You know, every Albertan wants to be respected. They go to work. They want to come home at the end of the day healthy and happy and continue to provide that support through their wages to their family. Again, fights with members of this government bureaucracy: prosecutors, Crowns. As a result, we have a demoralized public service, who are just waiting for the opportunity to see a government change so that they can be actually respected in their workplaces.

Lastly, the quality of life. I think it's pretty remarkable that Alberta continues to have a decent quality of life when they've got the UCP at the controls of government. I know from my own critic portfolio that municipalities are saying that their lives in municipal government are extremely more challenged as a result of not only cuts. Certainly, there have been hundreds of millions of dollars of cuts to municipal programs, things like MSI. You know, $5 million were directed towards the city of Calgary to help revitalize the critical central business district that is downtown Calgary. Five million. When the city of Calgary put up 200 and about 30 million dollars to incentivize and improve the downtown, which has taken such a hit as a result of the change to the oil situation in this province that now 30 per cent of the towers in downtown Calgary are vacant – and potentially they're not going to get filled up by oil businesses anymore.

They're going to have to look at diversification. They're going to have to look at other businesses who will come into the downtown but not only businesses. They're going to have to look at – and it's happening right now with regard to HomeSpace – you know, refurbishing older buildings so that they house people, and that's being done right now. The report that we put together called revitalizing downtown Calgary, that can be found at albertasfuture.ca, explains how we would work with the city of Calgary to make that happen, while this government: all that can be found in its budget is $5 million for the downtown.

The other thing that I wanted to talk about in addition to balancing the budget on the backs of Albertans is that, you know, a lot has been made by the amount of personal income tax revenue that's coming into this province as a result of not indexing the tax brackets. I heard the Premier earlier tonight talk about: "Well, we might do that. We might do that. We're going to take a look at it." This is the third budget where Albertans are paying more and more in taxes, where other provinces – in the government of Canada the norm is to index brackets. It was not a surprise to me that this government decided not to do that because they were looking for any way to continue down the road of sharing those profits, sharing those monies with corporations in this province.

Another thing that I think we need to look a little longer at is how the $4.7 billion in corporate tax giveaway was, for instance, said to fill up the downtown Calgary towers. Well, that's not happening. That won't happen. What will happen is, under a different government, working with the city of Calgary to ensure that the downtown gets the care and attention it needs as the most important central business district in this province.

The budget also talks about the estimated inflation. Already it's pretty offside with the inflation that's currently present in Alberta. It's offside by about half the amount, which is going to be – and we're already seeing it. Albertans are struggling with the costs and the impact on their daily budgets as a result of the high increase in inflation. This government has got no help for that. Well, they do talk about helping with electricity and helping with natural gas. Natural gas may be coming sometime in the future – it's not here – in terms of a rebate. And electricity: we know there'll be $50 for Albertans. That's starting sometime in the future. Again, this government is overpromising and underdelivering, overpromising or not delivering at all, overpromising and bungling rollouts. That's what you see in this fiscal plan. That's what you see in this Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

Madam Speaker, the budget provides no real relief to families in this province at this time. That's something that when we were government, we were most mindful of. Families are the backbone. Families and the workers that are embedded in those families are the backbone of this province. But this government, the UCP government, seems to believe that insurance companies are the backbone of this province. They seem to believe that corporations who can count on $4.7 billion of tax giveaways are the backbone of this province.

That's not why any of us, I think, got into politics. Perhaps I'm being too generous with the other side, but I think people got into politics because of a desire to ensure that there was a good quality of life for their neighbours, for the people in their communities, you know, that they help work out the problems and issues that would be brought to them. I didn't get into this to ensure that insurance companies could walk away with billions of dollars in profit and Albertans would suffer as a result. I didn't get into it for that reason. I got into it as a result of an interest to try and change policy at the local level, and I think many of us did.

But this statutes amendment act is not something that I think Albertans should be rightly proud of. The balanced budget is only in name. It's as a result of being able to ratchet down supports for Albertans, and my colleagues have talked about some of those supports, whether they be in the lack of indexing of AISH, of seniors' benefits, of income support programs. All of that saves you a lot of money when you're not investing that money in people and they're not investing that in the economy. So, yeah, you can get to a balanced budget if you start to turn the tap on the things that people depend on, people are supported by.

If you turn it down significantly, then you've got problems in your health system. You've got problems in your judiciary as a result of more people needing to go for health care, more people winding up on the streets, more kind of conflict with the law. But those things aren't counted by the budget that we have before us. Those things are overlooked, Madam Speaker. Those things are pushed down to the personal experience, to saying that, you know, that's their problem. They're somehow lesser as a result of not being able to have the . . . [Member Ceci's speaking time expired]

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I look forward to speaking tonight to the Legislature and talking about the Financial Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, and making some comments around that as well as the budget that it actually implements. I'd like to start by saying that even as earlier as today in the Legislature – maybe it was yesterday – we heard a number of MLAs remark about their meagre beginnings and how proud they were of what they were able to rise above. I think there are a lot of similar stories in this Legislature, and it has been a theme throughout other Legislatures in the past, where MLAs and their families have started with basically nothing or went through hard times and have come through the other side and made good.

It makes me wonder, Madam Speaker, given this budget, especially from members on the government side, how easily they forget those hard times and when they were or their family was in financial trouble or just getting by or scraping by or maybe not quite making it, how easily that period of their life is forgotten or just pushed aside when considering, in cabinet or in caucus, budgetary measures that will end up extending the period of time for many, many Alberta families that they will end up remaining in poverty or an impoverished state and struggling to get by or not really getting by or making do or doing without.

I, too, came from a family of six which went through some difficult times. There was no money left over at the end of the month after my father suffered construction accidents, and we knew we'd be wearing our cousins' winter coats the next year. My mom never had a winter coat, a new one, for 17 years, the whole time I went to school until after I was in high school. I mean, lots of stories abound in this Legislature about that type of difficulty in families.

It, I think, behooves us as MLAs, Madam Speaker, to remember those times and reflect upon them and incorporate that understanding into the Legislature, into the budgets that we build so that the onus is never forgotten, is always upon us, is always upon legislators, especially the Finance minister, to never forget those who are hardest hit, those who are suffering the most, those who are just scraping by, those who, through no fault of their own, are not able to provide the means to sustain themselves. These are the people that should be uppermost in the mind of any Finance minister in order to ensure that these people have a dignity and quality of life that we would be proud to say that we provided to our own family, because, in fact, these people are part of the Alberta family.

That's something that I'm saddened by when I see some of the measures in this legislation, in the budget indeed that has been before us and in the implementation act that we're debating here tonight. This government is operating on a wing and a prayer. They're winging it, and they're praying that the price of oil will once again resurrect their chances at the polls and get us out of the economic crisis that's been caused by a number of difficulties, including the pandemic that we've been going through in Alberta in the last couple of years. But, Madam Speaker, the government says one thing and does another in attempting to convince Albertans that happy days are here again and that the pandemic is over when, in fact, the happy days are happening for a select number of people.

But the pandemic certainly isn't over. We're looking at a sixth wave that's oncoming, and we may not know exactly when it hits because we don't have the data to verify exactly what's going on in the province with respect to the COVID infection rate. A lot of us are in the dark to know exactly what risk that we're facing, and it's a risk that I think has caused a lot of economic damage over the last two years, whether you'd be in business, whether you're in family. It's something that the budget doesn't take into account because, of course, costs are going up for everybody, and those individual families who are suffering with COVID and have had family members who had to isolate, leave their jobs and employment for periods of time are those that are being hit even harder than everybody else during the pandemic, that is on its way up again.

Now, for example, I have in my constituency a number of seniors' bungalow complexes, and one would think that these adult bungalows of significant square footage with double-attached garages would have in them fairly well-off people with substantial means. In fact, if indeed you do the door-knocking that I've done in the constituency, you find out that these folks as well are just – just – getting by, if they're getting by, because, of course, they will suffer in their elderly years some debilitating diseases and injuries, and there are costs there that they've had to bear.

This measure in the budget is going to cost the seniors big time. A seniors couple getting the Alberta seniors' benefit will lose $750. That's a chunk of change when you look at an individual, say, who's worked in a clerical position for a significant part of her working life after raising a family, may have an income around the $30,000 mark. You take $750 out of that and you're taking away something that every month you might have enjoyed: a night out maybe, a movie, a new pair of pants once in a while. That $750 is real money, real money that the Finance minister has to be aware will be felt, will be a loss that's felt by an individual who's getting the Alberta seniors' benefit, and if they lose that, it affects their quality of life.

If you're looking at another failure of this budget and of this government, it's women, Madam Speaker. Women, in fact, were the hardest hit in the employment sector. They were the ones who first lost jobs and lost them the most, and they're the last ones to have the jobs recovered. They're still behind in that regard.

The young high school grads: unemployment is very, very high among our young people. This budget doesn't address their abilities to enter the job market.

I'm thinking most often about the AISH recipients. I have in my constituency of Edmonton-McClung three complexes that are operated by Civida, formerly capital region housing. Of course, if you knock on doors there, you'll find stories of various range which usually involve some sort of single parent and broken home and perhaps an illness, could have been an addiction issue of some kind, domestic violence, lots of different situations which find people ending up in affordable housing. These individuals are often on AISH as well. If you're looking at losing $3,000 in real purchasing power, which is what happens to individuals on AISH as a result of this budget, and you're looking at earning approximately $22,000 on an annual basis, take that out of your wallet on an annual basis, Madam Speaker, and see how much more difficult it is for you to get by. It's not a simple thing.

I think all of us can relate to that. There are thousands of people in Alberta who live on that kind of money, who exist on that kind of money. Taking $3,000 out of their pockets in purchasing power as a result of the failure to index to inflation the benefits is something that I'm hoping this Finance minister argued against in cabinet, but apparently he wasn't able to convince the rest of his colleagues to see the wisdom of protecting the most vulnerable people in the province. I can't imagine it was him making the proposal. I'm sure he was defending those individuals but, unfortunately, wasn't able to win the day.

I did mention earlier, of course, about the fact that this government is singing Happy Days are Here Again and the pandemic is over. You know, my mother received a phone call about a week ago. It was from a woman she's known since childhood from her small village of Thorhild, Mary Yachimec. She was in tears because her son Bobby Yachimec, a fellow that I'd known, a little bit older than me, had just died. He'd contracted COVID-19, and he ended up having a case of pneumonia, and he died – it took him about three weeks – aged 72, otherwise healthy.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

So to be told that things are behind us and COVID is in the rear-view mirror and it's a mild disease doesn't give me any comfort, Madam Speaker. I certainly fear that we are going to see increasing evidence about the long-term effects of COVID, long COVID. It appears from the emerging science that anybody who's infected has a chance of having some form of brain damage. It's something that we hope doesn't become established as scientific fact, but it certainly seems to be emerging as a residual effect of this so-called mild disease.

Now, one of the things that we'll also see as a result of this budget is that the Alberta child and family benefit not being indexed to inflation is going to cost Alberta families about $450. That's once again another failure of this budget and this Finance minister to look after people in this province when, in fact, the coffers of the government are filled with oil money as a result of the global price of oil going up due to global conflict. The government is still suggesting that the plan to balance their budget is one that they made a great success of.

In fact, what they've done is balance the budget on the backs of those least able to afford it, and that always seems to be the go-to place for Conservative governments. Rather than looking at ensuring that always those people able to afford it least, those who are hardest hit, those who are underprivileged, those who are disabled, children – all these individuals are seemingly the last ones to benefit and the first ones to pay when it comes time to balance the budget under a Conservative government. It pains me to see this story repeated generation after generation. It was one that I saw growing up under Progressive Conservative governments and, previous to that, Social Credit governments.

It doesn't seem to be that a budget is really balanced if indeed you have these outstanding debts to pay, these debts, these real unpaid burdens that need to be borne by the provincial government to keep people afloat. How can one say, Madam Speaker, as a Finance minister or as a government, that the budget is balanced when we're taking $3,000 away from AISH recipients, when seniors are being deprived of $750 of benefits, when a family is losing $450 a month? Those additional cuts to the pocketbooks of families are what's adding up to this Finance minister's claim that the balance has resulted from having a sharp pencil. Without a sharp pencil – another way to describe a sharp pencil is a sharp, pointy stick. That's what he's done to Alberta families, and he's got the numbers he's wanted to arrange to have a balanced budget by hurting Alberta families.

Indeed, the really challenging part for me, Madam Speaker, is that this government seems to say and do one thing and then actually execute in another way. They like to say things loud enough and long enough, and they hope that people will accept what they're saying as the truth. It assumes a certain amount of stupidity.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others that wish to join the debate? The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the chance to speak on this important piece of legislation, and I wanted to correct a few things. It's interesting to hear the folks on the other side complaining. I heard them complaining about the empty towers in downtown Calgary. In fact, it's really interesting to hear from the worst Finance minister in the history of this province when the government that he was in charge of the financial affairs for drove out $100 billion worth of investment, mostly from energy companies that had their head office . . . [interjections] See, he can't stand hearing the truth, so he's trying to interrupt me here. But he can't stand the fact, the absolute fact, that their government drove $100 billion worth of investment out of this province. Companies, including Murphy Oil, Total, many, many others: $100 billion worth of investment; 180,000 jobs. They drove out all this investment. They drove out all of those jobs. The fact is that now they're complaining that the office towers are not full. Well, if you wanted to look for why they're not full, look for the people that left town when the NDP was in government.

Member Ceci: Look over there.

Mr. McIver: I can see. I have to say that I've got the floor, and I intend to speak right now. Thank you very much.

Madam Speaker, the fact is that they drove people out, 180,000 people, and many of those occupied those buildings in downtown Calgary, those buildings that, until the NDP showed up, were paying a big portion of the property taxes for the city. Now they actually have the chutzpah to come in here and complain that the office towers are empty when they are the absolute source of the emptiness.

They didn't just drive them out gently; they told them that they weren't welcome. They had an Energy minister go into the head offices with their financial reports and say: write me a cheque for that because that's my money. Of course, that actually was the shareholders' money. The fact is that they had an Energy minister that told Albertans to go to British Columbia if they wanted to keep a job. That's what the NDP did. They were unbelievably bad for Alberta, which is why they got fired after one term. Madam Speaker, the folks . . . [interjections] See, I love it. They can't stand hearing the truth about their terrible track record.

In fact, you've got a former Finance minister that is guffawing over a balanced budget. I appreciate that when he was the Finance minister, one year he'd come in with a budget that was $1 billion less deficit than the year before and pretty much had a parade for himself right here in the House because he was coming so much closer to balancing the budget. Now he's actually making fun of a government that actually succeeded under our current Finance minister. This is a Finance minister where, when he had that parade for himself, at the rate that he was going, it would have been 95 years to balance the budget – 95 years – and he actually is in here complaining about a real balanced budget . . .

Member Ceci: Real on the backs of Albertans.

Mr. McIver: . . . that this government and this Finance minister put – well, let's talk about whose back this is on.

At the rate the NDP were going, the biggest threat to providing health care, education, social services, income supports to Albertans is having a government that can't afford to pay for those things, which is exactly the straight line an NDP government was headed for, either bankruptcy or a complete inability for the government of Alberta to pay for the services that Albertans most needed, under the leadership of that former Finance minister, the same person that actually has the tenacity, the incredible gall to come in here and complain about a real balanced budget and a balanced budget in the same year with record investments in health care, record investments in social services, record investments in education, record investments in mental health care and addictions care, the things that the NDP used to care about when they were honest with themselves.

When they were honest with Alberta, they used to actually care about those things. Now they actually make fun of a budget that is both balanced, with record investments in all the things that they used to care about, and puts Alberta in a position to pay for the things most important to Albertans not just this year but for years going on, because that is what a balanced budget does for you. That is what sharpening your pencil does for you. That is what getting better value for the taxpayers does for you. You can provide the things that Albertans most need forever, not just till you get kicked out of office in four years.

I mean, listen, let's look at Bob Rae in Ontario as an example of where the NDP was headed. Everybody was getting raises. Everybody was happy. All of a sudden the workers for the government found out they were getting every second Friday off. Beautiful till they found out that their pay just got cut by 10 per cent because they weren't getting paid for that second Friday that they got. That is the NDP way of doing government. That is the NDP way of doing finances: spend it till you haven't got it, and then take it away from the people that are doing the work, and expect to be thanked for it. Well, they weren't thanked for it either. Bob Rae and his crew got tossed out, and this crew across the aisle got tossed out. [interjection] Sure, hon. member.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, hon. minister. It's a great opportunity to jump in here. You had touched on something that I thought maybe you could elaborate on a little bit. I know the members opposite could never balance the budget. Heck, they couldn't even balance a diet. But I will say that I do remember Rae days, and I do remember how that really affected public-sector workers in Ontario. Maybe the minister could talk a little bit more about the devastation of the NDP in other provinces and this province and how it was going to take us so much work to get back to balance, but with the genius of our Finance minister and the Premier we are there already, something that the members opposite couldn't have done, not even in their wildest dreams. In fact, with the current projection of $70 oil they still would have run a massive deficit, something that we have overcome. Maybe the member or the minister could talk a little bit more of the devastation of the NDP in other provinces and even here.

The Deputy Speaker: A great time for the Speaker to maybe offer some remarks on the matter of relevancy. Just a reminder that we're on Bill 2 and that the remarks should be tailored as such, which I know the minister is more than capable of.

I'm going to take also a minute to remind all members that the minister is the only one with the floor at this time. There is a significant amount of heckling, which the minister has stated he quite enjoys, which is why I have not intervened up until this point. But just a reminder that what goes around comes around, and I don't think we want to proceed down this path for the rest of the night.

Lastly – and my apologies; I promise I will let you have the rest of your time, Minister – when a lack of acknowledgement on an intervention has been made, that is considered an acknowledgement and an unaccepted intervention and should be taken as such. Try and proceed in such a way. If it is ignored, that is considered a nonrequest to the intervention.

The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I will continue to talk about the bill and why it's important. It's part of this government balancing their budget. Really, it's important to point out the opposite, what the NDP did comparatively, which is why they should be voting for Bill 2, which is before us. This is a bill that will allow Alberta to pay for those social services, those income supports, the health, the education forever, which will also make Alberta more competitive to provide job opportunities for young people.

I heard people across the way talk about young people, yet they drove them out. When the NDP was done after four years – and we haven't recovered from it yet, Madam Speaker. We've got a lot of work to do. The NDP created such a negative employment situation that unemployment amongst those less than 25 years old is at a terrible high, and they're still at high rates. They're still at higher rates than we want, but the fact is that right now there are jobs.

In many areas there are more jobs than there are people to fill those jobs. I heard the Premier tonight on Facebook Live talking about, you know, that if you search oil and gas jobs or search jobs in almost any industry, you will find hundreds if not thousands of them unfilled right now. When the NDP was done, there was hardly a job in sight in the whole place and people were leaving Alberta as fast as they could. Now we actually have a different problem, one this government needs to do more work on, to get more people in here, because we have so much work.

We have re-established Alberta as the economic engine of Canada, something the NDP tried very hard to stop – well, succeeded at, actually. If there's one thing they succeeded at, it was at taking the Alberta swagger away, taking away Alberta's place at the top of the economic ladder of Canada. They started with a government that was at the top and took it to the bottom in four years and then wondered why they got fired. It might have been because they weren't paying attention to what matters to Albertans.

That is why we need to support Bill 2. It supports job development. It supports opportunities for our young people, to keep them here. It supports postsecondary education and much more. The minister here always talks in question period about the fact that there's much more support for low-income Albertans and those that might otherwise not be able to support postsecondary education. That's the future. That's the future. Under the NDP the future was running out the door. We haven't solved that yet as our government, but by gosh we're sure working hard at it, and there are way more opportunities for them now than there were two and a half years ago, when this side took government.

Madam Speaker, that is why it's important. That is why, when the other folks laugh at controlling expenditures – I don't know why they do. We balanced the budget. Again, it's really important. This is why they should support this. We balanced the budget with record spending for health care, record spending for education, record spending for social services, record spending for addictions and mental health. We actually are supporting the things that Albertans care about much better, in a much stronger way than the folks across the aisle did when they botched government, and we're in a position to do it potentially forever, because that's the beauty of a balanced budget. I've got to say that it wasn't easy – there were some hard decisions made – but we are supporting the most important things, more than the NDP ever thought about, and we're setting the province up for success again.

With that, Madam Speaker, I think that says what needs to be said. You've got a tale of two governments, a tale of two Finance ministers, a radical success versus a radical failure across the aisle, and that's why we should support Bill 2.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak at third reading of Bill 2. I had the opportunity to speak at second reading. It's always great to speak again. You know, I was going to start to complain that it was starting to get a little cool in the Chamber. I was feeling this blast of air conditioning coming from this side, but then I just felt this large blast of hot air from the other side, and now I'm all warmed up again.

I'm feeling good, Madam Speaker, and I'm pleased to speak to Bill 2 again. A couple of things to say about this bill. The first is that what I find very striking is that this bill really solidifies the decision by this government to continue to tax inflation, which really is on the backs of Albertans. You know, we've been, on this side of the House, raising this issue for some time. It's a bit of an in-the-weeds kind of thing that not a lot of people would see happening, the decision to deindex personal income tax from inflation, which really means that all Albertans are going to be paying a little bit more.

What I find striking, Madam Speaker, is that in the number of times that we have brought this issue up, we have never actually heard the Premier or the Finance minister actually respond to that, like, actually acknowledge that they have done the very thing that the Premier used to call insidious and a sneaky tax grab. It is such a blatant hypocrisy for claimed fiscal conservatives. The Premier railed against it when he was the head of the Canadian Taxpayers Federation and spoke about it at length and critiqued it, and as an MP he spoke up. Yet not once has the Premier even acknowledged it, nor has the Minister of Finance. Now, listen, this government has done a lot of things that are hypocritical, a lot of things that they've gone back on their word on, but on this one they remain incredibly silent consistently. Just once I would appreciate one member of that UCP caucus, one member of that front bench to actually stand up and acknowledge that they are doing the very thing that they claimed they would not do.

Now, we know that Albertans have kind of gotten used to that from this government, but this one is, like, key to the heart of who they are as fiscal conservatives, key to the heart of who the Premier is, key to the heart of who I suppose the Minister of Finance is, key conservative values about not taxing individuals' income tax, certainly not increasing their income tax behind their backs, yet they've done that very thing. The fact that they continue to remain silent and all their heads are down and they're not going to stand up and speak to this very issue – and I'm certain they'll stand up and they'll yell at us and do all kinds of other things, but none of them can actually stand up and speak to the fact that they are doing the exact thing that they claimed they would never do and that is core to who they are.

Let's be honest. At this point do they even know who they are, honestly? Like, what are their values anymore? What are their principles? They can't seem to agree with each other. They can't seem to listen to Albertans. One side is calling the other side lunatics. The other ones are calling them – I don't know what they're calling them behind their backs. We can only imagine, I guess, based on what we hear on recorded tapes of conversations. I don't even know if this caucus has a clue what their values and principles are. Frankly, the bigger issue is that Albertans don't know either.

This is something that I would love, for one member of the UCP caucus to stand up and admit: yes, we have done the very thing that we said we wouldn't do, which is bracket creep. Just, like, say the words. The Premier has said it many times as an MP, but will they say that in this House, admit that they did bracket creep?

We hear a lot of bluster about two things. One, I'm not surprised that the Minister of Municipal Affairs and many other UCP members will stand up and want to rail against, you know, the NDP when we were in government, from 2015 to 2019. Of course. What they're hoping that Albertans will forget is that they've actually been government for three years now. So they can talk as much as they want about what happened in 2015-2019, but where are they on their record from 2019 to today's date? On their record – let's be honest. Before this international rise in oil prices this government was actually going to have the largest deficit – the largest deficit – of any government in this country. The only reason they don't is because they won the lottery.

Now, they won the lottery, but Albertans have not. They got a special benefit of rising oil prices, which they know they did nothing to create. So that balanced budget, as they keep talking about – this is the second issue, Madam Speaker – is good for them, but as we are seeing from this bill, from everything we're hearing, which I know they're hearing from their constituents as well, is that it is not helping Albertans.

Albertans are paying more every step of the way. They're paying more in income tax because of this government. Their benefits don't get them as far as they used to. In fact, they're actually losing money because of the rise in inflation. We know that Albertans are paying way more in utility rates, way more in electricity, way more in car insurance, all the things that this government not only lifted the caps on, which would be a huge benefit for Alberta families right now as they're trying to pay the bills – all of those rebates that they've now promised: we actually found out they're not coming for months and months and months.

Now, I know it takes months to do a leadership review for this party. I understand, especially when the rules keep changing and they're fighting with each other, that that can take a long time, and we all hang in the balance. But you would think they'd be able to – I don't know – copy a piece of legislation that was already written and produce that in faster than five weeks. You'd think, by how quickly they, say, fired the Election Commissioner or fired 20,000 EAs at the beginning of a pandemic, that they'd be able to create regulations to actually benefit Albertans right away.

An Hon. Member: They fired you guys.

Ms Pancholi: I think, actually, that if we had an election tomorrow, we would find that this government would also be fired pretty darn quickly. I invite them to call the election.

Honestly, given the chaos that's going on in their party right now, maybe some of them want an election. Maybe some of them don't because they wouldn't get their seats back. I understand there are going to be conflicted feelings about that. But over here we're pretty confident that an election is something that Albertans want, and we're pretty confident that it's something that we would welcome as well.

Madam Speaker, I think this government should take a look in the mirror and take a long, hard look at their record, because it isn't so shiny. While it may be good for the bottom line of their budget, balancing their books, Albertans are paying the price. They see and they know that this budget has been balanced on their backs, and now it's about time, I think, for this government to take accountability for that.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaidis: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Happy to take the opportunity to talk a little bit more about our government's record and the things that our government has accomplished. As the member says – and I agree that it's not useful and worth while to talk about what happened between 2015 and '19. We all want to erase that period from our minds because it was a very dark time in the province. I remember, when I was out door-knocking in that period, that when I would ask people at the doors what their number one issue was, a lot of people would just laugh and smirk at me and say: I don't know; get rid of the NDP. That was their number one issue.

You know, I'll happily agree with the member that we shouldn't focus on that period. Let's talk instead about the last three years and what our government has been able to accomplish. Let's look at the record. First and foremost, as it relates to this bill, Madam Speaker, we've been able to deliver a balanced budget, the first balanced budget in more than a decade, and we did so with the same oil price projections that their government used. So to try and assert that we've balanced the budget because of a large cash windfall due to large energy prices is simply not true. We're using the exact same predictions for oil prices at $70 a barrel that the members opposite used.

But you know what the difference is, Madam Speaker? Under their projections, their revenue projections of $70 for a barrel of oil, their government would continue to see massive deficits, but because our government made challenging and difficult decisions to get reckless and uncontrolled spending under control, we have now been able to present a balanced budget to Albertans. This is important because a balanced budget will ensure that we have the capacity to continue to invest in needed and necessary social programs that, I believe we can all agree, are necessary and worth while to contribute.

Apart from delivering a balanced budget, Madam Speaker, let's continue to look at our record over the last three years. From an Advanced Education standpoint, as I've mentioned in this House many times, we're investing $171 million over three years to create 7,000 additional spaces in our postsecondary institutions. That's more spaces than the NDP created during their time in government. But, again, let's not focus on their time. Let's focus on what we're doing. As well, we're providing $15 million in new spending to create new bursaries for low-income students. We're investing $12 million over three years to continue to ensure that our scholarships are able to meet demand. We're investing $30 million over three years to expand apprenticeship programming to ensure that all Albertans are able to find successful career pathways. We're investing more in work-integrated learning to ensure that Alberta students can benefit from co-op opportunities and internships. We're investing more in supports for Indigenous learners to ensure that every Albertan can access postsecondary education.

As well, we're seeing record investment in many other areas of our economy: film, television, the tech sector. All of these aspects and facets of our economy and society are increasing significantly, and that's a direct result, Madam Speaker, of the actions that our government has taken over the last three years.

I'm happy to spend the 15 minutes that I have here before you this evening and talk about our government's record in doing precisely that. I won't do that. I agree with the member opposite. I won't spend the entire 15 minutes – she has my word on that – but I'd be happy to because I am very proud of the record of our government in delivering what we were elected to do in 2019: balancing the budget, strengthening the economy, returning job and economic growth to the province, and fighting to build pipelines. Madam Speaker, that is precisely what we campaigned on. That's precisely what we are delivering.

I'm proud to stand by that record, and I'll be doing that by supporting this bill this evening. Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others wishing to join the debate? Seeing none, would the hon. minister like to close?

Mr. Toews: Yes, Madam Speaker. I would like to make a few comments in closing tonight. I've been listening with interest to the debate on both sides of the House. I appreciate all members engaging on Bill 2, the budget implementation bill. I do need to correct the record. Now, my colleagues have done a good job, I would suggest, already of really correcting the record, but some of these points bear repeating.

We certainly heard the members opposite talk about the fact that this budget is balanced simply because of the high price of oil. Well, Madam Speaker, oil is high today. WTI was over $100 today.

That's a high price of oil. But I want to remind all members of this House that we didn't use $100 in our projections for the price of west Texas intermediate, the price of oil. We used $70 for the upcoming year, $69 for the mid-year, and $66.50 for the out-year. So, yes, higher energy prices were part of the story but only a small part of the story.

In fact, had we continued on the spending trajectory that we inherited from the members opposite, Madam Speaker, we would not have a budget surplus this current fiscal year, the next year, or the following year; we would have deficits in all three years. In fact, for the current fiscal year, which is the first year of this budget, instead of a $500 million projected surplus, we would be projecting a $6 billion deficit.

Madam Speaker, fiscal discipline, fiscal responsibility matters. That's what the members on this side of the aisle have brought over the last three years, and it has been a team effort. But there's more than fiscal discipline, albeit fiscal discipline is so important, to this budget.

I want to talk about one other thing. As we have worked hard to bring fiscal discipline, we've done it surgically and thoughtfully. We've done it by maintaining the highest levels of support for seniors of any province, the highest levels of support for families of any province. We've done it with the highest levels of support for the most vulnerable. Why, Madam Speaker? Because that matters to Albertans and that matters to this government.

We've done all of that and still balanced the budget. We've done all of that yet have turned down that spending trajectory, that irresponsible spending trajectory, that would have left this province with perpetual deficits, downloading irresponsible fiscal decisions onto the next generation. We will not do that. This budget demonstrates our resolve, Madam Speaker.

But there's more. Budget 2022 was about positioning the province of Alberta for investment attraction, disproportionate investment attraction, economic growth that leads to expanded fiscal capacity. Madam Speaker, there are a whole number of pieces that go into a business environment. One of those is our tax rate. Tax rates matter. Business tax rates matter. In fact, I can point to an investment project here just outside of Edmonton. Fortune Minerals has announced that they're going to build a plant just out of Edmonton. Why did they choose Alberta? This was their rationale, and they made it public. Because of Alberta's preferential corporate tax rate. Corporate tax rates matter.

Madam Speaker, I need to also state this. We've dropped Alberta's corporate tax rate by one-third to attract investment. The result of that measure, along with a number of other measures to position this province to be most competitive, has resulted in economic growth, expanded fiscal capacity, where we will be collecting on average $400 million more per year in corporate tax revenue over this fiscal plan than the members across the aisle, when they were in government, collected over their four-year term.

I know my time is almost up, but Budget 2022 is an inflection point in this province, when we round a corner. It is the time when, ultimately, we position this province not for perpetual deficits, not for downloading irresponsible fiscal decisions onto the next generation, not for sending tens of billions of dollars of investment out of the province, creating job loss and business loss for thousands and thousands of Albertans, but in fact, Madam Speaker, Budget 2022 is about ensuring this province has a future, ensuring the next generation of Albertans can choose Alberta to raise a family, pursue a career, start a business, live in prosperity, and live in freedom.

Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure tonight to recommend to every member of this House to support Bill 2. Let's pass this bill. Let's support the budget. Let's put this province on a sustainable fiscal trajectory. Let's put this province on a trajectory where the next generation can live in freedom and prosperity.

Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 2 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 13 Financial Innovation Act

[Adjourned debate April 19: Mr. Bilous]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there members wishing to join the debate on Bill 13 in second reading? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise again this evening to speak this time about Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act, in second reading. I've been doing a little bit of searching to prepare myself to make remarks this evening about this piece of legislation. To be clear, the legislation, I think, is a necessary addition to our laws on the books in the province to govern appropriately new innovations and technology and financial services companies that are arising to meet the needs in a very fast-moving, changing world.

The biggest issue that I think can be had with this piece of legislation is not that it's not needed; it's just that it gives the Minister of Finance unwieldy powers, asking us to trust him. This legislation, like many other pieces that we've seen before us from this UCP government, is a piece of legislation which demands that the government be trusted to not go too far one way or the other in making regulations, in this case in a new field.

If one simply does a quick search to find the number of different types of fintech companies that are out there, whether here in the province, across the country, throughout North America, or globally, it's a massively multiplying and exponentially increasing field of new fintech companies to serve any variety of needs that one might imagine.

It's actually very interesting to see some of the things that are coming up, whether it be a firm like Catalyx, that provides blockchain trading platforms, or PayShepherd, a fintech payment platform. ATB Financial is in fact listed as one of those in Alberta that's involved in fintech. If you just go right on through, you can find places like Chroma technologies, financial technology and property solutions toward the rental experience; Bitcoin Well, a Bitcoin ATM company headquartered here in Edmonton. There are lots and lots and lots of companies that are fintech company start-ups in many, many, many cases that, I think, should be covered under legislation so that they have a, quote, unquote, sandbox that they can be governed within.

The trouble with the legislation as we see it before us today, Madam Speaker, is that this sandbox, this framework that these companies will be regulated within, basically, is filled with players that are decided upon by the Finance minister according to the legislation. Whether or not it is something that needs to be done is not the question with this legislation. It's, in fact, a sector that employs more than 60,000 Albertans and growing, and we support the innovation in this space to grow and diversify the economy, but it's the latitude that is given to the minister involved that we have concerns with.

These powers might assist a regulatory sandbox, but they also require the Assembly and the public to just trust the government to do the right thing, and in this province in many, many ways, I think, it's been demonstrated that we have lost trust in this government, and unfortunately that's caused people to lose trust in government itself. It doesn't matter whether we're talking about supportive services to human beings like AISH, as we talked about, whether it's education, firing educational assistants and getting into major spat with the ATA and teachers in general, firing doctors and ripping up contracts. Any manner of portfolio that one wants to speak about, Madam Speaker, this government has found a way to create distrust and disharmony.

That's why it gives me pause to see in Bill 13 a piece of legislation that once again requires us to fully put our trust in this case in the ministry and the Minister of Finance. I think the better way of going about it was to not have all that authority rest with the minister himself and to narrow the discretion that he has under the legislation.

As you look at the field itself, it's truly an exciting field. It almost bears some resemblance to the oil patch and its resourcefulness as far as new companies are concerned and how companies, local ones, many of them, are seeing a niche opportunity and taking advantage of it by creating a start-up. But, indeed, that entrepreneurialism, which is part and parcel of our province and many jurisdictions throughout the world, still has to be governed by rules and regulations which protect the public.

The financial services sector is one that's undergoing a great revolution globally, and the public deserves to know that it can trust that financial services sector. Typically when an Albertan goes to bed and they've got $5,000 in their savings account, they feel pretty comfortable that when they wake up in the morning, that $5,000 will still be there and that that financial institution wouldn't have failed. I think that's the kind of confidence that the people of this province want to have in their financial services sector and in the fintech sector that will be regulated by this Financial Innovation Act, that the government has so much control over through the Minister of Finance.

There are a number of entirely appropriate safeguards that ministers can apply, but they're not quantified in the legislation as it would be impossible to know what's appropriate for new ideas that don't exist yet. They could include, for example, a capital threshold to support a venture, appropriate insurance coverage, risk management procedures and policies. Certainly, Madam Speaker, if one is to take even a cursory look at the multitudes of small companies, small start-ups that have begun here in this province and around the world to identify and then serve a niche sector of the financial services sector, it certainly begs to be properly regulated so that people are protected. You know, appropriate insurance, risk management procedures, and capital thresholds to support the ventures are governing guideposts that one would hope are things that the minister would be having within the legislation.

Finally, Madam Speaker, any certificate issued by the government would be made public in this case. If the regulator – for example, the superintendent of financial institutions of Treasury Board and Finance – finds that any company breaches their terms, the fines are up to $100,000 for a first offence, $200,000 for a subsequent offence.

Now, it's been legislation that's been received warmly by a broad cross-section of people in Alberta. Indeed, the intent is, of course, to provide comfort in, actually, its implementation as we progress through the period of time that we have right now, where it's – I wouldn't describe it as the Wild West, but it certainly is a very, very effervescent field in financial services. It's exciting, and there are tremendous business opportunities that exist. It's a realm where, while not deterring the entrepreneurial activity, you also want to make sure that there are sidelines and goalposts that are not breached. The minister has tremendous scope and power in this legislation and discretion, which I think may be beyond what the minister should be exercising in the regulation of this new industry.

Now, another element that we seemingly have come to the surface regularly when we speak about our financial services sector or any sector that has clients and collects data – the real estate industry was no different when I was working in it. It had many, many rules around the protection of data and the privacy of your clients. But when it comes to protecting the privacy of Albertans and the powers to issue exemptions to our privacy laws, is there anything that's on or off the table here for this government? How will consumers know, Madam Speaker, that when they're using a new product or service or technology that's operating within this regulatory sandbox – if it's regulated at a much lower level to allow the preponderance of successful new start-ups, is the government prepared to consider some type of a warning label to individual consumers so that they really know what they're getting into?

In this country we have a very large and well-deserved faith in our major financial institutions. We have a trust in them because they've earned that. We know they're not going to fail. They're very, very well regulated. We know that our banks and our trust companies and our credit unions are very, very sound and secure because they're regulated quite well, and they're respected around the world for that. That's the type of faith and confidence that we need to ensure Albertans have, and those investors from outside Alberta who want to come and invest in these start-ups must have that faith and confidence in these start-ups because of the regulations that govern them. That's what I hope we don't lose by having too much discretion given to the minister in applying the regulations to these start-ups in this new regulatory sandbox, as it's called.

It's legislation that would create a sandbox where financial services companies and financial technology companies could test new products and services and technology, and it's the first sort of regulatory sandbox of its kind regulated directly by a provincial government, as in this case by Treasury Board and Finance. It builds on a regulatory sandbox initiative that was started under the previous NDP government in Alberta and in other provinces in the securities space, which is regulated by the Alberta Securities Commission in Alberta. It's something that is novel, but it's not brand new.

It's important, I think, to keep in mind the goal of these new regulatory sandboxes, to ensure that the public confidence is secure, to know that we have in this country a banking and financial institution framework and network that is the envy of most of the world, Madam Speaker. We have had a history of very, very solid Canadian banks emanating out of sort of the British banking system, a counterpart to those that have developed in the United States, and we have had very, very few financial institutions fail in this country, because of our acceptance of very, very careful regulation and tight regulation to ensure that the soundness of these financial institutions is never brought into question. I think that even during some of the most extreme times in the financial meltdown in 2008, 2009 we never came to the point that many other financial institutions in the world came to, where it was thought that they might actually fail. There were measures taken by government to assist then, but we withstood those tumultuous times because of the strict regulations that Canadian financial institutions must adhere to.

I think the same type of attitude, the same dedication to careful regulation has to be maintained in this legislation in a new field, which is really burgeoning. It was quite astonishing to see the numbers of small start-ups in Edmonton and Calgary, provincially, and throughout the country, in Canada. We're not talking tens and twenties; we're talking hundreds of small fintech companies, small start-ups. Of course, with the start-ups, Madam Speaker, as in any business, you're going to see significant failures. Some of them just won't get off the ground. Some will get to a certain level and fail for a variety of reasons. Quite often scaling up is a difficulty. Indeed, all the more reason for the government to be very, very careful with legislation regulating this new sandbox that the new, exciting companies will be playing in. It's serious business, because we're looking for investment.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you. I do appreciate and acknowledge the comments by our opposition member previous. I think he has pointed out some key messages, that we do have to regulate this in a very careful way. That's why it's my pleasure to rise and thank the minister, through you, Madam Speaker, for the great work in bringing this bill forward, particularly to second reading, Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act.

Our government has been working continually for Albertans in nearly every economic sector. Alberta's economy is more diverse than ever as we intensely focus on creating more jobs and building our economy.

A little bit of history from what we were able to dig up in this sector. From 2000 to 2020 Alberta's real gross domestic product in the financial services sector grew at an average annual rate of more than 4 per cent, outpacing growth in all other provinces and contributing over $14 billion to the provincial GDP in 2020. Nearly 63,000 Albertans were employed in the financial services sector in 2019, and we want to continue to build on this growth and the attractiveness of doing business in Alberta.

In Bill 13 the proposed rules will make it easier for entrepreneurs anywhere in the province to test products in the emerging field of cryptocurrencies and online banking. If passed, this bill would set up what is known as a regulatory sandbox, allowing companies, under strict government supervision, to test new programs and products, with temporary exemptions on select regulations and requirements. Companies would also gain access to certain information, with strict parameters and individual permissions governed by the Minister of Finance and his advisory team. These are just some of the reasons I think Bill 13 is essential to the growth of our economy here in Alberta, by exploring, challenging the status quo and engaging with industry to provide new and innovative ideas to all Albertans and potentially all Canadians.

The government of Ontario had the Capital Markets Modernization Taskforce, which recommended the creation of an Ontario fintech regulatory sandbox and a Canada-wide regulatory sandbox for all financial services. So this idea isn't only being considered here in Alberta. This regulatory sandbox is already being used in various industries and sectors world-wide in places like the United Kingdom, the United States, particularly the states of Arizona and Wyoming, Hong Kong, and Australia. The regulation helps create tech jobs and keeps these regions at the forefront of cutting-edge financial technology, which also attracts world-class companies and minds searching for new ideas. No other Canadian province or territory has yet established a regulatory sandbox for the finance and fintech sector, but Alberta seeks to be the first.

Regardless, the Canadian Securities Administrators, the CSA, in partnership with the Alberta Securities Commission, the ASC, established their securities-related regulatory sandbox in 2016. The establishment of an Alberta regulatory sandbox would be complementary to the CSA and ASC's regulatory sandbox and provide the certainty, security, privacy, and governance needed for the financial technology sector to operate here in Alberta more fully.

Margaret Paproski, the chief operating officer, general counsel, and co-founder of InvestDefy, stated on March 31:

I applaud the Alberta government's commitment to supporting innovators and businesses in financial services and fintech with its proposed Financial Innovation Act. With so much regulatory uncertainty making it difficult to create and launch cutting edge products, the regulatory sandbox is an extremely welcome initiative and demonstrates Alberta's commitment to being a leader in this space.

That's something I think we should all be proud of.

I want to take a moment to talk about some of the specific criteria each of the applicants would have to meet to be eligible to operate under this legislation. The first: the physical presence requirement. Applicants must maintain a corporate physical presence right here in Alberta, meaning that applicants must have an office in Alberta or senior staff living in the province of Alberta.

The financial services requirement: the regulatory sandbox is designed for companies that offer financial products or services. This isn't just a broad, blanket legislation applying to all kinds of different sectors but specifically to fintech and financial products.

The innovation test: applicants must adequately explain how each eligible product or service is considered new and original or a new adaptation or a material improvement on another product or service. Applicants would not receive exemptions for products or services currently offered in Alberta by other companies. They must be new.

The business plan requirement: applicants must provide a sound, viable business plan, including details for testing their financial product or service and plans to exit the regulatory sandbox.

In addition to these requirements, there are also case-by-case dependent requirements like risk management policy, security, privacy, and insurance qualities that would be decided by the minister's expertise and governing advisers.

Lastly, I wanted to talk about the attention to detail to ensure transparency. The government will be making a website available to the public, which would outline, one, the name of each participant issued acceptance; two, a description of the product or service each participant is offering through the sandbox; three, a list of the exemptions provided to respective participants; four, any terms, conditions, or restrictions imposed by the minister on a case-by-case basis; and five, any amendments, revocation, or cancellation of the acceptance certificate.

Once and if passed, the goal of this bill is simply to create a regulatory sandbox for financial services and fintech companies in Alberta. Alberta would be Canada's first province or territory to establish a regulatory sandbox for these sectors. These measures would ensure that Alberta remains a growing destination of choice for financial services and financial technology companies, growing business and creating jobs. It will benefit Albertans through innovative products and services for generations to come as well as diversifying our economy even further. Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you again to the minister for bringing this bill forward. I would ask that all of our colleagues in this place support this bill.

Thank you.

Member Ceci: I appreciate the opportunity to address this at second reading, Financial Innovation Act, Bill 13, and I appreciate the Member for Lethbridge-East for sharing some information that I think will be helpful to Albertans. This is a new area to venture into, and we need to be as clear as possible so that Albertans understand what their government is doing. There obviously is a huge interest not only from the 63,000 employees who work in this area but also potentially for the new sector that will flourish and develop in Alberta as a result of this bill. I'm certainly hoping that that's the case and that we see even more billions added to our provincial GDP. That can only be a good thing for Albertans.

I do want to say that I'm glad to hear ASC, Alberta Securities Commission, mentioned. They have always been stalwarts in terms of ensuring that the securities sector, the security space, in this province remains strong and trustworthy. They do good work in terms of ensuring that the capital Albertans invest and others invest in securities is regulated, that the commission goes after people who are taking advantage of the investments of Albertans.

I remember that back when I was Finance minister, I got a call from the Finance minister of the day, who was a member of the Conservative Party of Canada under the Harper government, and he said: "I want you to essentially get rid of the Alberta Securities Commission. I want you to consolidate it across the country. We want to consolidate it across the country." And I said: "Why would I do that? We have different companies. We have an energy sector here that we know well and our Securities Commission knows well. They can stand up for Albertans better than a consolidated commission out of Toronto likely could." And he said, "Well, I think you're going in the wrong direction." I said, "Well, I don't think so."

Alberta needs its own security commission, and the Member for Lethbridge-East was correct in saying that they were innovative and they were strong and they did things that this Financial Innovation Act is building off of. We may not have had that – we likely wouldn't have had that – had I listened and taken the direction of the federal Finance minister at the time of the Conservative Party of Canada.

I, too, want to say that there are positive aspects of this bill. I think it is something that should get a lot of airtime, publicity. There should be media about it so that Albertans can understand what this bill is all about. I think on this side we have general broad policy agreement in this approach, and I would stand up and support it. I will stand up and support it.

It's new legislation, however, so that's why I am suggesting that we need to be speaking about it frequently through potentially our own communications to our citizens, because where it is a regulatory sandbox, that's new terminology for Albertans. I think it's a place where new products and services and technology should be tested so that we keep, essentially, a bit of a tighter grip on it initially so that it proves itself over the long term. I do think it's important that there be the necessary expertise, whether that be in Treasury Board and Finance and bureaucracy, where this initiative can be understood, transparently worked on, and ensured that we're not going down the wrong road.

For the kinds of exemptions that will be sought out by companies that want to work in this area, they are significant in number, so we need to ensure that the decisions made in this area – because they're not unsubstantial. I mean, they're in the following acts: the loans and trust act; the Credit Union Act; ATB Financial Act; Consumer Protection Act, with the additional approval from the Minister of Service Alberta in that area; personal information and privacy, with additional approval from the Information and Privacy Commissioner; the Financial Consumers Act; and other acts that could be added via regulation at a later date.

The Member for Lethbridge-East talked about how entry into the sandbox can take place. I won't go over that. But that's useful to know as well because there is direct skin in the game or investment in Alberta that must be a case. They must make it in terms of making a business case for participation in the sandbox.

The information about the exemptions that are granted: I think it's necessary that that information be clearly laid out in terms of the conditions and the restrictions, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera, as well as an expiry date so that Albertans can know what decisions are being made on exemptions that other businesses have to meet or not get exemptions for but in this space they're granted so Albertans on their own can come to some understanding if there is additional, I guess, benefit for the entrance into the sandbox for Alberta.

I wonder about the size of the penalties, fines for offences, with $100,000 being for the first offence and $200,000 being for any subsequent offence, when companies are found in breach of the terms that they have already been approved of having. I just wonder if that's an adequate amount, seeing the potential problems that will be caused to Albertans if offences are committed.

I'm glad, as the Member for Lethbridge-East talked about, that there is a cross-section of support for this endeavour in this province. I'm glad to understand that and hear that. I think that shows that things potentially are on the right track. The challenge, I think, will be to ensure that the broad powers given to the minister in this case have some checks and balances along the way and that there is transparency in terms of the decision-making that is made by the minister with regard to these businesses that are starting up in this space, because we do have some pretty problematic decisions that have been made by government as a whole over the last two and a half, three years, and I wouldn't want to see those recreated in this space as well, nor would Albertans benefit from some of the bad decision-making that has been made, for instance the pipeline investment of $1.3 billion that was made by this government with no return at all.

Those are some of the concerns that I would kind of just want to put on the record, recognizing that this is a start and needs to see some positive steps taken. I'm willing to give it that support so that it can take those steps but with some caution around the lack of transparency, the size of the fines.

I'll sit down. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise just to add some brief comments here around Bill 13, the Financial Innovation Act. I think my friends from Edmonton-McClung and Calgary-Buffalo have pretty much spoken to most of the points I want to make, but I guess there's something I do really want to highlight here.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I guess, to begin with, when it comes to innovation, I'm certainly in favour of that. You know, getting a chance to do new things, cool things that make things easier for people: that's always a desirable effect. Of course, when those things do go sideways – and you can certainly ask my wife this. When she doesn't get the services that she is expecting and certainly that she's paid for, I could probably go up onto the roof of my house and find a few missing shingles because of those cases. I don't think there's anything wrong with Albertans demanding a certain level even when we're talking about a potential new innovation, say, for instance, around financial services, which is what Bill 13 is starting to enable here.

As my friend from Calgary-Buffalo had mentioned, the one concern I do have in this bill is around the great leeway that this bill does grant the minister. You know, I can't help but think again: serving back in the 29th Legislature, members of the government bench, members of the government caucus who also served during those times had significant concerns every single time it was thought that extra abilities, extra powers, extra creative decision-making was being allowed to a minister. I can't help but wonder what members who had served back at that time would have thought when reading through Bill 13, because those are some of the concerns I have. Really, at the end of the day, what you're asking members of this House and quite more broadly the public in general: trust us; trust us to get it right.

Well, there's my concern with this, Mr. Speaker, you know, trusting the government, trusting the Premier. I trusted the Premier to disclose his donor list. We see how that worked out. Albertans trusted him to disclose his donor list, and that never happened. The government had said: well, trust us; we're going to give this very big corporate tax giveaway, and it's going to create 100,000 jobs and it's going to fill the business towers.

Mr. Nielsen: That kind of fell up a little bit short, to the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

They said: trust us on the new curriculum revamp. We've seen how that has gone over with people, you know. "Trust us to fix the insurance premiums." Those have been running wild. I've got constituents that have come to me and said that their auto insurance went up 46 per cent, their condo insurance went up 57 per cent. Yet the Premier went and asked, "Please reduce the premiums" and somehow managed to haggle – what? – a 3 per cent to 5 per cent reduction after them going up 10 per cent to 30 per cent on average. There was the trust.

Again, my friend from Calgary-Buffalo also mentioned that we trusted you: you bet $1.3 billion on Donald Trump, and you lost that bet. You know, the government said, "Trust us to get the word out around our energy sector; it's only going to cost $30 million a year," bumbled two logos, and the biggest thing we have to show for it is chasing after Bigfoot. What's next? "Trust us to go after Ogopogo." I don't know.

Bill 13 significantly asks us and Albertans to trust them, so I'm really going to try to encourage the government that you need to work on this trust issue because it hasn't been going very well for you so far. I just really wanted to highlight that, Mr. Speaker, at this point.

I think what I will do is motion to adjourn debate at this time.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 14 Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022

[Debate adjourned April 20: Member Loyola speaking]

The Speaker: Hon. members, the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has risen.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is absolutely an honour to rise in this Chamber and to speak to Bill 14. In fact, I did not get a chance to speak in the Chamber yesterday, so as is my tradition, I'd like to just acknowledge all the front-line workers who are continuing to work so hard for all of us. Of course, we are still in a pandemic, so a shout-out to all those workers in health care and education and retail and on the front lines, wherever you are. You're seen and you are valued.

You know, I'm actually quite pleased to be able to speak to Bill 14, Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022, and, in fact, to be able to speak to it as the critic for Status of Women, because, of course, it was the Associate Minister of Status of Women who has sponsored this bill. Yeah. Gosh, this is a bill that is certainly overdue and a long time coming.

I'm very happy, actually, that I get – I was joking about the fact – to speak before the two lawyers who are planning to speak, not that I'm referring to their presence or absence but, spoiler, they will be speaking on this bill. I'm happy that I get to speak before them because I will admit, of course, that my knowledge of the legal system is not quite as strong as the members for Edmonton-Whitemud and Calgary-Mountain View, but, you know, I can talk about this a little bit from just what I've heard from stakeholders and from stories that have been shared with me.

I shared earlier today that one of the most powerful parts of my job – I don't know if all the MLAs would agree – for me is to be able to hear people's stories and to meet folks. Actually, earlier today I met two lovely young women here in Edmonton who are both health care workers. One is a respiratory therapist, and the other is a nurse. Their names are – I'm sure they won't mind because I already posted on social media – Sabreena and Anna. I met them because they actually met at the beginning of the pandemic. They are going to get married in September, and they asked if I would be their wedding officiant. Yeah. It's really exciting – and they're both, obviously, doing so much on the front lines of health care – just to be able to meet them.

I tell that story and just, you know, the power of story because when I saw this bill come up, I thought about the survivors of sexual assault and sexual violence who I've been able to connect with in my role as the critic for Status of Women. A few stories stand out, but I'll share one, and that's the story of Emma Nikolai-Wilson. She actually stood with us when we opposed this government's horrific cuts to victims of crime. She had reached out to me, and she said that she was willing to share her story of sexual assault. Don't worry; I am tying this back to the bill, and I'm not going to solely use this as an opportunity to remind this government of their poor choices in the past but to talk about why we need to be taking sexual assault and sexual abuse seriously. I know that no one in this Chamber would disagree with that sentiment.

Emma is one of the, believe it or not, 1.95 million people in Alberta every year who have survived sexual assault or sexual abuse. Basically, I mean, you're talking about close to 1 in 2 Albertans experience sexual violence of some form. That's according to data from the Association of Alberta Sexual Assault Services, and those are just staggering numbers, absolutely. You know, we know that one of the significant challenges when it comes to sexual assault and sexual abuse is that numbers show that roughly only 5 per cent of survivors in Canada report the incident, so you can't even imagine how many people are struggling, suffering in silence. Yeah. I think about people like Emma, who shared her story with me. I can think about others who've shared their just incredibly heartbreaking stories of sexual violence, and it's on all of us as legislators to hear those stories and to act.

You know, this is why I'm happy to see that this government is making it a requirement for sexual assault training for judges to be a requirement. I do want to get on the record, though – and as I've already alluded to, I know my colleagues will be able to expand in even more detail on some of the concerns that we have, but I saw this actually right away when the bill was introduced as a concern – that the sexual assault training actually applies to future judges; it doesn't apply to sitting judges. I think what the government said in response is that they're hoping that sitting judges will get training through existing education plans.

Well, it's hard. You know, they're kind of justifying that they'll address this eventually, but I think it's hard to trust that that will in fact be the case. Again, I can come back to the example of victims of crime and the slashing of those funds and being told, as an example there, that: "Oh, no, no" – I try not to use the word "victims," but of course that's the name of the fund – "survivors will have supports." Sure enough, I heard from countless Albertans who didn't get supports, who were denied claims.

This is what we've raised, and I truly actually believe that we might be able to get some movement from this government on that decision on victims of crime. We know that survivors of sexual assault, sexual violence: many often don't report, and if they do report, they take their time reporting because it's incredibly traumatic, right? So the changes to the victims of crime fund meant that if survivors didn't apply within a 45-day window, they would be denied. That's exactly what has happened to some folks. I give that context to say that you can imagine why we are concerned. We are skeptical about this government just promising that they'll address some of these issues later on.

A couple of things, a couple of other concerns that I want to raise. I will actually point out that I'm going to use the words of somebody who's far more versed on these issues than I am, and that's Jennifer Koshan. She is a law professor at the University of Calgary. I think she's only so far issued a tweet thread, but I think – I'm looking at my colleague for Edmonton-Whitemud – she is planning on writing a blog about this. Yeah. I've read much of her work before, and although I still often need it explained to me by my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud, she does do a good job of distilling some of the issues.

She did this with one piece of this proposed bill in front of us, Bill 14, and that's on the definition of – oh, I'm sorry; I closed my window; here we go – social context. This bill, Bill 14, that we have in front of us is built on some of the work in federal Bill C-3. In Bill C-3 they explain social context "to include education on systemic racism and systemic discrimination as well as myths and stereotypes associated with sexual assault complainants." I can share that with Hansard because I am quoting her tweet directly. One of the issues that we see here in Bill 14 is that this term is not defined, and that's troubling at a time when, you know, we should be absolutely equipping judges, well, all Canadians in fact, with an understanding of systemic racism and systemic discrimination and taking an intersectional lens to look at the causes of some of these issues. She points out as well myths and stereotypes associated with sexual assault complainants.

I mean, we know, anybody who's followed some of the past on what led up to Bill 14, the issues with – was it Justice Robin Camp? – you know, the perpetuation of rape myths, of awful stereotypes. It's clear not just in the justice system but in the justice system as well that these myths persist, right? So what an opportunity – perhaps it's the teacher in me – to really educate and to talk about or to dig into some of the bigger issues around myths and around stereotypes.

Again, I really want to reiterate the piece around systemic racism as well, right? You know, we've talked in this Chamber about the barriers that racialized folks have experienced in navigating the justice system. No one in this Chamber needs to be explained the fact that Indigenous folks are overrepresented in the justice system. This is why we need to ensure that judges are equipped with a really broad understanding of these issues, including systemic racism, systemic discrimination as well, and just really given a good understanding of what social context issues really mean, and I would add to that looking at issues around gender.

We also know that there are – you know, there is homophobia and there's transphobia in the justice system as well. Perhaps it's not always as obvious. But again, this is where taking that intersectional lens is so critical. I know intersectionality is not a word that this government seems to embrace, and I'm not saying that just to start anything. It was, in fact, their Premier who said that intersectionality is a, quote, unquote, kooky theory. We've seen that very ideology play itself out in the crushing of GBA plus, gender-based analysis plus, across this government. For folks who don't know, GBA plus is a really important policy lens to ensure that policies and programs from governments are very much analyzed from an intersectional lens before being passed and before impacting the lives of Albertans. I've called on the previous Associate Minister of Status of Women and the current minister – I called on them both – to do better because when asked if there was any sort of lens being applied to legislation, policies, programs, the answer is no.

That was something that I was so proud to see under this government, under the NDP government, because when there is a gender-based lens applied, we know that the results are better as well. I know I'm explaining it in a simplistic way, but the reality is that I'm concerned. I'll come back to Bill 14. I'm concerned, when we've got a record like that from this government, that we won't see the proper education and training for judges that they ought to have. So I'm calling on this government to really think about that as well, and like I said – I know my colleagues are going to speak to this as well – I do hope that we get some responses from this government on some of the questions that we're going to raise.

Again, I'm happy that this piece of legislation is before us – and perhaps there will be some amendments forthcoming – but we've got an opportunity to make a really important bill, a good bill a lot better and a lot stronger. I think everybody in this Chamber can agree that on an issue as important as sexual assault and sexual violence we want to get it right. When you've got experts in law urging you to amend and to make it better, I think we should listen to them.

With that, I think I will wrap up my remarks here right away and again, you know, just point out that I am happy to see this from this ministry, but I urge the minister to take our points seriously.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to join in the debate this evening? The Member for Calgary-Mountain View has the call.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and speak to this incredibly important piece of legislation. I'd like to start out by saying that I am supportive of the bill insofar as it goes, but I think that there are a few things that could be done to make it better. I think it's worth starting with the importance of this bill.

There is a long-standing legal tradition of sort of separation of powers between the legislative branch, which is us, and the judiciary. It's important that people not be intersecting unnecessarily into each other's jurisdiction. I think we see in the U.S. a system where judges are elected. That has some problems because it can sort of result in the pushing to do things that people are reactive to in the moment. Rather than thinking of the system, rather than thinking of the overall law, it can cause people to react in the moment, and that's problematic.

Our system doesn't suffer from that problem, and I think that's important, but a problem that I think it potentially does suffer from is somewhat of a problem with inertia. There has been a lot of movement in the science and the understanding of trauma and the understanding of how individuals behave after a trauma, and I think that while the law itself has done a good job of keeping up with that, we need to make sure that the people who hold the discretion of the application of that law, in this case judges, are keeping up with the advances in the law.

The law has been clear for a long time that certain myths and stereotypes are impermissible and that a judge cannot use those things in their reasoning. So questions about, you know, "Why didn't she report it right away? Why did she put herself in that situation? Why didn't she wear a longer skirt?" those pieces of analysis, aren't allowed anymore. Unfortunately, some of those myths stay with us in society and have followed us to the justice system. That is incredibly problematic, so it is very important that we make advances in this way.

I will give credit to the Provincial Court. I know they have done a lot of work around offering this training and ensuring that all of their judges are in a position to take it. There are some systems in place to deal with problems that arise. I, obviously, got a very sort of up-close and personal encounter with this when I served as the Minister of Justice in this province. I received a letter from several professors, several of whom had actually taught me, about a case that had occurred before the Provincial Court of Alberta in which a number of those myths and stereotypes were used in the reasoning. That was incredibly troubling. The transcripts were long. I read them in detail, and I ultimately took a very rare step, potentially unprecedented in the history of Alberta, of writing to my federal counterpart to make a complaint with respect to that judge.

The reason for that was that the treatment of the victim in that instance by the justice system was deeply inappropriate. The application of reasoning, questioning like "Why didn't she keep her knees together?" reasoning around whether or not she had consensually engaged in activity because she was homeless and she was essentially trading that for a place to stay, was extremely problematic, and the myths and stereotypes in the decision were very troubling. Ultimately, the judge was removed from the bench, which I think was the right outcome, but we need to keep in mind that this is just one case, and there are probably many in which similar things have occurred.

Even when we're talking about cases, we're talking about a very small fraction of the sexual assaults that are actually occurring out there, because the evidence is quite clear that women do not report, and they don't report in part out of fear for how they will be treated by society and how they will be treated by the justice system. There are a lot of problems, and this is definitely a solution to one of them, so I don't think it should be understated, the importance of this. However, I think that by itself it is insufficient.

One of the things that happened early on in the UCP's tenure is that they made changes to the victims of crime fund, changes that I think are extremely problematic. Essentially, what those changes did: prior to that, the victims of crime fund, which is a surcharge placed on – it actually primarily comes from speeding tickets, but basically most financial things that go through Provincial Court have a victim's fine surcharge on them, and it goes into the victims fund. The victims fund is intended to be used to support victims of crime in this province. The UCP changed that so that was no longer necessary. Now the victims of crime fund is essentially used to fund other projects. Now, I'm not presuming that those projects are bad – many of those projects are fine – but those should be funded with government funds, because the results of these changes are that a large portion of the fund is now going to fund government services and not going to victims of crime. The government actually refused, at that time, an amendment that would have ensured that at least a certain portion of the fund was reserved for victims' programming.

The result of this is that the funding that goes to groups that support victims has been decreased when, in fact, it needed to be increased, and victims have been denied benefits. One of the ways in which this happens is that certain streams of benefits have been cut off, so that's extremely problematic. Another way in which this has happened – and this is important when we're talking about victims of sexual assault – is that they have put in place a time limit of 45 days. The victim has to apply to the fund within 45 days.

I don't know how many members of this House have had the misfortune of knowing someone who has been the victim of a sexual assault, but 45 days isn't enough time. People are still processing their trauma and what has happened to them, and they may not choose to come forward in that amount of time. They may need longer than that, and in fact I believe that these victims who have survived a sexual assault – we're talking about people who have survived sexual assault. They have had agency taken away from them in a very deep and personal fashion, and we should give them as much agency over how they process that as we can.

That was one of the reasons why, when we were in government, we removed the limitations period on their ability to sue in civil court. The civil process you can now pursue at any time so that people are not forced into making that decision by an arbitrary timeline. They have the time to process it in whatever way they see fit, and then they are able to come forward when they choose. Having this 45-day limit on the application is extremely problematic.

Now, it wasn't a lot of money that people got, maybe enough to cover, you know, some portion of the counselling they needed or to take some time off work just to emotionally process what had happened or maybe even to pay for a course they had to withdraw from at school because they just weren't able to cope in those circumstances. It wasn't a lot of money, but it was meaningful and it was something, and it was something that we could do for them. I think that that's a big part. So I think that this, without reforms to that victims of crime act, is not sufficient on its own.

I think another thing worth noting are a couple of issues with the bill itself. One of the questions that we've had sort of around this is about definitions of terms. It requires education in sexual assault law and social context issues. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've already gone on longer than I intended.

Social context issues is a term that is taken from federal legislation, and in federal legislation social context issues is defined. The reason I think that that is important is because it is defined to include systemic racism. That is important. I think it is important that we put into legislation the requirement that some of the training be around systemic racism.

I mean, certainly, in my experience many lawyers don't even really understand what that means. Many lawyers still think and many justice system participants still think that when you say "systemic racism," what you mean is that the individuals in the system are racist. That's not what it means at all. What it means is that the results of the system in its entirety have a differential impact on people of different races.

I honestly don't think that anyone who is paying the slightest bit of attention to the justice system can deny that that is the case. The incarceration rate for Indigenous people is wildly disproportionate, and that is a result of the systems. What else can it be a result of? If you are getting an outcome that doesn't reflect the distribution in the population, if you're suggesting that the system isn't responsible for the outcome, what you're suggesting is that certain people have a greater proclivity to criminality, which is obviously false. It's obviously not true. So I think systemic racism is fairly well demonstrated, and I think it's worth using that definition in this legislation to make sure that those issues are being recognized by the system as a whole.

Finally, another one of the questions I have about this is that since this legislation occurred at the federal level, there's been a lot of conversation about survivors of domestic violence and whether there should be training specifically in that because it is a very similar problem to the way sometimes the system misfires with respect to sexual assault law. The law is clear that you can't use myths and stereotypes, but sometimes those myths and stereotypes still get used because the people who apply the law are members of society, and society still, unfortunately, suffers from those biases. That is clearly the case with domestic violence as well, so I think it's worth considering the inclusion of that sort of training as well.

Again, we get the same sort of recurrent themes both in society and potentially in the legal system, where people are, you know, "Well, why didn't she leave sooner?" or "Why didn't she seek help sooner?" or a series of questions like that, that we know just are not reflective of the way people process the trauma. A lot of people stay because there are children involved, because they have no place to go, because they wouldn't have money to buy food, because maybe they don't have a work permit in this country and they wouldn't have anywhere to go. They don't have any family or friends to protect them. Even if those things aren't the case, there are many psychological reasons that people won't necessarily leave in the first instance.

I think it's important to recognize these things, and the bill, again, as far as it goes, I think, is very important. It definitely is a step forward. I think there are some things we can do to make it a bigger step forward to make sure that it is more inclusive, so hopefully we will have a chance to bring those amendments.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others? The Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 14, the Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022, and in particular it's a pleasure to follow the comments from my colleagues the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood and the Member for Calgary-Mountain View, both very thoughtful sets of comments about this bill and incredibly important, reflecting their commitment to these issues as well.

I want to begin by, as well, expressing my happiness, my pleasure that this bill is being brought forward before this Legislature to require training around sexual assault and sexual violence for judges. I do think it is important legislation that I believe pretty much, I'm assuming, most of the members of this House are going to feel that they want to support given that the objective of the legislation, which is really to make sure that those in positions of judgment in our court system are operating and assessing their judgment in a way that is free of myths and stereotypes around sexual violence, is something that we're all committed to. I support the basis of this bill.

However, as my colleagues have mentioned, there is some room for improvement here, and I hope that the comments that we're making today and suggestions that we're making are met with that spirit of: let's try to make this bill as good as possible and really achieve the objectives that I believe we're all committed to in this House. I want to give credit to Professor Jennifer Koshan, who has certainly provided her insight, but she's one of many legal academics, practitioners, survivors of violence, sexual violence who have brought forward their experiences, and we can learn from that information and those experiences to improve this bill, I believe, to better serve survivors of sexual violence.

My colleagues have mentioned a number of them. As indicated, you know, the reason why this topic has, well, gotten a lot of media attention was because of the comments specifically of an Alberta Provincial Court judge, Justice Camp, who, during a trial on sexual assault in 2014, made a number of shocking comments that revealed not only that myths were still certainly present within the judicial system but were actively being applied by a member of the judiciary. I think we were all rightly shocked to hear some of those comments. I actually thought about whether or not it's appropriate to repeat the comments only because I always worry about revictimizing those who have survived it to have to hear these comments again. But it is important context to know that we had a sitting judge in the Provincial Court of Alberta who, during a sexual assault trial, said the words, "Sex and pain sometimes go together. That's not necessarily a bad thing" and said, "Young wom[e]n want to have sex, particularly if they're drunk" and also said, "Why couldn't [the complainant] just keep her knees together?" Those words shocked many of us. Of course, it led to an inquiry into Justice Camp and led to this public conversation around judicial training around sexual violence.

But we have to be clear, as my colleague the Member for Calgary-Mountain View indicated, that this was a high-profile case. The concern is that this may have and likely is occurring more often than we know about, and I'm sure there are many practitioners of the bar, many survivors of sexual violence who have experienced this. Sometimes it's as obvious and as explicit as these comments, and sometimes it's not. It's underlying some of the decisions that are being made and the judgments that are being made, so that's why we talk about this now, and it's a good thing that we're talking about it, and it's a good thing that we're bringing forward legislation to require judicial training around this.

However, there's room for improvement, as I mentioned. As noted, you know, Bill 14 does indicate that newly appointed judges – or nobody may be appointed as a judge unless that individual has completed education in sexual assault law and social context issues. I echo the comments of my colleagues that we should follow the lead of the federal legislation Bill C-3, which does actually provide a definition of social context. That is a very broad term, and upon just reading it in this legislation, in this bill, it's not clear what is meant by that.

I think it is important to be clear what we're talking about. Since we are saying that newly appointed judges must receive training in this area, what do we mean? Training in what? So I think it's important for us to consider amending this legislation, if that moves forward to Committee of the Whole, to consider adding a definition of social context issues that mirrors – unless there's other feedback as to how it should differ, but I believe I support the definition in Bill C-3 which talks about looking at systemic racism and systemic discrimination.

I believe that's incredibly important because, as my colleagues have noted, intersectionality is a key piece of sexual assault and sexual violence. I think we only have to think about, for example, another shocking case, the Gladue case, which was an Indigenous woman, where there was actually a debate – I mean, this woman died as a result of a very violent, violent activity, and there was some suggestion that she consented to it, and that was a matter of debate in that case. I'm not sure if we necessarily would have been having those conversations in the same way had Cindy Gladue not been Indigenous. That underlies so much of the discussion that happens around sexual violence.

We also can't ignore that women with disabilities are actually at higher risk of sexual violence as well. In fact, I note that the Member for Calgary-Mountain View mentioned, you know, if any of us in this House have the misfortune of having known somebody who has been sexually assaulted. Actually, the statistics show that not only do we, all of us in this House, know somebody who has been sexually assaulted; there is a chance that 30 per cent of the women in this Assembly have been sexually assaulted. The statistics show that women over the age of 15 in Canada: almost actually close to 39 per cent have reported that – not reported. They report not solely to the police, but they have indicated that they have experienced sexual assault.

This is not an uncommon issue. It's incredibly common. What is uncommon is actually that it gets to the courts. Only about 5 per cent of sexual assault cases actually end up being reported to the police, and then even fewer than that move on to the court system. The reality is that many of us have been impacted or know somebody directly close to us who has been impacted by sexual assault.

How those matters are dealt with in the court system is critically important because we know that myths and stereotypes actually prevent reporting. It is very much that fear of being judged when you go into the space, all of the rape myths that many of us, unfortunately, have heard before: how the woman was dressed, was she intoxicated, what was her past sexual activity? All of those things are not only sometimes explicit but very implicit in some of the decisions that are being made. That discourages women from actually reporting.

If we're going to be serious about dealing with sexual assault and violence, we actually need to be encouraging women to understand that it is a safe space for them to be able to report, that they can go forward, that they will be believed, that they will be heard, and the matter will be dealt with. Certainly, we need to be clear that we need to make this legislation as good as possible, but this is only one small piece of addressing it. So I encourage that we consider moving forward by including a definition of social context to address those systemic racism issues and systemic discrimination.

I also note that the federal Bill C-3 also – when it talks about the judicial training that's required in sexual assault, it actually indicates in the legislation that that sexual assault education training must be developed in consultation with sexual assault survivors and persons and organizations and groups that support them as well as in consultation with Indigenous leaders and communities. I think that's a really important piece because when we're talking about sexual assault training and education, again, what do we mean by it, and who's going to be involved in the development of that training? I think that's something as well for this House to consider.

I also want to note that Bill 14 as drafted only applies to individuals who may be appointed in the future as judges or those who are currently on the eligibility list. It does not mandate sexual assault education training for existing judicial members. I think that is a concern. I was just actually having a conversation with my colleague from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood about what training I received when I was in law school, which was now 20 years ago, and did we talk about sexual assault myths and sexual violence myths? You know what? We didn't explicitly. It was sometimes. It was brought up by the nature of – depending on the professor, depending on the nature of the cases that were brought up, and sometimes in conversations in classes that conversation happened and we did discuss it a little bit, but it wasn't actually part of our training to become lawyers.

Now, I'm not familiar with whether or not that's now required. I hope it is certainly part of at least the criminal law and family law courses, but certainly there are many sitting members of the judiciary who have not had any exposure to training around sexual assault and sexual violence. I think that we can certainly consider in this bill the potential for requiring an undertaking that they do some kind of training like that.

I also want to pick up on pieces that were brought up by Jennifer Koshan around similarities around domestic violence. The way Professor Koshan put it was very good. She said: we have an opportunity here with Bill 14; why don't we expand it to include training around myths and stereotypes around domestic violence? This is an opportunity because, as noted, there are certainly many similar stereotypes that apply to domestic violence. You know, we've all probably heard or read stories about where there was this implied sense of, "Well, if a woman was really being assaulted or there was really domestic violence going on, why did she stay?" or "If she fought back, maybe it wasn't so bad to begin with." There have been stereotypes in family law for many years around that domestic violence is only raised or intimate-partner violence is only raised in custodial disputes, implying that perhaps they should not be believed.

So there are many myths and stereotypes that apply in the domestic violence context that we have an opportunity to address here as well. We have an opportunity to be leading in this issue by bringing forward required training for new judges on those myths as well, and I think there is a lot of good research and academic work that's been done as to how that can be implemented. So I hope that's an opportunity that this government takes in the spirit, of course, of making the best legislation possible.

Lastly, I want to mention that, you know, I appreciate that there have been a number of pieces of legislation since this government was elected that are around the issue of violence against women. We've seen Clare's law and human trafficking legislation as well as now this piece. This is important. I'm not going to deny that. I think that's good work, and I think members of this side of the Assembly have supported those pieces of legislation.

However, I do have to comment on the fact that whenever I do see legislation or action taken by this government specific to women, it seems to be around this idea of women in positions of victimhood, positions of violence, and there are bills that are brought forward that are focused on legal mechanisms to address that. Those are important. Those are important parts of the work that we need to do to address violence against women. However, this government also continues to ignore the other factors that lead to both physical, financial, and so many other types of insecurity for women. Those issues may not be within the law and order framework of this government's, I guess, predilection to go towards, but certainly they are equally as important in addressing issues of violence and also to treat the security of families and children and women as a whole.

We can't talk about family violence or sexual violence without also addressing issues of poverty, without also addressing issues of access to affordable quality child care, which gives women the security and independence to be able to work, to go back to school, which sometimes gives them the ability to leave violent situations. We can't talk about addressing violence against women without also talking about drug poisonings, without talking about housing insecurity and food insecurity. All of these factors lead to situations where women are not supported, don't have the ability to be able to leave violent situations, whether that be domestic or intimate-partner violence or whether that be sexual violence.

I appreciate the efforts that are made to bring forward law and order type of measures. This is a good bill. It can be better. But we cannot ignore all those other pieces that provide women the agency to be able to speak out when they experience violence and to also experience independence so that they can extricate but also not have to be in situations where they are facing violence. I'd like to encourage this government to look at this issue a little bit more holistically than only about law and order preventions. We have to be talking about poverty and financial security. When I read the reports of the children and young people who have been in the child intervention system and died from care, these issues are prevalent throughout. I encourage this government to consider these issues and to look into the issue more broadly.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on Bill 14 for second reading, the Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really appreciate the opportunity this evening to rise and to add a few comments. You know, like my friend from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, I now get the opportunity to try to follow up from two amazing colleagues who are lawyers. Frankly, it is a little bit intimidating, to say the least.

So far this evening I've heard some very, very great discussion about this bill, and it got me to thinking here just a little bit, and I feel like there's something I need to – I don't know if it's to get it off my chest or have it come out from my heart when listening to the story of this judge, the decisions the individual made around a case, and hearing about the comments: well, why didn't she keep her knees together? You know, Mr. Speaker, this is the 21st century, and quite frankly I don't understand why some men can't get their big-boy pants on and start owning up to the decisions that they make. But, more importantly, when are the rest of the men going to step up and call them out for it? That's the big hurdle there.

You know, I really believe – I guess this training, I'm hoping, will help, but there's a broader message here, as was said, you know, that kind of systemic issue, the societal issue: well, she made me do it. That's ridiculous. You decided. Start owning up to it, and the rest of us need to call those individuals out on it. I'm hoping that maybe within my lifetime we'll see that societal shift.

I guess one of the things that I wanted to briefly comment about on the bill: I agree fully with both of my colleagues. You know, we have a good bill here. I think it can be better. We have some opportunities here. The bill suggests that we train judges going forward. If I can be quite frank, Mr. Speaker, not good enough, okay? We also need to train the judges that we have here currently, right now. Everybody has seen these videos in the courtroom, these ridiculous outbursts that we've seen on cases. It's unacceptable, so we also need to deal with who we have right now.

Here's how I kind of – again, not being a lawyer, not having the opportunity to participate in that world, I have to try to relate it a little bit with my own. Before my life as an MLA I was responsible as the co-chair of the health and safety committee in my workplace. I was also responsible for all of the training of anybody who was going to operate power equipment within the plant, and that included a forklift, a power jack, you know, anything else that required moving stuff around. It wasn't enough for me to just simply train them once and then that was done. We had to renew that training on a regular basis.

Now, here's the thing. I found that there were times when I retrained individuals on a forklift and then when they go to do the test again, they're doing some strange things that I never taught them to begin with and were not acceptable. Actually, there was even one time where an individual passed the training with flying colours, and a month later I see them in the middle of the freezer spinning doughnuts on a forklift. I pulled the person's certificate right there. I think through Bill 14 we have an opportunity not only, again, to get future judges training but the current personnel that are available to us right now.

We also need to come up with some kind of ongoing training system on a regular basis to make sure that the information is current, nothing has changed, and that they're still actually indeed practising what they originally learned to begin with. As I said, all it takes is one to kind of, you know, make all those efforts useless for all the work that we put in.

But it's not enough just to put that in place. There's a responsibility on government to be able to fund that ongoing training as well, so my hope is that the government is looking at not only actually funding because, as my colleagues have pointed out, we've seen some reductions in funding in the justice system. There are a lot of problems right now. I hear it from folks within the system. As it is now, there's some trouble brewing, you know, with prosecutors. I'm certainly hoping the government is going to be able to work their way through that so that we don't have any kinds of disruptions and any other larger problems.

My hope is that as we move through the process of debate, as was mentioned, and get into Committee of the Whole – I think my colleagues have some very, very good suggestions which could make this even better. I mean, let's not just settle for mediocre. Let's, you know, as they say, shoot for the Cadillac because by not doing that, we're doing a disservice to Albertans. For the victims, as my colleagues have pointed out, who struggle for a very, very long time trying to process what they've gone through to finally get to the point where they can maybe tell somebody and seek justice and restoration, only to hit a brick wall once they get to the system would be just incredibly, incredibly disappointing.

I do hope that as maybe we craft some of these suggestions, the government will look very seriously at them. Again, we have an opportunity not just for our future judges but what we have currently providing service to us here in the province right now as well as a continuous ongoing program to, I guess, to some degree, recertify individuals so that they still continue to practise the good things that they've learned around this. My hope is that we'll see some of that.

With that, I will conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to add comments to the debate this evening?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call on the minister to close debate.

[Motion carried; Bill 14 read a second time]

The Speaker: The deputy government whip.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move that the Assembly be adjourned until 9 a.m. Thursday, April 21, 2022.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

Prayers

The Acting Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideals but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 18

Utility Commodity Rebate Act

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity has risen.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a privilege to rise to move a critically important piece of legislation at second reading. I'm referring to Bill 18, the Utility Commodity Rebate Act.

We all know that Albertans have had a difficult time over the past two years. We've witnessed as much with our own eyes, and we've heard the stories from families, friends, and the constituents we represent. First there was the pandemic, accompanied by massive economic hardship and a historic crash in energy prices. Now, driven by geopolitical uncertainty, supply chain disruptions, and a federal government intent on sending spending through the roof, families and businesses are dealing with the worst inflation in decades, which has led to higher prices for everything from food to fuel. For many Albertans coping with steeper bills, the pressure on their wallet is becoming unbearable. Alberta's government has heard their calls for help, and we've moved quickly in response.

First and foremost, Bill 18 will provide Albertans with some desperately needed fiscal relief. On March 17 we announced electricity rebates to protect families, farmers, and businesses from the worst effects of skyrocketing energy prices. These rebates will provide $50 a month for three months to compensate for the higher cost of electricity experienced in January, February, and March. That amounts to $150 in critical assistance for nearly 2 million homes, farms, and small businesses so that they can have some relief on their utility bills. The best part: this rebate doesn't need any complicated application process or confusing documents. We're working with retailers so it will go directly onto their bills, saving Albertans time and money. Families shouldn't have to go into debt to cover their basic living expenses or have to make the choice between putting food on the table or keeping their lights on, and small businesses struggling to recover from the worst effects of the pandemic shouldn't have to cope with even more burdens from energy inflation.

Amid these challenging times we are taking real action to make life a little bit easier for everyone. Our proposed legislation will create a mechanism that lets us roll those rebates out to Albertans swiftly and effectively. Through this bill we are integrating utility commodities under a single legislative framework. The Natural Gas

Price Protection Act does not allow for rebates on electricity. In the interests of efficiency, Bill 18 will replace the original natural gas protection act in order to implement both rebates under the same act. Under this new legislation Alberta's government will have the tools to respond to these high prices we've been seeing and provide much-needed relief to families and businesses. It's not just the right thing to do. Heat and electricity are essentials. They're key to getting through an Alberta winter, and they're an unavoidable cost for just about every small business. This legislation ensures that we can move quickly and effectively to support Albertans against high commodity prices. Alberta's economic recovery and Albertans' peace of mind demand nothing less.

Since the beginning of the pandemic we've been ready with emergency measures for difficult situations, and at this time of price uncertainty that's not going to change. You can see that in other steps we've taken to make life more affordable for Albertans, like removing the provincial fuel tax at the pumps. Later this spring we will be introducing legislation to enable unlimited self-supply of energy with the option to export as well as energy storage. These new tools will help increase competition, add more supply, and bring down energy prices over time. Our government is also reviewing the province's distribution and transmission policies, and we're working with agencies and industry partners to maximize system efficiency to make sure we're getting everything we can out of ratepayer dollars.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a single conversation that I have about utilities that doesn't start and end with affordability. At a time when we have a federal government that is determined to hammer the pocketbooks of families, retirees, and students for just heating homes and, of course, a hangover from the ideologically driven policies of the NDP, this government is stepping up. Unfortunately, we were handed a broken system by the previous government thanks to their short-sighted approach to energy policy. They spent $7.5 billion on transmission. Seven point five. We all know that new transmission is needed at times, and maintenance, of course, has to be done, but to send such a massive amount when it was clear our economy couldn't support it: an absolute shame. Albertans will be footing the bill of that mistake for years.

To give the members opposite some credit, they were not guilty of starting that overbuild, but they were absolutely guilty of not stopping it. They approved the build-out during the years they sat on this side of the House. They can't blame anyone but themselves for that, Mr. Speaker. When we came into office, we stopped it, and we are making sure that taxpayer and ratepayer dollars are treated with the respect they deserve. Fiscal responsibility is critically important when it comes to the electricity grid, and that's a quality that the previous government lacked on all fronts.

Adding onto that $7.5 billion loss, their ideological agenda and dedication to their leftist extremist friends lost Albertans another $1.3 billion through the Balancing Pool. Again, Mr. Speaker, fiscal responsibility is not a luxury for government; it is a necessity.

To top it off was their job-killing carbon tax, forcing families to pay to put the lights on. We put a stop to that, too, Mr. Speaker. All of these are contributing factors as to why Albertans are being forced to pay such high utility bills right now, and all are examples why we cannot let the NDP near our electricity grid ever again.

We are committed to fixing those mistakes and to providing real support to Albertans while we do that. Bill 18 will enable us to provide that support. Mr. Speaker, Bill 18, the Utility Commodity Rebate Act, is part of the suite of measures we're taking to maintain energy affordability in both the short term and the long term. From fiscal responsibility in the transmission and distribution systems to modernizing our grid to allow more supply, the tsunami of new generation that is set to come online, we're looking for ways to improve affordability at every turn. At this current turn it is the rebates that we can offer to Albertans through the Utility Commodity Rebate Act.

I urge the members of this Assembly to support Bill 18 so we can start to implement the promised electricity and natural gas rebates and get the money into people's pockets. I would say that this is our duty as elected officials, to see this bill passed and get these rebates out as quickly as we can. Albertans deserve nothing less.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, we have an opposition – a hostile opposition – that is fighting us at every turn. I came into this Chamber last night at 7:30. I stood in front of those cameras, and I asked for unanimous consent so that we could go to second reading of Bill 18. Do you know what they said? No. They refused to go to second reading of a bill that will get $280 million worth of supports out to Albertans.

Now, really, should we be surprised? Let's go back a couple of years. This was the caucus that filibustered a bill that would provide support to victims of human trafficking. That's right, Mr. Speaker. Victims of human trafficking, and they filibustered it. So we should not be surprised that the NDP is choosing to filibuster this. Now, I'm going to give them one more chance. This is a piece of legislation that will provide . . . [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. minister. There are lounges. I'm hearing a lot of conversations happening, so I was wondering if maybe those individuals having those conversations could take them out to the lounges on either side of the House. The individual with the call is the hon. minister, and as everybody knows, there will be an opportunity to respond as well.

Please, hon. minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I guess they're laughing because they think it's funny that Albertans are struggling. Well, we don't think it's funny.

I'm going to give them one more chance. The Chief Justice will be in this Legislature at 3 p.m., and with their help we can get royal assent on that bill. We can push this piece of legislation through that will get $280 million into the pockets of Albertans. But in order to do that, we're going to need them to work with us. At 3 o'clock this afternoon I encourage the NDP – no, Mr. Speaker; I invite the NDP to work with us to help get $280 million into the pockets of all Albertans. This is not the piece of legislation that you want to filibuster. This is the piece of legislation that you will want to support. I implore them. I invite them. Now, I can appreciate that the Energy file is a difficult file for the NDP, and not because their Energy critic doesn't know the price of electricity. That's part of it, but the Energy file is difficult for the NDP because they bungled it so badly.

I will be releasing an audit later on today that has audited the Balancing Pool's $1.3 billion losses that happened on their watch. Now, just to put it into perspective, the Balancing Pool was an agency that actually contributed $4 billion back to ratepayers until the NDP decided to use it to pursue their ideological agenda. I know they're angry. They should be. They should be angry at themselves for doing this to Albertans, but this is a chance for them to show all Albertans that they will support them in their time of need. Mr. Speaker, $280 million: we would like to get it into the pockets of Albertans as soon as possible.

Please, Mr. Speaker, through you to the hon. members, stop the gaslighting. Help us get this money into the pockets of Albertans, because they're struggling.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Are there any individuals looking to join the debate? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has risen.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I think, since the minister raised it, that it's worth discussing what our duty to Albertans is in this place. I think that duty starts with trust and it starts with honesty. That minister could certainly learn a few lessons about both of those things.

Ms Issik: Point of order.

Ms Ganley: We were sent here to fight for Albertans, and no matter . . .

The Acting Speaker: A point of order has been called. I see the government whip has risen.

Point of Order Allegations against a Member

Ms Issik: Under 23(h), (i), and (j). I think that she just basically told us that the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity was a liar or misleading the House.

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Clearly, this is not a point of order. The member did not either say that they're a liar or imply that in any way whatsoever; it simply was debate about the level of trust that this government has with the people of this province. Clearly, evidence would indicate that there is good reason to believe that that is a debatable point and one which we will continue to bring up in this House.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: I don't have the benefit of the Blues. I believe that there was something in there with regard to that it could have been abusive language. However, that wasn't the point of order. I didn't hear it quite perfectly, whether it was directed at the government or the minister individually. I think that if it was something that was directed individually at the minister, then perhaps there's an apology there. But I don't have the benefit of the Blues, and I don't have perfect recollection of what was exactly stated.

What I will do is that I will take this opportunity, however, to remind all members that in order for us in this House to have effective debate and do our jobs effectively, obviously, decorum is required. I think that there have been a few comments that have been made, from all sides, that have worked against decorum. I would just take this opportunity to remind all members that effective debate is the goal.

At this point the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has the call.

Debate Continued

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Let us begin with what this bill does. It sets up a framework to allow a rebate. What does this bill not do? It doesn't guarantee a timeline and it doesn't guarantee a rebate, and that is precisely the concern that our Official Opposition has. It is our duty to stand up for those thousands of Albertans who are writing in to us who are struggling with the rising cost of living due directly to decisions of this UCP government.

They removed the cap on electricity. Electricity rates have skyrocketed. They made decisions around insurance that have caused insurance rates to skyrocket as a result of removing the cap, and then they attempted to hide the report that proved it so that Albertans couldn't see. No one, Mr. Speaker, trusts this government to move forward with this file, so the fact that we are in a position where literally no member of the opposition has spoken to the bill yet and the associate minister is trying to pass it off to Albertans as a filibuster is absolutely absurd.

Let's begin with the history of this file. In the fall, when this Official Opposition began calling on this government to do something about electricity prices, the associate minister rose in this House and said before all members of this Assembly, on Hansard, on the record, that he planned to do absolutely nothing – nothing – because skyrocketing prices, Albertans unable to afford their bills were just the market working.

Fast-forward a little bit and we have the government announcing that they're going to do a natural gas rebate. I'm sure that was a great relief to many Albertans in this province who were struggling. Except, Mr. Speaker, the program wasn't real. The government came in, they introduced a budget, and they introduced a program that wasn't going to help Albertans now. It wasn't going to help them until next fall. And when they introduced it, they didn't even introduce it with its own line item of funding because they were hoping that they could hide from Albertans the fact that there was no money allocated to it. Now, they claim it's part of some giant contingency slush fund, but all that is is an attempt to obfuscate from Albertans, an attempt to hide what's actually going on.

So we had the fake natural gas rebate, and the government is still claiming that they are going to do precisely nothing on electricity. Then suddenly they changed their minds. Now they want to do electricity. Now suddenly it matters. That's fine. They come forward with a rebate that their own members have referred to as paltry because it barely touches – it barely touches – the hundreds and thousands of dollars that some Albertans are behind on their bills.

We drafted legislation, legislation that would prevent those Albertans from being disconnected from their utilities. That disconnection ban lifted on April 15. The government refused to hear from us. They refused to even debate it. They refused to have a conversation about it because they didn't think it mattered.

We went into session on February 22. It's not quite two months ago, Mr. Speaker, but it's pretty close. It's pretty close: February 22. We've been in session for two months, and two months later the government comes racing forward with this bill, a bill which is essentially copied and pasted, with minor alterations to include electricity, from a bill that existed in 2001, and we are led to believe that now suddenly this is an emergency. The same government that mere months ago was claiming that this was something they shouldn't do anything about, that this was just the market working, is now telling us that it's an emergency, that they need to rush this legislation, that took them two months to copy and paste, through the House without doing our due diligence on behalf of Albertans.

Now, I know that this government likes to claim that they were sent here with the biggest mandate. But, Mr. Speaker, the Official Opposition was sent here for a reason, too. We were sent here to hold this government to account, and this government has proved on file after file after file that they can't be trusted. They come forward, they say, "Trust us; trust us on curriculum; trust us on public health care; trust us on education," and they proved untrustworthy on every single one of those files. On everything that has come forward that is of importance to Albertans, they have proven that they cannot be trusted.

They rescinded the 1976 coal policy with the stroke of a pen with no announcement. They didn't tell people what was coming. Then they brought it back in and claimed they cancelled all the leases except that they didn't cancel all the leases; they cancelled some of the leases. Mr. Speaker, the list goes on and on and on.

So I think it is our duty in this place to take the time necessary to attempt to improve this legislation, improve it because, again, the legislation is a framework that enables. It does not require the government to do anything, so we are simply meant to take on faith that this government, which has dragged its heels over months, which has waffled back and forth on whether or not Albertans need help or deserve help with respect to the costs that this government has foisted upon them – we're just supposed to trust that they're going to do that?

Suddenly it's an emergency? This government has had months – months and months and months – of doing precisely nothing on this file, but because the associate minister woke up yesterday and decided to copy and paste some legislation, suddenly it's an emergency? Mr. Speaker, it has been an emergency for months. This government has had the capacity to do something about it for months, and they have chosen not to. So to come before this place and claim that the problem isn't a government that has dragged its feet for months and months, that the problem is an Official Opposition filibustering by not even yet having spoken to the bill is just preposterous.

I think there are a few other things that ought to be addressed in the associate minister's comments because I think that it is worth setting the record straight. Let us begin back with the previous Conservative government and a series of bills, bills, Mr. Speaker, which built transmission lines, bills that the NDP opposition objected to in the strongest possible terms. We warned Conservative governments of the day that this would cost Albertans money, that Albertans would be paying for those transmission lines for decades, that they were not necessary. We warned them, and they didn't listen. They didn't listen, and they forged ahead with their ideological bent, ensuring that money was going to their friends.

So they forged ahead with those lines, and, yes, Mr. Speaker, they did result in an overbuild. But the suggestion is that when the NDP government came into office in 2015, we ought to have – what? – gone and ripped them out with our bare hands? The Conservatives had already built them. Contracts were signed. There was no getting the money back. In addition, I think it's worth noting that if you go to the projections – and these are documents that exist. If you go to the projections in terms of what projected transmission growth was and how it scaled down under our government, it proves definitively that the associate minister is – let me be charitable here and say: deeply confused about his own file.

This government is, you know, trying to blame everyone but themselves. Mr. Speaker, in addition to this, we saw a report come out yesterday from the University of Calgary that talked about why electricity costs have skyrocketed, and it is because profits have quintupled. That is the cause according to this paper by the University of Calgary, according to objective analysis, but the government doesn't want to talk about that. The government wants to wave their hands and make up stories and talk about things that never happened.

Mr. Speaker, I think the other thing worth noting, the difference between this government and the NDP when we were in government: every decision we made was made in the best interest of Albertans, of regular people walking around out there, because that was what we were focused on. That is who we were sent here to serve. The government could really stand to remember that when they stand up in this place and they try to create stories about why things are happening when they have been in power for nearly three years – nearly three years – and they think that they are in a position to blame literally everyone else for problems which they created.

[Mr. Reid in the chair]

Mr. Speaker, the idea that this legislation is the only possible way forward is completely disingenuous. There are multiple ways that this government could have proceeded. In addition, if this government's plan was to use this legislation, they could have introduced it on the 22nd of February. We're currently in April. This is a huge concern, the idea that they couldn't possibly have drafted the legislation any faster, that the Official Opposition has to let it fly through the House despite the fact that it doesn't contain any requirement to provide a rebate, any requirement to provide a rebate on a certain timeline, any requirement about who is getting the rebate. Yes, it's legislation that existed before. It existed in 2001. Yes, the government has altered it to include electricity, and that is just fine. But it's worth discussing the fact that the government had alternate policy options.

When the NDP was in government, we had a rate cap. That rate cap was already in place. They repealed it. They could have brought it back. They could have distributed the money directly to Albertans. If this was the mechanism they chose – and that's their choice; they're the government; they can choose any mechanism they like – they could have brought this legislation before this House on the 22nd of February. If – I don't know – they were still working to get their act together, which seems to be a pretty consistent problem on behalf of this government – maybe they were arguing about which one it is. Maybe they just couldn't focus on this file because they were too focused on their leadership review. Who knows why it took so long? Mr. Speaker, even if that was the case, the leadership review happened on the 9th of April. They could have sent us the legislation to look it over. They could have had that conversation with the Official Opposition. They could have given their own members the heads-up that they intended to move this ahead.

The associate minister tries to write this off as a filibuster. Mr. Speaker, I was in the House last night. I saw a bill get called and the Minister of Finance rise to move that bill and the associate minister come running in and jumping up in front of him. Even their own members didn't know that he planned to ask for unanimous consent to move that forward, so the idea that the Official Opposition ought to have known is preposterous.

Mr. Speaker, I think this is a government with a demonstrated lack of concern for the lives of Albertans. We have seen the associate minister over and over again rise in this place and belittle those concerns, belittle the costs that Albertans are facing, belittle the struggles that Albertans have when choosing whether to keep the lights on or whether to buy their groceries. Those are concerns that the Official Opposition has been listening to, that we have been raising, that we have been bringing forward for months now, and the government has been ignoring it.

Then they announced a natural gas rebate. It was a fake program. It wasn't even coming in until next fall. They didn't anticipate that it would spend any money at all. They said on electricity: they didn't need to do anything about it, that struggling Albertans was the market working. Then they come forward and say that they're going to provide an electricity rebate but no timelines, no mechanism, no discussion of when any of that is going to happen. Then we all wait. We wait for weeks and weeks and weeks. Then the associate minister, finally, five weeks later, manages to copy someone else's homework and brings forward a bill, a bill that guarantees nothing, and comes running into this House and expects the Official Opposition to pass it with zero scrutiny, with zero concern for the fact that we are passing legislation that doesn't guarantee anything.

We could pass this legislation, and then the minister could decide not to provide the direction to the companies, and there would be no rebate, Mr. Speaker. We could pass this legislation, and there still wouldn't be – and the minister himself admitted it. He admitted it in a news conference. He was asked when this rebate would be in the hands of Albertans, and he said: well, um, you know, we're kind of hoping that the companies will work with us, and we kind of hope that maybe it's going to come out in June, but maybe it might be July. I think this idea, especially with the minister having admitted before the media that the soonest they could possibly get this rebate out the door is June, that somehow the fact that this bill wasn't passed in under six hours is the holdup, that that's the problem, is just absurd. What it is is an associate minister who is embarrassed . . . [interjection] I am happy to give way, but I am the first speaker, so no; no giving way.

9:30

The Acting Speaker: There are no interventions at this point. Thank you.

Ms Ganley: Sorry.

This is an associate minister who is, I mean, essentially embarrassed by his mishandling of the file, and he is attempting to blame it on everyone else. Well, I don't think, Mr. Speaker, that we're willing to let him do that, and I don't think that Albertans are going to buy it. I really don't think that Albertans are going to buy it. It's clear that Albertans have been asking this government about this issue for months, and the government has been failing to respond to them. So I think the attempts to blame everyone else and to claim that it's someone else's fault – I mean, add to that the fact that the associate minister is in charge. It is his file. The person who is responsible for doing something about the file is him, but he has chosen to do nothing.

You know what, Mr. Speaker? They can fling whatever they want at us. They can throw whatever wild allegations and bizarre stories their minds can invent to try and deflect from their complete and abject failure on this file, to try and deflect from their total incompetence in bringing forward this legislation, but Albertans aren't going to buy it, and it certainly will not make me sit down and stop standing up for the constituents I was sent here to serve. It certainly will not make my colleagues stop standing up for the Albertans we were sent here to serve, because those Albertans are struggling. They are struggling under UCP policies, UCP policies that have seen taxes rise, that have seen insurance rise, that have seen utility costs rise, tuition rise – the cost of borrowing on that tuition has risen – all due to the decisions of this government.

We will not stop standing up for those Albertans because whatever – whatever – the associate minister thinks he was sent here for, we on this side were sent here for Albertans. We were sent here to stand up on behalf of Albertans and to ensure that their voices are heard in this place. Nothing that they can create, no story that they can manufacture will make us stop doing that. I sincerely believe that Albertans understand the truth of this matter, that Albertans know who is on their side and who is standing up for them.

I would urge the government to take a more genuine approach to this file and to start talking about the real reasons that underly the concerns, to begin being willing to work with Albertans and with the Official Opposition and with experts in the public. There are solutions. If this government can just stop standing up with their ideological bent and start listening to Albertans and listening to ideas and having rational conversations, there is a way forward, Mr. Speaker.

With that, I will say, you know, that I sincerely hope that we can get this done and I sincerely hope that this government starts taking their duty to the people of this province a little more seriously.

The Acting Speaker: Are there other members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill. Of course, it is the right of members of this Legislature to speak to the bill, and this is our very first chance to do so, in spite of the fact that we have been accused of filibustering a bill that we hadn't even had a chance to speak to. I guess, you know, as well as other things that I keep suggesting we send over to the government side of the House, perhaps we can include a dictionary. This is a very interesting bill to look at, particularly when we want to look at the history of this bill and how it arrived in this House and what has led up to this moment.

First of all, we know that the UCP is doing exactly what the UCP always does, coming too late and coming with too little for the people of the province of Alberta, just like they did in so many other areas, of course, most noticeably COVID, which resulted in a significant increase in the number of deaths in this province as compared to the per population rates of deaths in other provinces.

The same thing is happening here in terms of utility rebates. First of all, we have to remember that it was just last year that the government brought in a bill on this very same topic and failed to do it right in the first place. Again, just like they have with many other pieces of legislation, they've had to come in and correct themselves and change their own bills within the year. We've had a number of examples of that, and often it's just because they are completely on the wrong side of the issue; for example, with coal mines. When the people of Alberta clearly told them that they had to do something that they did not want to do, of course, they came in in that case and did too little too late, as they have in so many other situations in this province and in this Legislature.

Here we are reading a bill that could easily have been introduced a year ago, when these discussions were first happening. But what did the associate minister of gas say to this House when he was asked at the time about whether we should do something? He said that what they were going to do is absolutely nothing, and he emphasized the word "nothing." Then he went on further to explain that it's just the market doing what the market does, and the market is working perfectly, and therefore we won't intervene. We know that the natural position of this government and this minister is not to protect Albertans, is not to stand up and take responsibility for things but, rather, to allow the whims of circumstance to have a serious effect on Albertans without any kind of attempt by the government to do something about it and protect Albertans at a time when they need some protection from the circumstances of the era.

In this case, in fact, the government could have simply chosen to do nothing from the beginning because there was a rate cap in place. If they had done nothing, as they said they were going to do, then Albertans would have been protected to this very day. The legislation was already put in place by the previous NDP government, and that rate cap would have made sure that people already now in 2022 – in fact, it would have been in place in 2021 – would have been receiving those kind of protections that now this government is trying to figure out how to get to. Too little too late.

I think this is interesting, that we know what their position is. We know that they removed the protections for Albertans. We know that they said that they were going to do nothing. We know that they said that was just the market doing whatever it was going to do. Suddenly this morning we have the associate minister making statements such as – and I wrote this down at the moment, so I'm going to quote it – Albertans should not have to choose between "putting food on the table or keeping their lights on."

I can tell you that having come from academia recently, before I got elected, if that kind of statement were made in an academic setting, you'd be charged with plagiarism for taking somebody else's speech. I think that this minister fails to acknowledge that that kind of comment, that kind of statement, has actually been taken from and borrowed from the opposition, who've been asking for this for a long time for these very, very reasons.

Suddenly we have the minister go against all of his instincts and arrive in this House quoting the words of the opposition and other people and suddenly see the light on why they are wrong in this piece of legislation, just as they have been with so many others such as COVID and coal mines and so on. [interjection] I will cede.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you. You know, correct me if I'm wrong, but I think we just saw this bill introduced on our desks yesterday, right? I would suggest as well that it's not an insubstantial money bill, which is fine. I mean, we do want to make life easier for millions of Albertans in regard to their energy costs. I think that's a given, but we will have to work out just how much money this is – right? – and to make sure that it is spent and is disbursed in the most equal and efficient way possible. So I think amongst the many questions that I have is: what are those mechanisms? What are those ways by which we can execute what's obviously needed and do it in the most efficient way possible?

Mr. Feehan: I'd like to thank the member for that intervention because I think it does highlight a significant point, and that is the fact that while this government is now saying this morning that this is really important and that they need to subvert democracy in this province in order to move this forward, it's clear that they have done nothing to prepare for this moment, including the fact that they have just introduced the budget into this House in which there is no specific line item dedicated to this particular topic. So it tells me that there has been no real planning here in this event.

The government did not actually sit down and cost out the costs that are involved in this particular case, and they did not look at the fact that were the rate cap in place right now, Albertans would already have been benefiting from the legislation that was already in existence in the House. They didn't cost out for Albertans what the actual expenses of their delayed and problematic introduction of legislation is at this particular time.

You know, we have done a number of things to try to make sure that Albertans are in good shape in this province and are able to get through these difficult kinds of times, but this government, of course, has failed to stand up any time with that. For example, we brought in some legislation to try to extend the disconnection ban for people who are struggling at this particular time. Did this government stand up and support that? No, they did not. They did everything they could in their power to ensure that that did not happen in this House and that the legislation did not proceed forward. We know their actions speak louder than their words, that they have failed to put money into the budget for this, they have failed to plan for this, they have actually taken away the protections, and they've failed to put in new protections that have been suggested by the opposition side of the House.

In fact, we see this happening all the time. They've taken the rate cap off not only electricity but also insurance, and then in that case they hid the report that would demonstrate the fact that their move in that particular case was again hurting Albertans unnecessarily because it turns out the insurance companies were receiving great, significant profits and didn't need to have the rate cap removed from the insurance company point of view. You know, I think it is really problematic that we find ourselves in this place, and it's really discouraging to see a government try to subvert democracy by trying to eliminate the process by which the people's representatives can actually question a bill that's being brought forward and then complaining that somehow, without even having spoken to the bill, we're filibustering the bill.

Yet if it was that important, why would the government not have put into the bill some timelines for the actual implementation of the bill and the processes that will allow that to happen? It's really important for them to not talk about it in the Legislature, but it's not important for them to actually give the rebate to Albertans. There's no timeline that forces them to do that. We know that even if we did filibuster, which of course is an absurd thing to be saying – let's say that we took two months – it still wouldn't change the date at which Albertans got the rebate because the rebate would be coming out in June or July at best, at a time when utility bills are not at their highest.

You know, what Albertans needed is they needed some help this winter. It was a very difficult winter for many Albertans. Costs were going up in many ways, many of those directly related to government actions in this House: taking the caps off utilities, taking the caps off insurance, and generally just imposing difficulties on citizens in this province. They didn't stand up, and they didn't do that kind of thing.

Now, we know that the minister has complained that the NDP were involved in . . . [interjection] Oh, I'm sorry. Yes, I will cede.

Member Loyola: Please don't be sorry. I was so enthralled with your comments and insights. Of course, I know that many of my constituents have been reaching out to me on this particular issue. You were speaking specifically about help directly for Albertans this winter. I was wondering if you could speak a little bit about some of the e-mails, correspondence, phone calls that you've been getting at your constituency office regarding this particular issue, Member.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you to the member. Of course, you know that I have received many, many such e-mails and so on, as I'm sure you have and I'm sure the government members have. In fact, we know they have because they're often CCed to us on the opposition side because they've heard so little back from their own MLAs.

People have indicated that they have had problems with situations, including one situation, a very difficult situation in my constituency, where someone simply ended up losing their house and having to move into an apartment because they simply couldn't pay their utility bill living on a fixed income for many years now. That fixed income has not gone up because, of course, government policy has kept the income fixed, and as a result they simply had to make the decision that they could no longer afford to live in a house and had to move to an apartment where the utility bills were included, and therefore the total cost to them was significantly smaller. You know, it's just one individual personal tragedy, but of course it's been duplicated time and time again, as we know from the many letters we've received about people who have not been able to survive this winter and could have used support from the government over the last six months to get through this difficult time.

I know that the associate minister has complained about the cost being related to transmission, which he admits in this House was actually something that was proposed by the Conservative government at the time and opposed by the NDP government. Then he goes on to complain that the NDP government didn't actually trash the decisions of the previous government when we were in office, which, you know, is a fascinating way to talk about how government should proceed, that it's our fault that we didn't stop them from being bad. That kind of thinking is something that I think is problematic.

Of course, in the same breath he complains about the fact that when we did make some changes in the Balancing Pool, it turned out that they had put a poison pill into the contracts, so it cost us some money. He's actually suggesting that we should have done in this case what he says we should not have done in the other case, so clearly he is confused. Clearly, he does not have a logical approach to whether contracts should be cancelled or not. You know, he's simply using these as talking points in order to pull the long con that we see happening here with the people of Alberta.

This government has not stood up and been on the side of Albertans, and now they try to pull this ridiculous process here in the House where they prevent the representatives of the people of Alberta from even questioning the bill and then complain out loud to the public that somehow we are stopping the bill from proceeding when, in fact, anybody who understands the process of parliamentary democracy understands that that is not in the least bit true. [interjection] Sorry. An intervention? Yes.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Member, and thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford's comments on this bill and was hoping that the member could talk a little bit about timelines. We've talked about when – I know that the previous speaker had mentioned when an iteration of this bill first was tabled in the Chamber many, many years ago. But just looking at the timelines around when the Official Opposition was calling for supports and real help for Albertans as prices were skyrocketing and the fact that this bill, Bill 18, was tabled yesterday and in a passionate and off-putting speech the minister on one hand was attacking the Official Opposition and in his next breath asking for the support of the Official Opposition to pass this bill expediently through the Chamber – yet when could this government have brought forward a bill of this nature? When could they or should they have acted? I would love to hear the member's thoughts.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you to the member for that intervention. I think it is clear – and it does need to be repeated again in this House – that this government has had plenty of opportunity to bring this forward. It was at least in the fall that we were standing up in this House asking for the government to take action on utilities. That's when we were told that they would do nothing, words from the associate minister's own mouth, and we were told that this was just the market doing what the market does and that they wouldn't interfere with the market.

We know that they've had at least six months to work on this, to get this together. In fact, they could have done this all when they introduced the first failed bill, and now they're introducing the second failed bill. We know that if it was really that important to them, they could have done it in the first week we were back in the House, and that's almost two months ago. Two months ago they could have come in and resolved this and got money in people's pockets at the time they needed it most, in the middle of winter, when they really needed to protect their homes from the assault of the difficult winter that we had. So there's been plenty of time here now, and the government is trying to divert people's attention away from the fact that they have failed to act. They've acted last and they've acted least again, as they tend to in almost all situations that are important to citizens in this province.

I think that it's really shameful of the government to be in this place where they are blaming Albertans for wanting democracy to actually occur in the process of protecting Albertans at a time when rebates or some other kind of intervention is necessary. They could, of course, if they wanted to, go back to the really good, decent legislation that was previously in existence under the NDP government and put a rate cap back on the utilities. It would be a great situation here in this province if we had done that because we would have been able to see not only the utility companies making a reasonable profit at all times through that process, but we would have seen Albertans being protected from huge increases. I can tell you that many Albertans have told me that the increase in their utility bills has been in excess of 100 per cent over the period of time.

This is the kind of thing that I think is problematic. This is the kind of thing I think this government should take some responsibility for. Unfortunately, this government's failure to take responsibility in this case is no surprise given their failure to take responsibility for almost any of the other really terrible pieces of legislation that they brought into this House. I may have to ask: why has this government not had its eye on the ball? Why is it rushing in at the last moment, trying to do something that they could easily have done in the fall sitting or could have done early on in this sitting, right in the middle of the winter that required people to pay these exorbitant utility bills?

The answer is, of course, that they were too busy being focused on their own internal fights, their own internal squabbles, and the leadership review in which their own leader has, apparently, less than 35 per cent of the support of the province of Alberta and, it would seem, has probably low levels of support even within the party. But, you know, we all have to wait now. We all have to wait until mid-May, when the results of their leadership review are over, before we see a government actually focused on governing, and that's a shame. That is something that's very problematic. Democracy has really been taking a hit under this government, has taken a hit in terms of the government trying to move ahead in this particular case without actual proper debate, as they have in other situations. It's taken a hit every time the... [Mr. Feehan's speaking time expired]

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Other members wishing to enter the debate? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to provide a few comments at the second reading stage – I am the third speaker at this stage – of the Utility Commodity Rebate Act. I am one of the first speakers to provide some comments from the floor of the Legislature for this matter proposed by Executive Council. It is up to all members – it is indeed our right – to discuss this bill and to propose amendments to this bill for, you know, a period of time whereby all of us members, private members, feel that the people's work is done and we have represented our constituents appropriately.

I was reflecting last night, Mr. Speaker, on why it is that the province seems so unwilling – they're able – to solve the problems that are preoccupying ordinary Albertans right now, whether it's insurance or electricity and natural gas prices. I went back to some notes that I took in 2019 after watching the prosecution of the campaign by what has now become the modern conservatives and certainly a movement that is untethered from its previous iterations as something of a brokerage party.

In the modern conservative movement losing in theatre is the goal on public policy. On any matter of public policy it's fine not to solve the problem because that will then destabilize our faith in institutions, in politics, democracy, what we can do collectively.

You know, it's just this constant process of working the refs, of dumping money on lawyers' lawns for fool's errand Supreme Court references that are just a spectacular loss in terms of the carbon tax, in terms of yelling at various external actors. We certainly see this as a feature, not a bug, of modern conservative parties throughout western Europe as well. There's always a bogeyman. It's usually taking a page – our playbook here took a page out of Orbán's playbook, certainly, in Hungary, blaming someone else, external actors, foreign-funded, shadowy figures. But for most political parties in the history of liberal democracies winning in practice should be the goal; that is to say, solutions should be the goal.

But that's not the goal, and continuing that politics of grievance is actually what we see playing out in this little micronarrative as well. I point us to last summer, when the hon. members were talking about: what was the timeline of the Official Opposition raising this issue? Well, I recall in the summer, during the heat wave, standing up with the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View discussing the spike in power prices and the risks to the grid and affordability during the heat wave in July. After that news conference we went and got something to eat, and we wrote out a list of possible actions the government could take. We pulled up a couple of industry experts on the phone and put them on speakerphone, ran a few things past them to get their thoughts. That's what winning in practice rather than losing in theatre looks like. It's trying to find solutions, and that is why people sent us here.

I go back to my notes from 2019, just after the election. You know, the UCP went into this election believing they would win 80 seats, but they didn't get that, and they won't get an easy ride in the Legislature either. They will be opposed by a group of women and men who are honest, hard-working, and practical, who will name it when they give gifts to their corporate friends, when they bring in policies that do not have people's best interests in mind. Those were my thoughts before coming into this Chamber in, whenever it was, May 2019. We see that kind of hubris of just refusing to solve a problem reflected in this budget.

The budget address: let's go to that, on February 24, 2022. On page 9 we see the slapdashery, the ad hockery of even grappling with this question of utility prices.

Pushing up costs for Albertans... has elevated concerns over the costs of utilities. To alleviate the fear of spiraling utility costs, and to allow Albertan's...

Misspelled.

... to benefit from an owned resource, budget 2022...

"Budget" is not capitalized, so clearly these paragraphs were not edited. [interjection] Yes, I will give way.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Member. I just really appreciate what you're focused on right now, and I just wanted to ask you to speak a little bit about the fact that the budgets themselves were established over the last couple of months and only introduced into the House fairly recently, and they did not include clear direction as per the bill that we're bringing in the House today. It seemed to indicate that at the time of writing the budget, while they certainly had been challenged on the opposition side of the House to do something about this on many occasions, they had not in fact planned to do this as recently as a month or so ago and didn't put a clear line in the budget to indicate that they wanted to do this. I wonder if you just might spend some time talking about what it is that you found as you looked through the budget about their really lackadaisical attitude toward this.

Ms Phillips: Yeah. I mean, when we looked at the budget documents, one of the first things we did was look for the line item of where this reference to the natural gas rebate would be. I'll go back to the speech on page 9:

... allow Albertan's ...

Misspelled.

... to benefit from an owned resource, budget 2022 implements a consumer price protection mechanism, similar to the measure Ralph Klien ...

Misspelled.

... put in place in 2006.

If natural gas prices exceed 6.50 a gigajoule, a utilities rebate will be triggered.

To be clear, the word "rebate," if one executes a simple control-F search in the budget speech, appears precisely once, and that's here.

This means Albertans needn't fear a run up in natural gas prices of the variety currently experienced in Europe and Asia.

Okay. Now, first of all, the government's own budget documents, their projections at the time, do not show at any point over the fiscal forecast period natural gas going up above $6.50. It is now for obvious reasons having to do with the geopolitical instability and the war in Ukraine.

Having said that, this was clearly shoved into this speech at the last minute because the, you know, grammatical car crashes that we see in this section do not appear in the rest of the speech. It's clear that the rest of the speech was drafted, and then somebody woke up sometime in mid-February and went: oh, I talked to a single Albertan one time, and they seemed really worried about utilities, so maybe we should shove something in here. When we then asked TBF officials during the briefing, "Okay; so where is the budget line item?" "Well, that doesn't exist." "So where is anything for electricity?" "Well, that doesn't exist." Just absolutely no grappling with what we had been hearing from people since the previous summer, as I described.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

We understood right away that the natural gas rebate was fake and the electricity rebate was invisible. Again, continuing grievance and blaming someone else is the point, not actually solving the problem. If the problem wanted to be solved, there was a piece of legislation that they had scrapped that they could pull off the shelf and bring back in, which was very clear of where the money was coming from and where it would be going to and what aspects of the bill would be affected in terms of our electricity bills, and that was the rate cap. [interjection] I recognize that my friend from Edmonton-Ellerslie would like to make an intervention.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, hon. member, and exactly that. I was hoping that you could cover a little bit more of the rate cap, how that actually worked in favour of Albertans when we were in government, and what you're hearing now from your constituents in terms of how they appreciated that rate cap when it came to their utility bills. I would be happy to hear more about that.

Ms Phillips: Indeed, the rate cap was for the actual use portion on people's bills, and I fully recognize that there are other parts of the bill, the transmission and distribution costs, which are different across the province for different types of consumers. However, that was one piece that could be affected. In fact, I heard from a constituent just yesterday, who phoned us up and said, "So where's this rebate that I've been hearing about?" and I have no more answers after the introduction of this bill than I had before the introduction of this bill, which says something about the quality of this legislation.

The minister said yesterday, "Oh, well, the electricity thing might happen, you know, in the next few months," and "Oh, the natural gas thing might happen next year." That's what he said in the news conference yesterday. There is no more clarity today than there was yesterday, and that is the fundamental failing of this bill. There's no one thing that you can point to and say: okay; here's how we were going to solve the problem. Again, solving the problem is not the point. Blaming someone else for our problems is the point.

Now, I've heard a little bit of other blame having to do with transmission and distribution, so I want to just put a few things on the record here because how quickly we forget. Let's go down memory lane. On November 25, 2009, Bill 50, the contentious piece of legislation that would remove the requirement for public hearings on new power lines, passed third and final reading.

Here's what Brian Mason, the great Brian Mason, had to say, with a mighty four-person opposition. Quote: I think people are going to be reminded of this every month when they get their power bill; it's almost like there's going to be a rider – PC arrogance, PC extravagance – on everybody's power bill every month. Sound familiar? Arrogance, extravagance: these are words now applied to this group of new Conservatives. For these guys it was after 35 years. For the new crop it barely took them 35 days to have those sorts of monikers applied to their approach.

Now, here we have Wildrose Alliance MLA Paul Hinman, a blast from the past: we needed a competitive and efficient power line, not one that's overbuilt, overpriced; it's not in the benefit of the Alberta advantage. Interesting.

Now we fast-forward to 2011, when the mighty Brian Mason releases a report saying that the Alberta NDP leader Brian Mason says that power bills will jump dramatically in the coming years as the government pushes ahead with massive new transmission lines. This is from April 21, 2011. [interjection] Yes, my hon. friend.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you. I just noticed that you're going back a little bit on this and indicating that it seems that government information was available quite some time ago about the potential for an increase in electricity increases and that the reason why the cap on our electricity was brought in under the previous government was, in fact, quite evident. I just wonder if you might speak to the fact that in spite of the evidence that was being provided clearly by the civil service at the time and would have been fully available to this government for the last three years, they chose not to intervene at any time in a three-year period and now suddenly they are trying to rush through a bill in the House in less than six hours. It seems the hypocrisy involved in that is quite extreme, and I think it's worth noting that when you've had three years and the evidence clearly available to you, doing things at the last second is not possible.

The Acting Speaker: Just before the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West continues, there are also two extra minutes added because that was your third intervention as well.

Ms Phillips: Okay.

The Acting Speaker: Perfect.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, you know, there's no question that it was known to this House and to the people of Alberta that those PC decisions that were taken in 2011 were going to have an effect over the long term. These are massive decisions, multibillion-dollar projects. They don't show themselves on people's bills overnight. Yet here we are in 2011. Mason pointed to a study done by the Alberta Direct Connect Consumer Association of large industrial power consumers. The study suggests the transmission costs on power bills are set to jump by 65 per cent in the next two years. Mason says that these hikes will happen because the province is overbuilding power lines.

Then later on May 9, 2011: Alberta's New Democrats say the provincial government is being willfully blind to evidence that new power line construction will send electricity bills through the roof. Mason said that it's time the province repealed legislation passed two years ago that allows cabinet to approve power line construction without public hearings if it deems the lines are necessary.

Now, of course, this minister has suggested that it would have been more prudent to cost the taxpayer billions of dollars extra by breaking contracts, which is not a way to welcome in new investments. It certainly does not inspire confidence in the power market, and it certainly would have undermined our ability to attract the lowest cost renewables in Canadian history or make sure that we had the right investment climate in place for coal-to-gas conversion, something that the Harper government failed to do in 2012, when they phased out 12 of our 16 coal-fired electricity plants, of which this Premier sat at the cabinet table, twiddled his thumbs, and did not give a thought to the workers that he would be affecting by those decisions of 12 of the 16 plants being phased out.

Be that as it may, now his idea is that we should have ripped up those contracts, yet this minister hasn't. Even though he rails about the coal-fired electricity phase-out, has he ripped up the contracts? He certainly has threatened to do so, not inspiring confidence for investment in renewables.

He has also sat by while the Minister of Environment and Parks raises the carbon tax on industrial emitters to $50 per tonne. Apparently, that's not really a carbon tax. It is. It's absolutely a price on carbon. They haven't repealed the carbon competitiveness, the output-based allocations program, none of those things.

So, again, solving the problem, however the problem is defined on the other side, is not the point. The constant grievance is the point. Theatre is the point. Artifice is the point for these modern conservatives, not actually meeting the concerns and solving the problems of ordinary people.

I will cast my mind back to right around the time of estimates debate when there was an audio that came from the Finance minister's town hall where a woman came to him and said: "I have thousands of dollars in utility costs. What are you going to do about it?" He said: "Yes. My wife tells me we also have thousands of dollars in utility costs." Anyway, he did not propose a solution to the problem. No wonder his budget address had this kind of slapdash, grammatically incorrect sop to caring, maybe in a perfunctory and performative way, about the rising cost of electricity. You notice even in the budget address it says: not to solve the problem, but to solve the fear of the problem. In other words, we're not going to do anything at all to help people.

So you'll have to pardon the Official Opposition, who were sent here to practically solve problems, who were sent here with the faith that we will put people first, that the point of being here is to focus on solutions, not grievance. You will have to forgive us for wondering out loud why now the Chief Justice is going to be used in some kind of performance art and some kind of kabuki theatre this afternoon at 3 o'clock to solve this particular issue.

We would happily have even come back into the House early because everyone knew that electricity and natural gas bills were rising. We would have happily come back into this House to solve that problem early in February, as we would have been just as happy to come back in here and make legislative amendments to the Traffic Safety Act so that we could clear out that $44-million-a-day disgrace that was happening down at the Coutts border and hurting the southern Alberta economy. We would have done that, too, because our job is to come in here and propose solutions, not to bang the pot of grievance.

So that is what we will focus on with our amendments, with the process. We will respect the rules of this House. We will not try to abuse the process. We will make sure we are doing the people's work. We will make sure that even while the Conservatives on the other side and this modern conservative movement just go around spinning false narratives, telling fairy tales, trying to scare people with, you know, a bogeyman of who we are and what we might be – they can go around telling all those tales about us, but guess what. We will tell the truth about them.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to rise and offer a few thoughts and share some views of constituents on this issue of Bill 18, the Utility Commodity Rebate Act, because as all of the previous speakers before me have mentioned, Albertans have been loud about the price of electricity and the price of natural gas, and they want the government to do something about it. I thought I'd first share some of the e-mails that I've received to my office in Edmonton-Gold Bar and then discuss the likelihood of this piece of legislation meeting the needs that the people of Edmonton-Gold Bar have identified.

The first e-mail that I'd like to share was sent to me on Monday, February 14 of this year, "Happy Valentine's Day; your electricity bill is a thousand dollars," essentially. It says:

Good afternoon . . .

I'm writing to you today expressing concern about the recent increase in utilities rates. My heat and power rates have more than doubled in the last month. I was quite shocked to see such an increase.

. . . So many families are struggling in this current environment, and unexpected charges like this can be incredible hardships for many.

I spoke to a neighbour whose bill was close to $1000 last month. And a fellow business owner who had to make the difficult choice of keeping an employee on staff or keeping the lights on in his business. Unfortunately he had to let an employee go. This is not sustainable for anyone.

I urge you to explore the increased charges so many Albertans are facing, and identify solutions to reel in the charges suppliers are grasping for.

That came from Lindsay, who is a resident of Edmonton-Gold Bar.

On February 8 I had another e-mail with the subject Concern regarding Utilities. It says:

My name is Serenity . . . and I am a full time University Student as well as a mother to two young children. I am writing to you today in order to highlight some concerns regarding the utility distribution charges here in Edmonton.

As you already know, times are tough right now, and Covid has hit our world hard. I am utterly disappointed to see how high the utility bills are becoming here in Edmonton. It feels as though the Utility companies are taking advantage of Albertans, and kicking us while we are already down.

Our usage of power, water and gas has been quite standard with only small fluctuations, yet my most recent bill is more than double what it usually is. $750 in utilities this month, with nearly $400 of that being distribution charges!

How are we supposed to feed our families when the cost of living is constantly rising, and most of us are on fixed incomes?

The price caps need to come back, Albertans deserve fair prices and shouldn't have to choose between heating our homes, or putting food on our tables!

I really appreciate you taking the time to read through my concerns, and I look forward to hearing from you!

All the best,
Serenity.

My heart goes out to this person because, of course, as a university student not only is she faced with the tremendous spike in electricity and natural gas prices, but the Minister of Advanced Education has jacked up her tuition and other related university fees as well. So she's been hit hard by a number of terrible policy decisions that this UCP government has made.

On February 15 I had an e-mail from Deb about unacceptable utility rates.

I am a homeowner . . . and I am writing to complain about the ridiculously high utility rates that I, and every other Albertan, is paying. I don't get charged all kinds of fees and distribution charges for my water, why do I pay more in charges and fees than the actual cost of the product for my gas and power?

On my latest bill (Statement date January 22, 2022), the cost for my electricity was $107.24, and I paid an additional $140.25 in charges & fees. The cost for my natural gas was $112.77 and I paid an additional $243.90 in fees and charges. More than twice the cost of the product. My senior mother, living in a 1 bedroom [apartment], receiving a $500/month subsidy to afford her rent . . .

Another piece of important government support that has been either frozen or cut by this terrible UCP government.

. . . was charged $79.71 for her billing period of [December 10, 2021, to January 11, 2022]. During that period, she was at my house for an entire week! She used 220 [kilowatt hours] of electricity and was charged over 16 cents per [kilowatt hour]. The cost of her electricity was $32.39, and she paid $47.32 in admin fees, distribution charges, transmission charges, etc.

Deb says that this is robbery. Yes, I did call Epcor and get my mom locked into a much lower rate for her electricity, but it's all of the additional charges that the average person cannot afford.

I hope that the associate minister listened to that last point very closely, because we've heard him stand up time and again and tell Albertans to just go to their utility and beg for lower rates, which does absolutely nothing to address the distribution charges that people are paying. So that's an important point that Deb raised for that.

She goes on to say that these incredible fees and charges have to stop. Albertans are being taxed and charged to death. I pay over $5,000 [a year] in property taxes, my provincial taxes go up and up . . .

Something that this government has refused to address.

You know what doesn't go up?

She goes on to say:

My income. Not one penny. So I would like to know what the province of Alberta is going to do to bring these fees and charges down. When will Albertans quit being [gouged] with unaffordable fees and charges for the basic utilities we all need?

An excellent question, Deb. I wish the associate minister had come into the House today with answers to that question, but unfortunately he did not.

That leads to the next point that I want to make that Deb raised in the last e-mail that I read into the record. When will Albertans see relief from high utility prices? Well, according to the piece of legislation that we have here in front of us for debate this morning, we don't know. Not only do we have no indication from the piece of legislation that we're debating here this morning; the associate minister – sorry; I forget his title – had no further answers when he introduced this legislation in a press conference yesterday afternoon.

Now, I managed to catch a couple of clips from that press conference, and it was so uniquely bad, Mr. Speaker, that you could have sworn that it was ripped from the television show Veep or one of these other political satires. It was so terrible that you would have to believe that it was fiction, because you wouldn't think that any minister would actually hold a press conference and embarrass himself so badly in front of the entire province of Alberta.

He was asked over and over again: when will people see the rebates? He couldn't provide any answers. He refused to answer the question. The best that he could come up with is that maybe, if we go to the utility companies on our hands and knees and beg them to co-operate with the government, we might be able to get a rebate into the hands of people by July or end of June at the very earliest. Well, that is cold comfort to the people who have already paid thousands and thousands of dollars in electricity and natural gas bills over the last three months and won't see any reduction in their bills in the upcoming months.

I'm proud to stand with my colleagues, especially my friend from Calgary-Mountain View, the Official Opposition critic for Energy, when she says that it's our job to make sure that we hold the government accountable to the promises that they've made and pressure them into actually committing to a timeline for getting the rebates into the hands of Albertans and just coming clean with how much they can expect to be rebated.

That's the other piece that isn't clear here in this piece of legislation. We've heard rumblings and commitments made at the last minute from the Premier and other members of Executive Council about how much Albertans can expect to pay. We think that they're going to get $50 for an electricity rebate, which is not even 5 per cent of what some of the constituents in Edmonton-Gold Bar are getting. You know: "Here's $50. Hope you can cover the other $950 that you were charged for electricity in the month of February." That's not help. [interjection] I see that my friend here from Edmonton-West Henday would like to intervene, so I will entertain that intervention.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've appreciated the comments so far, and like the member speaking, I also appreciate the comments that have come forward from the Member for Calgary-Mountain View as well and appreciate the work that that member has done on this file, specifically thinking back to a few weeks ago when that member called for a reinstatement of the moratorium on utility shut-offs, something that this government has been unwilling to follow through with.

When we're talking about real support for Alberta families, I mean, we've proposed as a caucus many more supports past that, even early on in the pandemic, so I find it very rich that the associate minister of natural gas is now coming back and telling us we need to rush this through when for essentially several months if not even years, looking back to early days of this pandemic, when the utility cap came off and the government decided not to reinstate that as well – I mean, there have been so many opportunities for this government to take action to show Albertans that they truly support them when it comes to lowering their bills, but they haven't.

Thank you.

Mr. Schmidt: I want to thank my friend from Edmonton-West Henday for raising this important point, and it builds on something that my friend from Lethbridge-West highlighted in her speech as well, that the point of the modern conservative movement isn't to provide meaningful solutions to the people of the province of Alberta; it's only to drum up grievances and assign blame to other actors in the hopes of, you know, whipping up the mob and generating political support from that. That was a tactic that was incredibly effective in the 2019 election, when the UCP was not in power. But I think they so effectively whipped up the mob, they made promises to the people of Alberta that they were going to be able to fix all of the problems that we were facing, and now they've fallen flat.

The old trick of whipping up the mob doesn't work anymore because everybody knows that they have the power to make progress on these issues. They have the power to implement solutions, and they don't want to do that. That's quite clear from the bill that we have here today. As my friend from Lethbridge-West said: complete political theatre.

There is a whole host of other public policy options that is available to the government that didn't even require this piece of legislation to be brought forward. As my friend from Calgary-Mountain View said, they could have left the electricity rate cap in place. Just a reminder: we capped the electricity price at 6.8 cents a kilowatt hour. The regulated rate option right now for EPCOR customers is something around 10.6 cents a kilowatt hour.

Had the government done nothing but just left the rate cap in place, electricity consumers in my riding would be paying 30 per cent less for electricity than they are right now. That's all the government had to do: nothing. I don't know why they didn't choose to do nothing, because they've done nothing on a whole host of other issues. I would say that doing nothing is their strong suit, but they couldn't leave well enough alone. They had to lift the electricity cap, and now the people of Alberta are paying, literally paying, thousands of dollars for that poor public policy decision.

That was one thing they could have done. They could have simply written a cheque to Albertans. They could have sent out a $50 cheque to every household in the province of Alberta. That doesn't require a piece of legislation. I'd like to hear the minister of electricity tell us why he couldn't just write a cheque. I suspect that that might actually impact the bottom lines of the electricity distributors whose interests he is so interested in protecting.

We saw that during the initial stages of the pandemic when the government brought forward utility deferrals. Well, heaven forbid that EPCOR or Enmax be out money because people can't afford to pay their bills during the worst economic downturn that this province has seen in its history. "No. We need to keep EPCOR and Enmax whole, so we're going to lend them a bunch of money to cover the unpaid bills for Albertans." I suspect that's exactly what's going on here, too. This government needs to make sure that its rich friends in the electricity industry are still making more money than they've ever made before, and that's why the people of Alberta have to wait six months to get a $50 cheque.

It's extremely frustrating that the people like Deb and Serenity and Lindsay in my riding have to wait and wait and wait at least six months, probably more. They may never even see a natural gas rebate, because we still don't have any details about how much money they're going to provide.

Mr. Eggen: They could shut their power off, then, too.

Mr. Schmidt: Yeah. As my friend from Edmonton-North West says, in the meantime they could have their electricity and natural gas completely shut off, and this government wouldn't lift a finger to do anything to prevent it.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

I see the hon. government whip has risen.

10:30

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, you know, it's pretty unfortunate that the NDP have chosen to play politics with Albertans' utilities bills.

[interjections] Well, it is. They're seemingly intent on making sure that Bill 18 is prevented from being passed this morning. Let me be clear. By not providing unanimous consent last night and wasting time this morning, they've basically made sure that they've stopped $280 million from being returned to Albertans. By the way, that amount is more than the NDP spent on their precious rate cap.

Again, it's disappointing but hardly surprising, and it's with deep regret that we've run out of time this morning. We won't be able to have Bill 18 get royal assent this afternoon. At this time I'm going to move to adjourn debate.

Thanks.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 9 Public's Right to Know Act

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General has risen.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to be here today to move third reading of Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act, which will make it easier for Albertans to find information about crime in their community.

We believe that people have a right to know how crime is affecting their community, and this legislation is delivering on a platform commitment of ours to bring in legislation that will affirm and strengthen that right. Now, if passed, this legislation would require the provincial government to report crime and justice system metrics annually. This would involve publishing information like police-based crime data on the government of Alberta website and by tabling the information in a report to this House every year. Now, it's important to point out that while, to some, this may seem modest, I can say that it is not the case. We are merely at the starting point here.

It's important to note that this is enabling legislation. What it does is that it creates a framework for reporting crime and justice metrics not only now but as well into the future. Additional metrics can be reported as they become available to us and as we work with our partners to develop those new metrics. The minister of the day would then have the ability to enter into information-sharing agreements to obtain and then publish the data respecting crime and the justice system. Now, indeed, this is just the beginning, and there will be increasingly more data and more helpful information to a variety of Albertans in the coming years.

This piece of legislation that we're debating here, Mr. Speaker, is a first in Canada. Alberta is proactively taking a leadership role and modelling the way for other provinces. No other jurisdiction has stand-alone legislation requiring the government to report crime and justice system metrics to the public at defined intervals. This annual reporting requirement would enhance transparency by creating an expectation among the public that the government will provide Albertans with this information at regular intervals and ensure it's easy to find and easy to understand. Now, to that end, Alberta Justice and Solicitor General is looking at ways to present the raw data that we receive in more user-friendly ways. That could mean, for example, giving people the ability to examine trends over time.

Contrary to what members opposite have claimed, access to this kind of data is indeed a priority for Albertans. During a tour of the province in 2019 a former Minister of Justice and Solicitor General heard from many rural Albertans who were concerned about crime, and they also told him that they wanted more information about what's happening in their communities. Our conversations with Albertans indicate that there's a strong appetite for this kind of information as well as valid reasons for people who want it.

Transparency is an important principle, but increased openness isn't the only benefit to legislation like this. We've all heard the saying: knowledge is power. There's a reason that expressions like this have become part of our everyday language. It's because they're often true. Information and easier access to it empowers people to make better decisions. Improving access to crime data could help decision-makers at various levels develop policies and to take actions that are based on evidence. A troubling crime trend could expose gaps in services and lead to the development of new initiatives or perhaps even new enforcement strategies.

At a more basic level this is also about giving Albertans the ability to make better decisions about their personal safety. Knowing property crime statistics in their community may cause someone to take added steps to protect their homes or their businesses such as installation of better lighting, security, other measures to deter thieves. What these examples have in common is that in all of these cases having better access to information can result in better outcomes. An informed and empowered public can help build safer communities for everyone in Alberta, and it starts with ensuring that folks have easier access to information.

I hope that members on both sides of the House will support this legislation for what it can mean to Albertans and how it can help them out in the years to come. I ask that we move third reading of Bill 9.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

To respond, I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act, but before I launch into the bill, I just want to make a comment about the previous bill that was under discussion, Bill 18, and the final comments made that the opposition was being criticized for not giving the government . . .

An Hon. Member: Unanimous consent.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much.

. . . unanimous consent to move the bill expediently through, yet then the government adjourned debate. If the bill was that important, we should have continued to discuss it.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt; however, I think we are on third reading of Bill 12, so if we could please bring our comments back to the task at hand.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Bill 9.

The Acting Speaker: Sorry. Bill 9 in third reading.

If the hon. member could continue.

Mr. Bilous: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just wanted to make that comment so that it's clear to Albertans at home that were wondering why the Assembly was not continuing to debate a bill that was so important yet brought in six months late.

But here we have Bill 9, the Public's Right to Know Act. You know, I do have a number of questions. My first reading of this bill is that everything in this bill the minister currently has the authority to do, so what we have here is either a job-description bill or a bill that allows the minister to check a box for a promise made, yet an ability the minister already had. The minister can commission reports.

Mr. Shandro: You don't know the difference between "can" and "must."

Mr. Bilous: The minister who is now yelling across the way. This bill could have and should have done much more.

I want to talk a little bit about, Mr. Speaker, the fact that this very government raided the victims of crime fund in a bill that they brought forward a couple of years ago. This bill had the capacity to be able to ensure that every dollar from the victims of crime fund would go to victims, yet it was expanded to cover a myriad of programs to which there have been a number of articles and stakeholders and not-for-profit groups who support victims of crime who were devastated and frustrated with this government and were sounding the alarm bells before this government made changes to the victims of crime fund.

Previously, since that fund was initially established in the province, all funds were going to victims. We know, Mr. Speaker, that some of those victims – well, I mean, they're all victims, but many of them suffered incredible atrocities and needed long-term support in order to, for some, get back to functioning, so those funds were critical, but the funds were limited.

I'm happy to table this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, some articles that I'm going to quote from. You know, first of all, an article that appeared in the CBC, New Victims of Crime Benefits Delayed, Existing Alberta Program Limits 'Naive,' Advocates Say, and in this the first challenge that these organizations had is that victims had 45 days after a violent crime to apply for benefits. Now, I'm no expert in this area whatsoever, but putting a limitation of 45 days after someone has experienced something extremely traumatic seems a little absurd to me. That window is so small for a person who's been a victim of a crime to apply for support. It's pointed out that Albertans used to have two years from the date of crime, and that was backed up all the way to 45 days, which is a significant change. I can tell you that the CEO of the Sexual Assault Centre of Edmonton had said that "this is really naive and, quite frankly, uninformed, to make a decision about what it means for a survivor to even acknowledge to themselves what happened, let alone report," which I think is a very compelling argument.

There's now also a limit of $1,000 on reimbursements for counselling, which is nowhere near enough to cover the amount for treatment most victims need. Again, if you think about, Mr. Speaker, the fact that a one-hour session is on average about $200 – so for a victim of a crime they would have maybe five sessions total. Again, you know, others had called this move ridiculous.

You know, it's troubling, Mr. Speaker. I'm going to pull up another article that talks about a number of not-for-profits. There's a group in this next article – it was on CTV news – entitled Concerns Raised over Planned Changes to Alberta Victims of Crime Fund. Here's an example of a group that represents 73 victims' services organizations in the province, so quite a large umbrella organization, that was raising the alarm bells over the proposed, at that time, changes that the UCP government were going to make to the victims of crime fund. Again, the frustration is that it would "allow the provincial government to raid a fund that was meant to support people and families hurt by crime." This is something that could have been in this bill: real, meaningful action to either restore the money that was taken out of that fund or to add new dollars into the fund to support those.

Now, my understanding is that when this bill was first introduced or around that timeline, the minister made comments around even the necessity of this bill and whether or not it is necessary to do what the bill enables the minister to do. You know, the challenge that many of my colleagues have raised regarding this bill is that it does not address the concerns that Albertans have and it doesn't specify which data has to be recorded or collected. Now, I'm sure the minister – as his colleagues have been doing for every bill we're debating in this Chamber: "Oh, no. That's in the regulations. Just trust us. Trust us, trust us, trust us." The reality, Mr. Speaker, is that – and I think all parties in this Chamber are pretty aware of Albertans' level of trust in this UCP government.

So here was an opportunity to provide race-based data that would give real information to be able to look at what changes need to be made and where the system is failing people. That's unfortunate, Mr. Speaker.

Now, my understanding, again, of the data that this bill enables the minister to report on is that the minister already had the ability to create reports and share with the public. Again, it's not in the bill as far as what data is actually going to be collected. I think Albertans have reason to be concerned as far as what data will be collected, what data will be shared. I'm curious. I'm sure the minister already heard this question, but without this bill would the minister be able to publish a report on individuals on bail or on parole, as was promised in the platform? I would like to know why the minister chose not to include specifically which data will be included or disclosed. I don't know if the minister knows that and doesn't want to disclose it here in the Chamber or if the minister doesn't know as of yet. You know, maybe this bill was written hastily. I'm not sure, Mr. Speaker. Our job is to try to get answers to these questions.

Now, I'm not sure if the minister is going to be supporting Bill 204, that's in committee right now, but before this House, that was put forward by my colleague the Member for Edmonton-City Centre, which proposes the collection of race-based data, which is what many communities have been asking for in order to identify exactly where the problems lie and provide us with information to be able to make data-driven decisions. I hope that the minister will support that.

Again, Bill 204 will allow the collection of data about the justice system. Many of the constituents I've spoken with have felt frustration with our current justice system, identifying that there is significant room for improvement on it. Collecting data to be able to make informed decisions on how to improve our system, I think, is a good thing. I would hope that all members of this Chamber would support improving our system to ensure that Albertans have access to justice, quite frankly. That bill also would create the Anti-Racism Advisory Council to make recommendations based on data collected, which, again, in my opinion, is a good thing, to have the input and advice of a council.

Now, this current bill, Bill 9, does none of these things. It doesn't provide any tools to create recommendations based on the data presented. There's no direction. There's no guidance through this bill on, again, what information will be collected, how it will be used, who will have access to it. I think the bill in and of itself, from what I can see, Mr. Speaker, does nothing to address crime. As I had mentioned, it doesn't restore funding to the victims of crime. It doesn't prioritize the new victims of crime model. It doesn't prioritize hiring more prosecutors, which is one of the challenges that our system is currently facing and why we have so many cases being thrown out. The timelines lapse because there simply aren't enough prosecutors. Why doesn't this bill work to address that issue? I mean, there was an opportunity here that the government has missed. It doesn't present a plan to make sure that criminal cases are not thrown out due to delays in prosecuting them within the Jordan time frames, which, again, could've been in this piece of legislation.

As well, Mr. Speaker, I know that the associations for our municipalities, both Alberta Municipalities and the Rural Municipalities of Alberta, RMA, have been telling this government to abandon this idea of a provincial police force and to focus on addressing the root causes of crime.

Now, what's fascinating, Mr. Speaker, is that while we are debating this bill, recently – in fact, I learned of it yesterday – 10 fish and wildlife officers are being dropped from a task force that was created to respond to rural crime. Significant dollars were spent training these officers, equipping them with everything from body armour to carbine rifles, et cetera, which at first I found curious but then recognized that our fish and wildlife officers are often in remote rural areas of Alberta and can respond in a more timely manner to rural calls for help. I can only imagine how the organization within fish and wildlife had restructured in order to take on these new responsibilities, staff up, train, procure equipment, et cetera, and with a stroke of a pen they're no longer part of that task force.

My question, Mr. Speaker, is to the minister and to the government. There are fewer officers now responding to rural crime. For a government and a party that brags about being tough on crime, they're the opposite. The UCP are weak on crime and clearly are not prioritizing the safety of rural Albertans. I would love for the minister to stand up and explain to the Chamber why they dropped these 10 officers from responding after they had been trained. This isn't just taking one little course. This is so that fish and wildlife officers have the knowledge of all sections of law and the Criminal Code to be able to lay charges, to act, in essence, as an RCMP officer.

My understanding is that the training went on for more than a year, and suddenly, with no word from the minister or this government, they're dropped. Who's going to pay for that decision? You know who's going to pay for it, Mr. Speaker: rural Albertans, the very ones who have been talking about wanting meaningful action, which this UCP government promised in their platform and now they're failing to deliver.

Again, this bill could have addressed the backlog in our court system, and it didn't. It could have dropped this – I'm trying to think of a parliamentary way of framing this concept of an Alberta police force, which clearly is just trying to pander to the extreme of this government's political party. You know, Mr. Speaker, I even asked some of the accountants over there: show me the math. Show me the math on creating a provincial police force. How many millions of dollars would that cost? Millions. How long would it take for that police force to have a system that actually can talk to the existing RCMP system?

Albertans aren't asking for a provincial police force. Don't take my word for it; go and talk to the Rural Municipalities of Alberta. Don't even talk to just the association. Talk to the actual individual municipalities, rural municipalities, and how many of them are asking for an Alberta police force? Now, maybe there are one or two. I don't know. Every one that I've spoken with has said: "Nope. Not a chance. We'd like to see more funding." What they didn't want to see was what this government did, which was download the costs of policing onto municipalities.

Mr. Speaker, for those reasons and many others, I struggle with this bill.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday has risen.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a privilege to rise to speak to Bill 9, Public's Right to Know Act. I appreciated the conversations that we've heard so far this morning and even before that. You know, some of the comments that I had planned to make through this time that I have speaking to Bill 9 will likely reflect some of the words that we just heard from the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview because I also share many concerns, not only with the legislation itself but also what is clearly missing and also the bigger picture of some of the other pieces that we've seen the government move on that have had negative impacts and consequences on the justice system and supports for victims of crimes across the province.

First of all, I would again repeat that this legislation does little to address the priorities of Albertans. You know, we see in this legislation very vague references to the ability that is going to be given to the minister, but it does seem that for the entirety of what we're seeing in here, it's very likely that the minister is able to produce and request this information in the first place. I'm not entirely sure exactly why we need this legislation in the first place. I would be happy to hear some specific examples from the Justice minister, if they so choose to rise and speak to some of the, maybe, information that they've requested in the past that they haven't been able to have provided to them and exactly what they expect to get into the future from this legislation if it were to pass.

Again, from what we see in here, like many other pieces of legislation that this government has brought forward, it's very vague and leaves the opposition and many Albertans wondering exactly what the intentions were when this bill was introduced.

Now, specific to some of the things, some of the issues that we've seen and the decisions that this government has made, I think that we've heard to some extent discussions around the victims of crime fund. I plan to spend some time on that. Specifically, again, the previous member referenced this article from the CBC dated January 10 of this year and concerns that have been brought forward by many advocates within this field, but specifically in this case Mary Jane James, the CEO of SACE, the Sexual Assault Centre of Edmonton, which is located in the constituency of Edmonton-West Henday. The work that they do is so important, and the education that they provide is so important, and the value that they bring as advocates and as supporters of the work of protecting and supporting survivors is so important.

It's always a concern when the government is bringing forward legislation that is bringing out advocates like members from the Sexual Assault Centre of Edmonton and they're putting forward that there are red flags in what the government is proposing. Again, I think that we've had ample opportunities or this government has had many opportunities to rectify the problems that they've created. I think that this legislation itself could have potentially been another opportunity for that, but instead, again, we see vague commitments to collecting data with little information about what exactly we might be collecting.

Just reflecting on the decision that this government made to, quote, unquote, expand the ways that the money from the victims of crime fund could be spent, first of all, we saw about 60 per cent of that fund being diverted to other programs. On top of that, in this last budget we've actually seen a 12 per cent cut to that fund. In both of those circumstances that is very concerning. We see money being diverted to paying for courts and policing initiatives and, well, they say, hiring more Crown prosecutors. It doesn't seem like that's going so well even with the added funds that they're taking away from victims of crime, Mr. Speaker, but the fact is that they are now allowed to use that money that was once entirely designated for those who are trying to deal with traumatic experiences and get the supports and therapy and everything else that comes along with it.

The previous member also reflected on the fact that the government has moved to put a $1,000 limit on reimbursements. We see stories from previously, before that limit was put in place, where Albertans who have been victims of crime have been reimbursed or received compensation of upwards of $10,000 in some cases. That is entirely understandable, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that we should be doing everything we can to support these people. Unfortunately, this government has gone in the exact opposite direction. This is just one more instance of the government completely failing on the Justice file, really, across the board.

I would say, specific to this issue, that what is potentially most concerning or most questionable about the decisions of this government is the fact that so many of them come from rural communities. I would say in many instances that the need to support victims is – or not the need, but the barriers to supporting victims in rural communities is potentially higher than we might see in urban settings. Obviously, we have more associations and advocates within our urban centres and potentially more opportunities to receive supports, whether it is from police or advocacy organizations or wherever a victim or survivor might feel safe going to. Instead of ensuring that those funds are in place and that we keep that two-year time limit, we actually saw the government go backwards, down to a 45-day time limit, which, again, might be even worse for those people in rural communities who have been victimized in one way or another. I find that concerning and question why so often the decisions of this government are actually negatively affecting rural Albertans potentially even more so than those in urban centres.

You know, we heard from the previous minister the idea of Jordan's principle and the risk of cases being thrown out because of ongoing delays based on the lack of supports in the justice system. It was also very interesting to see from the current Justice minister, when the idea that this was happening, that there was more than 3,000 cases in the Provincial Court alone that were at risk of being tossed out, that when that story initially broke, the minister actually said that this wasn't the case, that even though they've gone past this 18-month timeline, there's no chance that this is going to happen. Again, advocates from within the community came out and said that the minister was wrong. Defence lawyers came out and said that, absolutely, it's possible that, you know, upwards of 1,282 violent cases are at risk of being thrown out in the Provincial Court. So it's hard.

Again, when we look at Bill 9 and the vagueness and the lack of detail and the fact that we're being told that much of the important parts of the legislation will come through regulations, it's hard to believe that the government is on the right track, with the vagueness of it and with the track record that this government has already put forward and also with their inability to be straightforward with Albertans, Mr. Speaker. I think that the discussion around the Jordan case is a great example of that. I think that the denial of the truth or denial of the facts around the victims of crime fund through this process leaves Albertans concerned about the track record of this government.

Further, like the previous member, I have great concerns, and I know Albertans by and large have great concerns about the fact that right now, as brought forward again on April 6 of this year – the document is titled Alberta Crown Prosecutors Meet to Consider Strike. Again, we have the Crown prosecutors in the province who, rightfully so, are concerned that even though in the UCP's platform in 2019 the Premier committed to hiring 50 new prosecutors, at this point there are still 37 vacancies. So now they are considering job action because of a lack of resources, a lack of what seems like respect coming from people above them in terms of the minister and the ministry's office potentially as well as the caseloads that continue to grow and grow. They feel that they're being unheard or aren't being listened to, and they are considering job action now.

[Mr. Reid in the chair]

Across the board it seems like the justice system or the responsibilities of this minister aren't being taken as seriously as they should be. The resourcing isn't there. There are major concerns. I think the previous member said that this government calls themselves tough on crime, but it seems like quite the opposite when we look at the decisions that they've made. I would reflect on the fact that not only are we seeing policing costs downloaded onto municipalities, even before we have this discussion about moving to a provincial police force, but they are also taking more portions of things like traffic tickets. They're taking with both hands, Mr. Speaker, not giving back with any hand; taking with both of them. Unfortunately, what this means is more costs on Alberta municipalities, which in turn means more costs on Alberta residents across the board for the money that is being taken away from municipalities, but it also means less services provided by those organizations within their community.

That really goes back to the point here of Bill 9 and the Public's Right to Know Act. Though very vague, you know, the idea of increasing the transparency and oversight and opportunities for the Justice minister to request information: I absolutely feel that in principle the idea that is put forward in this legislation is something that I am willing to support. Again, the main concern here is the lack of clarity in what exactly the minister is hoping to get out of it and also the lack of clarity if it is going to result in, essentially, more paperwork or more work for these organizations within our community on the ground, who – we, of course, with the scaling back of funds from this government, need to ensure that there is adequate staffing, whether it's policing in rural communities or otherwise, and we continue to talk about the fact that they need to be out in the community. As best as possible we need to ensure that they're in the community supporting families and not necessarily stuck behind a desk.

Now, if we are going to ask them to provide more data for the work that they're doing, which is – again, I support that idea, but we need to ensure that the resources are in place, to ensure that it's not going to mean a reduction in the people in the community and on the street level.

11:10

So with that, Mr. Speaker, I do believe that I, again, support in general the principles that are put forward by Bill 9. I have major concerns about the direction of this government overall when it comes to the Justice ministry and the justice system, but with that, I will take my seat and hear from some other colleagues.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Looking for other members wishing to join debate. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and of course yesterday during debate on Bill 9 in Committee of the Whole I made reference to dealing with issues of justice as they relate to the overrepresentation of Indigenous people in the prison system here in the province of Alberta but, as well, federally. I just wanted to take this opportunity to delve a little bit deeper into what I brought up then in debate, which were the sentencing circles. I promised that I would during third reading mention it a little in more detail.

I do have a description here that I wanted to share with everybody now, and I remind all the members of the House that this is so important because this is a practice that's already taking place in many jurisdictions across Canada. The Edmonton Police Service decided to pilot a project very recently in the last couple of years, and I want to encourage all of us to promote this because I honestly believe that this is a nonpartisan issue, that we need to work on it in terms of reconciliation with Indigenous nations all across Canada. Of course, it's a great alternative to making sure that these situations can be dealt with in a more productive manner for Indigenous people and that is more fair, I would say.

According to the document that I have, it says this, and I'll quote directly from it, Mr. Speaker. I'll be sure to table this later on today.

A sentencing circle is a community-directed process, conducted in partnership with the criminal justice system, to develop consensus on an appropriate sentencing plan that addresses the concerns of all interested parties. Sentencing circles – sometimes called peacemaking circles – use traditional circle ritual and structure to involve the victim, victim supporters, the offender, offender supporters, judge and court personnel, prosecutor, defense counsel, police, and all interested community members. Within the circle, people can speak from the heart in a shared search for understanding of the event, and together identify the steps necessary to assist in healing all affected parties and prevent future crimes.

Sentencing circles typically involve a multi-step procedure that includes: (1) application by the offender to participate in the circle process; (2) a healing circle for the victim; (3) a healing circle for the offender; (4) a sentencing circle to develop consensus on the elements of a sentencing plan; and (5) follow-up circles to monitor the progress of the offender. The sentencing plan may incorporate commitments by the system, community, and family members, as well as by the offender. Sentencing circles are used for adult and juvenile offenders with a variety of offenses and have been used in both rural and urban settings. Specifics of the circle process vary from community to community and are designed locally to fit community needs and culture.

On top of that, I want to say that I highly encourage all members of the House – a good friend of mine produced a short documentary on this particular issue. You can go on YouTube and find it just by typing in “sentencing circles,” and you can actually see the Edmonton Police Service member that actually participated in one of these sentencing circles, what they thought about it, you know, what their prejudices were before going into the sentencing circle process, and then, of course, what they thought about it once they finished the actual process.

Again I will reiterate that this is the type of legislation – these kinds of programs I wish we as a government or the government and we as a Legislature were focusing on to actually bring real solutions to real problems, and in this case the real problem being the overrepresentation of Indigenous people in the prison system.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will take my chair. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, I'm prepared to ask the question.

[Motion carried; Bill 9 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading (continued)

Bill 12 Trustee Act

[Adjourned debate April 19: Mr. Nielsen]

The Acting Speaker: Looking for members wishing to speak to Bill 12, the Trustee Act. I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to provide some comments here at second reading of Bill 12, the Trustee Act. This is quite a lengthy piece of legislation. It's quite complicated as well, so it is for that reason that I am very grateful for the detailed and very careful work of the Alberta Law Reform Institute. These folks do something of a yeoman's task of combing through old pieces of legislation, pieces of legislation that, as identified by various members of the legal profession, require update, and make recommendations to government on how to do so after a typically lengthy and detailed consultation process with members of the legal profession and provide that analysis in both a practical way based on how those pieces of legislation have worked or not worked and also an analysis that is oftentimes interjurisdictional in nature and that references some of the academic reckoning in various law faculties with these types of pieces of legislation.

Now, a trust is, of course, a fiduciary relationship between an individual and one or more persons to hold property and to use and make decisions about that property for the beneficiaries of that trust, many different types of trust. Some of our legislation was very old, and this was the case across the country. Indeed, there is an entity called the Uniform Law Conference of Canada, which undertook a project on trustee legislation reform across the country. They made a recommendation at the time in 2012 that the Uniform Trustee Act be adopted in Alberta, but the Alberta Law Reform Institute then examined those recommendations and indicated that there were a few aspects of that work that needed to be tailored and clarified for Alberta's particular needs, understanding, as we do, all of the areas of provincial jurisdiction around property that this law reform project would affect.

I want to pause for a moment here and reflect on the value of organizations like the Alberta Law Reform Institute. There is a reason why they are so well respected within the legal profession and why they merit public support as well.

These are the types of what I like to call drumbeat-of-governing processes, that are tremendously time consuming, do not result in, you know, lightning in the sky, people's typical understandings of what we do here in the Legislature, but they are nonetheless extremely important to the maintenance of rule of law, to the equal application of the law to all individuals, to ordinary concepts of fairness that any ordinary person can understand and accept, the appropriate continuation of the business of our courts such that we do not have legislation that is antiquated or difficult to interpret or resulting in varying interpretations that then result in appeals after appeals or other inconsistencies or outcomes that, in fact, disadvantage certain groups.

This is the kind of work that, quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, is quite boring in nature. Certainly, when I read through the written Trustee Act at first, given as I have some background in law courses but not having gone to law school, the Trustee Act was certainly one that reading it through made my eyes glaze over, and I had to go and read the Alberta Law Reform Institute paper, that they subsequently put out a couple of years back, to understand exactly what we were talking about here. I think that's normal even for people in the legal profession. If you don't have an expertise in these particular areas of law, the eyes may also glaze over with respect to this piece, which is why we need those experts to inform the debate through, like I said, the practical use and application of these legal frameworks but also the work of legal academics and scholars, and the Alberta Law Reform Institute contains both of those types of people.

That's how you get the best evidence-based decision-making. That is how a government that is interested in the best outcomes for public policy conducts itself, and we would do well to revisit some of those anchors and guardrails of not only the Westminster parliamentary system but also of a properly functioning liberal democracy. Yes, we are assembled in here, a group of ordinary people. Some of us are lawyers, and some of us are not. Some of us have different backgrounds, but the fact of the matter is that we must trust and respond to appropriate expertise and evidence and not shout it out of the room because it does not automatically confirm our priors, especially if our priors happen to be a predilection for serving particular groups of folks who are not interested in evidence, the scientific method, or the rule of law.

Now, in terms of what this bill actually does, there have been amendments to the Trustee Act, but it's never been comprehensively reviewed. It's largely based on an 1893 English statute. Now, that, on the face of it, makes the case for why it might need to be updated. Our property relationships to one another were quite different even prior to the Charter. Certainly, division of property, holding of property between men and women, for example, or on the basis of national or ethnic origin was something that was already beginning to change prior to the Charter, and of course we have seen a number of changes in this regard after the Charter. That in and of itself would signal that the Trustee Act may have some inconsistencies or some places where it crossed threads with established practice around making decisions to protect and benefit others in terms of the beneficiaries.

This piece of legislation establishes more provisions for the day-to-day management of trusts, and certainly that is a piece that is very, very important to the public interest when we examine who, in fact, becomes someone who has their property managed in a trust relationship. The fact of the matter is that there are newer types of trusts, for example, for folks with disabilities, trusts that manage inheritances or significant financial gifts while receiving AISH.

For example, our government passed legislation in 2018 to make this possible, the Henson trust legislation, which, if memory serves, was repealed in some sort of ridiculous omnibus exercise undertaken by this current government. I suppose that's another thing that we'll have to fix because the fact of the matter is that an appropriate and appropriately respectful way to approach trusts for people receiving AISH benefits is something that is most certainly in the public interest. It defies logic why that would have been something that was repealed. I'm happy to be corrected that it wasn't, but I think it was.

Mr. Eggen: Yeah.

Ms Phillips: Yes. Okay. I mean, it just makes absolutely no sense why anyone would do that, but that is the situation that we're in.

The history of this particular conversation around trusts, of course, resulted in the Alberta Law Reform Institute publishing a discussion paper. There were consultations, as I indicated. There were 23 new or modified recommendations. It appears that Executive Council has included many of those recommendations in this legislation. That is a good thing. I certainly support this piece of legislation's expeditious passage through this Legislature.

I will say, however, that there's no question that both this bill and Bill 9, I mean, that we just spoke to – Bill 9 I spoke to yesterday around second reading, and then we just finished with third. This Bill 12 has moved into this current stage of debate rather quickly as well. There's no question that other pieces of legislation could move at a similar pace, certainly, if the government didn't see fit to adjourn debate on their so-called priorities.

There's no question that the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General has a number of important files to balance, this being one of them, and there's no question that some pieces of legislation move quicker through this House than others. But, you know, along with this and Bill 9, if the minister was at all worried about the effect on folks whose affairs are managed, for example, via the office of the public guardian and trustee, then there would have been some reckoning with the challenges that the OPGT has had within this bill, and there is not.

For example, when there are victims of crime who are also folks whose affairs are managed by the office of the public guardian and trustee – those folks sometimes were former children in care, and their affairs are still managed by the OPGT as adults – what they can qualify for when they are a victim of crime: it's the OPGT that goes and gets them whatever they're entitled to. You know, it's the government of Alberta, it's the province that acts on their behalf because their affairs are under trustee of the government. So if they're a victim of a crime or even a victim of a car accident in a civil litigation affair, but certainly if they're a victim of a crime, it would be the OPGT that goes and tries to get those folks whatever they need. They don't have parents or anyone else to advocate for them. It's our job. By our, I mean with a capital "O." It's the province's job to meet those folks' needs.

What has happened since the raiding of the victims of crime fund is that those folks don't get anything if under the care of the province they somehow experienced an egregious crime such as sexual assault or aggravated assault. They don't get anything anymore. You know, I think there are five counselling sessions or something. Like, come on. Give me a break.

Some of that could have been contained, some of the challenges for folks whose affairs are managed by the provincial trustee relationship could have potentially been at some point in this Legislature. The problems with the victims of crime fund could have been appropriately reckoned with. Given that the legislation changing it was introduced in June 2020, there was supposed to be some sort of review around what victims of crime are actually getting. It never happened.

The Acting Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to Bill 12, second reading? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and offer a few brief comments on Bill 12, the Trustee Act. I want to, first of all, thank all of my colleagues ahead of me for speaking. Again, I think it's worth highlighting some of the comments that my friend from Lethbridge-West made in regard to this bill, that we're happy to see that in this particular case the government has consulted with academics and legal experts and adopted a number of the recommendations that have come forward from those people who looked closely at this issue of trusts and made significant recommendations for reform. Certainly, I would encourage the government to take that approach to a whole host of public policy decisions and not just making it up as they go, as they seem to have done on a number of other important files.

You know, I can't help but wonder what the state of the eastern slopes would have been if the government had just conducted this kind of public policy review at the very outset of its term instead of scrapping the Lougheed coal policy and then continually walking back that decision and finding some kind of a cobbled-together way of appearing to be responding to the massive backlash that it suffered while also still intent on catering to the big coal interests that this government clearly favours over the interests of average landowners.

You know, it's incredibly concerning to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Coal Policy Committee that the government struck made a number of recommendations to the Energy minister that she has been completely silent on, a whole host of recommendations that the government refuses to even acknowledge were made in that report, much less address in other areas of public policy.

Had the government taken the approach that they've taken with this Bill 12 to other issues like the coal policy issue, I think Albertans would be in a much better place. The eastern slopes would have their future much more secure, and this government wouldn't find itself with such a severe trust deficit as it does now.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

You know, on the issue of a trust itself, I first of all want to declare that I have absolutely no conflict of interest whatsoever with this piece of legislation just by virtue of the fact that I have nothing to leave behind when I die, Mr. Speaker. As soon as I expire, the only thing that I will leave to my dependents will be a bill for the cost of cremating and disposing of my remains. I have no earthly possessions, nothing of value. In fact, the only inheritance, I think, might be the gas that they will be able to siphon out of the van and perhaps put into their own vehicles. That's it. Sorry, kids. You better keep your old man around for a lot longer because this is as good as it's going to get. There's nothing that I'm going to leave behind.

Having declared absolutely no conflict of interest, I'm pleased to offer some other comments on this piece of legislation, and I do want to pick up on something that, again, my friend from Lethbridge-West raised in her remarks on this issue, and that was the issue of Henson trusts, because I had a number of people come into my constituency office from the period of 2015 to 2018, when our government had been elected and before we took issue to allow for the creation of these so-called Henson trusts. There were a number of families in Edmonton-Gold Bar who had dependents who were receiving AISH and wanted to be able to leave behind a little bit of an inheritance but were afraid to do so because that would mean that their AISH benefits would be clawed back.

Now, I know that to members of the UCP clawing back AISH benefits isn't a severe concern, but to the families of people who are recipients of AISH, clawing back AISH benefits is a concern, and these families were put in a tremendously awkward circumstance because they wanted to be able to provide for their dependants who were not able to provide for themselves, yet by doing so, they would actually make their dependants worse off than if they had left them nothing.

That struck them as being incredibly unfair, and that struck us as being incredibly unfair, too, so that's why we took the opportunity to amend the legislation to allow for the creation of these Henson trusts, so that families of AISH recipients could leave behind a small inheritance for their loved ones who are recipients of AISH without putting them at risk of losing their benefits. I think that was an important public policy decision that left the families with their minds at ease that their loved ones would be taken care of once they passed away. It also, you know, provided for a suitable public policy position, I think, for the people of Alberta, one that the people of Alberta were happy with. I think everybody thought that that was a reasonable state of affairs; everyone, I guess, except this current government, which decided in one of its pieces of omnibus legislation to repeal this concept of Henson trusts and again leave the families of AISH recipients uncertain about the future of their loved ones once they've passed away. That's extremely unfortunate.

But saying that, I think that overall this piece of legislation is a much-needed update to the legal framework around establishing trustees, and as I said at the very beginning, I'm very pleased to see that the government relied heavily on the advice of experts like the Alberta Law Reform Institute when it decided to bring forward these changes. It is a little bit concerning to me, Mr. Speaker, that the act only implements about 80 of the 90 or so recommendations that the Alberta Law Reform Institute made to the government on this particular issue, and I'm curious to know why those outstanding recommendations weren't adopted in this piece of legislation.

Is it that the government needed more time to work through the implications of those recommendations and that they intend to bring forward legislation at a future date to address them? Did they reject them out of hand for reasons that are unknown to us? Or did they simply – I don't know – get bored with the issue and couldn't go beyond 80 recommendations because at that point it was probably whisky o'clock on the sky palace terrace and they couldn't be bothered to complete their work anymore? I don't know, and it would be interesting to hear from the Minister of Justice or any other member of Executive Council why the government refused to address these outstanding recommendations.

11:40

But on balance I think that this is overall a significant step forward in the legal framework around trusts and trustees, and for that reason, Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to join my colleagues here in the Official Opposition in supporting this legislation.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I do see that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to spend a little bit of time on Bill 12, the Trustee Act. As with a number of the bills lately, I have certainly found some things to be very positive about and wish to support. I think that's a particularly important area for us to be moving forward on because, as we know, the original Trustee Act was based on legislation that is literally over 100 years old, and it's really time to bring it home to this Legislature, to take responsibility for it within the context of this province, and to ensure that the Trustee Act and all the recommendations that had been brought forward are put together in such a way that it benefits the people in the province of Alberta.

I'm glad to see that the process by which we have arrived at this date has been one which I think we all can celebrate here in this province, and that is that those people who are most informed about the topic were brought together and had an opportunity to put together a review of the issues that are inherent in the area of trusts, which, of course, included not only members of the Law Society but also some members of the public who experienced some of the significant consequences of when things go wrong in the situation of trustee positions.

I'm very glad to see that the report that came out in January 2017, called A New Trustee Act for Alberta, Final Report of the law commission society, was largely adopted here in this particular piece of legislation because, you know, what we have is exactly what we like to see here in the Legislature, and that is people bringing forward recommendations based on their vast lived experience, their academic knowledge, and their legal expertise and bringing forward recommendations that are about doing some of the mundane things that most of us don't even know that much about. People that have the ability to understand the small-detail work that has to go into establishing a law such that people will be able to practise it well without too much lack of clarity in the future – I know that you can never make things a hundred per cent clear, but having this great group of people put together a good list of recommendations and then have the government adopt most of those recommendations is good.

Of course, over time we'll spend some time making sure that the recommendations that have not been adopted by the government are re-examined, just to make sure that maybe they shouldn't be included into this bill, you know, just to follow up in terms of government decision-making, but the adoption of the majority of these recommendations is good. Starting, of course, with the adoption of the Uniform Trustee Act, I think, is a good starting place. You know, this is certainly an act that we can be supportive of because we know that the place from which it has been derived has been one that has been nonpartisan. It has been focused on the law. It has been focused on the outcome of the people that will experience it. I noticed that the standards which are being put in here in all of the different sections – there are sections on who is appointed as trustees, when that trustee resigns, when there's a transfer of trustees. All of those pieces, which are the minutiae of this type of law, have all been set down on the underlying priority that we seek to reach the highest possible standard of skill and professionalism amongst our trustees, and I think that's an excellent place to begin.

It allows, of course, courts to make very clear decisions about whether or not the decisions made by trustees on behalf of others have in fact met those high standards, because the standards are clearly laid out, which is something we've been asking this government to do in a number of other acts. Can you please lay out what the standards are? Can you please lay out what it means, you know, for you when you say that you're going to produce a report? For example, in the last bill we just talked about, on the public's right to know, there is the overarching legal structure that says that a report will be produced, but then it does not say what's in the report. It's due to that lack of detail that brought us to great concern in Bill 9, so now it's nice to see in Bill 12 that we actually have a little bit more detail, that more is being provided to people who are involved in the trustee relationship. Therefore, it's providing some clarity to the court system.

I understand that the government is hopeful that this actually will mean that we'll have a reduction in the number of cases that go to court and end up in conflict or that if they do go to court, they're much more quickly settled, because the rules are established in such a way that there will be clarity as to whether or not the rules were followed fairly quickly. I know that right now the courts in Alberta are in a very difficult position. We do not have the number of appointed judges that we might have had if the government had submitted the list of needs to the federal government, as had been requested and was not fulfilled by this government, so we are short on the number of judges. We have court prosecutors threatening to strike because of the difficulties in the court system. Overall, there's just been some – it's been a very problematic few years under the UCP government in the court system, so it's nice to see that we actually have something coming forward that's going to benefit the court system and help to take some of the pressure off. Therefore, I certainly want to support it.

I'm also very encouraged to see that there is a continuation of the current prudent investor rule, that ensures that investors cannot take, you know, wild chances with the monies invested in their trusts, that they must always act in a prudent way that is for the best interests of the person who is the recipient of the trust. Now, we know that the government has had a problem with that in the past as well, under AIMCo, when they lost a billion dollars because they decided to experiment with very high-risk investments and lost a significant amount of money for the province of Alberta under the UCP government. In this case I'm very happy to see that there is a prudent investor rule, one which I think government should always kind of maintain as they move forward because I think it's important that people who are responsible for the financial well-being of others be in a place where they have to understand that they cannot just assume any kind of possible consequence for their behaviour because it's not them that will have to bear those consequences. That prudent investment is a rule that I'm very happy to see in this list, and I wish, of course, that the government would exercise it themselves in terms of their own investment behaviour.

I also want to spend a few moments on the concern we have regarding Henson trusts. Having been a social worker for much of my career, I certainly have worked with a significant number of people who have had a need for a trust from their family because of their inability to care for their own financial needs. In my career I did spend time working in child welfare, of course, where we had some people who were unable to take care of themselves. I also worked at the Glenrose hospital in the area of people with disabilities and so on, so I have seen circumstances where we have individuals, because of no fault of their own – sometimes, for example, when I was at the Glenrose hospital, people had acquired brain injuries or were born with a disability, some congenital factor which prevented them from being able to, you know, take on responsibility for their own well-being.

I know that all of these people generally are taken care of well by their families and, of course, by many public institutions from the time that they are born till they are 18, but then what happens is that at the age of 18 a lot of that responsibility suddenly shifts to public institutions like the office of the public guardian. Of course, the actual source of income for these individuals shifts to the program which we refer to as AISH, assistance for the severely handicapped.

Unfortunately, this government has made a number of decisions with regard to people living on AISH which are problematic. They have failed to raise the rates as inflation goes up. They deindex them. They have delayed the AISH payments for three days at the end of every month, which makes it very difficult to pay your bills on time. Of course, they did all of this just to make their budget look slightly more balanced at an earlier time, no real function either for government or for the people involved. It was just simply a self-preservation act on the part of this government.

It is very discouraging, then, to see them pile onto the people who live on AISH, people who have the inability to care for their own needs, this issue of removing the Henson trust during an omnibus bill in which they just slid this in amongst many other things. The purpose of the Henson trust was really quite clear, and that was for families to participate in the well-being of their family members beyond their own life.

Now, many of us choose to do that. You know, many of us have spent a great deal of time ensuring our finances are in order so that we can pass on the benefits of our successes in our lives to our own children. This should be equally true of people who have children with disabilities. In my own case, for example, if I were to die in the next little while, all of that which I own will be passed on to my children, and it would not be subtracted from their income. They would be able to receive those monies. In fact, I could even right now provide significant amounts of money to my children as a gift, and it would not even be taxable at this time.

Unfortunately, if you're on AISH, all of that goes out the window. Gifts from your own parents suddenly come off your income. If your parents have put money aside in order to be able to provide you with resources for the rest of your life through a Henson trust, that would have been protected if the legislation had been left alone. But this government chose to remove that, and as a result, now if you set money aside for your children, that money is taken off their income, you know, which essentially means that if you have been a responsible and caring parent and you've set money aside for your children, you essentially are saving money for the government. You're not saving money for your children. You're not providing them with the ability to do things.

Having worked with many disabled people in my career as a social worker, I know that their life is not a rich life in terms of finances. They do not have the wealth to do things they want to do. I remember one young man I worked with at Camp He Ho Ha, where I worked for three summers, put myself through university, by the name of Ricky. I ran into him on Jasper Avenue one day. I asked what he was doing, and he said that he just sits on Jasper Avenue with his coffee cup there on the end of his wheelchair. He cannot speak very well, so it's an elongated conversation. People put money into his little cup. He doesn't even ask for it. But his disability is so obvious that people come along and put money into his cup.

I said, "Oh, what do you plan to do with that?" He said, "I'm going to buy myself something to play music with." I mean, he had to go out onto the street to ask other Albertans to contribute to his life just so he could listen to some music, which is one of the few pleasures that he had available to him because his disability was such that he could not feed himself, for example. He could only move around in an electric wheelchair, because he did have enough control to be able to manipulate the chair itself. I just thought: you know, living on AISH, which is what he was living on, is not a very nice situation to be in. By the time you pay your basic rent and the extra costs of your disability, often things like wheelchairs and other kinds of things you might need or lifts in the toilet and other things like that, you really have no money. So he was actually in the position of having to sit on the corner of Jasper Avenue, collect money so that he could buy himself a small stereo of some nature.

We just thought it was really important, when we were in government, to have a Henson trust that would prevent that kind of thing from happening, and now this government has taken it away.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has risen.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, I'll keep my comments very, very brief. I think, as you can see, that our caucus has concurred that this bill is necessary and provides a good function, an improved function for trusts here in the province of Alberta. I certainly just want to reiterate how it reflects positively on how a bill should be researched and solicited and consulted with the people who actually use that law. This being a reflection of the Law Reform Institute consultations as well as a reflection of the Uniform Law Conference of Canada – right? – from a number of years back, it seems to hold up very well not just as legislation for the province but as part of having some concurrence with other forms of trust law in other jurisdictions across the country. Based on all of those things, I think that we can certainly support this bill, and I appreciate the minister and his department for doing work to get it done.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any others wishing to join debate?

Seeing none, I am prepared to ask the question. I have noted that there is an opportunity to close debate, which has been waived.

[Motion carried; Bill 12 read a second time]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you. I move that the Assembly be adjourned until 1:30 p.m.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, April 21, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, please remain standing as we will be led in the singing of God Save the Queen.

Hon. Members:

God save our gracious Queen,
Long live our noble Queen,
God save the Queen!
Send her victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us,
God save the Queen!

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Statement by the Speaker

Queen Elizabeth II

The Speaker: In April 1926 Alberta's fifth Legislature was getting ready to adjourn in advance of the general election to be held in June of that year. However, I imagine the enthusiasm for the upcoming election was slightly overshadowed by the competing headlines across the pond when the Duke and Duchess of York welcomed their first child, Princess Elizabeth. As we all know, Elizabeth would go on to become the Queen at the ripe age of 25. Although officially celebrated in June each year, April 21, today, marks Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the II's actual birthday. Of course, this year is even more to celebrate as Her Majesty celebrates her 96th birthday and marks the 70th year of service during her platinum jubilee.

As we honour this occasion, I remind members that the Legislative Assembly of Alberta invites you and all Albertans to join in the jubilee celebrations by composing a congratulatory message for Her Majesty the Queen. Details of the messages can be found in the visit section of assembly.ab.ca.

Please join me in recognizing the devoted service of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II today on her 96th birthday. [Standing ovation]

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, I am pleased to introduce to you eight guests seated in the gallery today from Black Canadian Women in Action. They are guests of the Minister of Labour and Immigration. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Also joining us today are four special guests of the Member for Edmonton-North West: Volodymyr Bril and Iryna Bril, two Ukrainians who have recently come to Alberta as refugees. They are accompanied today by Marni Panas and Alex Panas, two constituents who are billeting them here in Edmonton. Thank you so much for joining us today. I invite you also to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. [Standing ovation]

Ukrainian Refugees

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, this entire House stands with the people of Ukraine. I think I can speak for all of us here that we are deeply moved by the suffering being inflicted by the illegal and aggressive invasion by Vladimir Putin's Russia. But in the midst of this tragedy that has created millions of refugees, torn families apart, taken lives, and destroyed livelihoods, there are moments that remind us of the good that still exists in the world.

We saw the efforts of the former Premier and Deputy Premier filling a plane with 35 tonnes of aid to Ukraine, and that same plane brought dozens of Ukrainian refugees back to Edmonton. The support for the people of Ukraine from Albertans has been amazing, and I thank each and every person who has stepped up to do what they can.

Today I want to give a special shout-out to some of my constituents. In the gallery are Marni and Alex Panas, who have taken in two refugees recently arrived from Ukraine. Also joining us in the gallery is Volodymyr Bril and Iryna Bril, who arrived here from Ternopil in Western Ukraine, not far from Lviv. We all know the map of Ukraine very well now, don't we? Volodymyr and Iryna escaped Russian bombing to Edmonton, where Marni and Alex, who are also of Ukrainian descent, opened their doors and their home to them. It's a good thing you got a bigger house, hey? I am proud to be able to introduce them as such wonderful, compassionate people to this Assembly and all Albertans, and I am proud to represent them here today.

They are not alone in stepping up to support the refugees in Ukraine. Local families across Alberta have opened their homes to those fleeing the violence; 50 Ukrainians arrived in Jasper, for example, to find welcoming homes and businesses. While I wish that the reasons for these refugees to come to Alberta, to find safety and security from a horrific invasion, had not come to pass, the compassion of Albertans like Marni, Alex, and so many others continues to show to the world what a welcoming place our province, Alberta, is. [Remarks in Ukrainian] [Standing ovation]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Balancing Pool

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We've seen time and time again that during their time in government you can't trust the NDP with Alberta's economy. Today the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity released an independent financial review of the Balancing Pool which further confirms what we already know, that the NDP value their leftist extremist friends far more than the hard-working Albertans we're all here to serve.

The review found that during their ideological mismanagement of the Balancing Pool $1.34 billion was lost between May 2015 and April 2019. This loss was a direct result of decisions made under the previous government and will have to be paid off by ratepayers until 2030. At a time when utility bills are rising and Albertans are struggling to manage the burden of inflation, the NDP shouts outrage. What they should be shouting are apologies and taking ownership of the $1.3 billion fiasco that they caused. These massive losses are a direct result of their ignorant and ideological market meddling.

While in government the Alberta NDP did nothing to enhance future capacity and oversaw an additional $7.5 billion transmission build-out that wasn't supported by economic growth forecasts. That's a total of $9 billion that they are forcing ratepayers to pay off, not to mention the effects of their job-killing carbon tax and all the investors that they sent running out of the province. They failed to address the long-term issues facing Alberta's electricity system and left Albertans to pay for their mistakes. We will not be doing the same.

With the expiry of the PPAs at the end of 2020 we will be taking steps to dissolve the Balancing Pool, which included releasing this independent review while ensuring that no future government can incur losses through this agency. We're doing the hard work to set our province and the electricity grid up for success in the future, which starts and ends with maintaining affordability.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock.

Federal Emissions Reduction Plan

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For many years the Trudeau government attacks on western Canada and its industry seemed to have no bounds and no end, from the cancellation of pipeline projects to Bill C-48 banning tankers on the west coast to Bill C-69, better known as the no-more-pipelines bill. During a time when energy security is paramount and there is a world-wide demand for ethical energy, instead of reducing barriers and supporting the Canadian energy sector, the federal government continues to increase barriers, putting our global competitiveness at risk.

The 25 per cent increase of the Trudeau-NDP carbon tax on April 1 when Albertans are already struggling to make ends meet shows how out of touch he is with the impacts his policies are having on everyday Albertans, but it doesn't end there. Most recently Trudeau and his minister of environment have slyly inserted a discriminating tax against pickup trucks as part of their plan to reach their delusional emissions reduction targets. This hefty, unreasonable Trudeau truck tax is a direct attack on Albertans, who purchase about one-third of pickup trucks in all of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps our privileged Prime Minister, who is accustomed to trust funds, does not understand the concept of hard, demanding work, the type of work that requires hauling of equipment, tools, and materials that can only be done with trucks. Perhaps our Prime Minister does not understand our agriculture, energy, and forestry industries here in Alberta and the industries' reliance on trucks to continue to contribute billions of dollars, hundreds of thousands of jobs, and economic prosperity to all of Canada. Perhaps our Prime Minister does not understand that certain road and weather conditions require such vehicles for transportation and human survival.

Mr. Speaker, this is an attack on our Alberta way of life, our ability to earn a living, and on our very means of survival. The fact that the Trudeau government and his NDP allies would accept this as any type of benefit highlights the delusion that Trudeau purports.

1:40 Utility Rebate Programs and Legislation

Mr. Nielsen: Let's talk about this government's record on utilities. It was months ago when our caucus raised the issue of utility bills hammering small businesses and families. The associate minister proudly told this House that his plan was to do – and I'm directly quoting – nothing.

Then, months later, the Premier decided that action needed to be taken and committed to looking at a natural gas rebate. Our caucus stood with families who told us they were being forced to choose between groceries and paying their bills. Then, in February, the government introduced a budget that didn't mention an electricity rebate, and while it did have a natural gas rebate, it had no details, funding, or plans to implement it. It was a fake program.

Our caucus proposed a bill that would protect Albertans from having their power cut off. The UCP voted it down right before a snowstorm hits Alberta.

Now they have their own bill, a bill that doesn't guarantee rebates, a bill that has no timelines for providing support to Albertans. The minister who proposed it was asked multiple times when Albertans might see these rebates, and not one time could he answer this simple question. It took the Premier and the minister weeks to realize their rebates needed legislation, a textbook case of total incompetence, Mr. Speaker.

Now, as Albertans cope with utility bills that have reached the thousands and have been climbing for months, this government has done nothing for them – nothing – just like the associate minister promised, clearly as he always planned.

Mr. Speaker, Albertans need relief. Albertans need support. They need a government that has their best interest at heart and is motivated to serve them. They aren't getting this from this selfish, untrustworthy, and incompetent UCP government. So while the UCP is content to sit back and watch Alberta families struggle, our caucus will continue to be their voice and to advocate for real actions to help them. Albertans deserve better than the UCP.

Extremism and Political Discourse

Mr. Schow: Mr. Speaker, the other day Alberta Health Services announced that Verna Yiu would not continue as CEO. In response, the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona went on Twitter to decry the decision and called my colleague the Member for Peace River an extremist because he dared to publicly challenge AHS leadership during the pandemic.

If it's extreme to represent my constituents in this Chamber like the Member for Peace River did or to question the decisions made by public health officials or defend thousands of public health care workers from being fired or university students from getting kicked out of school for not being vaccinated, then colour me extreme as well. But let's get serious. We shouldn't throw the word "extreme" around too lightly. It's not extreme to challenge the mainstream.

It is, however, extreme for the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood to tell Albertans that Extinction Rebellion and their radical views to blow up pipelines have a place in our classrooms. It's extreme that the NDP have adopted the Leap Manifesto at their annual general meeting in Edmonton, the same Leap Manifesto that calls for the complete shutdown of Alberta's energy sector, abolishing hundreds of thousands of mortgage-paying, grocery-buying jobs. Extreme is the Member for Edmonton-City Centre fund raising off a pandemic or the Member for Edmonton-South illegally hacking the Premier of Alberta's personal health information. Finally, extreme . . . [interjections]

Speaker's Ruling Interrupting Members' Statements

The Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika is making a member's statement that I appreciate has some vigour involved in it. Members of this Assembly make these sorts of statements on a very regular basis. Whether you are on their team or not, both sides have heckled during this particular member's statement. Everyone is held culpable in that, but as a result the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika is going to be able to start again from the beginning, just as I have allowed the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud in other places to do the same. I hope that we can contain ourselves over the next two minutes while the member has the floor.

Extremism and Political Discourse (continued)

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The other day Alberta Health Services announced that Verna Yiu would not continue as CEO. In response, the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona went on Twitter to decry the decision and called my colleague the Member for Peace River an extremist because he dared to publicly challenge AHS leadership during the pandemic.

But let's get serious.

We shouldn't throw around the word "extreme" too lightly. It's not extreme to challenge the mainstream. Extreme is the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood telling Albertans that Extinction Rebellion and their radical views to blow up pipelines have a place in our classrooms. Extreme is an NDP that adopted the Leap Manifesto at their annual general meeting in Edmonton, the same Leap Manifesto that calls for the complete shutdown of Alberta's energy sector, abolishing hundreds of thousands of mortgage-paying, grocery-buying jobs. Extreme is the Member for Edmonton-City Centre fund raising off a pandemic or the Member for Edmonton-South illegally hacking the Premier of Alberta's personal health information. Finally, extreme is the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud, while in this Chamber, accusing me and other male members of the UCP caucus of supporting and engaging in sexual assault and then refusing to apologize for those disgusting and heinous remarks.

Mr. Speaker, this is the people's Chamber, where healthy debate on their behalf is a central pillar of our work, so the next time the Leader of the Opposition wants to go on social media and insult another member, calling them extreme, I suggest she first open up the camera app to selfie mode, take a good hard look, and ask herself: who's the real extremist?

RamadanBasket.ca

Member Loyola: Mr. Speaker, Ramadan is a very important time of year for Muslims all around the world, during which followers of the Prophet Muhammad – peace be upon him – are called to the spiritual refinement. This is achieved through fasting, prayer, study, and, most importantly, what is known as zakat. This word is often translated as "charity," but that is an incorrect translation. The word "zakat" in the Quran is described as giving to the poor what is owed to them because of the corruption, sin, and oppression that takes place upon the Earth by people. That is to say, where unjust conditions have occurred, it is our responsibility as Muslims to contribute toward redistribution of wealth to make sure that those that are going without are cared for.

One group that is doing their part to redistribute wealth is RamadanBasket.ca, a local fundraising initiative by dedicated members of the Muslim community. This initiative started here in Edmonton in 2016 to feed those less fortunate overseas in several countries in the Middle East, Asia, Africa, and Europe during the month of Ramadan. The group wanted me to highlight specifically that this initiative has zero admin fees, so all money collected goes straight to the families being helped. This year they will surpass $500,000 collected, bringing the total number of families fed to 25,000 during Ramadan. RamadanBasket.ca has brought the whole Muslim community together to work on one united project. Participants include schools and most local masjids in Edmonton and several across Alberta. In order to raise money, local volunteers do everything from organizing bottle drives to setting up donation booths at many local businesses, and these endeavours have been covered by local media. For two years in a row now RamadanBasket.ca has been supported by local athlete Alphonso Davies.

It is my absolute pleasure to recognize these amazingly hard-working volunteers, that have made RamadanBasket.ca a huge success. I congratulate them for bringing their faith into action by helping so many families around the world. May their efforts be recognized by all, including our Creator, and may they be blessed for their good deeds during this blessed month of Ramadan and all year-round.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Umoja Community Mosaic

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As you know, I often like to take the opportunities in here to highlight good-news stories from Calgary-Currie. Today I rise to tell you about Umoja Community Mosaic, a Calgary-based charity which is the next chapter of its previous brand, soccer without boundaries, started in Calgary-Currie. Now, as you know, before becoming an MLA, I was not very politically involved. I was a lawyer paying my bills. I started a local company, I built it up, and every business deal I did included fund raising for charities. That is how I met some amazing community leaders. That is also how I met Jean Claude Munyezamu.

Jean Claude Munyezamu is the founder of Umoja Community Mosaic. He escaped the genocide in Rwanda, found his way to Canada. Then in 2010, noting that children in his neighbourhood were getting into trouble, Jean Claude took some soccer balls to a nearby park on a Saturday morning, and soccer without boundaries was born. Now, what he probably wouldn't tell you is that he actually had to clear the park first of a bunch of drug dealers who had set up shop there.

From its humble soccer beginnings Umoja Community Mosaic has grown to provide many, many community services. It now provides culturally sensitive food hampers to over 3,500 people in need. The soccer program now has over 650 kids. There are after school programs, community-based tutoring, arts, crafts, music programs, and I could go on.

1:50

Umoja and the good work that it does would not exist without Jean Claude. He has received more awards and accolades than I can even list, including the 2019 immigrants of distinction award, the 2021 community justice award for leadership. He is an antiracism pioneer. He is a true change-maker. It is organizations like Umoja Community Mosaic that need our support, so if you can, please donate. Go to www.umojamosaic.org/donate today.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has question 1.

Utility Costs and Rebates

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the UCP unveiled legislation to implement a utility rebate they promised Albertans months ago. I would say that it's a case of better late than never except the minister said that Albertans will still have to wait months more. The minister gave many excuses yesterday, but it all comes down to this: it will be months before Albertans see a single dime of relief. This is a brutal failure by the UCP and a demonstration of total incompetence. To the Premier. You're already months behind. Why will it take several more months to help Albertans struggling to pay their energy bills?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, in fact, this government is taking real action to help address the rising cost of electricity, which is largely the result of reckless NDP policies like their power purchase agreement fiasco. Just today the minister for natural gas and electricity released our promised audit of the PPA fiasco under the NDP, demonstrating that they cost electricity consumers $1.3 billion on that alone in addition to their carbon tax, their 7 and a half billion dollars on transmission costs.

Mr. Speaker, we want to get that relief to Albertans, so why is the NDP holding up the bill and delaying that utility relief?

Ms Ganley: That is categorically false, as usual.

Let's talk about the bill we're here to debate. The House is a place of democracy, and as a member of the Official Opposition it is not my job to rubber stamp the government's bills. It is our job to make them better. You know what would get these rebates moving faster, Mr. Speaker? A real legislated timeline, a commitment in writing to force the UCP to get the money flowing. Would the Premier support adding a legislative timeline to deliver this rebate? Yes or no?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I have to apologize to the House. I was inaccurate earlier on when I said that the NDP's power purchase agreement fiasco cost ratepayers $1.3 billion. In fact, the audit conducted and released today demonstrates that it was $1.34 billion – $1.34 billion – on top of $7.5 billion in unnecessary transmission costs, on top of their carbon tax, on top of the billions from shutting down the coal plants. Shame on them for driving up electricity prices for Albertans and for blocking today's relief.

Ms Ganley: Blaming others is all this Premier knows how to do. It's weak leadership, Mr. Speaker.

The Premier wants to talk about the past, but he doesn't want to talk about the Conservative decision to overbuild transmission lines. He doesn't want to talk about the failure of the deregulated market to actually increase competition. He doesn't want to talk about the fact that power companies are jacking up their markups to squeeze more profits out of Alberta families. Will the Premier commit to an independent public inquiry into power costs to give Albertans the full picture, not UCP half-truths?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we just released an independent audit of the NDP's PPA fiasco: $1.34 billion down the toilet. She talks about these decisions as though they're just in the past. Here's what the NDP doesn't understand in their illiteracy about economics and about energy markets. Those prior errors – shutting down the coal plants, the carbon tax, the PPA fiasco, the overbuild on transmission – all of those are costs now passed on to taxpayers, so why won't they support the bill to get that relief to Albertans right away?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Automobile Insurance Industry Lobbying

Ms Phillips: Now, Mr. Speaker, Albertans have been absolutely side-swiped by massive increases to their car insurance. They want to know why. Part of the problem here is that the UCP government removed the NDP's cap on insurance premiums after a few meetings with their friends in the big insurance lobby. Now, yesterday, when I asked who these lobbyists met with, the Premier said: oh, not me. Okay, then. Let's find out who. Will the Premier table all meeting minutes, agenda items, correspondence, and calendars detailing UCP meetings with insurance lobbyists today?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, that's patently ridiculous. There are 25,000 people who work in the government of Alberta, and I don't track every single meeting. I can say that I never met with any lobbyist to discuss lifting the cap. We received advice from Treasury Board and Finance – and it was accepted by cabinet – to stop the flight from the Alberta market of insurers, the situation where tens of thousands of people could not get insurance and where many people were having to pay 100 per cent of their premiums up front because the NDP had made such a hash of the insurance market. Thankfully, we now see premiums coming down, and we implore the insurance companies to continue that downward momentum.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, I don't trust this Premier's word, MLAs on both sides of this House don't trust the Premier's word, and Albertans don't trust the Premier's words. Here's what we do know. UCP insiders, including the Premier's close friend and campaign manager, Nick Koolsbergen, lobbied the government to take the cap off. The Premier caved, and now Albertans are paying hundreds of dollars more. So once more: will the Premier tell us exactly who in cabinet or on their staff met with car insurance lobbyists and table those documents?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, the member knows perfectly well that lobbyists have to report meetings with public office holders.

The reality is this. The NDP screwed up the market. They were driving insurers out of Alberta. They took no action. This government did. We brought in legislation to limit soft tissue personal injury awards, that were increasing significantly the cost of insurance. We've taken measures that have brought more insurers back into the market. That is exactly why premiums are now going down.

Ms Phillips: You know, the Premier spins this story about the hard-knock life of the multibillion-dollar insurance industry and says that they have it so tough. He says that they were looking to leave the province. None of them did, and in 2020 those companies raked in $1 billion more in premiums than they paid out in claims. Albertans are shedding no tears for them. Why did the Premier let these big, profitable companies take Albertans for a ride? Why did he put his lobbyist friends first and Alberta drivers last? And for the last time, Mr. Speaker, where are those meeting documents?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, once again, the NDP completely screwed up the insurance market such that companies were no longer providing coverage in Alberta. Many people – I recall that three years ago we were all as MLAs hearing from constituents who said that they could not get insurance, and they couldn't afford to pay up front for the whole year. That's the disaster that they left us with, which is why we brought in Bill 43, that has begun to reduce the cost of payouts by insurance companies. That's why premiums are now coming down.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo is next.

Calgary Storm Damage Recovery Funding

Member Ceci: On June 13, 2020, a terrible hailstorm swept across northern Calgary and nearby communities. It severely damaged homes, vehicles, businesses, and farms. The storm caused more than $1.2 billion in damage, one of the most expensive natural disasters in Canadian history. But that's just the beginning. For months and months the Premier and his UCP government turned their backs on the people of Calgary. Why did the UCP refuse to activate the disaster recovery program to help families and businesses recover from the hail damage that they suffered?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, we were all disturbed to see the huge costs imposed on many families, not just in northeast Calgary but other parts of southern Alberta, during those hailstorms. I am pleased to report that one year out over 90 per cent of claims have been fully resolved, and the remaining 10 per cent outstanding were well into the claims process. I don't know why the NDP is trying to politicize the process. Where people have home insurance, they've received the benefits that they are entitled to. In other cases they're working through that. That's exactly how it should work.

Member Ceci: Many northeast residents who didn't have hail insurance got no help from the UCP, and the residents who did have that insurance got the runaround from their insurance companies for months. There are families and businesses in northeast Calgary, we've just heard, who still haven't gotten their claims paid out two years later. Of course, the UCP took the side of their friends in the insurance industry. Premiums are soaring even while some families are repairing the damage out of their own pockets. Why did this Premier and the UCP government refuse to help the people of northeast Calgary and choose, instead, to help their wealthy friends in the insurance industry?

Mr. Kenney: What in the world is he talking about, Mr. Speaker? People buy insurance. When they incur damage, it's validated, and they get their payments. They get their benefits. That's exactly the legal obligation of the insurance firms. Is the member now suggesting that the taxpayer should be forced to insure losses for people who do not acquire insurance? Then why would anybody buy insurance? It's called moral hazard. It would impose billions of costs, of dollars on taxpayers. I guess that's the socialist way.

Member Ceci: What this member knows is that the UCP refused to help Calgaryans, but other levels of government did so. The city of Calgary provided $3,000 rebates for homeowners to replace hail-damaged roofs with new hail-resistant roofs. It's such a good program that they're oversubscribed. They have many more eligible households than they can afford at the city of Calgary. Here's the promise: an NDP government will bring provincial dollars to this program, make sure every eligible household in Calgary gets help with hail-resistant roofs. That's a promise.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, the disaster assistance program provided significant funding to uninsurable losses under the same policy the NDP government had in place. You know, what a shell game. Here they are trying to politicize this. The insurance policy of this government is the same as the NDP government, which is to say that people have an obligation to insure their homes against damage of this nature, and now the NDP is saying that we should remove that obligation and move it all onto taxpayers. That's why, if they were still in office, we'd have a multibillion-dollar deficit.

Kindergarten to Grade 6 Draft Curriculum

Member Irwin: Teachers involved in the writing of curriculum seems reasonable, right? Well, according to at least one UCP MLA, not so much. In a meeting with the Coaldale council the MLA for Taber-Warner stated that he wasn't sure having teachers involved would be critical in determining a good curriculum, that same UCP curriculum opposed by teachers, students, parents, school boards, Indigenous communities, francophone Albertans, and so many more. Does the Premier share his MLA's view that excluding teachers makes the curriculum better?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, teachers have been deeply involved in the development of the revised curriculum. Over a hundred teachers have been involved in the formal consultation advisory committees with the Minister of Education. The revisions have been delayed to take on board more constructive input, for example in the social studies curriculum. But the real question is: why does the NDP oppose world-leading techniques for language arts and math instruction based on the best practices around the world? Why do they want to continue to hold Alberta students back? Why do they oppose these meaningful improvements in both reading and mathematics?

Member Irwin: We know that when it comes to this curriculum, the UCP has a clear vision. The Premier's racist friend, who slammed the Pope's apology for residential schools, got to hold a pen while teachers are told by the UCP that their involvement isn't necessary to create a good curriculum. Albertans know that the opposite is true. Can the Premier explain why Chris Champion got to write the first draft of the curriculum while teachers are cast aside and told that their input isn't necessary?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, in their ideological zeal to impose their left-wing agenda in the schools, the NDP is jeopardizing life-learning chances for Alberta students. Sarah Sarich, the president of Decoding Dyslexia, wrote yesterday in the Journal that the new English language arts curriculum "will prevent the systematic discrimination of students who struggle to read and has the potential to dramatically improve literacy rates for all Alberta students." Why does the NDP oppose the right to read for Alberta students?

Member Irwin: Albertans know that this government doesn't value teachers, something that was only confirmed when we saw the MLA for Taber-Warner tell his constituents that involving teachers wouldn't make the curriculum better. Since this government is funding 1,000 fewer teachers, showing that not only did they not value teachers in curriculum; they don't value them in the classrooms either, does the Premier think that excluding teachers and continually disrespecting them will get his Dumpster fire of a curriculum a passing grade? Let me tell you that Albertans are saying loudly and clearly: it's a huge fail.

Mr. Kenney: Again, the NDP is trying to hold back significant improvements in math proficiency and in literacy. Dr. Nhung Tran-Davies, a very powerful advocate for elementary education, says:

It took eight years of advocacy for me to see this . . . [a curriculum that] is clear, concise, age-appropriate and well sequenced. It is a curriculum that sees and realizes our children's fullest potential. They will have the confidence and skills to pursue their dreams and succeed not only in the STEM fields, but also in life.

Mr. Speaker, why does the NDP oppose this concrete progress for elementary school kids?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein has a question.

AIMCo and Heritage Savings Trust Fund Performance

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. AIMCo is a very important Alberta institution that generates returns for all Albertans in the heritage savings trust fund but also for thousands of public-sector servants whose pension contributions rely on AIMCo investment performance. The professional experience of investment managers at AIMCo means high returns for pension holders, which in turn reduce contribution rates. To the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance: what is the state of AIMCo's investment performance for 2021?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for that great question because I'm very pleased to rise and talk about the status of AIMCo's returns. In fact, yesterday AIMCo announced a record annual value-add of $7.7 billion. That's over and above the benchmark rate. For the year-end, December 31, the total fund return was 14.7 per cent, 8 per cent over their benchmark. I'm very pleased to say that this marks the strongest year of returns ever for AIMCo.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that that is absolutely amazing news and given that during the Budget 2022 consultations and following the news of Alberta's first balanced budget in more than a decade Albertans wanted to know what was happening with the Alberta heritage savings trust fund and given that AIMCo announced incredible results for 2021 yesterday and that the heritage fund has also had incredible results presented in Budget 2022, can the Minister of Finance tell us what the status of the heritage savings trust fund is today?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Yeah. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to provide that information. The heritage fund has seen seven quarters of positive returns. In fact, in the first three quarters of the previous fiscal year the fund generated more than $2 billion at a rate of 14 and a half per cent. At the end of December the heritage savings trust fund had an $18.9 billion balance of net assets. We remain focused on ensuring the heritage fund continues to be a source of pride and security for all Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that in 1976 Premier Peter Lougheed established the fund to provide for future generations and that over the years government after government has pulled money into general revenue and given that our government has balanced the budget and is looking forward to contributing to the heritage savings trust fund in the near future, can the Minister of Finance tell us what his vision is for the heritage savings trust fund going forward?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. One advantage of fiscal discipline is a balanced budget. An advantage of a balanced budget is that it gives a government and a people options. We committed to reinvesting any surplus back into the heritage savings trust fund this year. I will reiterate that commitment today in front of this House and in front of Albertans.

Government Policies and Cost of Living

Ms Renaud: While this government can't even figure out how to get the utility rebates they promised out the door, Alberta families are struggling with inflation. The Calgary Food Bank is reporting a year-over-year increase in demand from 11 to 20 per cent. Over 47,000 were served last month, an increase of over 10,000. The Premier and government are ignoring the increasing number of Albertans who need support to actually put food on the table. What tangible support can the Minister of Finance offer these families who've been left behind by government? They really are struggling to make ends meet right now.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the member's question because there's no doubt that inflation is creating cost pressures for all Albertans and many Alberta households. That's why we moved forward with the electricity rebate. Every household will receive an electricity rebate in the weeks and months coming up. On top of that, we have suspended the fuel tax. Again, every Alberta motorist, every small business will not pay any fuel tax for the first quarter. That may be extended for the full year. On top of that, we're delivering responsible fiscal management.

Ms Renaud: I'm talking about real people right now.

Given that this punishing inflation is making these hurtful UCP policy decisions even worse and given that the UCP chose to use inflation to take thousands from seniors, disabled Albertans, and students and given that the Calgary Food Bank is reporting that they're dealing with people who are at a crisis level right now, who have used up all of their resources, will the Finance minister step in by ending his policy of using inflation to take food away from the most vulnerable?

2:10

Mr. Toews: Well, again, Mr. Speaker, we're moving forward with a number of initiatives that will provide relief for Alberta households and families. Moreover, Budget 2022 was about positioning this province for increased investment attraction, increased job creation, increased opportunities for every Albertan. Right now there are tens of thousands of employers right across the province looking for additional employees. Now is a great time for Albertans to step into that labour market, a great time for employees to take on a job or upgrade a job.

Ms Renaud: Given that this government has systematically made life more difficult by deindexing benefits that were already poverty level – the Business Council of Alberta is reporting a 4 per cent decrease in average household incomes – and given that this would be an ideal time for the UCP to end their policy of taking a billion dollars from Albertans in the form of a sneaky bracket-creep tax hike, so that families can afford to buy groceries, or reindex benefits at the very least, will the Finance minister admit that Alberta families are struggling to put food on the table right now and do something? End this . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are taking action right now, again, with a whole host of relief programs, including the suspension of the fuel tax. We're positioning this province for increased opportunities for every Albertan, and on top of that we're delivering responsible fiscal management. We inherited a fiscal train wreck from the members opposite that would have given this government no options to provide relief today to ensure our programs are sustainable for tomorrow. We're taking real action.

Postsecondary Tuition Fees

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Advanced Education approved enormous, exceptional tuition increases for next year and then keeps bragging in this House that Alberta's tuition isn't that expensive because last year Alberta was still below the national average. Since this minister won't level with students and families about the real cost of education in Alberta, allow me to do so. Over their degree, this is how much more the University of Alberta will pay than the Canadian median: law, $6,600; business, $6,400; engineering, $1,300; dentistry, $45,780. How can this minister defend those . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I didn't quite hear a question in there. You know, I think we've been over this in the past, but I'm happy to go over it again for the benefit of the member. According to Statistics Canada tuition in Alberta today remains below the national average, and with respect to some of the programs that the member is referencing, many of those programs also continue to remain below the national average. As a quick example, the University of Alberta's MBA will be $24,000 for new incoming students. Across the U15 it's $29,000, so prices in Alberta continue to remain competitive.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that this minister claims that these enormous hikes are a good deal because they will increase program quality for students but given that the students in the programs don't seem to agree – student representatives and programs have spoken out against tuition increases because of the massive cost to students and lower quality of education – and given that the minister himself gave himself the power to approve these increases without the support of students, something that would not have happened under an NDP government, if the minister's gigantic increases are such a good deal, why do students not want them?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As the member opposite mentioned, these increases must go to improve the quality of the program, and that's precisely where those increases will go. The institutions have submitted very robust proposals providing details as to how those increases will improve the quality of the program, and that'll indeed be the case. As well, a section of that revenue will also go to strengthen student assistance and provide more support and financial assistance to students in those programs, but again, as I referenced earlier, many of those programs still remain competitive with the national average.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that the minister claims that he cares about student consultation but that FOIP requests by the student union have showed that the deans of the affected faculties did not think that they had enough time to do a consultation properly and given that all of these consultations were crammed into final exams in June 2021 and into the busy first weeks of September classes, so the rushed amateur-hour proposals that this minister approved are a direct result of these timelines, why did the minister force students and universities to rush to develop these important proposals in such a short time?

Mr. Nicolaides: Mr. Speaker, we didn't force and rush anyone to do anything. The universities have the discretion to submit the proposals whenever they want, and it's completely within their discretion. There are no timelines as to when the proposals must be received. In fact, when we first received the proposals, we sent them back to ask the university to engage in more consultation. I have no idea what timelines the member is referring to because there are no timelines in the process. It's completely up to the discretion of the universities and the institutions as to how they want to manage that process.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Nurse Practitioners and Physicians in Southern Alberta

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Nurse practitioners are an important part of Alberta's health care system. They are registered nurses with graduate degrees and perform many similar duties that physicians do such as diagnosis, treatment, prescription of medications, and many more. With the current struggles facing our rural health care system, nurse practitioners might be a great solution to a very real problem. Can the Minister of Health please tell this House about his department's efforts to bring more of these talented health care workers into our communities?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Nurse practitioners can provide many of the same services as doctors, and they play a vital role in our plan to address the ongoing concerns concerning rural health care. That's why we initiated the nurse practitioner support program. We also updated regulations to increase their scope of practice, allowing them to complete driver medical examination forms and work as medical directors and provide real-time advice to paramedics. We'll keep working to ensure nurse practitioners can provide quality health care for all Albertans, particularly in rural Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for his answer. As I mentioned earlier, given that nurse practitioners can perform certainly not all but many of the same functions as physicians and given that timely access to quality health care is a major concern for the residents of Lethbridge and the surrounding area, through the Speaker to the same minister: does he see an opportunity for nurse practitioners to be more involved in southern Alberta's health care system, and are they looking to attract these practitioners to Lethbridge?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thanks again, Mr. Speaker, and thanks again to the hon. member for his advocacy for Lethbridge. We recognize the need in Lethbridge and in other communities. We started the primary care nurse practitioner support program to hire 80 new nurse practitioners. AHS has already hired 50 new nurse practitioners and is currently in talks with 20 more candidates. There are 2.8 full-time equivalent NP positions located in Lethbridge, and they're under active recruitment right now. Albertans deserve the same level of care regardless of where they live. We are endeavouring to deliver that.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and once again to the same minister for his answer. Given that I've raised the recent issue of the lack of doctors in Lethbridge directly with the minister and given that my constituents are rightly concerned about their access to quality health care as a result and given the government's commitment to addressing the health care of rural Albertans, can the minister give an update on the current efforts to attract more doctors to Lethbridge and ensure southern Alberta maintains access to the quality health care that they deserve?

Mr. Copping: Thanks again, Mr. Speaker, to the member for his continuing advocacy. AHS is currently recruiting 26 family medicine positions in Lethbridge, and they've interviewed to date 23 candidates. Ten of those candidates have committed to work in Lethbridge and are awaiting their CPSA assessments. Another five physicians already working in Lethbridge as locums have been offered permanent positions there, and three of them have accepted. I hope to see them stay and work in Lethbridge and see new physicians join them in the coming weeks as I provide more information to my colleagues here in Lethbridge.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton–City Centre.

Rural Physician Recruitment and Retention

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The UCP's attacks on Alberta's health care system are harming families in every part of our province. Dozens of communities have partially closed hospitals. Tens of thousands of people in Lethbridge can't find a family doctor, and now this shortage is spreading into the Bow Valley, where there isn't a single doctor in the region accepting new patients. In Canmore those without a doctor now are losing access to a walk-in clinic. We haven't heard a word about this from the Member for Banff-Kananaskis, so I'll ask the Minister of Health. Why under the UCP government are whole regions of Alberta continuing to lose access to a family doctor?

2:20

Mr. Copping: I thank the hon. member for the question. This is an important issue. We recognize that there are challenges in finding primary care in rural Alberta. Mr. Speaker, this is an issue not only affecting Alberta, but it's affecting all provinces across the entire country. As I indicated to my hon. colleague from Lethbridge, we are utilizing PCNs to be able to help fill the gap, plus we are actively recruiting family doctors across the entire province. I can advise the hon. member across the way that AHS and Covenant are recruiting to fill two recent family physician vacancies in the Canmore region, and we're going to continue to work . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton–City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that this is an issue this government has actively made worse because given that last week I stood with Dr. Brendan Flowers, a family physician who practises in Canmore, one of the most beautiful places in the world, yet they are struggling to find doctors willing to work there, and given that as doctors retire without being replaced, the workload on Dr. Flowers and his colleagues is increasing, putting him at risk of burnout and early retirement, and given that Dr. Flowers said that decisions of this UCP government are making it harder to attract doctors to Alberta and the Bow Valley, what specifically is this minister doing to undo the damage his government created?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, let's set the record straight. A recent report demonstrated that if we compare Q1 last year to Q1 this year, 99 more doctors came to Alberta than left the province or left the practice. We are committed to being able to increase our supply of health care professions in rural Alberta. That's why last year we committed $90 million to rural programs, and this year we committed the same amount. You know, we've been through two years of challenges through the pandemic, that has put stress on the system, but we are focused on getting practitioners in health care in rural Alberta.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that the minister can spin, but Albertans see the reality on the ground and given that the Alberta Medical Association says that the rate of doctors retiring has doubled in the past two years under this government and given that Alberta's medical schools are reporting dozens of unfilled family residencies this year and given that the hostility from this UCP government to doctors, the entire front-line health care team is clearly not only driving current doctors but also future doctors away from working in Alberta, will Albertans have to wait for a change in government to see new doctors come back to the Bow Valley and other communities in need across Alberta?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I just want to be clear, and let's set the record straight. We are investing in our health care system: an additional $600 million this year, $600 million next year, $600 million the year after that, $1.8 billion. We are investing in capital at some of the highest levels ever, $3.5 billion over the next few years. We're investing in rural health care, and this is a challenge not only being faced in Alberta, but it's being faced across the country. We have more doctors here now. We have more nurses. We have more paramedics. We are supporting our health care system, we will support our rural docs, and we will support to make sure that rural Albertans can get the health care that they need where they need it.

Federal Housing Funding

Ms Sigurdson: With the cost of living continuing to increase, many Albertans are struggling to afford a home. I was glad to see that the recently released federal budget recognized this and expanded the national housing strategy to spend a total of $72 billion on affordable housing. Sadly, the UCP has continually left federal money untouched, ignoring the calls of municipalities, housing providers, and business leaders. Will the UCP finally change course and work to access every single federal dollar possible for affordable housing?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We are in fact taking the time to review the recent federal budget and its commitments to housing. I know that my colleague looks forward to getting more details in the coming days, particularly in terms of how much new federal housing funding will be allocated for Albertans and how the new dollars and initiatives will align with Alberta's 10-year affordable housing strategy. We are committed to working with community partners and governments at both municipal and federal levels on this very important issue.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that downtown revitalization and economic recovery requires investment in affordable housing, chambers of commerce and business associations across the province have advocated for permanent solutions to address poverty and homelessness. Given that this federal funding is a great way to quickly use available space in communities and convert it to housing, with so much new funding available will the UCP finally work with communities, become a true partner, and invest in new affordable housing?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services is rising.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I said before, we are absolutely committed as a government to partnering with our municipal and federal partners in this as well as community organizations.

You know, in the first question the member opposite, Mr. Speaker, asks about leaving federal dollars on the table. Nothing could be further from the truth. It is actually quite shameful that the NDP are once again not telling the whole picture when they do in fact know better. They're fully aware of the terms and conditions for Alberta to receive federal funding under the NHS, including what Alberta's maximum allocation will be and how much Alberta will receive in relation to other provinces.

Ms Sigurdson: Given, Mr. Speaker, that $187 million was left on the table and given that a clear solution to access more federal funding for housing is for the UCP to simply invest their fair share as well as work with municipalities and providers to navigate federal programs and given that the UCP have left housing providers high and dry – I've heard from some who have taken funds away from their needed services to hire consultants to navigate federal programs; this could all be avoided if the UCP were simply a willing partner – why does the UCP refuse to do the bare minimum to receive available federal funding?

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, once again, the NDP are fully aware of the terms and conditions for Alberta to receive federal funding under the NHS, including what Alberta's maximum allocation will be, $561 million, and how much Alberta will receive in relation to other provinces and territories, as they signed the original agreement in 2019. It is, however, our government that has continuously pushed for more flexibility and collaboration with the federal government to find better housing solutions for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod has a question to ask.

Educational Curriculum Redesign and Student Assessment

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For far too long students in Alberta have struggled to learn to read and write. Families have had to spend thousands of dollars on tutors, and those who can't afford it have simply fallen behind. Alberta data shows that approximately 30 per cent of students are struggling readers, and that is only what we know from the very few school boards who track that data. Many do not. To the Minister of Education: what is this government doing to ensure that our students do not fall behind?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I recently released the final curriculum for K to 6 English language arts and literature. This curriculum was developed using expert advice and world-class research. We are taking a scientific approach to improving literacy rates. This approach also includes the introduction of mandatory learning assessments for language, a key UCP commitment in our 2019 election platform. Promise made, promise kept.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for her answer. Given that the minister did explain that this is a science-based approach, while all I'm hearing from members opposite and from the teachers' union is criticism, and given that members opposite are loud and angry and the ATA is spending thousands of dollars to convince Albertans that this is an evil and racist curriculum, I'm wondering: what do the experts say? Does the minister have any experts who have spoken out in support of this approach to curriculum and assessments?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I certainly do. When asked about the new mandatory language assessments, Pamela Guilbault, superintendent of Lakeland Catholic, said, and I quote: these assessments are necessary because they provide important information about student learning, which allows our teachers to apply ongoing research-based instruction as well as literacy and numeracy intervention. Dr. George Georgiou of the University of Alberta said, "The new English Language Arts and Literature curriculum is grounded in research and allows for explicit and systematic instruction in foundational skills."

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that there are University of Alberta professors, there are parents, and there are other advocates who support this curriculum and given that many of these experts specifically support the math curriculum and given that the NDP would prefer that our students flounder in discovery math in their classrooms, can the minister assure this House that these new assessments will also support students struggling to keep up in math class?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The short answer is yes. We've released a strong new mathematics curriculum and, with it, new mandatory learning assessments that build on the important work we did this school year to identify struggling learners. Dr. Martin Mrazik of the University of Alberta said:

The revised K-6 Mathematics curriculum includes strengthened content that fosters core competencies in math. This included reinforcing basic fundamentals in a well-sequenced manner that will promote a student's understanding of math in a real-world context.

Our kids need this so desperately.

2:30 Medical Diagnostic Imaging Test Coverage

Mr. Nielsen: As of March 31 last year this government decided that diagnostic imaging services like X-rays, ultrasounds, bone scans, MRIs ordered by chiropractors, physiotherapists, and audiologists would no longer be covered by the Alberta health care insurance plan. They decided that the best time to act on this was in the middle of a pandemic and that it was completely fine for Albertans to pay out of pocket. The colleges of chiropractors and physiotherapists have conducted research and found that it is crystal clear that this policy is severely detrimental to Albertans, to their health, and to their finances. Will the minister listen to Albertans and reverse these failed changes?

Mr. Copping: Well, I thank the hon. member for the question. This is an important issue. As the hon. member is aware, we did an assessment of the provisions of the services being ordered by chiropractors, for example. They weren't able to do this in other provinces, and we looked at this. We understood that many people who are actually advised of the service had private coverage. We also understood that those who actually needed to be able to do this and didn't have private coverage would have the opportunity to go see a family doctor to do this. We did this as a cost-saving measure, but I'm happy to speak with the physiotherapists and the chiropractors to better understand their report and understand the implications of that.

Mr. Nielsen: Given that the ACAC reported that one Albertan had to live with an untreated heel fracture for over a year because of the inefficiency created by this policy – this was one of many testimonies they collected – and given that this policy has only created more red tape for Albertans to jump through and that it forces them to wait while their pain increases, their bones degenerate, their surgeries are pushed back, how can the minister justify this policy? Does he know how it's affecting Albertans? Can he tell us about it, or has he been sitting bone idle as Albertans suffer because of these hurdles the government has created?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to learn more about that particular incident, because, as I indicated, you know, the change in the policy was about who is able to requisition an insured service. A doctor is able to requisition an insured service like an MRI or a scan, so if the individual in that particular case went to see their doctor and there was an issue there, that actually would be requisitioned by that individual. Alternatively, many individuals have private plans, so if a chiropractor does a requisitioning, then it would be paid for under the private plan.

Mr. Speaker, again, as I previously indicated, we put this in as a cost-saving measure. We did an assessment on this. However, if there are other assessments out there that suggest that there are other ways to do that, to provide better care and manage our costs, I'm happy to take a look at it.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, given that the report, that I know the minister has, has found that government costs for diagnostic referrals and report interpretation were nearly $4 million more in '20-21 than in 2019-20 – Mr. Speaker, this cost was currently zero before that – and given that this obviously doesn't support the policy goals of cost containment, especially when adjusted for COVID, I once again ask the minister: will he rescind this detrimental policy and commit to involving Alberta's chiropractors, physiotherapists, audiologists, and the rest of the trained Alberta health care force before he decides to play with Albertans' well-being . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I already indicated, you know, this was introduced as a cost-saving measure, and part of the approach in terms of the cost-saving measure was to be able to not only leverage the private plans but also to ensure that people could actually still get the services through doctors. Again, as I indicated in my previous responses, if there is other evidence that shows that we can provide better service and manage our costs, I'm happy to talk with the associations in that regard.

Southern Alberta Concerns

Ms Sweet: Mr. Speaker, during the break, while the UCP were focused entirely on their internal drama, I had the opportunity to travel through southern Alberta to meet with the people this government has left behind and to hear their concerns, their fears, and what they want to see for their future. Southern Alberta and Lethbridge in particular have been hit hard by this government's war on doctors, and as a result there are tens of thousands of people who aren't able to access primary care anymore. Can the Minister of Health say right now how many doctors have been hired to replace the physicians driven out of Lethbridge and southern Alberta?

Mr. Copping: Well, I'd like to thank the hon. member for the important question. As I already answered with the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East, we have put in place mechanisms to be able to improve primary care in Lethbridge. We are recruiting over 20 doctors in Lethbridge; 10 of them already have agreed to say yes, and we're waiting for their accreditation. We also have offers open for locums for doctors in Lethbridge, Mr. Speaker. That's the success of our system, because, as you know, we don't hire doctors, but we are working very hard to ensure that we can attract doctors to the right locations.

Ms Sweet: Well, given that Lethbridge lost 40, that's a problem.

Given that I heard loud and clear that good jobs are the path to thriving rural communities and given that instead of investing in diversification and investing in rural economies, this government is actively eliminating jobs and the economic drivers in southern Alberta and given that one only needs to look at how the UCP's health care privatization agenda has cost four jobs in Claresholm – and likely another 90 are following very shortly – how can the Minister of Health or the minister of rural economic development claim to support southern Alberta when they are removing the economic drivers in our rural communities? Will they commit to reversing these job losses in Claresholm today?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated previously in this House, there is a challenge with attracting and retaining health care workers in rural Alberta, and this is a challenge being faced not only here in Alberta but across the entire country. We are committed to being able to attract and retain not only doctors but all health care professionals, and we are backing that up with dollars: $90 million last year, another $90 million this year. Programs include the rural remote northern program, $57 million; the rural medical education program, $6 million; the rural community rural clerkship program. I can go on. We are focused on doing this, and we're having success. An example we just talked about is Lethbridge, and there'll be more to come.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this government hurt rural families and communities by firing tens of thousands of educational assistants, not properly funding education, and leaving boards out to dry during this pandemic and given that the crisis that they've created in education is only made worse by their failed curriculum, rejected overwhelmingly by the teachers, the parents, the students, the school boards, the academics, the Indigenous communities, all in rural Alberta, and given that in order to build thriving rural communities, access to education is a must, rather than trying to defend the failed policies of this government and the lack of action, will the Education minister look at the camera and promise to bring those educational jobs back to rural Alberta?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, that is just a load of bunk. There is no truth in it whatsoever. None whatsoever.

In terms of the curriculum I just want to read from a rural assistant superintendent from Westwind school division: I appreciate the listening voice the government has been throughout the piloting of the new K to 6 curriculum in our division; I appreciate that they listened to some of our views in terms of the reasonable rollout plan; it may not have been exactly as I planned or I would have picked, but at least I can say that I feel that I have been listened to and heard and . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie has the call.

Federal-provincial Child Care Agreement

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Many working families rely on child care, and I was grateful on their behalf when we announced a made-in-Alberta child care deal with the federal government. I was even more pleased to see Alberta among the first provinces to roll out affordability dollars to both parents and operators. As a result, I'm hearing from my constituents in Grande Prairie that are now saving real hard-earned dollars on child care. To the Minister of Children's Services: how many families are benefiting from this deal, and what kinds of savings are they seeing?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I do want to thank the member for the question. Nearly 83,000 kids and their families are now benefiting from fee reductions, on average by half, right across this province. Fees will continue to decrease as we move through this five-year plan. Since signing the agreement, more than 28,000 additional children are also receiving a subsidy. Enrolment has gone up 30 per cent as parents are going back to school, getting back to work, and driving our economic recovery. This deal has in fact been great news for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again, through you, to the minister for that answer. Given that we know that parents need the benefit of options and flexibility when looking for child care and given that many parents rely on the variety and flexibility offered by many private spaces and further given that nearly 60 per cent of child care programs currently in Alberta are private spaces, to the same minister: what is being done to expand and protect these spaces in private child care across Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. That's a great question as we fought hard to include private programs in our made-in-Alberta agreement, many of which are run by female entrepreneurs. We negotiated as well for an additional 2,700 privately operated spaces to be included in this agreement since signing it. Just like for day homes and preschools, operators who were left out under the former government, we wanted to make sure that absolutely no licensed spaces were left out. We're working with the federal government on our expansion plan, and we'll have more details on new spaces very soon.

2:40

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, through you, to the minister. Given that we know this deal was built following the first consultation with the child care sector in over a decade, a consultation that I was honoured to lead on behalf of the minister, and given that this minister clearly listened to Alberta parents and operators when creating this plan and further given that this is a five-year project that will include more savings for parents, workforce supports, and training for educators, can you outline for the House what's next for Alberta parents in the child care sector?

The Speaker: The minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As the member noted, this is a five-year plan, and there is absolutely more to come. We chose to roll out affordability dollars first because we are here to represent working parents, get them back to work, and make sure that they can take part in our economic recovery. More spaces will be created in both facilities and day homes. I do want to thank the Member for Grande Prairie for her hard work in the first consultations in over a decade in this area. Round-tables are right now under way confirming exactly how we should invest dollars into our workforce and supporting our early childhood educators. We're also going to be investing in staff and training the ones who are already in the system.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 15 seconds or less we will proceed to the remainder of the Routine given that Royal Assent will take place this afternoon.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon has a statement to make.

Support for Ukraine

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Some would argue that everything in life is relative, yet others believe that there are moral absolutes, where an action or belief is right all of the time, in any circumstance and in any era. For instance, a society that nurtures strong, creative, self-reliant people is better than a society where its people are dependent upon some version of an all-knowing and all-controlling government, that a commitment to limited government, majority rules, and respect for individual and minority rights is always better than supporting the unchecked self-interest of authoritarian rule.

The conflict between Russia and Ukraine is not one of two morally equivalent nations. The facts are clear. Russia attacked Ukraine. Russia is an authoritarian state that has killed opposition politicians, restricted a free press, arrested dissident citizens. It is Russia that is bombing civilians, targeting hospitals and civilian infrastructure, and threatening its peaceful neighbours with the use of the atomic bomb and chemical warfare. To consider the actions of the two nations as morally equivalent is a grave injustice to the people of Ukraine.

Albertans' support for Ukraine is not purely familial, cultural, or historical, but it is one built on the very foundation stones of deeply held common values. These democratic values are worth defending. In the Drayton Valley-Devon constituency the Breton Agricultural Society hosted a community supper that raised $40,000, a figure that will be multiplied three to four times by funnelling the donations through the Foodgrains Bank. The Rotarians in Drayton Valley organized a community supper that raised over $50,000. The Zirka dancers in the community of Calmar raised close to $6,000. Private citizens have banded together and sent over plane loads of humanitarian supplies, and these are just the efforts that I am aware of.

Clearly, Albertans understand that they must support those who defend freedom and democracy. The people of Alberta and Ukraine show a common set of values that are eloquently expressed in the Alberta motto, strong and free, and Albertans are prepared to help defend these values in Ukraine.

Premier's Leadership

Mr. Loewen: The Premier insists on absolute loyalty from everyone. That's being a team player. This aligns with the strategy that turning a blind eye to flagrant blunders is required on his team. The Premier's most important promises have all been broken. He pledged servant leadership. Instead, he wants an election if you don't support him. He wants a new base. He allowed interference in nomination races, and he had his cronies alter the rules of his own leadership review. Servant leadership? Promise made, promise broken.

The Premier promised a grassroots guarantee but made the rules for recall and citizens' initiatives virtually unattainable and delayed implementing them. Grassroots democracy? Promise made, promise broken.

The Premier swore he would fight for a fair deal. Instead, he stops at only words. As a result, the federal government has completely ignored the results of the equalization referendum. But don't worry; he'll write a letter. Fair deal? Promise made, promise broken.

The Premier's mishandling of the pandemic has impacted every single Albertan in this province. He promised to fight against vaccine passports. He promised to vastly increase ICU capacity. He promised no mandates. Instead, no more ICU capacity, he brought in vaccine passports, and he allowed thousands of Albertans to be fired while him and his cronies partied on a patio. Promises made; promises broken.

To my constituents and all Albertans, I must tell you that I am tired. I'm tired of corruption. I'm tired of policies being made to benefit the few. I'm tired of money being spent wastefully. I'm tired of complacency. I'm tired of politicians who are all talk and no action. I'm tired of an entitled, elite political class that doesn't care about Albertans.

I dream of a day when I can retire and hand this province off to my children and grandchildren. This is their world. We need to leave this province in better shape than we found it. We all have a role to play. We must be vigilant. We must never stop participating in democracy, and we must resist the temptation to become demoralized. We can change things, and together we will.

In this House our loyalty and duty is to Albertans, not to the failed leadership of one person. This is a duty I am proud to accept. How about you?

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the appropriate number of copies of e-mails that I read into the record during debate on Bill 18 this morning.

Thank you.

Member Loyola: Mr. Speaker, I have the requisite number of copies of a document that describes and well defines what sentencing circles are all about, which I brought up in debate earlier today and yesterday afternoon.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you. I have several tablings, Mr. Speaker, and I beg your indulgence. The first is the requisite copies of a document from 2009 outlining the indomitable NDP leader Brian Mason's concerns about the effect on electricity bills due to PC policies on transmission lines in Bill 50.

I have the requisite number of copies as well, five copies, from an April 21, 2011, document that I referenced in bill debate this morning from the indefatigable Brian Mason on how power bills will jump dramatically as the PC government pushed ahead with massive new transmission lines. There's those five.

And yet another document from May 9, 2011, from the inimitable Brian Mason discussing how the provincial government was wilfully blind to evidence of new power line constructions that would send electricity bills through the roof. That one is 2011 as well.

I also have the requisite five copies of the executive summary of a University of Calgary School of Public Policy document released a couple of days ago – it's been referenced a few times in bill debate – entitled Why Are Power Prices So Darn High? by Blake Shaffer, David Brown, and Andrew Eckert, to make sure that we have that for the record as well.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, this afternoon Royal Assent will take place. It was scheduled for approximately 3 o'clock. We are going to stand in recess until 3:05.

[The Assembly adjourned from 2:51 p.m. to 3:05 p.m.]

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 15 Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise and move second reading of Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022.

Bill 15 is about reforming the teaching profession's discipline process to create one system that serves the best interests of students, their families, the public, and the teaching profession in Alberta. This legislation builds upon the important work started with the students first act, which passed last fall. Mr. Speaker, Albertans deserve greater accountability, transparency, and timeliness in the teaching discipline process, and so do teachers. Bill 15 does just that while also ensuring legislation and related regulations that oversee these processes do not present a conflict of interest.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

Alberta is the only Canadian province where the teachers' union has the sole responsibility set out in legislation for overseeing complaints of alleged unprofessional conduct and professional incompetence filed against their union members. There is no other avenue to address a complaint that questions a teacher's suitability to hold a teaching certificate. Mr. Speaker, this simply cannot continue, which is why the teacher discipline process needs to be improved with Bill 15. This legislation would create the Alberta teaching profession commission and appoint a commissioner to oversee teacher and teacher leader conduct, incompetency complaints for the profession regardless of where teachers are employed or their membership status in the professional association.

The goal is to have one legislative structure to govern matters of discipline for the entire teaching profession by one organization using a consistent, effective, and efficient process. Mr. Speaker, currently Alberta has a dual-system process where the Alberta Teachers' Association oversees discipline for its active members while the Alberta Education registrar oversees the discipline for all other teachers. The new model would ensure that all teachers and teacher leaders, including superintendents, are subject to the same disciplinary system. Bill 15 would bring Alberta in line with other jurisdictions and regulated professions such as nurses by eliminating the conflict of interest where a union could advocate for its members while also overseeing disciplinary matters.

Let me be absolutely clear, Mr. Speaker. The commissioner would be appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council following an open competition and would operate at arm's length from the ministry. There are numerous examples where individuals are appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. In fact, officers of the Legislature such as the Ethics Commissioner and Privacy Commissioner are all appointed in this way and do objective work on behalf of the Legislative Assembly and the people of Alberta. I expect the same from whomever is selected to fill this commissioner role.

Contrary to narratives I've heard from the Alberta Teachers' Association and even the members of the opposition, Bill 15 would not give the Minister of Education the ability to influence or control the commissioner in the course of their duties or those of their office. And, to be frank, Mr. Speaker, Bill 15 is not about consolidating power in the hands of the minister's office, as some critics have argued. This is about protecting students, not punishing the hard-working and dedicated teachers and teacher leaders across this great province. In the discipline model proposed in Bill 15, all complaints would be received by the registrar at Alberta Education and referred to the commissioner, not to the minister, for further action.

Mr. Speaker, let me explain how this would work. Under Bill 15 the commissioner would have the authority to address and investigate a complaint. The office of the teaching profession commissioner would review and investigate the matter and may initially dismiss the case. They may recommend a penalty under an expedited process or use consent resolution agreements, dispute resolution, or mediation to resolve the issue. If the commissioner determines that the case warrants a hearing, a hearing would be conducted by a panel. The panel would be comprised of teachers and public members who would render a decision on the matter and put forth a recommendation to the Minister of Education. Mr. Speaker, this is not a wholesale change from the current process, and we are simply making improvements to the process that will benefit students, parents, teachers, and teacher leaders.

Currently the Minister of Education has the final say on decisions made under the registrar's hearing process and also has the final say on decisions that recommend suspension or cancellation of certificates under the ATA's discipline process. This is because the Minister of Education also holds the authority to issue a certificate in order to practise in the teaching profession.

Mr. Speaker, these change won't happen overnight, and we know the education system will need support to make the transition to the new system. To do this, we will ensure a smooth shift transition from the current system of teacher and teacher leader professionalism to the new commissioner model with transitional regulations.

For discipline matters that are under way when the new act takes effect, transitional regulations would allow throughout the first half of 2023 for matters to continue in accordance with the rules under which they were started. During this transitional period the responsibilities would shift, where appropriate, to the commissioner and office of the commissioner as well as the newly appointed members of hearing and appeal committees, but the previous rules would be followed, and some matters such as hearings that are currently under way would continue until completion or June 2023, whichever comes first. The goal would be an effective and smooth transition while ensuring procedural fairness in dealing with current complaints.

Mr. Speaker, we engaged with key stakeholders and education partners in February to hear their perspectives. This did include the Alberta Teachers' Association as well as other education partners and victim advocacy groups. We also reviewed best practices in Canada. Two provinces, Ontario and Saskatchewan, have self-governed professional regulatory organizations that issue teaching certificates and oversee matters of professional discipline for their teacher members, but they also have no union functions. British Columbia dismantled their teachers' college in 2011 because of a strong influence from the B.C. Teachers' Federation that did not ensure public interest, resulting in the creation of a commissioner's office, that has been successful in that province.

In all other provinces and territories the provincial government is responsible for issuing teaching certificates and also plays a varying role in overseeing teacher discipline processes that bring into question suitability to hold a teaching certificate. There are additional checks and balances in place for many of these jurisdictions such as adjudicative committees comprised of teachers and public members or commissioners who operate at arm's length but have accountabilities to the Minister of Education in carrying out disciplinary functions. Mr. Speaker, it makes sense to keep the certification and discipline functions within the same organizational structure, and, as I've stated, Bill 15 would bring Alberta teachers into alignment with other Canadian jurisdictions.

This new model would not impact the role of the Alberta Teachers' Association or the College of Alberta School Superintendents in their other roles and duties as professional organizations. In fact, it will give them the opportunity to focus on those important functions. A focus on professional learning is essential in maintaining the status of any profession, and it will enable the ATA and CASS to ensure teachers and teacher leaders in this province are current in their practice and enhance their skills to ensure student success.

This model will also not impact the ATA's role as it pertains to collective bargaining. Alberta's government remains committed to strengthening the teaching profession through improvements to transparency, accountability, and public assurance. It is abundantly clear that Bill 15 demonstrates this commitment, Mr. Speaker. Albertans have raised concerns about the ATA playing both a union and a disciplinary role for its members and the potential for conflicts of interest that can arise due to this dual role. We know this simply cannot continue. The students first act strengthened transparency, accountability, and safeguards for students, but it did not change the underlying structure of the discipline system. Bill 15 is the next step.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 15 will restructure who is responsible for teacher discipline in Alberta, create a single streamlined process, and separate discipline from advocacy functions. A commissioner model balances the need for an impartial and fair process with government's desire to increase oversight to protect students and the public interest.

Bill 15 will reinforce that there is a duty to report to police when there may have been serious harm or a threat to student safety. This is something already required under the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, but as evidenced by recent cases, there seems to be confusion on who the duty to report falls on. Mr. Speaker, Bill 15 will clarify this process and affirm that everyone and anyone who is aware of potential abuse of a student or a child has a duty to report to police.

The online teacher registry established under the students first act will also be further enhanced. Bill 15 will make all hearings, appeals, and ministers' decisions as well as consent resolution agreements completed with the commissioner where there is a finding of unprofessional conduct or professional incompetence – they will all be made available to the public.

Bill 15 would also see the Alberta Teachers' Association and the College of Alberta School Superintendents continue to focus on professional development and other member-focused services and advocacy.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation would balance the need for an impartial and fair process while ensuring greater transparency and accountability in addressing discipline matters in the teaching profession.

Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to bring Bill 15 forward. I hope that everyone in this House can agree that student safety should be paramount, and I look forward to discussing and debating this very, very important bill.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. members. To respond, I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is an honour to rise and speak to Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022. It's got a long name. I appreciate the minister standing up and sharing her thoughts and her vision of what this bill is intended to do. Because of that, I actually have quite a few questions just based on some of the comments. Again, because we're in second reading, I hope that the minister will just appreciate my questions and maybe be able to come back at some point with an answer in regard to what we're going to be bringing forward.

A couple of things that came to mind for me when the minister was speaking was this idea of the commissioner. This is, I think, one of the things that I'm really struggling with understanding when it comes specifically to this bill. The reason for that is that there's no other profession – nurses, doctors, social workers, which is what I was – that has what would be classified as a commissioner. They don't have that same requirement or structure. We take our commissioners quite seriously, I would say, in this Chamber. I mean, again, we heard the minister referencing comments around the Ethics Commissioner, for an example. Commissioners that are in that role have a responsibility to have to report to Legislative Offices. Their budgets are brought to elected officials. There is an accountability measure that is built in place that specifically relates to those roles. The reason for that is because their role is to basically hold the Legislative Assembly to account and to ensure that there is ethical accountability and all of those requirements that we see.

For me, what I think I'm not understanding and what I'm missing is that I don't see how that structure would then exist underneath this current piece of legislation. To create such a powerful role – I see commissioners in those contexts, especially if we're going to compare them to levels such as the Ethics Commissioner. Our Privacy Commissioner would be on the same level. Our other officers that are responsible to report to the Legislative Assembly, our elections officers, all of those roles are at a very significant level, and they are very close to the government and to the elected officials.

When we look at this legislation, this position is being created – again, the minister clearly also said that this role would then make it so that the government wouldn't have influence, yet it is a role that is going to be appointed through an order in council. It is a role that would have conversations with the government, that would have conversations with elected officials. Currently within the commissioner system that we have set up within this Chamber, again going back to the example that the minister used, the Ethics Commissioner, there are annual reports that are drafted. There is an accountability component to that. I don't see – and very specifically legislation that clearly articulates the role of the commissioner. I don't see within the legislation the accountability components, the same requirement to report back, the piece that regulates and administers, and the discipline components.

Ultimately, if there is a penalty that we – like, if the Ethics Commissioner decided that there was a penalty for a sitting MLA, that there was something that didn't happen – let's say that we didn't do our ethics disclosures on time – there's an ability within the legislation to administer a penalty. That just happens. There is no minister that signs off on that penalty. If the Election Commissioner determines that there has been a breach of the Election Act, there is no minister that signs off on that and says: okay; well, you can initiate a fine.

So to have a structure within this bill that says, "Well, there is a commissioner; they have all of these powers and responsibilities, but ultimately the recommendation still has to go to the Minister of Education to sign off and say that this can happen" doesn't make sense. It is not built into the same structure as all of these other commissioners' roles, so I think there is fairness in the question of, then: why is it being built this way? Why does the minister still have to have involvement and influence?

I think this is the question that Albertans are asking when they speak to – when the ATA asks these questions, when teachers ask these questions, it's: why, then, does the minister still have to have a level of influence? That's the trust question. That is the part where, when the government says, "Just trust us; this process is going to be fair and transparent and all of the things, and it will do what we say it's going to do," the response to that is, "How do we trust it?" How do we trust this legislation and this decision when it is set up in a way that actually does not align with the norm? The norm of how our commissioners currently work is that there is no minister involvement at all.

There's no minister that signs off on any decision that any of our legislative officers make, so why would we have a one-off? The one-off is what people are concerned with because it's not actually mimicking the structure. I think that's the question and the conflict that the government is going to have to reassure teachers and parents and the ATA as to why it has to be this way. I'm concerned. I'm concerned that that is the structure that has been created, yet the minister is the ultimate sign-off. There is still a level of influence there that I don't think is necessarily answering the trust question, and it's worrisome.

I mean, I think, clearly, what we see is that there is a conflict between the current government and the ATA and the relationship, and – you know what? – we've seen it in other provinces. It's not unique. What I do actually find kind of unique, though, with this legislation – and, in fact, the minister spoke to this – is that they've adopted a model that is very similar to British Columbia's. Well, if we looked at any province in Canada that had the most conflict with teachers, I would say it would probably be B.C. Teachers go on strike there all the time, so to follow the B.C. model, I find, is a little bit interesting because it's obviously not a system and it's obviously not a structure that is necessarily working well.

I don't know why the minister wouldn't look at Ontario and Saskatchewan's model and say: maybe that one makes more sense; we should look at adopting that. I mean, the minister did reference that those were other models that were explored and evaluated, so I guess my question to the minister around that, too, would be: why choose the one province that seems to have the most conflictual relationships with teachers if there were other jurisdictions that obviously had models that maybe worked a little bit better?

I think, again, the major concern that we continuously hear around this legislation is that relationship piece between the ATA, the teachers, and the government. For a piece of legislation to be drafted that mimics the most conflictual relationships across the country and not look at the models that actually are a little bit more harmonizing and work better together does send a signal. It sends a very clear signal that the conflict is okay. "It's okay to have conflict, because we know it doesn't necessarily work well in other jurisdictions. It's not necessarily working well in B.C., but we're going to pick that one out of all the other models."

The other thing was a question that came to mind as well. The minister had spoken about, you know, the current impacts and whether there is a disciplinary process happening or not. I am curious, and I don't know if the minister can actually answer this. How many teachers are currently even going through this process?

On this big shift, this big piece of legislation, this requirement to create a new body with a commissioner, create a new budget for a new office, all of the things, I'm curious: how many teachers will actually be forced to go through this process in a given year? Will the monetary requirements, the setting up of a new office, the salary associated with a commissioner, all of those things, justify the number of teachers that actually go through a disciplinary process, or is this creating something purely based out of a conflictual relationship and that we're going to hold the ATA to account?

For a fiscal component, a fiscal party that believes that we should be cutting red tape and believes that we should try to minimize the amount of expenditures in government, then why are you creating a new office? Why are you spending a whole bunch of money on new salaries? Like, what is the benefit? What is the outcome? How many teachers are going to go through this for the return on the investment that this government is going to make in a new office for a new commissioner? [interjections] The government doesn't like it when I talk about fiscal policy because they don't think NDP people can, but unfortunately we can. They're starting to talk back to me, which I'm used to. That's fine.

The piece about it, though, is that this can be done, and this can be done in other ways. Now, again, we see it with the United Nurses association. They have a disciplinary process. We see it with the Alberta physicians' association. They have a disciplinary process. Social workers, which is what I was, have a disciplinary process. My profession didn't have a commissioner, and we were dealing with vulnerable children every single day, all the time. My responsibility as a child intervention worker was to make sure kids were safe, so I'm very aware of what we're talking about. My profession didn't have a commissioner.

I had the same accountability within my profession. There is no question. In fact, my accountability and people watching what I was doing because of the children that I was working with was very, very high. Very high. There are mechanisms that already exist in other professions that do this.

Mr. Yao: It's not demonstrated here.

Ms Sweet: Well, then, my question would be: why does it have to be a commissioner? I'm fine. It's okay. I mean, if members want to ask me questions, I'm more than happy to talk about this. It doesn't pass the test . . .

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. It will be me who decides, unfortunately.

I would just ask the member that if there are comments that need to be made, perhaps wait until your opportunity to respond, which I believe, actually, might be next.

The hon. member, please.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. In fact, I thought you were doing an intervention. I was like: I don't think I get any in my 20 minutes, not as first speaker.

Again, just to follow up on some of the processes, I mean, if the government wants to answer the question about how many current teachers are going through this process and how many have had to go through a disciplinary process, I'd be very interested to know that information. How prevalent is this that it is actually requiring such an extreme response by creating a whole commissioner's position? If there's something wrong and there are concerns with the disciplinary process of how teachers are being held to account, the investigation, all of the things, that's fair.

I found it very interesting, though, that I also heard the minister make comments about: well, people didn't know who to report to. I have a really hard time believing that, and the reason I have a hard time believing that is because I was a child intervention worker, and many of my referral sources were teachers. In fact, the majority of my referrals were teachers because they see kids every single day. They would report on their colleagues if they ever deemed a child at risk. If there is a concern around teachers not knowing who to call and who to report to, then that is a question and an issue that the Minister of Children's Services should be addressing when it comes to education. That is an issue that the Minister of Education should be addressing when it comes to making sure teachers know who to call. Albertans can call 911. They can call their local police officer. They can call 211. They can call Children's Services: 1.883.429.2001. I believe that is the number. There are many people that can be called, and I know people do it all the time, because this was my job.

To hear that this needed to happen as well for clarity, for teachers to know who to report to, that is not a function of legislation. It is a problem around education and the minister having a responsibility to make sure that the professionals within this profession know who to call and working with their partners within cabinet to make sure, if there is a concern that teachers don't know who to call to make sure kids are safe, that there is an education program being set up by the Minister of Children's Services to make sure professions are being educated, no different than medical professionals and no different than day care and child care providers. Those conversations, those programs exist. Those educational tools are provided to those professionals on a regular basis to make sure they know who to call. I have a hard time believing that that would create a concern around legislation.

What I think is happening is that, again, it is an overreach of power by this government when it comes to how to create and how to address an issue. I am not saying that that isn't an issue, by any means. I spent 12 years of my career working in child intervention services. I take this issue very seriously. But to create a commissioner for one profession and not for doctors and not for nurses and not for social workers and not for all of the other professions and to create such a high level that it's almost equivalent to a legislative office and to still allow the minister, then, to sign off on any disciplinary process, that is speaking to a direct involvement in one profession and choosing that profession over every other profession.

We've seen a theme and conflict with this government and the teaching profession. I think the struggle that is happening here is: why does it have to be to this level? Was there not an opportunity to create similar mechanisms, like every other profession in this province, that address these issues? The physicians' association, the nursing association, the social workers' association: all of those have mechanisms, and they've worked. If they haven't worked, they've never been brought to this Chamber to be discussed and turned into a new piece of legislation. There is something uniquely different here that the government has not been honest and transparent with Albertans about, about why this needs to be to such an extent. That is where the trust issue comes from. That is what Albertans are concerned with. Why is it that it has to be in this structure that . . .

Mr. McIver: She's going to get union support.

Ms Sweet: The minister across will say that this is about union support. The reality of it is that there are many other unions in this province that have structures that are not set up this way. The ATA is an association; it's not a union, to clarify.

The point of this is that there is a significant difference. There is a significant difference. I struggle with the fact that there is such a difference and the fact that the government doesn't seem to want to engage with this conversation and wants to heckle and wants to try to make this about making sure children are safe. I think it's disingenuous of this legislation because that's not what this is doing. There was legislation that we had, that was just in this Chamber a while ago, that was addressing those issues.

This is about a structure, which is very, very different. This is an administrative piece of legislation. The level at which the government has chosen to try to create what they are trying to determine as being a separate piece of legislation and at arm's length from the government is also disingenuous. The commissioner would be if the government couldn't sign off on the disciplinary piece. If the minister would like to amend the legislation that removes the minister from signing off on the disciplinary piece, then you know what? I guess there wouldn't be an issue.

But the issue is that you can't say that it's one and not the other, because if you're saying that it's a commissioner who's going to be at arm's length, then a commissioner gets to invoke penalties and gets to invoke all of those things without the sign-off of the minister. But this isn't how it's set up. It's either one or the other, but right now the way the government has set it up is that it's not one or the other. The government wants to be able to have the vision or the optics of making it look like it's arm's length because they're making it as a commissioner position, but in the fine print the minister still signs off on the disciplinary approval. That's not truly what a commissioner is. Then why is it a commissioner?

Mr. McIver: To track the kids.

Ms Sweet: That's not the case.

I disagree with the minister when that's what their message box says, because that's incorrect.

But the point of this is that there's something that doesn't make sense, and it doesn't add up, so the government needs to stand up and explain why that is.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The next member who caught my eye is the hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to rise today and speak in favour of Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022. I first have to give a shout-out to my good friend from Red Deer-North, the Minister of Education. No one has demonstrated to me such strength, such fortitude, such ability to take such abuse, because God knows in our question periods I see an opposition that increases in their decibels as they attempt to intimidate and bully the good Member for Red Deer-North. I find that absolutely disgusting. Perhaps it's because she's a woman that they feel that they can do such things. It is true. We can certainly measure that very, very easily, so I would certainly take that challenge on any day of the week.

Now, I believe this bill will go a long way to increasing protection for both our children and our teachers, because this is just a much-needed bill. Parents should not have to worry about their children falling victim to inappropriate conduct by one of the educators who have been entrusted with the well-being of their children during the school day.

I want to give a shout-out to my good friend from Edmonton-Manning because she talks about the trust and the norm. First off, let us talk about trust, shall we? And let us talk about these comments that I just made that parents should not have to worry about their children falling victim to people who are in positions of authority, people that we entrust our kids to.

To be clear, Mr. Speaker, I'm not against unions. I was a former member of the International Association of Fire Fighters, and the fights that we fought were good fights to ensure that safety measures were in place for our members, that we had the right equipment, that we were supported appropriately, and that things like mental health supports were in place after we experienced such negative incidents. But in this case the ATA has demonstrated that they're just really a bunch of political hacks. They do not demonstrate a level of quality that we want to see in a group that is there to build their members.

I must say, as an example, that during the NDP government of previous years, 2015 to 2019, when the NDP government chose to overhaul the entire curriculum, they did not release any names of anyone involved in that restructuring and redevelopment of that curriculum. They would not release names. The ATA did not say anything publicly to criticize the NDP government. They said nothing even though the fact was that there were extremists that were identified as being members of those folks that were developing that curriculum.

Nowhere have we seen an organization like that advertise so much political advertising that attacks one government or one group while negating the effects of the others. I find it just absolutely disgusting that this labour organization chooses to spend their money on advertising and attack ads as opposed to developing their members with balanced education. I have had teachers from my region, from my community whisper in my ear that they dislike the education that the ATA has been providing them for the last half a dozen years because it demonstrates a certain level of socialism and social justice that they don't necessarily agree with.

It paints a picture of a very hard-left union. It's really disappointing that such a group is in charge, when their members have to whisper in my ear that they do not feel that they have the freedom to speak the truth, and it is disappointing that they have to speak to the fact that they aren't being supported, that they are actually being provided with, for all intents and purposes, propaganda. That is really disappointing, yet the members across the way continue to support this group.

If the ATA were to take a different approach, perhaps more balanced, and do what they do, which should be to support their members in certain labour issues perhaps, I might have a different perspective, but all I've seen is – I'll say it again – political hacks, people who do nothing but attack one governing party and support the other. They do not demonstrate any level of nonpartisan perspective, and you can see that when they discuss the curriculum. Mr. Speaker, they are attacking our government on the Indigenous content in the new curriculum that my good friend from Red Deer-North has instituted based on all of the advisers and teachers that were building this curriculum.

I did a review of this up in Fort Chipewyan, and I displayed all of the content on Indigenous peoples. When the folks came through and looked at it all, the only thing they told me were two things: (a) we shouldn't be teaching about residential schools in grades 1 through 6 because it is too harsh of something that they want these kids to learn. They don't think that residential schools should even be taught in grades 1 to 6 whereas the ATA, if you look at their talking points, were saying that we weren't teaching enough about residential schools. So who's doing the consulting there?

Secondly, the other thing that they wanted to see in there was more language. They wanted to see the languages of the Cree and the Dene promoted. You know what? That's respectful. We have schools that are teaching Ukrainian and other languages, even Japanese and stuff. I think that's fantastic. Bilingualism is very important. I think Canadians would be well to do to learn other languages. Again, there is a blatant demonstration of ATA bias in attacking what they perceive to be as an inequality, yet our government is demonstrating a high level of quality in providing Indigenous content.

Now, the . . . [interjection] Yes, please.

Member LaGrange: Thank you. I just wanted to get up and answer a couple of the questions that were asked by the members opposite in terms of: why a commissioner? Why this arm's-length approach? I was happy to see the opposition really speak to the fact and recognize that a commissioner is a highly ethical – it elevates the whole office. It is an individual who is highly skilled, highly ethical. In fact, the B.C. commissioner for their teaching profession is a former ombudsman, has an extensive legal background.

The reason why we wanted to go with this model – and we looked right across Canada. We did a jurisdictional scan. We looked at every province. We looked to incorporate the best elements of every province, so we do have elements of the Ontario process as well as the Saskatchewan process.

I think I'm running out of time.

3:50

Mr. Yao: Thank you so much.

Do I have the ability to give my good friend the opportunity to speak one more time?

The Acting Speaker: If she stands up, you can offer the intervention.

Mr. Yao: To finish her fine thoughts, please.

Member LaGrange: Thank you. We did look at all of those elements, all of the jurisdictions and took the best elements. We saw that B.C. has the commissioner, a highly skilled, ethical individual that works at arm's length. When we look at the fact that the minister has the responsibility for the certification of teachers, we felt it very, very important to continue that process, that the Ministry of Education is, in fact, the one that certifies teachers in this province. To have a commissioner that would be acting totally independently would not serve the best interests of the whole process. We will continue. It is the Minister of Education's ability right now to ensure that they have the ability to cancel and suspend teachers' certification in this province, and that will continue with the commissioner role.

Mr. Yao: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. Back to trust. The Alberta Teachers' Association union is in charge of the discipline process for their members, but unions are designed to protect and advocate for their members, not necessarily discipline them. As such, we know that there are many cases where there has been inappropriate conduct with a student that has led to the offending teacher being removed but not necessarily being disciplined. These people, these individuals, these teachers, these bad apples, if you will, move on to another jurisdiction and continue on. That's shameful if the ATA executive chooses to protect their reputation by not identifying these members that might be bad apples. [interjection] Please.

The Acting Speaker: This will be the third intervention. They're a minute long each, and two minutes will be added to your time as well after.

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, you know what will increase trust? Having public assurance. The fact that the commissioner will provide annual reports, that there will be hearing dates that will be posted, that decisions will be posted on the registry that every Albertan can have access to: that creates trust because there's transparency, there's accountability, there's the ability for every Albertan – right now the member opposite said that her profession has a different process. But you know what? That profession is separate from the union. No other profession has the union overseeing their discipline process. When we look at what happens currently under the ATA process, under their code of conduct a teacher actually has to go and speak to another teacher before they report any issues that they have with that individual. We need a single code of conduct for all teachers.

Mr. Yao: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you so much to the Minister of Education for that clarity. Again, she points out some good thoughts there, and that is that Alberta is the outlier in the nation in regard to professional conduct as well as their labour side of things. Certainly, it's good to see the separation of these two jurisdictions with the hope that we can have a fair process that protects children and not enables them.

My good friend from Edmonton-Manning also talked about – well, she talked about the norm, and that is the norm. That's what our good minister is attempting to do with this, to make sure that we're in alignment with the other provinces and territories in these two groups and that there's no conflict of interest. Again, the ATA, unfortunately, has made decisions over the years to not prosecute their own members, but what they don't realize is that there are bad apples everywhere in every single profession. Whether it be physicians, teachers, firefighters – you name it – there are always some bad apples, and they have to be addressed and dealt with in such a manner.

This single system for addressing complaints under the newly created Alberta teaching profession commission, which will be headed by a commissioner to oversee the teacher and teacher leader conduct and conflict complaints for all teachers and teacher leaders equally: that is fantastic. Under this system the registrar at Alberta Education will be responsible for the intake of all complaints, and this will avoid duplicate complaints.

Then these complaints will be forwarded to the Alberta teaching profession commissioner, who will have the authority to address and investigate a complaint and determine the most appropriate course of action to take regarding a complaint. I think this is fantastic news because it increases accountability and transparency by expanding the online teacher registry, established under the students first act, by making publicly available the information on hearings, appeal dates, et cetera, as the good minister had explained to us earlier.

Again, these changes will ensure that the entire teaching profession is protected by bringing all teachers and teacher leaders under one reformed disciplinary process and put forth the best interests of students and their families and teachers and the public at the centre of the teacher discipline process. This is a fantastic bill that just makes sense. Again, it is definitely reflective of the good minister that has crafted this up, and I think she's doing excellent work for Albertans and for children. Whether the ATA realizes it or not, I know the general population of teachers respects and appreciates this bill and understands that. For the average taxpayer, they can probably rest assured that their money won't be spent on political advertising and perhaps will focus more on the education of their teachers to ensure that they are also supported.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the teachers' union claims that this bill is an attack on teachers, the teaching profession, Alberta's education system as a whole. In fact, again, I just disagree with that entirely. When you look at the actions of the Alberta Teachers' Association executive over the last five, six years especially, it's just disappointing to see how they behave and they act and how political they have become. I had a parent write to me to ask why I criticize the ATA executive because they're a neutral, nonpartisan group, and I literally could respond with good honesty and facts about a lot of the partisan messaging and rhetoric that they have.

I can certainly demonstrate that now with, again, the curriculum criticisms. Still to this day they're very effective at their communicating because I'm still getting some parents that are expressing concerns about this widespread curriculum change even though the fact is that the good minister has actually pared it down and is providing it piecemeal for certain subject matters and certain grades, and she's doing a good, responsible . . . [interjection] Say again there?

The Acting Speaker: Through the chair. There will be opportunities after your comments for others to comment as well. However, comments, as always, go through the chair. At this time there are no more interventions, unfortunately.

If the hon. member could please continue.

Mr. Schmidt: It's okay if I heckle him, though, right? I can still do that.

Mr. Yao: Yes, you can continue to heckle there, Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. I'm sure you're still recovering from your holidays overseas as well – hey? – after criticizing some of our members.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, I would just remind that we are currently on second reading of Bill 15. If we could please keep our comments towards the bill.

Thank you.

Mr. Yao: I digress, Mr. Speaker. My apologies for responding to the heckling from the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. He's got a big mouth, and he just continues on.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, I don't think that that would be considered parliamentary to directly . . .

Mr. Yao: You know what? I apologize, Mr. Speaker, and I withdraw the comment.

The Acting Speaker: I consider the matter completely closed.

Please, if the hon. member could continue.

Mr. Yao: To clarify, I do have the utmost respect for teachers and the work they do as they prepare our children for the future by making sure that kids have the skills and competencies needed to succeed. I believe that virtually all teachers have that quality to ensure that, but again we now and again have our bad apples, and we have to make sure that they are addressed in the most appropriate way so that our kids are protected, not only our kids here but in other jurisdictions as well.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I just want to sum it up and say that teachers need not be worried about this legislation. This is in the best interests of everybody involved. Again, if they have any worries about trust and the norm, as the previous member who spoke, from Edmonton-Manning, had stated, this bill does exactly that, ensures that there is trust, ensures that we are in the norm with this, that we are doing what all the other provinces are doing, that has been proven time and time again to be the most effective level of managing these issues.

This bill is a common-sense approach to teacher discipline, and I will proudly vote for it. Again, I strongly encourage all members of this House to do the same, to vote to support this bill. I want to thank the good Minister of Education for her hard work and her endeavours as she continues to do the best things for our children. God bless her.

Thank you so much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to join the debate on Bill 15, Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022. It's pretty clear, from the previous speaker and many of the actions of this government, that this government is afraid. They are not able to actually let civil society operate. They need to control everything. This bill is taking away a profession's self-regulating authority, which is a fundamental principle of any profession. It's ridiculous.

There are five main characteristics of being a professional. You have a self-regulating profession, and this is taking away that opportunity for teachers. There's a code of ethics, standards of practice sometimes. Sometimes there are different words for these things, but these are the values, beliefs, principles of any profession that you adhere to. On a regular basis, you know, each year – for example, I'm a registered social worker in the province of Alberta. Every year I must review once again my code, my standards, make sure that my continuing competence is up. If there is a complaint placed against me, of course, I must go through the regulating process. I mean, this is just an ongoing thing of being a professional. There's also a special scope of practice. There's a unique area of practice that you have that's exclusive to your profession. There's a knowledge base that, actually, professionals within that profession seek to augment. They do research to add to that knowledge base. Then there's mandatory registration so that all members of that profession are part of that. So there are five characteristics of a profession, and this government in one fell swoop in this bill is just annihilating a significant piece of that.

It's so disrespectful and untrusting of teachers. It is just abhorrent what they're doing, and they think they have the right to do that, but this is a fundamental piece of being a professional. Around the globe this is fundamental. It boggles my mind, but all I can figure out from what this government does repeatedly on many issues, and certainly on this one, is that they're afraid, that they're terrified, so they have to muzzle and keep people quiet. This is what the minister is doing here. She is taking control and hurting an independent profession to be able to self-regulate.

You know why it's important to self-regulate? Say I have a complaint against me, and someone who's reviewing whatever the situation is doesn't understand the values of my profession, doesn't understand the code of ethics, the standards of practice. They don't have a good understanding of what my responsibilities are in that role. That's why self-regulation is so important, so that I'm not being assessed by a lawyer. A lawyer doesn't know what I'm doing. Certainly, if anybody has been cross-examined in a courthouse – and I certainly have when I used to be a social worker in child welfare – the lawyers just denigrated your profession. They made fun of you. That's kind of how the law system works.

But in this there's a sincere attempt to look at the kind of work that you do and understand it. You understand it from the value base of your profession. That is being totally wiped out by this government right now. Again I just say: why are they doing this? I think they're fearful, and they want control. They don't really – even though we hear some of the rhetoric that they want to hear from people, they don't. They only want to hear from certain people. The rest of us professionals – I mean, they tear up the agreement with the docs unilaterally. The Minister of Health: it's one of the first acts he did. It's ridiculous. It's despicable. It's sickening.

You know, we've just been through this pandemic. We're not through it. It's still with us today, but – guess what – let's attack people who are working the hardest to take care of Albertans who are overcome with COVID. Let's attack health professionals. Let's cut the wages of health professionals. I mean, please. I don't understand. You know what? Albertans don't get it either. Albertans don't trust this government. It's so clear. They know that they're certainly not caring about the professionals that put themselves in harm's way during this pandemic. They're showing so little respect.

I mean, I have a lot of teachers that have reached out to me. Certainly, in my riding there are many teachers. You know, class sizes are ballooning. There's so much responsibility. All the protocols around COVID, all the challenges of going online, all the things that they've done: this government doesn't care about that. This government just wants to make it harder.

Of course, we've all talked about the fiasco of the curriculum many times. I mean, the previous speaker said: "Oh, yeah, the curriculum is great. We shouldn't talk about this, and we shouldn't talk about this." That's not how education works. Of course, we need to be age appropriate, but kids need to hear about the realities that have gone on and certainly our colonial history. We know very clearly that the Northwest Territories always used Alberta's curriculum, and they are not, because of the abysmal job that the UCP have done on this matter. So, please. Like, this is a government afraid, and this is just another way for them to control a profession that they don't like their views or their values.

It's just like my profession, social workers. Last year, last spring, there was a bill passed in this House that meant the Alberta College of Social Workers had to separate. It had to have the college separate from the association. You know, the Alberta College of Social Workers isn't very big. It's only about 8,000 members. This is the death knell. This is the death knell for the association.

I worked there for 10 years before I was elected in this House. I'm very proud of the advocacy work we did, how we worked with government. I know I was involved with lobbying government to have an independent Child and Youth Advocate during that time. That work is important. That is civil society work. That's professions, regular citizens speaking up about what they care about. But you know what this government thinks when people do that? That they're troublemakers. They shouldn't be listened to. They have to be silenced.

You know, the separation of my profession and making that happen is actually – I mean, the new association hasn't quite been created yet although it's in the process – silencing a lot of members of the Alberta College of Social Workers. It really breaks my heart because it feels like that is a really vital part of a healthy society, that people have outlets to speak about it. Certainly, as a social worker my values of social inclusion, making sure that no one is left behind, humanitarian values, social justice values: all of these things are so important to me. Of course, they brought me into this House. That is why I actually became a politician. I wanted a bigger platform. I wanted to be able to have more authority and power to speak about these things. I didn't think that when I came into this position, my profession would be attacked and that would be the thing the UCP thought was important. Like, why silence people who have important views to share? To hear the members opposite, they just think that, well, you know, you shouldn't care about social justice. Well, why not? I don't understand that.

It is about silencing people. It is about silencing professions. I really ask the members in this House to vote against this bill because it is taking a fundamental characteristic and responsibility of any profession to self-regulate, taking that totally out of that, so it really weakens the profession significantly. You know, I really want to ask the members opposite: why are they doing this? They're doing this because they're afraid, and they don't care about civil society. They only care about people who think like them, and it's so clear from all the things they've done, so many things they've done unilaterally to be disrespectful and not be inclusive. It's evident in so much of what they're doing.

Besides the Alberta College of Social Workers, which is the profession that I belong to – they're separating that – there's another college that certainly I've had contact with, but it came out of the Association of Counselling Therapy of Alberta. This government promised them some time ago that they would create a regulatory college for them, and they did all the homework, got everything going. Guess what. Now they don't want to do it. Now the minister is dragging his feet on that. This is just another example of how much the UCP are afraid of professions and certainly don't want to give them any kind of rights or authority.

We know that people having a regulated college of professionals is actually in the public interest. It actually protects the public. Certainly, you know, teachers, of course, are dealing with people in the school system, young people. These are children. I mean, in the Alberta College of Social Workers we work with children all the time, and we're a self-regulating body. Certainly, health professionals do that. So who's next? Who's next? Who else is going to be stripped of this self-regulating power? You say that it's for the kids, but is it? I think that there's another hidden agenda perhaps that the minister needs to be more honest about, that it is: "Okay. These guys are bugging me, so I'm just going to give them a bit of a hard time here. I'm going to take away this fundamental power of being a profession."

This legislation is just – again I will say it – really denigrating teachers, and it's not respecting civil society. It's not making sure that citizens have voices to speak up in our province, and it's certainly not about protecting children. It's not. It's not at all. It is a political game by this minister and this government to take control of the self-regulation of teachers in our province because they're mad at teachers. You know, we definitely cannot trust the UCP government. I mean, this has been demonstrated time and time again, and we see it.

I was, like, stunned that this was something that was pretty quick legislation that came through when my professional college was split. You know, honestly, it is the death knell for their ability to advocate, speak up, which is, of course, what we want in a civil society, but not if you're afraid. The UCP seems to continue to be too afraid to actually have robust public discourses, political discourses, because – I don't know – they have thin skin or they don't have very good arguments and they don't have to speak about them or explain them. I'm not quite sure what it is exactly that they're afraid of, but it's just been demonstrated time and time again: if you're not following our rules, if you're not doing what we say, we don't want to hear from you or, hey, we're going to cut your funding. Certainly, I have lots of contacts with the nonprofit sector, and people are afraid all the time. It's happened so much already.

Seniors and Housing: when we were government, we put $2 million into nonprofits, seniors' centres, things like that, to support people to age in their communities. Guess what the UCP did. As soon as they got in, they slashed that budget to below $1 million. You know, this makes so much sense, to keep people in their communities. But guess what. Nonprofits can't say anything because they're afraid. They feel like they'll be even more likely to have budget cuts, and then they'll be able to do even less.

You know, this is a punitive government. If you speak up against them, hey, they're going to discipline you for that. That's exactly what this bill is about. It's about keeping the ATA weak.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

The next hon. member that caught my eye is the hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you very much for the opportunity to rise late on a Thursday afternoon and speak to Bill 15. It's a pleasure to have the opportunity. I'll just start off by reiterating something that the minister said when she introduced the bill for second reading. She said that this really is about protection for students and not about punishing teachers. I just wanted to reiterate that.

Like many of my colleagues on this side of the House, I'm rising today to express my support for this bill. I've had some conversations in my constituency office with teachers and administrators, trying to figure out what the purpose is. They had valid questions, and we've answered those questions. I really believe that this is important legislation, and it's coming forward at an important time. It will reform the discipline process for teachers, teacher leaders, and administration to make the education system safer for students. Members opposite have said, you know: "Why? Why this?" Well, that's the answer, to make the system safer for students. This is about our kids and their kids.

Bill 15 will create a streamlined, effective, consistent, and efficient discipline process. The disciplinary process will have a set timeline, where action must be taken within 30 days of a complaint. I also think that's critical. As it stands now, it can take a long time, and teachers can remain in the system, where there's question. It's not good for the teacher, it's not good for the classroom, and it's not good for the students that may be involved. I really think a key element to this is the timeline. An additional 30 days will be provided for these measures to begin.

Mr. Speaker, right now the Alberta Teachers' Association functions as judge, jury, and lawyer, right? They're there to determine the proceedings, but they're also there as an advocate for the defendant. That seems a bit flawed to me. They have disciplinary power, and because they also serve as the union, I believe it increases the chance of a conflict of interest and certainly the perception of that. Our priority is the safety and education of students. This bill will enhance the accountability and the transparency of the teaching profession. I actually have spoken to teachers who support that theory, that concept, that intention. It will further protect students and give parents peace of mind.

Mr. Speaker, the decision to put forth this legislation is not one that was taken lightly. I want to thank the hon. Minister of Education, as others have this afternoon, for all the hard work that she's put into this bill and all of the dedication she's demonstrated in not wavering in her commitment to Alberta students.

The goal here is to implement the best practices, period. After examining other key provinces and other comparator provinces as well as other Alberta professions like engineering and nursing, in all cases the union and disciplinary functions were carried out by separate organizations, and I think that's key. We've heard from members opposite who said that that's not the case. Well, that is the case, Mr. Speaker. This is how we came to the decision to implement a structure that combines the effectiveness of the commissioner model in British Columbia with the arm's-length features of Saskatchewan's teacher regulatory board.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta is behind as many other provinces already have their own disciplinary bodies. The current disciplinary structure has been in place for 85 years, and it's time for change.

One of the members opposite said that we were motivated by fear. I'm not motivated by fear, Mr. Speaker. I'm not scared to make change. That's why I ran for office. I'm not scared to say that we need to make a change here, because we need to protect students.

The existing system is difficult to navigate, and it causes a fear of reprisal from one's own association as it currently sits. In contrast, Bill 15 empowers teachers and administration and allows for the duty to report under the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act to be carried out dutifully.

A concerned parent found it disturbing that, and I quote: the ATA felt they had no duty to report criminal acts involving children to police because they felt it might jeopardize their own hearing process. End quote. That's the reason, Mr. Speaker. That's why we're here today talking about Bill 15. That is the point. The goal here is to protect students, Alberta's children, and ensure that they have a safe environment to learn in. Alberta currently does not have a sole organization to protect and advocate for them, and with this bill that will change.

A commissioner's office balances the need for an impartial and fair process with the government's desire to protect student interests. Any and all accusations that this change is a direct attack on teachers is simply a tactic being used by the ATA or the members opposite to create fear amongst their members in an attempt to retain their own power and control.

That's not what this is about. This shouldn't be about politics. This should be about kids. The implementation of Bill 15 would lead to greater accountability, public assurance, and consistency in addressing complaints under one legislated governance structure. [interjection] I see the minister is rising to intervene, and I welcome that intervention, Mr. Speaker.

Member LaGrange: Thank you. I just want to build on what I'm hearing from my colleague. What I heard from the members opposite was that they're really more concerned about protecting the union than they are about protecting children. This is not about protecting the union. This is not about retaining power within the union. This is about making sure that there is an independent, fair, accountable process so that when these terrible situations happen – and I again want to reiterate that the vast majority of teachers are amazing, caring, wonderful individuals, and they have our respect – there has to be a process in place that is fair and transparent.

The members opposite said that we are not listening. You know what? We are listening. We're listening to parents. We're listening to victims. We are listening to victim advocacy groups. We're listening to child advocacy groups. We are listening to teachers. We're listening to administrators, to superintendents, who all have said that we need to change this process.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The minister took the words right out of my mouth. The next sentence I literally was going to say is that the vast majority of teachers in this province are professionals who value and protect the safety of students. They care about their students, and they will likely never have any involvement with this process.

That's not what Bill 15 is about. It's not about vilifying good teachers; it's about dealing with the ones that aren't. That's the point. This legislation will elevate the status of the teaching profession by removing any perception of conflict of interest. I've had teachers tell me that in my office.

The Alberta teaching profession commissioner will have the authority to address and investigate a complaint and determine the most appropriate course of action to take regarding that complaint, but as is currently the case under the Education Act, the minister will have the final decision on a penalty for unprofessional conduct or professional incompetence.

That's a second piece of oversight, and I don't see the problem with that. I actually think that enriches the system. Transitioning and implementing a new system can be challenging, and we've heard that this afternoon. During this period the responsibilities would shift, where appropriate, to the commissioner and newly appointed members of hearing and appeal committees, but the previous rules will be followed. As a result, procedural fairness will be followed while also ensuring an efficient transition into a fully operational single model for teacher and teacher-led leader professionalism in Alberta.

I'm going to wrap up because I see that the time is getting close to the end here, Mr. Speaker.

The cost of implementing this change? I can tell you the cost of not implementing this change: our kids. The fact is that this change is not about politics; it's about doing the right thing for students and the right thing for the profession. An examination of sexual assault cases involving staff in kindergarten to grade 12 schools in Canada carried out by the Canadian Centre for Child Protection found that 714 employees or former employees were linked to sexual offences against schoolchildren between 1997 and 2017. This is unacceptable. That's 714 too many.

What Bill 15 is trying to do is deal with that issue. We do not want any more exposure for Alberta's kids. Blatant abuse of power by adults in positions of power is a type of behaviour that should never be tolerated, no matter who you are, in this province.

I'm going to skip over some of my notes because, again, I see our time is short. [interjection] Does the minister have another intervention? I welcome it.

Member LaGrange: Yes, just a really quick one. I had heard a question about: what is the return on investment? Like my colleague, the return on investment is: what is the cost of the damage to our children, to their futures? I have heard stories from victims that now are suicidal because of the damage that has been done by a teacher, someone that they should have been able to trust. The trust that's broken between children and their teachers, the trust that's broken with the parents: this is a lifetime of damage. This cannot continue, and if we can do anything that makes it better, why wouldn't we do it? We have a system that's been in place for over 85 years with little to no change. We have a dual system. Why don't the members opposite want to see a single system that is actually going to be independent, arm's length, accountable, transparent to the public?

Mrs. Allard: Thank you. Like many others in this House, I am a parent. I'm a parent of three now adult children, but how would I feel if something had happened to any of my children during the course of their education? Horrified, Mr. Speaker. I cannot imagine it, and I would not forgive a government that turned a blind eye knowing that this was a problem, period. Again I commend this minister for her dedication to Alberta's kids and to my kids and to your kids.

Mr. Speaker, the impacts of the misuse of authority have devastating and long-lasting effects, as the minister just mentioned. There are students who have contracted incurable sexual infections from teachers. That's an extreme case, but that's the impetus behind Bill 15. There are children that have told us that they had to keep their mouth shut for three years and that that was one of the most horrific and destructive experiences of their life. We don't want that to ever happen again in Alberta schools. Again, the vast, vast majority of teachers are incredible, wonderful people. This will not impact them at all. We're finding the bad apples and getting them out of the system.

In instances like the ones I just mentioned, kids are robbed of their childhoods. They're made adults way too young, and there's no way back from that, Mr. Speaker. The damage is done. These events are horrific, and they're heartbreaking, and they should never occur, full stop.

While we do everything in our capacity to prevent these situations, sometimes they still happen. When they do, there needs to be a body to hold perpetrators accountable for their actions, and that's why, Mr. Speaker, I wholeheartedly support this change in legislation, and again I thank the minister for her work on it.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Deputy Government House Leader has risen.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think we've accomplished a ton of work this week here in the Legislature. I'm grateful for all the hard work of members on both sides of the House. At this time I would move that the Assembly be adjourned until 1:30 p.m. on Monday, April 25.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 4:29 p.m.]

Bill Status Report for the 30th Legislature - 3rd Session (2022)

Activity to Thursday, April 21, 2022

The Bill sponsor's name is in brackets following the Bill title. If it is a money Bill, ($) will appear between the title and the sponsor's name. Bills numbered 1 to 200 are Government Bills. Bills numbered 201 or higher are Private Members' Public Bills. Bills numbered with a "Pr" prefix are Private Bills.

* An asterisk beside a Bill number indicates an amendment was passed to that Bill; the Committee line shows the precise date of the amendment.

The date a Bill comes into force is indicated in square brackets after the date of Royal Assent. If a Bill comes into force "on proclamation," "with exceptions," or "on various dates," please contact Legislative Counsel, Alberta Justice, for details at 780.427.2217. [The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interest and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Hon. members, we will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by Ms Ariana Whitlow. I would invite you to participate in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all of us command.
With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
The True North strong and free!
From far and wide, O Canada,
We stand on guard for thee.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

The Speaker: Hon. members, this morning I had the absolutely privilege of meeting a very special guest who's now joining us in the Speaker's gallery. It's my great pleasure to welcome His Excellency Toomas Lukk, the ambassador of Estonia, accompanied by Anne-Ly Ader, first secretary at the embassy of Estonia in Ottawa, and Mrs. Külliva Kangur, honorary consul of Estonia in Alberta. Hon. members, there are approximately 2,700 Estonians in Alberta, comprising 10 per cent of all Estonians in Canada. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. [An electronic device sounded] Oh, my. That sounded a lot like a cellphone ringing in the Chamber. I look forward to the member, being honourable, noting that it was theirs and making a donation to the charity of their choice on behalf of the Speaker

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Members, as you are aware, recently I put out a call to all Albertans to contact my office if they would be willing to lead our Assembly in the singing of our national anthem. We've been overwhelmed with responses by Albertans, and this afternoon I was pleased to welcome our first anthem singer following that call. It gives me great pleasure to introduce to members of the Assembly Ms Ariana Whitlow. Along with being a highly accomplished and passionate singer, actor, dancer, Ms Whitlow holds a place near and dear to my heart because she is also the daughter of the late Speaker Gene Zwozdesky, the former Speaker and minister and long-standing, beloved Member of the Legislative Assembly. Ms Whitlow, please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. I know that your dad would have been so very proud of you, not just today but every day.

Hon. members, this afternoon we have one School at the Leg. joining us. They are a group from the constituency of Edmonton-Glenora, the St. Pius X elementary school.

Also joining us in the galleries today: guests I had the pleasure of meeting earlier. Guest of the Member for Camrose: Aiden MacKey. Also joining us in the gallery is Josh Traptow, the CEO of Heritage Calgary and a guest of the Member for Calgary-Klein. And finally, please welcome Al Nagel, the CEO of Alberta federation of rural electricity. He is a guest of the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction. I invite you all to please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Alberta Joint Working Group on Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, for more than 20 months I had the honour of serving on the Alberta Joint Working Group on Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls to provide recommendations to the Alberta government to address the calls for justice in the final report of the national inquiry. I'm grateful to the Minister of Indigenous Relations for entrusting me with the role and will forever be changed by the impact of my conversations with the incredible working group members with whom I served.

Mr. Speaker, according to data from the report Indigenous women in Canada are three times more likely to be victims of violence than non-Indigenous women. In Alberta 206 Indigenous women were murdered between 1980 and 2012. One morning in our working group we discussed the potential to improve our police service and justice system. During that conversation I heard from fellow working group members about the distrust towards police. When I asked for more details as to why, one of the members was willing to share a heartbreaking yet straightforward perspective. She said: when I was a little girl, my grandmother taught me, when I saw a police officer, to run and hide in the bushes because whenever police came, either an adult went away and never came home or a child went away and never came home. As her words sunk in, I reflected on what my mother taught me when I was a little child: if you're ever in trouble, run and find a police officer.

Mr. Speaker, I share this story to highlight how different the journey and perspectives are for our Indigenous women, our brothers and sisters. It is vital to consider this is as we begin this journey of reconciliation. We may not know where to start with the journey of reconciliation or if we will ever truly end, but the road must be travelled with patience, understanding, and a desire to honestly try to see the perspective from the eyes of our Indigenous brothers and sisters. With the 113 Pathways to Justice recommendations now delivered to the Alberta government, I look forward to seeing them implemented through various ministries and through legislation. Our province prioritizes healing from the past and a more robust outlook, a hope for the future for Indigenous people and their communities.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Family Doctor Shortage in Lethbridge

Ms Phillips: In the past three months Lethbridge has lost 13 more doctors. Since 2019, when the UCP took over, southern Alberta has 62 fewer doctors. That's the net; 43,000 residents of Lethbridge don't have access to a family doctor, and no clinics are accepting new patients. This crisis is getting worse. The urgent care centre in Coaldale has been closed for two years, and the UCP MLA for Taber-Warner recently revealed that there is no plan to reopen it. Those are the facts.

Last week the MLA for Lethbridge-East and the Health minister predictably told people that a couple of new doctors and a handful of maybes is good news. Well, Lethbridge, don't let them tell you things that are not true. We have lost five times that many doctors in two years. We lost them because the UCP went to war with doctors. They tore up their agreement. They have attacked them in the media, on social media, and here in this Chamber all through the pandemic. They're not fixing the problem because they are more focused on infighting than on health care.

Now, the Member for Lethbridge-East is the Premier's man in caucus, rallying the troops, sticking up for the Premier, carrying his water. He spends his time defending his indefensible Premier rather than defending the right of parents to get care for their sick kids. Albertans rightly do not trust the UCP with their public health care. The fate and future of public health care relies on removing the UCP from office. Almost half the city of Lethbridge does not have a family doctor now, but once there is a change in government, we will make fixing that our priority. Call the election. Lethbridge is ready.

1:40 Organ and Tissue Donation Awareness

Mr. Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, April 24 to 30 is National Organ and Tissue Donation Awareness Week. This week is a time to raise awareness about the critical need for tissue and organ donation across the country. The key to success starts with raising awareness. Currently 90 per cent of Canadians say that they support organ donation, yet only 32 per cent have registered their intent to donate. The disconnect between those willing to donate and those registered is concerning. There are currently 4,400 Canadians waiting for a life-saving organ transplant, almost 700 of which are here in Alberta alone. As a reference it can be up to a seven-year wait for a kidney, with many more awaiting tissue transplants. Sadly, on average 250 Canadians die each year on a wait-list. Each year less than 2 per cent of opportunities for organ and tissue donation exist.

As a member of the Legislature I feel that it is crucial that we work together to create the best system possible. That is why, with the help of transplant organizations across Alberta, I've introduced my private member's bill, Bill 205, that, if passed, will strengthen our referral process and expand education and awareness. Since engaging in this process, the families that have reached out to me have truly moved my heart, Mr. Speaker, like Cindy Krieger, who shared how the decision of her daughter Morghan to donate saved countless lives, or the story of Jennifer Woolfsmith, who lost her 22-month-old Mackenzy, and the solace it provides her to know that the decision to donate was a gift of life to four other children.

It takes only two minutes to register to donate, and one donor can help save up to eight lives and make life better for up to 75 people. Don't forget that it is never too late to become a donor, so please take two minutes today and become a tissue and organ donor.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Southern Alberta Concerns

Ms Sweet: Mr. Speaker, I've had the pleasure of touring southern Alberta on so many occasions and talking to Albertans about their priorities. I met with local residents, businesses, health care workers, educators, and more. I did this so I could hear first-hand what those communities need to be able to grow and thrive. The people I met with were worried about their local health care and education. They are concerned about job losses and want a government that will invest in them. They told me loudly and clearly that they want to have a partner and an ally, something they're not getting from this UCP government.

While I was visiting rural communities, this government was doing what they do best, ignoring the people they were elected to represent. They continue to engage in their infighting and the internal drama that Conservatives are known for. The Premier's staff compared his caucus to clowns. The Premier's office called his caucus sad and sour. You can feel the desperation from over there, Mr. Speaker. To tell you the truth, not a single person that I met with told me that that's what they really need, petty name-calling from the supposed leadership of this province. Even the UCP MLAs know this. One of the candidates for their leadership race warned them that their rural seats were at risk because of the bad policy calls and because of the work being done by this Official Opposition.

But I want to offer my colleagues in the UCP a hand of friendship and offer to help out. I commit to them that since they are more focused on their internal policies rather than the concerns of their constituents, too busy focused on protecting the Premier's job rather than creating and protecting jobs in rural Alberta, I'll take it off their hands. Let me assure them that on this side of the House I will continue to represent their constituents, because they continue to abandon them. Albertans deserve a government focused on them, and while they won't get it from the UCP, it won't be long before they have the opportunity to elect a new government that will.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East has risen.

Alberta at Work Initiative

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As part of our continued efforts to strengthen Alberta's labour market, our government introduced the Alberta at work initiative. Alberta at work aims to get more Albertans working in jobs that support their families and improve their lives. To accomplish this, five collaborating ministries will invest $600 million over the next three years in a variety of programs to support training and remove potential employment barriers for Albertans.

The Alberta at work initiative focuses on building strong foundations by allocating $87 million to support STEM and trades training. In addition, $295 million is being invested in the creation of training opportunities in high-demand fields to develop the skills of our workforce. Every Albertan should have the opportunity to participate in and benefit from our province's economic recovery. Our government is dedicating $23 million to help low-income students advance their careers by joining high-demand programs. Another $41 million over three years is available to service providers working with Albertans who are unemployed, marginally employed, receiving income supports, or from underrepresented groups. Over the next three years $23 million will be invested into the Canada-Alberta job grant, which helps employers hire Alberta workers and helps businesses develop the skills they need to grow and diversify.

Mr. Speaker, we are ensuring the success of our students by investing $235 million into programs to support enrolment growth, microcredentials, expanded apprentice education, and additional work-integrated learning opportunities. To continue to break down potential barriers, $20 million is being allocated to Albertans experiencing long-term unemployment to facilitate their return to work. Thanks to investments like these, more than 32,000 people were able to leave income support programs and get back on their feet last year alone.

The Alberta at work initiative is a great example of collaboration across government for the betterment of Albertans, and I am pleased to support it.

Iftar Event at Rahma Mosque in Edmonton

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, this Saturday I was honoured to be able to join the Rahma mosque community in breaking fast as the month of Ramadan comes close to an end. Hundreds of Albertans gathered with food and water to celebrate iftar, the breaking of the fast. I would like to thank my many colleagues, particularly from Edmonton-Mill Woods, Edmonton-Whitemud, and Edmonton-West Henday, and the countless community leaders and members who joined with me for this important celebration. As the MLA for Edmonton-McClung I am honoured to be able to represent such a diverse and welcoming constituent group in this Legislature, and it's a special privilege to be able to represent the Rahma mosque.

As one of the five pillars of Islam, fasting calls on Muslims to reflect on and show compassion towards the less fortunate. It is also coupled with acts of charity, where individuals are encouraged to increase their generosity and donate for causes like hunger and poverty alleviation. But, most importantly, Mr. Speaker, Ramadan is also a time of community. By opening their doors for community iftar, the Rahma mosque provides an excellent opportunity for people of different cultural backgrounds to form new friendships and share in the feeling of generosity. Muslims do Ramadan as an opportunity to recognize their connection to faith and human communities. As the month draws to a close, we wish them blessings for their good deeds within their communities.

At a time when we are seeing increasing instances of Islamophobia in Edmonton and Alberta, events like this that bring the community together are more important than ever. Alberta has always been a welcoming home for Muslims, with the first mosque in Canada being built in Edmonton, with the Al Rashid mosque, that was built in 1938. This iftar event is one that celebrates the Muslim community and the best of Alberta. I was honoured to play a role in organizing this event and look forward to many more in the future. I encourage all Albertans to join with others in the community to celebrate an iftar meal at their local mosque.

Thank you.

Health Care Funding

Mr. Turton: Mr. Speaker, as many in this House know, health care is one of the most important items on the minds of Albertans, especially over the last two years. Spending the time, energy, and money on health care is something that this government has and will continue to do, and this is proven in what is outlined in Budget 2022. I've heard and seen members opposite say that this government is leaving empty promises for Albertans. They claim this government is not putting money where their mouth is, but that is simply not the case. This budget is the largest health care budget Albertans have ever seen.

In 2018 the NDP government spent just over $20 billion to support AHS initiatives, but this UCP government is expected to spend over $22 billion in this year's budget, a 7.9 per cent increase. Let me say that again. Our budget outlines an almost 8 per cent increase in spending for health care compared to the previous government. That includes $2.2 billion to build, expand, and maintain health facilities, and $64 million for response capacity in EMS. We're also committing $20 million in new funding for mental health, addiction supports, and $90 million per year to bring new family physicians to rural and remote communities. As a result, this province will see the highest number of doctors, the highest number of nurses, and the largest capital investment for health care in our province's history. Our seniors will also see record-setting funding levels, with nearly $3.7 billion going towards the supports they need and require when it comes to programs like continuing care. Those are big dollars and commitments, Mr. Speaker.

As MLA for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain I want my constituents and all Albertans to know that they can sleep comfortably knowing that this government cares about their well-being and the health of their families. This massive and unprecedented commitment shows that we will continue to support and increase the publicly funded health care system that our residents need for many years to come.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Utility Rebate Timeline

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are struggling with the rising cost of living, and they need help now, not later. It's been months since the Premier announced, reluctantly, that the government would provide rebates on power bills, paltry rebates but rebates nonetheless. Sadly, because this government is so mired in scandal and drama, it's way behind. Our party is proposing a timeline that would ensure Albertans see these rebates, already promised, arrive in their pockets no later than May 31. Will the Premier provide this guarantee for Albertans who are so tired of waiting on his empty promises?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, first of all, let's be clear that Alberta is taking more action than any government in Canada to help people cope with the rising cost of living, particularly energy, not only with the $150 electricity rebate but with a cap on natural gas prices and the 13-cent-a-litre abatement of the Alberta fuel tax. We'd like to get the electricity rebate in people's hands as soon as possible. Unfortunately, the NDP is standing in the way. Why did they deny consent? Why did they block this bill last week? Will they co-operate with us? We can pass it this week if they co-operate.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, we've outlined what they have to do for us to pass it this week, but instead what we're getting from this Premier are excuses. If I was over there, they would have gotten the cheque already. The urgency is real. We're hearing from Albertans who are so behind on their bills that they face shut-off, and all they get from the minister is a 1.800 number. It is not good enough. We propose a ban on utility shut-offs until at least October to allow time for rebates to arrive. This would protect Albertans who can't wait for the Premier to get his act together. Will the Premier agree with that? Then we could pass it really fast.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, this bill could be done and dusted by this evening if the NDP got out of the way and actually accepted to pass it quickly. She said that Albertans would have got the cheque if she was Premier. I'll tell you that what they got was the NDP's hand in their pockets, taking thousands of dollars out of the pockets of individual Albertans with their carbon tax. If they're actually concerned about power prices, why did they build 7 and a half billion dollars of transmission infrastructure, why did they shut down the coal plants in a hurry, and why did they bring in their carbon tax?

Ms Notley: You know, Mr. Speaker, the Premier should really read the report from U of C into power costs, because the leading cause isn't any of the things he's identified; it's profit. It's power companies jacking up their markups just to turn a bigger buck. The falsehoods, the blame, the excuses: they all arrive very quickly. You know what doesn't? The rebates. Our party is proposing that any future rebates delivered to Albertans must arrive within 30 days of Treasury Board authorization. Does the Premier support putting that level of accountability into the act, or is he going to run from that, too?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, last week we released the independent audit of the NDP's power-purchasing electricity fiasco: $1.34 billion that they wasted. Why? Because of their ideological zeal to shut down the cheapest and most dependable form of baseload power. But the biggest driver now in electricity costs is their carbon tax, and they voted in this place two weeks ago to support Justin Trudeau's 25 per cent increase of the carbon tax. They want to quadruple it. Shame on them.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition for a second set of questions.

Ms Notley: None of that's true, Mr. Speaker, but nonetheless.

Physician Supply

Ms Notley: Since this UCP government was elected, the number of doctors leaving Alberta each year has increased 60 per cent. What does that trend mean? In Lethbridge 40,000 people have no family doctor, not a single doctor accepting new patients in the Bow Valley, scheduled ER closures across rural Alberta, and now eight rural communities that have lost obstetric services. Will the Premier today stand and apologize to the families who are losing medical care in their communities across the province of Alberta?

Mr. Kenney: Well, first of all, Mr. Speaker, she said that none of that was true. Is she now saying that she opposes the carbon tax? Should we bring back that motion where they can vote against the planned increases in the carbon tax? They brought in the carbon tax. They shut down the coal plants. They overbuilt the transmission infrastructure. They had to pay $1.34 billion in penalties. If Albertans are paying more in electricity, they have one person to blame, and it's the Leader of the Opposition.

Ms Notley: We're talking about doctors, Mr. Speaker, since 188 have left Alberta since December alone. Why? Because the Premier ignores their issues, clearly, because he tore up their contract, he disrespected their profession, and he refuses to listen to their advice on public health, and now the expectant mothers who live in eight rural communities – north, south, central Alberta – cannot have their babies where they live. This is a fundamentally important health care service, and this Premier is letting them down. He won't even talk about it. Why won't he take responsibility for his failures on this issue?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, first of all, I'm pleased to report that Alberta has seen, according to the CPSA, a net gain of 99 physicians versus the same quarter of last year. That's to March 31. So we have more physicians. We have more physicians per capita than the rest of Canada. We have more nurses working in Alberta than ever before. We've added $2 billion to the baseline Health budget. But when she says that we didn't listen to doctors' advice on COVID restrictions, she really means the Twitter donor doctors, and they would still have us in a hard lockdown if they had their way.

Ms Notley: Just keep insulting the doctors, Mr. Speaker.

You know what? Albertans can't get a family doctor. They can't give birth in their community. They can't schedule their emergencies. So if the Premier thinks that there are more doctors in Alberta, I suggest that he get out the old Ford photo op, he get on that little puppy and he goes south, where he will find 31 fewer doctors compared to just a year ago and 13 that have left in just three months in Lethbridge alone. Why won't the Premier take responsibility for the mess he is making in health care and the hurt that he is imposing on Alberta families?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, again, we have 99 more doctors working in Alberta in the first quarter of this year versus the first quarter of last year. We are attracting more physicians, and indeed we're investing $90 million into the retention and recruitment of rural physicians. That's $90 million more than the NDP. And to put that in context, that's for about 800 rural physicians. We have the strongest incentives for rural physicians of any province in Canada, and I'm pleased to report that there are 1,800 more nurses working in Alberta Health Services than under the NDP.

Calgary Storm Damage Recovery Funding

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, I was proud to join our leader last week to commit to Calgarians whose homes were destroyed in the record 2020 hailstorm that an NDP government would be there for them. We committed to backfilling the city of Calgary program to install hail-resistant roofs. This program will cost less than $5 million. The Premier ridiculed our commitment and then made up figures about how much it will cost. Can the Premier tell this House why he doesn't care about tens of thousands of Calgarians, including my constituents, whose homes were destroyed by hail?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, let's be clear. What the NDP is engaged in is the most cynical act of failed vote-buying that I've ever seen. You know, it costs about $17,000 to put in a metal roof on an average home. There are about 150,000 homes in northeast Calgary. They're talking about a bill for taxpayers of at least 2 and a half billion dollars, and I've got news for that member of the NDP. People in northeast Calgary: they work hard, and they pay a lot of taxes, and they don't expect . . . [interjection]

The Speaker: The Premier has the call.

Mr. Kenney: They work hard. They pay a lot of taxes, Mr. Speaker, and they don't support the kind of cynical vote-buying scheme of the NDP. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, the only person trying to buy votes was the Premier at the Genesis Centre in northeast Calgary this weekend.

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

Mr. Sabir: The hailstorm happened two years ago, and still today there are claims that are pending, and this government hasn't lifted a finger. Some people are considering moving altogether. The stress of the damage caused to their homes, the delays in settlement, and the lack of support from government is too much. Is this government really going to sit there and do nothing as Calgarians pack up their lives and leave their communities? [interjections]

2:00

The Speaker: It's important for the Speaker to be able to hear the question as well as the answer.

Mr. Kenney: You know, why is it that the NDP is proposing that only a small number of Albertans would get this new free roof program? You know what? Hail happens all across the province, Mr. Speaker. Hail happens all across the province. There are about 1.5 million dwellings in the province. To install new roofs for 1.5 million dwellings would be in excess of $20 billion. Welcome to the NDP's new fiscal reality.

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order was noted at 2 o'clock as well as again at 2:01.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, it gets worse. The Premier has insulted northeast Calgary residents over and over. First, he brushed off their concerns about skyrocketing insurance claims after the hailstorm. Then he blamed northeast Calgary for spreading the COVID-19 virus. For the record we have the highest vaccination rate in the province. But then the Premier had the audacity to go to northeast Calgary Friday night and beg people to vote for him in his leadership review. Will the Premier admit once and for all that he doesn't care about the people of northeast Calgary?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm proud of the fact that the majority of northeast Calgarians voted for this government to get Alberta back on track. I'm proud of the hard work being done by northeast Calgary MLAs. And do you know what northeast Calgarians tell me? They tell me they want to keep their taxes low. They want a strong economy. They are great entrepreneurs and hard-working people, and what they don't want is a multibillion-dollar tax bill being passed on to them by the NDP because of reckless and cynical left-wing vote-buying politics.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Anti-Racism Act

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week the UCP members on the Private Bills Committee voted to block debate on my private member's bill, the Anti-Racism Act. The bill, aimed at addressing systemic racism, came out of extensive consultation with racialized communities, academic experts, and a recommendation from the government's Anti-Racism Advisory Council. BIPOC Albertans were there at the committee to watch the proceedings and were shocked to see government members declare that this bill, which has long been called for by racialized Albertans, was not worthy of being debated. Does the Premier agree with his committee that tackling systemic racism in Alberta isn't worth debate in this Chamber? Will he join us next week in voting that it should be?

Mr. Kenney: Well, of course, racism is a critically important issue, which is why we have debated it many times, including through government motions, in this place. There was not a vote to block the bill at committee but a recommendation against it. There's an invitation in the deliberative legislative process for the NDP to work with government members. The question is: if that bill was so important, why didn't the member bring it forward when he had a majority of members in this Assembly? Why wasn't it important to the NDP government? Why did the NDP government do nothing about carding, nothing about street checks, and nothing about the barriers to economic inclusion through foreign credential recognition? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Opposition had lots of chances to ask questions. If she'd like another one, she's more than welcome to do so.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: What a shameful response from this Premier.

Mr. Speaker, what I will say is that, unlike this Premier, when I learn more, I do better. That's why I brought forward this bill, which would address a long-standing call of racialized Albertans by establishing the frameworks and standards to enable the collection of race-based data, supported by communities, academics, health care experts, even this government's Anti-Racism Advisory Council. If they are so committed to addressing systemic racism, legislation like this is a critical step. If the Premier won't vote to even allow Bill 204 to have debate, will he commit that he will take the recommendations of the bill and that he will step forward with a government bill to accomplish this this session?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we have a deliberative process for legislation. I haven't read the bill. I haven't commented on the bill. It goes to the committee. Members study the bill. I know that what he's asking me to do is to tell members to vote against their judgment. I won't do that. The real question is: why did that member and his party vote against this Conservative government bill to ban the often racist practice of carding? In four years the NDP did nothing to address that often racist abuse of police power. This government brings forward a bill to ban carding, and the NDP voted against it. Why?

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, what we did was debate that bill, introduce amendments brought forward to us by members of the community who expressed concerns that that bill had loopholes and did not do enough. We did our job, unlike this Premier and unlike the members of that committee who were unwilling to even take the time to actually look at what the bill would accomplish or bring forward a cogent argument against it. All it requires is for this House to have the opportunity to fairly debate. If the Premier won't support that, will he at least commit that he will sit down and speak to the stakeholders that his committee members shut out to hear their concerns?

Mr. Kenney: Let's be clear, Mr. Speaker. In four years in office the NDP did absolutely nothing about carding. They did nothing about the often racist practice of carding . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: The Premier.

Mr. Kenney: I know they hate hearing the truth, Mr. Speaker. The record is clear. For four years they did nothing about carding. When this government brought forward a bill to ban carding, they voted against it. This government is taking unprecedented action to combat the reality of racism in our society, including banning carding, limiting street checks, appointing a special liaison in the hate crimes unit to work with communities, creating the security infrastructure program, the fairness for newcomers office, and so much more.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein has the next question.

Surgery Wait Times and Chartered Facilities

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the last election and over the last three years I've heard concerns from many of my constituents about long surgical wait times. I wanted to take this opportunity to let them know that I have heard them. I am proud to be part of a government that campaigned on reducing wait times. The pandemic has made that harder by forcing us to postpone some surgeries to free up resources to support the ICUs. To the Minister of Health: what is our government doing to ensure that Albertans receive critical surgeries in a timely manner?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the important question. The member is correct. COVID-19, unfortunately, has forced us to slow down scheduled surgeries at several times, but we're making progress in spite of it. The overall wait-list continues to come down. Most recently it was about 73,000 compared to 76,000 in March. Just last week we reported that we cut the wait time for cataract surgery nearly in half, from 19 weeks to 10 weeks. That's the shortest in seven years, shorter than at any time under the previous government.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that it's good news to hear that cataract removal surgery is shorter today, even after two years of COVID-19, than at any time under the previous government and given that I've heard it claimed that cataracts are just an exception, as if that particular wait time was the only problem we inherited from the previous government, to the same minister: are cataracts an exception, and what are we doing about all other surgeries?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thanks again, Mr. Speaker and to the hon. member for the question. Cataract surgeries are not an exception. Wait times also went up under previous governments for hip and knee replacements, heart surgeries, for MRIs and CTs, for some cancer surgeries as well. Emergency delays, discharge delays in hospitals, and access to continuing care got worse without a pandemic. That's why we campaigned on reducing wait times and improving access to our health care system. COVID made it tougher, but we're continuing to work on delivering on our promise. We will do that.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for his efforts. Given that I've heard that we've achieved the reduction in wait times for cataract surgeries by contracting more surgeries to chartered surgical facilities and given that the NDP appear to have an ideological focus on eliminating chartered facilities, could the same minister clarify: what is the role of chartered surgical facilities, and what are the plans for them going forward?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thanks again, Mr. Speaker. We're doing exactly what we promised, funding more surgeries in hospitals and chartered surgical facilities to reduce wait times. We need to maximize our resources, so we're increasing capacity in hospitals and in CSFs. Contracted surgeries are publicly funded surgeries. Patients do not pay, just like visiting their family physician. Any space freed up in the hospitals is used to do more surgeries in hospitals, so more complex surgeries are done there. The previous government contracted surgeries, just like we are. The difference is that on their watch wait times went up, but they're going down on ours.

Support for Small Business and Economic Recovery

Mr. Bilous: New data shows that retail sales in Alberta are down in February, the fourth decline in the last six months. When you factor in inflation, sales are down 6 per cent. That's effectively a 6 per cent cut to revenue, yet the UCP keeps piling costs onto businesses and consumers that are hurting them and hurting their viability. Our recovery is still very fragile, but the UCP is already declaring mission accomplished, patting themselves on the back, and saying that we're in a boom despite that small businesses are still struggling. How could the UCP be so out of touch?

2:10

Mr. Schweitzer: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'll tell you: after four years of the NDP, where they chased business out of Alberta, we are proud of our record, 6.5 per cent unemployment. Just to educate the members on the other side, that is a lower unemployment rate than when this government formed office, when they were in power. We're going to continue to have the best possible business environment. We're leading the country in growth. We're creating jobs and diversifying our economy.

Mr. Bilous: And there are fewer head offices in Calgary under the UCP.

Given a 6 per cent drop in sales and that the UCP is doing nothing to support these businesses and given that many small businesses I've spoken to are still struggling from the pandemic, many waiting for supports the government promised months ago – the government has failed small businesses over and over – and given that the UCP is actually adding costs onto businesses with higher utilities and insurance, if the UCP won't provide direct supports to these small businesses, will they at least stop making a bad situation worse by increasing costs?

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank goodness the NDP was not in office during this pandemic because they would have shut down small businesses for years at a time. We're going to be there with them. We're open right now. We're moving forward to live with this pandemic. Moving forward, Mr. Speaker. On top of this, we've created the best possible business environment, lowering our corporate taxes from 12 per cent down to 8 per cent. On top of that, the NDP increased taxes, their carbon tax, chasing away businesses. We are diversifying when it comes to manufacturing, when it comes to aviation, when it comes to logistics. Our economy is thriving.

Mr. Bilous: Given that the minister missed the questions, that are based on small businesses, and given that at the national level year-over-year retail sales rose by an impressive 7.6 per cent in February, a full 6 per cent higher than Alberta, and given that once inflation is factored in, this is a decline in Alberta while the rest of the country managed to grow and given that Alberta's unemployment rate lags the national rate, with Calgary having the highest unemployment rate among major cities, why is Alberta lagging the rest of the country on these key indicators, and more importantly why are Albertans and small businesses falling further behind under the UCP?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, Alberta's economy is booming right now. People are moving here for the first time in about seven years. The NDP chased away thousands upon thousands of people from this province. Right now there's this thing that is happening in Calgary – I live there – where we're starting to see licence plates again from other regions of the country, people that are moving to Alberta. Now, why are they doing that? Affordability. Calgary and Edmonton are two of the most affordable cities in the entire country. Alberta's economy is diversifying, creating jobs.

Obstetric Services in Rural Alberta

Member Irwin: This government is failing rural Albertans when it comes to access to health care in their communities. In Whitecourt

Alberta Health Services paused obstetrical care at the Whitecourt health care centre for a month due to limited physician resources. Patients are trying to work with their family doctors to ensure they have the supports needed to safely deliver their babies, yet last week the Health minister boasted about the record number of doctors in Alberta. What message does he have for families in Whitecourt who are being told they can't have babies in their own community?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'd like to thank the hon. member for the question. Alberta, like all provinces across the country, is facing challenges in terms of recruiting doctors, particularly in rural areas. We understand that that is a challenge, and that is why we are investing more than ever to build capacity within our health care system: $600 million this year, $1.8 billion over the next three years. As indicated by the Premier earlier, we're also investing an additional $90 million to be able to attract and retain workers, particularly in rural Alberta, and I'll speak more to the details of those programs.

Member Irwin: Given that it appears that the minister's plan isn't working, because this government's war with doctors hasn't just impacted expectant parents in Whitecourt – in Provost there is no surgical coverage for C-sections due to a lack of physician coverage; in Lac La Biche there are no obstetrical services because of a lack of physician coverage – can the Minister of Health explain to folks in these communities why he is boasting about his government's record when it comes to doctors while parents are being told to just wait because there aren't enough doctors in their communities to deliver babies?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as indicated, this is a very important issue. The comment made by the member opposite that Albertans are being told to wait simply isn't true. We are focusing on providing the services. We recognize that in certain areas there is a shortage. Now, we have a detailed plan to work on that, $90 million this year. We announced – and I was pleased – the RESIDE program, the rural education supplement and integrated doctor experience, which is supporting 60 doctors, physicians, annually to practise in rural or remote communities. In addition, we understand that obstetrics is challenging in terms of finding individuals, and I will speak more about that in the next . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Member Irwin: Given that the former Minister of Health created this crisis by starting a war with doctors, at the beginning of the pandemic, might I add, and that one of his biggest boosters was the Minister of Environment and Parks, who's also the MLA for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, and that in both Rimbey and Sundre there are no obstetrical services on-site because of a lack of physician coverage, what message does the Minister of Environment and Parks have for parents in his riding who can't safely deliver a baby in their communities? Does he regret putting the interests of the former Health minister above the health of his own constituents?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as previously indicated, we understand there is a challenge in rural Alberta, particularly in regard to obstetrics, which is very specialized, and AHS is working with family physicians to be able to provide those services in other areas. We are working towards attracting and retaining physicians, family physicians and those involved in obstetrics, with that specialty. We'll continue to work on that, and we've devoted $90 million to be able to do this. We are working with other plans in terms of the increased training within our province. We will deliver on providing better health for Albertans.

Electric Utility Oversight and Power Prices

Mr. Barnes: ATCO Electric has agreed to pay a $31 million penalty after an Alberta Utilities Commission investigation. ATCO deliberately overpaid for sole-source work on a transmission line, and the reason for this overpayment scheme was to guarantee that ATCO would maintain a deal to work on the Trans Mountain pipeline and a guaranteed rate of return of 8.5 per cent. This is the type of thing we expect from Quebec's SNC-Lavalin, not ATCO. Given that the provincial government regulates electricity transmission, Minister, please inform Albertans when and how you became aware of this fraud against Alberta ratepayers?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have a system in this province where the Market Surveillance Administrator polices the electricity industry. We've got the Alberta Electric System Operator, and we have the Alberta Utilities Commission that actually does the investigations. So in terms of when I found out, I found out about it the same time that that hon. member did, when it was in the paper and the Alberta Utilities Commission released their statement to the public, because they don't clear their decisions through government. They are an independent agency. That member ought to know that.

Mr. Barnes: Given that as a result of this highly fraudulent scheme Alberta ratepayers have once again been stuck with a high utility bill and given that Alberta ratepayers have already been paying more for the massive overbuild of Alberta's electric grid under the former PC Redford government and given that ratepayers face pressure from inflation, the federal carbon tax, as well as this government's industrial carbon tax again being passed on to Alberta families, can the minister tell us: how much are Alberta ratepayers being overcharged because of this scheme, and where is the $31 million fine? Is it going to be returned to Alberta families, or is your government going to hoard it?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, our government has done something that the previous administration did not do. We stopped the overbuild of the electricity transmission system. The Alberta Electric System Operator recently released their report for their forecast for the next 10 years, and they can clearly show that they have deferred a billion dollars' worth of transmission infrastructure. In addition, they're forecasting that they're going to spend between $150 million to $200 million a year versus the $2 billion a year that was spent by previous governments.

Mr. Barnes: Given that ATCO's fraudulent scheme may never have come to light without a whistle-blower coming forward to warn the Alberta Utilities Commission and given that it begs the question, "How many other you-scratch-my-back-and-I'll-scratch-yours schemes are taking place that leave Alberta ratepayers on the hook for these crooked dealings?" can the minister tell us if he intends to beef up the AUC's investigative powers or whether there will be additional sanctions against ATCO to crack down on these types of fraudulent schemes and restore all Albertans' confidence in our electrical system?

The Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It sounds like the hon. member is complaining that the system worked. We have an Alberta Utilities Commission that did the investigation, and they brought about their appropriate ruling. In addition to that, we have a system that's managed by the Alberta Electric System Operator, and it's policed by the Market Surveillance Administrator. I would say that the system is working. However, if that member is aware of anything that I'm not, then he should refer that to the Market Surveillance Administrator.

2:20 Deaths of Children in Care and Youth Transitioning out of Care

Ms Pancholi: Mr. Speaker, on Friday it was confirmed what we already knew: 2021 was the deadliest year on record for children in government care; 49 children and youth died. This is a 44 per cent increase from the year before. I have continually raised this troubling trend in this House since last year, but the UCP has ignored these warning calls. Thirty-nine of the children and youth who died were Indigenous, yet the minister's recent review indicates that no consultations were done with Indigenous families, elders, or communities. How can the Minister of Children's Services expect to change these trends if she won't engage with the very families and communities that are affected?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I've said a number of times before, this for our government is a call to action. That is why I did ask the ministry for an additional review into what has happened here. We are not ignoring anything. We took action. We committed to transparency and accountability. I'm also happy to report to this House that when it comes to the overrepresentation of Indigenous children in care, this is something that we are committed to. We are making progress on the all-party panel for child intervention recommendations; 23 of those have been now completed, with three in progress, which is definitely an increase over just a few months ago.

Ms Pancholi: Well, the minister has ignored these families.

Given that the minister's report, which she only released a week ago, includes no action items to deal with increasing caseworker vacancies, burnout, caseloads, and turnover and given that the last report of the former Child and Youth Advocate points to the redeployment of a specialized caseworker in one instance which impacted a youth who died and given that the advocate highlighted the negative impact high caseloads are having on youth in government care, why is the minister refusing to take action on the caseworker staffing crisis in her own ministry that is directly affecting the safety and well-being of children and youth in care?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Once again, as typical, not one thing that the member opposite has said is accurate or correct. When it comes to staffing front-line child intervention, this is one of the most important things that we do as a government. This is one of the most important roles, I do believe, and also one of the most challenging. I am so grateful for the caseworkers who have supported kids and families, some of the most vulnerable kids and families in this province, over the last two years. We continue to hire caseworkers any time that there is a vacancy. We also are working on a recruitment plan, especially for rural and remote communities.

Ms Pancholi: There are no new caseworkers hired by this ministry this year.

Given that the issues faced by youth and their families in the child intervention system are complex and often systemic and include poverty, food insecurity, and housing insecurity and given that safe housing is even more important for youth transitioning out of care and that deaths in that age group have been more rapid – they have tripled, actually – under this government and given that the former Child and Youth Advocate found the ministry's response of focusing on the shelter system inadequate to support these young people, does the minister believe that shelters are all these young people deserve, and if not, what actions are forthcoming to address systemic issues like poverty and access to safe, affordable housing?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, one of the things that I've continually said in this House when it comes to supporting the most vulnerable children and youth is that it's also focusing on better transitions for young adults who are transitioning out of the child intervention system. This does in fact require multiple ministries to work together on this. It's why we introduced the new transitions to adulthood program to make sure that instead of being a financial program, we do have a program that asks young people those questions. Do you have housing? Can we help? Do you know how to apply for a lease? Do you know how to find a doctor or mental health supports? Now we have caseworkers dedicated to that very specific work to make sure that we're focusing on a successful transition into adulthood. That is important . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora is next.

Kindergarten to Grade 6 Draft Curriculum

Ms Hoffman: This government is doubling down to defend their horrible curriculum, the process that most charitably would be described as chaotic and rushed. Rather than working with teachers, community leaders, parents, and academics to get a draft that Albertans can be proud of, the minister refused to listen and only backtracked at the last minute, causing more chaos and more confusion. Schools boards have overwhelmingly rejected this minister's drafts. Rather than doubling down to defend her failed curriculum, will she admit that she missed the mark and delay implementation until a reasonable number of public, Catholic, and francophone boards are willing to pilot the curriculum?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We know that the school systems will be ready. In fact, we've allocated $191 million over the next three years, $59 million in this upcoming year. I'm hearing from school authorities. They've already started along the process of ensuring that they have professional development and the resources available for their teachers so that they can implement in September of 2022. Looking forward to it.

Ms Hoffman: Given that they all still hate it, Minister, and given that 97 per cent of teachers say that they won't be ready for a new math, English, phys ed curriculum as well as wellness by September and given that the minister's only response has been to praise her own process, one that's been universally rejected by Albertans, and given that the minister has a thousand fewer teachers in school now than when the NDP was in government and that students have suffered significant learning loss under her leadership, will she at least get out of the way and let educators start over with her Dumpster-fire curriculum?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, I was up in the Fort Vermilion area the other week, last week, and I was so happy to go into a classroom, an elementary school classroom. In that whole school they've been implementing the draft curriculum since last September in math, English language arts, and phys ed and wellness, and you know what? They're seeing two levels of growth, two years of growth, in mathematics, three years in English language arts. Doesn't every Alberta student in elementary school deserve that? We believe so. [interjections]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora is the only one with the call.

Ms Hoffman: Given that the minister had to drive eight hours to find one school division willing to pilot her Dumpster fire of a curriculum and given that last week we learned the true feelings of this government towards teachers when the Member for Taber-Warner told the Coaldale council that involving teachers is not necessary for a good curriculum and given that the Premier refused to condemn these antiteacher claims last week – let's hope that the Minister of Education will at least stand up for teachers today – will the minister admit that removing teachers from the curriculum-writing process was a huge mistake? Will she admit that kicking teachers off and inviting Chris Champion in was wrong, and will she apologize for her colleague's disrespectful remarks towards Alberta teachers?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite should apologize. She continually trashes the curriculum when, in fact, she admitted two weeks ago that she hadn't even read it yet. We are bringing in a curriculum in math and English language arts . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, we had the most transparent, open engagement process with hundreds and thousands of individuals right across this province, including teachers, including superintendents, including education partners, all of them.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When new educational programming is introduced, as the former member mentioned, and modifications are made to what students are learning and the age at which they learn these items, difficulties can arise. Given that these challenges commonly include a shortage of resources during the transition, limited time for training, and high work volumes as the new material is adopted system-wide in classrooms, to the Minister of Education: what is the implementation plan to support the new curriculum, and how will you ensure it is resourced appropriately when implemented across Alberta in the fall to facilitate this transition? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the great question. We are taking a staged approach to implementing the new curriculum. Beginning in September 2022 English language arts and mathematics will be implemented for students in kindergarten to grade 3 as well as physical education and wellness for K to 6 students. Implementation of the new subjects by common grade groupings such as K to 3 and 4 to 6 will ensure successful implementation, and $59 million in this upcoming year has been allocated to help prepare teachers, parents, and students for the new curriculum. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and through you to the minister. Given that the draft curriculum for kindergarten to grade 6, set to be implemented this fall, represents a massive program shift for both educators and students and further given that there will be adjustments required for both students and teachers throughout this transition period, to the same minister: what consideration is there for students this fall that began their schooling under the former curriculum? For example . . . [interjections]

2:30

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order. It's one thing for members to heckle; it's an entirely other thing for members to have conversations across the bow while their colleague is asking a question. Perhaps it would be reasonable to allow her to do so in a manner that the Speaker could hear.

The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. To the Minister of Education: what consideration is there for students this fall that began their schooling under the former curriculum – for example, a child going into grade 3 – and what is the plan for a smooth transition of their current knowledge into the new curriculum to mitigate any potential gaps?

Member LaGrange: Thank you again for a great question. This implementation rollout is based on the expert advice that we receive from the Curriculum Implementation Advisory Group. Focusing on K to 3 mathematics and K to 3 English language arts and literature will help younger students strengthen their numeracy and literacy skills, which are essential for early-years learning. The new K to 6 physical education wellness curriculum will support students in learning how to build resiliency, manage their health and mental well-being as well, Mr. Speaker. These are great subjects that our students need to have the improvements in.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker and through you to the minister for her answer. Given that the new curriculum includes wellness education to support the mental health, safety, and well-being of students and we know that general wellness is the basis for long-term health outcomes for our kids as they grow, again to the Minister of Education: why is the financial literacy piece of this curriculum, including banking, being incorporated into gym classes, and how will this support a physically active cohort of students who are already more sedentary coming out of the pandemic?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Let me be clear that the physical education and wellness curriculum is more than just gym class. The new phys ed and wellness curriculum has also been finalized to support elementary students in developing life skills and building resiliency to manage their physical and mental health and well-being, which also includes learning about financial literacy and consent. These additional learning outcomes will not prevent our students from participating in physical education, which we all know is so critically important to our young people.

South Edmonton Hospital Construction Project

Member Loyola: Mr. Speaker, the south Edmonton hospital is critical to so many people living in Edmonton and nearby municipalities. Our NDP government was proud to approve this project in 2017 and pledge to have it open by 2026. This government abandoned those timelines. They said that they intended to start construction in 2023 and open it by 2030, but then another change: earlier this month the government's own website for this project pulled the 2023 start date, and now it's blank. Is the minister really delaying the south Edmonton hospital yet again?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Budget '22 includes $371 million over three years towards a $930 million total investment, with additional funding to be provided in future years as project planning progresses. We made a commitment on the south Edmonton hospital. This is part of our budget, and we're going to deliver on this. As an overall approach to expanding capacity in health care, the overall $3.5 billion that we've committed over a three-year budget – we know that we need to expand capacity, and we're going to deliver.

Member Loyola: Well, given that the Minister of Infrastructure doesn't even seem to know what's on his own website when it comes to the south Edmonton hospital and given that this same site also removed the project costs for this project and that we know that the government has made the ridiculous decision to move to a P3 construction model and given that schools in south Edmonton were massively delayed by decisions from previous Conservative governments to go the P3 route, can the minister confirm that his move to a P3 construction model is part of the reason constituents in Edmonton will now wait four extra years longer for a hospital that they desperately need?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, as you know, this is a large, multiyear project. Budgets move across the years based on the progress of the work. Right now the work is going on. As regards the P3s: we campaigned on it. We are going to implement P3s where it makes sense, where there is a value for money. In this particular case we haven't got to that stage about the procurement method. When we know, we'll let him know.

Member Loyola: Given that the UCP can't be trusted with health care, can't be trusted with construction of hospitals, managing a pandemic, clearing the surgical backlog, and taking real action to improve mental health services, will the minister admit once and for all that he, like so many on the government bench, has failed when it comes to building the south Edmonton hospital, and will he come clean on whether he's actually trying to sabotage construction of the hospital so he can kill the project once and for all?

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

Mr. Panda: Sabotaging is only in their DNA, not in our DNA. The project is progressing well. There are 24 health projects happening across the province. In your own region, Mr. Speaker, in central Alberta, last year we approved $1.8 billion for the Red Deer hospital, so we are not sabotaging anything; we are actually adding capacity in the health system to deliver care where it's needed, when it's needed.

The Speaker: The point of order is noted at 2:35.

RAPID Force Fish and Wildlife Officer Deployment

Mr. Schmidt: It was a big plan of this government to enable members of the sheriff highway patrol and fish and wildlife enforcement services as part of their RAPID response to tackle rural crime. The move was met with criticism and concerns. According to AUPE at least 10 fish and wildlife officers originally assigned to RAPID are now being dropped. This would mean 10 fewer officers being able to support the government's plan to have fish and wildlife officers to respond to calls by citizens, making response times worse. Why is the government dropping 10 officers after just recently preparing them for the RAPID response and risking making response times worse?

Mr. Shandro: That is untrue, Mr. Speaker. Since the RAPID response program began, six months ago, we continue to make sure that all Alberta fish and wildlife officers have included in their training the module for the RAPID training. We have the same number of officers who are responding to priority 1 calls as before. There's been no reduction in the amount of officers, and everybody who is responding to the priority 1 calls is getting the wage top-up.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that training fish and wildlife officers for the RAPID response has cost a lot of time and money and given that these resources could have gone to good use supporting fish and wildlife officers in doing their jobs and given that Alberta sheriffs have a smaller budget this year than in 2018, these resources are badly needed. To the minister: how many resources have been diverted from sheriffs and the important work of fish and wildlife officers to the government's RAPID response, that it's now scaling back?

Mr. Shandro: Well, Mr. Speaker, we're very proud to have implemented the RAPID response program and make sure that we are adding our Alberta fish and wildlife officers to being able to help with rural crime, something that, by the way, the NDP refused to address in their four years, but we're going to take it seriously. This is one of our tools in making sure that we use our Alberta fish and wildlife officers and making sure that all of them have included in their training the module that is providing them the training of RAPID response and making sure that we have those resources available to us to help reduce crime in our rural areas.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that Albertans cannot trust the UCP with protecting public lands and resources and given that Albertans are seeing more and more chaos in the justice system and that the UCP has proven to be incapable to address the concerns of Albertans and given that the UCP government has made cuts to undermine important public services before and officers are concerned about what is to come in the months ahead, do these 10 reductions just show that even the government believes their RAPID plan failed and that we will see further reassignments going forward?

Mr. Shandro: Once again, Mr. Speaker, that isn't true. There has been no reduction in the amount of officers responding to priority 1 calls. Now, we do know that for many different reasons not every fish and wildlife officer can respond to a priority 1 call, but everyone who is responding to a priority 1 call is continuing to do so. Everybody who has been responding to a priority 1 call has been and will continue to get the wage top-up.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

High Level Disaster Response and Recovery Funding

Mr. Williams: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I represent the constituency of Peace River, and I couldn't be more proud. Inside my constituency is the town of High Level, a hard-working economic engine of Alberta in the oil and gas industry particularly. These northern communities like High Level are no strangers to damaging natural disasters – forest fires, floods, and others – so to the Minister of Municipal Affairs: when can the town of High Level expect their full reimbursement from the disaster recovery program that they incurred from the Chuckegg wildfire?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs has risen.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for being such a strong advocate for High Level. The member would be interested to know that High Level has already received over $7.2 million in disaster recovery money from the province. That's out of the current cost estimate of $9.7 million. DRPs are administered out of the Alberta disaster assistance guidelines to determine eligibility of expenses and to maximize the federal reimbursement available. Reconciliation of the file is in progress, and we should have another $2.3 million by the end of . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Mr. Williams: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that northern Albertans are faced with natural disasters – as I said, wildfires and floods – and given that the town of High Level has encountered many of these in recent years and that they've put a proposal forward for a multipurpose community evacuation centre, the question to the Minister of Infrastructure is: have you been briefed on this, and how are you responding to my constituents?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, I have visited High Level with that hon. member twice, and I can understand and also appreciate that the town council is very passionate about that project. I also know that High Level is a border town, is an important hub for the north region and for the neighbouring First Nations. While I can't promise the funding right here and now, I can work with the hon. member and his community to find innovative and creative ways to finance that project. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Peace River.

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that many of my communities have undergone natural disasters and received no funding for new aluminum roofs or houses that burned down and given that after these natural disasters many of them struggle with all sorts of issues, including mental health, and we have huge lineups to get access to mental health in our community, can the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions please let us know what he's doing or what can be done to find support for communities in my constituency, including High Level? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The associate minister has the call.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Of course, Alberta is very focused on ensuring that all Albertans have access to a range of mental health supports to improve their mental wellness. This includes the good people, of course, of Mackenzie county and High Level, which is why we've created funding to enhance mental health supports in that north zone. This includes the recent hiring of a new mental health therapist, a nurse practitioner, to help residents improve their mental wellness. Of course, we've streamlined the 211 system to make it easier for people to access mental health supports. Anyone can call 211 and get connected today.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will return to Members' Statements.

Anti-Muslim Discrimination and Hate Crimes

Member Loyola: Mr. Speaker, I'm rising today in support of the Muslim community in Alberta and to condemn those who would seek to harass, terrorize, or inflict their hatred on them. On Thursday the Edmonton police confirmed that two mosques had received packages containing white powder. It is concerning that this occurred during the holy month of Ramadan, a time when mosques will see many gatherings for prayers, fellowship, and to break their fasts. While both counts turned out to be innocuous substances, this is still an unacceptable act that requires immediate action from all levels of government and law enforcement to ensure that it never happens again. I'm glad no one was harmed by this, but I'm worried about the chance of copycats and backlash from the racists who think it is okay to terrorize an entire community because of their hateful views.

This cowardly act, designed to cause panic, fear, and create frustration in the community, must be condemned by each and every leader in this province and country. Every single Muslim deserves to feel safe in Edmonton, Calgary, all over Alberta and everywhere. At a time when racialized Albertans are seeing increasing instances of hate crimes and intolerance, it is distressing to see someone specifically targeting the Muslim community during such a holy time. It is concerning to see increased cases of Islamophobia around Alberta and Edmonton, vandalism of mosques, attacks on women wearing hijabs, and it shows that we still have a long way to go to address racism. We must take those steps together as a province to ensure that these instances of hatred and violence are driven out of Alberta.

Despite this tragic news, I'm proud of Edmonton's Muslim communities and mosques, who opened their doors to people of all faiths and backgrounds during the pandemic, who welcomed everyone during the final days of Ramadan. While some show us the worst in humanity, the resilience, strength, compassion, and welcoming of Alberta's Muslim community shows us the best.

Hailstorm Recovery

Mr. Schow: Mr. Speaker, in July 2012 Cardston was hit by a devastating hailstorm. What seemed like a lifetime only lasted 20 minutes as baseball-sized hail pelted the town. When it was all over, the destructive storm caused in the ballpark of $100 million in property damage, and that was just for a town of 3,500 people. In 2020 a hailstorm ripped through northeast Calgary, one so devastating that it ranks as the fourth-costliest natural disaster in Canadian history, at nearly $1.2 billion, and some of the property damage is still visible to this day.

But these are not isolated storms. In August 2019 grapefruit-sized hail smashed parts of west Edmonton, destroying property and farmers' crops. In July 2021 Red Deer had its own bout with hail that caused flood and massive property damage, and in July 2017 the small town of Evansburg in northern Alberta was hit with hail the size of billiard balls.

Mr. Speaker, Mother Nature doesn't care where you live, but the NDP sure do. That is why the opposition leader announced last week that, if elected in 2023, they would buy everyone in northeast Calgary a brand new roof that is hail proof. Why, you ask? It's simple. The NDP want to buy votes with taxpayer money, and it won't come cheap. Let's do some quick math. There are about 150,000 houses in this part of Calgary. Multiply that by $17,000 per roof. This puts the price tag of this crazy idea at over $2.5 billion of taxpayer money.

Mr. Speaker, this isn't some episode of daytime television where the opposition leader comes out and says: you get a new roof, and you get a new roof, and so do you. This is the people's money. They expect the government to spend it wisely, not use it to buy target seats. The next time the NDP shed hail-sized crocodile tears about a natural disaster in some part of the province, just remember: Alberta taxpayers aren't buying it, especially not for 2 and a half billion dollars.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Bill 21

Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

With Bill 21, our sixth red tape reduction bill, we are continuing to cut red tape that will support investment and economic growth, reduce unnecessary regulation, improve service delivery, and make life better for Albertans. The amendments included in this bill will speed up government approvals, enable local solutions for local problems, and streamline and update legislation for greater clarity. We are committed to cutting red tape by one-third, and Bill 21 is one more step to help us get there.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I hereby move first reading of Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

[Motion carried; Bill 21 read a first time]

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of hon. Mr. Copping, Minister of Health, responses to questions raised by Mr. Shepherd, hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre, and Mr. Loewen, hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley, March 15, 2022, Ministry of Health 2022-23 main estimates debate.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order.

At 2 o'clock and 2:01 the Deputy Government House Leader rose on a point of order. I understand that he intends to withdraw the point of order at 2 o'clock and debate the point of order at 2:01, but I will wait to hear his remarks.

Point of Order Remarks off the Record

Mr. Schow: Yes. Mr. Speaker, thank you for acknowledging me. I rise on a point of order under 23(h), (i), and (j). At the time the Premier was speaking, in answering a question in the first set of questions of the day in question period, when the Leader of the Opposition said – it was so important to say it twice – in a heckle: you're making things up. This is certainly one indirect way of saying: you're lying. It imputes false motives to a member, which would be a contravention of Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j). I would ask that the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona or on her behalf the Opposition House Leader apologize for and withdraw those remarks.

The Speaker: The Deputy Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I certainly didn't hear that heckle, so I will leave it to you to decide.

The Speaker: Well, hon. members, certainly, if the Leader of the Opposition did say, "You're making things up," that would be a point of order because the Speaker has ruled on a number of occasions that that particular language is a point of order. In particular, on page 6144 of Alberta Hansard from November 16 – I'm sure you will all remember such an auspicious occasion – a member of this Assembly had to apologize for saying just that.

Having said that, while I heard many things that the Leader of the Opposition heckled today, I did not hear that. If the hon. Deputy Opposition House Leader also makes such an assertion, I am unable to rule. According to page 624 of House of Commons Procedure and Practice we all know that it says that the Speaker cannot be expected to rule on comments that they may not have heard. As such, this is not a point of order. I consider the matter dealt with and concluded.

Also, at 2:35 the hon. the Deputy Government House Leader rose on a point of order. I'm not sure if he would like to . . .

Mr. Schow: Withdraw.

The Speaker: He's withdrawn that point of order. I consider the matter dealt with and concluded.

Privilege Threatening a Member

The Speaker: Hon. members, last week there was significant debate around a point of privilege, on which I am prepared to rule. However, I believe that the Deputy Government House Leader has a statement he would like to make.

Mr. Schow: Indeed, I do, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for recognizing me. On March 31, 2022, during extensive tablings that included multiple cases of unparliamentary language being used by the Member for Central Peace-Notley, the Government House Leader rose on a point of order. During the argument of this point of order the hon. Government House Leader stated that he would bring forward a standing order motion so that members opposite could not abuse the tabling process.

On this side of the House we maintain that stating that a motion be brought forward for members' consideration and debate in no way constitutes a threat and certainly was not intended as such. While no offence was intended with the remarks, the member opposite has indicated that he felt offended during the exchange. As such, on behalf of the Government House Leader I happily withdraw any remark that occurred during that exchange in the point of order on March 31, 2022, that may have caused the offence.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I find it quite unique that the Government House Leader would provide a statement for a colleague to read on such a serious matter.

Having said that, I have been in correspondence with the Government House Leader today and have accepted his absence from the Assembly as a significant, serious, and reasonable absence from the Assembly. Because it's important that the statement be made prior to the ruling and while there may be areas of disagreement in the statement of the Deputy Government House Leader, I will, as I have in the case of members of the opposition, accept the withdrawal on a point of privilege and consider the matter dealt with and concluded.

We are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Motions for Concurrence in Committee Reports on Public Bills Other than Government Bills

Bill 201 Eastern Slopes Protection Act

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and speak to this bill, the motion for concurrence with respect to the Eastern Slopes Protection Act. I think it's worth going through two things by way of speaking to this bill, the first being: why is this bill important? The second is the history of this matter, because I think the history of this matter demonstrates fairly clearly some very interesting things.

This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that this bill has been introduced. The Leader of the Official Opposition introduced this bill in the last legislative session as well, and knowing that they intended to prorogue the session, the members of the UCP voted for it to go forward to the House to be debated. Because they knew that this issue is incredibly important to Albertans and that they would expect their representatives, the elected members of this House, to debate it because it is of major interest to members of the public, the members of the government voted for it to go forward.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Then they prorogued the session, Madam Speaker, and the bill comes forward again. Lo and behold, in an instance where they would have to vote against it in this Assembly, they used the committee they created for the purposes of preventing private members' bills from the opposition getting to this House for its intended purpose, to prevent bills by members of the opposition from getting to this House.

I mean, it's not just bad policy, Madam Speaker, but it is incredibly cynical. [interjection] And it represents a policy and an attitude, an attitude being displayed by the Member for Calgary-Klein, who's chirping at me right now, in great spades. It represents the UCP's view of the people of this province, that they would vote for the bill to go forward when they knew it would never reach the House and that they would use the committee they created to prevent debate of the ideas of the Official Opposition from moving forward.

It's disrespectful, Madam Speaker. It is disrespectful. It is disrespectful, as the Member for Calgary-Klein was being disrespectful just now. It is disrespectful as the government staff is disrespectful.

Mrs. Frey: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat on a point of order.

Point of Order Imputing Motives

Mrs. Frey: Yeah. Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise under 23(h), (i), and (j), imputing false motives to another member. The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View very clearly stated that the Member for Calgary-Klein was aiming to be disrespectful. That is not fair, nor is that accurate. She should withdraw her comments, apologize, and stick to the bill.

3:00

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Madam Speaker. In fact, you know, this is clearly a matter of debate. The Member for Calgary-Mountain View was trying her best. She was clearly being heckled quite closely, and I know that the member involved is going to be having a conversation about that. So I would love for the Member for Calgary-Mountain View to be able to continue her debate as this is clearly not a point of order.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, we've just begun this afternoon's debate, and here we are in a familiar spot. This isn't a point of order. This is a matter of debate. However, there was very clearly some stuff happening here that was perhaps a whole lot more than it should have been. I've noticed that members in this Assembly seem to be working things out on their own in the background, which is great. I encourage all members of this House to settle their debates outside of here, should they be personal ones.

I will ask the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View to continue her debate.

Debate Continued

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. That is, I think, what's problematic about the history of the particular bill.

Now, the second thing I wanted to speak to was the bill itself and why it is so important to the people of this province. Madam Speaker, it's worth noting that the government members are going to take the position that there's a ministerial order in place in this instance, and they are correct. There is a ministerial order in place in this instance. Why is a ministerial order insufficient? Well, a ministerial order is insufficient because it can be repealed with the stroke of a pen. Repealing important protections on open-pit coal mining in the Rockies with the stroke of a pen with zero public debate, with zero public consultation, is exactly the reason we find ourselves in this conversation in the first place.

The history of this matter is that the government repealed the 1976 coal policy, a policy that has been in place, much as the name would suggest, since 1976 protecting the mountains from strip mining. This was something that was important to Albertans in 1976. It continues to be important to Albertans in 2022, Madam Speaker, and the government repealed that with zero consultation. There was a massive public backlash because this is an important issue for Albertans, but of course the UCP chose not to bring it before this House. They did it quietly on a Friday afternoon, trying to do it in secret, after being lobbied by coal companies.

So the Official Opposition brings forward this bill because the problem that we are trying to solve is twofold. It is both a problem about coal mining in the Rockies and Albertans not wanting coal mining in the Rockies, but it is also a problem about a government repealing important protections with zero public consultation with Alberta. The only way to achieve both of those goals is to pass this act. Now, obviously, we're not here talking about whether or not we're passing this act. We're here to concur in a report, a report from a committee that was created to prevent the debate of opposition bills.

After they rescinded the coal policy, after there was a massive public backlash, the government committed to coming forward and preventing those contracts they signed from going forward. That was, well – it can charitably be described as a splitting of hairs that I think was inappropriate. There had been a whole number of applications that had come in during the time that the protections were in place, that were basically on hold while those protections were in place. When the protections were lifted, all of those applications went through. Now, new applications also came in, and the government got rid of those new applications, but they certainly left the public with the impression that they got rid of all of the applications. That is not correct. They got rid of only the new applications, so a number of projects did in fact proceed forward. That is the reason that we bring forward this bill: because the government can't be trusted on this issue, and Albertans know that the government can't be trusted on this issue.

Albertans deserve to have a public debate in the Legislature – the Legislature – which is their House. They send elected representatives here to have public debates on issues that are important to them, but the UCP members of that committee have voted to prevent that debate from occurring. They didn't just vote against the bill; they didn't just vote not to protect the eastern slopes from coal mining; they voted not even to discuss it in this place. So this one hour, this debate on the concurrence in the motion, is the only public debate that Albertans will ever get on this. I think, Madam Speaker, that that is incredibly sad. I think that that is a disservice to democracy, and it is a disservice to the people that we serve.

It is also a disservice to the future of this province, because the reason Albertans so vehemently oppose this is because of the effect that it has on our beautiful landscapes, on landscapes that make us who we are. These are part of us as Albertans, and they are important to us. That is why Albertans responded so strongly to the UCP's removal of those protections, and that is why I think it is the obligation of every member of this House to vote against concurrence in this report and to ensure that the bill can proceed to the House so that we can have the debate on these issues that are important to Albertans.

It is also important to Albertans that we protect our water and our land for future generations. We all know that water is a resource becoming increasingly important and increasingly rare. And this, the removal of the protections that this bill is meant to reinstate, has a huge impact on that. They have a huge impact on the protections of our land and water, protections that are important to the people of this province. So I think that the actions of the UCP members on the committee, in denying so much as debate on a bill that is this critical, that is this important to the people of Alberta, are disrespectful. I think it's disrespectful to their constituents.

I think it suggests that they don't understand how important this issue is. It's one thing, Madam Speaker, to disagree on policy; it is quite another . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am rising today to support the recommendation that Bill 201 should not proceed. Alberta is one of the few locations with ethical coal mining operations and policies, and we take the process, of course, very seriously. Suppose we were to think about some of the first coal and mining policies introduced in Alberta. In that case, you will see that they proceed after years of research and public consultation. Thanks to that research, Albertans can enjoy the Rocky Mountains, and the world has access to an ethical and safe supply of coal, of other minerals.

Madam Speaker, as the scientific knowledge and findings develop, so do Alberta's mining practices and those around the world. Two springs ago we began consultation on a new policy to strike the right balance between protecting the areas we cherish and the need for economic opportunity for rural communities in the province. As a direct result, the Coal Policy Committee was formed. The committee conducted meaningful consultations to ensure the development of modern coal policies by Albertans and for Albertans.

Madam Speaker, the Eastern Slopes Protection Act is extremely hypocritical and divisive. And, what's more, the Leader of the Opposition and MLA for Edmonton-Strathcona failed to address any of Alberta's coal policies while in power. Perhaps that's why she's in opposition now. But those are not the main issues with it.

In fact, in 2017 the NDP government and the MLA for Edmonton-Strathcona, while she was Premier, approved a two-year drill permit for Altitude Resources to drill and define the potential coal resource at its Palisades property. If the opposition truly has an issue with coal mining and policy in the province, then they had the opportunity to address this for the four years that they were in government. But, instead, here's what they did, Madam Speaker. They supported six category 2 leases, that are currently being explored on category 2 land, and even issued a letter to the AER requesting that the application for the Ram River proceed.

In addition to their hypocrisy, Madam Speaker, is their claim that the decisions made by the government were unilateral or malicious in nature. That's so far from the truth. The Coal Policy Committee was formed to lead a comprehensive engagement to ensure everyone's views are represented. We heard from Albertans north to south, urban, rural, Indigenous – you name it – as well as other various communities and organizations, and the coal policy received more than 170 technical submissions, more than a thousand direct e-mails, 25,000 responses to the survey initiated by the government, and had round-tables with approximately 35 Indigenous communities.

That's as diverse as a consultation gets, yet the NDP continues to stand here and light their hair on fire about a lack of public consultation. So let me ask you this: who did they consult? Did they reach out to anyone?

Madam Speaker, I could go on and on about the NDP's assurances on this bill; however, it all comes down to their claims being accurate and not in favour for Albertans. Currently Environment and Parks regularly monitors water quality, including selenium levels, at 116 river and tributary sites across Alberta plus an additional 31 tributary sites throughout the oil sands monitoring program. In addition, all exploration and development are now restricted in the eastern slopes on category 2, 3, and 4 lands.

On top of that, Madam Speaker, you know, our government has made historic investments, the largest investments in the province's history, in irrigation. We've also made historic investments in drought mitigation with that irrigation investment. We've also talked about flood mitigation. So if the NDP wants to talk about water, they can talk about water all they want, but they've done absolutely nothing in their four years or as opposition – I don't even think they've talked about this – to deal with water insecurity for farmers, especially in drought-ridden areas like southern Alberta, that I represent. So it's hypocritical at the very least.

Alberta will continue to provide feedback to Environment and Climate Change Canada about the federal coal mining effluent regulations, which are expected to be finalized by the end of 2023. Madam Speaker, I'm opposed to Bill 201 because I reject the shameful and divisive politics of the NDP, and I urge all other members of this Chamber, on both sides of the aisle, to do what is best for Albertans and the environment, not a hypocritical bill.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am certainly enjoying this very public debate that we're having here in the Legislature on Bill 201. Thank you, all, for taking part in this important discussion. I rise today to state that Bill 201 should not proceed. Let's be honest here: this bill is not necessary.

The Minister of Energy went back to the drawing board on March 4 as it was made clear that our government and Albertans want to get the coal policy right. I want to thank the minister for listening to Albertans. I'm very comfortable that the minister and this government are getting it right. The NDP's private member's bill is hypocritical and a distraction from the Coal Policy Committee's meaningful consultations, which are an essential step to ensuring that the modern coal policy is developed by Albertans for Albertans.

However, Madam Speaker, there is no need to take my word for it. I trust the more than 170 technical submissions as well as over a thousand direct e-mails related to this topic from Albertans. How about the 25,000-plus survey responses from Albertans? The consultation did not end there. There were more than 70 meetings with interested parties, including industry, nongovernment organizations, Indigenous representatives, academia, subject matter experts, and 15 municipalities. Consultations also included bilateral meetings and virtual round-tables with approximately 35

Indigenous communities to go along with three tours of coal-producing regimes. All of the examples I just mentioned seem like consultation to me. I actually think that if we were in the opposite seats here and the government was pushing this bill forward recklessly without actually properly consulting with Albertans on this, we would be being criticized right now for not doing proper consultation. That's why I'm opposed to moving forward with Bill 201.

I'm also confused as to why this bill lists category 1 lands. The Leader of the Official Opposition and members across are well aware that coal exploration and development has never been allowed on category 1 lands, which include national parks, provincial parks, wildlife sanctuaries, just to name a few. So why waste the paper writing this thing?

The government has also heard the Coal Policy Committee loud and clear. That is why the ministerial order expands the halt of coal exploration on category 2 lands to also include exploration and development on category 3 and category 4 lands as defined by the 1976 coal policy. The restrictions on activity on category 2 lands has been in place since April of last year, so what we see, based on the language of Bill 201, is again virtually identical to the policy already in place. This bill is redundant.

Madam Speaker, Bill 201's aim is to cancel all coal activity as well as under category 3 and 4 lands unless these leases were issued prior to May 1, 2020, and hold approvals for actively operating mines or processing plants. Our province has always – always – had a strong track record in regard to reclamation of land. The bill does not specify whether reclamation activities will be permitted to continue; however, these activities will be required even if a lease is cancelled. Now, the previous government had an opportunity to act on the coal file. They did. It's interesting that the former Premier and the former Justice minister, the Member for Calgary-Mountain View, did not act on this, and I wonder why they did not act when they were in power. Was it not important to this government?

There are six category 2 leases currently being explored; four began exploration under the 1976 coal policy. During her Premiership, when she had the opportunity to address this policy, her government supported these initiatives; the Member for Calgary-Mountain View supported these initiatives. The NDP went far enough as to issue a letter to the AER requesting the application for Ram River to proceed. I guess they had the political capital to burn at that time. Madam Speaker, I know that this is not question period and, thankfully, the NDP are no longer in government; however, if I were to pose a question to the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona or the Member for Calgary-Mountain View, it would be based on the current bill. Is she now opposing the types of projects that her government supported only a few years ago? If so, what has changed?

The hypocrisy doesn't stop there, Madam Speaker. In March 2018 the Member for Lethbridge-West and former minister of the environment was questioned about development of metallurgical coal in the eastern slopes. In response she said, "Of course, Alberta does have a number of metallurgical coal interests and [we] will continue to develop those [interests]." Again I would ask: what has changed for these members since they were in government and now are opposition?

I would also like to highlight another redundancy. One amendment states: restricting coal exploration and development in the eastern slopes until land-use planning is completed. Madam Speaker, I am thrilled to tell members opposite that that is already in the coal report, which the government is currently acting on.

Madam Speaker, I want to remind the House that the committee's report and recommendations in combination with input from Indigenous engagement processes make it clear that modernizing Alberta's management of coal resources is a complex undertaking that must be done with care. It does not mean cancelling projects that are already under way by the snap of a finger. What do you tell the workers in this industry when they are out of work and not able to feed their families? We will not be putting hard-working Albertans out of work or endangering projects that are safely already under way. This is just more evidence that our government is there for the hard-working men and women of Alberta who are safely, responsibly harvesting our resources. The bottom line is that the coal report was done with thorough consultation with industry, municipal governments, Indigenous communities, experts, and, of course, everyday Albertans.

I cannot speak for the NDP and who they may or may not have consulted with their bill; however, I have the utmost trust, faith, and confidence in the Minister of Energy and the government to get this right. With industry being consulted, this will help us create a coal policy that will protect our most precious spaces while also creating a business environment where responsible projects will not simply be cancelled because of ideological drive. I am opposed to Bill 201, and I urge all members of this Assembly to vote in favour of nonconcurrency.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

3:20

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the chance to respond to the last couple of speakers, some of the things that they were mentioning in their comments. You know, maybe I'll start off here: we keep hearing about: "Well, why didn't the former government do this? Why didn't the former government do that?" Well, the former government didn't, under the cover of evening, right before what I believe was even a long weekend, remove the 1976 coal policy just like that. They probably thought: "Oh, 1976: that must be red tape. That's just old. Let's just get rid of it." That is what triggered this whole exercise, so it's funny that the members opposite seem to leave that detail out, okay? This has been going on, certainly, for a very long time. Alarm bells were raised when that happened.

Now, all we need to do is look to one of the provinces right beside us to see a living example of what happens when our water system gets contaminated. You can always go down that road: oh, you know, the human body needs selenium. Sure, in very, very tiny quantities. But when you're sitting here measuring down from that disaster that happened to our neighbours and you're – I think it was something like 20 miles downstream from the event – seeing levels something like five or six times higher – like, lethal – than the human body can absorb, that needs to be the moment to pause. Listening to the one member talk about the historic investment in irrigation in southern Alberta – absolutely great; totally onboard with that – that would be a complete waste of money if we contaminate the water. People won't be able to drink it, we won't be able to irrigate with it, and all of that money that we just spent on all of that great infrastructure is now put to waste. That is what people in southern Alberta had a really big problem with.

Hence, leading to Bill 201, the exact same bill that members opposite voted in favour of at the Private Bills Committee, that it should be debated. Nothing changed, so as a member who's sat on this committee since the beginning of the 30th Legislature, I've clearly seen members who have sat on that committee, through a concerted effort, deciding that private members' bills from opposition members don't deserve debate in this House. The ones that did, clearly, we've seen are far enough down on the list, and we all know, from the limited amount of time private members get in this House, that those bills wouldn't be debated. How do you get from supporting a bill to be debated in this House to all of a sudden not? "Oh, well, the government took action. We did all kinds of consultation." Great, so all of that effort and all of that work and the best thing that could come out of that, Madam Speaker, was a ministerial order?

Everybody knows, and if you don't, you should learn, that a ministerial order as fast as it's tabled can be taken away. Just look at the 1976 coal policy. That was actual legislation; gone, snap of the fingers. You think a ministerial order is going to slow things down? Come on. I'd hope that you were all able to get to this House with some degree of understanding. I keep arguing over and over and over again in this House, Madam Speaker, about language. Where does it say in that ministerial order that it cannot be cancelled unless approved by this House? Spoiler: there isn't. There's no language for that, so it can be removed by the decision of one person, snap of a finger, no problem. We're left to, basically, that same thing that we've heard over and over again: well, just trust us; we'll get it right.

Well, I hate to tell you this. I can't trust this government, because the leader of this government couldn't manage a simple promise of delivering a donors list. How am I supposed to trust something much larger, then protecting our water system? That's what triggered Bill 201 and why we need to get something in place. That way it comes before all of us. We get the opportunity to go back and talk to our constituents if that's the case, if some kinds of changes need to be made.

If you're sitting here telling me that Bill 201 is useless, that the government is taking action, then I have to ask the Minister of Energy and the Minister of Environment and Parks: where's the legislation to guarantee the safety? What's taking you so long?

Again, going back to this whole: well, the past government; the past government. You've all been in charge for three years. I remember members of the government caucus, members of the government bench, back when they served in the opposition, were busy telling us that same line after six months, let alone three years. Start owning what you're doing.

Madam Speaker, this bill needs to be debated in this House where Albertans can watch. You thought it was worthy then; it's still worthy now unless, of course, you're trying to duck Albertans. Here we go back, full circle, again to that whole trust issue. I've heard the Minister of Municipal Affairs before, in the past, saying: we need to work harder to regain the trust of Albertans. I agree; you do. You have an opportunity here.

We need to vote against the committee's report. I know that members of the opposition that sit on that committee, including myself, disagreed emphatically with that. We provided a minority report to say as much. At the end of the day, if it doesn't pass, then so be it. At least it was debated in this House.

I know that my colleagues have more to say on this. Hopefully, I've managed to get my point across. I'm certainly going to urge members to vote against the report from the committee, and hopefully we get a chance to talk about Bill 201 and maybe a few other opposition bills in this House.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak to the motion for nonconcurrency for debate of Bill 201, the Eastern Slopes Protection Act. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this; however, I'm disappointed that this will be the only opportunity that I have to speak to this bill and that this is the only opportunity for this Chamber, for the members of this Legislature, to debate this bill.

I've been quite surprised to hear some of the arguments coming from the members from the government side with respect to why we should not even consider this bill in the Legislature. I actually want to highlight again that that is what we are discussing here today, whether or not we should even debate Bill 201 in the Legislature. We certainly know that government members may have different views about certain provisions in Bill 201. They may take issue with it. They may raise some of the concerns that they've raised here today in the concurrence debate or in the committee, but that should be properly had in a debate on the merits of this bill.

What's troubling about this is that if we look at what Bill 201 is about, it is about protecting the eastern slopes, full stop. That's what it's about. And there should be almost unanimous understanding that that is what Albertans want from the members of this Assembly by now. I actually fail to understand how this is even up for, I guess, any discussion, because I don't think there's been one issue that has so galvanized Albertans from all different stripes, from rural, from urban, farmers and ranchers, and people who love to hike and experience our eastern slopes for their beauty. Whoever you are, it has been overwhelming.

I am willing to bet, Madam Speaker, that every single Member of this Legislative Assembly, regardless of which constituency we represent, has been inundated with correspondence on this issue, and the overwhelming consensus is that Albertans do not want coal exploration on the eastern slopes of the Rockies. In fact, that is also the conclusion that was reached by the coal committee in their report, that very conclusion.

3:30

Why, then, would the members of the government caucus be so opposed to debating a bill that does just that? They may say that it's because, yes, there's a ministerial order that has already been passed and therefore it's not necessary. That's something that we could have a discussion about in debate on this bill. We could actually have that discussion about: what's the difference between a ministerial order and legislation? Policy and law geeks like me would love to have that discussion. But the biggest difference, Madam Speaker, of course, is that a ministerial order can be changed by one minister by simply rescinding it by the stroke of a pen, and it's over.

If it's in legislation, however, Madam Speaker, as you know, that comes before this Assembly. Whether it be amendment or passing such legislation, it has a fulsome debate: three readings, the opportunity for amendments, an opportunity for Albertans to watch through, you know, Assembly Online or to read Hansard debates and to put forward arguments to have their MLAs represent them in the Legislature. The democratic process: that's what that's about. That is the primary difference.

We could discuss that in a debate on Bill 201. Instead, the government members of this House are saying what they have said over and over again in their time as government, which is: trust us. Now, they've said that over, and they've proven to Albertans over and over again that they cannot be trusted. There's no issue that that is more true of than on the coal issue.

I heard members, the Member for Calgary-Klein, say: oh, if this issue was so important to us, why didn't we pass the eastern slopes act when we were in government? The answer to that, Madam Speaker, is plainly obvious. It's because when we were in government, the 1976 coal policy was in place. We didn't need to pass this legislation. The need for this legislation arose only as a result of the conduct of this government, which was to eliminate with the stroke of a pen a policy on a Friday before a long weekend, hoping that no one would notice. Now they're asking Albertans to trust them that they won't do the exact same thing on the exact same issue again.

I think what we have determined, Madam Speaker, is that on many issues this government can't be trusted: on what they say about health care, on what they say about education, on what they say about the economy, on what they say about how they're going to be good stewards of taxpayers' money. We can't trust them on any of that, that they're not going to make things more expensive, that they won't increase taxes or fees on Albertans. We can't trust them on any of that, but certainly there is no clearer example of what Albertans can't trust them on than coal.

I know that that's the case because, Madam Speaker, even this past weekend in my constituency of Edmonton-Whitemud – I was out door-knocking this past weekend, a beautiful day for it, might I add, gorgeous weather for knocking on the doors, lots of people excited to talk to me, and I was excited to hear what they had to say – do you know what issue kept coming up again? Coal. I want to give a shout-out to Ken, who I spoke to at the door this weekend. Ken said to me specifically, "I don't trust these guys on coal as far as I can throw them." He said: "Yeah, yeah. They're now saying that they're not going to do coal development, but they said that before, and guess what they did? They got rid of that coal policy."

This is in my constituency of Edmonton-Whitemud. Now, my constituents may not be directly affected by any resulting coal exploration on the eastern slopes. They may not have their ranches, their farms, their drinking water – although, by the way, it does affect our drinking water eventually, they may not be as directly impacted as constituents of many of the other MLAs who sit in this Chamber. But Ken and many others do not trust this government on coal, so when the members of this caucus stand up and say that they don't even want to debate a bill that will put into legislation the things that they claim to agree to, which are actually preventing exploration of coal on the eastern slopes – that's what the report said. That was the conclusion overwhelmingly, what Albertans wanted.

They claim now to be the grand stewards of the eastern slopes, so why don't they want to even debate a law that would protect that? Perhaps, once again, when given the opportunity to earn back Albertans' trust, they're going to throw that in Albertans' faces again. Honestly, Madam Speaker, this is an opportunity. The government should be thanking us for providing them this opportunity, or thank the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona for bringing forward a bill to put into legislation, to codify what they claim to be the case, which is that they do not support coal exploration on the eastern slopes. Instead, at a committee, which has every single time prevented the debate of private members' bills from the opposition members from coming forward for debate, this committee has stopped it once again.

I honestly feel like this is a missed opportunity for this government to try to earn back a little bit of trust, but perhaps they're not trying to earn back trust. Perhaps they're actually once again showing their true colours, which is that they're not interested in protecting the eastern slopes. They got their hand slapped pretty hard by Albertans when they eliminated the coal policy and then tried to pretend it wasn't happening. This government came up with lots of fictional stories about what was going on and what wasn't going on. They couldn't even own up to it right away when they did it and admit that what they were doing would permit coal exploration on the eastern slopes. So they've lost the trust of Albertans, and this was an opportunity to regain it. It sounds like they're not interested in regaining that trust. They're interested in, perhaps, coal exploration on the Rockies.

Certainly, this ministerial order could be struck out as I know the cabinet members who have done that with ministerial orders, who have issued them and revoked them without any debate in this House. They know that. In fact, many ministerial orders are not even publicly available. They're not even published. This was a shock to me when I actually worked within the public service, that there are many ministerial orders that Albertans might not even know of. Perhaps, in this case, they'll once again try to strike it down, and nobody will know.

So I have to say, Madam Speaker, that I'm deeply frustrated not only by the fact that this government won't even take those opportunities that are presented to them to really gain back Albertans' trust on the coal issue – they have this opportunity, and they're not taking it – but I'm also deeply frustrated for the state of democracy in this province right now. Not one single private member's bill from a member of the opposition has come forward for debate in three years. Not one.

I do recall that when the NDP were in government, there were several private members' bills that were passed by opposition members. I know we discussed some of them. Some of them had been brought in, at least had a fulsome debate. It's no doubt that this government has a majority in this House. If they don't like a piece of legislation, they can prevent it from passing – they can – with their numbers in this House, but the fact that they're even afraid to have that debate speaks volumes about who this government is and why Albertans continue to not be able to trust them.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others wishing to join the debate on the motion for concurrence? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is, as always, an honour and a privilege to rise in this House. I was chatting with a school group not long ago, and a couple of people kind of asked what the hardest part of my job was. I always stumble on that question because I have to talk about the fact that we are so privileged to be in this Chamber. You know, I'm one of only 87 MLAs, so I think it's just a good reminder to think about the role that we have.

As always, the first time I rise during a week, I would like to also give a shout-out to all of those on the front lines who are doing so much for all of us as we are still in the midst of a pandemic.

I talk a little bit about, you know, the privilege that we have as members. I lay that as some context to my argument today because the opportunity to present a private member's bill is a very rare one. It's a privilege that many MLAs may not even ever get a chance to do. I have not been lucky enough to have one myself. I know that the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona was incredibly lucky to be drawn first. I'll have to check with her. I can't recall actually if she's had multiple opportunities to introduce a private member's bill. I mean, she has been around a long time. That's not an ageist joke; she's just one of our longest serving members, I think in the entire Chamber, in fact. It is such a privilege.

I know the work that my colleague from Edmonton-Strathcona put into this bill and, of course, the previous iteration of it as well. You know, I know the consultation that was done, so for the Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat to ask about consultation is just quite disingenuous and quite disappointing, I might add.

Oh, gosh, I'm getting serious déjà vu from quite recently having the honour of sitting on the private members' bills committee and seeing my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre – the truly countless hours that were put into his bill, Bill 204, the Anti-Racism Act, and just how much consultation was done. You know, I sat back, and I can't claim to have helped to write the bill, but I certainly sat in on many consultations. These were consultations that took place on weekends, where community members, primarily racialized community members, gave up their time, volunteered their lived experience, their expertise, their knowledge, their wisdom, resulting in a bill that everybody in this House could and should be quite proud of. It was absolutely – and I'm not even exaggerating – heartbreaking to see what took place just the other day on that bill. I was going to say which day, but now the time is just all confusing to me. But it was quite, quite recent.

You know, so that Madam Speaker doesn't get concerned about my staying on track here, I'm framing all this to give a little bit more context. I can echo some of what my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud just spoke about. I've been able to serve on this committee, the Private Bills Committee, since it was formed, and we've seen a clear pattern from this government. Bill 204, just the other day, was another bill in a long, long list of many that this government refused to move for debate in this Chamber.

You know, if the Member for Calgary-South East would like to join debate and present his position on this, I'd love to hear that, and from other members from Calgary, too. You know what? I've spent a number of hours knocking in various Calgary constituencies, and I love being able to talk about door-knocking in Calgary. I've knocked in a number of members' ridings, and protecting the eastern slopes, protecting our mountains comes up a lot. It really does.

I've knocked on doors in Calgary-Klein, in Calgary-Foothills. Oh, gosh, the list goes on. I don't need to tell you the whole list. I'm going back, in fact, in early May, and I'm going to be knocking on many more. I've even knocked in Calgary-Mountain View, so I'm not just going after seats we plan to flip. You know, I know that the Member for Calgary-Mountain View, who spoke quite eloquently about this bill, hears about it at the doors a lot.

You know, often my line when I talk to Albertans is: I'm there to listen. I don't want to plant any seeds. I just say, "I'm your MLA" if I'm knocking on the doors in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, as I was this weekend in beautiful Highlands. If I'm knocking in another MLA's riding, I say: I'm so-and-so from Edmonton, and what issues are top of mind for you? I can tell you that the top issues that I've heard recently in ridings outside of my own are health care; education, primarily curriculum; and mining, coal mining; and protecting our environment.

It truly should be, you know, incumbent upon all of us in this Chamber to be listening to our constituents. I don't know how much the members opposite are knocking on doors in their ridings. I know I do hear from a fair number of folks who say that they haven't heard from their MLAs a whole lot. I would urge them perhaps to get out there and do so and take a similar approach. Ask your constituents what they're hearing, because what you get in your e-mail inboxes or even on social media is not necessarily representative of the broader community. Often the people who reach out to you are the ones who might be incredibly passionate about issues. They're a little bit, perhaps, more engaged than other constituents. So when you come to constituents, constituents who aren't expecting you, and you put them on the spot – I mean in a respectful way, of course – it's really interesting to see the responses that you get. I would urge the members of the UCP to be doing that, to be listening, not to be explaining away decisions that aren't supported by our constituents. That's what we're hearing today. That's what we've heard from the members who've stood up to try to defend their position on Bill 201, the Eastern Slopes Protection Act.

I can't wait until the next time I'm in Calgary-Klein, which will be, hopefully, fairly soon again, you know, to talk about the fact that we are protecting the Rockies. We're protecting the eastern slopes. We're protecting our mountains from further coal mining. Sadly, I was here in the Chamber and heard their current MLA denying this reality and refusing to stand up against coal mining on the eastern slopes and against the specific legislative requirements on environmental effects.

Water, right? Sorry; I have this in my notes here, too. I meant to touch on a point around water. Apologies; I didn't get everything down that that member said, but one of the members talked about: why isn't the NDP talking more about protecting water? I can tell you, defend her honour, that the Member for Edmonton-Manning, who is, of course, our agriculture critic, has done a great deal of consultation. She's been on the road a whole heck of a lot, talking to rural communities and talking about the connections with the environment. I know she's talked to me about irrigation, some of those issues that are probably mostly above my head, I must point out. She's done that consultation. She was just on the road for, I think, a full week quite recently, talking to folks who are directly impacted.

You can say, you know, that, well, it's the surrounding communities around the eastern slopes that are most impacted. Well, no. I distinctly recall talking, the last time I spoke to the previous iteration of this bill in the Chamber, about the fact that the water sources are impacted up here in the Edmonton area as well, right? There are deep interconnections there. It's not just an issue that impacts those communities surrounding the eastern slopes; it has an impact on all of us. I hope we can acknowledge this.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to join in the debate on the recommendation of the committee. I speak to strongly encourage all members of this Assembly to vote against concurrence, to vote for this Assembly to consider this piece of legislation fully here in the Alberta Legislature. I believe that the Eastern Slopes Protection Act deserves a full and robust debate in the Assembly, an opportunity to listen to the feedback Albertans have given to put protections into legislation that cannot be undone with the stroke of a pen. I will speak more to my reasoning and my support for the Eastern Slopes Protection Act. I do want to echo what we've heard.

Right now we have a single hour to debate what the committee has recommended to this Legislature, which is that the Eastern Slopes Protection Act not be debated, the same thing that this committee has essentially recommended for all NDP private members' bills, the exception to that, of course, being when this committee first reviewed the version of the Eastern Slopes Protection Act at a time during the last sitting when the government knew that the session was going to be prorogued. At that point the members of the committee said, "Yes, we should debate this legislation," knowing full well it would never actually get that opportunity, a level of hypocrisy that really is quite startling. Of course, the same members who voted that, yes, it did deserve debate in this Assembly, when it was brought back again in the exact same form, with the exact same logic and reasoning behind it, then changed their recommendation.

It's been very frustrating during the past three years as members of the Official Opposition because of how this government is using the committee to ensure that no private members' bills from the Official Opposition ever receive full debate in this Assembly. So many suggested bills have deserved that debate. I think that it is an abrogation of this Chamber's duties and quite shameful.

When the standing orders were originally changed by the UCP government to insert a committee that would essentially vet whether a private member's bill deserved to be brought forward or not, allowed debate or not, we said during the debate of those standing order changes that it would be used to suppress issues that deserve debate in this Chamber.

Private members' business does not receive very much time in this Chamber, Madam Speaker, and the choice from the UCP government to interfere with and to suppress private members' business: we argued against that when the standing orders changes were brought forward in 2019. And now three years later we continue to see the same behaviour and the same application of those changed standing orders, in this case not only to not allow Bill 201, Eastern Slopes Protection Act, to be fully debated in the Alberta Legislature, but the members of the committee said, "Yes, it should be debated" in one form, because they knew it would never actually happen, and then when it became Bill 201 in this sitting, they changed their mind.

I believe I heard my colleague from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood talking about the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, who has moved this bill, and wondering if she'd had the opportunity to have a private member's bill before. The answer is no. As a member of this Assembly since 2008, when she first won her seat, Bill 201, Eastern Slopes Protection Act, is the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona's very first private member's bill, which perhaps goes to show how rare the opportunity is for members. You literally have to win a draw, a lottery, Madam Speaker, to have the honour to bring forward these pieces of legislation.

To now know that Bill 201 will not be debated is incredibly frustrating, specifically because of the substance of the bill. I've spoken now about how frustrated I am that the process is what it is and that the government is not allowing these bills to be debated. I'll speak briefly now about why I believe Bill 201, the Eastern Slopes Protection Act, should be debated. I would strongly suggest that for the past two years the province has been engaged in an incredibly important conversation about coal mining within . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but under Standing Order 8(7)(a.1), which provides up to five minutes for the mover to close the debate, hon. members, I will now call the question.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for concurrence carried]

4:10 Bill 203
Technology Innovation and Alberta Venture Fund Act

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, on April 20, 2022, the chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills presented the report of that committee on Bill 203, Technology Innovation and Alberta Venture Fund Act, and requested concurrence of the Assembly in that report, which recommended that the bill not proceed. As a member other than the mover rose to speak on April 20, 2022, debate on the motion will proceed today.

The motion to concur in the committee's report on Bill 203 has already been moved, and I will therefore now recognize any additional members who wish to speak. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Happy to rise this afternoon to try to maybe persuade members of the government side to finally debate any private member's bill that's been brought forward by an opposition member. I likely won't succeed but will certainly give it the old college try, as they say.

Bill 203, the Technology Innovation and Alberta Venture Fund Act, sponsored by my good friend from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, proposes to create a venture fund that does not risk a single penny of Alberta taxpayer dollars, giving them the ability to invest in Alberta's future through tech, through AI, basically an opportunity that Albertans haven't seen since the Great Canadian Oil Sands project under Ernest Manning and the Alberta Energy Company. Right now Albertans do not have the ability to be able to participate in these things unless they're in a very specific position. What a great opportunity for Albertans to be able to invest in the success of Alberta right here in Alberta, again, something that happened which kicked off a sector of the Alberta economy which, you know, very unabashedly, every member of the UCP supports, as they should. So why would you not give Albertans a chance to duplicate that experience that they had back then?

Like I said, Madam Speaker, I mean, as a member of the private members' committee since the beginning of this 30th Legislature I don't know what words I could even use – disappointing, frustrating, surprising, completely confused – about why a bill that was clearly supported by very, very successful business people here in the province with regard to investing in Alberta businesses, investing in start-ups, why they would not listen to those individuals. I can only come up with the one reason, and that was because it was an opposition member that brought this bill forward, a very good piece of legislation.

Now, I know that there have probably been some arguments about: well, you know, there was no consultation around who could manage this type of endeavour. Well, if there was such a great concern, Madam Speaker, around that, why didn't the government members invite stakeholders that could have spoken to that? I'm actually going to go out on a limb here. I'm going to bet that there weren't any. I'm betting that what little consultation members opposite partook in: all they heard was good stuff, because that's what there is.

It's about allowing Albertans to share in the prosperity. You know, I've said it time and time again: tech, AI – I mean, please. We had an opportunity to jump on this train in the past, and unfortunately it didn't happen for whatever the reasons were. I remember this back when I was in college and whatnot. Some opportunities had presented themselves to Edmonton, and, you know, whatever the decisions were at that time – I wasn't as engaged – all I remember thinking was: wow, what a great opportunity. Unfortunately, it wasn't taken advantage of, and look where things went. Very few times do you get a second go-around to do that.

I always use the example, because it's so blatant, Madam Speaker, of the gaming industry. You know, again, in what little free time I have, I get to participate and play games, including developed by our very own company here in Edmonton, with BioWare. When I was really excited about this, that industry was poised to be a $150 billion industry by 2023, so you can imagine my surprise when I decided to do a little checkup and see how things were going, to see if maybe things had improved even a little bit further, and it actually doubled. Right now: a $300 billion industry. Why don't we get a piece of that action? Why don't Albertans get the chance to get a piece of that action? Well, they could if we could set up the conditions for them to be able to participate, just like they got the opportunity to participate in driving what would become one of Alberta's major economic sectors.

I have absolutely no doubt that tech and AI are going to jump up there very, very quickly, but if we don't act now, Albertans, through, actually, no decision of their own, are going to lose out on that opportunity. Why? Because the government doesn't want to entertain an opposition bill? If it's really that problematic, why don't you consider amendments? I mean, I would certainly never speak for the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, but, you know, I have a bit of an idea that perhaps he would entertain some amendments to the bill if there is such a concern around it, thereby taking a bill that Albertans get a chance to participate in and make it even better. Like I said, he's done his homework. He's had major stakeholders speak in support of this bill. But, unfortunately, we're not going to get the opportunity to really debate the bill, because all there is an hour here. That's not debate.

Madam Speaker, why would we deny Albertans at least the opportunity to learn why they're not going to get a chance to participate in the success of Alberta companies? We've got some great opportunities here. Like I said, BioWare: a huge success story. What are they, 25 years now here in Edmonton producing world-wide games? I play them; they're fantastic.

Mr. Bilous: And Aaryn Flynn, one of the cofounders of BioWare . . .

Mr. Nielsen: Aaryn Flynn, one of the cofounders of BioWare . . .

Mr. Bilous: CEO of Inflexion.

Mr. Nielsen: . . . CEO of Inflexion, supports this bill. I feel like I'm stealing from his notes here almost. But it is a good point, you know, seeing as how I am on the subject, and I appreciate the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview for pointing that out, seeing as I am talking about it.

4:20

Are you telling me that you don't trust his opinion? The amount of success that he's had here in the province of Alberta, the jobs that have been created – and I know that these jobs are not minimum wage jobs, by any stretch of the imagination. My understanding is that there is still roughly somewhere between $70,000 and $80,000 a year, on average. That's a good, mortgage-paying job. They're probably even higher than that now. Again, my stats are probably a couple of years out of date here. Why would you deny Albertans an opportunity like that?

We could get a chance to debate this bill. We could quickly, probably, get it into Committee of the Whole. We could address the concerns that members opposite probably have.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise once again to discuss this motion for nonconcurrency on Bill 203, the Alberta venture fund, brought forward by my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. I'd actually thought that one of the government members was going to speak, because he seemed interested in speaking, but I'm happy to take this time.

I once again have to raise my concerns about the fact that not a single private member's bill from the opposition side of this House has been brought forward for debate in the three years of this Legislature under this government. This is incredibly undemocratic. We have heard discussions over and over again about how rare it is for private members to have the opportunity to bring forward a private member's bill. I should be so lucky, Madam Speaker, to have the opportunity as a private member to bring forward a bill. It hasn't happened to me yet, and I understand – for example, today we discussed private member's Bill 201, which was the first time the Leader of the Official Opposition, the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, has had a chance, since being elected in 2008 as an MLA, to bring forward a private member's bill.

At every step this government seems to be undermining our democratic institutions and the ability to even debate those bills that are brought forward by private members. Let's be clear, Madam Speaker, that we could hear spirited discussion about the nature of the provisions of Bill 203 – what's good, what's bad, what could be improved – and amendments could be proposed. I know that the members on this side of the House would be welcoming in hearing those amendments. Those are the opportunities that this legislative process affords us. Yet for some reason this government is so afraid of any true democratic engagement and even the consideration of ideas from others – well, anybody other than, in fact, even just the cabinet members, because it's well established by now that members of the backbench of the government don't have their voice heard either. So, really, it's only those core 20-odd people in cabinet who appear to have any say over any legislation that's considered by this House.

I want to speak to Bill 203 and just – you know, I was looking over some of the considerations that were made by the committee members when looking at Bill 203. There are not many situations, Madam Speaker, where I and the Member for Banff-Kananaskis are in agreement, but I noted a comment that she made in debate on this bill that I actually very much agreed with. I believe, when considering it at committee, the Member for Banff-Kananaskis said: "I think there are several of us who are quite intrigued by the concept of this bill. I think it's the most Albertan concept ever if it can be executed properly, allowing good-hearted people to invest in good-hearted, homegrown companies."

Madam Speaker, that is actually precisely what this bill is about. It actually capitalizes on what Albertans do best, which is that we are risk takers, we are innovative, we are creative, and we take leaps forward on things that sometimes other people in other provinces don't. It's the reason why our oil and gas industry has been so successful; it's because people took risks. People took risks in innovation, and they took risks in terms of technology. They did that, and that's what, apparently, is very strong about Alberta. So why would the government members of this House not want to support even the debate of a bill that does precisely that?

Let's be clear. Bill 203 would have established the Alberta technology venture capital fund under the Alberta Enterprise Corporation, and this fund would do what we've heard members of the government talk about. We want to encourage venture capital. We want to encourage start-ups. We want to encourage that innovation. What it would do is that it would allow Albertans to invest a small amount that, you know, could be manageable by an individual Albertan who maybe is not able to make big investments in other start-ups, but they could contribute in a small way to make an investment into an Alberta company. It's a win-win in that Albertans could invest their own dollars and see potentially great reward, but they're also investing it in Alberta companies.

Those two things are things that I would think there should be agreement in this House that we want to support. It appears that that's something that the government claims they want more of, venture capital. They want more investment in tech. We've heard the Premier and the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation, you know, talk about, with big, loud voices, how Alberta has got its swagger back, but when they're given a good idea, which even members of the government caucus agreed were good ideas, to actually create this venture capital fund, which would allow individual Albertans to invest in Alberta companies, they say no.

There are two reasons. There are the reasons on paper that they say no, and then there is the other reason. We'll get to that. The reason on paper that they say no is, shockingly, because they thought it was too risky for Albertans. First of all, there are no taxpayer funds involved in this, so it's not a risk of taxpayer funds; it's individual Albertans making their decisions about how they want to invest their dollars. To say that Albertans can't be trusted with making potentially risky but also potentially innovative decisions about how to invest their dollars: I am shocked to hear government members say that. Why don't they trust Albertans to be able to make really strong and creative and groundbreaking investment ideas? Isn't that the basis of enabling business and breaking down red tape and trying to encourage and attract investment in business?

It's harbouring that kind of risk taking. Of course, any time there's an investment in a start-up, there's risk involved. Nobody is trying to hide that or belittle that. Certainly, those Albertans who are deciding to invest in this would be – I believe it was part of the bill that there'd be education about this so that they would understand what their investment is going towards. I can't believe that the government, this government, doesn't trust Albertans to be investors. It's quite shocking, Madam Speaker, actually. That's their reason on paper, that for some reason all of a sudden they want to make business decisions for Albertans. They know better, and they're worried about Albertans' ability to make those decisions about when to invest in a venture capital fund.

The other reason is simply because this government can't conceive of any idea other than that coming forward from the 20 people in their cabinet. Maybe it's 20. Is it more than 20 now? I can't even remember. Who could keep up? There are so many associate ministers. Is it 24? Any time there's somebody who they need to make happy, they get an associate minister job. Yeah. I think there are quite a few. I think – what is it? – two-thirds of Calgary MLAs now have a cabinet position of some kind. It must be a little bit frustrating for all the rest of their caucus. In any event, anybody other than those 20 people, 24 people, in cabinet who get to actually put forward bills: nobody else seems to have a good idea that's heard by this government, certainly not members of the opposition.

Again, as I said in my earlier comments, Madam Speaker, you know, this is only about debating a bill, right? We're not even actually supposed to be discussing the substance of the bill right now; we're just supposed to be talking about whether or not it should be heard for debate in this space. Why would the government caucus be so opposed to debating this bill in the Legislature? Is it because they don't want Albertans to hear that they don't trust them with being investors? They don't trust them in making investment decisions? That's a shocking position. I mean, it is their position, apparently, if you look at the committee. That is their position. Maybe they're hoping that nobody reads committee transcripts, and maybe I'm the only one who does.

They're trying to avoid having that debate here in this Chamber, but ultimately this is a good-idea bill, and we can talk about how to make it better, how to change it, how to mitigate some of those risks, perhaps. That could be done within the process that this Chamber set up to do, which is to debate a bill, make amendments. I don't know if it's laziness about not wanting to do the work, or is it that they just don't want to contemplate good ideas if they don't come from that front bench? That's certainly what it feels like on this side of the House but certainly what it feels like to Albertans who see that not one single private member's bill from the opposition MLAs has been brought forward.

I will say once again, Madam Speaker, that when we were in government, there were a number of private members' bills brought forward by at that time opposition members that not only got to see the light of day for debate but were passed in this House with the support of government members. Yet this House is so afraid of the opposition, of anybody in their backbench, that we don't even debate bills in this space anymore. As a private member myself I find that deeply discouraging, but all Albertans should also find it deeply worrying, because there is a blanket of silence that this government places on anybody except for those 20 people.

4:30

I think Albertans are getting sick of it. I know they're getting sick of it, Madam Speaker. I know I certainly am. So I look forward to an opportunity where private members in this House have the opportunity to bring forward bills with good ideas – it doesn't matter where it comes from – to represent their constituents, local issues, local ideas, issues that may affect people all over this province. Nobody has a right to the good ideas. They come from all of us. We have a right in this limited time, this limited space in this Chamber to actually hear those.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others wishing to join the debate? I'm seeing the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak to this bill. It's disappointing that the government is shutting down debate on this bill, especially because of the ideas of this bill. The two things it would do is that it would create or legislate a technology innovation advisory council to the minister, which is what industry is asking for, and two, it would create a venture fund and unlock, well, hundreds of thousands, potentially, of Albertans to be able to invest millions.

Honestly, I think this fund could have easily surpassed $1 billion, so unleashing $1 billion of private capital into Alberta start-ups and companies looking to grow. I promise you, Madam Speaker, that that would have turned the heads of investors, venture capitalists around the world. Silicon Valley would have been looking at Alberta and asking: what is going on there? You know, the minister talks about Alberta by 2030 leading the country in venture capital investment. This bill would have helped the minister and this government deliver on that commitment.

Now, I'll talk about the merits of the bill and, you know, why the government should reverse their decision, but I also want to talk about the different steps that brought us here today. I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that when I first introduced the bill, I had a number of UCP MLAs reach out to me to get together to ask questions about the bill. They were intrigued by the idea. They had some concerns. We talked them through. I'm not going to out the members to their own party, but I appreciated the fact that they were able to set aside partisan differences to say: "This idea is intriguing. Let's learn a little bit more about it."

I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that the ideas for this bill came from industry. So when I say that I'm disappointed in the government's actions, you know who's more disappointed in the government? The very entrepreneurs and businesspeople of Alberta who were asking for this. This is not an NDP idea. It's not a UCP idea. It doesn't belong to a political party. Quite frankly, the fact that the government – and, again, it's the government. It's not the private members of the UCP. It's the government that has decided that this bill should not even be debated because it came from the NDP.

Madam Speaker, that is precisely what is wrong with this place. The state of Alberta politics is in really bad shape. The fact is that Albertans elected all of us – it doesn't matter which party you belong to – to come to the Legislature to represent them, to debate policy, to bring forward good ideas, ideas that are meant to be improved through the role of the opposition, which is why we have Committee of the Whole and the ability to amend legislation to make it better, because nobody has a monopoly on good ideas.

On this bill, as I made clear in both committee meetings, I am open to amendments from the government. If the government points out issues or flaws or shortcomings with this piece of legislation, I am happy to accept amendments, and I'm happy to share this as a win for Alberta. I said that to the UCP members that I spoke with and in the committee, and I mean that sincerely, Madam Speaker.

I'm not playing politics with this bill. It's a phenomenal idea that would help diversify the economy and grow Alberta businesses at a pace much quicker than the track that we're on right now. The beauty of this bill is that it is private dollars being invested. There are no government tax dollars.

Now, Madam Speaker, I can tell you and the Chamber and Albertans that I've been consulting on this concept for about six years now. I've spoken with dozens of venture capitalists, from some of the biggest names in the province to new and smaller VCs. I've spoken with entrepreneurs. I've spoken with small businesses in every sector.

The beauty about this bill, Madam Speaker, is that it would have supported the energy sector, the agricultural sector, life sciences, forestry, artificial intelligence. It would have improved and supported companies from every sector. Again, arguments of picking winners and losers don't apply.

Madam Speaker, the other disappointment with this is that, you know, again, we were all elected to this place to perform different roles, and the opposition, under the leadership of the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, have made it abundantly clear that we will not just be an opposition that criticizes or critiques. We will also be one that proposes ideas. We want to be propositional, and I honestly believe that that's what Albertans are looking for.

Here is an example of a bill that was free from any partisan language, and the purpose of that, Madam Speaker, was to debate the concept of the bill and not to go back and forth, which sometimes occurs in this Chamber. The bill – here's the exciting part – was modelled on a fund that was created under a former PC Premier, Ernest Manning, who initiated the Great Canadian Oil Sands project.

That project helped unlock Alberta's potential in our oil and gas. It gave Albertans the ability to invest collectively, reducing risk. Instead of an Albertan having to go out and research all the different start-up oil and gas companies, they could invest in a fund that would go and do that due diligence for them. It had nothing to do with government. It was arm's length. They brought in industry experts to evaluate industry, which is how it should be done. And those investments, Madam Speaker, were the equivalent of about $13,000 today, the amount that they were able to invest.

If you take that $13,000 and you apply it to, say, 100,000 Albertans, you now have a $1.3 billion fund. And I'll remind folks that Alberta's population under Premier Ernest Manning was much smaller than today. I mean, I can only imagine a fund being past a billion, maybe past $2 billion. That would act as the magnet that everyone is looking for or hoping that Alberta will be for venture capital for companies.

We would have companies relocating from across the country and around the globe to participate in this kind of fund. We would give Alberta companies a competitive advantage over every other company globally. That opportunity is in jeopardy in this moment.

You know, Madam Speaker, what was frustrating for me was the fact that both parties were given the ability to invite stakeholders to speak on this bill, and I was ready for a stakeholder to come and maybe present, you know: is this the best idea? Now, I will tell you that in all of my consultations over the past six years I never had a single industry expert speak against this. Some had concerns, which we spoke through, which we talked through, as far as: how do you ensure that you set this up so that it's arm's length, and how do we ensure that it's not government picking the companies? We worked hard to do that.

Madam Speaker, I know my time is running short, but I want to use my last minute to thank a number of people who helped me on this bill. First and foremost, I want to thank the very stakeholders. We had two, Aaryn Flynn and Trent Johnsen, who came to the committee meeting to speak in favour of this bill. My third stakeholder was Brad Zumwalt, who was prepared to speak but had trouble connecting. And dozens and dozens of other stakeholders provided input into this bill and actually are disappointed because they were hoping – hoping – that for once we could set aside partisan differences, share the stage, and bring forward and pass legislation that would benefit Albertans.

I also want to thank our policy staff's Jan-Niklas, who did an incredible job helping me write this, and a shout-out to Parliamentary Counsel and Trafton for helping me to write this bill. As government we will bring this forward.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to the debate on concurrence on Bill 203. I will be voting against the recommendation from the committee seeking to deny this private member's bill even the opportunity for fair and open debate on the floor of the Legislature. I think my colleagues have pretty ably laid out our concerns with this new process, this additional red tape that this government decided to put in place around how private members' bills are presented, a drastic change from how that's been done for decades here in the province of Alberta.

I see the Minister of Municipal Affairs across the way. Certainly, he presided in a number of governments in which they allowed private members' business to proceed in a way that gave fair and open debate to every single bill. But he sits with a government now, Madam Speaker, that is looking to use mechanisms behind closed doors to silence anyone that they deem not worthy of making their voice heard on behalf of their constituents and on behalf of Albertans in this Legislature.

My colleagues have noted how rare it is to be chosen for a private member's bill, what a privilege it is as a member to have that opportunity. I can speak from my own experience at the amount of work it takes to sit down, consult on a bill, to draft, do that work, the effort, talking with stakeholders, the excitement you feel at putting forward something that you truly believe would be good policy that could make a difference in this province. And I can think of no other word, Madam Speaker, than "contempt" for how this government approaches this process and the members of the opposition.

I recognize that we don't give them an easy time. I don't believe that's my job as a member of the opposition. I certainly try not to be any more disingenuous than the Premier himself or the members across the way in their attacks on us, either when we were in government or certainly as they continue now in government. But it is disappointing that on a bill like Bill 203, which has no partisanship attached – none, Madam Speaker. I've never heard the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, in presenting this bill, in bringing it forward, use it as an opportunity to attack and criticize this government despite many stumbles that it had in regard to tech and innovation in the province of Alberta.

Now, eventually, Madam Speaker, they did come around. You know, we had a change in the minister of economic development and trade, and certainly we saw an improvement after that, where he began to awaken to the importance of the tech and innovation sector in the province of Alberta, and we've seen much more positive engagement in policy, for instance. But the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview did not reference any of that. He simply brought forward a bill from his consultation with these stakeholders.

And let's be clear. He has built some excellent relationships – and he continues those relationships – with CEOs, innovators, entrepreneurs across the province of Alberta who are working in this sector, who respect the work of that member because of his engagement and his willingness to take actions and invoke policy that was brought forward from them, from the community, during his time as minister and again now as the critic. We hear from these government members complaining about how we as opposition criticize too much, but, Madam Speaker, when we bring forward real proposals with no partisanship attached, we're met with contempt and dismissal.

On the bill itself, as a representative for Edmonton-City Centre I certainly recognize the incredible importance of the tech and innovation sector. You know, it was back in 2019, around the time that this government ended and cancelled every credit that was available to support tech and innovation, including the SRED credit, which was a national credit, Madam Speaker. Every single province in Canada provided that credit; this government ended it.

In that year, this report was brought forward, from the Edmonton Downtown Business Association, called Accelerating Tech in Downtown Edmonton: Impacts and Opportunities. They talked about how Edmonton, at that time, was home to 394 tech companies – we know it's more today – the majority of them located here in my constituency in the downtown core. They noted that supporting and attracting more would take a major shift in mindset. They noted that of those 394 tech companies at the time, 44 per cent were considered start-ups, companies that could potentially grow into major companies with the right support and resources. As of 2018 there were just under 30,000 tech employees in Edmonton. We know there are more today. The number of employees in that sector had grown by 26 per cent over the previous five years, and the report showed that 65 per cent of Edmonton tech companies were looking for funding.

Now, I have great admiration for those who work in the tech and innovation sector, particularly in start-ups. Madam Speaker, it is the very definition of hustle. These are folks who have an idea, work with a very small team to build that idea out, have endless numbers of meetings with potential funders, work, on a shoestring, long hours, often getting by on their savings while they develop an idea that they had. Funding is absolutely core to the opportunity to develop these technologies, these ideas, and the incredible economic benefits that come when those companies are able to succeed.

That's why we introduced things like the Alberta innovation tax credit, which is a credit that is available in many provinces across Canada to help support investment in Alberta tech and innovation companies. It has been incredibly successful in many jurisdictions; it was incredibly successful here. Same for the interactive digital media tax credit. These are proven policies and principles, and they are essential, again, to helping these companies grow. Indeed, there are hundreds more jobs here in Edmonton-City Centre because of those credits, because of those actions that helped support companies in their growth. There are companies that were start-ups four years ago that are now beginning to thrive and expand because they had access to that support here in my constituency.

The proposal from the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview to create the Alberta venture fund is another potential tool in that tool box. It would be another way to support these start-ups, these companies as they are beginning, Madam Speaker, because these companies do not benefit from the steps that this government is proud of taking to stimulate the economy. They do not benefit from the corporate tax cut because they are not yet making a profit. They don't benefit from many of the steps that this government has taken. They would absolutely potentially benefit from an Alberta venture fund.

Indeed, some of the very folks who are the experts in supporting start-ups, in growing the tech and innovation system, folks like the gentleman from the A100 – Aaryn Flynn, one of the founders of BioWare, part of the A100, a group of investors across the province of Alberta who have an expertise in this field, spoke in support of this bill. He sat and he answered questions from members of government. He provided many compelling arguments that were summarily dismissed.

It is clear, Madam Speaker – and it is incredibly unfortunate – that no matter how good an idea, no matter how nonpartisan it may be, it is the intent of this government and its members on that committee to never allow any opposition bill the opportunity to have fair and open debate on the floor of the Legislature. That is deeply unfortunate.

You know, one of the arguments these members brought forward at committee – and it's interesting to me that not a single government member is rising in this House today to speak to this bill. I hope that's not because none of them have bothered to take a look at it. I hope it's not that none of them feel that it is worth speaking to Albertans about this bill. Not one has. But at the committee they brought forward a somewhat disingenuous argument, pointing to an investment fund in Manitoba that had not been successful, that had been government run, very different, Madam Speaker, from this particular bill, which risks not a single public dollar. Let's be clear on that. This is a government that was very happy . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this afternoon and speak against this committee's recommendation that the bill not proceed. You know, I will echo some of the comments made by my colleagues, and they're absolutely right. That failure of all of us here to ensure that we open a path so that we can debate legislation, private member bills – we all know that we don't have many opportunities to do that, but it's incredibly problematic today.

But it's actually not surprising, Madam Speaker. I'm sure you'll know that this is just a history. This is just the way that it's gone for this particular government. They are completely focused on themselves. They don't listen to Albertans. They certainly don't listen to good ideas from the opposition, because it's this governing party that believes that they know best about everything, and they actually don't. They've demonstrated that over and over and over again, yet they are still unwilling to let a debate proceed, a debate on a piece of legislation where the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has talked about the depth of consultation that has gone on for, I believe, six years, he said.

There was some interest and some support from members of the committee. Suddenly that changed. What changed? You know, it's funny. It's hilarious to me, in a really sad way, that we can hear – we saw some reporting recently. I think it was eight UCP MLAs that were willing to go on the record and talk about their leader and corruption that we all know exists in this particular party and talk about the internal problems. They're sure brave when it comes to saying things like that, but they are not brave enough to go against instructions and stand up and pave the way for a private member bill to be debated in this Chamber. That's why we're here. We all have different points of view. We all have different ideas, and the fact that all of them are standing together to deny an opportunity to debate this private member bill is incredibly problematic. It's incredibly disappointing.

You know, it's not surprising, though, because this has been years now of just chipping away at democracy. They can laugh. They can heckle, whatever they want, but it's happening. We saw it over and over again. We see even threats that standing orders will be changed if the person in charge doesn't like it. I hope that is not the case. You know, we saw at the very beginning of this government's mandate, we saw them fire the Election Commissioner, the independent Election Commissioner, that was investigating. That was a chipping away of democracy. We saw standing orders changed to actually limit all kinds of things that had not been limited before.

As we all know, we all have an opportunity or chance to have a private member bill come to this place so that we can debate it. The chances of us getting a number that actually helps is slim to none. Nevertheless, we participate in this lottery, and we hope that, in good faith, all 87 members of this place will actually take a fair look at the piece of legislation and then decide accordingly whether or not it deserves the time and space to be debated in this place. I think that just reading the legislation, even comments from some of the committee members, it is clear that this piece of legislation is that, as are the other two that have come up in debate this afternoon, the Anti-Racism as well as the Eastern Slopes Protection acts.

It is incredibly disappointing – incredibly disappointing – Madam Speaker, that members in this place that claim to have the best interests of Albertans at heart refuse to hear from members that are not part of their political party, even when we have good ideas, because they are too focused on what is good for them. That is called self-serving, and this is what this government is. It is absolutely self-serving. The interest of themselves is number one, not what's best for Albertans, not at all.

With that, Madam Speaker, I am going to take my seat.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members that wish to join the debate?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

Motions Other than Government Motions

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Alberta and Canadian Federation

505. Mr. Barnes moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to deploy every legal, economic, and constitutional tool at the province's disposal to maximize its ability to achieve a fair deal for Alberta within the Canadian federation.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is my honour and privilege to rise and introduce to this Assembly Motion 505. The motion is as follows:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to deploy every legal, economic, and constitutional tool at the province's disposal to maximize its ability to achieve a fair deal for Alberta within the Canadian federation.

Madam Speaker, now, you may wonder why I chose to read the text of the motion aloud to you when you all have a copy of it readily available. Well, I am happy to explain. Renowned poet and writer T.S. Eliot once said: good writers borrow; great writers steal. I wish I could take credit for the text of this motion, but I can't. The motion is based on a quote taken directly from the Premier, from the Premier's speech to United Conservative Party members at the 2019 annual general meeting. You see, back then the Premier said that he had a plan to win a fair deal from Ottawa, a plan that would go beyond sending semiregular angry letters to the federal government. If he did have a real plan for real action, Albertans have yet to see it.

The purpose of this motion is twofold: first, it is to serve notice to Justin Trudeau that the days of elbow-bump diplomacy between himself and his good friend in Alberta have come to an end; second, it is to remind the Premier that his first duty is not to the federal government nor to corporate donors and their lobbyists and certainly not to international billionaires and celebrities trying to cram untested economic experiments down our throats. Whether the Premier likes it or not, his first duty is to Albertans.

About every six months or so this Premier has attempted to delay action and shift blame for his lack of progress in fighting for us and our families for a fair deal. The reason is self-evident. There simply has been no progress to speak of. He has not been able to secure changes to Trudeau's Bill C-69, the no-more-pipelines bill, which are necessary for our province to realize the full potential of its provincially owned resources and its great, hard-working people. All this Premier's so-called soft diplomacy has not prompted the removal of Bill C-48, the anti-Alberta tanker ban. Madam Speaker, the federal carbon tax has not been eliminated; indeed, it's even being steadily increased. The Premier has failed to negotiate the elimination of the cap to the fiscal stabilization program also, and maybe most importantly there have been no changes to the equalization program. In fact, there's been virtually no movement on this file whatsoever.

These are the five key issues that matter most to Albertans when it comes to obtaining a fair deal for our province, and the last one, equalization, is particularly important. Last October Albertans even voted 61.7 per cent in favour of removing equalization from the Constitution. In addition, this Assembly then provided a motion recognizing the results of this referendum. Madam Speaker, when it comes to fighting for a fair deal, Albertans have done their part. First, they elected this government. Then they approved the referendum. When it comes to recognizing the democratically expressed wishes of the public, this Assembly has also done its part. It's the Premier who has not, and while he constantly attempts to pass the buck and shift the blame for his lack of progress, Albertans know exactly who is to blame.

You see, shortly after the 2019 election this Premier appointed himself as Minister of Intergovernmental Relations. Fighting for a fair deal isn't somebody else's job; it's his job, and he has achieved nothing. In the private sector such failure to achieve results would be cause for immediate dismissal, cause to be sacked. In fact, this Premier has even fired ministers for much less.

With Motion 505 I am offering this Assembly an opportunity to remind this Premier of the promises he has made and his complete failure to deliver on these promises, but more importantly I'm offering you an opportunity – all of you an opportunity – to speak out for your constituents. It is not acceptable for this government to further delay or deny the democratically expressed wishes of both Albertans and this Assembly.

Unfortunately, this has become a habit for the gang of elitists running this government. Now, need I remind you that this cabinet under this Premier has delayed implementing the Citizen Initiative Act? This Legislature should immediately reform the Citizen Initiative Act by adopting my amendment from last year to make it possible for Albertans to have a referendum on independence, to hold Ottawa accountable, to give us a fair deal since this Premier is too much of an avowed federalist to get that job done.

They also delayed implementing recall. They also delayed implementing the opt-in provisions that would allow union members to avoid contributing to union-backed political campaigns. Now they're trying to run out the clock on defending Albertans' interests when it comes to fighting for a fair deal. They even scoff at their own party's policy on these issues and disregard the democratically expressed wishes of this Assembly.

Madam Speaker, enough is enough. For far too long the executive branch of this government has run roughshod over the legislative branch, and it has to stop. If you want to send a message to this government, colleagues, I am offering you a great place to start. I ask you to support my Motion 505.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Red Deer-South, followed by Brooks-Medicine Hat.

5:20

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I stand and speak in support of Motion 505, proposed by the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat, who is a principled conservative whom I respect and consider a friend. His motion deserves more attention than it receives. Many Albertans are concerned that we are sleepwalking into a disaster. It is time to raise voices of warning and to prepare. I am concerned that it may be too late.

Canada is spending itself into oblivion, threatening to drag Alberta down with it. Sticking one's head into the sand does not alter inconvenient realities. Alberta is regularly attacked by policies of economic self-destruction, undermining the capacity of Alberta businesses and families to provide for themselves and others. Why are we having to succeed in spite of Ottawa and not because of it? What does Ottawa do for Alberta? Madam Speaker, they are too expensive.

Madam Speaker, we need to protect ourselves. Alberta businesses and families should not be subject to unprincipled federal politicians who have demonstrated that they will not hesitate to attack the livelihoods of Alberta businesses and families to further their political ambitions for power. The fact that Alberta can be continually subject to plunder and attack from unprincipled politicians like Trudeau is proof positive that Albertans are suffering under a rigged partnership arrangement. There are deep structural issues in this so-called fiscal federation, federalism, which are bigger and transcend Canada being afflicted by the worst Prime Minister in Canadian history, aided and abetted by a destructive Liberal-NDP axis.

Albertans need to understand that the NDP will do nothing for them. Parasitic policies and plunder are their stock and trade. That is their world. How can they speak against it? Like the NDP, we need to accept the reality that the majority of politicians in Canada will do little or nothing to assist Alberta to get a fair treatment from this rigged arrangement that they politically benefit under. In fact, the Premier of Quebec has said that one of his favourite things about Canada is equalization. Madam Speaker, politicians like him are not going to help. They will hinder and oppose.

So, Madam Speaker, we are compelled to take matters into our own hands. How do we free ourselves as hosts of parasitic laws and Trojan Horses? How do we free Alberta businesses and families? The less Alberta needs Ottawa, the more leverage Alberta has, but Ottawa will resist efforts to need them less. It reduces their power.

Many Albertans rightfully ask: what true progress has been made to need Ottawa less? Madam Speaker, it is not enough to compare ourselves to a useless NDP. We need to be better. Here's an example. It was estimated that CPP contributions by Alberta businesses and families were about $3 billion more annually than benefits paid to Alberta retirees, but since 2019 Trudeau has been jacking up CPP taxes so that this annual transfer from Albertans is now in excess of $4 billion. This year alone maximum CPP costs increased over 10 per cent.

Madam Speaker, this is crazy. Under an Alberta pension plan, without Alberta being forced to produce billions in subsidies, rates for Alberta businesses and workers could be the lowest in Canada while maintaining retiree benefits. This could produce a game-changing competitive advantage, supporting businesses to hire more employees, with Alberta workers taking home more money. It is inexplicable to me that we are not getting out of the CPP, which every year is ripping off Alberta businesses and workers more and more, billions upon billions every year. Why are we not stopping it? The NDP do not get it. They never will. But in the private sector, in the real world, we would never stand for it. This is unacceptable.

What is our moral authority to hold Ottawa accountable if we fail to do our part? A requirement for fairness needs to be founded on principle. Alberta needs great self-reliance to free ourselves from hostile interference and insulate ourselves and our children from a looming $1 trillion plus fiscal train wreck.

I support the motion of the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat. Alberta must deploy every legal, economic, and constitutional tool to achieve a fair deal for Alberta. Albertans are tiring of overpromising and underdelivering. Less talk, more show. Trust is earned as one's actions are consistent with one's words.

In closing, Alberta is a land of prosperity. It is a land of opportunity. It is a land of freedom. We must be vigilant to keep it that way.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mrs. Frey: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It is a pleasure to join the debate under Motions Other than Government Motions on private member's Motion 505 from my colleague and, truth be told, one of my favourite people, the hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat, who I also consider a very dear friend. I am very happy to be supporting private member's Motion 505. I totally agree. We are in a situation where every day it seems like another Albertan is coming up to me and saying, you know, how unfair of a deal we have in the federation and how much we need to do to change that.

Madam Speaker, I am happy to report, though, that I am proud of the progress that our government has made on this file. The Fair Deal Panel released a myriad of recommendations, and I'm happy to see that so much work has been done.

On a personal level, I was very proud to be involved with the Alberta firearms advisory council, chairing that as well as making sure that we appointed Alberta's provincial Chief Firearms Officer. Teri Bryant is the new Alberta provincial Chief Firearms Officer. She's from Calgary. She is a sports shooter and advocate, really everything you can possibly dream of when it comes to a Chief Firearms Officer. She's truly incredible, Madam Speaker.

I know that there were many people who were concerned about this office and the time it took to get it set up. So just for the record what was going on was that in other provinces where they had appointed a provincial chief firearms officer, it kind of – the cart came before the horse. We needed to make sure that we had the office set up, that the backlogs were cleared, that we had the ability to let her hit the ground running as soon as she started. So just a shout-out to Teri and all of those who work in the provincial chief firearms office, to Marlin Degrand at Justice, and to everyone else because they are truly fantastic people.

We also had recommendation 2, which was to “proceed with the proposed referendum on equalization, asking a clear question along the lines of” and then, of course, the question on equalization. Of course, we know that Albertans voted resoundingly to scrap equalization from the Constitution. So that's done. We have a clear mandate from Albertans, and we're happy to move forward with that.

5:30

Recommendation 21 – just a couple of highlights here – “vigorously pursue access to markets for Alberta's [resources].” This one's really exciting, Madam Speaker, because just last week or maybe two weeks ago we had Senator Joe Manchin up here in Alberta, and for the very first time an Alberta Premier has been asked to testify before the United States Committee on Natural Resources. This committee is obviously very widely broadcast. It's obviously very important. The Premier will be taking a delegation down to Washington to fight for Alberta's resources and to really put us on the map. Alberta has a great reputation world-wide for our natural resources, and I am very proud to see Alberta leading the way on advocacy and our government being in front of that because we know that governments prior had been doing everything they can to block Alberta's resources. It's time that we stood up for that, and if the federal government is not going to do it, then, by golly, Alberta should.

We're also making significant progress on TMX. We fought to keep line 5 open. We know that the governor of that state – I believe it was Minnesota if I'm correct – was asking for that to be shut down, and we had done the hard work to make sure that it stayed open. We are at all-time record exports of Alberta oil right now, Madam Speaker. Drilling activity is up. Jobs are up. It's really fantastic news for Alberta.

We've also had democratic tools such as referendum and citizens' initiative referendum. We passed those bills. They've come into force, much to the dismay of the NDP. We have held Senate elections, Madam Speaker, and three fantastic Albertans were nominated by Albertans to be recommended to go to the Senate. Now, I'm not going to hold my breath waiting for Justin Trudeau to appoint these fantastic people, but I sure can hope. I guess hope is going to have to be a strategy in this one because we have to make sure that Justin Trudeau knows that it's not okay to sit on your hands when there are democratically elected, competent individuals waiting to take their seats in the Senate.

We are also continuing to challenge federal legislation that impacts Alberta. We're currently in court fighting C-69 – that's the no-more-pipelines law – and we're working to support First Nations who are opposing C-48. So C-48 is a tanker ban, and we know that the Prime Minister has been, in a word, hypocritical about this as he's allowed tankers on other coasts but just not in this instance.

I already spoke about the Chief Firearms Officer, but I'll plug it again just because that is a really big deal for Alberta.

We also have the recommendation that I heard the hon. member touch on, which is “a comprehensive plan to create an Alberta Pension Plan.” I will say, Madam Speaker, just as a point here – I know you'll be excited about this – that AIMCo just released some really great numbers. We have Alberta's investment management company. I think it was close to 14 per cent. It was a banner year. It was a record year for AIMCo. That is really fantastic news if the work is done to pull Albertans out of CPP.

We know that we need every tool at our disposal to make sure that Albertans are getting a fair deal from the federation, that the Prime Minister knows that we mean business. Of course, we are in a situation where in Confederation we are – you know, of course, there is a division of power, but what we need to do is fight back when that division of power is stepped upon.

We have seen the federal government encroach on the lives of private citizens through things like the use of the Emergencies Act. We stood up for Albertans against the Emergencies Act with government motions calling on them to stop what they were doing. We've stood up against federal travel mandates. We have continued to fight for Albertans and their rights and their freedoms.

I'm really also excited to say that, you know, we are continuing this work on the Alberta provincial police force. While there are many thoughts out there, I know that in some of the more remote and rural areas of my riding there are many people who are concerned with the response times of the RCMP and have a real issue with rural crime. Of course, those of us who live in cities, who have police a maximum of five minutes away, don't have quite the same issues, Madam Speaker, but it's high time that we listened to rural communities and we listened to those people who live in some of the more remote regions of our province and give them the access to policing that they deserve.

Those studies are still under way, and we'll make sure that we are making a pragmatic decision on that. We can't just, of course, be the first ones to move and do whatever we want just because it's what we want to do. We have to make sure that the proper due diligence is done and process is followed so that we know that Albertans are getting the best deal possible.

With that, Madam Speaker, I would like to hand the floor off to another hon. colleague, but I just wanted to once again thank the hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat for his relentless advocacy for a fair deal as well as for giving me the opportunity to speak to such an important issue today.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre, followed by Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Motion 505, resolving “that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to deploy every legal, economic, and constitutional tool at the province's disposal to maximize its ability to achieve a fair deal for Alberta within the Canadian federation.” I think that all MLAs in this Assembly today will support this motion. I mean, after all, how could we not? It seems pretty obvious that our province should be strategic in our dealings with other provinces and with the federal government. It makes perfect sense that in doing so, we would deploy every legal, economic, and constitutional tool at our disposal to achieve those strategic objectives. So I think I and likely all my colleagues in the Official Opposition will support the motion.

But I think it's very important to be clear that there is considerable breadth in considering: what are the strategic objectives on the part of the people of Alberta, and what tools achieve those for the people of Alberta without doing harm to the people of Alberta? Certainly, I'd say that we in the Official Opposition and many Albertans have a sharp disagreement with this UCP government on what constitutes Alberta's strategic objectives and priorities and some of the means by which they go about seeking to achieve them. I think a real government would see that ensuring we get the best deal possible involves diplomacy, partnership, strength of purpose, certainly, at certain points, economic linkages, strategic political advocacy, but unfortunately what we often have, I believe, with this government is playing childish games, empty posturing, shaking the fist while looking east.

As a result, we haven't gotten much for Albertans, and indeed many of the proposals this government has supposedly to fight for Albertans would do Albertans further harm. Just think about the $1.3 billion that this government chose to waste on a pipeline to nowhere because they couldn't manage to do their job of actual advocacy to get that over the hill. That's one good example. They could have worked to build allies across the country. They could have worked to advocate hard south of the border. They could have avoided insulting key elected officials who were involved in that. But no; instead, they gambled $1.3 billion of Albertans' money, and those dollars are lost.

In other instances we've seen failed stunts that have had a real negative impact locally cause a lot of concern for Albertans. For example, some of the members have spoken about the fair deal report and one of the proposals in there replacing the RCMP with an Alberta provincial police force. Now, to be clear, even that report showed that there was very little support from actual Albertans for that proposal, Madam Speaker, and indeed we continue to hear loud and clear from Albertans that they do not want that. They don't. All Albertans have learned just how expensive that endeavour would be. We'd be looking at spending at least $366 million in transition costs alone, borne by the taxpayers in Alberta, and even more concerning, with an APP we would lose $170 million in funding every year from Ottawa.

Simply put, over the mandate of one government Alberta would spend over $1 billion of our tax dollars on an initiative that, to be clear, taxpayers, municipalities, folks across the province, a majority of individuals have said they do not want. The fair deal report, as I said, shows that two-thirds – two-thirds; 66 per cent – of Albertans do not support an APP. They are dead set against it. You know, the Member for Red Deer-South talked about unprincipled politicians who do damage to working people as part of their own pursuit of power. What an apt description of this government's mindless pursuit of an Alberta provincial police force. Indeed, I think that as Albertans hear more and more about that, they like it less and less.

As I said, Madam Speaker, we are working to listen to Albertans. Albertans want their government to act strategically, absolutely. They certainly want a better deal in Confederation, but they don't support the agenda of this Premier when he tries to wrap himself in that flag. His priorities are not the priorities of Albertans. That has been made abundantly clear on a wide swath of issues.

Another example: leaving the CPP. Now, I recognize that the Member for Red Deer-South spoke very much in favour of this policy, but again, a vast majority of Albertans, tens of thousands, have written to us on this proposal, and the message has been very clear: hands off my pension. They do not want it seized by this government. They do not trust it in the hands of this Premier, yet this government continues to dangle that out there. That is not negotiation on behalf of the people of Alberta, because the people of Alberta have been very clear that they do not want it. They do not trust it. And, hey, there are many fair criticisms to make about Ottawa, the current government, without question. But let's be clear. One of the things that works best in this country is the CPP. Albertans rely on it; they trust it. They do not trust this Premier or this government or those members who continue to push for it. They may be speaking for a vocal minority, but the majority of Albertans are opposed. So the message is clear: this government should keep their hands to themselves, keep them away from Alberta's CPP.

Again, I agree that any government representing the people of Alberta should be acting strategically, should be using the tools and levers at their disposal to act in the best interests of Alberta, to fight for the objectives that Albertans elect them to do. We'll support this motion, but we will not support the objective that this government has of giving up $170 million a year from Ottawa so the Premier can advance his APP agenda, wave a flag on something that no Albertan – or at least a vast majority of Albertans have been very clear they do not want it.

We will not support giving this Premier or his government control over Albertans' pensions, and we will continue to hold this government to account for attempting to claim that it is standing up for Albertans when they are standing up for themselves, when they are attempting to preserve their own political power, when, as they have on so many issues, whether it's on the coal plan, whether it's on the Alberta pension, whether it's on the Alberta provincial police – APP seems to be a common acronym; I just realized that. But on all of these issues – their curriculum, Madam Speaker – where Albertans have been very, very clear that they do not support this government, we as the opposition will continue to speak out because that also is supporting the best interests of our province and the strategic objectives of Albertans.

I thank the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat for bringing this forward and certainly reminding us of our duty as elected officials. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Pleased to get up today and support the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat and his Motion 505. I'll read the motion. "Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to deploy every legal, economic, and constitutional tool at the province's disposal to maximize its ability to achieve a fair deal for Alberta within the Canadian federation." I think this is something that is very important to Albertans, and Albertans overwhelmingly support this. It's good to see that this is coming forward in this Legislature as a motion.

When we look at what the Premier said in the past on this, in the 2019 UCP AGM he stated: our government is prepared to deploy every legal, economic, and constitutional tool at our disposal to maximize our leverage and to win a fair deal for Alberta. I want to point out just a couple of little differences there in words. The motion says, "urge the government to deploy every legal, economic, and constitutional tool," and what the Premier said is: our government is prepared to deploy every legal, economic, and constitutional tool. I think that's maybe a bit of a problem because being prepared to do it and doing it are two completely different things. I think what Albertans want to see is that they want to see action and not a lot more talk about some of these things.

If we look to the fair deal report, that was produced for Albertans, I'm just going to read a couple of them, a couple of the recommendations.

Develop a comprehensive plan to create an Alberta Pension Plan and withdraw from the Canada Pension Plan.

Of course, we've seen absolutely no movement on that.

I'm just going to look at another one.

14. Create an Alberta Police Service to replace the RCMP . . .

18. Opt out of new federal cost-shared programs, subject to Alberta receiving full compensation.

I think we've seen this government opt in on a bunch of different cost-shared programs with the federal government.

Looking down the list:

24. Use democratic tools such as referenda and citizens' initiatives to seek Albertans' guidance on selected Fair Deal Panel proposals and other initiatives.

I think we've seen here where the citizens' initiatives, that was passed, I think, last July, was finally brought into action just a week or so ago. That, I think, is a big failure. Then when we look at the actual bill that brought in the citizens' initiative referendums, we see that the standards to actually make them happen are so high that it is possible that we may never see it actually take place because those standards are so high. So we've seen a lot of failures in the government and this Premier as they've tried to bring – well, they've not only not brought some of these things in, but they've actually created barriers for them to happen.

I wanted to read just a couple more things out of the Fair Deal Panel recommendations. It says:

However, we believe that if the federal government and the rest of Canada do not respond positively and quickly to Albertans' demands for a fair deal, then support for secession will only grow.

I think that's something that we are seeing here in Alberta, that support for secession is growing. A lot of this we can't blame on the federal government. We're not demanding it. We're not asking for it, so the federal government isn't even in a position to respond positively or negatively to what we would like: our demands, Albertans' demands, for a fair deal. Until we put that into action, then I think Albertans will say: okay. They'll see how the federal government responds. We need to have that happen.

I'll just read one more part out of the Fair Deal Panel recommendations.

How will we know when we have a fair deal for Alberta? In the panel's opinion, we will know when Albertans trust people in Ottawa to act in this province's best interests, and when Alberta's position within the Canadian federation has been equitably reset.

Well, Madam Speaker, I think we can clearly see that there's no trust from Albertans in Ottawa and that it's acting in this province's best interest. I believe that so far we have failed on getting a fair deal for Albertans.

I just want to kind of leave with just one final comment here. This has been said by other people, too, but I just want to repeat it here. If we were in Alberta here right now and we were looking at joining Confederation with Canada at this time and we were offered the deal that we have now, would we take it? I think it's pretty clear that Albertans overwhelmingly would say no. I think that speaks volumes as far as our position right now within Canada and how Albertans view our position in Canada and how we feel that we're being treated. Therefore, I think we need to pass this motion, but then, further, we need to act on this motion and start getting a better deal for Albertans.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the motion?

Seeing none, I will ask the hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat to close debate.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and a big thanks to all my colleagues that spoke and for the support for this government using every legal, economic, and constitutional tool at its disposal. Of course, the hon. members for Edmonton-City Centre and Central Peace-Notley talked a lot about empty posturing and not much happening. I want to come back and talk about four failures of this government, but first – and I felt it and I heard it when my colleagues all spoke – this is about our constituents. This is about our families. This is about giving them every opportunity to go to work and reach the full potential that they can and that Alberta can.

Madam Speaker, what has happened instead is $650 billion – $650 billion – has left Alberta since 1961 and gone to Ottawa and been redistributed. What has that gotten us? Sometimes it feels like it's gotten us only abuse. Has that gotten us resource movement? Has that gotten us Northern Gateway, which would get oil and gas to India and China a day quicker or at all? That would go a long, long way to clean the air and, you know, make that more secure for our kids and our grandkids. Has that gotten us Energy East?

One of my hon. colleagues – I think it was Brooks-Medicine Hat – mentioned line 5. Quebec and Ontario and the Maritimes almost lost their energy security because our pipeline has to go through America. Alberta put all those opportunities out there for energy security for the country of Canada, and it was met with a lack of respect.

This government has, so far from doing everything, the big failures. The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre mentioned the $1.3 billion lost in an empty pipeline, Keystone. Oil by rail: the previous government puts $2 billion in oil by rail; the UCP government spends more than $2 billion to get rid of it, claiming that that saved us $400 million. The poor Alberta taxpayer, because of being landlocked by Ottawa, lost billions of dollars and didn't move a single barrel. This government, this Premier applauded when the federal government bought Trans Mountain. What did Trans Mountain announce three or so months ago? No more federal money into Trans Mountain. Where's that going to go? Of course, this government put in a turn-off-the-taps legislation weaker than the predecessor NDP government. How that is using every tool in the legislative tool box is beyond me.

My hon. colleague from Red Deer-South talked about the fiscal train wreck of Canada. A couple of people have said to me, you know, in the last little while, "Well, thank God, Ottawa was there for CERB and for getting us through this pandemic," and, Madam Speaker, I don't know what the answer is to that. They printed $400 billion. They increased the money supply by 20 per cent, meaning 1 out of every 5 dollars that's in circulation was put in by Prime Minister Trudeau in the last two years. That means that your family, my family, all of our constituents are paying inflation through the roof, and now we're looking at huge interest rates skyrocketing when all we have to do is give Albertans a chance to develop our oil and gas resources.

This is maddening, and it's important that this government do what the Premier promised at the 2019 UCP AGM. "Government to deploy every legal, economic, and constitutional tool at the province's disposal to maximize its ability to achieve a fair deal for Alberta within the Canadian federation." No more angrily worded letters. No more posturing with insignificant appointments. Madam Speaker, let's come to work every day for a fair deal for Alberta families and Alberta communities. Let's make Alberta the freest and most prosperous place in North America.

Thank you.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, before we start, just a reminder that it would be very kind to the table officers counting the vote if there were to be silence while they do so.

[Motion carried unanimously; Bill 18 read a second time]

Bill 13 Financial Innovation Act

[Adjourned debate April 20: Mr. Nielsen]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there members to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to, you know, just reiterate the importance of Bill 13. I think that it definitely is necessary, and it's some important ways by which we can change financial products and improve consumer protection. However, I also know that there are always the bills that we have before us and then the time as it progresses. I'm just looking at Bill 18 and the urgency of getting some movement and progress around Bill 18, so I would like to request to adjourn debate and move to Bill 18.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 16 Insurance Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board to move Bill 16 at second reading.

Mr. Toews: All right. Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I, in fact, rise to move second reading of Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022.

Bill 16 proposes measures that would help ensure an efficient regulatory framework, support growth of Alberta's insurance industry, and advance our efforts to modernize Alberta's financial services sector. Alberta's recovery plan, our strategy for economic diversification, recognizes the tremendous potential for expanding the financial service sector in the province.

To this end, I recently introduced legislation to promote innovation in the financial services sector by allowing companies to test new products and services. This legislation is the first of its kind in Canada, one that will spur investment in innovative and new technologies and position Alberta's economy for growth in the financial services sector. Bill 16 takes us a step further in these efforts with amendments to insurance legislation for commercial entities. The proposed amendments in Bill 16 relate to two insurance statutes, the Insurance Act and the Captive Insurance Companies Act. I'll go over the amendments to each, starting with the Insurance Act.

Proposed amendments to the Insurance Act are intended to advance government's efforts to increase insurance capacity in the province by facilitating access to reinsurance. Madam Speaker, reinsurance is insurance for insurance companies. As a result of scarce supply of insurance and reinsurance globally Canadian and Alberta's insurers are finding it very difficult to meet the demands of their clients in both commercial and personal lines of business. Increasing reinsurance availability in the province should have a positive impact on the overall insurance supply in the provincial insurance market. This will help ease the shortage and high prices and better position traditional insurers in serving Albertans and Alberta businesses.

Specifically, the proposed amendments would add reinsurance provisions to the Insurance Act, allowing provincially licensed insurance companies to focus solely on reinsurance and to enter limited partnerships. If Bill 16 is passed, Alberta would be the first Canadian jurisdiction to allow provincial insurers to have a reinsurance-specific business model and pursue limited partnerships for capital formation.

It's worth noting that the reinsurance industry in Canada is very limited and composed mostly of foreign-based enterprises. The majority are operating through a subsidiary and conducting business in Canada through a branch. In some instances their business activities are performed directly from abroad. To do business in Canada, reinsurers may choose to be licensed, often referred to as admitted, or unlicensed. Admitted reinsurers are federally licensed and supervised by the federal office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. Much of the existing global reinsurance capacity is located in Europe, the United States, and Bermuda; therefore, it can be challenging to access reinsurance if you're a Canadian- or an Alberta-based insurer.

In addition, Madam Speaker, we're continuously seeing pressure to reduce Canadian insurance capacity through actions taken in Europe against insurers supporting fossil fuel projects such as Canadian pipelines. Add that to the current global hard insurance market, and I'm sure we all can appreciate the challenges for many commercial entities to meet their insurance needs. That's why it's imperative we do what we can to allow the insurance industry to attract capacity to Alberta and to help diversify our provincial insurance sector.

Diversifying Alberta's insurance sector has both short- and long-term benefits for the province's economy. Greater insurance options will help commercial entities with immediate insurance needs. Greater activity in the insurance industry will help attract investment, strengthen Alberta's financial services sector, and support economic diversification. That's why in the fall of 2021 we passed the Captive Insurance Companies Act, which will come into force this summer and allow the formation of captive insurance companies right here in Alberta.

We're very excited to be only the second province in Canada, next to B.C., to come into the global insurance market as a captives domicile. The Captive Insurance Companies Act is expected to come into effect this summer once we finalize the accompanying regulations. Right now we're putting the finishing touches on the legislation itself, with an amendment being proposed in Bill 16. The amendment proposes new redomestication provisions for the Captive Insurance Companies Act to specifically address the relocation of foreign captives to the province. These new provisions in the legislation would help clarify how companies can bring their foreign captives to Alberta; that is, having their insurance companies together with the rest of their business geographically.

If passed, the amendment will ensure that forthcoming rules for setting up a captive in Alberta are straightforward. This will make it easier for Alberta businesses to evaluate decisions on bringing their foreign captives home and to do so without interruption to the operation of their captives. This is a very important consideration when making business decisions about relocating an existing captive to another jurisdiction.

I'm pleased we have an opportunity to refine our legislation before it comes into effect to ensure it's straightforward, on par with legislation of other captive jurisdictions, and, most importantly, built on feedback from experts and stakeholders. Alberta is well positioned to soon welcome captives.

In addition to new provisions on reinsurance and captive insurance, Bill 16 proposes several administrative amendments to the Insurance Act. This will help ensure a clear and efficient regulatory framework for the conduct of insurance business in the province and maintain adequate protection of consumers.

Overall, Bill 16 supports the positive momentum for creating opportunities in every sector of our rapidly growing economy. The proposed measures will help create a regulatory framework that will help generate more insurance activity right here in Alberta. This will lead to more opportunities for Albertans in sophisticated finance and insurance positions or careers and boost the investment potential of our entire financial services sector.

With that, Madam Speaker, I would like to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 18 Utility Commodity Rebate Act

The Chair: Committee of the Whole has under consideration Bill 18, the Utility Commodity Rebate Act. This is its first time in Committee of the Whole. Any members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Yes, Madam Chair. Thank you very much. I am pleased to rise and speak to Bill 18. As I think we have discussed in the House and as we have voted recently, the Official Opposition in general is in favour of this bill; however, we believe that it can be made better in some ways.

With that in mind, I plan to move a series of amendments, beginning with this one. I'll wait for that to reach the table.

The Chair: Hon. member, please proceed to read it into the record.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 18, the Utility Commodity Rebate Act, be amended in section 3 by adding the following immediately after subsection (3):

(4) A rebate required to be provided under this Act in relation to the use of a utility commodity between November 1, 2021 and April 30, 2022 must be provided no later than May 31, 2022.

The purpose, Madam Chair, of this amendment is to put a timeline into place. You know, we've seen, with respect to natural gas rebates, a promise that it would be coming in the budget, and then in the budget it was sort of deferred until fall.

With respect to electricity rebates, we've seen six weeks and some portion of a week go by at this point since it was promised. My understanding, at least from the associate minister's comments in the media, is that we are not expecting that rebate until June or July. The purpose of this amendment, Madam Chair, is to bring that date back, because I think the issue that we have is that this situation is urgent. It is significantly urgent for Albertans, and you know another few months is likely to be far too much for those Albertans.

You know, we have certainly heard – and we've been getting volumes of correspondence, a lot of correspondence, on this issue – from people who are basically writing to us to say that they're making the decision between keeping the heat and lights on and buying groceries. That is a dire situation for many Albertans. It is a situation that is of immediate concern to them. The purpose here of this amendment is to ensure that this moves forward in a timely manner.

You know, this act, which is before us today, is an act which essentially mirrors a natural gas act from 2001 and just adds electricity into that act. It's very straightforward. It's a very easy drafting job. I would imagine it could have been done in one day, to be perfectly honest, yet we waited five weeks to see it come before the House.

The concern I have is that I'm not sure that the government feels the sense of urgency that Albertans feel on this file. What we are trying to do is to amend the act to ensure that that sense of urgency is through.

I know the government is going to say, you know, that we didn't pass the act in one day; therefore, we don't actually really want it to go through. Madam Chair, I think it's worth just taking a moment to outline why that is completely absurd as an argument. To begin with, like I say, this act itself is essentially a copy and paste from a previous act, just kind of adding in electricity. It could have been introduced the day after the rebate was promised. It was not. Instead, we waited five weeks, and apparently we're still going to be waiting another two months, till the end of June or beginning of July, before Albertans see relief. I don't know. It's clear to me that this could have moved faster than it did, and it hasn't.

So rather than simply opposing, rather than simply complaining, we have come forward to try and help make this legislation better, to try and do something that is important to all Albertans, to try and ensure not some sort of, like, fake, you know, "They didn't vote for the bill the same day it was introduced" but a real timeline – a real timeline – that puts real money in the hands of Albertans in a real and timely manner.

I think, Madam Chair, that every member of this House owes it to their constituents to give real consideration to this. I imagine that the members opposite are getting the same e-mails we are from people who are not partisans. They are just desperate and under stress, and they need assistance now. Even though we believe that the amount of the rebate proposed by the government is insufficient – and it seems that at least some members of the UCP’s own caucus agree with that – we do think that sooner is better, and a more timely rebate is definitely better.

You know, there are people who are behind right now who face disconnection because this government was unwilling to support an extension on that ban, and I think that those individuals need the money. I would hope that many members of this Chamber understand what that’s like, when you have a sudden and unexpected increase in your costs. Albertans have seen a lot of sudden and unexpected increases in their costs. They’ve seen utilities going through the roof. They’ve seen car insurance going through the roof after the cap was removed on that by this government. They’ve seen tuition hikes. They’ve seen interest on student loan payments go up. All of these factors are coming together to combine to make sort of the perfect storm. These aren’t people who are being frivolous or wanting a new iPhone or something like that. They are people who are doing their best to pay their basic costs and get by, and they are genuinely struggling to do that.

I think we owe them that help. I think we owe them that help in a timely manner. So even though I continue to oppose the proposed amount of the rebate and I believe that it ought to be higher, I do think that we should move forward as quickly as possible. With that, I would urge all members of this House to vote in favour of this amendment because I think it will help constituents throughout the province.

The Chair: Hon. members, I forgot to note that this is amendment A1. Are there any members that wish to speak to amendment A1?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Chair: Back on the main bill, Bill 18, in Committee of the Whole, the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. That was disappointing to see, but fortunately I am prepared with another one. I’ll just wait for that to reach the table.

The Chair: Hon. members, this will be known as amendment A2. Hon. member, please proceed.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 18, Utility Commodity Rebate Act, be amended as follows: (a) by adding the following immediately after section 4(3).

(4) Despite any provision to the contrary in any other enactment, a distributor may not disconnect an eligible consumer from a utility commodity for non-payment of the cost of that utility commodity from the time a rebate is authorized under this Act until the rebate has been provided to the distributor’s eligible consumers.

(b) by adding the following immediately after 5(3):

(4) Despite any provision to the contrary in any other enactment, a direct provider may not disconnect an eligible consumer from a utility commodity for non-payment of the cost of that utility commodity from the time a rebate is authorized under this Act until the rebate has been provided to the direct provider’s eligible consumers.

(c) by renumbering section 6 as 6(1) and adding the following immediately after subsection (1):

(2) Despite any provision to the contrary in any other enactment, a contractor may not disconnect an eligible consumer from a utility commodity for non-payment of the cost of that utility commodity from the time a rebate is authorized under this Act until the rebate has been provided to the contractor’s eligible consumers.

That was a bit of a mouthful. What it means is that between the time a rebate is authorized and the time a rebate reaches the consumer, they may not be disconnected from their utilities.

Madam Chair, as you may recall, the Official Opposition drafted an act to extend the disconnection ban. Between October and April 15 of any year people cannot be cut off from their utilities for nonpayment. There are very good reasons for that: we are Albertans, we care about one another, and we don’t like anyone to freeze. Now, we offered a piece of legislation to the government, and we offered to work with them to get it through in order to extend that ban. It ran through the summer and would continue to sort of run into the ban for next year, so they’d have another year.

The reason for that, Madam Chair, is that these are extraordinary times. These are times when Albertans are under an extraordinary amount of pressure. We have seen, you know, high unemployment, jobs returning very slowly, a lot of people giving up looking at all. We have seen very little wage growth, especially for those earning less. We have seen a government who has used inflation to take more money out of the pockets of Albertans, seniors whose benefits were deindexed by the UCP who have less in their pockets, and many other people in a similar situation. People have less coming in at the same time we’re seeing unprecedented growth in costs.

When the UCP took the cap off insurance, we saw some people’s rates go up 20 or even 30 per cent. That was a big hit for a lot of people. We have seen utilities skyrocket since the UCP took the cap off electricity. Again, as I’ve mentioned, we’ve seen, I mean, some tuition going up triple-digit percentages, like more than 100 per cent. We have seen the UCP government essentially start charging people additional interest on their student loans. That’s driving costs through the roof for folks.

You know, this is a perfect storm of factors because of the policies of this government that have left people in a position where they are not able to cover their basic costs with the income they are earning, and that has been extremely problematic. It has been stressful and challenging. Despite the fact that we don't hear them standing up and talking about it, I have no doubt that the members opposite have been hearing from their constituents, just as I have been hearing from mine, about these concerns.

My last amendment was to get the money out the door faster, to ensure that Albertans had the money in their pockets by the end of May, because, again, this government has been promising these rebates for months, and they haven't gone out. We know, according to the associate minister, that it will be at least two more months before people see electricity relief, and even then, $150, something one of their own members called paltry, and it may be months more before they see relief on natural gas. That's problematic, and the people who have been writing in to us are hundreds or even thousands of dollars behind on their utility bills.

With the government having refused our amendment to get the money out the door faster, with the government having refused to work with us to ensure that Albertans are not cut off from their utilities while they are getting their feet back under them, we now have one more attempt, and that is an attempt to say that once the government authorizes a rebate, during the time that it takes them to process – and, I mean, with this government that seems to be a pretty long time – those rebates, people can't be cut off. So if people are sitting there expecting relief, having relied on the word of the government that relief was coming, they can't be cut off while they're waiting for that help to get there.

This is an incredibly small thing – an incredibly small thing – that this government could do, having done next to nothing to help people, having told them that it was the market working and that they should feel sorry for these poor insurance companies who are generating record profits. This is a very, very small thing that they could do to help Albertans, many of whom desperately, desperately need that help.

You know, I'd like to remind the members opposite that we were sent here to represent those Albertans. That is who elected us. Each and every one of us won an election. Each and every one of us had people come forward and put their faith in us that we would put their interests first, that we would be there for them and take their concerns seriously and bring those concerns to this place, this place where we collectively come together and make the rules that govern us all. I would remind the members opposite that it is those people that they work for. It is not corporations.

Madam Chair, with that, I will simply say that this is a very small thing. It's not asking the government to do anything additional. It's just asking them to give people the tiniest amount of relief and to allow them not to be disconnected in that period between when the government promises them something and delivers, which with this government could be a while, that period of time during which the money is travelling to our constituents who are waiting for that money, that they not be disconnected, that they not be left with no heat or sitting in the dark, that they can happily go out and spend that money on their groceries so that they can have both groceries and heat and power at the same time. That is not, I think, a tremendous ask, but I do think that it would be a tremendous help to those people who sent us to this place.

The Chair: Are there members wishing to join the debate on amendment A2? My apologies. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie caught my eye first, but if you want to give – there we go.

Member Loyola: Thank you, Madam Chair. As you can see, we're all chomping at the bit here to respond to this particular amendment.

Like many other members on my side of the House, I am absolutely one hundred per cent sure that they also have constituents that they've heard from, like myself. I remember – it's probably about four weeks ago now – that I had a constituent that was contacting my office because her electricity was being cut off. This is something that, of course, is unfathomable to me because we're going through a really tough time. We're going through a considerably tough time. We don't need to let people know that COVID was very hard on families. I can't tell you the number of people who I've spoken to who tell me that they're just one paycheque away from not being able to make ends meet at the end of the month, and some people are, like, $200 away, we've heard.

I think that amending this bill to include this particular amendment, that has been proposed by the Member for Calgary-Mountain View, is a no-brainer. I just can't understand why the members on the other side wouldn't want – well, first of all, I was completely surprised when they didn't want to accept the proposal that we had put forward to actually extend the opportunity for people not to have their electricity or their utilities cut off. The only way that I can understand what the members on the other side of the House are thinking is that they're so blinded by their ideology that government should just stay out of these things.

Of course, you've heard me say before that when it comes to supply and demand, there are going to be people who are priced out of the market, and there are people who are struggling because of COVID. COVID exacerbated the economic crisis that we're going through. I understand, you know, that members on the other side are all about making things voluntary. For the most part corporations, yeah, do their part but not always. It's a very difficult situation. I want to remind members of this House that for people who are going through potential cut-off of their utilities, it's so incredibly stressful. It's so incredibly stressful to have to go through that process. Even though you end up calling a 1-800 number and you work out some kind of an arrangement, the whole process is stressful for the person going through it.

I just don't know how else to state to the members on the other side of the House that this could be easily rectified by accepting this amendment into the proposed piece of legislation that you have brought before us. It would calm so many people who are actually going through quite a miserable time right now. To not do this would add insult to injury.

I highly suspect that members on the other side of the House are going to vote this amendment down, and it's heartbreaking, to be quite honest. I know for a fact that if I'm hearing from constituents that are having a hard time making ends meet, members on the other side of the House must be hearing also from constituents in their ridings that are also having a tough time making ends meet. It can't just be my riding.

I would highly encourage the members to, you know, give some sober second thought to this amendment – it's a no-brainer; it would help so many people – so that we can actually pass this amendment and make this piece of legislation that you've brought before us a little bit better.

With that, I'll take my chair, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Chair. Albertans want to live in a province where we can keep the lights on, and Albertans expect a government that will protect them as consumers – not to do everything but to do that which is in their power and to take common-sense approaches to protecting consumers – but we have a government who are in cahoots with companies who are making every choice they can to increase costs for us and raise profits by now five times what they were last year.

Albertans have asked us for action. That is why we are debating this legislation now. This appeared nowhere in the government's budget documents. It was only after the outcry from Albertans. Albertans deserve the credit for the minimal amount of action that this government has already taken, but it is only on this side of the House, Madam Chair, where we have a group of people who are willing to actually make it real.

Now, this government was not interested in a legislated timeline to get money into people's hands. What they could do, at the very least, is protect people from utility cut-offs while they are waiting for the government to get its act together to send them the money to protect them as consumers. People need us to be there for them right now, while they're waiting for those rebates. We know that people need us to be there for them because they have asked us for this action.

We all as Albertans want a level playing field, where the government policy is targeted and reasonable and keeps us financially and physically secure. That's what keeping the lights on does for all of us and for small businesses and for farmers, but we have a government who are focused on tilting that playing field, Madam Chair. They are focused on tilting that playing field towards record profits that cost ordinary people more. Ordinary people pay for those profits, that have now gone up by five times.

This is a common-sense, very simple thing that the government could do, a very simple amendment to help people while they're waiting for those rebates. This is what Albertans can support and want to support, a targeted, common-sense, low-cost solution to protecting them as consumers. It is prudent. This measure protects the right people, not the obscene profits of the utility companies right now but ordinary people just trying to get by when the cost of everything else is going up. That is why this House must support this amendment.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Chair. I thought one of my colleagues was going to have to hold me up. I would like to thank the member for the comments. I would like to invite them to leave the house of revisionist history and come back here under the dome, under the realm of reality, and we can be a little more accurate about the actual current events. The reason I say that is that we have an opposition like no other opposition in the country and certainly like no opposition this country has seen, quite frankly.

We'll start it off with the Member for Calgary-Mountain View, who in March was in front of a business telling everybody that electricity in this province was 15 cents. Well, in effect, that wasn't true. Electricity wasn't 15 cents. Electricity was 7.5 cents if you had a contract. If you had the regulated rate option, it was 10 and a half cents.

An Hon. Member: That's awkward.

Mr. Nally: Embarrassing, right?

So, depending on which price you looked at, the member was off between 50 to 100 per cent.

Mr. Sabir: Point of order.

Mr. Nally: Well, Madam Chair, I would suggest . . .

The Chair: Point of order.

Point of Order

Allegations against a Member

Mr. Sabir: I rise under 23(h), (i), and (j). The minister is making allegations and references to things that are not part of this House's record. I think the minister should stay on the amendment and speak to whether he will support it or not.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. deputy government whip.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Madam Chair. This is clearly a matter of debate. I think the amendment, covering off quite a bit of things around electricity, cutting people off, the price of electricity – this entire conversation is very relevant to what the minister is talking about. The facts that he is pulling from, I believe, came right from media sources within the Calgary Herald, so he's accurate in what he is saying. If the members opposite don't like what he is saying, then I suggest that they just join into the debate and add what they would like to add. But it is certainly not a point of order.

The Chair: I would tend to agree with the deputy government whip on this matter. However, I think it's probably important to caution all members on the language that they use in this House and how it may incite others to not be very happy.

However, my caution has been given, and I'll ask the hon. minister to carry on with his remarks.

Debate Continued

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Chair. I certainly don't want to be responsible for them getting all ginned up and excited tonight, so I will not reference the newspaper article where the member was quoted as saying that it was 15 cents.

The point that I'm trying to make is that Albertans deserve an Energy critic that actually knows the price of energy. The regulated rate is 10.8, by the way, in case the member was interested.

Also, you know, what we've heard from the opposition – I think that we need to change the name of this amendment. This is amendment A2. We just heard from A1. Let's change the name to the CYA amendment, because that's really what these amendments are about. They are a CYA amendment, and the reason I say that is because the NDP made a strategic error last week. You see, I came into this House, and in front of the members of the opposition I asked for them to work with us in a bipartisan fashion. I asked to have unanimous consent to proceed to second reading, and they refused. They voted to continue with the legislative process. They voted to get the rebates out longer rather than speeding them up.

Then the next day I pointed out to the members, again in a bipartisan fashion, that the Chief Justice was going to be in the House at 3 o'clock providing royal assent, and I invited the members to work with us to push this legislation through, to get the rebates into Albertans' pockets as . . . [interjections] You know, Madam Chair, it's hard to speak when they're lighting their hair on fire like that. We were certainly very patient to listen to them, and I would ask them to extend the same courtesy to us.
