Now, this may sound, you know, like pie-in-the-sky idealism on my part. However, from the work I did when I was at Catholic Social Services, I was able to learn that this already existed 20 years ago and is being used in many countries in the world, typically in northern European countries. Finland, Switzerland, Denmark, Holland, Germany all have models that have what I'm talking about to some significant degree. Finland, for example, has an almost completely comprehensive model in which they have been able to reduce the number of people going into continuing care by a significant amount. The vast majority of people, even with needs that make them dependent, whether it be health care or other kinds of in-home care needs – it's down now to a very, very minimal number of people that are going into care. I think that's good. I think that's positive.

I think it's something that we should aspire to and something that we can achieve simply by learning from other jurisdictions, which is exactly the point of this amendment, that we are seeking to have this no longer move ahead until we've done the work to actually make this section of the bill more robust and to deal with the issues that are in front of us. We know that not only should we do it in order to avoid systemic discrimination against one group in society, but we can do it because it is being done in jurisdictions that are very similar to our own. It's simply a matter of political choice. Are we prepared to do what we can to ensure that people stay in their own homes and live the good life that they possibly could live, or are we prepared to just say, "No, people are just going to have to suffer and go into longer term care situations, which are certainly not as satisfying as living in your own home"?

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday has stood.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise this afternoon, or evening, to speak to the proposed amendment before us, that, again:

Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the government has not carried out sufficient consultations on the contents of the bill with families whose loved ones lost their lives from COVID-19 while in continuing care.

I completely support this amendment. I've appreciated the points that have been made by several speakers before me this afternoon. It's going to be hard for me to do a better job than that. That's just simply the fact.

But I, like many of my colleagues before me, have concerns with Bill 11. First of all, I guess, just reflecting on the decisions that this government has made previously in regard to long-term care sites – you may remember that back in April 2021, I believe, we saw this government put forward legal liability protections for continuing care or long-term care providers. At the time we were seeing – about 61 per cent of deaths, I believe, from COVID-19 at that time were happening in these long-term care sites or facilities or homes. I think, Mr. Speaker, that's a devastating fact and figure and clearly shows that this UCP government and we as a society did not do enough to protect the seniors in those communities.

But at the point of seeing this high amount of life loss in our communities and across the province, instead of increasing protections and increasing quality of care for seniors across the province, this government decided to add legal protections for these long-term care facilities and these long-term care companies. Unfortunately, since then we have not seen much work done to improve the quality of care, to improve reporting, necessarily, or monitoring of these facilities.

We have heard from many speakers before me this afternoon reflecting on what we saw from this government: the facility-based continuing care review. I would repeat and echo the comments of previous speakers that there was a real opportunity to make impactful change for seniors and for families across this province if only the government followed through on the proposals that were put forward in this review. There were many important pieces within this that would have been attainable from this government, but, again, as we look at Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, the most consequential amendment that we see in here in terms of holding these companies and these long-term care sites accountable is an amendment talking about increasing the amount that an operator can be fined to $100,000 from $10,000.

While I can appreciate that, on one hand I think we must also reflect on the fact that through the COVID-19 pandemic and onward we have not seen any movement from the government to strengthen regulations, to strengthen the requirements to provide quality of care, to monitor things like staffing and the idea of staffing burnout, and ensuring that we don't see staff going from one facility to another.

As we heard from previous speakers, often this type of work can be precarious. The people on the front lines are well intentioned and trained, often as best as they can be, but the fact is that in many instances there aren't benefits being provided to these workers and there aren't full-time opportunities. That is something that was spoken to in the facility-based continuing care review recommendations from the final report on April 30, 2021. It discussed the fact that in many instances these workers were not getting full-time employment, that they were potentially going from one site to another and had the potential to create further spread of COVID-19.

It truly doesn't seem like this government has learned anything from this report, as good as it may be, which is truly unfortunate because they had a real opportunity to make choices, and they could have been reflected in this Bill 11. But, unfortunately, we see very little in terms of the recommendations that were put forward in this report. Again, when we look at some of the topics that it talked about and issues and concerns, the need for an increased focus on quality of life and person-centred care for facility-based continuing care residents, have we seen anything to prove that the government has made any changes to this model and ensuring that regulations and rules that are in place are increasing the quality of life for these families?

There's no doubt that it has been incredibly complicated and complex keeping seniors safe but also ensuring that they have a better quality of life and ensuring that they are able to stay integrated into their community, whether they are in their home but, more specifically, in a long-term care site. But the fact is that the government hasn't taken any steps required in terms of ensuring that there's adequate staffing, ensuring that those staff feel that they have mental health supports in place, ensuring that those staff have benefits that are going to ensure that they don't have to go and get a second job, that they don't have to go to several long-term care homes to be able to support their own family, let alone the families that they are trying to support in these sites.

Again, some of the other recommendations in terms of improving co-ordination for monitoring and inspections. This truly goes back to the idea that, again, not only is this government trying to reduce the liability to these long-term care companies and again, through Bill 11, increasing the fines, but increasing fines does nothing. It means nothing if you aren't increasing the regulations and the requirements of these facilities to provide adequate quality of life, to provide adequate monitoring to ensure that the families that are relying on these sites and on these homes are getting adequate support.

We saw this tragic story play out – and very unlikely that it was a unique situation here in Alberta; I'm sure it's happened in other sites, but I'm not sure that we've learned anything from it – in the story of the family who found that their senior or their parent had been mistreated in a facility, that they had died from dehydration, that they weren't being provided adequate supports, and that they weren't being taken care of properly. What we saw from that is staff reporting that they were completely burned out, that they didn't have the proper supports to ensure that they could in turn support the families that they were supposed to be caring for. What have we learned from that? Through Bill 11, what we see before us, it seems this government has learned nothing.

As we reflect on this amendment to Bill 11, that it not now be read a second time because we aren't of the view here in the Assembly that sufficient consultation on the contents has been carried out, I again completely agree with that amendment. I think it's completely reasonable, that what we see in Bill 11 is not adequate in terms of supporting the families across the province who have not received the proper care and support that they should expect from this government and that they would expect from any government.

I think that there was also an important point, that I believe the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford made and likely several other members, about the need for more long-term home care, and that is reflected in that report, that report recommending that we shift the current distribution here in Alberta of continuing care services from 61 per cent long-term home care and 39 per cent facility-based continuing care to a ratio of 70 per cent and 30 per cent. What movement have we seen from the government with this expert review report coming back to them and having a year to reflect on the important issues that have been raised by this report? What movement have we seen on that?

I know that when we look at the supports that are provided by this government and the decision from this government to deindex important benefits like the Alberta seniors' benefit, that this year alone is costing many seniors $750 a year – of course, that would only increase year after year when it was previously indexed. The government went back on that decision, so we are seeing systemically dollars being taken out of the pockets of seniors, and it is only going to see more and more needing further service from the government and increased costs on our health care system across the board, which is completely disappointing but not surprising from this government on the many backwards decisions that they made.

Another one, an important thing that needs to be pointed out and has been by members so far, is the lack of an independent seniors advocate here in the province, the government's decision to not find somebody to fill that position. I've spoken with many people out in the community, whether it be nonprofit organizations who deal with seniors, whether it be aging citizens in my community who are deeply concerned that such an important role, the role of an advocate to, well, Mr. Speaker, advocate on behalf of these seniors – that whether it be about long-term care, whether it be about facilities in their community, whether it be about income supports, whatever the issue might be, they have somebody to go and talk to and potentially get answers. Unfortunately, this government, on such an important role, the seniors advocate, has made the decision to not fill that role. Completely devastating.

You know, looking at the facility-based continuing care report, again, something that – the UCP government commissioned this report, had the opportunity to reflect on it and improve the services provided to seniors through long-term care and, unfortunately, just didn't follow through with these things. I just do not understand, because in many situations, while some of them likely would cost more money when we are talking about providing adequate staffing levels and providing that mental health support – but these things will pay themselves off in the short term. But in some instances, whether we're talking about expanding home care, their own report shows that it's very likely to save money, so I'm not sure, especially in the continued pandemic that we see ourselves in and the need to provide adequate space and a feeling of belonging to seniors, why we aren't moving forward with that model that has been proposed through this report.

You know, the idea of being able to interact with family members and friends and caregivers has become increasingly difficult through the pandemic. I can appreciate that entirely, that as a representative – and I'm sure many people in the House here have had the opportunity, whether it be for Easter, whether it be for Christmas or any other special event, to go spend time with seniors and, of course, above and beyond that, take time as the representative for these citizens in our community to ask them what is important to them. Unfortunately, through the pandemic that relationship has completely changed. I can appreciate that, but there would be further opportunities for seniors and families to be able to visit with their family members if they were potentially in home care instead of being locked down in these long-term care homes.

There is so much to be said, Mr. Speaker, on how completely wrong the direction of this government has been, specifically on how we are taking care of our aging population, specifically on the lack of action to strengthen regulations to . . . [Mr. Carson's speaking time expired]

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members looking to join on RA1? I see the hon. Member for Peace River has risen.

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise to speak on this amendment on Bill 11. The first thing I want to address is the minister. The Minister of Health, bringing this forward, I think, has done a terrific job on a number of fronts and is beyond reproach when it comes to his sincerity in his desire to see a system that works, works for Albertans and works for seniors. I think that if we start with that premise, understanding that the minister, first of all, when it came to consultation, has been doing this for a long time with the help of other members, the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek and others, in doing the consultation with the FBCC review – we have to remember that the legislation that we're currently working under is as old as 1985. That's a long time ago for legislation that governs a very important part of health care delivery with continuing care, and it does need updating.

This amendment in particular would suggest that we do not continue in second reading, which would mean the bill would die, would prohibit moving forward on important enabling aspects of that review.

Now, I appreciate that the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford made, I think, a very thoughtful speech going into details of why there are many good things in this legislation but, he thought, even better things in the review that are not included in the legislation. The reason for that, as the minister has explained previously in the House and I'll help to try and elaborate now, is because this legislation allows us to do the transformative work from a number of different pieces of legislation. I think it's six different pieces of legislation under one house, one legislative house, updated for today. We're looking at something that's over – what is it? – 35 years old or so. The truth is that this legislation is enabling.

I heard some interesting comments and thoughtful comments from Edmonton-West Henday, who was speaking previously, asking for us to do a number of things. His reason for opposing the bill and for this amendment, which effectively kills the bill, is because there's staffing burnout, and he wants to strengthen regulations. Well, Mr. Speaker, the proper place to strengthen regulations is in the regulations. The legislation itself is an inappropriate place. Obviously, this Chamber needs to be making decisions for the enabling framework so that we can do the transformative work we need to in continuing care. To put the kind of regulations that the members opposite are asking for in legislation would be misplaced and ill advised given the importance of that review that the members opposite also appreciate and see as something that we need to be finishing.

I do think it is important we understand as a Chamber the best way for us as legislators to structure the future generation of continuing care. It would be a mistake for us if we did that in a short-sighted way and overloaded our legislation with details that need to be changed and updated. As we can see, there's much legislation and demand on this House, and the very fact that we have not updated this since 1985 is a testament to that. That was back when we had even fewer pieces of legislation as a government, fewer bills that we needed to manage, continue to update. Technology and best practices are continuing to advance very, very quickly in all fields, particularly when it comes to health care, this important piece.

The Member for Edmonton-West Henday also talked about staffing arrangements, working in multiple facilities. I could not think of a worse place to deal with staffing arrangements than in a piece of legislation. It strikes me as very, very much something that ought to be in regulation or in policy. Many of these very important points that are being brought up are right to be brought up. The truth is, Mr. Speaker, as the minister has promised in this House and in public, that they will be addressed. We take very, very seriously the FBCC review, and the reason we take it so seriously is because we know it's transformative. It's important for future generations and perhaps even some in this Chamber to have the continuing care that we need, but that will not happen if we try and bog down the legislation in ways that cannot be updated in appropriate ways as these changes come about.

Then another part that I would like to bring up particularly is surrounding home care. Now, the work in home care I think the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford is very right to bring up as paramount. In my own review that I did when it came to end-of-life and palliative care, it also came across brightly as one of the most important points that we need to invest in, and it's true as well in the FBCC review. I think that is obvious to all members of this House, on all sides.

I'm very happy to report that the 2022 budget that we passed – unfortunately, members opposite voted against it – is increasing home care by $81 million, totalling that to a $750 million investment. Now, for that money to be spent in an appropriate way, for it to be able to enable home care in its most effective way so that we get as many folks in continuing care with as many supports as possible in the comfort of their own homes, in the way that we all believe they ought to be cared for, we need to have the legislation and the framework there to do it.

When we heard the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar say that this is not the time to be passing this legislation, I could not disagree more.

The exact opposite is true, Mr. Speaker. We absolutely need to be passing it today. Any more delays are only delays on the care that we ought to be delivering. Any more delays now, any more filibuster, any more proposed amendments, reasoned or hoist or otherwise, are continuing to slow down the work of this House and, effectively, the work of that review that we want to be implementing in the appropriate space, in the space of policy, in the space of regulation, as it ought to be done.

I encourage the members opposite to take up their own challenge and to move forward so that we can vote against this amendment, for the bill, get it out of second reading, look at any thoughtful, genuine amendments when it comes to Committee of the Whole, and get it passed. Our seniors, those who worked so hard to build this province, those who have laboured so much to build the families and the communities and all the civil society we care so much about, deserve it. They deserve very much to see us move forward as serious legislators, as adults in this Chamber, and say: "We agree on the importance of the review. We think the review is right in its recommendations. We think home care should be enabled, that the $81 million ought to be spent in the best possible way."

We need to be serving these individuals, and the way to do that is by putting aside any differences that you might have over questions of allocation of staffing when it comes to the legislation, because the right place for that is on an operational basis. Legislation should not be dealing with those sorts of intimate operational questions of who is staffed, in what building, when.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the important thing that we need to do is vote down this amendment quickly and move quickly out of second reading into Committee of the Whole and as soon as possible be able to do the transformative work needed for our seniors and for our province.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, and very good timing.

I see that the time is now 6 o'clock, which means that we are adjourned until 7:30 tonight.

[The Assembly adjourned at 6 p.m.]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Good evening, hon. members. Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022

Ms Ganley moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, be amended by deleting all of the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment May 2: Member Ceci]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, we are on amendment REF1 on Bill 19 in second reading. Are there members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise tonight to speak to the referral amendment proposed by the Member for Calgary-Mountain View to Bill 19, the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022. Let me just start by saying that I encourage my colleagues to vote against the amendment as I am confident in the provisions contained within this amendment act and the hundreds of hours of stakeholder consultation that have gone into crafting this bill. I would like to take some time here to talk about what exactly it is that is inside this bill, what it is that we’re trying to do, why it is that that’s important, and why it is that I believe these are very common-sense, nonideological amendments that members of this House can and should support.

In fact, the condo sector has been talking about the two main pieces of this amendment act since the 2014 Condominium Property Amendment Act was passed in this House, and those pieces are adding a simpler method for voting on routine business and recovering the costs of damage caused by an individual owner or a tenant. Madam Speaker, 2014 was a long time ago, and the condominium industry has been waiting for these items since then.

I’m proud of all the work that my team at Service Alberta has done in my short time as minister, that we have done together, to get to this point of being able to deliver on these important topics. Since 2019 my department has worked with Alberta’s key condo stakeholders, representing all corners of the condo industry and all corners of the province. These groups include the north and south chapters of the Canadian Condominium Institute, the Condo Owners Forum Society of Alberta, and the Association of Condominium Managers of Alberta, and I’m happy to share with the House that their representatives are supportive of this bill. I want to thank them in this House for the work that they put into improving condominium governance in Alberta as I know it will help to create an even healthier condominium sector in Alberta. We want condo living to remain a strong option for Albertans, which is something that is very important for this government, and these amendments will help to solve some of the more contentious challenges currently faced by the sector.

I’d like to reinforce again why we’re doing this and who has been asking for these changes, because some members opposite have questioned that, including the Member for St. Albert, who asked: which condominium lobbyists asked for it? Well, Madam Speaker, I’ve just said that it was, in fact, Alberta’s largest condo owner association, the Condo Owners Forum Society of Alberta, and the Canadian Condominium Institute and the Association of Condominium Managers of Alberta, none of which I would consider to be lobbyists, not in the way that the Member for St. Albert was implying. I hope that we can put to rest any assertion behind the motivations of this bill. The fact is that the motivation of this bill is to benefit Albertans and, most specifically, to benefit those Albertans who choose to live in condos.

In fact, as the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview suggested, we’re all wanting to get to the same outcome, which is improving the current condominium legislation. That member should know, as a former minister, that stakeholders are looking for these amendments to the act, that make their lives easier, save time in meetings by enabling simple voting on routine affairs, and save the vast majority of responsible condominium owners money by appropriately assigning the cost of damages to common property to those who caused it. These are common-sense amendments that will save condo owners time and money. It is important to pass these amendments, so I cannot support the referral amendment made by the opposition, which would simply delay the delivery of these important amendments to condo owners and residents.

But let me go into some more detail. On the voting rights, these amendments on voting rights will add flexibility in the voting processes used at condominium meetings while respecting the self-governance model of condo corporations to adapt the voting processes to meet their needs. Currently the act has a narrow process for voting, where condo owners are only entitled to vote by unit factor. A unit factor vote makes sense for conducting votes in situations where those results could be contentious, like in matters where you need to approve a large expense or decisions that may have legal implications. However, for routine business, including approving an agenda or approving the minutes from a previous meeting or simply adjourning the meeting, it is an overly complex calculation that needs to be done on the unit factors, and that can unnecessarily delay the time required for concluding an important meeting.

That is why we’re establishing a new voting option, an owner vote, which is one vote per owner or co-owner, which reduces administrative burdens associated with preparing and verifying voter eligibility for boards and condo corporations. A condo corporation will adopt an alternative voting format in their bylaws and can set out a different, simpler voting format – for example, one vote per unit – if that works better for that corporation.

Madam Speaker, we are amending the condo property act to make voting rules more flexible for condo corporations who may want to use simpler voting methods on routine business. We have heard that this is something that is already widely happening in practice in condominiums across Alberta, so we want to ensure that our condo legislation reflects this practice while establishing specific parameters to protect owners’ rights. As such, owners will be allowed to request a unit factor vote on any vote, which would overrule an owner vote, so long as the request is made before the result of an owner vote is announced. I’m happy to hear that this proposal has been very well received by members in this House so far.

Circling back to the damage chargebacks topic, Madam Speaker, similarly, we are providing condo corporations with tools to protect the financial security of all owners and their corporations by charting how they can recover the costs for damage to common property. Now, normally it makes sense that an owner of any asset would be responsible to pay for the repair of any damage that they cause to it. However, in condo corporations, where people own common property in addition to their own personal assets like their unit, it is unfortunate that owners might have to pay to repair damage caused to common property when they had nothing to do with that damage in the first place.

Currently condo corporations must seek a court order to recover the costs of repair for damages to common property attributable to owners, including damage done to hallways, elevators, and parkade infrastructure, just to name a few examples. Going to court costs a lot of money for the condo boards and, ultimately, to the condo owners that they represent as they generally have to hire lawyers, and then those fees get passed on to the owners through higher condo fees or special assessments. At the end of the day, Madam Speaker, it's always the condo owner that ends up paying for this, so we want to make sure that responsible condo owners who have never caused damage to the common property in their building or on their property no longer have to pay for the costs associated with an irresponsible owner who caused damage to common property. This is common sense.

We know that the vast majority of condo owners and residents are responsible stewards of their property, and we don't want them to have to deal with unsustainable increases to their condo fees because of the negligence of a small minority of condo owners and residents. We know that that's not what condo owners want. We don't want that either, and I would hope that all members of this House would recognize the financial burden that is being placed on all condo owners by not allowing for the proper allocation of damage costs to those who are responsible for causing it.

What we are doing with this legislation, ultimately, is allowing for condo corporations and condo boards to charge back damages directly to that owner or occupant who is responsible for causing that damage in the first place. The context on exactly how that would happen, Madam Speaker, will be spelled out in regulation.

Let's make sure that people who cause damage are held accountable for their actions. Let's make sure there's a fair process to make sure that that is handled in a way that is acceptable to all of the owners and that it is handled consistently and fairly, with due process. I'm pleased to say that that's exactly what this legislation will deliver.

To put this into a real-life example for everyone – and I believe my colleague the Member for Grande Prairie may have shared some of this story in some earlier remarks – this is a personal example for me as someone who lived in a condo building for six years and served on a condo board for two of those years. In our building we had about 158 units. We had a very large underground parking lot, and without fail every couple of months somebody who lived in our building would hit that door with their car. We had a video camera. We knew exactly who it was. We could prove exactly who it was, but the fact was that they chose not to pay for that damage, and ultimately we had no legal means to recover the costs for that damage. Guess who paid for it. Every single condo owner in that building, not the one owner who caused the damage. That is unacceptable, so that is what this legislation is designed to address.

Another important part of this legislation is that it will allow these chargebacks to be treated as a contribution, which means that if the owner chooses not to pay for it, the condo corporation has the ability to place a caveat on the title of the condo unit and also to charge for reasonable administrative and legal costs associated with filing that caveat. This is critical to ensure that there is fairness for all residents in a condo property and to ensure that the folks who are responsible owners do not have to bear the costs of irresponsible owners.

Madam Speaker, I have heard members opposite bring up concerns about whether the introduction of this tool would mean that due process would be eliminated for an owner who wanted to dispute being charged with a chargeback. That is simply not the case. As I've said, the process for a chargeback being issued will be set out in regulation. Those regulations will be developed in consultation and collaboration with the industry, including those condo owner groups that represent the interests of the 500,000 Albertans who live in condos all across this province.

We will take the time to get this right, and we will do that in collaboration with the industry. But, at the end of the day, there will be due process. There will be a format to deal with an appeal. I can assure all members of this Chamber and all Albertans who may be watching that that will be the case. But that is way more appropriate to be spelled out in regulations instead of in the legislation.

If passed, these amendments will come into effect on proclamation, Madam Speaker, which is targeted for the fall of this year. That will give time for the condo corporations to consider the process we put forward through legislation and the accompanying regulations and to decide whether or not they would like to make use of it.

We have also addressed a number of standing issues in the act that frequently cause confusion for those who interpret the act on a regular basis. The section that deals with whether or not windows and doors are part of a unit of common property will be moved into the act. And just to confirm for this House, given that the Member for Edmonton-McClung had raised some concerns, we are not changing who owns windows and doors with these amendments. This does not change the definition of personal property or common property. This change simply means that all of the rules that determine what is personal property and what is common property will now be in the same section of the legislation, which will make it easier for readers of the legislation to interpret, and that may include people who are purchasing a first home in a condo. This is an important step to clarify our legislation and make life better for condo owners.

Finally, to wrap up here, I've heard a lot of talk from members opposite about a dispute resolution tribunal and how they wish to refer this bill to committee in order to further study that issue. Madam Speaker, we see the value in a dispute resolution tribunal. However, it would not make sense to force a dispute resolution tribunal on short notice into a bill that was not designed to handle that, and it certainly would not make sense for us to hold up the implementation of these much-needed reforms that have been asked for by the condo owners all across this province. While we work towards getting the tribunal right, we are moving forward with these important amendments now because they are ready now and because condo owners want them now.

Let me remind the House of the work that we have done since I became minister to address these issues in the condo space. First of all, let me just say that if we were to listen to what condo owners said about the NDP's track record when they were in government, they told us that every single thing that the NDP did on condo regulation was awful, and they begged us to stop it and change it. Guess what. That's what we did in June 2019, Madam Speaker. We paused the regulations that they had screwed up, and we took six months to work with the industry to make it better, and we did. That's exactly what we did. We got those up and running in January 2020.

Since then we have been working with the industry on a series of reforms to other important condo-related matters. The fact is that the NDP did nothing of value on condos for four years, and that meant that we inherited a long to-do list, Madam Speaker. We've been hard at work tackling that, one item at a time. These are two more items that are extremely important to condo owners that we have ready to implement now, and I urge all members to vote against the referral amendment and instead to vote in favour of this bill so that we can deliver on what condo owners need and want and have been asking for.

Madam Speaker, I can assure you that work continues on developing a framework for what a condo tribunal could look like in Alberta. We know it's important, we know that condo owners want it, and we are working towards that. But we will not hold hostage these important reforms that are ready under Bill 19 now simply because they want to make up for the four years that they squandered when they were in government, when they did nothing of value for condo owners.

When the time is right, we are committed to moving forward with a tribunal that would be created through extensive engagement with stakeholders, taking all of their concerns into account. In the meantime we are making these common-sense reforms that will bring immediate benefits to the over 500,000 Albertans who live in condos across this province.

With that being said, Madam Speaker, I would like to encourage all members of this House to vote against the referral amendment and to support Bill 19, the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, as proposed. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 19, the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, and to speak to the referral that's before us today. I actually want to give credit to the Minister of Service Alberta for going through some of the questions that the members of the opposition had laid out and for answering them in detail. You know, honestly, there have been many pieces of legislation that the minister has brought forward in our time in the House, and I do give him credit for consistently doing that. He regularly does try to engage in a thoughtful debate for the most part. Something went a little awry at the end of that, but really there is a genuine willingness to engage on the questions that are put forward, which is appreciated. I do appreciate that he's addressed some of those concerns.

I do note that the Minister of Service Alberta, you know, seemed to be frustrated that members of the opposition were perhaps questioning the process – or the motives, I suppose, is the way he framed it – of some of the proposed changes, and I can appreciate why he would be frustrated with that. I think part of that, of course, is because Albertans have come to question the motives and intentions of this government due to the broken trust on so many issues. Even on an issue where maybe there are no ulterior motives or friends that are being supported or lobbyists that have a disproportionately loud voice in certain ministers' ears – unfortunately, some of the minister's colleagues in cabinet have shown that they are beholden to certain interests, and that's why we have to be very careful in this Chamber to make sure that there is full transparency around the motivations behind legislation that comes forward to this House. The frustration that I heard in the Minister of Service Alberta's voice in addressing those – he may want to share that frustration with his colleagues who are making it more difficult for him to do his job.

I do want to speak to some of the proposed changes that are within this bill and why I do support the amendment to have this matter referred back to committee for consultation. The Minister of Service Alberta outlined a number of the changes that actually are noncontroversial, from our perspective or at least from my perspective – I can't speak for everybody else – in terms of some of the changes that are coming through that will be beneficial. For example, the Minister of Service Alberta talked about moving to an owner vote on sort of less substantial issues to get through meetings, to allow for where there are multiple owners of one condo unit to be able to each have a vote. It does make it easier, and I think that makes sense, for certain. I think that's something that the condo associations and those representing the owners have indicated they support.

While I've never owned a condo, I have rented a condo from an owner and have been privy to some of those condo board meetings, and I know sometimes they can be very challenging to have the proper representation to get certain matters heard. If there are processes that this bill is putting forward to make that easier, that's certainly something that I think is a good idea. I don't think that we have too much issue with those changes as well as the chargeback issue, which is the ability to sort of have individual condo owners held accountable for costs that they may have incurred as a result of damage to common condo property.

You know, that's very, again, noncontroversial in the sense of we need to be careful, of course, that that's not used to sort of single out – with condo associations and living in condo situations, I know you become very entrenched with your neighbours because your neighbours' conduct does have an impact not only on your living space, which is true of any multi-unit or communal kind of living environment, but also in a condo the conduct of another condo owner could actually have a direct financial impact on you. Certainly, the ability to hold those owners who are causing damage and are incurring costs for all members of the condo association – a chargeback process sounds like it could be reasonable as long as it's not used in any kind of punitive way.

We know that sometimes in those situations tempers flare and there's a lot of emotion involved, and we want to make sure that things are handled fairly. I think, you know, again, that's a process that exists in other jurisdictions and Ontario, and that seems to be something that the condo owners and stakeholders are supportive of.

When I say condo owners, I should mention, you know, that I think the census data talks about that as of at least 2020 there are roughly half a million Albertans who own condos and live in condos. That's a significant portion of our population, so those kinds of changes that make the process better for those owners are important, and that's a good thing.

The Minister of Service Alberta also spoke to a couple of other small pieces, you know, provisions about who holds responsibility for doors and windows on the exteriors of units, from regulation to the legislation. Again, I don't necessarily think that that's controversial.

The reason why I support the referral amendment to send this back to committee is something that the Minister of Service Alberta seemed to kind of gloss over in his comments there at the end, which was about the dispute resolution process. You know, I'm happy he went into significant detail about the other changes, but I would argue that this issue of a dispute resolution process is a very significant one. In fact, Madam Speaker – don't take my word for it – it's actually something that we know that condo owner groups have spoken out about.

This idea of having a dispute resolution process to hear disputes between owners and between neighbours, essentially, because that's what we're talking about when we're talking about condo owners, having that ability to resolve those disputes through a resolution process, has been something that has been on the table and in active discussion since 2014, when this amendment act was first considered. That goes back now eight years. That is when that concept of setting up some kind of a dispute resolution process was first conceived.

I know that under the current provincial government they have been doing ongoing consultations on this issue. At least that's what the Minister of Service Alberta has said. I can provide some commentary that I know when the NDP was formerly in government, consultation was done on that piece. It's an incredibly important piece because we know that the failure to have a dispute resolution process leads to unnecessary and incredibly costly and then increasingly adversarial court processes. Having neighbours go to court against each other: those costs that are incurred in those situations can be significant.

First of all, to get to the point where somebody is even in a position to go to court means that, you know, there has been some significant conflict between condo owners in the same property. That's, of course, never a great thing, to be living in a situation where you're in deep conflict with your neighbour and sharing common space with them, potentially sharing walls with them. So getting to a point where the matter has to go to court – first of all, that's going to be prohibitive for many people, right? We simply know that the court process in general, especially civil litigation, is incredibly difficult for people to access, and it can be very costly.

Even when it's gone through that process, the resolution is often not very satisfactory. Apart from the fact that both condo owners might have incurred significant costs or groups of condo owners within one property are, you know, suing each other – not only is there that conflict, but the cost is significant, and then the outcome is rarely one that everybody is happy with. Unlike many other litigation disputes, when a condo litigation dispute goes poorly and the outcome is not satisfactory, those individuals often still have to continue living with each other and near each other, and that is not a great outcome for anybody. So this dispute resolution process is incredibly important.

I was quite surprised to hear the Minister of Service Alberta say that, you know, they didn't want to rush something through. Madam Speaker, I don't know how many times it's necessary for the Official Opposition and for Albertans to remind the government members that they are the government and have been for three years.

Member Irwin: You had the same minister for three years.

Ms Pancholi: Yeah. Granted, the same minister, which we can't say the same for some other ministries, but certainly with Service Alberta it's been one minister in place for three years.

It's interesting. I know perhaps, Madam Speaker, that the government members may forget sometimes that they're in government because there are too many other things going on, internal drama and soap operas. They forget that they're actually governing, but they are. The time is well past for this government to be blaming a previous government when they have been in this position for three years.

It's certainly not rushing it through. Again, as I mentioned, the idea of a dispute resolution process: well, consultation was going on under the former government, and the concept of it has been at least discussed since 2014, so that certainly is not a short period of time. Nobody is rushing anything through. Frankly, the Minister of Service Alberta said that, you know, certainly – I think the phrase he used was that this legislation was not designed for that. Well, he's the minister who designs the legislation. It certainly was within his power to draft legislation, to put forward to this House for consideration legislation that would have been designed to implement a dispute resolution process.

Again, Madam Speaker, as I said, this is not something that you need to take my word for. It is actually condominium owners' groups who are deeply disappointed. In fact, I'll point to Terry Gibson, the president of the Condo Owners Forum Society of Alberta, who indicated that the lack of a dispute resolution process in Bill 19 came as a, quote, big disappointment. He also said, by the way, quote, we've lost years by failing to do this now.

That's really an important point. If it's not being done now, Madam Speaker, when is this going to be done? Now, I know the Minister of Service Alberta tends to like to bring the same piece of legislation forward to this Assembly numerous times for amendment over and over and over again, but we don't know if there's any intention to once again bring condo legislation before this Assembly or when this Assembly may sit again or whether this government will be in power. In any event, we will have lost significant time that has already been lost by this government's failure to act. Again, that's, a quote from Mr. Gibson, a very poor decision. This is only going to make it harder for condo owners to resolve their disputes.

Again, I point to another organization. The Canadian Condominium Institute's north Alberta chapter president, Mr. Anand Sharma, commented that it's been urgent for a long time and that this is, quote, disappointing that they pulled the plug on it because that's not the solution; the solution is to work through these issues. I think that's an excellent point, Madam Speaker, that just because it's hard doesn't mean this government should shy away from doing it. It actually doesn't need to necessarily be that hard. There are other jurisdictions that have a dispute resolution process in place. Certainly, we have the opportunity to maybe learn from the models they have built, maybe make adjustments, of course, to reflect Alberta's circumstances, and do ongoing consultation, which apparently has been done. We've heard the Minister of Service Alberta talk about the lengthy consultation he has done. We know consultation began under the former government. How could those conversations have not resulted in a feasible dispute resolution process for condo owners?

I think what we're really seeing: this is not necessarily about the complexity of the issue, it's not about, as the minister would say, it being rushed through in a piece of legislation that's not designed for it, but this is really about cost. I think that's really why this government is not committed to doing this. It does require the government to put some money up front to help design the process.

Of course, certainly, there are mechanisms by which it would be a shared cost in terms of administering it and processing it. Condo owners could certainly have some kind of – associations could determine on some kind of a levy that goes into that. Certainly, if somebody is participating in that process, a condo owner, they could – as is typical in other resolution processes, there are filing fees. There are certain things that can be done so it doesn't have to be solely a cost that's borne by the government. Will it require some upfront cost? Probably. But as the minister has said, he's here to make, you know, life better for condo owners, and this is a significant issue that they have been asking this government to address for a very long time, for the entire three years to date of this government's term.

While I know that a number of condo association groups are supportive of the other changes in Bill 19, as I think many members of the opposition have expressed, certainly we believe that this is a significant enough issue around the dispute resolution process – and more importantly, condo owners are saying that it’s a significant enough issue – that this should go back to a committee for consultation to see whether or not we can come up with legislation that addresses the needs of condo owners by developing a condo owners’ dispute resolution process. That would truly make a difference, I believe, Madam Speaker, for condo owners, the 500,000 of them in this province who would very much appreciate a process that would keep them out of courts and help them resolve their disputes with their neighbours in a less costly way so that they can continue to live peacefully with their neighbours.

I think that’s worthy, Madam Speaker, of referring this matter to a committee, and I certainly hope that all of my colleagues and all of the members of this Assembly would support our amendment.

With that, I would like to move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 20 Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie on behalf of the minister.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It’s my pleasure to rise this evening to move second reading of Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, on behalf of the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

This act proposes a handful of housekeeping amendments intended to keep our province’s justice legislation up to date for Albertans. If passed, the amendments will make updates to the following: the Corrections Act, the Justice of the Peace Act, the Missing Persons Act, the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, and the Youth Justice Act.

Starting with the Corrections Act, Madam Speaker, we are looking at clarifying processes for the Alberta Parole Board. Right now Parole Board members’ remuneration is set in regulation. We are proposing to change it so that this is set by an order in council. This would make the process consistent with what is done for other Alberta government agencies, boards, and commissions. To be clear, we are not changing compensation rates for board members, just the tool the government uses to say what that remuneration is set at at any given time.

With respect to the Justice of the Peace Act for this legislation all we are proposing is to streamline the process to make justices of the peace – that’s a handful to say – part-time or full-time. Madam Speaker, instead of having to go through a time-consuming bureaucratic process of needing to take this request to cabinet and go through that process, we are recommending to simply let the Chief Judge, on their own accord, designate a JP as part-time or full-time. Not only would this simplify judicial administration processes, but it would make this process the same as what’s already being done for judges and masters in chambers. More importantly, it would allow the court to respond more quickly to caseload challenges as they arise.

Moving on to the Missing Persons Act, Madam Speaker, proposed administrative changes to the Missing Persons Act are meant to help the police complete tasks with minimal delay. Obviously, when a person is missing, time can be of the essence. To that end, proposed changes such as clarifying what information police can request and ensuring records can be requested before destruction would help them find missing persons more efficiently and complement the changes recently made to the regulation such as allowing remote applications for orders.

Next we’ll speak about the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act. The plan for this piece of legislation is to simply clean up some outdated wording and make the language more sensitive to grieving families. For example, the amendment would rename “death benefit” to “funeral expense reimbursement.” This is in response to stakeholder advice about using the term “benefit” when talking about criminal death of a loved one. It just seems insensitive, Madam Speaker. We’re also proposing changes to remove items that are no longer required, specifically references to the old Criminal Injuries Review Board and provisions that were only needed while a specific class-action settlement was completed. The settlement is now complete, so the board is longer needed.

With respect to the Youth Justice Act, the last legislation we are proposing changes to in this omnibus bill, Madam Speaker, for this act all we are suggesting is an update in wording to keep it in line with the changes the federal government made to Canada’s Criminal Code related to detaining and releasing young persons.

Taken together, the proposed changes demonstrate that as times progress and change, it’s important to do the work to keep Alberta’s legislation current and effective and relevant to the times. They show our government’s commitment to making sure Albertans can access justice across our province and that it remains strong, including taking the time to look after the smaller details. I hope all members will support these changes.

With that, I am pleased to move second reading on behalf of the minister, and I thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any members to join the debate? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I’m pleased to rise and speak to Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. As was just noted, this bill does a number of things, but I think what I would like to focus on is related to the victims of crime fund. Obviously, one of the reasons for that is that this is an issue that is near and dear to my heart.

I think, Madam Speaker, that the first thing I want to say is that what this bill is doing with the victims of crime fund in some way just sort of ensconces into legislation some parts of changes that were made previously. I don’t agree with the changes that were made previously. I think I’m on the record fairly extensively not agreeing with the changes that were made previously. Primary among them is the change that limits the ability to apply to 45 days. The reason I think that this is a problem is because many victims and, in particular, victims of sexual assault are never going to apply within 45 days. They’re not there yet. I think that’s sad, and I think it’s incredibly problematic.

I appreciate that the government has taken the money they appropriated from the victims’ fund and used it to fund what are otherwise good programs. Certainly, drug treatment court is a program that has proven extremely effective. I think it has a long track record of being effective. What I do not think, however, is that it ought to be funded at the expense of survivors of sexual assault. I think that these are individuals who have been through enough. I just fundamentally believe that it is wrong for the government to take funds that were earmarked for victims or survivors of various types of violence and funnel it to any other purpose.

I think that that is very problematic, especially in light of the fact – what Albertans may not know is some background on the victims of crime fund. It usually comes in by way of a surcharge on various offences. The vast majority of money flowing into the fund actually comes from traffic tickets. People pay their ticket, and on the ticket is a victim fine surcharge. I think it's reasonable, if the government is not going to fund in any other way programs to support victims, that this should go forward.

The government made changes previously. Those changes altered the victims' fund and allowed the funds to be used for other reasons. Again, the things that the government is funding out of this are good things. I just think the government should be funding them out of revenue and leaving the victims' fund for victims. My understanding is that some of it goes to ALERT, also an excellent program that does very, very good work.

In fact, I think that probably my first extensive lobbying experience was with respect to ALERT when we were first elected. The PCs had – I don't know if they had cut its funding or were set to cut it. I can't remember exactly what it was they had done, but when I arrived in the minister's office, a number of folks had been, I think, prepared for my arrival, and the lobbying started pretty much immediately on this. And they were right. It is an organization that does very good work. It's a good model. It's actually a model that should be replicated in many different ways.

No one is denying what they're doing with the funds. That is my point. The challenge is that the result of that is that it was only possible to use that money in other ways because they knew that survivors wouldn't be accessing it. This doesn't just go for survivors of sexual assault. It goes for victims of any sort of crime. If they don't apply within 45 days, they don't get it.

There's also been a significant diminishment in the amount of benefits that can be achieved. For instance, the fund will now pay funeral expenses, but it won't necessarily pay to, say, certain family members, like children of a murder victim, which is not a choice I agree with. I think that those children deserve that money. I think that survivors of sexual assault deserve that money. It wasn't a great deal of money.

What this legislation does is that it finishes the disestablishment of what is called the Criminal Injuries Review Board. Now, the Criminal Injuries Review Board did an interesting thing. Their work was very – essentially, they assessed, based on various factors, what had happened to the victim in the particular instance, how much financial reimbursement they were entitled to. It wasn't lofty compensation. You know, often people who were very badly injured in an assault would get, like, $10,000, something like that, for a sexual assault. It wasn't a huge amount of money. You rarely saw awards over $20,000. Basically, what it did was that it allowed people to take a few days off work to recover, to pay for some counselling to deal with the trauma.

I mean, a lot of people don't interact with crime in their daily lives. A lot of people have the good fortune, I guess, to walk around and not worry about getting hurt, about someone beating you up or stealing your purse or sexually assaulting you. After that happens, your ability to interact with society changes. A lot of people are sort of permanently fearful in certain situations. It impacts the way they carry on their lives, what they're able to do, what they're able to enjoy socially, what they're able to do for work. It impacts future relationships. It impacts every aspect of their life. I feel like cutting them off from this very small amount of money, to which they would otherwise have been entitled, is just incredibly wrong.

The Criminal Injuries Review Board is de-established here now. The disestablishment started in the previous legislation. The reason that the Criminal Injuries Review Board had to be continued is that there was an outstanding court case. The government – not this one, not ours, a previous government, and not the government itself but people on behalf of the government – had essentially failed to apply for benefits through the victims of crime fund for children that were in care, benefits to which those children would otherwise have been entitled. There was a class-action lawsuit arising, and it was found in favour of the plaintiffs.

The order was that the plaintiffs had to apply first to the victims of crime fund, and then there would be a secondary fund that was set up by the government if they were declined. So the Criminal Injuries Review Board essentially had to be continued for the length of time that that case was ongoing, so until such time as those probably now adults but at the time dependent children – the government hadn't applied on their behalf – had an opportunity to apply to the fund, that the fund could make a decision, and then, you know, they could either go to the other compensation or not.

This just finishes that process, but I think it's a sad day to see that process finished, because it means that that is the end. That is the end of the fund. That is the end of people's ability to apply to that fund. I'm actually somewhat surprised to see that, because some of the other changes are just sort of terminology changes, but they kind of put permanently in place the changes the government made, which is confusing to me, Madam Speaker. I know the government did consultations, extensive consultations, consultations which were, in my opinion, quite well done on this matter. I was in some of those consultations – I was fortunate enough to be invited – and I heard what people said. I heard what police said. I heard what agencies who normally support victims had to say. They were not happy with the changes. They thought that there were a number of changes that could be made to reverse the changes that the UCP made when they first came in.

I'm deeply curious about what happened. Those consultations were done. They were well done. I presume – I don't know if a report was prepared. I don't know if a report was laid before the minister. I don't know if it ever came out. I think, probably, a lot of people wonder what ever happened to that piece of work.

I'm just a little surprised to see the government coming back here and sort of finalizing those changes because I was hopeful of a different outcome. I think a lot of people were hopeful of a different outcome, an outcome where victims could apply to the fund, where they would have additional financial benefits, an outcome where that 45-day time limit was removed. I myself had the opportunity to do extensive consultations on this issue in particular because when we were in government, we brought forward a bill to remove the limitation period for survivors of sexual assaults and other forms of sexual abuse, which at the time was two years, so the limitation period was two years from when the person knew or ought to know, with an ultimate limitation period of 10 years.

I consulted specifically on what the journey of many survivors was, and one of the things that I think came up over and over again is that everybody has their own journey. Everybody has their own way that they process an experience like that. It isn't really subject to an arbitrary time frame in that way, so the advice was that we remove the time frame, and that's what we did. And that is the advice I would give to the government in this instance, to remove the time frame, because 45 days – like, two years wasn't enough. Forty-five days is definitely not enough.

I think one of the other things I heard loud and clear from survivors was that in a lot of cases they had choice taken away from them in a very fundamental way, in one of the most fundamental ways that a choice can be taken from you, and we should give them all of the choices about how they deal with that that we possibly can.

I think it's incredibly problematic to see that this bill is coming forward, which is an otherwise procedural bill, that essentially puts permanence, I guess, to the changes that were made. I had hoped that what we would see was a bill that fixed some of the problems that arose. Yeah. You know, according to the government page up there on this issue, it is still the case that that 45 days is in place. I think that's troubling because even – like, it's clearly and obviously problematic for survivors of sexual assault. I think it's probably problematic for a lot of other victims, too.

I think survivors of a domestic assault are probably – you know, when a woman or a man or any person makes the decision to leave an abusive partnership, there is a lot to deal with. Potentially there are children. Potentially there are pets. There are leases. There are joint bank accounts. There's a lot. I think people, rightly, focus on what is in front of them, on putting one foot in front of the other, on doing the best that they can, so they don't necessarily apply immediately, and 45 days is a pretty short time frame. I think people are still potentially processing what has happened to them.

I mean, it's often the case that survivors of sexual and domestic violence don't report at all. When they do report, which is the minority, it's definitely – I mean, the one thing we know for certain from the statistics is that it is the minority of cases that are reported at all. It's not necessarily immediate, so – I don't know. I feel like at this point I'm shouting into the wind a little. I feel like the government did consultations. They went out and talked to the victim support workers, who are on the ground, who are dealing with this. They went out and talked to front-line police and police governance, who deal with this every single day, and they heard the message loud and clear.

So I don't suppose that me saying it is going to change that, but I think it's worth putting it on the record, because I think that if even one survivor hears that at least one person in this place thinks that their inability to access this fund after 45 days is extremely problematic, that's at least something.

Let's see. Yeah. That's my primary concern with this bill. I would say that other than that, the changes appear to me to be administrative changes, changes to align the legislation with other federal legislation. That's very common. Governments do that all the time. There is actually a lot of work of government that doesn't really come to the attention of the public. It's important work, but there it is. Those things all seem fine, in my estimation: changes to the Corrections Act, the Justice of the Peace Act, Missing Persons Act.

It is really just this one set of changes, I think, that troubles me, because it sort of does indicate, or at least it indicates to me, that the government doesn't seem to be looking to implement the changes that arose out of those consultations. I mean, it's important to do consultation. I'm glad that consultation occurred. It feels a little like those consultations were essentially political cover because nothing happened.

I believe that there are at least some members in the government caucus who don't agree with the fact that nothing happened as a result of that. I think that there are at least some members in the government caucus who would like to have seen those changes, because I know that some members of the government caucus care deeply about this issue. I hope – it is my sincere hope that somewhere something is occurring that will alter that and that we will see changes and that we will see greater support for victims and that we will see the victims of crime fund going to victims of crime.

Yes. Was there anything else I wanted to add on this bill? Yeah. I guess that pretty much sums it up. Most of this is administrative. Most of it seems fine. I wish deeply and sincerely that the government would reconsider their course of action with respect to the victims of crime fund. That is what I have to say about that.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any members wishing to join the debate on Bill 20? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. I'll try and follow the former Justice minister. I'll try and be clear and succinct about what I think about this act as well. As the previous speaker was just saying, different aspects of this statutes amendment act before us, like the Corrections Act, the Justice of the Peace Act, the Missing Persons Act, and the Youth Justice Act. I'm going back many years. I think the Young Offenders Act has been changed. The title has been changed.

Those changes – as I was listening to the mover on behalf of the Justice minister talk about housekeeping amendments, I wouldn't disagree with those four in particular, but the one in particular that I would disagree with is the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, I think.

Going back to my years as a social worker, many, many years ago I was involved with the Youth Justice Act, called the Young Offenders Act at that point in time, and involved with counselling many individuals, families, and community and speaking to the victims part of this. I know that it took a long time, and I don't think it was because of my particular, you know, skill level as a social worker. I think many people just took a long time to address their needs because of the weight of the conditions they were living in. Many of those individuals had left violent situations and were setting themselves up in new circumstances with their children, single parents often. They were moving on to an extent, but they weren't totally feeling like they had everything together. They were just, really, surviving at that point in time. I and my colleagues would do what we could to assist, make their lives better, support children in those situations, get them into schools, ensure they had the necessities of life: food, shelter. In time often those living situations would get better, but that was in time.

Just as my colleague before me was talking about, the 45-day cut-off for taking action under the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, it seems totally unreasonable to continue to perpetrate that kind of situation on Albertans. I know, from this side, that when the Minister of Justice is questioned in question period about this sort of thing, our critic brings up the inadequacy of the current program and the fact that it was changed by the current government and the fact that it doesn't meet the needs of Albertans.

The monies that are there for victims of crime now are diverted to other, as my colleague was saying, good programs. But those good programs should be experiencing the funding not through the money out of the ticket revenue for victims or other places, but they should be funded from the government. The fact that they're not and that victims are given short shrift in this regard is a reason why I will oppose this legislation.

I think, also, the points that were made in opposition here need to be briefly underlined again. I know that when changes were made to the victims of crime fund initially, many, many stakeholders – probably a better word is Albertans who were victims of assault – came forward to say how disappointed they were that the changes were being made by the government. Person after person after person, victim after victim after victim came forward, at probably great distress to themselves, to be reliving some of their darkest hours in front of the public, to say how wrong this approach was, and they were not given any satisfaction by the government. The monies that obviously, we have been saying, should support victims are now being directed in other places, and victims and their children are lesser for it. We put forward amendments at the time to change that, and they were voted down by the government. I want to say as clearly as I can that this is a continuation of the wrong-headed approach of the government, and I won't be supporting it in any fashion.

I would like to adjourn debate on this now. Thank you.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

8:30 Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 15 Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022

The Chair: Are there members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Sorry. I'm just trying to remember. Is it 15 or 20?

The Chair: We're on Bill 15.

Ms Hoffman: Sorry. Debate time.

The Chair: Oh. You have 20 minutes.

Ms Hoffman: Twenty. Perfect.

I think I'll actually start by introducing an amendment and keeping the remainder of my time to explain the amendment. I will pass those through to you, Madam Chair, through the page. When you're ready, I'm happy to read it into the record.

The Chair: Just one minute.

Hon. members, this will be known as amendment A1.

Hon. member, please proceed to read it into the record.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Through you I move that the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022, be amended as follows: (a) in the proposed section 225.8 (i) in subsection (2) by striking out "The Minister may appoint" and substituting "Subject to subsection (2.1), the Minister may appoint" and (ii) by adding the following immediately after subsection (2):

(2.1) At least half of the panel members appointed under subsection (2) must be recommended by The Alberta Teacher's Association.

(b) in the proposed section 225.9 (i) in subsection (1)(b) by striking out "in accordance with the regulations" and substituting "in accordance with subsection (2.1) and the regulations"; (ii) in subsection (2)(a) by striking out "in accordance with the regulations" and substituting "in accordance with subsection (2.1) and the regulations"; and (iii) by adding the following immediately after subsection (2):

(2.1) At least half of the committee members appointed under subsections (1)(b) or (2)(a) must be panel members appointed in accordance with section 225.8(2.1).

A little bit of rationale here, through you, Madam Chair. This really does come back to the rationale that the Premier and the Education minister have been using for quite some time in arguing their significant changes to the way teachers are led and disciplinary issues are handled. There have been a few different social media campaigns, and one did a comparator between other provinces and explained that Alberta was an outlier, and another did a comparator between other professions. You might remember that there was a list of scrolling professions going by on the screen that were governed differently than how teachers were governed within the province of Alberta.

Understandably, many people were looking into those types of professions. Many of them I am very familiar with, having been part of the appointment process for the College of Physicians & Surgeons or College of Registered Nurses of Alberta, for example, and every other health profession that is so governed in the province of Alberta. Knowing that for these types of colleges that govern the profession – and I'm not saying that the minister is creating a college. But colleges were what was used as the justification through all of the public campaigns as to why the model needed to change.

The thing that is very different, though, about what is being proposed by the minister and by the current government is that the model that's being proposed is unlike any other profession in the province of Alberta in that the minister, through the current bill, will appoint through cabinet one individual to be the person that brings these recommendations forward to the minister for final decision. Final decision is currently already with the minister, but it's currently a disciplinary issue led by the ATA that does that. So instead of the ATA doing it, the minister is now selecting one employee, essentially through the department, to bring forward these recommendations.

To go back to the original arguments as presented by the Premier, the minister, and many members of the UCP, they said that teachers should be governed in accordance with the fact that they are a profession and with other professions in mind. I have to say that we did absolutely check on a number of other professions. I'm just going to highlight a couple because I think we're probably erring on the side of the minister having still more influence on who is part of the recommendation process than other comparable professions within the province of Alberta.

If I'm to look at the College of Physicians & Surgeons, for example, there are eight elected doctors who are part of that and seven public representatives as appointed by the Minister of Health through OIC, and then there are four university reps or observers. In this situation the majority still are physicians who are governing disciplinary recommendations as it relates to physicians and surgeons, eight versus seven.

In terms of the Law Society of Alberta there are 24 individuals: 20 are elected lawyers, and four are public representatives, again, appointed by government through order in council, very different than having one person appointed to oversee the process as is outlined currently in the bill.

In terms of APEGA there are a few different disciplinary committees, but the biggest one: the disciplinary committee has 10 members selected by APEGA, selected by engineers, and one public member appointed by the government of Alberta.

Then for social workers: for example, for the hearing tribunals there are two members from the college – social workers – and one public member from the government of Alberta.

So for all of these professions the majority of those who are making the recommendations around disciplinary decisions are actually members of that profession, not government appointees. One sole government appointee is definitely an extreme example and for good reason, through you, Madam Chair. Of course, if the Law Society, which determines which lawyers are in and which lawyers are out and have the right to continue practising in the profession, was governed by one lawyer, the current Minister of Justice, I think that there would be huge red flags of concern raised by members of the public as there are regularly complaints brought forward to the Law Society about the minister themselves. So having the minister in charge of the determination of who's in and who's out through a one-person appointment certainly would be a breach of most people's sense of common sense and understanding.

I also have to say that regularly we see feedback from the public through public opinion polls and such about who you trust with making decisions around different professions. In health I will say that, you know, of course, the number one and number two trusted professionals are my doctor – my personal doctor is usually number one, and nurses are number two. Doctors in general are a little bit lower down the list, but generally it's the people that they have the relationship with or who they trust the most about the functioning of the health care system and then, of course, nurses.

I'm confident that it is the same when it comes to the education system. We've seen significant concern raised by, generally, members of the public about the lack of partnership and respect when it comes to the role that teachers play in the education system. I think the government could demonstrate that they are actually trying to do what they laid out as their original opening arguments when they launched this significant change to the way the teaching profession is governed by actually accepting this amendment even though there were many – it wasn't a short amendment. There's really one thing it does, and that one thing it does is say that the folks who are making the decisions about who is allowed to teach and who is not allowed to teach: half of those should actually be teachers, folks recommended by teachers to be on that decision body.

Again, that doesn't mean that the government can't have a significant role. The government absolutely should, much like the case with College of Physicians & Surgeons, where there are eight elected doctors and seven appointed public representatives. A similar model would meet the terms outlined through this amendment, creating that opportunity. You might notice that I haven't proposed any changes to the fact that the minister is the ultimate decision-maker. At the end of the day, it would still be a recommendation, but instead of it being a recommendation by one person – an employee, an appointee, a direct appointee by the Minister of Education – it would be a panel that included majority teachers. That would be far more consistent with other professions within the province of Alberta.

I also want to say that the other piece that I highlighted earlier, that there were comparators done to other provinces – this probably is closely aligned with one other province, but there are many more than one other province in this country, of course. I'll just maybe touch on two others: Saskatchewan, which has an independent regulatory board, which, of course, is self-governed, and then, of course, in Ontario they continue to have a college that both invites and appoints. I believe that is a mix, again, of the profession and government appointees.

Back to the crux of the original argument that the government used for why they were bringing forward such significant changes to the way the profession is governed, it is that they wanted teachers to be governed in a similar fashion to other professionals here in the province of Alberta, and that is definitely not what's being proposed through the bill in its current form. That's why we've addressed this one change that I think could give a greater sense of confidence to the people of Alberta when it comes to trusting the process around recommendations.

There are many people who feel that the government is showing a lack of concern and respect for teachers and the teaching profession. The number of teachers who approached me to talk about concerns around their safety and well-being, the curriculum, their teaching conditions, the fact that they for the last two years have been teaching in incredibly difficult times, trying to find ways to manage increased educational and mental health needs for students in their schools – I don't think that there is anyone who feels that their school is in a healthier place now than it was, you know, three years ago or four years ago, Madam Chair.

I think that this would at least show a little bit of respect to the profession in saying: "We are going to welcome you to appoint people to help make these decisions about the profession, just like we do for nurses and doctors and social workers and lawyers. We will not assume that the minister knows best on the minister's own." I think that that is something that would be well received by teachers and also, I would say, by most people in general, especially those who are currently governed by some kind of joint governance model around discipline, as we've highlighted through some of the comparators that I just laid out.

So I am hoping that that was enough time for colleagues across the way to consider what is being brought forward here with good intent to try to meet the government at a halfway point, to propose something that I think would bring greater trust and greater confidence to the process that the minister is proposing here. Knowing that we're in committee and that I can possibly respond at a later point, maybe I'll cede the remainder of my time so that the minister and other colleagues can respond to the recommendation and the amendment that we've brought forward here through you, Madam Chair.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on the amendment? The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the amendment coming forward. I do believe that what the member opposite was really looking for is transparency, accountability within the system, and what we have said all along is that we really want to be transparent. We want to be accountable, and we want to ensure that the bias and any perceived bias are taken out of the system, so under the office of the commissioner, when there is a hearing committee required, when there is a panel that needs to be put together, we have that ability under regulation to make sure that the commissioner is able to appoint that panel. Of course, there will be regulation stipulating that there will be teachers and there will be public members on that panel and that the commissioner, similar to the way it functions right now with the executive secretary of the ATA or the registrar putting together, depending on whether it's a teacher that falls under the ATA – of course, as you know, we have a dual system. That is what we're looking to eliminate, that dual system, that we only have one process for disciplinary matters for all teachers, teacher leaders, and that is certainly what we're looking to do.

I don't find it surprising that the members opposite would bring forward this amendment because it really does, by stipulating the Alberta Teachers' Association, speak to their friends, their union friends, and this is not what we're about. We're not about ensuring that the union has more control and input into this process. We're about making sure that the union stays out of the control and input into the process. It's really about making sure that the process is unbiased, that it's fair, and that it runs smoothly. There will be the ability for the commissioner and their office to make sure that when they comprise a panel for whatever hearing may need to take place, there are public members and teachers.

I'll just remind the members opposite that not all teachers belong to the Alberta Teachers' Association and definitely not all superintendents, because they will now belong under the CASS legislation. They belong to the College of Alberta School Superintendents. As well, there are teachers that are in charter schools, independent schools, First Nations schools, and ECSs that do not belong to the Alberta Teachers' Association. So to recommend and approve this amendment would in fact negate all those voices being on the panel. Anyone who wants to apply to be on those committees, those panels, that panel roster certainly can go through the process and make sure that their voice is heard there.

For all of those reasons I would recommend to my colleagues that we not vote in favour of this particular amendment. Thank you.

Ms Hoffman: The challenge is that what's different from what the minister is saying and what's being proposed – the reason why I put the Alberta Teachers' Association is because it's an elected body, and with the other professions outlined, they are elected. Their doctors elect who they want to have on the College of Physicians & Surgeons. The Law Society elects who they want to have as benchers, and the list goes on. What the minister just said is that the minister will choose teachers. That is a very different process than how other professions are treated in this province. The reason why we proposed the ATA is because it was an elected body.

I certainly would welcome the minister bringing forward an amendment that ensured that these were elected, not hand-picked solely by one individual. The biggest problem with the argument being laid out as it is currently by the minister is that the minister is choosing who the employee within the department is. The minister is choosing who the representatives will be on the panel, and it doesn't give the same level of trust and confidence that we see with other professions where they are elected representatives. So I sincerely hope that the minister – if the minister doesn't like the way I'm recommending elected individuals be appointed, then I would like the minister to propose a different election process. But simply to say, "Trust us," when trust has been at record lows, I think, does not give greater confidence to the people of Alberta.

That's why I proposed a model that would have elected representatives be a part of this decision-making process rather than solely appointees by the minister. Again, the College of Physicians & Surgeons elects physicians to be part of the disciplinary committees. The Law Society is governed by elected benchers. The vast majority – there are a number of appointed individuals by government, but this is completely different from those models that have been used as an argument that there should be a model more consistent with other professions.

But, clearly, that isn't the way the government is actually responding to teachers in what the government is actually proposing because they are refusing to allow elected representatives of that profession to actually be a part of making recommendations, still to the minister. The minister still controls the ultimate decision-making power and, through my amendment, would still have the ability to have just one fewer than the number of elected teacher representatives making the decision. So I hope that the minister is either willing to bring forward a subamendment to the amendment that I proposed or an alternate amendment because, definitely, the bill in its current form, I think, doesn't pass the nod test around trust and accountability.

This was one idea I had. I certainly welcome others from the minister or any other member of the government who would like to bring forward a greater level of transparency and accountability through a model that actually reflects the same level of respect for teachers as we have for other professionals in the province of Alberta. The current bill does not do that in its current form.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Madam Chair. I would beg to differ with the member opposite. In fact, the Alberta Teachers' Association, should they want their members to be part of those panels, can certainly recommend that they put their names forward, similar to – we have that happening in so many other areas. Nothing prevents them from ensuring that their membership is made aware of these committees, similar to the way it happens right now, and they can put their names forward in that way. We do not need to enshrine it in legislation. I believe the legislation, the way it is written, is accurate and fair and accomplishes what we look to accomplish.

I have the utmost respect for teachers, and I can tell you that I've heard from many teachers who have come to me personally and said, "This is so needed," so many administrators as well who have said, "This legislation will in fact help because I haven't been able to report something that I felt needed to be reported because I felt there would be conflict within my profession and just the way the code of conduct, et cetera, is put forward." So, again, I do not feel that the amendment that has been brought forward is necessary.

I believe the – you know, I give kudos to my department. They have done tremendous work in ensuring that this piece of legislation meets what we're wanting to do, fulfills the role that we want it to fill in ensuring that we have an accountable, transparent, and timely process to deal with all teacher discipline issues, whether they are teachers that are under the Alberta Teachers' Association or teachers that fall outside of the Alberta Teachers' Association. We have both. We will have one streamlined process for all.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to speak to amendment A1?

Seeing none, I will call the question. [interjection] Oh, my apologies. I've got a blind spot there. The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. You know, I want to say that I've really enjoyed listening to both sides of the House as we've talked through this amendment. There's no doubt that this is worthy of consideration but I'm not sure worthy of support. At the end of the day, one of things I think I liked about this bill was that there are currently teachers that are not a part of that discipline – we've got different discipline processes depending on where you are, whether you're a charter school or an independent school or part of the public system.

So I think that the minister probably makes a good point. I think we probably should leave this in the hands of the commissioner to be looking at the panel and how it should be organized. Each of the situations is going to be unique, whether we're talking about professional conduct or whether we're talking about teacher capacity, you know, whether they've met the qualifications for the TQS. So I think there's a wisdom in letting the commissioner have the capacity to decide what is a body of their peers and who should be a part of that panel. Putting a number – half have to come from the ATA – may not do justice to that particular situation. So I think I would – like I say, I believe this was worthy of consideration. I'm just not sure it's worthy of support.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to the amendment?

Seeing none, I will call the question on amendment A1.

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Chair: We are back – well, we never left Committee of the Whole.

The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Madam Chair. It is my honour to rise and speak to Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022. Unlike members of the opposition, who spent a significant amount of their time during second reading not focusing on the specifics of this bill and instead making excuses for their union friends, I will spend my time further unpacking it for the members of this House.

Madam Chair, Albertans have raised concerns about the ATA playing both a union and a disciplinary role for its members and the potential for conflicts of interest that can arise due to the dual role. Bill 15 will restructure who is responsible for teacher discipline in Alberta, create a single, streamlined process, and separate discipline processes from advocacy functions. This will secure the best interests of students, the public, and the profession itself. Bill 15 would see a teacher profession commissioner appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council to operate at arm's length from Alberta's government.

To be absolutely clear, Bill 15 would not give the Minister of Education the ability to influence or control the commissioner in the course of their duties or those of the commissioner's office. Under the new proposed discipline model in Bill 15 all complaints would be received by the registrar at Alberta Education and referred to the commissioner, not the minister, for further action. The office of the teaching profession commissioner would review the complaint and determine the appropriate next steps. The complaint would be investigated, referred to mediation or dispute resolution, or dismissed. If an investigation takes place, the commissioner would be required to render a further independent decision to: one, dismiss the complaint if warranted; or, two, consider entering into a consent resolution agreement or refer the matter to a hearing or choose the dispute resolution option.

In cases where the expedited process to cancel a certificate must be considered for prescribed indictable offences under the Criminal Code that threaten student safety, the commissioner must also decide if a recommendation to the minister should consider cancellation of a certificate or a referral to the hearing committee to recommend a penalty to the minister instead. This is about improving accountability, transparency, and timeliness in the teacher discipline process, full stop.

Mr. Chair, a commissioner model would balance the need for an impartial and fair process with the government's desire to increase oversight to protect students and the public interest. This legislation demonstrates that Alberta's government is putting students first. Albertans deserve greater accountability, transparency, and timeliness in the teacher discipline process and so do teachers. Bill 15 would bring Alberta's teacher discipline process in line with other provinces.

Alberta is the only Canadian province where the teachers' union has the sole responsibility for overseeing complaints of alleged unprofessional conduct and professional incompetence filed against their own union members. That's why the teacher discipline process must be improved with Bill 15. We have one goal with this bill, Mr. Chair: to have an effective and efficient teacher discipline process by using a single legislative structure to govern matters of discipline under one organization, regardless of where teachers are employed or their membership status in a professional association.

Simply put, Mr. Chair, this new discipline model would ensure that all teachers and teacher leaders, including superintendents, are subject to the same disciplinary system. By eliminating the conflict of interest where a union could advocate for its members while also overseeing disciplinary matters, Bill 15 would also bring Alberta in line with other regulated professions such as nurses. Alberta's government is extremely proud of the more than 50,000 hard-working and dedicated teachers and teacher leaders across our great province. Bill 15 is about further protecting students, not punishing the vast majority of Alberta's incredible teachers.

Mr. Chair, Alberta Education will ensure an effective and smooth transition to the new model while ensuring procedural fairness in dealing with current complaints. My department is committed to supporting the education system to make this transition as smooth as possible. This work was not done in a vacuum. We engaged with key stakeholders and education partners in February to hear their perspectives, including meeting with the ATA as well as other education partners and victim advocacy groups. The discussions we had were rich and nuanced, and I cannot thank all of the participants enough for their time and their attention. They were remarkable.

Since we tabled Bill 15, we've received very positive responses from the victim advocacy groups. For instance, Debra Tomlinson, CEO of the Association of Alberta Sexual Assault Services, said that they support efforts to streamline professional regulation, transparency and accountability utilizing an external review process for all professionals who are in positions of power and authority across all of our institutions and systems.

Sheldon Kennedy, the cofounder of Respect Group, said:

I applaud the government's efforts to reform the discipline process used in Alberta schools. Professions and organizations all across North America are modernizing and refining their policies and processes to ensure they are unbiased, support victims and ensure transparency for the public. I'm pleased to see Alberta's education system doing the same.

Our education partners, including the College of Alberta School Superintendents, the Association of Independent Schools and Colleges in Alberta, and the Association of Alberta Public Charter Schools, have all said that they support this legislation. Mr. Chair, this is significant. Even the Alberta Teachers' Association can acknowledge some changes may be beneficial. It seems that the opposition is the only group unwilling to put students first.

Bill 15 was informed by the best practices in Canada. We looked to Ontario and Saskatchewan, who both have self-governed professional regulatory organizations that issue teaching certificates and oversee matters of professional discipline for their teacher members. But they also have no union functions. We also looked at British Columbia, who dismantled their teachers college in 2011, which resulted in the creation of a commissioner's office, that has been successful for them. In all other provinces and territories the provincial or territorial government is responsible for issuing teaching certificates and also plays a varying role in overseeing teacher discipline processes.

Mr. Chair, we found that there are additional checks and balances in place for many of these jurisdictions such as adjudicative committees comprised of teachers and public members or commissioners who operate at arm's length but have accountabilities to the Minister of Education in carrying out disciplinary functions. This new model would not impact the current professional development role of the Alberta Teachers' Association or the College of Alberta School Superintendents. Bill 15 would give them more opportunity to focus on these important functions.

Mr. Chair, this model would also not impact the ATA's role as it pertains to collective bargaining. Bill 15 would also see the Alberta Teachers' Association and the College of Alberta School Superintendents continue to focus on other member-focused services and advocacy. This bill would ensure that members from the teaching profession continue to play an important role in the disciplinary process by serving on hearing and appeal committees, conducting dispute resolutions and mediation processes where appropriate, as the members opposite were just asking for. All committee members would serve on the professional conduct and competency general panel, that would have a chair and a vice-chair, who would then select both teachers and public members from the panel roster to serve on hearing and appeal committees as needed.

Again, to reiterate for the House and particularly for the members opposite, the chair and the vice-chair would make decisions on the composition of hearing and appeal committees, not the Minister of Education. Where a teacher or teacher leader does not agree with a hearing or appeal committee's decision or the minister's decision, the ability to file for a judicial review is still available. These are all elements that ensure procedural fairness in the process.

Mr. Chair, Bill 15 is about the Legislature doing everything we can to ensure that the public and parents know that we have accountability and transparency when it comes to teacher discipline.

That being said, Mr. Chair, I have an amendment that I want to introduce. I want to make the House aware that since tabling Bill 15, it has come to my attention that minor amendments will be required to address editorial errors and adjustments that are necessary to ensure effective proclamation dates for Bill 15. These are technical amendments that adjust the timing of the coming into force of the legislation; they are not a shift in policy or in the intent of this bill.

Mr. Chair, I look forward to the questions that will come my way, and now I would like to table an amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Just for clarity, if you want to hand off the copies of the amendment there and just wait a moment until we get a copy here at the table, and then I'll give more instructions.

For the purposes of debate, this will be referred to as amendment A2.

The hon. minister can continue, with about 10 minutes still remaining should you choose to take it.

Member LaGrange: Thank you. With amendment A2 to Bill 15, Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022, as indicated, the bill is amended as follows: (a) section 11(b) is amended by striking out subclause (ii) and substituting the following:

(ii) by repealing clause (a);

(ii.1) by repealing clauses (d), (e) and (f);

(b) section 12 is amended in the proposed section 225.99994(2)(g) by striking out "the The" and substituting "The"; (c) section 15(2) is amended by striking out ", (aa)"; (d) section 18 is struck out and the following is substituted:

(18) Sections 2(a) and (b), 3, 4, 7(c) to (e), 9, 11(b)(ii.1), (iii) and

(iv), 12 to 14 and 17 come into force on Proclamation.

Again, these are very technical errors – obviously, a double "the" in one line – just in the formatting, nothing substantive here to change. I encourage all of my colleagues to vote in favour of this amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you.

Are there any members looking to join debate on amendment A2? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair, and thank you to the minister and the team for ensuring that we could have a chance to look at this and confirm what the minister has said, which is that, clearly, there were just some numbering errors and a couple of instances where a word was duplicated. We have a chance, while this bill is open right now, to fix those, and therefore I'll be supporting the amendment and encouraging my colleagues to do so as well.

What I wish had been done, though, is that there were some actual amendments to address the primary causes that parents, educators, teachers, educational assistants, school leaders, teacher leaders, bus drivers, custodians, everyone who's working in education as well as, of course, students and their families have been raising as some of their key issues as it relates to education. It's not every day we have an opportunity to debate an education bill, and it would be great if in this bill we were doing something to address the significant concerns that Albertans have raised across the board with regard to curriculum, the significant concerns that have been raised about class size, and the fact that there are fewer teachers now according to the government's own budget documents. When you compare the last NDP budget to the most recent budget under the UCP, about a thousand fewer teachers now than there were under previous NDP governments, and of course we know that educational needs are going up, particularly as many families have faced significant hardships over the last few years and the yo-yo effect between schools being open and closed and open and closed.

I know that everyone wants schools to be able to stay open consistently as we continue to move forward, and I'm continuing to hear pressures around staffing as it relates to illness caused by COVID-19 in schools. I wish that the government was doing something in an education bill to address some of the design changes that could be made, including increased filtration in schools and creating safer opportunities for kids to learn consistently in school. Really, what we in this province have experienced over the last two and a half years has been incredibly unfair to ordinary Alberta families.

I wish that the government was addressing curriculum, class sizes, COVID, the supports that students with disabilities need. Disabled students have suffered significantly under this current government's leadership, particularly when I look at some of the youngest Albertans and some of the oldest Albertans who are in school, losing funding for years 4 and 5 of high school for those who need it, primarily students who are dealing with a number of pressures in their home lives and often disabilities, and children, of course, in the earliest years who relied on PUF funding. Of course, the funding for kindergarten has been eliminated under PUF.

It is these types of things that I wish the government was addressing tonight through education legislation, but the numbering errors and the odd replacement of a duplication of a word: I'm fine to support this amendment as proposed by the minister. I really wish we were discussing some of the other significant issues that families, students, staff, and families have been raising with us, and I'm sure it's not just with me. I'm sure they're raising them with the minister as well.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you very much.

Are there any members?

Member LaGrange: I thank the hon. member for supporting the amendment and acknowledging that it is really just minor errors in drafting that were needing to be corrected. I heard the hon. member wishing for many things, nothing that had to do with the bill, but I do want to assure the hon. member that wishes do come true, because, in fact, we have been dealing with all of the concerns that she has brought forward in terms of curriculum, ensuring that we had the most robust engagement process across this province, and we have a curriculum that is going to be implemented in September that is research and science based and that really is reinforced by all of the terrific engagement that we have received.

We also have close to – no, over $1 billion that we will be adding to the Education budget over the course of the next three years and looking at making sure that we have $700 million added to the base funding and operational funding for school authorities as well as $191 million over three years for curriculum implementation, an additional $110 million over three years, again, for mental health and wellness and supports for students that have fallen behind because of COVID.

When we look at special needs, last year I was happy to have announced an additional $40 million in that funding envelope, which sits at well over half a billion dollars to support our schools and our most vulnerable, and that's not even mentioning the $45 million that we did add on top of the funding that we provided last year – I should say in this current school year – for the learning disruption loss. I'm hearing great things on how those dollars have been used to ensure that students are catching up.

I do thank the member opposite for supporting this amendment, and I guess the fact that the lack of concern in terms of the actual substantive issues around the bill indicates that we probably got it right, so I am thankful for that and really appreciate all the support. I look forward to everyone voting in favour of this amendment and then moving forward with the rest of this bill process.

Thank you.

9:30

The Deputy Chair: Thank you very much, hon. minister.

Prayers

The Acting Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideals but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate May 3: Member Ceci]

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to join debate on second reading? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall has risen.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. This bill seems to be making a few changes to justice acts. Some of them seem pretty straightforward, as the government claims. They are mostly housekeeping, and I will speak to those changes as well. But we have obviously more challenges in the justice system that this government has done nothing to address.

One thing that we do take issue with is that this bill is legislating the changes that government made to the victims of crime fund by taking supports away from the victims of crime, and these changes will certainly have a negative impact on the victims of crime. Instead of supporting victims of crime, the UCP is doing exactly the opposite. This was the opportunity for this government to realize how horrible their changes were and to fix some of those. But, no, they did not get this one right.

As I said, the bill amends five different pieces of legislation: the Corrections Act, the Justice of the Peace Act, the Missing Persons Act, the Youth Justice Act, and the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act. I want to say that we do not take issue with the changes to the Corrections Act, the Youth Justice Act, the Justice of the Peace Act, or the Missing Persons Act, but we have serious concerns with respect to the victims of crime fund and public safety act changes.

The Corrections Act is making changes so that the compensation rate for Alberta Parole Board members can now be set by an order in council instead of regulation. In the tech briefing government shared that this brings this board in line with other Alberta boards, agencies, and commissions.

With respect to the Justice of the Peace Act, it gives the Chief Judge of the Provincial Court of Alberta the discretion to designate a justice of the peace as either part-time or full-time if there are certain conditions that are met. That's the same process for judges, and we take no issue with that.

With respect to the Missing Persons Act, it adds a definition of medical information and now allows for TV footage and other video recordings to be used in missing person cases. Again, we do not take issue with the changes that are proposed in this legislation.

Lastly, the Youth Justice Act changes align the act with changes from the federal Criminal Code, and according to the government it's not a change in the policy.

But the changes that they make to the victims of crime fund and public safety act are significant ones, and these changes have implications for victims of crimes.

Earlier, a couple of years ago, the UCP brought forward Bill 16, and they made changes to the victims of crime fund so that the victims of crime fund can be used to backfill for the reckless cuts that this government has made to the justice system. Since then we have been hearing constantly in our constituencies – in Edmonton, in Calgary, across the province – that victims of crime have been denied benefits. They are only given 45 days to apply for the benefits. I think that's unfair. That doesn't give enough room, enough time for the victims to apply for these benefits. Victims should not be forced to apply for these benefits within a certain time. They should be allowed to heal on their own timeline.

The changes that are contained in this piece of legislation are making some of those changes, some of those horrible changes, permanent. One change that is contained in this piece of legislation is that it de-establishes the Criminal Injuries Review Board. That was, I guess, in part done by legislation previously, but this one formally de-establishes that. This board was an important, arm's-length board that was responsible for reviewing the benefits, hearing the complaints about those benefits. What this government is doing is that they are completely getting rid of this board so that victims will only have to apply through this government, and whatever government wants to do with that program, they will be able to do that on their own.

So far the changes that government has made to this program were not helpful. They were, rather, harmful to the victims of crime. Not one organization across this province – not one organization – supported the changes that government made. I do challenge the members of the government, members of the UCP caucus, this morning if they are aware of just one organization across this province that supported these changes. Not one, but the government won't listen.

That's the reason Albertans don't trust this UCP government. They think they know the best. They ignore Albertans. They just don't respond to their e-mails. I was personally copied on many e-mails relating to this fund. Our leader has received numerous e-mails about this, and we know that they are getting the same e-mails, but unless these e-mails are coming from lobbyists, they just don't respond. The result is that victims of crimes are paying the price.

These changes are fairly significant, and they will codify the changes government made to the victims of crime fund. No one, no victim supports these changes, no organizations supporting victims are in favour of these changes, and we will not be supporting these changes.

Government needs to go back to the drawing board. Government needs to consult with the victims of crime. Government needs to consult with organizations providing supports to victims of crimes and reverse their damaging policy of using the victims of crime fund to backfill their reckless cuts. Since the UCP took over, they have cut the Justice department budget by $200 million in the last three budgets, and that impacts services throughout the Justice department. They have downloaded policing costs onto the municipalities. They are making Albertans pay for their recklessness.

When we talk to stakeholders, when we talk to the legal community, there are many issues that they will bring up, but that's not the focus for this government. For instance, since they became government, they've been telling Albertans that they will be hiring 50 prosecutors. And year after year, every time when we ask about the progress on that hiring, they will say that they are in the process of hiring those prosecutors.

We do know that because of the Jordan decision there are so many cases that are at risk of being thrown out because courts won't be able to prosecute them within Jordan timelines. There are so many cases, and Albertans who are victims of those crimes won't be able to have a day in court. They won't be able to get the justice they deserve. That situation has been made worse by the COVID-19 pandemic as well. There are tens of thousands of cases that are at a serious risk of being thrown out. Government should be focusing on those cases, on addressing those delays. That's something that Albertans expect this government to focus on.

Lastly, in Calgary in particular we have seen a wave of violence, drug related, gang related. So far there have been 11 murders already this year in Calgary – 11 murders – and one of them a couple of weeks ago was from my neighbourhood. The government needs to focus on addressing that wave of violence because that's, first and foremost, the government's responsibility, to make sure that people are safe in their homes, in their communities. That needs to be the focus of this government. Everyone is fearful for their safety. Those are the real issues that are facing Albertans. Instead, the government is solidifying their raid on the victims of crime fund so that they can backfill for their reckless cuts to the justice system. These changes are hurtful. These changes are damaging.

One, the government is not doing anything to address the rise in crimes. Two, the government is not doing anything to address the delays within the justice system. On top, the government is taking away the supports from those victims of crime. That is shameful, and that's something we will not support.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs has risen.

Ms Goehring: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this morning to speak to Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. While I am so appreciative of the Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall for highlighting some of the major concerns that this piece of legislation has, this legislation makes some changes to the justice act. Some seem positive. Some are housekeeping, as per what the government is saying.

We, however, think that more needs to be done. We see that they're legislating the victims of crime fund but not actually doing anything to fix the mess that they made. In previous pieces of legislation – I believe it was Bill 16 – this government created some considerable changes to the victims of crime fund, none of which actually support victims of crime.

I have a background where I was a volunteer with the Sexual Assault Centre of Edmonton and then did my first-year practicum as a social work student with the Lurana Shelter. I can tell you that had they talked to just simply those two agencies, they would have known that the changes that they were making were not only not helpful, but they were going to be so restrictive that victims couldn't actually access the fund. They put in an implementation of a 45-day time period where the victim must apply for the services for emergency assistance.

I can tell you that the majority of my calls and my interactions dealt with victims well past the 45-day limit. Most in that period – in the initial weeks or months following a crime specifically related to domestic violence or sexual assault, there is no capacity to expect someone to go and fill out all this paperwork and do all of this work, especially because the majority of those individuals haven't even reported it yet. So many are still in that contemplation phase.

You know, unfortunately, there's a lot of stigmatization that happens around sexual assault and domestic violence. There's a lot of blaming of themselves. Unfortunately, there can be space where other people blame them as well. We've seen judges throughout the province make comments that are completely inappropriate, blame the victim, and those things make the news. So when someone is a victim of a serious crime, those are all of the images and messages that they have. To expect someone to apply within 45 days for funding is absolutely ridiculous.

I think about what the intention of this Bill 20 is. I mean, most of it is what we can support. There are, I believe, five different pieces of legislation, different acts, that are being impacted, but the one that sticks out the most is definitely the victims of crime fund and the horrible changes that this government did.

I know that since the implementation we've heard from many that work in the area of being supports to those that have been victims. You know, there were some significant concerns. The money wasn't rolled out on time. They highlighted the 45-day time period as being way too restrictive. It used to be two years, and even within that two-year time period there were still organizations advocating on behalf of victims, saying that it just wasn't enough time. To take it from two years to 45 days: I can't imagine that many victims are actually able to access this funding. So when this government opens up this legislation, I'm just so confused as to why they wouldn't have taken the feedback that they heard from Bill 16, both prior and post, and done some significant changes in here.

We know that, you know, I believe it's a $1,000 limit for being able to access money for counselling. Well, Mr. Speaker, the average rate for a qualified therapist is around $200 an hour, so saying that there's only $1,000 to access supports – you're dealing with trauma. That simply is not enough. We hear from victims and their families who say they've spent tens of thousands of dollars on counselling. To have a trauma-informed practice isn't something that can just be wrapped up in only a handful of sessions. These are situations where, like I mentioned, we're talking about the stigmatization of what happens when someone has been assaulted, acknowledging that there's that impact, acknowledging the societal messages that this person perhaps could be to blame. You have to undo all of that trauma.

Oftentimes I've experienced where there are multiple incidents of trauma, and the one that they actually come forward and report wasn't the first time that this person has been victimized. So to think that $1,000 for counselling is the solution: it's simply unacceptable to look at that. We have so much trauma that can happen as a result of a crime, and I think that this could have been a really great opportunity for them to fix the legislation that they broke with Bill 16.

We know the history and the statistics regarding domestic violence, and we know that it's very likely that those that have experienced domestic violence or intimate partner violence don't report within the first incident. When I was at Lurana Shelter, the statistic was that an assault happens, a woman is victimized, an average of 35 times before she tells one person. Thirty-five times. And that's just telling someone. What happens if that person comes forward and she's not believed or she's not supported or she can't access shelters because they're overflowing, there are no beds available, or she can't get in to see a therapist because the wait-lists are astronomical?

Forty-five days is just simply not a reasonable expectation for someone to be able to report the crime and then complete all the paperwork that's required. There are some significant barriers that individuals face when they're trying to access support services. I know that because of this, many individuals choose or are forced to stay in that relationship because there isn't anything available to help them escape safely.

We know statistically that when a person decides to leave the relationship and they have a plan, that's when they're most at risk, and when I say "at risk," Mr. Speaker, the worst case scenario is that they're killed. This isn't something that is a light topic. It is proven over and over that in intimate partner violence, domestic violence the highest risk to that individual is death. So when we're talking about things that could actually support victims, they need access to mental health supports. They need access to nonprofits, where some of those services no longer exist because they've had to close their doors.

I remember working at Lurana, and the amount of calls that we received in a day compared to the amount of beds that we had available was devastating. We were a shelter that was in Edmonton, and we accepted women from all over the province. We had a shelter that had four beds for single females, and then we had family beds as well. Those four single female beds were never open. There were continuously women that required those services, and to have to tell an individual that we don't have a bed – they've created the courage to come forward, they have a plan, they want to escape – is devastating.

So when you think about the decisions that victims that are fleeing domestic violence or intimate partner violence are facing, it is basic safety needs first. Do I have somewhere safe to go? Do my kids have somewhere safe to go? To complicate things more, throw in a family pet. Trying to find a safe shelter or space for a family pet that you know is at risk – because often statistics show that if human beings are being abused in the home, family pets are also being abused. That can be a factor, where someone chooses not to leave because of their family pet.

When we're talking about a 45-day time period, these individuals are simply trying to stay alive. They're not thinking about applying for the victims of crime fund. And I can tell you that's probably not at the top of mind for those that are providing the supports and services to those individuals. We want to make sure that their basic needs are being met. Is there a protection order in place? Do they have the means to be safe? Can they make sure that their kids are safe? These are people that are coming from all across the province. If you're in rural Alberta, I can tell you that it can be a huge culture shock to come into the city and be in a shelter in the city.

On top of an individual being abused an average of 35 times before they tell one person, the statistic from when I was at the shelter was that an individual would leave the situation an average of seven times before leaving the final time. There are so many factors that come into place when you're deciding what to do. What is the best thing to do for myself? For my kids? For my loved ones?

Those are statistics that aren't unknown. They're easily accessible. We have done so much studying when it comes to how best to support victims. I can tell you that Bill 16 and what the UCP introduced is not what is needed.

Bill 20 would have been a wonderful opportunity to be able to take the mistake of Bill 16 and do some real changes. There are other pieces of this legislation, under the other acts, that make sense, and they're clearly things that we can support. However, this should have been a place where the UCP fixed what they broke. We heard pleas when this piece of legislation was introduced, and we continue to hear from those that are providing services and from victims that there's been so much damage done for those that need to access the victims of crime fund, that something should be done. Bill 20 would have been the perfect opportunity to make those changes.

I have a friend who accompanies police, RCMP specifically, when there is a serious incident, and her job is to help the families. She's a victim support worker, so she's on call, and she could get a call at any time of day within her area of work to respond. That's because the police have been called, so we know that there's been a crime. Even within that time period, where it's been reported, the police know that it's happened, we have a date of the incident, she tells me that this still isn't enough time.

The priority isn't trying to set up an application to get services. So many of these individuals are in shock. They have no idea of the trauma that can happen.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will take my seat. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to join debate on second reading? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. I want to thank my two colleagues who have spoken to this bill and shared their insights and experiences, which helps, I think, Albertans to understand the significance of this bill and the significance of the actions of this government.

Now, as pointed out by my colleagues, there are a number of – I would refer to them as housekeeping – amendments that are being made to, I believe, five pieces of legislation, which, as my colleagues have indicated – I mean, I'll go through them, but they're all reasonable changes. The focus of my comments this morning in second reading will be on the changes that the UCP government made to the victims of crime fund and how frustrated Albertans feel that a fund that is so critical to helping people, helping support people who have gone through unbelievably traumatic experiences, is being used to fund other programs that, quite frankly, the government should be funding, whether it's additional police officers, especially at a time right now.

Mr. Speaker, I mean, it should be pointed out that western Canadian select has been sitting around $90 U.S. a barrel for some time now. You know, as many Albertans know, every dollar that western Canadian select is above what the government budgets is another $200 million in royalties for the government. The government has the funds and the means to provide services to Albertans, but this government is choosing not to, and I'll relay some of my experiences working with some very vulnerable young people when I taught at Inner City High School for six years.

I guess I'll lead with some of the housekeeping changes for the benefit of Albertans who are paying attention to the debate this morning. We'll start with the Corrections Act. There's a change where compensation rates for Alberta Parole Board members can now be set by OIC, an order in council, which brings it in line with most other if not all other ABCs, agencies, boards, and commissions. That seems reasonable and very much a minor, minor change.

There are changes to the Justice of the Peace Act giving the Chief Judge of the Provincial Court of Alberta the ability to designate a justice of the peace as either part-time or full-time. This is similar to the process for judges, so this brings it in line, you know, with the rest of the justice system. I appreciate that previously governments were doing this in a process through regulations, which, of course, just expedites the process. In fact, this could have been in the red tape bill. This is actually reducing red tape and speeding up the process. So instead of tying up cabinet to do this, it gives the authority to the Chief Judge of the Provincial Court of Alberta to make that decision. Quite frankly, they are probably much more qualified to make that decision. My guess is that the Minister of Justice would have been speaking to them regardless ahead of time. This expedites that process, so that change I can get behind, Mr. Speaker.

As well, there are changes to the Missing Persons Act. It adds a definition of medical information. Now, the act already had provisions which allowed access to health information, but now things like TV footage, other video recordings can be used in missing person cases, which is wonderful. My understanding of this is that that would also apply to any kind of video even done by cellphone. You know, my understanding is that this is really modernizing this act, but again it wouldn't hurt to have some clarification from the Minister of Justice that it's bringing the act up to speed for today's technology and the access to technology that most Albertans have.

It also adds a section that the justice of the peace can seal court records related to a missing person if that case interferes with an investigation or if it endangers people and changes the timeline for a review by a special committee of the Legislative Assembly. As well, Mr. Speaker, it adds regulation-making powers that give the government the ability to define any term not defined in the act. Again, I suppose that if there is a realization that there's a term that needs to be defined, instead of having to bring the whole act back through the Legislature, which, of course, is a much more lengthy process than doing it through regulations, this gives the cabinet the ability to define a term.

For the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act – actually, I'll come back to that one. Let's jump to the Youth Justice Act. Changes here are changes that are going to align with changes from the federal Criminal Code, so that includes updates on forfeiture, changes that notification of parents can be given by any peace officer as opposed to solely the officer in charge. I mean, that again seems that it makes quite a bit of sense, Mr. Speaker, especially when you think about people and their shifts when they work, holidays, et cetera. It now gives peace officers much more flexibility. I also believe that this will expedite those conversations, again, that they can happen now much easier and much quicker.

I'll now spend the duration of my time talking about changes that this government made to the victims of crime fund and how this was an opportunity for the government to reverse changes that they've made. Again, you know, for the benefit of Albertans, there were a few changes made to the victims of crime fund, first and foremost being that all of the funds that were collected would be used to support victims of crime. Now, I have in my notes, if I can find it, the fact that there would have been a surplus in the fund. Here we go, Mr. Speaker. Before changes to this act were made, there was a $74 million surplus in this fund, the victims of crime fund, that could have been used toward helping more victims. Instead, the money is now also going to be used to pay for more prosecutors and police officers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am supportive of the fact that we need more prosecutors and we need more peace officers and police officers, absolutely, but they should be paid out of government's revenues and not out of the victims of crime fund.

You know, as a number of people have spoken out and said – I was reading that one person had described this as robbing Peter to pay Paul. We've heard stories of the trauma that people have experienced and what's required, the supports that are needed to help victims.

You know, another change to this was that the two-year reporting period shrunk down to 45 days. I remember speaking in this Chamber against this idea, which is absolutely ridiculous, that the timeline requiring someone to report a crime has shrunk so significantly, especially when we're talking about assaults, sexual assaults, domestic violence. The number of victims that will be ineligible to access this fund is staggering. It's shameful, Mr. Speaker, that people who have gone through what I can only imagine as some of the most traumatic experiences that a person could ever have to go through now don't have access to supports if they do not report within 45 days.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that when I worked at Inner City High School, I worked with a number of young people who had faced incredible challenges and had students disclose being victims, but I can tell you that it was not within a 45-day window. Some of them were well over a year if not even longer. To deny supports because a person is not ready to disclose or has to work through the trauma that they've lived through – like, I don't understand the rationale for it, but it looks a lot like the government is trying to prohibit or inhibit victims of crime from accessing supports. I'd love to hear the logic behind it. It's creating barriers, barriers that are completely unnecessary.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that when I first looked at this, it made me think back to why I first ran to be an MLA. I was teaching at Inner City High School and saw the incredible barriers that the government then was putting forward for these young people who faced a myriad of challenges but were trying to go to school in order to change their circumstances. They wanted to improve their lives. They didn't want to live in poverty. They didn't want to be homeless.

The hoops that the government brought forward with additional barriers in accessing funding for them to be able to pay their rent, to go to school – many of the students were older, Mr. Speaker. They were unsuccessful in the traditional system. Some of them were born on the streets, born into poverty. Some faced addictions. For some, their parents or parent were in and out of incarceration their whole life. That's their number one role model.

So here they are trying to improve their lives. Mr. Speaker, if a student or someone who wants to go to school can't access funding to do so, then how are they supposed to pay for food and a roof over their head? A number of the students also had young children, so there are issues and barriers as far as child care and daycare. It was really frustrating to see. You know, I give kudos to the school, that provided incredible supports, working with our students, spending hours in front of a computer trying to navigate the system. Here we see again barriers that this government has created.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I certainly appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill because it gives me the opportunity to speak to an overall trend that I see with this government. In fact, I'm beginning to think that we should not refer to this government as the UCP but, rather, as the "Are there no workhouses?" government.

Mr. Bilous: Charles Dickens.

Mr. Feehan: Exactly.

We see a consistent trend in this government to seek out people who are the most vulnerable in society and to take resources away from them and deprive them of the things that they need.

We saw in Bill 16 substantive amounts of money taken away from rape victims to be used for other useful – agreed – things in society, but you don't take money away from rape victims to do them. Why would you take it away from the most vulnerable? We've seen with this government the decision to deindex AISH and to move the payment date for AISH to a date that makes it most likely for people who are disabled to end up having to pay extra fees because of the lateness of their payments. Of course, the deindexing is actually taking money out of their pockets. So we see this government not only going after rape victims; we see them going after disabled people.

We see this government moving to reduce the age at which children in care are supported, and what have we seen in the children in care services? We've seen the most number of children in care or who have had a recent open file with Children's Services die in the history of this province. So if you're a rape victim, if you're disabled, if you're a child in care, if you're vulnerable, this government is not there for you. We see this government oppose race-based data collection, so for people who are oppressed, systematically victims of racism, the government is not there for you. I can tell that after over three years since the report on the missing and murdered Indigenous women and girls from the federal government has come out, this government has not even issued a single step forward in moving on that.

Consistently what we see is this government taking people who are vulnerable, pummelling them, beating them down, and then kicking them when they're down, taking their money away when they're in the most vulnerable place that they could possibly be: children in Children's Services, disabled people, racialized people, and now we see people who are rape victims. Specifically, people who've actually witnessed murders are no longer considered eligible for services. You know, this is something I just cannot stand for with this government, this constant decision to go after people who are most vulnerable, to take resources away from them, and to just make the decision that they don't care.

This is the whole attitude of Scrooge writ large here in this province, sending people who should be protected by a society into the worst possible circumstances and making the decision that they just have to survive on their own, and if they don't survive, too bad, even if they're murdered. We have no report from this government after three years on murdered and missing Indigenous women. Three years. How much time do you need when the reports are already written for you?

This is completely unacceptable. Here we are again finding this government taking money away from people who have been brutalized by watching murders, by being raped, and going through serious traumas that have resulted in the destruction of their lives, their families, and their sense of self. Does this government have no sense about how trauma affects human beings and the consequences of trauma in our society? Can they please go back to school and learn something about how trauma has the consequence of building more trauma in society? If you don't deal with trauma, you will end up with people acting out in ways that cause more trauma for others.

Repeatedly I see this government finding the vulnerable, beating them up, doing the worst possible thing they can to them, and now taking their resources away.

Mr. Nally: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker: A point of order has been called.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, 23(h), (i), and (j), language that is going to cause disorder. I have been very patient listening to the ridiculous comments from the individual across, but to say that a government beats up on vulnerable – and, actually, not beats up on. Beats up, so it wasn't even figurative. It was literal. Quite offensive. Hopefully, the gentleman can class it up.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I understand that that member somehow didn't like hearing about trauma, victims of rape, victims of crime who are stripped of support through this piece of legislation. We are at the second reading of this bill, where a member can talk about the principles of the bill, changes contained in it, how they impact the society, how they impact Albertans. It's not at all a point of order. I think the minister needs to read up in this House procedure book.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you very much.

At this stage I don't think that we have brought ourselves to a point where there's an actual point of order. The individual, though very passionately, was discussing about the government broadly speaking, not individuals. What I would say, though, is that it can get to a point where language chosen by an individual in here can ultimately begin to cause disorder. So what I would do is that I would just ask the hon. member to perhaps use some different phrases that may accomplish the same goals. If he could, please, continue.

Thank you.

Debate Continued

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, when I'm using an expression, I'm speaking metaphorically, not literally, although it doesn't surprise me that the government has trouble with the difference between the two.

I do think it's interesting that they are not objecting to the facts that I've put forward, that this government indeed has attacked the disabled and has taken money out of their pockets, that they have reduced supports for children who have lived their lives in care, and that we have seen an increase in the number of children that have died subsequently, often from suicide, if you read the Ombudsman's report on this. They do not argue the fact that they denied race-based data collection, which was asked for by people who are oppressed. They do not deny that they have done nothing about murdered and missing Indigenous women in terms of putting out a report. They've had three years to do something. They had a committee work on it for over a year within that period of time and still have done nothing.

You notice they do not argue the facts, because the facts speak for themselves. The truth is that this government does not understand the nature of vulnerability and are more than happy to take resources away from people who are vulnerable. In this case they're specifically targeting people who have experienced trauma. They are specifically going after people who have been raped, people who have seen murders and taking resources away from them, just as they did with Bill 16. If they just did nothing, we would be better off. If they had just left AISH alone, we would be better off. If they had just left the children-in-care bill the way it was, we would be better off. In most of these cases doing nothing would be a better moral choice than the choices that this government has made.

Now we see there are specific actions being taken here where they're putting in limits of 45 days from the time of the actual commission of the crime to apply for victims' services. This is so ridiculous, that they do not understand the nature of trauma and how people respond to trauma. If you look at jurisprudence across this country, you will see that governments and courts have said that you cannot put limits on victims because there is a process of dealing with trauma which often extends into the period of years.

There was a time that you couldn't report a rape if it was over a year old. Governments and courts have said: "That's ridiculous. People can't do that. You should be able to report a rape 30 years later." But in this government, in this province, if you do that, you get no resources because: oh, you didn't report it in 45 days. Can you imagine what it's like to go through a sexual assault? Can you imagine what it's like to witness somebody in your family get murdered? And you're supposed to go: I know I'm feeling all these bad feelings, but perhaps I should be reasonable and think about the paperwork I have to do. It is absolutely unconscionable that this government is acting in this way yet again, consistently. Their value system is to go after people who are most vulnerable and take the resources away from them.

The other thing that this government could do, besides take off this ridiculous limit of 45 days, which is just absolutely in the face of all science with regard to the treatment of trauma: they could actually provide resources, put the money back in that they took out in Bill 16, and say to people: "You know what? We're not going to limit your counselling to $1,000 after you've been raped," which, as has been mentioned in this House, is maybe five sessions, "and why don't we actually provide counselling for you for a period of a year or two regardless of the costs?" That's what most trauma victims actually need.

Trauma is not readily resolved. I worked in this area for many, many years, as you know. I wish we had a better resolution. I wish people could come with me and work with me and within five sessions it's all gone, they're happy, and they're at least in a functional place where they can move on in society. But that is not what happens. What happens is that people go into a trauma state, and they struggle for months, sometimes years even to get into the place to begin to do the work, let alone actually work through the horribleness of these things and then actually resolve them and move on and find a place to thrive and be vibrant in society. Anybody who works in the area knows that's true.

I wish there was a better answer. I certainly would go take the training if something else was offered to be able to provide quick and effective services to resolve trauma, but we know that nobody in the world has designed that kind of treatment. What we do have is effective, solid, relationship-based treatment that takes time to build a relationship and to use that relationship effectively to move a person from a place of trauma to a place of health. And this government has just made the decision that they do not want to be part of that healing process, that they are going to put limits on families.

First of all, some won't even get it at all because: "Oh, they only witnessed their mother being murdered. They didn't actually get murdered themselves." And others who have been sexually assaulted or by other kinds of assault will be told: "Get over it. Get on with it quickly." This is absolutely not acceptable, and I'm insisting that this government remove this bill, that they do the work to get this right. They haven't even released the report that was done by the working group to examine the benefits of the fund for victims. They won't even give us the information, hiding reports, as they typically do, and, when they are absolutely forced to, releasing them on Easter weekend. This is the consistent pattern with this government. There is an inherent dishonesty in that kind of behaviour.

If you want people to actually receive the information, you don't release it on Holy Thursday. You release it on Monday morning so that people can read it and respond to it. But I can see that they are just trying to hide yet again the facts that people would use to judge this government as they should be judged, as governments who are not there if you're disabled, not there for you if you're a child in care, not there for you if you're part of a racialized community, not there for you if you are a murdered or missing Indigenous woman, and now not there for you if you are a victim of trauma.

This government needs to remove that 45-day limit now before this bill moves forward. This government needs to increase the actual resources available to families and not limit it to $1,000. This government must reinstate the financial benefits for all survivors of any kind of victimization, because you are not the judge of how people respond to a traumatic incident. For one person a traumatic incident may not be overwhelming, but for somebody who has had a previous traumatic incident, even a small crime can be triggering of the initial traumatic incident.

I worked with one person who was a bank teller, and someone came in to rob the bank. She wasn't even the one who had the gun pointed at her, but she came into therapy. She was deeply traumatized because she had experienced previous traumas of being victimized as a child, being sexually assaulted, and therefore came back to me, because I helped treat her when she was young, to say that she was struggling again. She's the kind of person that would not get any resources from this government because the gun wasn't pointed at her; she just happened to be in the bank at the time the robbery occurred. But for her it was real trauma because it was an echo of the trauma that she experienced as a child and made her feel vulnerable again, and she needed to come back into therapy in order to go back to that place where she found health and healing. And this government has made the decision that she is not worthy of services, she is not worthy of support.

This government needs to open up the money that is available in the victims of crime fund into new, exploratory ways of treating people and building community around people who have been victimized. There was supposed to be a surplus in this fund until the government raided it, and now the government is denying, put a moratorium on grant applications for new programs to come forward, and there's no reason to do that. You have the money.

As previously stated by one of my peers, oil is at the highest it's been for very many years. You have an abundance of dollars. Now, I know it can't be spent on everything, but you would think that people who are victimized and traumatized would be at least somewhere near the top of priorities. But no. You know what's at the near top of priorities? A war room, which doesn't report on anything and hasn't accomplished anything in many years and spends more money on a daily basis than this program gives to people who have been victimized. This is completely... [interjections] Yes.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you for that. I appreciate – you know, just further to that, let's not forget that the victims of crime fund is funded from resources that are seized from other criminal activities, too, right? So it's not as though it's, like, money that is from oil revenues. Rather, it is money that's accumulated from, let's say, the seizure of assets in a criminal situation.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, would you like to respond? You have only about 12 seconds at this stage.

Mr. Feehan: I think I've made my point. I think that the government needs to sit down and look at its decisions from a value-based perspective and to start treating people who are vulnerable with respect.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join in the debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and offer a few comments as well on Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. Let me first start off by thanking my friend from Edmonton-Rutherford for bringing so much passion to the debate. He has been a fierce advocate for victims of crime and for better treatment of the victims of crime from this government from the very day that he was elected, and I really appreciate the fact that he brings his significant experience as a social worker and a person who was engaged in therapy for people for many, many years. I appreciate that he brings that perspective to the House. It's one that I think is very much needed, and certainly the government would benefit from taking his advice into consideration.

I would also like to say that I appreciated the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford's references to Dickens. I, too, am a fan of Dickens but not Charles Dickens; I'm a fan of Little Jimmy Dickens, whose hit in the 1960s, May the Bird of Paradise Fly Up Your Nose, is certainly one of the most outstanding country music songs of all time.

I want to build on the point that my friend from Edmonton-Rutherford was making with respect to the government and how they're treating victims of crime. He did mention that the government has been sitting on the report on missing and murdered Indigenous women for at least three years, and I just want to update the House on the status of the government's response to that report. We had a meeting with the Indigenous Relations ministry at the Public Accounts Committee on Tuesday morning. We questioned officials from the Indigenous Relations ministry on the status of the government's response to that, and they said that they will be responding to that report in the very near future. So I certainly hope that that provides everybody with assurance that the government is taking this issue very seriously, because after three years of waiting for a response, to hear that the response is coming sometime in the near future is not exactly the assurance that people were looking for.

To turn to the issue around how the government has changed the use of the victims of crime fund with this legislation and previous legislation, you know, let me just first state that I think the government has done a good thing in announcing yesterday or maybe the day before – I can't remember exactly when it was announced – the fact that Crown prosecutors are going to get a pay bump so that they are competitive with other lawyers, people working in the field. I think that it's important that we pay Crown prosecutors the salary that they deserve and pay them enough to keep them working for the Crown instead of losing them to other areas of law.

We know that this government has had a serious problem with workforce morale in the Crown prosecutors' office, and I sincerely hope that by increasing the pay, the government will be able to better retain Crown prosecutors, better attract Crown prosecutors. This is a problem that has long existed, that the government has failed to address even though they committed to addressing it in their platform. You know, they promised to hire a whole host of new Crown prosecutors, yet they have failed for three years to hire the number of Crown prosecutors that the Justice department says that it needs. I hope that by increasing the pay of the Crown prosecutors, this will advance the government's work to attract and retain more Crown prosecutors in the Justice department.

Mr. Speaker, the money that is to be paid to Crown prosecutors, to new Crown prosecutors, to raises for existing Crown prosecutors, should not come from the victims of crime fund, as this government has given itself the power to do. That money should come from general revenue. Victims of crime should be supported by money from the victims of crime fund. I think that it's unfair to take away important supports for victims of crime to pay Crown prosecutors.

The government has an obligation to carry out justice by having an adequate staff of Crown prosecutors and to look after the victims of crime by providing them benefits through the victims of crime fund, and they certainly have the financial wherewithal to achieve both of those objectives simultaneously. There is certainly no cost pressure that the government is facing right now that would prevent them from doing both of those things at the same time. They can keep the money in the victims of crime fund for use by victims of crime and also give a pay increase and hire more Crown prosecutors at the same time. It won't affect their bottom line. They'll still probably run a surplus this year if they did both of those things.

It's outrageous to me that they would try to achieve their objectives in one area of the Justice department by sacrificing the needs of victims of crime. That's incredibly unfair, especially at the same time as granting profitable corporations a $4.7 billion tax cut. Why does somebody who has been a witness to murder or a victim of sexual assault have to go without important supports to deal with the trauma that they've suffered while shareholders of insurance companies get to increase their dividends? That's not fair. But this is the way the government continues to prioritize the people of Alberta. If you are an investor, you get every benefit, every support from the government. If you're a victim of crime, you have to fight tooth and nail to get the bare minimum of supports from the government. That's incredibly unfair.

You know, Mr. Speaker, we had a high-profile violent crime occur not too long ago in the constituency of Edmonton-Gold Bar. A young man by the name of Karanveer Sahota was murdered by allegedly seven children while waiting for a bus on his way home from school.

An Hon. Member: It's horrible.

Mr. Schmidt: It is horrible. My heart goes out to his family, who are suffering the pain of that loss.

But what's made it worse, Mr. Speaker, is that if they wanted to apply for support and benefits through the victims of crime fund, they only have 45 days to do it. I can tell you that just from observing how all of this has played out, 45 days is precious little time for a family to access victims of crime funding if they've been in this situation. The logistics of dealing with his hospitalization, the funeral, bringing the family together to mourn his loss: that all takes time and energy. They don't have additional time or the mental energy to worry about whether or not they should apply to the victims of crime fund within 45 days.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, this crime has victimized hundreds of other students. This kid was murdered in full view of a school of about 900 students. How many of those other students need the support to deal with being a witness to that trauma? Hundreds of them, and there are no supports for them now through the victims of crime fund because they're not eligible. If you're a witness to a homicide, you no longer qualify for benefits through the victims of crime fund.

Now, maybe people would say: “Well, surely the school must have support for them. Can’t they just talk to the counsellors at school?” The answer is no. On the very day that McNally high school brought in grief counsellors to help these hundreds of students deal with the trauma of witnessing one of their fellow classmates get murdered at a bus stop, that same grief counsellor was given his notice that he was no longer to be employed by the Edmonton public school board. They couldn’t afford to keep him on. How is that fair?

This government has failed that family twice over, failed that family and the students at McNally high school twice over. They’ve told everyone who has been victimized by that crime that they are no longer eligible for benefits, and they’ve taken away the important supports that should be there in the school for these kinds of cases.

And to add insult to injury, Mr. Speaker, when we bring this up in the Legislature, the lack of critical supports for students in Edmonton public schools, the minister denies it, tells us that we’re fearmongering, that what is actually happening and is plain for everybody to see with their own eyes is not happening. I would certainly like the minister to take the time to visit with the students of McNally high school – I’m sure they’d be happy to have her – explain to them the effect that this crime has had on their school community, and tell them the kinds of supports that they need to be able to heal from this, create safer schools, put measures in place to make sure that this doesn’t happen to another McNally high school student ever again. My hope is that by doing that, the minister’s heart would be opened, that she would let go of this story that she continues to tell, that the supports that Edmonton public school students are getting are sufficient, because they’re not, and that she’d reverse the decisions that she’s made to claw back funding from those students.

You know, it’s easy when you sit here in this House, and all you have are the budget documents in front of you, to think that what you’re doing is sufficient to meet the needs of the students, but if the minister were to actually visit McNally school right now, I’m sure that she would come back to this Legislature telling a different story because you can’t not be moved by listening to what the students and the staff have experienced as a result of this, and they need much more support than what they’re getting to get through this, and it’s not coming from anywhere. It’s not coming from the victims of crime fund. It’s not coming from the budget of the Ministry of Education. It’s not coming from anywhere else. Those family members and those students are left completely on their own to deal with this.

My fear, Mr. Speaker, is that if the family of that student and his classmates at McNally high school aren’t able to sufficiently deal with this trauma, that will have a negative outcome, that will lead to further violence and crime. I think we have an opportunity here to stop the cycle of violence, and I hope the government takes it.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’m pleased to rise today to speak in favour of Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. First, I want to thank the Minister of Justice for bringing this bill forward. Part of the responsibilities of this Legislature is to continuously update current legislation to align with current societal realities and changes in our province and country. This responsibility is even more important for justice-related legislation, which is required to stay current and effective. This bill is a demonstration of the UCP government’s commitment to ensure that Albertans have access to justice.

Mr. Speaker, we have read from the bill. One major highlight of Bill 20 is the housekeeping amendments to the Corrections Act, the Justice of the Peace Act, the Missing Persons Act, the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, and the Youth Justice Act. I fully support the changes proposed in this bill, which will streamline the appointment process for justices of the peace and clarify the processes for police working cases on missing persons.

There are also changes that will bring provincial legislation in line with changes to Canada’s Criminal Code. Some of these changes include renaming “death benefit” in the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act to “funeral expense reimbursement.”

We all know the trauma the families and friends of missing persons go through in finding their loved ones. This bill will make it possible for our officers to resolve missing persons cases in a timely manner. Some of this information includes inbound and outbound phone and text records of missing persons as well as a record of their browsing history to help police determine possible places to start looking. The bill also proposes access to signal records from wireless devices which will indicate the possible location of a missing person. This will go a long way to improve the efficiency, effectiveness of police searches for missing persons because they will have more tools at their disposal to work on the missing person’s case.

Administrative changes are also proposed in the Corrections Act amendments, which will ensure that compensation rates of Alberta Parole Board members are set by order in council rather than regulations. These changes will greatly improve the functions of the board and bring them into consistency with other government agencies, boards, and commissions in Alberta.

The bill also proposes to remove administrative bottlenecks in the Justice of the Peace Act to give powers to the Chief Judge to make full- or part-time appointments of justices of the peace. With these changes, the Chief Judge, in accordance with established laws and the approval of the Judicial Council, will have the flexibility in judges and masters in chambers for new assignments for the remainder of their appointments either on a full-time or a part-time basis.

With the passage of this bill there will be efficient and effective court administration. Mr. Speaker, it is important for us to examine our laws and justice system and look for ways to improve them by removing what slows down the justice system. This proposed legislation puts forward a number of changes that will modernize Alberta’s justice system by removing redundant clauses and correctly adjusting dated references in existing legislation. The new legislation will modernize the wording of this legislation and bring it up to speed with the current realities in Alberta’s justice system. The bill proposes changes to Alberta’s justice system, and it is pleasing to note the proposed bill will significantly align Alberta’s justice system with other jurisdictions in Canada. In my view, the administrative and housekeeping reforms included in this bill will help Alberta to update legislation that govern this justice system and bring relief to Albertans.

The job of government is fundamentally to respond to calls from the public for changes in different areas of society and to advance the well-being of its people. This UCP government is doing precisely that by introducing transformative adjustments to Alberta’s justice system that will make responsible stakeholders perform better. The administrative changes that are introduced, although minor, are very important in order for justice-related legislation to continue to run smoothly for Albertans both now and into the future.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will adjourn the debate. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there – I see the hon. member for . . .

Some Hon. Members: He moved to adjourn debate.

The Acting Speaker: Oh, he moved to adjourn debate. Sorry.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate May 3: Mr. Turton]

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members looking to join debate on this one? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to offer a few comments on Bill 22, the justice – Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022: that was the last bill that we were talking about. This is something else entirely. I'm sure that the name is incredibly clever, reflecting – the Electricity Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, of course.

I think that the government is making some positive moves here in modernizing the electricity grid. Certainly, the legislative changes that are being allowed here to allow for energy storage to be incorporated into the grid and function on our energy market are positive and much-needed moves to modernizing the energy grid. As my friend from Lethbridge-West said in her comments on this bill a few days ago, any forward-looking government would recognize the need to decarbonize its electricity system, and by enhancing the capacity for energy storage on that electricity system, I think that we are moving in the right direction with regard to that.

We have a long way to go, though, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to decarbonizing our electricity grid. Even though our government accelerated the phase-out of coal-fired electricity, the bulk of that electricity generation was picked up by natural gas generation, which, to its credit, is certainly a cleaner fuel than coal, but it is still quite greenhouse gas intensive. Eventually we need to get to a net-zero electricity grid, and in fact our party has committed to achieving that objective by 2035 should we be elected to government.

You know, it's interesting, Mr. Speaker, that on the topic of coal-fired electricity phase-out, the associate minister of natural gas and a number of his colleagues on Executive Council have blamed the accelerated coal phase-out for the current electricity price spike, which makes absolutely no sense, especially when it's followed up by the minister's claim that had we only looked at the issue of so-called clean coal, we wouldn't be in the mess we are in today when it comes to electricity prices.

Well, Mr. Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. The fact of the matter is that had any government pursued so-called clean coal technology, the price of electricity generation would have skyrocketed because the costs of capturing carbon emissions and storing them underground at a coal-fired electricity power plant are astronomical. There is no way that there would be any feasible way to capture those emissions and store them underground and provide electricity at a price that's lower than it is today had any government allowed coal-fired generation to pursue that option.

Moreover, there are a couple of examples where so-called clean coal technology has failed spectacularly. I think it was not too long ago that Mississippi closed down a so-called clean coal electricity generation plant because the technology that they tried to employ there did not work. So now the ratepayers in that state, in that jurisdiction, are on the hook for a massive technological failure of a huge bet that went bad.

So when the associate minister of electricity says that he wishes that the government would've pursued clean coal technology, what he's saying is that he wanted electricity prices to go up even more than they have already. It's completely outlandish. What I suspect that the government wishes they could've done is to allow coal-fired generation to continue apace without any significant greenhouse gas emissions mitigation measures in place. That's not even something that the Harper government in Ottawa supported, nor is it something that the planet could've survived.

I'm exceptionally proud of our government's record of phasing out coal-fired power. In fact, even though, when we embarked down that road, we were told by power generators that it was impossible, it could never be done, a couple of years later TransAlta and Capital Power . . .

Mr. Jean: We're paying for it.

Mr. Schmidt: We're not paying for it. We're not paying for it.

Mr. Jean: Yes, we are. You haven't checked your heating bill.

Mr. Schmidt: The Member for Fort . . .

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, through the chair. The only person with the call right now is the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: It's interesting to me, Mr. Speaker, that an actual member of the Harper government is taking issue with a decision that his own government made, and what the member fails to recognize is what additional costs the people of Alberta would have paid if we hadn't made that decision. He's laughing because I think he suspects that climate change isn't real and it doesn't have actual costs to the people of Alberta, but it does. It will, and it will be borne by his constituents if we – those greenhouse gas emission reductions had to come from somewhere, and they came from the coal-fired power plant. The Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo – sorry. Not the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo. That guy can't tell his left foot from his right foot most of the time.

Speaker's Ruling Insulting Language

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, I think that that was a direct insulting attack on an individual member. I'd ask that you withdraw the comment.

Debate Continued

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche needs to recognize that if those greenhouse gas emissions didn't come from the coal sector, they would've come directly from the oil sands sector, which is something that he's absolutely opposed to.

We need to recognize that climate change is a serious and imminent threat and that we need to do something. We need to take meaningful action, and our government did that. We shut down coal-fired power in an attempt to do our part to reduce Canada's greenhouse gas emissions. I'm looking forward to hearing the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche's greenhouse gas mitigation plan. If he thinks that he could do it cheaper, without making the kinds of impacts that our government made, then he's welcome to present his plan. I eagerly await that.

The minister has also claimed that skyrocketing power prices have been the result of what he says are our government's overbuild of the transmission sector. I have two things to say about that. First of all, if the associate minister is so concerned about the overbuild of the electricity transmission sector, then he should maybe take that up with the Minister of Municipal Affairs. Ask him why that decision was made, because that's exactly who made it, Redford-era PCs. In fact, I – the rest of them are gone. You know, former member of this House Joe Anglin made an entire political career on the issue of the overbuild of the transmission sector, and the PCs laughed him off at the time. So they're the ones who hold responsibility for that.

Let me also say that having lived through the hottest summer on record and then one of the longest cold snaps on record, just in the last eight, 10 months here in Alberta, I am thankful that we had the capacity in the electricity sector to generate and transmit that much power. If we hadn't, there would've been people freezing to death in their homes this winter, and there would've been people who suffered, who died from the heat because they didn't have access to air conditioning. We know that people did die from heat. Hundreds of people in Calgary died from heat exposure because they didn't have access to appropriate air conditioning.

Mr. Schow: Are we going to buy them air conditioners like we're going to buy them roofs?

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, the only member with the call right now is the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. I would remind all members of the House, though, that if they do have comments that they would like to make, it would be through the chair, or perhaps I think that there's always the opportunity to do an intervention as well – right? – but if you also want to have conversations, perhaps you can take them to the lounge.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar with three minutes and 49 seconds remaining.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Member for Cardston-Siksika asked me if I think the government should buy people air conditioning. I certainly do, at least in long-term care facilities. There are hundreds of people in long-term care facilities who had to withstand . . . [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, I think the next time I stand up, I'm going to call members out and say: perhaps you would like to go have a conversation in the lounge.

We have the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. If you could please stick to the bill at hand, Bill 22, that would be very appreciated; three and 34 remaining.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, all of the comments that I've made have been directly applicable to the electricity system. We need air conditioning in our long-term care facilities because senior citizens will die if they continue to be exposed to the kinds of heat that we saw at the end of June and the beginning of July last year. That is a fact, and the government has a responsibility to look after those people, to make sure that they lead lives that are as good as can be. If the Member for Cardston-Siksika would like to visit some of the long-term care facilities in Edmonton-Gold Bar and see the kind of conditions that people are living in currently, I am more than happy to give him a tour.

We have some serious issues to deal with in the electricity system. I think the government is making the right move in requiring distribution owners to provide long-term plans because upgrading our distribution system will be critical to electrifying the future. Speaking to people with experience in this area, the city of Edmonton is not equipped right now to handle the massive electrification of the transportation sector, for example. We just can't under the current plan, so I'm glad that the government is bringing forward a requirement for distribution owners to plan for that future because just in the transportation sector alone we are undergoing massive change.

The sale of electric vehicles is skyrocketing right now and would actually be even higher if we had a supply chain that didn't limit the production of those vehicles. But if people in Edmonton were to all suddenly shift to electric vehicles, the distribution system would not be able to handle it as it's currently constructed, so I'm glad that the government is requiring distribution owners to address those kinds of problems, and I look forward to everybody in Edmonton-Gold Bar being able to choose to purchase an electric vehicle and use that for transportation if they want.

An Hon. Member: What do you drive?

Mr. Schmidt: Right now – what do I drive? I drive a minivan. It's the sexiest vehicle on the road, thank you very much. I'm happy to take the member on a cruise through Edmonton-Gold Bar if he wants to enhance his cred there. I can tell you that you get a lot of attention driving down the streets of Edmonton-Gold Bar in a minivan.

Mr. Schow: Playing some polka music?

Mr. Schmidt: Yes, absolutely. The Member for Cardston-Siksika can choose the polka record of his choice to listen to as we make that cruise through the . . .

Mr. Bilous: It's an eight-track.

Mr. Schmidt: Yeah. I had to have my minivan modified to include an eight-track player so that I could listen to my old polka eight-tracks.

The point is, Mr. Speaker, that I think the government is moving ever so slowly in the right direction to decarbonize our electricity system and to upgrade, but I don't think they're going far enough, and they're not being honest about some of the cost pressures.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Calgary-East has risen to debate.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to express my support for this significant legislation that will modernize our electricity laws, Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022. I would like to thank the Minister of Energy and the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity for taking this important initiative to ensure our system is able to meet the fast-emerging technological innovations and promote investor confidence through sustained focus on regulatory clarity and efficiency.

Alberta's energy-only market continues to attract new investment and competition. It is a good thing that we maintained this type of market through Bill 18 in 2019 after consulting with a cross-section of stakeholders. During that consultation process stakeholders voiced strong support for the energy-only market, saying that it offers structural and administrative simplicity and has a proven track record for providing both affordable electricity and a reliable supply of electricity.

Investors expressed confidence and willingness to invest in an energy-only market, saying that it is established and understood, which offers greater certainty regarding its future performance. Technological and industrial developments continue to evolve rapidly, producing new challenges and opportunities as well.

We are seeing a transition from centralized to decentralized generation systems and a baseload to intermittent electricity generation. Alberta's electricity system, like many globally, is seeing the way that electricity producers and consumers interact with and use the electricity grid evolve as innovative technologies and changing consumer behaviours are increasingly asking a one-way-flow power system to operate in a bidirectional, or two-way, manner. This can also be seen from the significant rise in distributed energy resources, including distributed generation, generation like solar panels, small natural gas fuelled generators, energy storage, electric vehicles, and controllable loads.

With these emerging advancements occurring, Bill 22 will reinforce our energy-only market and maintain market competitiveness. It will ensure consumers have safe, reliable, and affordable electricity while promoting investor confidence through regulatory efficiency, policy clarity, and removal of needless barriers.

More and more consumers have expressed interest in a self-supply with export system. The Alberta Utilities Commission expressed that there are limited circumstances where the owner of a generating unit is allowed to consume electricity produced from that generating unit on their own property while also exporting the electricity produced by the generating unit for exchange through the Power Pool. Where no exemptions apply, the owner of a generating unit is prohibited from using that unit to supply on-site load and export electricity generated for exchange through the Power Pool.

The AUC recognizes that current legislation was enacted prior to the recent increase in distributed generation and the affordability of economic, small-scale generating units. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, in late 2019 consultation on the issue of power plant self-supply and export was made, and the majority of the 33 submissions received were in favour of the option of having unlimited self-supply and export, which requires a change to the statutory scheme and may require changes to existing transmission and distribution tariff structures.

A second round of consultation was made in 2020, which was focused on the market and tariff implications of unlimited self-supply and export. The AUC published a discussion paper which included a summary of the summations received from the said consultations. With thoughtful consideration of all the relevant matters, including the result of the consultations, and to ensure ongoing fairness relative to the transmission cost of uneconomic bypass, this bill will enable unlimited self-supply with export, which can assist industrial and commercial operators in managing electricity costs, promote the reliability of the integrated electricity system, and reduce emissions. It will clarify tariff treatment of self-supply with export projects in the spirit of fairness and ensure that these projects will align with an efficient, fair, competitive electricity market.

Currently, Mr. Speaker, Alberta's system is based on companies that generate electricity as their core business plus limited exceptions such as industrial system designations and small-scale generation. Commercial and industrial businesses who would like to generate electricity and export it to the grid are currently not permitted to do so. By enabling self-supply with export, everyone who wants to generate their own electricity will be able to do so and export the excess electricity to the grid and will pay their fair share of the overall system costs from which they benefit, including transmission.

Increased self-supply with export is not expected to increase electricity costs for Albertans. Rather, the additional generation would help stabilize energy prices and encourage electricity market competition. With greater competition consumers will expect more options and different offers. Also, the system is designed to ensure that those participating pay their fair share of system costs, which, in turn, would keep the system costs stable for consumers.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, it will explicitly provide the definition for an energy storage resource, which is lacking in the current legislative framework, inadvertently limiting its application. It is aimed to provide clarity to regulators and ensure certainty to investors. It will also identify parameters of users, ownership, and cost recovery. Over the past several years there has been an increased interest in energy storage projects in Alberta, particularly in the last couple of years. The significant development of new large-scale renewable projects has resulted in substantial interest in new energy storage projects.

Canada's largest solar energy project is under way in Vulcan county, which attracts big investors like Amazon, apart from their announced investment in a solar energy project in Newell county, east of Calgary, which will produce over 195,000 megawatt hours, MWh, of renewable energy. That is enough to power more than 18,000 Alberta homes for a year. So as we promote diversification of our economy, we have to modernize our legislation and systems for us to address growing development.

Energy storage is an evolving technology with potential benefits for all aspects of Alberta's electric energy system. Energy storage has many different attributes and, depending on the application, may look like generation, load, transmission, or distribution. Energy storage technology is also scalable, resulting in deployment to the smaller residential scale or all the way to the larger commercial projects.

Bill 22 will also begin winding down the Balancing Pool by redistributing its remaining responsibilities and laying the groundwork for dissolution in the coming years. Established to support Alberta's fair, efficient, and openly competitive electricity market, the Balancing Pool's primary role of managing fixed-price deals with electricity producers ended in 2020. Actions taken by the previous government resulted in the Balancing Pool losing 1.34 billion of taxpayer dollars.

Another positive impact that the bill introduces, Mr. Speaker, is the establishment of a long-term planning framework to modernize Alberta's distribution system. Grid modernization is needed to support the evolving system, and should there be no context of long-term planning now, unexpected costs may result in the future. Proper consideration must be made respecting the needs of rural electrification associations or disconnected municipalities. Suitable development of road maps and consideration of storage, electric vehicle charging, energy efficiency, and distributed generation must also be made with minimal technical standards.

To ensure accomplishment of these needed modernizations of distribution policies, this bill will authorize the minister to guide planning frameworks through regulations. Alberta's current policy framework does not require distribution companies to proactively plan for adoption of distributed energy resources and does not require distribution facility owners to consider the system benefits which these resources could provide.

However, proactive planning of grid modernization could provide for better cost management and improve customer outcomes.

Legislative amendments are required to ensure the distribution system can enable the development of distributed energy resources in an orderly and efficient manner. It is expected that a transparent and co-ordinated long-term planning framework will support an orderly and cost-efficient transition to a modernized grid that will integrate more distributed energy resources.

With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, the government seeks to improve the lives of all Albertans. Alberta's recovery plan is set on an unprecedented path towards a new, innovative, and diversified energy future, recognizing that the development of sustainable forms of energy will become more of a driver of investment moving forward. It is the provincial government's ongoing, aggressive response to the impact of the pandemic and distribution in global energy markets.

As we strive to lead the country in economic growth, we are seeing new businesses and more investors coming to our province as we promote diversification. That is why the changes that this bill carries . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022. I have a number of comments on the bill but also want to talk a little bit about Alberta's electricity system as a whole, going back to the mid-2000s. Really, that is where we need to go back to to truly understand why today Albertans are paying such a high price for electricity.

But I'll begin with some comments about the bill. I have a couple of questions, actually, for the minister. I know that the minister brought forward a bill similar to this. I believe it was last fall. I'm curious why it got pulled then to be reintroduced now. I appreciate that there are some changes between the two bills. I believe the first iteration of this bill didn't deal at all with the Balancing Pool and that this iteration does, but I'm just curious why that was, if the minister, through Committee of the Whole, could walk us through that process.

What this bill does I'm largely in support of, Mr. Speaker, as far as providing the ability for . . . [interjection] Oh, I don't even have to wait for Committee of the Whole. I'll give way to the minister.

Mr. Nally: Yeah. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for making way. That's a good question. We had this in another iteration. While it was in Committee of the Whole, we had some stakeholders that had some concerns that they had already made some investments based on the current climate of regulation in the industry. So if you go back to the bill, we put some amendments in there that allow and address those companies that had made investments so that they won't be unfairly punished with new regulation. It essentially gives them a path to industrial system designation. I don't know the exact number, because it's always fluid, but it's around 18 companies in that position. Then, as you know, we prorogued, so we had to start again, and Bill 86 has now become Bill 22.

There was a second question, and it escapes me. But it'll come to me, and I'll stand up on another intervention later on. Thanks, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bilous: Okay. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the minister, I do thank him for his comments and response. It's quite nice to actually have an exchange where we're talking about policy, so that was quite enjoyable. I appreciate that and recognize that that's a very good reason to pull the bill back, recognizing that companies had made investments.

I know for a fact – I'm curious, and if the minister has an answer to this, I welcome him to stand up, and I'll take his interjection. I know Amazon's AWS has made an announcement to invest significant dollars in Alberta. It'll take a period of about 14 years to get the full investment, but I know they've already begun. In fact, I found it fascinating to learn that their three facilities are powered by solar, so they've invested significantly in a number of different solar farms. I'm curious if – I would imagine and hope that this bill in its current iteration has obviously recognized that investment to ensure that that will be accounted for.

I found it fascinating that Amazon – and I sat down with AWS. I found it fascinating that their plan to go – you know, using renewables to power all of their facilities by the mid-20s is incredibly ambitious, but kudos to them, Mr. Speaker, for doing that. Their three facilities that they are building are all going to be powered by renewables. I think that that's very good news, and I think that as much as we can as legislators encourage folks to generate is good to see. [interjection] I see the minister has risen. I will give way again.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you for giving way. To answer the question – and I won't speak to specific company specifics – I'll say that the legislation was written so that if a company was doing self-supply with export on January 1, 2022, they are the ones that will have that path to ISD status, industrial system designation. If there were companies that started doing it after that, then they will not have that same path to ISD, but they certainly would be welcome to apply for it.

The good news with respect to the company that you mentioned – and again, well, I'll go back to not using company names. Any company, whether they're in business before or after January 1, 2022, will be able to produce electricity in theory for themselves cheaper than they could buy it on the open market. That's a competitive advantage for the province, why it's an investment attraction tool. They could sell the excess to the grid. They will in fact be able to do that. It's a great business model.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: I'll just remind the member that you have an extra two minutes because of the interventions, so you have 13 minutes left.

Mr. Bilous: Great. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, and through you to the minister: thank you for that response. That is great news.

I do agree with the minister that this is an additional competitive advantage for Alberta as far as companies being able to generate their own supply and then sell excess to the system. I don't know how many jurisdictions have enabled that, but I would imagine that Alberta is one of the few that provides that ability to companies. So that's wonderful news.

As I said at the outset, I don't have really any opposition to this bill. Again, providing the ability for producers is fantastic. Now, I know that energy storage – one of the issues is that it was previously undefined. It's because up until recently energy storage was – well, it just wasn't possible, you know, to store significant amounts of energy to be used later on. Again, of course, with evolving technology that's changed significantly. So it's good to see that our electricity statutes legislation is being amended.

I do want to talk a little bit about – I know, you know, Madam Speaker, that when we go back and forth, there are comments that are made as far as the current reasons for why the current price of electricity is so high. I just want to comment on that because it goes back to actually before my time in this Chamber. But also when I first was elected in this Chamber, there were a number of debates that occurred about the transmission lines being built. I'm even going to reference a couple of articles that were written a long time ago.

You know, Madam Speaker, back in – well, let's start in 2009 with Bill 50 under the PCs. That legislation was completely contentious. In fact, my colleague referenced Joe Anglin. Joe did make a political career out of fighting against the government's incredible overbuild in the electricity system. It started back in 2009, when the PC government brought in legislation that removed the obligation the government had for public hearings around new power lines.

Of course, when we're building power lines throughout Alberta, where are they being built? They're being built through rural Alberta, through people's yards and acreages and farms and ranches. So there were a lot of very angry Albertans. In fact, I remember the Member for Edmonton-North West telling me stories about going to town halls where Albertans were irate with the government about this bill, Bill 50. I encourage members to comb the media if they're interested to see just how upset Albertans were with the fact that the government removed this obligation to consult.

That was one of the first steps that the government did in the overbuild of the transmission lines. I'm going to give a shout-out to our former leader and my former colleague Brian Mason, who in 2011 was sounding the alarm bells that the transmission lines that the government claimed were necessary to prevent rolling brownouts, which was hogwash, Madam Speaker – it was not true. That was not the reason for the massive overbuild. The massive overbuild was, in fact, because the government was planning to sell electricity down in the States but didn't want to admit that.

You know, back in 2011 – and I believe my colleague the Member for Lethbridge-West has already tabled these articles, because I know she's referenced them – Brian Mason was warning Albertans that their power bills were going to double because of this massive overbuild in the electricity system, and it wasn't just Mr. Mason that was calling it. He looked to a study that was done by the Alberta Direct Connect Consumer Association, and the study indicated that power bills were set to jump 65 per cent. That was in I believe it was an April article. Then, again, in May another news article talked about how much power bills were going to jump. I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that I encourage government members to look back at Hansard because I'm also on the record in this Chamber talking about how that massive overbuild was not only costing Alberta taxpayers at the time but that it was going to cost them on their monthly bills.

Again, this started, you know, before my term in 2012, but this continued through 2012. As these commitments were already made, funding contracts were already signed – I know one of the members earlier had asked: why, when we formed government in 2015, didn't we cancel it? Well, the answer is quite simple. The contracts were already signed. The money was already out the door. To cancel them at that point would have cost Alberta taxpayers even more without the lines being completed. So it was a lose-lose situation that we were in. That's a bit of history that Albertans need to be reminded of, Madam Speaker.

The other part. When we talk about the coal phase-out and the transition off coal: that file I was heavily involved with when we were government. In fact, I toured the province and spoke to Albertans in town halls throughout the province. What I reminded Albertans about: yes, we were accelerating the phase-out of coal. Companies had a 12-year runway, from 2018 to 2030, to phase out coal, to transition to natural gas. Now, interestingly, companies have accelerated their phase-out, and in fact I believe Capital Power will have their final facility converted by next year. Now, I may have misspoke by a year, but they're going to be completed very soon. TransAlta is not far behind.

I had conversations with these companies about when people talk about clean coal and technology to bolt onto existing power facilities. The example, of course, that everyone likes to use is in Saskatchewan. The cost of that is prohibitive to the point that companies told me: it's less expensive, it makes more sense for us to transition to gas right now rather than invest in an expensive technology to try to clean the emissions as they're coming out.

The other thing that's interesting, Madam Speaker, is that Alberta had 18 – I'm trying to think of the term. But our regulations affected six out of the 18 because regulations under the Harper government in 2012 phased out 12 of the 18 facilities. The difference is that that government provided zero supports for workers, for communities, and for the companies to transition. Zero supports. Now, I'd love to hear from the members of this House who were part of the Harper government that brought forward those regulations. In fact, it was the Premier in his former role who was a member of cabinet, a part of the decision to phase out 12 of 18 coal-fired facilities. So when the government jumps up and screams at the NDP for phasing out six, their own leader, the Premier, and the newly elected member, who were part of the Harper caucus, phased out 12 of 18 coal-fired facilities with zero supports.

So when the members opposite yell at the opposition for phasing out the six, the runway we gave them was longer, and we had supports. We had millions of dollars set aside for retraining, for those that were close to retirement to be able to top up their pension so they wouldn't lose out on pension dollars, because the facilities, when they transitioned to gas, required fewer workers, about a third fewer, and supports for the companies to be able to transition. Now, the government shouldn't decry at all about supports for industry when they, too, have . . .

Ms Lovely: What about the people of Forestburg? What about all those people in Forestburg who lost their jobs?

Mr. Bilous: . . . when the supports that we provided . . .

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, I hate to interrupt the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, but if we're going to have conversations, I would prefer that we take them to the lounge.

Member, you can continue.

Mr. Bilous: Yes. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. The member that was asking about the facility in Forestburg: that facility was phased out under the Harper regulations, not under the Alberta NDP, so it's a great example of how the government uses misinformation to try to blame our government when the reality is that she should be asking that question to the Premier because it was his regulations.

Now, again, Madam Speaker, I'm encouraging Albertans and members of this Chamber to go visit Hansard for not just the Alberta Legislature. Go look at the federal Hansard, and members will see that it was the Harper government that phased out 12 of the 18 coal-fired facilities. That is a fact. That is not disputable. That's not an opinion of mine; that happened, factually. Yes, we brought forward regulations to phase out the remaining six of 18 coal-fired facilities. That is also a fact. They had a long runway with supports to help them convert. So the difference between the Harper government and the two sitting MLAs that were part of that government and the NDP government is that we had supports for those communities. I sat down with the mayor of Forestburg, I sat down with councillors and reeves of all of the coal-affected communities, and we asked them: what supports do they need so that their communities can remain vibrant? Then we provided those supports.

So I won't be lectured by government members about how decisions that we made impacted their communities. I recognize that it impacted their communities, but that's why we were there to support them through their transition.

The Acting Speaker: Any other hon. members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 22. I relish any opportunity to see the government correcting themselves, having initially entered into this process last term and now coming back to fix things up. I actually appreciated the comments from the associate minister of natural gas as to the reason why. It's always nice to be able to offer some support to the government when they make a decision that I think is good.

I was hoping that given the interim time, given the reason, that they had suggested, that they wanted to make a change, they might have done a little bit more, but I certainly like the direction that we're going here. I'm always wishing that the government would dig in a bit more and kind of get the work done, but I certainly want to commend them for kind of catching up with the rest of the world in terms of moving toward a better electricity grid, making sure that we are providing the infrastructure necessary for the future. We know that the future is certainly going to be a lot more about electricity and a lot less about coal.

[The Speaker in the chair]

As the previous speaker suggested, you know, the movement away from coal is something that is not actually a partisan idea. As was mentioned, it was actually initiated in Canada under the Harper Conservative government and continued with us. The major difference, of course, is that we actually did something to facilitate the movement forward in a positive way both for people who worked in the industry and for institutions that are involved in the transition whereas the Harper government simply didn't do that with the first 12 coal plants that they shut down.

Now, we know it's very difficult, and we know that it's easy for local MLAs to kind of blame the government when people go through difficult times, but I just want to, you know, reflect on the fact that the Conservatives often suggest that people just need to learn how to retrain themselves and catch a new job. In fact, I think we had an announcement out of the Finance minister's office recently that if you don't like the job you have now, you should just get a better one. We certainly know that the stance from the Conservative side of the House is that things change, economies change, and people just need to fend for themselves, yet here they are in the House often complaining, as we just heard from the Member for Camrose sort of chattering in the background with the last speaker, that individuals were hurt. It's funny that the government suddenly is concerned about that when they haven't been concerned about it with any of the other major transitions that have happened in society over the last number of years.

Moving beyond that, let's talk about the positives that I see moving forward here. I certainly like the move toward electrification being done in a way which is responsible and inclusive and forward thinking, future oriented. I know that it certainly was the direction that we had taken on this side of the House, both when we were in government and currently, in that we had had since we first came into government a very extensive climate leadership plan, that was ably brought forward by the then environment minister, which actually made some huge steps forward in our electrical grid and our joining the rest of the world in doing two very important things; that is, creating work and industry here in the province of Alberta and taking care of the environment simultaneously, which I think was quite effectively done under the climate leadership plan under the previous environment minister.

There were some real specific benefits that came from that kind of a plan. I was very happy to see the renewable energy program auction for provision of energy into the electrical grid, for renewable energies, and I can tell you that as someone who was watching that bid happening for the very first time and wondering what kind of a price we would get out of it, we were ecstatic to see the price that was being offered by international corporations to provide electricity in the province of Alberta at a rate that was actually better than many other facilities such as coal or even natural gas and all being done by wind, which had multiple benefits.

One, of course, is the intended benefit, and that is to make the shift toward renewable energies, because we certainly care for our children and our children's future and we love to see anything that's done to ensure that we can decarbonize the environment and provide for our children to have a good life, as we ourselves have been able to have. Unfortunately, we've kind of set them up a little bit with the climate, and we need to do something significant about that.

Not only was I thrilled with the movement forward because of the environmental benefits of it, but I also was thrilled because we really gave a boost to Alberta's renewable energy sector. The massive amount of investment that suddenly came into the province of Alberta because we were moving on these renewables and were providing long-term stable contracts in a competitive bid process is quite significant. The benefits for Albertans are that many jobs were created in the construction of these wind farms in southern Alberta, a place where jobs were quite needed. Of course, many people were able to begin businesses associated with the construction process and were able to enter into the economy in a really positive way that is both environmental and economically successful. We were thrilled to see that kind of movement forward.

Of course, what we've subsequently seen is continued investment, because we knew from our experience with the oil sands that if the government makes an initial investment, gets things going, it often stimulates the investment from the market. And exactly as Peter Lougheed did with the oil sands, we did with wind turbines in southern Alberta, and we were successful in very much the same way. I'm glad to see this is growing. I'm glad to see it's very successful.

Again, not only was I happy about the environment, not only was I happy about the jobs and the investment, but I was happy because in the second round of the renewable energy program bid process we made a requirement that you must involve First Nations communities in the bid process. We went through, you know, a very detailed conversation with the First Nations communities, saying: how much? If we made it too high, nobody would be able to bid in because they just simply wouldn't have the money or only those already wealthy nations would be able to bid in. If we made it too low, of course, you begin to wonder how much influence they'll actually have. We certainly wanted them to be at the table properly as full partners in the process.

So we came to an agreement as to what that level would be, and we then sat back and wondered: now, will this change the bids that are coming in? Will it change the prices that we were able to obtain? Lo and behold, it did not. We had virtually the same price come in in the bids that required First Nations partnership. That was an excellent outcome, not only excellent because we were continuing the good work that was done from the original round of the REP program, but it expanded the work by making sure that First Nations were beneficiaries of the movement into the future in this province, were not left behind. They have all too often been left behind in the history of Alberta.

As a result, we actually kind of coincidentally, to be honest, had nations from all three of our treaty areas benefit from this program: the Blood Tribe in Treaty 7, the Paul band in Treaty 6, and the Sawridge band First Nation in Treaty 8. We saw the benefits spread throughout the province, not just in the southern part of the province, and we saw an opportunity for First Nations to build their equity, to build their role in the economy in this province, and to do good things for citizens in this province, as we should always be making sure that they have the opportunity to do.

It was really a successful process and one that I think, you know, would have been nice to have continued and moved forward on because we know that the world is moving in that direction. It's not a left-right issue. Some of the most well-known right-wing financial groups in the world, like BlackRock, for example, are very clear that they want to move in this direction. They see it as the future of the world, and they are actually making massive investment decisions based on exactly those principles of ensuring that as we move forward, we move forward into the new economy and not the economy of the 1970s, and that will benefit all of society not only here in Alberta but around the world.

Our people are already experiencing the horrible effects of climate change. I was extremely concerned about people living in India over the last few weeks, where temperatures were hitting well over 60 degrees Celsius at one point in some areas, and people literally were dying of heat because they were too exposed to it without having any ability to respond.

We're going to see more of that. All of the research indicates that that is the direction that we're heading, that we're going to see more climate disasters and that that's going to not only be horrendous for the people who experience it but is also going to be very, very concerning for economies around the world, who are going to have to adapt to it, so it is responsible for governments to make the choice to adapt to it now so that the big financial hit doesn't come at the last second, when too much work is required to move forward and we just simply do not have the resources to do the things we have to do. Doing it now is the right thing, so I certainly think that there are some great movements forward here.

I was also very proud of working with the Indigenous climate leadership program in my ministry, where we were able to see a massive investment in solar and connection to the grid. I have been down to Montana band to see their over one megawatt system. I've been down to Samson band to see their over one megawatt system. I haven't, unfortunately, been able to return to the Mikisew up in Fort Chip, but I know that their solar system is there and it's actually replacing some diesel, which is one of the worst forms of energy generation. Of course, I've been to many, many other bands, like Little Red and Tallcree, where other aspects like solar panels on the roofs of buildings and the building in Tallcree of their new school on environmental principles were all made possible through the decisions of having a comprehensive climate leadership plan. I certainly wish this government would actually develop a comprehensive climate leadership plan, would actually plan for the future both economically and environmentally. They have not, so quite disappointing.

The one piece of this bill that I was kind of hopeful for seeing a little bit about was storage, because, of course, that is going to be a major part of the movement forward. I just wish that more had been done to actually provide resources or to establish mechanisms for the development of storage techniques and so on. There are very many varieties that are to be discussed.

I know the government has complained about the overbuild in the electrical system, but that has been well responded to by the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. I also want to remind the government that an overbuilt system actually is in itself a storage facility, and they themselves have put forward legislation to ensure that that is recognized, so it seems ironic that they complain yet actually have legislation that supports it.

Overall, I just want to say that I look forward to a future in which we build the economy of Alberta by recognizing where we are going. You know, the famous Gretzky statement "Go to where the puck is going and not to where it has been" is always a good message for governments. Too often this government is going back to an economy that was quite positive and significant in the 1970s but is not going to be the economy of the 2070s. We want to get ourselves in line. We want to move forward, and I certainly want to support this government in any of their legislation that does help move us forward.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to join in the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this morning to speak to Bill 22, Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022. I have to say that, you know, as a child I grew up in a home where we frequently spoke about electricity. My dad started to work with what was then Calgary Power in the '70s, then transitioned to TransAlta, and then after TransAlta transitioned to Fortis. So when I was a kid, electricity was something that my dad was very passionate about and something that we talked about quite frequently. I grew up in Whitecourt, and that's where he worked with TransAlta. Because we were a small community, many of my science teachers throughout the years asked my dad to come in to provide some sort of electricity education for me and my peers, and it was quite exciting for me as a kid because I got to really understand how electricity is distributed. My dad was a lineman, so we often got to go out and watch him climb poles and work on lines. So talking about electricity now as an adult is something that I feel kind of nostalgic about, I guess.

When we're talking about being able to modernize the electricity grid, I have a general understanding of what the province looks like in terms of electricity and the distribution and the DFOs that are part of this province and, really, all of those Albertans that rely on those DFOs when they're looking at their energy. When I see that we're moving forward with, you know, modernizing our electricity, I think it's a huge step.

I know that this was previously introduced by this government, I believe, and it didn't go forward. It was abandoned in the last session, and now, you know, we're seeing it again today. I think that there's so much in this legislation that I can support. Anything that looks at ways that we can modernize Alberta's electricity grid is a positive thing, and if implemented correctly, this could really have a positive impact on Albertans and the way that they are able to access electricity.

I know I'm really proud of the work that we did as government when it came to supporting a renewable energy sector. I saw many of my neighbours install the solar panels on their roofs. You know, it's something that we talk about in this province when it comes to alternative renewable energy, and I think that there's quite an appetite to look at ways to do that. Some of it is for perhaps cost benefit. Some of it is environmental impact. I think that there are lots of mitigating factors when it comes to ways to boost our renewable energy sector, and I think that Albertans are excited about that and they look forward to some of the alternatives that are out there.

I know a few of my friends have transitioned from different careers. They're now in the solar panel installation phase of energy, and it's something that they're excited about. Sitting down and talking with them can be a little confusing because I don't understand all the ins and outs of how their installation of it works and how they assess how many panels each roof should have and which way you're facing and all of those intricacies, but hearing the excitement and passion in what they do and being able to relay that to consumers in the province is really a good thing.

When I look at this Bill 22, I think that there are so many things that could have positive impacts long term. Unfortunately, what we have seen is this government that really has delayed the process and failed Albertans. When we look at the outrageous, skyrocketing costs for utilities, you know, we were pleading with this government to extend the ability for residents to not have to pay in the middle of winter, and that was rejected. There were some real things that could have happened to really help Albertans at the time. Even the fact that this legislation was introduced and then taken away and now, six months later, is reintroduced – six months ago this perhaps could have had a significant impact on so many Albertans that are struggling with high utility costs.

When I think about the trust that Albertans have in this government and their ability to modernize the electricity system, I know that there are some questions about what's going to happen. I know that many Albertans have told me that they simply just don't trust this government with their pocketbooks. They've watched utility costs skyrocket, insurance rates skyrocket, and we have a government that just talks about "Trust us," and it continues to be shown over and over that this government has failed.

So while I read the legislation – and I can see many points throughout this that are great areas. You know, being able to define the energy storage, talking about self-supply and export, requiring the DFOs, or the distribution facility owners, to prepare long-term distribution system plans: these are all really important things that we absolutely do need to look at and we need to take action on. I just think that there's a general mistrust for how that will roll out.

You know, this government talked about providing supports to Albertans when it comes to their skyrocketing utility rates. I get e-mails from constituents whose bills went from $88 to $475. That is something that is just simply a deal breaker for someone of fixed income.

When we look at the resources that have been cut back, they have cut those living on AISH, which is tough to make ends meet, and when you are experiencing these unexpected costs, it literally means food, utilities. So there's a general distrust when it comes to the capacity for this government to really have Albertans' best interests in mind.

I know, when it comes to working with stakeholders, that there are also some questions about their ability to consult. Because there are some major distribution facility owners, I hope that those organizations have been consulted, that they have talked with those in rural Alberta, because the way that they have grids and the way that they distribute power all across the province is different. The needs are different.

We look at, you know, some of the calls that I know my dad would go on in rural Alberta, and it's quite a bit different than the structure and the infrastructure that's provided in a city like Edmonton. So what is the capacity for this to roll out equally all across the province? Has that been considered? Have we looked at the different needs? Have we talked to the municipalities and the leadership within those communities to talk about what it looks like to roll out a plan?

I think that this is something that really should be taken into consideration, knowing how many decisions have been made without the key players being at the table. You know, we talk about the importance of being elected officials, and then we see the disregard for that when it comes to municipalities. I think municipalities have significant insight into what the needs of their communities are.

I would suggest that a community like Fort Saskatchewan, where I also lived when my dad worked for TransAlta, versus Whitecourt versus Boyle – all have very different needs and capacities. What does it mean for those that are doing the work? Have they been talked to? When they're talking about doing this rollout, is it with those that are doing the work? Has it been in consultation with the municipal leaders and how it will look in their communities? I think that something that we can all agree on is that adding more energy storage to the grid is a wonderful thing – we support that – but what does that look like for different areas in the province?

I think that, you know, something happened between the introduction of Bill 22 last fall, that ended up dying on the Order Paper, and then today with Bill 22. What happened in that time period? Was there information that, you know, was absolutely needed that came to be and now we're going to see it in here? Were there things that government thought, "Okay; no, we were completely on the wrong track"? We don't know what happens because of the secrecy that's going on, and it's just not clear, Madam Speaker, what this government is doing to get direct support out the door, what's happening with the decisions around this piece of legislation.

I know that it's concerning that there's this potential here for some great work to be done about modernizing our electricity grid, but based on the record of what we've seen over and over with this government, they simply can't be trusted. I hope to hear throughout this debate, you know, some of those questions addressed. What happened with the previous bill? Why was it allowed to just die on the Order Paper? What's the difference that they heard in that time? Was there something significantly wrong with that piece of legislation? Did industry come forward and express some glaring issues? What caused it to die on the Order Paper, and what's now happening that's different in this legislation?

I can say that Albertans are struggling, and when we look at utility costs and the outrageous costs that so many households are facing, something that is going to have an impact on that is welcome. One hundred per cent I would support anything that's going to have positive long-term impacts, but we just need more information about what that plan is in this. It's easy to support in the way that it's laid out, but I just have this hesitancy when I look at the track record and how many times this government continues to let down Alberta families, especially in a time where affordability is top of mind for so many.

We have other pieces of legislation before the House where we're talking about the high cost of insurance, where we're talking about just general affordability and the concerns that Albertans are facing. We're talking about them on this side of the House, yet we're not seeing legislation that's actually having any long-term effect. I just really hope that we're seeing a modernization of our grid to add energy storage and really reduce costs in the long term. That would be the ideal outcome of this legislation, and I look forward to getting some more information throughout the debate. I think that it's a wonderful opportunity to hear from all members about some of those details that are outstanding.

When we talk about, you know, being transparent and being able to really have a good understanding, the electricity grid in the province perhaps might not be an area that most Albertans truly understand. It's quite complex. When we're hearing that this legislation is going to help, that's something where we truly want to be able to say, "It helps because" and being able to identify clearly what those actions are going to be, whether it's supporting infrastructure across the province, being able to look at transmission lines and what that potentially could be across the province. I know that there's some understanding about there being alternatives to nonwire. I think that as a kid I had a really clear understanding of what lines were across the province, because no matter where we went, my dad was able to identify: I worked on that line. I think that there are some great conversations happening. I just really hope that we're able to kind of break through that and get a good understanding.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next up to speak I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I just want to make a couple of comments in regard to Bill 22. There are sort of three areas that I am particularly interested in categorically, and those are, of course, transmission lines and generation and storage.

I guess I'll start with the last one. I find it intriguing how this bill is sort of setting some frameworks for energy storage here in the province of Alberta, defining what energy storage could entail. I would be curious for the minister to give more information about initiatives that this government and different energy companies might be pursuing to move forward on energy storage. You know, it's just a very interesting way to make an electric grid more efficient and take advantage of generation of electricity during nonpeak hours, right?

Of course, electricity is transported around the province or to any given area, and the further that you transport that power, the more you lose through line loss and so forth. You know, to be able to build generation capacity in proximity to where most electricity is being used is one thing and then to build storage capacity in the same way – right? – so that you have some storage capacity that's in reasonable proximity to where the electricity is being generated.

You know, I've seen some very interesting different techniques in different parts of the world for how you can effectively store energy for off-peak hours and then bring it back when, let's say, you have rush hour or during the dinner hour or when people are using air conditioners more and stuff like that, right? Now that we have a defining framework for storage of electricity, I would like to see how we might pursue that in a reasonably environmentally sustainable way.

I can remember seeing one particular facility set up where they were pumping water during the evening and the nighttime, when the electricity demand was down, up into an elevated storage facility, like a lake that was built at a high level, and then running that same water back down through turbines during the day so that you could have a cycle of power that was already generated and then recycle it as hydro power and put that back into the grid. There are lots of ways you can pursue this. Batteries as well are another one.

In regard to generation – right? – again, as we move away from coal, which is a logical and, I think, economic and moral imperative for us to continue to do, I think we saw power companies, in fact, accelerate their conversion of generation from coal to even exceed the expectations that were set by our provincial government and the federal government and to actually retool the generators, power plants even faster than what the timelines were originally. You could see that there was incentive and motivation to do so. There was good economic motivation and incentive to do so, and of course the expectation to decarbonize is paramount.

I find it a bit disturbing to see the associate minister and the Premier talking about coal again, talking about clean coal. I mean, this is obviously the opposite of the direction of the world right now and obviously the opposite direction of what is actually happening here in the province of Alberta. You know, I don't know what the logic is behind that, if they're just trying to plumb some depths of polling to try to secure votes based on false pretenses or something, because it certainly is a false pretense. You're not going to bring back coal generation. I mean, that would be insane, right? Any suggestion of that is dishonest, quite frankly, and I really think it should not be included in the debate around electricity, in any legitimate debate around electricity.

The other parts that I had mentioned were in regard to generation and diversifying our generation capacity. One thing that's always intrigued me for years – right? – is for people to be able to generate their own electricity, not burning coal, of course, but through solar panels or wind power and so forth, and being able to sell that power back onto the grid. The degree to which you can enhance or somehow get people to do this, have incentives to do so, I think really can help to diversify our electricity grid.

You know, it's not just in order to decarbonize and to localize electricity generation, but it's a good safety net. Quite frankly, if you have all of your generation eggs in one basket, so to speak, and then those systems fail – right? – you get brownouts and blackouts, rolling brownouts and blackouts. It really can cripple an economy and really send a bad message to investors if you can't keep your grid up and running and diversified.

Anyway, my point is, Mr. Speaker, if you can incentivize people to put, let's say, solar panels onto their home, not just by making it cheaper to buy panels and so forth, which is getting cheaper all the time, but also to give a differential price for that electricity that you're producing on the roof of your house not just to use for yourself, which is yours because you generated it – the sun gave it to you, and away you go – but also to be able to sell that onto the grid, right? If you can sell that electricity that is monitored to be coming from solar panels and sell it at a better price, an incentivized price, back onto the grid, then lots and lots of people will put on panels. I mean, lots of people are putting on panels anyway.

I mean, it's certainly my intention to do so. I kind of missed the city of Edmonton's special deal. I think it was all taken up in about a couple of hours, right? They had a subsidy for panels and so forth. I mean, it's just, really, a great thing to do. I think it's a responsible thing to do, and by having a differential price, in other words a better price, for the electricity you're generating off the roof of your garage, you will make it look more attractive for people to consider doing that, you know. I think that there's a lot of future in that as well.

Another thing that we can do to help to maintain the safety and the integrity of our electricity generation system is to have more electricity generation capacity with smaller units closer to where it's being used, right? You see in Calgary, for example, the power company there really doing that, quite aggressively building smaller generating units around the city so that you're reducing line loss. You're not producing electricity somehow all the way over in Hanna or just south of Hanna and bringing it all the way to Calgary. If you have a smaller generating unit that's close to the city, then it's more efficient, and quite frankly it helps for the safety and the integrity of the system as well.

We have a lot of work to do for electricity generation and transmission and storage here in the province of Alberta. We know that at the much larger, higher level view this is the future of how we build a more sustainable energy future for our province and as you see electrification taking hold, right? I know that other members were talking about people building political careers based on opposing the massive transmission capacity that the PCs were embarked on back 10 or 15 years ago. I mean, I certainly was part of that as well, but also now here we are in 2022, and we're looking to really upgrade our electricity transmission with people using electric cars and so forth and different other forms of electric transport, electric-driven industrial development. You know, the long game for it is really not bad, right? Mr. Speaker, you have increased generation capacity and transmission capacity. We need to bring that down to a neighbourhood level, more or less. I think that's the next step, right?

I was listening to the radio the other day, you know, talking about: well, you have one person on the block, say, who is plugging in their car in their garage – right? – but what happens when suddenly you have 30 people plugging in their car in the garage on one block? Then suddenly that level of electricity transmission needs to be upgraded. I think I'm the first person on my block plugging in my car in the garage, and I expect there will be a whole lot more people doing it in the next number of years, especially with the price of gasoline and other incentives as well. Plus, it's quite fun to drive. I have an electric hybrid . . .

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. Under, I believe, Standing Order 4(2.1) we are adjourned until 1:30 this afternoon.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, it is with our greatest admiration and respect: there is a gratitude to the members of the families who share the burden of public office and public service. Today I'd like to welcome the family of the former member Jack Cookson who are seated in the Speaker's gallery. Mr. Cookson was the former Member for Lacombe who served three terms in this Assembly from 1971 to 1982. He passed away on July 8, 2021, at the age of 92.

I would ask each of the family members to rise as I call your name and remain standing until you've all been introduced. Jack's son Bruce Cookson, his granddaughter Kasia, both joining us from North Vancouver; Jack's daughter Sally Weenink and her husband, Ken Weenink, from Lacombe; and Jack's granddaughter Amanda Cookson and her friend Darcy Meyer from Calgary.

Hon. members, I ask you to rise and spend a brief moment reflecting upon Mr. Cookson's service each as we may have known him.

Hon. members, please welcome this family to the Assembly.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: It brings me a special joy to introduce to all members of the Assembly this afternoon a special guest and the partner of the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, Ms Jo Cusack. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members, we have several guests joining us in the gallery today, including parent council representatives and students from the Conseil scolaire Centre-Nord francophone schools of l'école Gabrielle-Roy and l'école Michaëlle-Jean. They are guests of the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Also sitting in the gallery today are 15 guests from Lakeland school in Dewberry. They are guests of the hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright. I invite you to all rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East has risen.

SCAN Unit Property Shutdown in Calgary

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the MLA for Lethbridge-East I'm very happy to report to this Chamber that today Lethbridge is a little safer place to live, work, and raise a family. Today the Alberta sheriffs have shut down drug activity at a problem property in our city. The safer communities and neighbourhoods, or SCAN, unit of the Alberta sheriffs obtained a court order against the owner of a known drug house that gives investigators the authority to shut down the property for 90 days. The community safety order obtained in the Court of Queen's Bench took effect today, May 4, and bars people from the property until the closure period ends on August 2.

Mr. Speaker, crews installed a fence around the property, boarded up the house, and changed the locks to prevent unauthorized access before then, a strong intervention and step by the Alberta sheriffs to continue to address the issue of drug dealing and property crime. The property in this case is also the subject of a court-ordered sale. The SCAN unit will continue to monitor the premises until the community safety order expires on April 26, 2023, or until the property is sold.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Alberta sheriffs who work alongside other law enforcement agencies in shutting down properties that are being used for illegal activities. They along with the Lethbridge Police Service and our local drug courts have made a considerable and noticeable difference in reducing crime over the past year or two.

Since its inception in 2008 Alberta's safer communities and neighbourhoods unit has investigated nearly 7,000 problem properties and issued nearly 100 community safety orders across the province. The majority of complaints are resolved by working with the property owners to keep criminal activity out of the community.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta's Safer Communities and Neighbourhoods Act gives law enforcement another tool for fighting crime by targeting properties associated with illegal activity. Community safety orders help break the cycle of crime and allow law-abiding Albertans to take back their neighbourhoods and rest a little easier at night.

Thank you again to the officers at SCAN for the important work that they do.

Jobs, Economy and Innovation Minister

Ms Phillips: In 2017 the now Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation was campaigning for leadership against the now Premier. At that time he said he disagreed with the Premier's socially regressive views on LGBTQ and abortion rights. In contrast with this Premier, he claimed to be socially progressive.

The MLA for Calgary-Elbow said the UCP would never out gay kids, but one of the first bills of the UCP government, that he supported, did just that, and yesterday when asked about his government's position on the right to choose, the minister ducked the question. When asked about his own personal opinion on abortion, the minister still refused to answer. His refusal to even act like he has an opinion on this issue might come as a surprise to some people, but his loyalty isn't to the folks in Alberta; it's to the Premier's office.

This is the same minister whose chief of staff was fired after coming forward with serious allegations of sexual harassment. The minister claims she was an excellent staffer, but he didn't know why his chief of staff was fired, and he had no part of it. Does he really expect Albertans to believe that he just allowed his excellent chief of staff to be fired and didn't ask a single question why?

His views on gender equality were made clear when he ignored the child care and other challenges faced by working women during the pandemic, when he claimed they were, quote, choosing to stay home and out of the workforce. A minister that ran for leadership on a socially progressive policy has quickly shown that to be false. After three years in cabinet he's shown he would rather cater to the Premier's social views about women than represent his women constituents in Calgary-Elbow.

But, surprise, women have the right to vote, and in the next election the women of Calgary-Elbow have a chance to choose an MLA who values gender equality. We need an NDP government.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Seniors' Issues

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to pay homage to Alberta seniors. Seniors are responsible for developing this province into the amazing place it is today. They created the bedrock and the infrastructure that allowed us to grow to be one of the most prosperous provinces in the Confederation. Their hard work and their dedication must not go unseen or unrecognized.

Yet I've received word from seniors in my constituency of Calgary-Cross and, frankly, across the province that they feel ignored, forgotten, and disrespected. This cannot stand, Mr. Speaker. We must ensure that Alberta seniors have every bit of access to services that allow them to live a full life like every other Albertan. We must do better.

While this government has created new plans to tackle elder abuse, improve seniors' housing, and created transformational shifts to continuing care, there is still a need to engage meaningfully with seniors in Alberta's communities to ensure that their needs are met. I strongly encourage the Minister of Seniors and Housing to continue to find new ways to ensure that seniors can participate fully in society. To accompany this, I also implore the minister to continue to find new ways to engage meaningfully with seniors to ensure that they feel heard and that their needs are met.

As a member of the government caucus I want to assure seniors from Calgary-Cross and across Alberta that you have and will continue to be heard. As your representative I will continue to do my best to engage with seniors and relay this information to both the government and to the minister to ensure that we set ourselves on the right path.

Intergenerational respect is paramount within our society. Alberta seniors have never forgotten about us. We must never forget about them.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

1:40 NDP Provincial Election Candidates

Member Ceci: Mr. Speaker, Calgarians are looking for a government they can trust. They're looking for a government that will help create good-paying jobs and drive investment in new and emerging industries. They're looking for a government that will help keep the lights on and put food on the table. They don't want to live paycheque to paycheque, in fear of something happening that could teeter them into financial ruin. They want a government that will protect and improve public health care, ensuring Albertans get the care they need when and where they need it. They want good teachers, good schools, and a curriculum that prepares their kids for the future. They want a government that protects their parks, not demolishes them to make way for coal mines. There's more, too, but the bottom line is that Calgarians are getting none of this from the current government.

But there's a team that's being built, Mr. Speaker, that will deliver for them, a team of New Democrat candidates with credentials, work ethic, and devotion to the people of Calgary. That team includes, of course, the members for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall and Calgary-Mountain View, but it also includes world-renowned medical researcher and neurologist Luanne Metz. It includes energy analyst Samir Kayande. It includes antipoverty advocate Janet Eremenko, teacher and community organizer Rosman Valencia, realtor and community builder Parmeet Singh, military veteran and Indigenous advocate Marilyn North Peigan, educational assistant Julia Hayter, and business owner and college instructor Gurinder Brar.

The team is growing, too, Mr. Speaker. Next week members will choose between two fantastic candidates in Calgary-Glenmore, and my friend and seven-term city councillor Druh Farrell will be acclaimed as the candidate in Calgary-Bow. This is Team Calgary. It's one heck of a team, and it stands ready to deliver on what matters for Calgarians and Albertans. Those looking for hope, those looking for help, those wanting to take part in building a bright future, head to albertandp.ca and get involved. We'd love to have you. [interjections]

Teacher Certification and Bill 15

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As you know, teachers hold an incredibly important role in Alberta. We're lucky to have some of the best teachers and a world-class education system to ensure that every student has the opportunity for success. Approximately 46,000 teachers are part of the Alberta Teachers' Association, which has been known to strongly oppose anything related to the UCP government.

Albertans sent a clear message that they wanted change in education. Parents told us that they want choice in what their child is taught. They told us that they did not want the NDP's ideological curriculum in the classrooms. Parents want to know that those who teach their children are being held to a high standard, a standard that is clearly too high for the ATA.

In 2020 only eight teachers in Alberta faced suspension or cancellation of their teaching certificate. Given the number of complaints, it's hard to believe that this is accurate. The Alberta Teachers' Association plays a large role in the certification of teachers. In my constituency I represent many newcomers to Canada who have not been able to receive certification to teach in Calgary.

Mr. Speaker, shame on the ATA and shame on the NDP for not supporting our government's solution to these issues. Parents in Alberta need to know that competent teachers are being certified in a fair and timely manner. The members opposite have chosen to side with the ATA in calling Bill 15 unnecessary. Protecting students is extremely necessary as well as certifying competent teachers. My constituents are happy to see that the UCP has consulted with Albertans on the new curriculum. Albertans are not buying into the fearmongering of the NDP, and they're certainly not buying into the lies offered by the ATA.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Calgary Storm Damage Recovery Funding

Mr. Sabir: I've never in my life seen a government so opposed to helping people in need, Mr. Speaker. On June 13, 2020, Calgary was hit by the fourth-largest natural disaster in Canadian history, a huge hailstorm that cost over a billion dollars in damage. People's homes, vehicles, and businesses were destroyed. For two years these residents looked for help, faced unacceptable delays in getting support from insurance, and lived with holes in their roofs during winter.

The government did nothing to support them. They exempted hail damage from the disaster recovery plan and did nothing to help plans get processed. The four UCP MLAs in northeast Calgary defended this government's refusal to help these Calgarians. Another UCP MLA, who got a $12,000 raise, gave a statement in this House cheering on the decision to not help people recover from the fourth-largest natural disaster.

This tells you everything you need to know about this government's priorities. This Premier will defend his private jets, his disaster of a war room, the billion dollars he spent on Donald Trump. He will also stand up and tell you that investing in the people of northeast Calgary is vote-buying. But that same Premier will then shamelessly go to northeast Calgary to beg for votes so he can keep his job.

Well, Mr. Speaker, hail season is coming fast, and the silence from this government is deafening. There are still over a thousand Calgarians with damaged roofs who are scared about what will happen should another storm hit, but the UCP simply doesn't care about them and won't lift a finger to help. I want to promise them and all Albertans that no matter where you live, the Alberta NDP will be there to help you recover should the worst happen.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Committee to Examine Safe Supply Consultation

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've had the honour of sitting on the Select Special Committee to Examine Safe Supply, where we have heard from leading experts on opioid addiction from across North America as we study the issue of so-called safe supply. This was supposed to be a bipartisan committee, but unfortunately the NDP wasn't willing to engage in the work to hear the evidence and listen to the experts.

For the benefit of the NDP and all Albertans, Mr. Speaker, I would like to share some expert testimony that we heard. Dr. Keith Humphreys is a former White House drug policy adviser to Presidents Obama and Bush. He was also the chair of the Stanford-Lancet Commission on the North American Opioid Crisis. When asked about the potential harms of public supply of addictive drugs on the community, he said:

We know for a fact – it is not hypothetical – that when we flood communities with drugs, they spread beyond the person who gets the actual prescription. There's no way to assess, and that is a weakness in safe supply studies. Because they don't admit the possibility that someone else could be harmed, they don't measure the possibility, but the fact that they chose not to . . . doesn't mean that it isn't there.

Next Dr. Nathaniel Day, a leading addiction medicine physician in Canada, had this to say:

My greatest concern with the concept of safe supply is the unintended impact that these policies have on the general public . . . increasing the supply of opioids will increase use, it will increase addiction, and it cannot help but result in increased death.

Then there was Dr. Kevin Sabet, former White House drug adviser to Presidents Clinton, Bush, and Obama.

There are not many truisms in drug policy because this issue is one that is complex, context dependent, and really intertwined with so many issues, but one truism that most scholars agree on, most experts agree on is that greater availability leads to greater problems because of greater use.

Mr. Speaker, these are the concerns being shared by leading experts in the field. Since the NDP couldn't be bothered to show up and do their job and hear from them, I guess we'll just have to give them an education in this House.

Women's U17 National Soccer Team

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, Canada's women have long been a powerhouse in the world of international soccer, and this week has been no different as Canada's women's U17 team competes in the CONCACAF championship happening right now in the Dominican Republic. Canada has never finished lower than third in the tournament's history and went into this year's competition seeded second and considered strong contenders to win. One reason they're such a strong team is because four of the athletes on the roster this year are from Alberta: defenders Ireoluwa Omotayo, Nyema Ingleton and midfielders Anna Hauer along with my partner's niece Isabel Monck.

The team has had a great tournament so far. They dominated their group, defeating the Dominican Republic 10-nil and Bermuda 5-nil and battling Jamaica to a 1-1 draw. Winning their group meant they advanced to the knockout stage, where they faced Honduras on May 1. Although the game got off to a tense start, with Honduras scoring the first goal early on, the team turned things around and knocked Honduras out of the tournament with a score of 4-1. It's worthy to note that to date the leading goal scorer in the tournament is Canada's own Rosa Maalouf, who has scored nine goals in four matches so far.

The top three teams in the tournament qualify for a berth in the FIFA U17 women's World Cup taking place this October in India. Canada has a lot of work to do to win one of those spots. First, they have to beat Costa Rica in their match this afternoon. Then they have to advance to the semifinals and face the winner of the USA-Jamaica match. It's not an easy path to victory by any means, but I know that I speak on behalf of the entire Legislature when I say: we are behind you one hundred per cent; go Canada.

The Speaker: Hon. members, let me assist you in saving some money today. At approximately 1:55 there will be an alert that will check the Canada-wide emergency alert system. At 1:55 if your phone is not off – and there's some debate about airplane mode – and if you're still connected to Wi-Fi, you may be alerted. If you are alerted, the fines are double today as a result of the very generous warning that I have now provided. If you want to save yourself additional trouble, I'm certain that the pages would be more than happy to remove your device from the Assembly altogether.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Cost of Living and Wage Growth

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, inflation is at a 30-year high, 6.7 per cent, and Albertans are paying more. Now, instead of reindexing the tax code to protect Albertans' income from skyrocketing inflation, this UCP government is trying to argue that the answer to inflation is a better job with higher wages, but according to their own economic dashboard average weekly earnings rose only 1 per cent in the last 12 months in Alberta, less than half the rate enjoyed by the rest of Canadians. When will this government stop the excuses and stop the tax on inflation?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Affordability is an issue, and that's why this government is taking action. That's why we are moving forward with an electricity rebate. That's why we suspended the fuel tax. That's why we're bringing in a price-protection mechanism for natural gas consumers. But it's more than that. We're positioning this economy for disproportionate investment attraction and growth, creating more opportunities for Albertans. Our plan is working.

Ms Notley: The Premier's record on private-sector wages is to drive them down, cutting overtime, cutting holiday pay, cutting youth wages. We used to lead the country in our rate of wage growth, and now Alberta is behind. Earnings are up 3 per cent in Saskatchewan and Manitoba; 4 per cent in B.C. and Quebec; 5 per cent in the Maritimes; Alberta, 1 per cent. To the Premier: if the UCP's answer to sky-high inflation is higher wages, why is Alberta's wage growth tied for the lowest in Canada?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, that's right. The Leader of the Opposition is correct. We used to lead the nation in wage growth until the NDP took office in 2015. Their policies drove out billions of dollars of investment. Tens of thousands of Albertans lost their jobs. That had a profound impact on the economy in this province, had a profound impact on opportunities for Albertans. This government is turning that around.

Ms Notley: A lot of passion; not a lot of facts, Mr. Speaker.

Wages in the private sector are stagnating, and that's especially true for industries that employ mostly women: arts and culture down 10 per cent; health care and social services down 3 per cent; educational services down 2 per cent; same with accommodation and food services. These Albertans are earning less even as inflation climbs higher, all under this Premier. Mr. Speaker, when the Premier claims the swagger is back, is he just mostly talking about men?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, we're taking real action on the affordability issues. We're also positioning this province to create more opportunities for Albertans. As I've travelled the province corner to corner, as I visit with employers, there's one common denominator across regions, across sectors: employers are looking for staff. There's never been a better time for Albertans to step out and get their first job, for Albertans to step out and get a better job, for Albertans to step out and find a career that didn't even exist when members opposite were in government.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition for her second set of questions.

Women's Reproductive Rights

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to ambivalence about issues facing women, yesterday Albertans saw a shameful display from a UCP government that is so afraid of discussing women's reproductive rights, they cannot even say the word "abortion." The Premier was simply asked to stand up for the millions of women in this province who are deeply worried about their right to choose. Instead of answering, he offered a series of excuses ranging from the untrue to the utterly laughable. Yesterday politicians across Canada stood up and spoke out on behalf of the women in their provinces and in their country. Why won't this Premier?

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, women's rights in Alberta are unchanged today. They were there yesterday, they were there three weeks ago, and I have to tell you that a U.S. court decision is about the U.S. of A, not Canada. Women's rights have not changed in this province. I'll tell you what: we support our publicly funded health care system, and access to abortion is part of that system.

Ms Notley: You know, this government claims that politicians don't comment on judicial decisions of other jurisdictions, except that's utter nonsense. This Premier does it all the time, and moreover this issue matters to Albertans. Americans could be coming north to exercise their rights, and the toxic extremism that is targeting these fundamental rights has already started leaking into Canada. Alberta women and gender-diverse folks need their leaders to stand up and passionately declare that their reproductive health rights will be protected. Why won't this Premier or someone in this government do that?

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, it is clear. Women's rights, access to abortion are protected in this country under Canadian law. Nothing has changed. Not yesterday, not the day before, not today.

Ms Notley: That's inspiring, Mr. Speaker.

The Premier tries to argue that this is a federal issue. It's not. Access is controlled entirely by the provinces, which is why B.C.'s Premier had no issue coming out yesterday and stating his clear position to protect a woman's right to access abortion services. This is also an issue of health care, which falls squarely on this Legislature. What is the problem here? Why can't someone in this government stand up, condemn the attack on reproductive services that we are seeing south of the border, impacting all of North America, and commit to forever protecting them here?

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, women's access to abortion services in Alberta has not changed one ought, not yesterday, not the day before, not today. Women continue to have access to health care services clear across this province, but I'll tell you what. There is a disparity between rural and urban, and you know why? Because when the opposition was in government, they actually directed capital from rural areas into urban areas. So if they have a problem with access to services . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Women's Reproductive Rights and Bill 17

Member Irwin: Mr. Speaker, words matter. Albertans are looking for leadership here given what we've seen in the United States over the past two days. We have an opportunity to make a real difference right here, right now. Bill 17 provides job-protected bereavement leave for miscarriages and stillbirths but does not explicitly state abortion as a form of pregnancy loss. It should. The minister indicated yesterday that he would be open to amendments. I want the Premier to be explicit. Will he stand and tell this House that Bill 17 will be amended to provide job-protected leave for abortion? Say the words. They matter.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Bill 17 honours all Albertans who have suffered the loss of a pregnancy. This side of the government is committed to that. Yesterday I indicated before the floor of this Assembly that there will be an amendment, and that amendment is coming.

Member Irwin: Mr. Speaker, will any man on that side of the House utter the words "abortion," "reproductive rights," "women"?

We have so much more we can do to support access to health care regardless of where they live. Currently getting an abortion in rural Alberta is nearly impossible. That needs to change. We need to expand access. Does the Premier agree that we should expand critical abortion services in rural Alberta? What specific steps is he going to take to make that happen as soon as possible?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, women's health services are available across this province, and it is true that abortion services are largely available in urban centres. I've got to tell you: part of the reason for that, the disparity, is because those members across, when they were in government, diverted health care capital from rural Alberta into the urban centres. Like it or not, that's the truth.

Member Irwin: Wow.

We have an opportunity to make such a difference. This Legislature could have yesterday provided reassurance to so many Albertans who are frightened, who are devastated by an anticipated ruling of the U.S. Supreme Court that could overturn Roe versus Wade. We could have had a debate in this House. We could have had people from all sides, men and women, stand and speak in support of reproductive rights and access to health care. The Premier? He wouldn't even say the word "abortion." Will he stand in this House and categorically state that abortion is a medically essential health care procedure and that he supports reproductive rights for all Albertans?

Ms Issik: As I've said many times, Mr. Speaker, reproductive rights in this province have not changed at all, period.

Speaking of periods, let's talk about women's health care. I hope that the opposition across will participate with me next week on very important women's health issues, including menstruation, menopause, and other critical issues that affect women's health. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

School-based Mental Health Supports

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, there is a mental health crisis in our schools. The UCP's gross mishandling of the pandemic and failure to support students, staff, and families have made a difficult time even worse. The pandemic is still affecting our schools, and staff and students are still getting sick. In a letter to Calgary families a principal said that a spike in student and staff absenteeism meant day-to-day decisions were being made on whether a class would go ahead or not. This pressure and uncertainty causes stress for students, staff, and families. Will the Premier explain to these families, who are begging for more support, why his government is failing them?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We do acknowledge that COVID has been very, very difficult on all students and families, teachers, the whole system, and the whole community, all Albertans in general. We as a province have spent more than any other province, $53 million, towards those programs. Additionally, we've had supports in our schools, and we continue to have those supports. It is why we've allocated another $110 million over and above the $700 million that we've added to Education for mental health and wellness supports for our students.

Ms Hoffman: Nonstop stress and anxiety faced by students and staff in schools is negatively impacting their ability to learn and work. Some Calgary parents report that very often in their child's elementary school they'll be notified late one afternoon that it's moving online the next day. Kids have already been through so much in the past two years, and they deserve stability and support from their government. Will the minister explain why the UCP has failed to provide students and staff the support they need to end the stress and anxiety of these uncertain times?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, again, we continue to hear fear from the opposition. They continue to put misinformation out. In fact, we have zero schools that have gone online. I have had zero schools from Calgary school division in the last . . . [An electronic device sounded] It wasn't me.

We've had zero schools in the last number of months from Calgary going online, but we continue to monitor the situation. Again, we prioritize the safety of our students and staff.

Ms Hoffman: In March 2020 the UCP laid off more than 20,000 educational assistants and support staff at a time when they were needed more than ever. Supporting students in their learning can be a demanding job at any time, let alone during the past two years under this UCP government. May 2 through 8 is Mental Health Awareness Week, and this year's theme is empathy, which, of course, is the ability to understand and share the feelings of another. Why won't the Education minister demonstrate some empathy for the students and staff who are really struggling right now? Will the UCP take the mental health of students seriously and put a counsellor in every Alberta school?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, we take the mental health and wellness of our students and our staff members very, very seriously. It's why we've added additional dollars. It's why we had a billion dollars' worth of supports and dollars added to our education system through COVID. It's why we continue to add more resources. We are doing everything we possibly can. We have to work as a community. When the members opposite talk about hiring these individuals, they're talking about 2,200 individuals. That's, like, 13,000 nonexistent teachers they wanted to hire. They weren't there. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order.

I would like to thank the hon. member who fessed up to their significant crime and will be making a $100 donation, as I understand it, to humane animal rescue and the Calm society. Thank you to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Artificial Intelligence Lab

Mr. Turton: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation recently released the Alberta technology and innovation strategy, which will position the province as a technology and innovation hub. Just yesterday, in support of this strategy, the Minister of Service Alberta announced that we are investing in the province's first public-sector artificial intelligence lab. Alberta continues to be at the forefront of technology and innovation in Canada, and this new AI lab is positioned to diversify our economy and accelerate economic growth. To the Minister of Service Alberta: how will this investment make life better for Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've said it before; I'll say it again. Technology is not just an industry; it is the future of every industry, and it must be the future of government. The most exciting innovations that are transforming every industry today are data-driven innovations. In other words, these are innovations built with artificial intelligence and machine learning technologies. That's why I'm so excited about yesterday's announcement to launch GovLab.ai, an AI lab partnership between the government of Alberta, AltaML, and Mitacs. This is an exciting investment to apply more technology and innovation in everything we do to deliver better services, better outcomes, and better value for all Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for his answer. Given that technology and innovation are essential for growth and success in all industries and given that Alberta's tech sector is already seeing record-breaking success, to the same minister: how will the AI lab encourage the attraction and retention of talent that will support this phenomenal growth?

Mr. Glubish: One of the most in-demand skill sets in Alberta and around the world today is for programmers, analysts, engineers, and executives with experience in artificial intelligence and machine learning. Alberta is already a global leader in training the best and the brightest in this space, but our investment, that we announced yesterday, in this new AI lab and our partnership with AltaML and Mitacs will create new opportunities for students and recent graduates to apply their skills and expertise to solve real-world problems with applied artificial intelligence. This will help us to retain and develop talent in Alberta, contributing to this growing momentum in this exciting space. It has never been a more exciting time to be in the tech sector.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this new artificial intelligence lab is set to be fully operational by summer of 2022, which is good news for the Edmonton capital region, including my residents of Spruce Grove and Stony Plain, and given that the lab will also build a sustainable innovation practice in the province, can the same Minister of Service Alberta please explain to this House how the AI lab will work in practice?

The Speaker: The Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, the exciting part about this lab is that the government will be bringing the public service forward to bring real-world problems and challenges, and then the private-sector expertise from AltaML will be bringing seasoned leadership and expertise to help us tackle those problems, and Mitacs will be bringing new students and recent graduates forward to have real jobs, working with both AltaML and the government, to tackle those problems. This is a collaboration from academia, from government, and from the private sector to bring the best and brightest together to apply more technology and artificial intelligence to solve problems in creative new ways.

Invest Alberta

Mr. Bilous: The UCP's failed war room has been plagued by scandal from day one. They hired failed candidates, plagiarized logos, impersonated and attacked journalists, and gave out hefty sole-source contracts to their friends. But these are just the scandals we know about, because the UCP has hidden the war room from FOIP. Now they're at it again. It turns out they've hidden Invest Alberta from FOIP as well, an organization that has a $25 million budget and is responsible for representing Albertans on the world stage, but we have no insight into their activities. Why isn't Invest Alberta subject to freedom of information laws?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, our department just recently sent me the paperwork to make sure that Invest Alberta is subject to FOIP. It is.

Mr. Bilous: Given that Invest Alberta spent $750,000 to sponsor Alpine Canada but is yet to produce any concrete, tangible outcomes and given that Invest Alberta is hosting lavish dinners in Lake Louise and given that the government refuses to shed light on any of the activities or tactics of Invest Alberta – see Hansard from estimates – why is this government so afraid of transparency, and what are they hiding?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I love the opportunity to talk about the success of Invest Alberta. With our investment and growth fund they've attracted over a billion dollars of capital investment to diversify Alberta's economy. Unlike the no-development party on the other side, we believe in attracting investment. They were involved in bringing Mphasis and Infosys into Alberta, diversifying our province. It's an immense success.

Mr. Bilous: Given that this power to correct the situation lies directly in the minister's hands and that if the minister saw fit, he could open it up to public transparency whenever he likes and given that there's a very easy fix to all of this – all the minister has to do is sign a ministerial order designating Invest Alberta as a public body under FOIP; he's claiming that he's done it – when, Minister, did you sign that order to open them up to FOIP, and will you table it?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, this is a marked day. Put this one on the calendar. The reason why: a member of the opposition actually deviated from their script. That is a big day and a big step for the members of the NDP.

Mr. Speaker, if people want to FOIP Invest Alberta, they can go right ahead. We've signed off on that, normal, core stuff with a Crown corporation. Again, we want to highlight one more thing. This side of the aisle believes in attracting investment, diversifying Alberta's economy. The other side: they chase away investment. That's what they did when they were in office. We're not going to let them do that again.

The Speaker: I understand the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley may also be writing a confession note.

Francophone School Capital Funding

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, Edmonton has one of the fastest growing francophone populations in the entire country, and the Conseil scolaire Centre-Nord has one of the fastest growing student populations in the entire province. These students desperately need a modern high school. The current Michaëlle-Jean school is located in an old junior high building, and it's not adequate for providing the quality education that these students deserve. The Minister of Education denied the conseil scolaire the new high school that's so desperately needed. Can the Minister of Education explain why she believes francophone students don't deserve the high-quality school facilities that everyone should enjoy?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In fact, we do take section 23 rights for francophone education very, very seriously. I just want to inform the member opposite that the north central francophone school authority actually has five current projects under way plus a modular starter school in Stony Plain. This means over $91 million in building and new modernizations for francophone schools in Edmonton, Beaumont, Sherwood Park, and Legal. This is 3,900 students over 20 schools, an average of 195 students per school.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that that's cold comfort to the parents who are here today to talk about their own needed high school and given that the Supreme Court of Canada recently affirmed the responsibility of provinces to provide francophone education when it found that British Columbia's inadequate spending on its francophone school system violated section 23 of the Charter and given that despite the minister's apparent beliefs Alberta is bound by the same rules when it comes to francophone education, will the minister live up to her constitutional obligations to provide francophone schools with equivalent funding and better schools, or do these parents have to take her to court?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll have the hon. member know that we have built more schools and are building more schools for francophone communities than they ever did in the four years that they were in office. A few weeks ago – I'll also add to that – Alberta Education committed to funding a feasibility study for a capital project at l'école Boréal. Also, in case you didn't hear it earlier, we currently have fewer than 3,900 school students in this school authority attending 20 schools in their authority, with an average of 195 students per school. We do take section 23 very seriously, and we're continuing to . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that the minister hasn't addressed the need to build a new school for Michaëlle-Jean students and given that I'm joined by parents of the conseil scolaire students today and given that they've tried for months to get a meeting with this minister but have been ignored and that when I wrote to the minister to request a meeting on their behalf, she replied that she wasn't interested – Mr. Speaker, these parents have a right to have their voices heard; they're here in the gallery to meet with the minister today – will she agree to meet with these parents today after question period? Yes or no?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, I'm not sure what the member opposite is talking about. I actually met with the executive of the board of the francophone Conseil scolaire Centre-Nord a week ago. [interjections]

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Member LaGrange: I also met with the association for francophone parents just yesterday. As well, I continue to meet with them. In fact, we're so committed to the francophone community that we are reintroducing the francophone language branch in my department. The directorate for the francophone community was actually terminated under the NDP. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order. Order. [interjections] Order.
The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Renewable Energy Projects on Arable Land

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government ran on a platform to strengthen and grow Alberta's agriculture industry and fight for Alberta's farmers and ranchers, including their property rights. I've heard from many constituents who are concerned about agricultural land use for wind and solar farms. Land is often passed through generations with the intent of enjoying it and farming it for generations. Not only is land value a concern when new solar developments arise, but the amount of tillable land that appears to be going to waste is a growing issue. To the Minister of Energy: what can be done to encourage developers and operators of solar farms to use nonarable land for their projects?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There are robust guidelines and regulations in place to conserve native grasslands and protect special areas, and renewable energy projects are only allowed on private lands. Most importantly, private landowners have full control in negotiations related to renewable energy development on their property. They will ultimately have the final say. We have and will continue to support a free-market approach.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for his answer. Given that energy prices are high and going up and given that solar and wind companies stand to benefit greatly from building their supply of solar and wind energy and further given that our UCP government promised Albertans that we would end the NDP's green subsidies from Alberta taxpayers, to the same minister: what is the status of taxpayer-funded subsidies for controversial green energy products in rural Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. The only controversial energy project is a subsidized energy project. Our power market is market based, and industry is free to make their own business decisions without government picking winners or losers. We ended the NDP's renewable electricity program because it was clear that subsidies weren't needed. The market was going that way regardless. Alberta has seen over $2 billion in renewable investments since we came into government, evidence our market-based approach is working.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the minister for his answer. Given that solar farms require vast amounts of land and given that arable land right now is being used for these projects and further given that solar companies and the operator can decide to abandon this project at any given moment, to the same minister: can you please explain to Alberta's farmers and ranchers in my riding who will be liable when or if these projects are abandoned?

The Speaker: The associate minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. The AUC requires companies to ensure that sufficient funds are available at the end of a project's life to cover the cost of cleanup, but these are ultimately business decisions between the landowner and the investor, assuming, of course, there's approval from the regulator. We are supportive of the free market, and that includes market-based renewables.

Thank you.

Utility Rebates

Ms Ganley: In the lead-up to the last budget the UCP made big promises about a rebate for natural gas, but Albertans found out it was a fake. It doesn't take effect until next fall, and it doesn't even have its own funding. Then the Premier indicated that a rebate would take effect much sooner: another fake out. As the government struggles to get that support out the door, Albertans are struggling to pay their bills. Can the associate minister tell us: if the prices exceed the cap, will Albertans actually see a rebate in October?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking the wrong question. You see, this was the same member that was complaining about the price of electricity when she didn't know the price of electricity. Albertans deserve an Energy critic that actually knows the price of energy, so I'm going to give the hon. member a chance to redeem herself. To the hon. member, through you to her: what is the price of natural gas today? Does the critic know? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Ms Ganley: Given that, Mr. Speaker, I think Albertans understand how question period works even if the minister doesn't understand how it works and given that the UCP has also promised an electricity rebate and given that it was announced almost two months ago but Albertans still haven't seen a dime and given that we still haven't seen regulations despite the associate minister's bluster about them being ready when the legislation was introduced, when will the electricity rebate be delivered to Albertans? Please provide a specific month. "In due course" isn't an answer, Minister.

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, since the NDP Energy critic clearly doesn't understand the price of natural gas, I'm going to let the hon. member know: $8.32 is what it was trading at this morning. So the trigger price for the rebate . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: The associate minister.

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, $8.32 is the price of natural gas trading this morning on AECO. If the member knew that, perhaps she would know that that's almost 2 full dollars above the trigger price for the rebate and that it's absolutely within the realm of possibilities for this to be triggered in the fall.

Ms Ganley: Given, Mr. Speaker, that the questions were about when Albertans will see the rebate and given that the UCP's natural gas rebate was a fake and given that their electricity rebate was promised months ago but hasn't been delivered and given that Albertans are still trying to pay off the bills that rose by hundreds of dollars under the UCP, is the associate minister so confident he can deliver these rebates to Albertans that he will stake his job on it? Will he resign if he can't deliver them on the timeline promised?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member complains about the price of electricity but doesn't know the price of electricity. Then the hon. member says that it's a fake rebate for gas, but the member does not know the price of gas in this province. This is absolutely an outrage, and here's the unbelievable part: that's the same member that voted against getting rebates to Albertans earlier. That's right. That member voted against early rebates. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Government Policies and Young Adults

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, this government is trying to paint a picture of Alberta's economy; the facts are just not adding up. The government brags about migration into Alberta, but their own data does not even bear that out. Despite claims, Stats Canada is reporting that last year, for the first time in 35 years, there was a net out-migration of 20- to 24-year-olds. Can the Minister of Finance tell the House how he can stand there and claim this economic strategy is working when young people are fleeing this province at rates that we have not seen since the 1980s?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, what I can say: in Q4 of 2021 Alberta led the country in terms of net interprovincial in-migration. That hasn't happened since 2015, since the NDP were in government. The reason is because there are more opportunities in Alberta. The reason is because we have a more affordable province in Alberta. The reason is because investment is pouring in by the billions, more jobs are created. There's more opportunity for all Albertans.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that facts don't lie – I wonder about other things going on here in this moment – and given that rather than addressing the problems that they created with the cost of living, making postsecondary unaffordable, and more, and given that it's reported that younger generations are leaving because they don't see a future in this province as long as the UCP is in charge, does the minister have any regrets about the brain drain that he's creating, or is he proud about driving out young people from Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaidis: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just wanted to rise to address the comment that postsecondary education in Alberta is unaffordable because that statement is simply not true. Tuition in Alberta is below the national average. I think all members of the Assembly can say it with me at this point. Tuition in Alberta remains very competitive. As well, to ensure that all students have access to affordable education, we are increasing supports to student assistance. We're providing $12 million more over three years to scholarships and $15 million over three years to new bursaries for low-income . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that it's clear this government just doesn't get it or they just don't care and given that Canada West Foundation saw that the young people looking to leave Alberta are looking for a quality of life that suits them, does the Finance minister think policies of higher utility costs, higher insurance rates, higher income tax, higher tuition, higher interest payments on student loans are signalling to young people that the UCP is actually interested in the quality of their life? Will they stop trying to make life harder for young people? Let's do something to keep them here so that we can build a strong economy together. The New Democrats are here to do that.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, when the NDP were in power, they increased regulatory burden. They raised taxes on businesses, on individuals, on everything that moved. They sent tens of billions of dollars of investment out of this province. This government has positioned Alberta to be most competitive. It's resulting in investment attraction, job creation, and right now we have more employers looking for employees than the other way around. That's why we've invested $600 million to reskill Albertans.

School Construction in Camrose

Ms Lovely: During constituency week the Premier visited Camrose, and we met with the Elk Island Catholic school board to celebrate in a sod-turning event to recognize the spot where their future high school will be built, starting this summer. Currently there's a wait-list for students to enter the Catholic school system in Camrose, and Our Lady of Mount Pleasant school has reached capacity. To the Minister of Infrastructure: when is this future high school scheduled to start construction, and what are the details regarding the school?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, I couldn't join the Premier recently, but last year, actually, the member knows that I was there with the Premier for Chester Ronning school. Talking about this particular Catholic high school, the opening capacity of that would be 410 student spaces, and at the peak it will be 610. As regards the start of construction, we're still evaluating which type of procurement, whether it is traditional or design/bid/build or alternate financing like a P3, which gives a better bang for taxpayers' dollars. We have yet to decide.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Camrose.

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you so much to the minister. Given that there are some concerns regarding decisions around the idea of capacity and design of the school on whether they were government ideas or they came from community consultation and given that oftentimes schools have portables added to them after a new building is constructed, community members are left wondering why a school is not built to capacity at the beginning. To the Minister of Infrastructure: are there any indications that would lead to the installation of these portables after the school's completion?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, we all know that modular classrooms provide much-needed flexibility as a community's school-aged populations ebb and flow over the decades that a school is in operation. In fact, last summer, together with the Minister of Education, I visited the second-best constituency, Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills. A manufacturer in your riding, Mr. Speaker, who fabricates and supplies modulars – they're really great. The latest ones are the best. But that said, school boards should decide when they need new modulars. In this case we leave it . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that constructing a school is a complicated process – it involves a lot of manpower and work hours across many trades – and given that during the construction of our new Chester Ronning school in Camrose RAP students participated in the construction of the building, to the Minister of Education: will it be possible for RAP students to get experience in their desired trade with this new build in Camrose?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Yes. Indeed, it's up to the school authorities to work with the contractors to enable that. I was happy to hear that Chester Ronning school did have students involved in the construction process. In fact, my old school division was one of the pioneering schools in having individual students involved in construction. This is done very safely, and it works really, really well, gives students that practical experience that they need to go on into the trades. We want to encourage the trades because we know we're going to be short in the years to come. So thank you for that great . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Avian Influenza

Mr. Dach: Alberta has more confirmed cases of the bird flu than any other province according to the Canadian Food Inspection Agency. There are 23 flocks where influenza has been detected, and it's estimated that up to 600,000 birds and counting are impacted.

Across the country 58 farms or businesses have been impacted. That number is growing. This is creating great concerns for Alberta farmers and producers, who are looking to this government to show leadership, but it's been nearly a month without real public comment from the minister on this growing crisis. Can the minister of agriculture and forestry explain his silence on this issue, that is hitting Alberta harder than the rest of Canada?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Happy to provide comment. It's not that we've been silent; it's that CFIA has taken the lead on this issue. I was in Ottawa at the start of the week, was able to speak to CFIA officials directly through the federal minister of agriculture. They're well aware of the current state of affairs in Alberta. Like you said, that 600,000 depopulated birds is moving quickly to probably 800,000. Across the country it's 1.7 million, so Alberta is seeing a large number of that. The federal monies are being triggered for depopulation and cleanup. Everything is working well.

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, producers are looking to keep their flocks alive, not help with killing them.

Given that April 12 is the last public statement this minister put out regarding the avian influenza in Alberta and given that since then we've seen 23 flocks impacted and more than 600,000 birds affected and likely more to come and given that the flu is breaching current protection protocols, what new, innovative, world-class best practices providing an extra layer of protection to actually prevent this flu is the minister contemplating?

Mr. Horner: Just so everyone is clear, this is moving through the wild populations. It started in Europe and Asia over two years ago, moved to the eastern seaboard of the United States, and then has moved into the Mississippi flyway, the central flyway, and it's getting into our migratory system. What we are doing is that we're expanding our zones where we do have confirmed contamination in barns. We're doing more dead bird testing at the surrounding farms. But you have to understand that, from starlings to hawks to owls, this is moving through all the species, and it's quite difficult to prevent.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our producers fully understand the complexity of this, and we hope that the minister will as well and will look towards new solutions that are innovative to actually prevent this flu from spreading given the serious nature of it.

Now, given that this is a very real concern for farmers and producers even though it's not a food safety concern and given that we know this government has a track record of being slow to deliver necessary supports to those who need them and given that there are concerns being faced about the cost and impact this crisis will have, can the minister list in this House all supports available to farmers and producers and when exactly they can expect to receive them?

Mr. Horner: Like I said, the supports flow through CFIA. This is their jurisdiction. The producers are compensated for any birds that need to be depopulated. They're compensated for cleanup and disposal. I can tell you that in our conversations on Monday through CFIA and the federal minister, AgriRecovery is being looked at. Those conversations are being had. That's an ad hoc program that can look to provide more benefits, but it's in ongoing conversations.

Budget 2022 and Lethbridge

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have three questions about investments in Lethbridge today. Budget 2022 doesn't have any new schools for the third-largest city in Alberta even though two elementary schools and 11 modernizations are needed just to keep up with the growth of our population, some of the fastest growth in the province over the last eight years, especially on the west side. There are 13 projects ready to go that are urgently needed, and we got zero. Can the minister provide an explanation as to why the people of Lethbridge don't deserve new schools?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will continue to reiterate the fact that we have a very robust gated process that all school authorities have to go through. We typically get about 400 requests a year. They go through that 10-step process. They rise to the list, and then they are funded as we move forward with them.

Mr. Speaker, we continue – in fact, last year, I do believe, not in this upcoming budget but the previous budget, there was a new Lethbridge school announced. I don't know why they continue to put fear into the public.

Ms Phillips: Given that we ask because we are sent here to represent our constituents, I will ask another minister.

Given that this government has not committed to a badly needed cardiac catheterization lab at Chinook regional hospital and given that a report from AHS found that it was warranted and that Lethbridge should have its own cardiac lab, a call echoed by Lethbridge city council and committed to by our government in 2019, will the Minister of Health provide us an update? Will he commit to this necessary hospital upgrade and provide us a timeline for the project?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the Member for Lethbridge-West for the question and also thank the Member for Lethbridge-East for speaking to me on this exact same matter over a couple of weeks ago. We are doing an assessment at this point in time in terms of the needs of the facility in Lethbridge. I spoke with AHS on this. That work is ongoing, and I look forward to reporting back when it's done and it's completed. I look forward to reporting back to the House on this.

Ms Phillips: Given that the government has levelled deep cuts to the University of Lethbridge, to the tune of $20 million over four years, and given that the university recently came through the longest faculty strike in Alberta history because of the government's cuts and given that these millions in cuts undermine our research and teaching talent attraction and the U of L's reputation as an institution, will the minister commit to reversing the cuts at the University of Lethbridge over the next few years and allow our city to attract and retain teaching and research faculty to rebuild our institution's once sterling reputation?

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm disappointed to hear that the member has so little faith in the University of Lethbridge. Just recently the University of Lethbridge received international awards and accolades for its performance. I stand with them in celebrating their excellence.

Mr. Speaker, we are investing, as well, $171 million over three years to create 7,000 additional spaces at all of our postsecondary institutions, including, I would imagine, many in the city of Lethbridge as well. Stay tuned for more details and information on that. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Road and Bridge Capital Projects in Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, Alberta Transportation has released a three-year highway plan as part of the provincial construction program. Within my constituency there are several repaving projects planned that are currently in the design phase: highways 44 and 18 through the town of Westlock, highways 18 and 661 from Barrhead to north of Fort Assiniboine, highway 28 from highway 63 to Waskatenau, and highway 55 east of Athabasca. To the Minister of Transportation: when can we expect the completion of the design phase on each of these projects?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Transportation.

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you to the member for that question. Mr. Speaker, Alberta has an extensive highway network that requires significant ongoing investment with a focus on safety for all Albertans. The member asked about highway 44. The design of passing lanes is anticipated to be completed by the end of this year. Design work to improve access on highway 18 is expected to get under way in about six months, and an engineering consultant was recently brought onboard for designing a paving project on highway 661, which will take about 15 months. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, given that two Transportation projects, the replacement of the Athabasca bridge and the repaving of highway 831 between highway 661 and the village of Boyle, are defined in the construction phase, to the same minister: have contracts been awarded for these projects, and if so, when can we expect construction to begin?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked an excellent question. I'm pleased to announce that the construction of a new bridge in Athabasca will begin this summer. Alberta-based Alberco Construction is the contractor. Again, I'm very pleased to announce that. The project to replace the old wooden plank bridge, built in 1950, will create more than 400 jobs. It is expected to be open to traffic in 2025.

As for highway 831, repaving started this week, with an expected completion of mid-October.

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, given that highway 769 is not currently included in the provincial construction program and given that in its current state highway 769 is in need of repair due to dangerous sections of pavement and cracking throughout and given that highway 769 does not adequately accommodate the current level of traffic, including the daily commuters and the large agricultural traffic, to the same minister: has this government considered the rehabilitation and widening of highway 769?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you once again to the hon. member for that question. Mr. Speaker, I want to assure everybody who might be listening that I have received the petition from stakeholders about this particular highway. The member is correct; highway 769 is not currently on the provincial construction program list. Alberta Transportation will be, however, hiring an engineering consultant within 12 months to complete the design activities. In the meantime pothole paving will be ongoing as part of routine highway maintenance.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta's government continually works to maintain our road network to ensure that our motoring public remains safe. It is a top priority.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

2:40 Support for Victims of Intimate Partner and Domestic Violence

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Intimate partner and domestic violence is far too prevalent in society. In 2019 Statistics Canada conveyed that police-reported family violence against children and youth and intimate partners has increased for three consecutive years. Our government has introduced Bill 14, Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022. To the Minister of Justice. There needs to be required training on intimate partner and domestic violence and on coercive control for the provincial courts. When will this training be considered?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to thank the member for her question and all of her hard work on supporting victims of domestic violence. Violence of any kind must be condemned, and intimate partner and domestic violence are no exceptions. As the member referenced, the government introduced legislation to reduce the risk of victims of sexual violence being revictimized during the trial process. This bill will foster stronger confidence in the administration of justice and encourage greater engagement in the justice system by victims. It will also embolden victims of sexual assault to report that crime, and that would be undoubtedly a positive thing.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that 60 per cent of cases of child domestic homicide are perpetrated by the father and that there is frequently a history of domestic violence against their partner and retaliation against their partner, to the same minister: will the government make efforts to have law enforcement agencies and courts take victims' accounts of domestic violence more seriously and prioritize proactive safety measures for children and victims?

Ms Issik: Our government is committed, Mr. Speaker, to providing comprehensive and integrated supports to victims of intimate partner violence and making sure they are safe and protected. We're working on expanding specialized domestic violence programs which give victims focused support throughout their involvement in the criminal justice process. Supports include updates to their cases, safety planning, and making sure their perspectives are heard. We've also developed tools designed to assist investigators involved in intimate partner violence cases to help them ensure victims are safe as well as supplementary family violence training for police services.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Minister. Given that many judges who decide the cases involving intimate partner and domestic violence need to have a background in family law and given that most judges need knowledge on violence and coercive control and how to recognize that these are occurring, to the same minister: when will our justice system proactively place routine protection based on assertions of abuse and coercive control?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's critical that we have a justice system that ensures that all people who come into the courtroom are treated respectfully and fairly. While not every judge has a background in family law, they are actually expected to practise ongoing education and would have access to education on subjects such as intimate partner and domestic violence. This is why Bill 14 will require Provincial Court judge applicants, in order to be eligible for appointments, to complete sexual assault law and social context issues education. This legislation will also require candidates already on the appointment eligibility list to complete or promise to complete training if appointed.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will continue to the remainder of the daily Routine.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie-East has a statement to make.

Alcohol and Energy Drink Regulation

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A situation has arisen in Alberta where bars and restaurants may serve energy drinks alongside alcohol while patrons do the mixing, but liquor stores cannot sell energy drinks at all. This is the doing of the Alberta gaming and liquor commission, the AGLC. It's the provincial regulatory body that oversees and enforces alcohol laws. The AGLC already allows caffeinated alcoholic beverages to be sold on liquor store shelves, some with even more caffeine than energy drinks, so why can't energy drinks also be sold at liquor stores? Caffeine is caffeine, natural or added.

Mr. Speaker, the situation is further complicated as in British Columbia, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba, where small private liquor stores exist, energy drinks are sold but not in Alberta, the land of free enterprise and Canada's leader in private retail liquor stores. Recently Alberta made changes to allow bars and restaurants to do takeout alcohol, and this resulted in convenience stores that have food service adding cafes that serve alcohol for in-store consumption. At select 7-Elevens in Alberta you can have beer or wine with your taquitos and hot dogs, and while you're at it, you can have an energy drink, too.

We know there are risks with alcohol, and there are added risks with combining alcohol and caffeine, and I encourage Albertans to consume both responsibly. Quite simply, Mr. Speaker, if you can buy beer and wine at a 7-Eleven store, where food and energy drinks are already available, why can't you buy food and energy drinks at a liquor store, too? This places Alberta liquor stores at a competitive disadvantage, and I call on the AGLC to go out and look globally as a way to modernize their regulation of alcohol and energy drinks and start allowing them to be sold in liquor stores, too.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Are there tablings? To the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie: I missed you there, but you do have a tabling.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have a two-and-a-half-page letter from a constituent dated April 24, 2022. Her name is Anna Portocarrero, and she's very disappointed with how education is being underfunded. She has a child who is neurodiverse and is very concerned about the fact that there are zero occupational therapists and zero speech-language therapists in her particular school, where her child needs the support. There are the requisite number of copies that I table here this afternoon.

The Speaker: Hon. members, there are no points of order today, and as such we are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Bill 15

Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise and move third reading of Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022.

I would like to begin by acknowledging the members of this Chamber for their valuable feedback and support for Bill 15. I would also like to once again recognize the dedicated and world-class teachers we have here in Alberta, who work so hard to ensure the success of students each and every day across Alberta. Mr. Speaker, we couldn't ask for better.

I want to take a moment to sincerely thank all stakeholders for their contributions related to this bill. We engaged with the Alberta Teachers' Association, other education system partners, and victim advocacy groups on this important legislation.

Madam Speaker, Bill 15 would reform the discipline process for all teachers and teacher leaders so that our education system is safer for our students, their families, and teachers. As this House knows, I raised seven children of my own, so I deeply understand how essential it is for parents in Alberta to have confidence that their children are safe when they go to school. Parents should expect nothing less.

Madam Speaker, we know that the vast majority of teachers do their utmost to secure the safety of the students in their care. We thank these amazing individuals who uphold the high standards of themselves and their profession. However, we know that there is a conflict of interest within the existing system. We know that the same organization that advocates for its members should not also oversee the disciplinary process. We intend to fix that. Bill 15 would improve the teaching profession's discipline process by creating the Alberta teaching profession commission. This work builds on the students first act, that transformative act which we passed last fall. This commission would oversee teacher and teacher leader conduct and competency complaints for the teaching profession. Bill 15 is about transparency, it's about accountability, and it's about ensuring that we have a teacher discipline process that is streamlined.

Madam Speaker, we would ensure, by creating this commissioner role, that there would be an appointed commissioner, appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, who would operate at arm's length from the ministry. This would bring Alberta in line with comparable provinces and other regulated professions such as nurses, where an arm's-length organization oversees disciplinary matters. Simply put, Bill 15 would modernize the teacher and teacher leader profession oversight process while further elevating the status of the teaching profession.

With that, Madam Speaker, I look forward to my colleagues supporting this important legislation that puts student safety first. It is an absolute privilege to be here and to hereby move third reading of Bill 15, the Education (Reforming Teacher Profession Discipline) Amendment Act, 2022, an act that is long overdue.

Madam Speaker, thank you so much.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there members wishing to join the debate on Bill 15? The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's an honour to rise today and speak to Bill 15, but before I get into the substance of my remarks, I would like to begin by saying that I have given significant thought and consideration to the content of this bill and the consequences it will have both for the teaching profession in Alberta and for the students that they educate.

When it comes to the safety of students, I will always put kids first. For that reason, I dedicate this speech to my daughter Olive. May her path through Alberta's education enrich her knowledge and fulfill her curiosity, and furthermore it is my prayer, Madam Speaker, that her experience will be made that much safer as a result of the debate we are having today and the content of this bill.

Each day we put blind faith in others, so much so that we rarely give it a first thought, let alone a second. When I board an airplane, I do so in the assumption that all the preparation work for the flight has been done in accordance with national and international standards. When I go to my dentist, I assume that all of his equipment has been sterilized and that he has completed the required education to perform the task. Even as I stand in this building, I do so assuming that the arch directly above my head was designed to withstand the forces of nature and time, and in my nonprofessional opinion I would say that it's done pretty well thus far. But should any of these aforementioned groups not maintain the standards expected of their profession, they have independent bodies that they are accountable to – and they are accountable to the public as well – and they investigate each instance of malpractice. Unfortunately, one of Alberta's largest public sectors does not, that is teachers.

When we send our kids to school, we assume they are going to a safe place free from harm and predation. That was the case for parents of students at John Ware junior high school in Calgary from 1986 to 2006. Each day they sent their daughters to school, where they would attend grade 9 science class and outdoor education with Michael Gregory. Madam Speaker, I should mention that some of the information I'm about to use and share was gathered from multiple news outlets, including the podcast Crime Beat, Mr. Gregory's Dark Secret, hosted by Nancy Hixt.

Michael Gregory was the cool teacher, the one that everybody liked. According to his victims his class was unlike any other because it was just so laid back. However, mixed with the fun, Mr. Gregory put the students in compromising situations as if to test them to see how much he could get them to do as he watched. Not surprisingly, Mr. Gregory was really beginning the grooming process that he used to initiate an inappropriate relationship with his students. This usually began by trying to relate to the students on a friendly level, giving the impression that he understood them like no one else could or would. He would make them feel safe when, really, he was the one from whom they needed protection.

Mr. Gregory then would move past relating to students in the classroom to making inappropriate comments like, "You're beautiful,” “You’re perfect the way you are,” and “You don’t need to lose weight.” And then came outdoor education. According to one individual the outdoor education excursions were trips organized through the school where students would embark on overnight canoe trips with Michael Gregory.

However, it became apparent that these trips were not your typical camping adventure. One female victim described the trip as follows, and I quote: we are somewhere in Kananaskis; we are pulling off in our canoes, starting the trip; I am in a canoe with Mr. Gregory, and he is seated opposite me, and we are facing each other in the canoe; I look up, and three other female students, who are a lot smarter than me, were topless, and they were canoeing as if it was completely normal but without clothes on; I remember being really confused and thinking, “Well, you know, they’re really smart; they’re the absolute smartest girls in my school, and if it’s okay with them, then it must be okay with me”; then Mr. Gregory took his canoe oar and put it in my life jacket; he unzipped my life jacket, and I don’t remember how, but I wasn’t wearing a shirt underneath; so he pulls my life jacket off; for a few minutes I was topless; he was the first person to ever see my breasts topless, and I just got really uncomfortable, so I decided to put my life jacket back on.

The female victim went on to say that later that evening Mr. Gregory chose one of the girls on the trip to sleep in his tent with him. This young lady also later found out that the group had gone on other trips without her knowing, and she was devastated. It was likely because she refused the initial advance from Michael Gregory in the canoe and could be a liability to his sexual predation in the future.

The case of Michael Gregory made national headlines when he was charged by police in February 2001 with 17 counts of sexual offences against former students. These offences ranged in severity from inappropriate touching to penetrative sex. Madam Speaker, these were 14-year-old girls. Five days later Michael Gregory took his own life.

As severe and shocking as this case may be, it actually came to light 15 years prior, when students and parents at John Ware junior high school came forward with complaints about Mr. Gregory to the school administration. In May 2006 Mr. Gregory was the subject of a professional conduct hearing for alleged misconduct that took place from 1992 to 2005. He was charged with unprofessional conduct under the teaching act, one count for failing to treat students with dignity and respect and one count of unprofessional conduct for failing to maintain the honour and dignity of the profession. Gregory pleaded guilty to both charges.

A report later outlined the nature of misconduct for which Michael Gregory was being held accountable, which included abusing, demeaning, and endangering students. The committee also found that Gregory had an inappropriate relationship with two female high school students. He admitted to this unprofessional conduct. The committee found that Michael Gregory

1. . . . showed disregard for the safety, well-being and dignity of the students in his care.
2. . . . mentally and physically abused his students.
3. . . . coerced and manipulated students for his own benefit.
4. . . . attempted to conceal his wrongdoing through misuse of his authority as a teacher and program leader.

In response, Michael Gregory was suspended by the ATA Professional Conduct Committee for two years, but the suspension was to be served concurrently, which means it only lasted one year, Madam Speaker. One year.

As a parent hearing this story absolutely breaks my heart. As the father of a young girl who is already faced with an ever-evolving and complicated world, from which I hope to protect her, I am furious. Like everyone else in this Chamber, I spend a significant portion of my life removed from my family, but if I spend my time here without making an effort to keep her safe and my other children safe and the children of this province safe despite not being close to them, then I would consider my time wasted. But, Madam Speaker, speaking to this bill is some of the best use of my time that I could ever imagine.

Now, the ATA has gone on record opposing this bill for a number of reasons. First, the ATA opposes it; they said that it’s not necessary, that the current system works fine and that changing it would require too much work on the part of the government. In response, I would say that that is incorrect, and I would echo the words of the hon. Minister of Education that the ATA’s role as a bargaining agent for teachers conflicts with its other role as a disciplinary body for its members. I have spoken to members of the ATA in my constituency, and there is an argument to be made that the system there works, and to a degree it may. But I have also heard from parents asking me a very simple and fair question, Madam Speaker: at what point does the advocate become the disciplinarian?

What is the threshold that must be met before the ATA stops defending a bad teacher and becomes the prosecution? Is it simply based on how much public backlash the ATA will receive if they don’t act or if the incident becomes public? Out of principle I cannot support a system where the advocate is also the disciplinary. That would be as if my re-election as the Member for Cardston-Siksika was solely based on the votes of members of my own caucus, not the residents of my constituency, for whom I work.

Second, I have heard that the ATA thinks that this is just a distraction from our curriculum launch. The president of the ATA, Jason Schilling, said: if we can’t trust the government to get the curriculum right, how can we trust them to get this right? In response to that gutless comment, I’ll read a few quotes from some of my constituents in response to the curriculum.

The first is from trustee Jessica Payne, and I quote: I feel like it’s a great move to have the separation between the ATA and the discipline of the teachers and increased accountability.

Assistant superintendent Rob Doig: I appreciate the listening voice of the government has been throughout the piloting of the K to 6 curriculum in our division; I appreciate that they listened to some of our views in terms of a reasonable rollout plan; it may not have been exactly what we had planned or would have picked, but at least I can say that I feel like we have been heard, that the minister and the government are making an effort to listen; our teachers are looking forward to rolling out the new curriculum, especially in language arts; I can see where the minister and curriculum implementation panel have listened to our concerns.

Trustee Ross Blackmer: I’ve never seen so much feedback ever in all my years of teaching as this curriculum has received; they are listening to everyone; whether they are taking it in is a different story, but it’s different from the “Here’s the curriculum; now teach it” mentality; there is a tremendous amount of feedback now compared to what has been done in the past.

Finally, from trustee Doug Smith: this is the most a government has ever involved teachers and everyone else in implementing a new curriculum in all my years of teaching.

Madam Speaker, the next time the ATA or the members opposite choose to diminish the importance of this curriculum and how it’s been rolled out and say that everyone is opposed to it, I’d like to refer them back to these quotes from trustees and a superintendent who would say the complete opposite, who are grateful for the way that this has been rolled out. In that same breath I will, again, give credit where it is due, to the hon. Minister of Education for all her work in piloting this program and having the courage to move forward with this bill.

What does this bill propose to change and why? First, about accountability: it would create an effective, consistent, and efficient discipline process that will oversee every teacher, principal, and superintendent across the system regardless of where they're employed or if they are a member of the ATA or not. This will be done through a new Alberta teaching profession commission, and an appointed arm's-length commissioner will oversee teacher and teacher leader conduct and competency complaints within the profession. This commissioner will be someone with understanding of both legal and education.

It's also timely to reinforce requirements for education system stakeholders like the Alberta Education registrar, the commissioner, the ATA, the College of Alberta School Superintendents, and employers to report to police if there has been any serious harm or threat to the safety of a student. Under the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act the ATA is already legally required to report to the police when there may have been serious harm or a threat to a student's safety. Unfortunately, as evidenced by recent cases, the teachers' union does not understand this duty to report.

Now, I should back up and say, Madam Speaker, that this does not reflect all members of the ATA. The ones that I have worked with personally have shown a tremendous amount of interest in making this bill as good as it can be, recognizing the challenges that we as a government face, and I want to specifically thank them for their time and communicating with me their concerns.

Lastly, it further expands the online teacher registry established under the students first act by making the following publicly available: all hearing, appeal, and minister decisions where there is a finding of unprofessional conduct or professional incompetence and any consent resolution agreements initiated by the new Alberta teaching profession commissioner as well as hearing appeal dates.

Madam Speaker, in closing, I again would like to applaud the Minister of Education for her courage in moving forward with this bill. It is my hope and prayer that, moving forward, this bill will make Alberta schools that much safer and more transparent in the process of teacher discipline.

To the teachers, the very, very few teachers who would take advantage of their position of power and authority over students, this bill is for you. To the teachers, the vast majority of them who do such a wonderful job educating our children, this bill is also for you, to protect you. I stand in this Chamber in support of this bill wholeheartedly, and I encourage all members of this Chamber to vote in favour of Bill 15 as well.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on Bill 15 in third reading?

Seeing none, would the hon. minister like to close debate?

Member LaGrange: Thank you to everyone who took part in this debate. This is a momentous and monumental bill. I'm very grateful to everyone. I close debate.

Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 15 read a third time]

Bill 17 Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

[Debate adjourned April 28: Member Ceci speaking]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak this afternoon to Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. Now, it's interesting where we're at with this bill. There's been some back and forth in the Chamber in question period, where my colleague the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has asked about a few different pieces for this bill to be included and strengthened, and until we see that – there are some elements of this bill that I do support. But there are – I'll spend much of my time speaking about bereavement, the current legislation as it's written, and then I'll also talk about, again, what we would like to see and how we'd like to see it strengthened. Quite frankly, it's been rare that we've seen this in this term in the House, where ministers have accepted amendments by the opposition, but it's my hope that this bill and amendments brought forward by my colleagues will be accepted.

To start off, Madam Speaker, I do support and we support our reservists and the incredible work that they do for our country. I recognize that removing the 20-day limit on job-protected leave will bring Alberta in line with other Canadian jurisdictions and is a good change. I'm sure that later on this afternoon you'll hear from my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs, who, of course, was our military liaison for the full four years that we were government and continues to liaise with the military and has an incredible relationship with the men and women who bravely serve. She'll also, I'm sure, comment on this.

Now, it's very important, Madam Speaker, that the grief that surrounds pregnancy loss is recognized. I do want to acknowledge that the bill does provide some dialogue around that, so I want to thank the minister, through you, Madam Speaker. We know that pregnancy loss can include instances of miscarriage, stillbirth, abortion, termination, and we want to work to ensure that the bill is inclusive and reflective of the experiences of birthing persons, women, and parents.

Again, we're also – at the outset, Madam Speaker, we're in the process of engaging with stakeholders ourselves, recognizing that the bill is in second reading. We're reaching out to stakeholders to get a better sense of their position on the bill. So we'll get back to the minister with that, and, again, hopefully, by the time the bill gets to Committee of the Whole, we'll be able to have some amendments written but also be in a position to speak with a little more detail about the bill.

Madam Speaker, again, it's extremely important that grief and other responses that may surround pregnancy loss are recognized. I cannot speak from personal experience, but I do have friends who have experienced this loss and recognize that there's a huge range of mental, emotional, and physical health experiences that people can feel and go through. So giving Albertans time away from the workplace to process pregnancy loss is a positive step. However, the challenge, and what we're hoping that we can strengthen or provide a little more clarity on, is that the legislation as it's currently written does not include – it's not inclusive of all types of pregnancy loss.

The bill as it's currently written specifies leave when someone "has a miscarriage or stillbirth," but it does not include abortion or termination for medical reasons. Because of that, it essentially discriminates in terms of the kinds of pregnancy loss that a person may experience. So our hope is that we can work with the minister to ensure that the legislation is written in a way that is broader and more inclusive and that it can include abortion and termination for medical reasons. The reason for that, Madam Speaker – and I'm sure the minister understands this quite well – is that we don't want to leave room for interpretation. I mean, I get that's why we have lawyers, but we really want to be clear, crystal clear, in the legislation so that there aren't cases that are interpreted differently and where women and families can be denied bereavement leave if they've experienced either a termination for medical reasons or abortion.

Again, my colleague the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood spoke about the difficult experience that a person and their partner and family could go through. And it's unfathomable to expect that person to have to explain in detail the situation to their boss if they've experienced pregnancy loss. It should be covered because of what they've already gone through. So we're hoping we can work with the government to amend this bill in its current state to ensure that job-protected leave will be included for an abortion or termination for medical reasons. This will, of course, protect individuals, Madam Speaker, from discrimination in the workplace. It will also show compassion and inclusion to all of those who are facing a pregnancy loss.

I know that, again, my colleague the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has spoken about this and had a person who has been an advocate that the bill must include the loss of pregnancy. We want grieving individuals to feel empowered to be able to define their experience as their own. Madam Speaker, all of the experiences deserve to be included, from miscarriage and stillbirth to abortion to TFMR, or termination for medical reasons, infertility, and failed adoption, so we will work with the government to achieve this.

A similar example, if I may, Madam Speaker, is that if an employee tells their employer the devastating news that they have cancer, they're not asked: well, what kind of cancer? Their leave is not dependent on which type of cancer they have. This is a similar example, where we need to ensure that the definition of pregnancy loss is inclusive, completely inclusive, and encompasses all of the different reasons for that loss.

Again, Madam Speaker, what we're hoping to accomplish here is to empower employees so that they can receive the support and have the choice, whenever they feel safe or comfortable, to share specifics but that it's their decision. They decide when and how and if they disclose any details about the experience and the loss that they're going through.

I think, quite frankly, that's the least thing that we can do because, unfortunately, not all employers and not all people may view all losses equally. You know, again, I recognize that many employers in Alberta are incredible employers and they care about their employees and they want to do everything they can to support their employees. Absolutely, Madam Speaker. The challenge is that not all employers will view loss the same way, so, again, to make it crystal clear, defining pregnancy loss to include all those terms will ensure that it's included and that no one has to attempt to justify the cause of their pregnancy loss.

The other thing is that it'll remove an additional stress of an employee, that of: "What if my employer says no? How can I frame this so that I can have this bereavement time?" Again, I don't think it's fair to put that additional burden onto a person and their family as they're experiencing this. Madam Speaker, you know, by making the language more inclusive, it's our hope that everyone who needs this leave will be empowered and will be able to go to their employer and say, "I'm going through a pregnancy loss, and I need support," and not have to define it further than that.

I'll mention a few other questions that I have on this bill. Again, as you've probably noted, Madam Speaker, that's a very, very important piece that I'm pretty confident members of the Chamber will hear from a number of my colleagues who have similar concerns and similar comments. You know, I appreciate that the minister, during question period, indicated that he's open to this type of amendment, so we'll see how that moves forward as we move into Committee of the Whole.

Other questions that I have for the minister. There is a section on the Labour Relations Code, Madam Speaker, that removes the July 1, 2022, end date to the legislative protections for faculty associations as exclusive bargaining agents for faculty staff and allows division 4 to apply to the boards of postsecondary employers, which often refer as organizations. I'm just curious who the minister consulted with on these changes that impact postsecondary faculty associations and if the minister is able to provide some detail. I'm not sure, quite frankly, how the leaders of faculty associations are determined, so if the minister is able to provide some insight on that as well, that would be welcome. Where I'm going with that question as far as how the leaders are determined is that if members of the association are unhappy with leadership, are there opportunities to change leadership and how is that conducted? Lastly on this subject, how will this change protect members' rights to have a say in their own contract negotiations, which is, I think, important, a very important topic?

I'm looking to you, Madam Speaker, if you can just advise me on how much time I have left.

The Deputy Speaker: Ten seconds. Go quick.

Mr. Bilous: Okay. Wonderful. I will leave my comments there and look forward to responses from the government.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. I will focus my comments today on unpaid bereavement leave. I realize that this bill does deal with and address reservist leave and postsecondary institutions, but I want to focus my remarks today on bereavement leave.

In this bill there is a section that talks about:

An employee who has been employed by the same employer for at least 90 days is entitled to unpaid bereavement leave on the occurrence of any of the following:

- (a) the death of a family member;
- (b) the employee has a miscarriage or stillbirth;
- (c) the employee's spouse or common-law partner has a miscarriage or stillbirth;
- (d) a person has a miscarriage or stillbirth and the employee would have been a parent of a child born as a result of the pregnancy.

and that they would be allowed to have bereavement leave for three days in a calendar year. I think we can all understand and we all would agree in this House that this is an important piece of legislation.

I guess I would start my comments by saying that it's been my experience in life that grief is not limited. It's a very wide and encompassing thing. Grief is not limited to knowing or necessarily having a relationship with simply a family member. Grief knows and goes beyond the bounds of having a family member. Grief can and often is just as intense for the loss of the life of a person in the womb or for a person outside of the womb. Every life has value regardless of age or race or nationality or religious belief or any other defining category that we choose to use.

We do not as humans, as people have value because of where we live or where we abide. We do not have value because of our IQ or athletic ability or physical ability. Our value as people transcends our looks. In my case that's a good thing. It transcends our income.

It transcends the job that we do. It transcends our perceived value to the society. The value that we place on a person, on human life is not determined by our age or whether we are firm or infirm or whether we are wanted or not wanted. As I was growing up, I was glad that that was the case, or I'm sure that my mother would have done away with me many times. I'm not sure if she really wanted me after some of the things that I did.

We have value because we're simply human. We have value because all life, every life – every life – has intrinsic value because, I believe, we are made in the image of God. We do not have value because some court or some government or some business or some budget line has granted us value. And I believe that we all understand this. In our most intimate parts of who we are, in our innermost being, in our very souls, we know that the people in our lives, all of the people have value. And that's why grief is so powerful.

I've often said to people, as I've wrapped them in my arms and consoled them in their grief over the loss of a loved one, that I would much rather suffer the grief and the pain that comes from a loss of someone that I have loved than to have never loved them and not to have had that grief. Grief over the loss of a loved one is the result of recognizing that we are social creatures and that we value and that we recognize the loss of a life and that that loss leaves a hole in our lives.

Bill 17 recognizes the loss and the pain of the people who have died and passed on in our lives through this bereavement clause. Grief is real, and it can be paralyzing. Grief does not recognize whether that life was a part of our lives for a long time, that we knew intimately and that we had had a relationship with or whether that life was inside the womb. I support this bill as it is written. Madam Speaker, I support Bill 17 as it's written because it recognizes the grief of so many Albertans who have lost preborn children due to miscarriage or stillbirth.

Madam Speaker, my wife and I have been blessed with four children. Three of those children have grown up to be fine young men and women. I support Bill 17 and I speak to it at second reading because I know that it would have helped myself and my wife as we worked through our grief after having the loss of our little boy in the womb. This bill recognizes the grief and the pain that transcends the location of the life that was lost. Our grief was no less painful to us and the life of our son was no less valuable because he was stillborn, because he had died in the womb. His life was no less valuable or loved because the only time that we ever got to hold him was when he no longer had a beating heart or could take a breath.

Bill 17 recognizes this reality. We all know in our very souls that life, every life, is sacred. Every life has value, and every person who grieves the loss of a family member should be given the time to grieve by an employer. It seems eminently reasonable to this MLA that employers would enable grieving employees three days to start to address this grief. Trust me on this one; it's going to take longer than three days. In fact, I would argue that it's probably going to take me a lifetime.

What makes me a little sad is that sometimes when I stand up or I sit in this Legislature and I hear some of the rhetoric that goes back and forth across these desks, it would appear that this bill is destined to be made a wedge issue. It frustrates me that a bill that's supposed to be structured around addressing grief and loss of life and a recognition that all life has value could potentially be used as a wedge issue. Could we not instead set aside the realpolitik of social politics and support a bill that helps Albertans to grieve with dignity over the loss of a loved one?

I guess I'll have to wait and see. The Committee of the Whole is coming. We've been told that amendments will be there, and I guess I'll have to wait and see what those amendments are and how they're brought forward at the Committee of the Whole. I'll be listening carefully – I'll be listening carefully – to see what comments are brought forward in support of or against those amendments.

But at this stage, second reading, Bill 17 has my support. I'm grateful – I'm grateful – for the recognition that this bill brings forward for those that are grieving, have lost somebody that they love, that it recognizes that all life – all life – has value and that the grief of a life should be recognized with bereavement leave.

Bill 17 has my support. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on Bill 17? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill. I will soon reflect on some of the comments made by the previous speaker from Drayton Valley-Devon. I'd like to thank him for his speech. But maybe I'll start first with some of the more trivial issues within this bill just to make sure I get to them and move on before we talk to the seriously difficult pieces of the bill.

The first piece I just want to comment on is the changes in circumstances for reservists. I just want to – you know, as only one of two people in this House who has served in the reserves, I thought I would take a second to acknowledge that this is happening and that there is a change. In reality this is going to affect very few people. My time in the reserves was fairly short, and there was never a circumstance where I found myself, because I was a student at the same time, requiring leave from work in order to be able to fulfill my duties in the reserves. Usually duties were related to training rather than service in combat or anything of that nature. But if I were in that position, I would have been happy to have been able to know that I could leave and do my duty on behalf of the country and then come back and be able to continue my work. So I'm just glad to see that we've made this slight change in terms of the ability of reservists to take time away and not be limited by the act in how much they can do that.

I guess I do wonder a little bit about what might need to happen to support employers in that. Certainly, I would hate to be in a position where employers express concern about hiring people who are in the reserves, knowing that they may be called away and that they may have to hold a job for somebody temporarily, and now that it's longer, even a longer period of time, that they might be hesitant to hire someone in the reserves. I would just hope that the government will think about that when they're doing regulations, that there may be some way that the government can assist or help employers to ensure that this does not become problematic.

I recognize, again, that this is not going to happen very often in an average year, where this is even a concern at all, but since, you know, it has come up in the legislation, I would like to just make sure that the government gives some consideration to making sure that the wheels are greased and things run smoothly, not only from the position of the Canadian Armed Forces but also from the position of the employee of both the civilian work and the government work and, of course, the employer themselves. I think that fits in well, and I think this piece of change is a good addition to Bill 207, which was the Reservists' Recognition Day Act, as it was called. I think it's a nice little piece in addition to that.

Just getting that out of the way for a few minutes, I'd like to go on and also talk about the academic associations. Again, in my career as a member of a faculty at the University of Calgary I had the opportunity to belong to an academic association at the University of Calgary at a time when the faculties did not have a right to be recognized as a union in bargaining. Thankfully, under the previous government that did change, and now people who are employed by universities have the rights that people outside the universities have, including that academics now have the right, not just nonacademic staff, to have someone represent them in bargaining situations. I appreciate that at the time the changes were made, there was a five-year window put in holding the academic associations as the interim representative bodies for negotiations because this was all new, and we needed to know whether or not that was the right place to start and whether to add some other changes.

Now, of course, we're in a place where it's been in fact established that those organizations are the bargaining unit in this bill. I think that's completely appropriate because nothing that I have heard from my university colleagues indicates it should be otherwise although they did express some concern that when this was introduced into this legislation, they were not consulted. So they're taking time also to make sure that their interests are fully protected by this legislation. It would have been good for the government to spend a little bit of time with the various associations to walk them through this, make sure that they fully understand this. I imagine there's not going to be a complex disagreement on this, so it would have been great just to have that kind of relational conversation where you're walking through what is happening and ensuring that if there is any glitch there, the people who are going to be affected by it are well informed.

Again, you know, this is not the biggest part of this legislation for me, but having involvement with both the reserves and academia, I felt it was appropriate for me to review these sections and to ensure that I didn't have any major concerns, and I guess I say now that I don't.

What I would like to talk about, of course, and what you will hear mostly from members of this House are conversations about the leave at the time of loss of a pregnancy. I think this is a very important thing for us to consider in this House because, of course, it is a very traumatic situation in the lives of everyone who has experienced it. I think we just heard quite eloquently from the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon about the importance of going through grief at a time of loss and how difficult that is and how much we really need as a community to support people, and above all we should not be in any place where we consider it right for us to judge other people's grief.

As the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon indicated, grief is very wide ranging. It's experienced differently by different people, and we have no right to create a circumstance where some people's grief is acceptable and other people's grief is not or that the way they grieve or what they're grieving over is acceptable or not. I think it's very important that in this circumstance we make it very clear to all people appropriate – all the family members, all the people that are affected by this type of grief – that what we are concerned about as a society is that they get support at this very significant time, that they do not get judgment, that they don't get questions, that there's not some kind of assessment about whether or not their grief is valid or not or the reason why they have grief is valid or not. I think that that would just be a horrendous intrusion of the state in the private lives of people.

You know, in many other situations we recognize this principle that the government just does not have a role in making decisions about people's lives because it does not affect others. Of course, government always has to make rules when something you choose to do affects another person, but in the case where you are having an experience that is about yourself and who you are as a person, then I think it is quite appropriate that we not enter into a discussion about your grief and about whether or not it is acceptable or not.

We need to make this legislation as wide as possible to avoid any potential for government interference or for employer interference. You know, as has been mentioned before, when we have other situations, if somebody comes and says, "I'm having heart surgery," we don't start to question them about what the nature of the heart surgery is or why they need heart surgery or if they engaged in activities like overeating or drinking that caused them to need heart surgery. We certainly just stay out of it. It's a conversation between a patient and their doctor, and the only thing that the employer needs to know is that, in fact, the surgery is going on and that the individual needs some time to go through that procedure and to recover from that procedure.

Sometimes it's easier for us as outsiders when it's a physical procedure that we recognize, like surgery. "Oh, I can see that, you know, you've got this cut, and you have to recover physically from it." But actually the most wounding kind of loss often isn't physical but is emotional. I know that this is an area that is so often vastly overlooked yet is so defining in people's lives.

My wife for a number of years was a social worker at the neonatal intensive care unit at the Royal Alexandra hospital and often would go back in in the evenings or overnight to be with families as they went through the process of grief around traumatic illness, children that were stillborn, or children that had died shortly after birth.

You know, in many ways there's nothing much you can do. Obviously, the medical profession did everything they possibly could to resolve the situation, but the grief itself still needs to be attended to. The sadness of the families as they lose a family member is deep, and it is really important that all of us recognize what that is like. It isn't just one or two things. It's not just a miscarriage or a stillbirth, but it's also these other things that go on all the time that people actually have significant grief reactions to. That would include abortions or TFMR or even infertility. I mean, trying to get pregnant is often very traumatic for people. They end up in the NICU because they've gone through these very difficult processes, and they lose a child yet again and they have to try all over again.

Really, just acknowledging that that is a problem, I think, is very important for us as a society. We're only asking for a few days. I mean, in reality we know that the vast majority of people will continue to grieve – well, as the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon says, for the rest of his life over loss of this. I know that in my own family there have been miscarriages and stillbirths, and that continues to be a grief for family members. But to have three days where you don't have to face other people on tasks that are irrelevant is very important, and I think we should be recognizing that for people.

One other piece that is not often talked about that is included in our recommendations for change is the situation of failed adoption. When I was at Catholic Social Services, I had the opportunity to be the supervisor of the adoptions program. You know, most of the time that was quite a joyous kind of occasion because in our particular program we were dealing primarily with newborn children who were being adopted, so people were very happy to receive a child when they thought they wouldn't after having gone through much infertility grief, finally to receive a child that they could love for the rest of their lives.

However, there were occasions where a situation happened that a child was placed for adoption, but within the 10-day period the biological mother of the child changed their mind. So they had a child come into their home, that child lived with them for up to 10 days – and I know in one situation it literally happened within an hour of the cut-off time – and they came to love this child and expected this child would be with them forever, and then this child was taken away. Now, I don't blame the biological mother. That's a very difficult decision, and, you know, if that's the right decision for her, I think she has to do that. But I can tell you that the consequence for those parents, after waiting sometimes years for an adopted child, was very high.

I think the chance that we have here is to recognize that any loss of a child, any loss of a pregnancy, including adoption, which is a form of pregnancy in a way, that I think we need to recognize – the only way to capture all of these things is to define the legislation widely and not to specify. If we start to specify, then we decide who are the deserving and who are the undeserving, and that is not a place for us in the question of grief. We should not be putting ourselves in the place of deciding whether someone's grief is legitimate or deserving of support and response from a compassionate community.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I wanted to rise today to speak and express my support for Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. First, I would like to thank the Minister of Labour and Immigration for bringing this important bill forward that provides more job protection to Albertans when they need it most. This bill is proposing to make necessary changes to bereavement and reservist leave. This bill will introduce long overdue changes that will make bereavement leave more inclusive, and it will expand reservist leave, providing reservists the flexibility they need in order to complete their training. This bill also goes on to maintain the status quo for postsecondary bargaining agents.

Under the current Employment Standards Code bereavement leave is provided for employees who have worked at least 90 days for the same employer, with up to three days of unpaid leave per year when a family member dies. This bill does the much-needed next step of including those who have experienced a miscarriage or stillbirth to now have access to that leave as well. It allows for three days per calendar year of job-protected leave.

This part of the bill, Madam Speaker, is similar to a private member's bill introduced in last year's session by the Member for Sherwood Park, and I believe that member had consultations with the stakeholders regarding the changes he sought to achieve. Though the private member's bill passed first reading, it did not proceed further as the session ended. I will applaud the member for his hard work and dedication on this matter, and I am delighted to see that these initiatives started by the member are being carried by Bill 17.

There is arguably no greater loss than that of a child. This bill allows for the process of inevitable grief to start to take place without any concern of job loss, and that is why this bill is so important, Madam Speaker. Unfortunately, about a quarter of pregnancies end in loss. This can result in a wide range of mental and physical issues. A study published by an American journal found that a month after an early pregnancy loss 29 per cent of women experienced posttraumatic stress disorder, or PTSD; 24 per cent experienced anxiety; and 11 per cent experienced depression. These statistics illustrate the need to include pregnancy loss in bereavement leave. No matter the circumstances of pregnancy loss, the impact is evident and the trauma caused is not to be overlooked.

There may be leaves such as this already available for some businesses, but it is the commitment of this government to provide this leave to all Albertans. Healing after such a loss is a process, and it will take time, but this bill makes leave available so no Albertan will need to even think about returning to work the next day after experiencing such a tragic loss. Employees are not required to provide any proof of entitlement for the leave but must give their employer as much notice as possible to take the leave. Employees may have access to more than three days of bereavement leave or may have paid bereavement leave if that is specified in their employment contract or collective agreement.

Prince Edward Island is the only province in Canada that provides bereavement leave specifically for the loss of pregnancy. However, other jurisdictions may have other leaves that allow employees to take off in situations of pregnancy loss.

This bill, Madam Speaker, also goes on to expand the leave taken by the reservists. This portion of Bill 17 was made possible with the support of stakeholders through consultations conducted by the Member for Leduc-Beaumont, the military liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces. I appreciate the member for his great work and contributions on this matter, including the initiatives in the reservist recognition act.

The stakeholders have indicated that reservists would have had to complete their training by using other leave options. Reservists are a vital part of our military, and they should be given a sufficient amount of leave required to complete their mandatory training. This bill would remove the 20-day cap on the use of reservists' leave for annual training, and it would allow reservists the allotted time they need to complete their training. It should not be on the reservist to figure out how they will complete their training in order to serve their country. They're courageous in their commitment to serve Canadians when disaster strikes at home or when they are called overseas for assignment. At the very least we should be able to provide them with enough leave that they are able to complete their training. Reservists should never be in a position where they're sacrificing hard-earned leave in order to meet their training requirements.

The Alberta government is proud to support our military reservists in all they do for us. It is in this bill that we acknowledge all their hard work and allow for it to continue with ease and remove a burden to them on how to cope with training days. Removing this limit on annual training days will align Alberta with most Canadian jurisdictions should this bill pass. Only British Columbia, Quebec, Yukon, New Brunswick continue to have limits on annual training for reservists.

Bill 17, Madam Speaker, also introduces changes to the Labour Relations Code. It replaces the effective date of the rights of academic staff associations to represent their members in the collective bargaining negotiations. This has been an exclusive right granted since 1981. This bill will allow for the right to continue indefinitely. The right was set to expire on July 1 of this year. These associations are the best option there is when it comes to representing their members. There is no other option that would be able to provide the same level of experience and expertise that these associations can.

The previous Minister of Labour and Immigration and the Minister of Advanced Education have met with different faculty associations and have heard from them that it is important to continue to give academic staff, graduate students, postdoctoral fellow associations the exclusive right to represent their members in collective bargaining negotiations. This provision in the bill to maintain the status quo shows the commitment of our government to listen to feedback and respond effectively. It will then allow for the right to continue indefinitely, and it is what many faculty associations have been asking for since 2019. This government has listened and is now introducing these needed initiatives that will give associations peace of mind that their exclusive right to represent their members will not be taken away.

Bill 17 is a win for all Albertans. It does what needs to be done in terms of increasing facility regarding bereavement, reservists' leave, and in maintaining the status quo for postsecondary bargaining agents. Albertans have had a tough two years. Bill 17 is a compassionate bill that acknowledges the need for time to heal in times of despair and the need to have sufficient time to train as reservists to protect our fellow citizens. It also continues to give postsecondary faculty associations the ability to represent themselves during collective bargaining, which allows for the continued strong representation they currently have.

Having said that, Madam Speaker, let me again thank the Minister of Labour and Immigration for introducing this bill to this Assembly. I also express my appreciation to the Member for Sherwood Park and the Member for Leduc-Beaumont for their efforts and contributions that led to the creation of this bill, and I encourage all the members in this Chamber to support this bill, that provides more job protection to Albertans in times of need.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a privilege to rise this afternoon and speak to Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. I think that, first off, in light of the potential decisions that we are seeing in the Supreme Court of the United States, I want to start off by saying that I fully and unequivocally support the right of women to make the very personal choice in their own life to have an abortion, full stop, period.

I'm excited to have the opportunity to speak to this legislation or at least debate some of the topics that have come up so far through this debate. I think it's a very, of course, sensitive topic but an important one that we should be debating in this Legislature today and many times into the future. I think that this is a reasonable first step, but by no means do I think it's necessarily where we would hope to end up in the grand scheme of things.

I would also address, off the top, that we've heard in this discussion from, as far as I can tell, every speaker that they are in support of the changes regarding job-protected leave for our reservists and removing the 20-day limit on those to bring that in line with other Canadian jurisdictions. I think that's a good change, a reasonable change, and we should be doing everything we can to support reservists, whether they are going to training or anything else.

I would agree that it's a very important piece of legislation when it comes to ensuring that we are providing some opportunity for families, parents, expecting mothers, or otherwise to process the trauma and grief that often comes from the situations that we are discussing, whether we are talking about, as the legislation describes, miscarriages or stillbirths, whether it is the person themselves or a common-law partner as well. I fully support the decision to enshrine this in legislation, Madam Speaker.

With that being said, I also fully support the idea of strengthening what has been put forward by this government by including the idea of termination for medical reasons and abortions specifically in the legislation. As far as I can tell, it seems to be the case that there is some understanding that this would strengthen this piece of legislation, so hopefully when the time comes for us to have the opportunity to put forward amendments, the government will be receptive to the discussions that we've had already and to those amendments as they come forward. Again, with the legislation as it currently stands, it only specifies leave when someone has a miscarriage or stillbirth and does not include abortion or a termination for medical reasons.

As the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford and, I'm sure, many other members as well have raised concerns, we must do everything we can in these sensitive and traumatic and overwhelming experiences to provide for those families who are dealing with this loss, showing them compassion and being as inclusive as possible when it comes to the relationship between the employee and the employer and the expectation that, I guess, we as Albertans expect for somebody who is dealing with such a sensitive situation and a traumatic situation.

I think that the member made some good points in regard to concerns around discrimination and concerns around judgment on whether that person's grief is valid based on the circumstances of their own situation. Again, we are talking about several different issues here, whether we are talking about termination for medical reasons, stillbirths, miscarriages, abortions, and so on. But we should as legislators do everything we can to ensure that when an employee is going to an employer with such traumatic news and a request for leave in this circumstance, unpaid leave for three days – I don't think that they should be asked to clarify their traumatic experiences, by any means.

You know, I think back to when I first found out that my wife was pregnant. We were so excited, elated, and went through the process, as you normally do, of waiting and watching as things progress. We found ourselves in a situation where, a few weeks into already knowing that this has happened, with a positive pregnancy test and everything, there started to be some concerning signs, cramping and spotting among other things. You start being very worried, and you look for medical support. Sometimes it's better than other times, but in this circumstance it was kind of pushed to the side until it got to a point where the pain was just completely unbearable for my wife, and it was quite clear that something was going wrong.

At this point we were finally able to get a referral for an emergency X-ray when a physician said: obviously, something is wrong here. That same day we were referred to have these ultrasounds done. At that point, after those results came back, our physician said: you need to go to the emergency room right now because you are putting yourself in a lot of harm, and it's quite clear that this isn't going to work out. At that point we found out that it was an ectopic pregnancy.

From there, obviously, things don't, by any means, get any better. First of all, talking about looking for leave when you are needing to go to the emergency department immediately: there's no time to necessarily ask for time off for that. At the same time, you didn't necessarily expect to find yourself in this situation so quickly. Among other things, after you get to see the physician, who is going through your options – and there are a number of options, one being a pill, which is not necessarily likely to work and is going to require follow-up and potentially having to go through that process again, or alternatively a medically invasive procedure, which is also more likely to be, you know, for lack of a better term, successful. But there's still a chance that you are going to have to come back – no doubt you will have to come back – and ensure that the procedure was, again, for lack of a better term, successful.

Already we're talking about the span, from that process, of many days, Madam Speaker – I would have to say above and beyond three days just for that process itself – and then, of course, the recovery from the trauma that is caused, not only emotionally, going from such a high of, you know, having all the expectations in the world of how things are going to turn out to completely grounded and devastated.

You know, again, I identify that while this legislation in itself is a good start, I hope that one day we are able to come back and have discussions about how long of a process this truly can be. But at this time I would again support the call, as members on this side of the House have, for including definitions or ensuring that things like termination for medical reasons are included in this legislation.

The idea of an ectopic pregnancy is the exact definition of what we're asking for, termination for medical reasons. I think that ectopic pregnancies are somewhat common when families are trying to have a child. I know, Madam Speaker, that in the grand scheme of things, while there was so much trauma and pain that we went through in this process – and I tell you it went above and beyond three days; it went above and beyond three weeks; it went on for some time – we were very lucky because eventually we were able to welcome our first child into the world last year. But I also recognize that many families aren't so lucky and that many families go through several miscarriages before they're, if ever, able to have a child.

With that, again, I would ask this House, I would beg of this House to include what we are asking for, as those amendments come forward, to ensure that we are strengthening this legislation to include abortions, to include termination for medical reasons.

I appreciate the indulgence of the House. You know, this was a very sensitive time for us. No doubt, the feelings that I went through were different than the feelings and trauma that my own wife went through. At this point I guess I would just say that I'm so proud and honoured to be married to such a courageous and inspiring and intelligent woman. It was a tough path. We were very lucky and privileged in our situations, here in the Legislature and in her own work, that her employers were willing to go above and beyond to support her. But not every family is so lucky. That is why we as legislators need to ensure that we are providing the strongest framework to ensure that people aren't discriminated against through this process based on the procedure or decisions that they make and that we do everything we can to support families through this very traumatic experience.

With that, I look forward to further discussions on this very important piece of legislation. I again appreciate the government bringing it forward and being willing to take some steps to strengthen what was previously in place. But, again, as a private member, Madam Speaker, I hope that we can do even better sometime in the near future.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you so much, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to add my voice to the debate on Bill 17. I just want to acknowledge my friend who's the MLA for Edmonton-West Henday for sharing his very personal story. We're so glad that it worked out for him and his wife. I think that he speaks for many Albertans, you know, about the deep emotional pain, of course, with the loss or potential loss of a baby coming into your life. It really does speak to the importance of making sure that Bill 17 accurately reflects what we really want to do to support all families and be inclusive.

There are really three aspects to Bill 17, and I'm just going to go through them. Like, there are three parts that sort of focus on reservists, and on just the labour code, protections for faculty associations regarding exclusive bargaining, and then, of course, what the Member for Edmonton-West Henday shared about bereavement leave.

I'll start with the reservists, Madam Speaker. This legislation removes the limit of 20 days of leave per calendar year for the training of reservists, and my understanding is that this is, you know, getting Alberta sort of up to speed in terms of the national sort of, I guess, the way it is done in most provinces. I just want to commend the government for doing that because I'm sure that not every type of training, not every type of activity that the reservist needs to do fits into that 20-day frame, so it's important that there be some flexibility with that. The removal of this I think is a good thing.

Let me just also thank all the reservists here in Alberta, who do work every day to support us, you know, as Albertans, as Canadians. Some of the international work that they're doing even supporting citizens of Ukraine right now: we're just very grateful for them putting themselves in harm's way, really, to support us here in our province and in our country.

I mean, I think that all members of the House think this makes sense, to remove this 20 days. You know, the minister: I know he has shown a lot of interest and oftentimes wants to be involved in debates, but if he could talk to us a little bit about how this specifically would help reservists, we'd be happy to hear some of his comments about that. Let me just say that certainly the removal of the limit of 20 days of leave per calendar year for training, so that they can keep their regular jobs, is very important. I just want the minister and the government to know that we certainly support that.

The other aspect of the bill that I'd like to talk about is about, you know, the labour relations amendment that they're doing. It removes the legislated protections for faculty associations as exclusive bargaining agents for faculty staff associations, graduate student associations, and postdoctoral fellow associations.

Somewhat similar but not exactly similar to the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, I taught at the University of Calgary also, but I never had a full-time gig. I always just was a sessional. I know that he was, of course, a full-time faculty member there. I taught at the University of Calgary and also at MacEwan University, Faculty of Social Work, for many years before being elected here to this Chamber. I even did one course for the University of Alberta, which is kind of extraordinary for a social worker.

There's no faculty of social work at the University of Alberta, which I think is a great tragedy for our province because, unfortunately, that excludes social workers oftentimes from – for example, the U of A hospital is a teaching hospital, so they have all the faculties come together and they often have collaborative professional development. When the students are in school, they're easily brought together because it's all part of the U of A. Of course, the U of A does not have a faculty of social work, and that apparently was a decision made back in the early '60s, 1960 or something, when it was decided that Calgary was going to be responsible for the entire province for the education of social workers.

Certainly, as a long-time social worker myself I've always wanted the U of A to have a faculty, and I think we have enough need and demand in our province to have students educated not only at the University of Calgary but here at U of A. But, yeah, U of C did have a satellite campus here in Edmonton, and of course that's where I taught.

Anyway, I have some, obviously, concerns and, you know, connection with faculty staff associations because of my previous work. Again, these are just some questions for the minister. How come this decision is being made to shift this? Like, what is the purpose of that? Who benefits? You know, that's always an important social policy question to any policy that comes forward. You have to ask: who benefits? It's really important. Like, is it just one specific group, or this group? It determines a lot of what people can understand from legislation. I'm just wondering if the minister would be willing to express some of his understanding about that.

One of the things that we have heard in our consultation, ongoing regarding this part of the legislation, is that there hadn't been consultation on this. That again is sort of confusing. Why is this being brought forward? If it's being brought forward, we always want – whoever is impacted by the legislation should have a voice in it. Certainly, the disabled community talks about “nothing about us without us,” but I think all of us feel that way. If there's legislation that's going to impact us, we want to hear about that. Faculty associations, graduate student associations, postdoctoral fellow associations are telling us that the government, the UCP, has not consulted with them about this, so that's concerning.

I mean, certainly, when the UCP was in opposition and we were in government, that was one of the things that they took great umbrage in, that they felt like a rigorous consultation process was so important, but it seems kind of strange now that they are government that they themselves don't see that as valuable and think that they can just go right ahead without actually including the voices of the people impacted by policy. I think that that's a deep concern, and I would really encourage the UCP – it's not too late. This legislation hasn't gone through. Maybe there are some amendments that need to be put forward, that they are listening to these leadership bodies of the groups that this legislation has impacted. I really encourage them to make sure that their door is open to all of these associations.

But I guess I have a deeper concern about some of the changes here, not only the consultation – of course, that's significant – but also just the UCP's continued attack on civil society organizations and certainly professional organizations specifically. You know, we just moved Bill 15 to third reading, and that's of course changing the self-governing process of the disciplinary hearings for teachers in our province. It's taking away their ability to be self-regulating, which is sort of a fundamental aspect of being a profession. That's actually part of the definition, so it's almost deprofessionalizing – well, it is deprofessionalizing the profession of teaching. Because it's important to be assessed by people who understand the work that you do, and if you're being assessed by people who are not understanding that, don't have that professional background, sometimes, certainly, poor outcomes can come from that because they don't understand the work you do. That is another attack on some of these professional associations and certainly my own professional college, the Alberta College of Social Workers.

Last spring a bill was passed in this House where the association had to split from the college. Because it's just such a small association, college, only 8,000 members, you know, it's the death knell – it could be the death of the association.

In the changes to this labour relations in Bill 17 I'm just concerned that they are continuing the attack on, sort of, professions, the civil society organizations. As I was just saying, my own professional college has just 8,000 members. The mandatory registration would continue, so social workers would need to pay fees, agree with a code of ethics, standards of practice on an annual basis, submit continuing competence, those kinds of things. But then the association, which has to do more with, you know, what the state of affairs is in our province regarding social services, what kind of supports, what kind of things our clients that we serve need, what some of the issues are in the workplace, all of those broader issues that we had come collectively together for – really, this splitting of the Alberta College of Social Workers is going to create a much weaker association, and I really am concerned that it may not continue. So then that's not a really strong advocacy voice for the profession in our province. I see that as a real attack by the UCP on professions.

Then just in terms of this issue regarding not consulting on this aspect of the bill, certainly I just want to remind members of Bill 78 in the fall, the Alberta Housing Amendment Act, 2021. I heard directly from many affordable housing stakeholders that they were never consulted on that bill. They were consulted on the strategy but not the bill, and they were surprised by the legislation that came forward. Of course, there are some deep concerns about that legislation because it really looks to privatize affordable housing and certainly not look at any kind of social housing, which, of course, is the deeper subsidy housing, which the private industries are not interested in. Maybe they'll do 10 per cent below market because there may be some profit motive for them, but nobody in the private sector is going to do rent geared to income. They're not going to do that deep subsidy. What does that mean? Is the UCP abandoning that whole aspect of housing? It's really important that we have that social housing for people. You know, at times it is seniors who are on fixed incomes and need that kind of subsidized housing and support.

It's also very tragic because at this time we know that the federal government is investing significantly, but unfortunately Alberta is kind of missing in action in that regard as they leave $187 million on the table. We could be benefiting from that in our province.

These are some reasons we need to consult and we need to really listen to those stakeholders, so I guess I'm encouraging the minister to be in contact with faculties, staff associations, graduate students' associations, and postdoctoral fellow associations so that they think that he's listening to them and understands their concerns. If legislation is being created, it needs to actually be assessed and be put before people who are impacted by that. I think that that's really important.

Then, sort of the third piece, which many of my colleagues have spoken about very eloquently, in this legislation is about the bereavement leave for pregnancy loss, which, I suppose, could potentially . . . [Ms Sigurdson's speaking time expired] Oh. I didn't get to it.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to get up and speak to the current bill, Bill 17, Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. Of course, as was spoken at length by the Member for Edmonton-Riverview, one of the concerning aspects of this proposed piece of legislation that we have in front of us right now is changes to the Labour Relations Code. It removes the July 1, 2022, end to the legislative protections for faculty associations as exclusive bargaining agents for faculty staff.

Now, as I've stated in the House before, I had the pleasure before being elected to this House to be the president of the Non-Academic Staff Association at the University of Alberta. One of the roles that I actually implemented was a meeting between all the associations at the university so that we could all talk about the immediate concerns, short-, medium-, and long-term goals that our associations had in relation to our representation at the University of Alberta. It was a good opportunity for us to see what the issues and concerns were that we had in common.

It was my own particular opinion at that time that especially the Postdoctoral Fellows Association would be better off being represented by the Non-Academic Staff Association. That was my opinion at the time. But, of course, things change. Things could be different now. I'm not suggesting that that should be the case. However, at that time and with the issues and concerns that representatives of the Postdoctoral Fellows Association had and how they felt completely underrepresented – actually, many of them felt completely disrespected by the board of the University of Alberta, the administration at the University of Alberta. They felt that not only were they being underpaid and receiving next to nothing in benefits, but also the amount of work that they had to do being postdoctoral fellows was immense compared to some of the academic staff that were there at the University of Alberta.

I was president of the Non-Academic Staff Association for, I believe, a period of two and a half years. Of course, that would be too short of a time to develop a real, considerable, deep relationship between nonacademic staff and postdoctoral fellows. But that was my intention, at least to sit at the table and to continue discussing the issues. Like I mentioned at the very beginning, it was my hope that many of these postdoctoral fellows would then become members of the Non-Academic Staff Association. Of course, you know, with the name being the Non-Academic Staff Association, the postdoctoral fellows were a little bit concerned about that. The thing is that organizations grow. Associations grow in their mandate. That's one of the beautiful things about associations like the Non-Academic Staff Association, that they're truly democratic organizations, and the directors of the association are doing the will of the actual members of the association.

I mean, that's just to give you a little bit of a history on the role that I played there at the University of Alberta and how it actually applies to this piece of legislation in the fact that things can change over time. People can feel better represented by another association, or there is greater strength or bargaining power in actually joining with another association so that when going through the bargaining process, they can have more strength at the bargaining table, right? These are some of the things that would have to be considered.

But, of course, that's not up to this body in terms of legislating it. I would say that it is the direct concern of the members that are being represented. So I feel like this piece of legislation actually closes the door to a potential possibility if it was deemed desired by the actual members of these different associations and, in this particular case, the Postdoctoral Fellows Association, but the same could go for the Graduate Students' Association or even the academic staff association at the University of Alberta or at any postsecondary institution for that matter. I think that, well – that's just to give it context and framing.

Now, the part that's even more concerning about this is the fact that this government didn't even choose to actually go out and ask and consult these associations about what it is that they would want, so it almost seems as if the minister is just assuming that, you know, this is what these associations want, didn't bother to actually consult with them. Since this proposed piece of legislation has been introduced in this House, we've actually reached out to a number of stakeholders on this particular bill, and they're the ones that are telling us that they haven't been consulted, right?

Here I'm giving a concrete example of how things can change over time or how members can be better represented, and of course that's completely up to them, how they are being represented. But it would've been good for this government to actually sit down with the stakeholders whom this proposed piece of legislation would be impacting and actually ask the questions – right? – give the time to sit down with the academic staff association and the Graduate Students' Association and the Postdoctoral Fellows and ask them, well, "What are the immediate concerns that you have?" especially since – and I can't tell you how many times I've heard this, Madam Speaker, from members themselves at the University of Alberta – they feel that because of the budget cuts they're drastically being impacted.

For example, since this government has taken power, I've heard from a number of members of the Non-Academic Staff Association that not only I used to represent but that also actually live in my constituency. You know, they reminisce about the times I used to do the work as the president of the Non-Academic Staff Association. Bless these members. They say, "You know what? We need you back at the university," and I say, "Well, you know, I'm trying to do the job from inside the House now" instead of doing it as the president of the Non-Academic Staff Association. Of course, I represent many people and constituents. For me it's an honour for a member of the Non-Academic Staff Association in my constituency to call me or write me an e-mail and tell me about what it is that they're experiencing now and the fact that they feel incredibly short-changed by this government because of the pressures that they are putting on postsecondary institutions all over this province.

It's tough because I remember when I was the president, and it was very common at that time that – of course, it was under, you know, previous Conservatives. Like, we have the new and renewed version now, but it's not so good for members of the Non-Academic Staff Association, as for many Albertans, because it's still the Conservative perspective, the Conservative ideology that they're trying to shove down people's throats, I'll say – and that's a nice way of saying it, Madam Speaker – because they refuse to listen to anybody else, right? I've said it time and again. That's what members of my constituency and members of the Non-Academic Staff Association have been telling me. Again, we're back to these antiquated policies in terms of underfunding postsecondary education and not everybody having equal access to it.

What ends up happening, Madam Speaker, is that the board of governors, the administration, the president of the University of Alberta see the economic, the financial pressures being set on them, and the first people that always get the short end of the stick are the nonacademic staff at the University of Alberta. They're the first ones to lose their jobs or get their hours cut. When it comes to bargaining, the administration wants to give them less and less benefits as time goes on.

Like that, I think that the Graduate Students' Association, the Postdoctoral Fellows Association, and especially the academic staff association go through the same, similar types of pressures being set on them. I would argue that they have a lot more in common than they have different. But, of course, this proposed piece of legislation just completely shuts the door to the possibility of one of them or even another association or group being the bargaining agent for them at the table when it comes to bargaining exactly for how they're remunerated for the work that is being done in the postsecondary system and the benefits that they receive.

A lot of the times, you know, they won't get – because of the economic conditions that we're currently under, the crisis that we're under, that was made even exponentially worse by COVID, these workers tend to have not received any pay raises for years now, and of course inflation is going up. I remember, under the previous Progressive Conservatives, being at meetings and sharing with members of the Non-Academic Staff Association that because of inflation that same box of cereal that you're buying for your child so that they can have some breakfast, the same box of cereal that you're buying yesterday, in, like, a year from now is going to get more expensive. That's exactly what's happening now.

It's a shame that this government, without consulting any of the stakeholders that this portion of the legislation is going to be impacting, didn't even bother to consult with this group to ask them why that is the case. Of course, this is going to change and effectively stop the work that they've been doing to determine who represents them and their best interests at that bargaining table, Madam Speaker. So I think that this is something that's serious enough that this government should take a second look at it, especially since they haven't consulted with these particular stakeholders.

I'm seriously thinking about voting against this bill at this time as it stands right now. I'm hoping that members on the other side will hear the message that I'm sharing with them right now and that they will bring an amendment once this proposed piece of legislation makes it to Committee of the Whole. Of course, as we know, Madam Speaker, this government has a majority so they tend to just – again, with all due respect, this is the way that a lot of people are feeling, that they're just ramming their ideology down people's throats and not listening, not taking the time to really listen to people and what their concerns are and how they can best be represented through pieces of legislation like the one that we have in front of us.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this afternoon to speak to Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. When I look through the legislation, there are clearly some things that can be supported. I think, right off the top, talking about removing the 20 days for reservists to have leave from their employer is incredible. I know that there are so many reservists in the province, many of whom are employed by the government of Alberta. Health is probably, I believe, the number one employer of reservists in the province, and to know that this leave is being made available is great. Being able to support reservists to do the things that they need to do to train and not go into their own personal days is a wonderful step towards showing support for the incredible work that they do within Canada domestically on missions and then internationally.

I know that when we have wildfires, when we have floods, if the community that's being impacted doesn't have capacity, the reserves are the first line of action that we call in when we're dealing with those domestic disturbances all across Canada. Recently we saw reservists deployed into several provinces during COVID to assist with the continuing care facilities. We heard reservists here in the province getting ready for potential deployment. In order to do that, they need to take time off, and the simple act of being a reservist means that you are a civilian and also part of the Canadian Armed Forces. While you have your civilian job, you want to be able to fulfill your service to the Canadian Armed Forces, and knowing that this piece of legislation is going to remove that is a wonderful, wonderful thing, and I can wholeheartedly support that piece of Bill 17.

When it comes to the rest of this legislation, specifically around section 53.983, unpaid bereavement leave, I think the sections where it defines common-law partner and parent under (a) and (b) are good. When we get to section 2(a), (b), (c), and (d), it's not clear enough. We talk about

- (a) the death of a family member;
- (b) the employee has a miscarriage or stillbirth;
- (c) the employee's spouse or common-law partner has a miscarriage or stillbirth;
- (d) a person has a miscarriage or stillbirth and the employee would have been a parent of a child born as a result of the pregnancy.

Well, when we talk about pregnancy loss, there are two clear definitions that have been left out. Madam Speaker, I don't know if that was intended, but it is a glaring omission in this legislation, and it absolutely needs to be included.

We need to talk about abortion and termination for medical reasons being included because this legislation needs to be clear. It needs to identify pregnancy loss in all its capacity. I think that when we see that there's an acknowledgement of adoptive parents, when it talks about the miscarriage or stillbirth and they would have been a parent as a result of that pregnancy, that very clearly is thinking outside of the box and not looking at biology but looking at what pregnancy means. To not define clearly abortion and termination for medical reasons is confusing, why it's omitted. I think that in order to honour all of those that experience any form of pregnancy loss, this legislation needs to be clear. We should be able to say the term "pregnancy loss" and look to the legislation and have clear definitions included under this section that identify exactly what that means so there is no room for interpretation. It needs to be very, very clear.

I think that when we're talking about pregnancy loss, it's not the why and it's not the how. A loss of pregnancy occurred, and that employee deserves the ability to access bereavement leave, period. It's our job as legislators to make sure that there is no question when it comes to the approval from that employer to be able to give it. Right now the way it reads is that if someone – like the hon. member my colleague from Edmonton-West Henday described, his heartbreaking experience with his wife and an ectopic pregnancy, that wouldn't qualify as a loss of pregnancy the way it's written in this legislation.

There's no reason to not be clear. When we look at legislation about the kinds of pregnancy loss that a person may experience, the way it's written is discriminatory. It clearly excludes abortion and termination for medical reasons, and I think that it's essential. Those legislators were able to be very clear in what pregnancy loss means. The last time I checked, Madam Speaker, those two words, "abortion" and "termination for medical reasons," are pregnancy loss.

When we hear in question period the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood ask specifically, "Will this language be included?" and we get a response that an amendment will be coming, even that message isn't clear. What will the amendment say? This is a piece of legislation that has a huge impact on those that are seeking that time off, those three days unpaid, because of the loss of a pregnancy. We don't need to be putting employees in a situation where they have to explain the type of loss. They should be able to look to the legislation and see all of the types of pregnancy loss and know that they unequivocally qualify. It's the importance of having clarity when we're talking as legislators and creating legislation that is inclusive and truly includes all the types of pregnancy loss.

I also think of the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford talking about the loss of a child through a failed adoption. The loss is significant. We have families that prepare, whether they're a foster to adopt family or they're approved for an adoption, and there are so many different barriers – they're not barriers but factors, perhaps – that could come into place that could cause adoption breakdown. One of them under the legislation allows the birth parent 10 days to appeal and revoke their consent. I can tell you, having worked with families who have gone through adoption, that those 10 days are excruciating. I've had parents tell me they're afraid to bond; they're afraid to love this baby in case it's not theirs.

I can tell you as a mom to three kids that when you find out that you're pregnant, you're flooded with a ton of emotion, whether it was planned or unplanned. Then to deal with the loss of a pregnancy is a significant loss to so many, whether you're the biological parent, whether you're the adoptive parent, the caregiver, the loved one. And however that pregnancy came to end, you shouldn't be required to explain to your employer. We should have it very articulate through the legislation to include those two extra definitions.

It's a positive step, for sure, that we're giving Albertans time away from the workplace. We've heard countless personal stories of the impacts of pregnancy loss. It's something that I can tell you as a support person, as a friend, as a social worker: the grief can be absolutely unbearable. To have to explain to your employer the type of pregnancy loss shouldn't be a requirement, or to try to justify or advocate for yourself that your grief affiliated with loss of pregnancy deserves three days of bereavement leave. If it was clear in the legislation, it would be a simple conversation that there was a loss of pregnancy, period.

I think that there is a real opportunity for this government. Like, the minister had said that there would be an amendment. I truly hope that that amendment clearly articulates abortion and termination for medical reasons. It goes in line with the rest of section 53.9. It adds extra clarity to this piece of legislation, which I would hope all can agree in a time of grief and loss shouldn't be left up to the employee to explain to their employer.

Now, I know as an employer that there are conversations that you just trust are happening and that they're being honest and truthful. I can't imagine what the experience would be like for an employee to have to explain the type of pregnancy loss, knowing the stigma that comes with so much of that.

One of my very best friends suffered numerous miscarriages. She got to the point where she was even embarrassed to tell us that she was trying. Telling her employer that she had a miscarriage caused so much stress for her.

I think that when it comes to pregnancy, we need to be able to acknowledge all the types of loss that occur, be able to have it clearly articulated. Miscarriage, stillbirth, abortion, TFMR, infertility, failed adoption: those are all examples of loss of pregnancy. Whether the language makes you uncomfortable or not, if we're truly trying to support Albertans in accessing unpaid bereavement leave for pregnancy loss, it simply makes sense to ensure that that's included.

I think that when we have conversations with employees and the different regulations under the labour statutes, there are conversations that just simply don't exist. When an employee comes and says, you know, "I have cancer," typically that word alone is enough for the employer to know that they need support, that they need time off. My hope is that it's the same when an employee comes to their employer and says that they've experienced a loss of pregnancy and they need time off. There shouldn't be follow-up questions. There shouldn't be: "How come? Why? What happened?"

I know that we still live in a society where there are some expectations around pregnancy. A very dear friend of mine in a public position, common law, not legally married, got pregnant and was terrified to tell her employer.

Thank you.

5:00

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, at the second reading stage. I was pleased to hear that the government does intend to amend this legislation around the issue of amendments to employment standards around job-protected leave in the context of a pregnancy loss. Of course, it's not defined as such in the legislation. It's a very curious crafting of the legislation in which miscarriage and stillbirth are not defined in the act, yet they are enumerated in the act. This should have been caught at the legislative review stage of cabinet. I am shocked that it was not. It is – and this is charitable – a very sloppy way to draft legislation given the number of events that may be interpreted within miscarriage or stillbirth or not and would have to be defined as a result of some forms of litigation.

I think we heard that through the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday describing in heartbreaking detail – and I thank him for sharing that story with the people of Alberta. He did not have to, but he did. I think it was in the public interest to do so, not only because I believe it to be in the public interest that people who come to this House accurately reflect the lived experience of the people who elected us. Certainly, pregnancy loss is a lived experience for far too many people. It can be very hard on people's attachment to workforce, on relationships, on overall health and well-being for prospective parents.

But an ectopic pregnancy, because miscarriage and stillbirth are not defined in the act, wouldn't necessarily be captured. It is a loss of pregnancy, but it is not specifically a miscarriage. It is not a pregnancy that can be carried anywhere near to term. It is, in fact, dangerous for women, and it has to be dealt with via medical intervention, that can sometimes also be very painful and, depending on how it is dealt with, can take some time. This has got to be fixed in the legislation if only because it causes, just on the face of it, even on the face of what constitutes either a miscarriage or a stillbirth, a great deal of confusion.

It also seems that it imports this language because there's sort of an attempt potentially by some to only keep those grounds very, very narrow. You can see coded in this – or one can see, if one is looking quite carefully at it and the various arguments of antichoice organizations and antichoice advocates, an importation of the concept of muddying women's personhood in front of the law and the bodily autonomy of there only being one person under the law even if that person is pregnant, which is, in fact, what underlines a lot of British common-law history and then was upheld in the 1988 Morgentaler decision, when it found that the Criminal Code provisions outlining access to abortion and the provisions requiring some sort of panel that women had to appear before endangered what was called security of the person in our section 7, security of the person rights. Those infringements on those rights were not saved by section 1 of the Charter because they muddied the concept of one person being able to make decisions and have autonomy over their own health care choices.

So it appears to me that, on the face of it, the refusal to have anything more than miscarriage or stillbirth is imprecise legal language. The terms are not defined, but also there appears to be an ideological impetus here as something of a way to mollify perhaps more extreme antichoice elements within the conservative movement, who do not reflect the broad consensus of Canadian or Alberta public opinion but nevertheless hold considerable sway in certain corners of the conservative moment in this province and across the country.

It is imperative that this be amended if only to satisfy just some basic concepts of fundamental justice, and I remain quite astonished, quite frankly, Madam Speaker, that this made its way through cabinet and none of the lawyers in cabinet looked at this and said: this is, on the face of it, a very problematic way to enumerate the terms for a job-protected leave and will just simply cause confusion at the level of employment standards interpretation and ultimately land us all in the courts. The courts have better things to do than to fix the Legislative Review Committee of cabinet's mistakes and deliberate oversights, quite frankly.

It's important that we put that on the record, I think, because we have not seen the amendment yet, and if and when there is an interpretation phase of this legislation, if it doesn't get fixed in the right way, then the courts will look back at the transcript of this and they will see that the province had the opportunity to insert a better definition and a better approach that conforms with women's Charter rights, or section 7 rights to security of the person, and the full gamut of our health care or what happens to us in our interactions with the health care system, whether it's medical reasons, pregnancy loss, or other forms of pregnancy loss, and they will see that the government chose not to take that route. I mean, somebody is going to end up having to pay a whole lot of money to fix this problem, including GOA lawyers and some brave woman, I'm sure, if it doesn't get fixed within the confines of this Chamber forthwith.

Now, I want to turn my attention and the remainder of my time and comments on this bill at second reading to a completely different matter, Madam Speaker, which is the matter of postsecondary associations and the individuals that are affected by the removal of the expiration of the exclusive right of academic status associations, graduate students' associations, or postdoctoral fellows to be bargaining agents for those groups. We have heard from those affected that they were not consulted on this change, and those changes will effectively stop the work, the constitutionally protected work, that those associations have begun doing to determine who represents them in their bargaining relationship.

I will remind this House that the reason why academic staff associations, graduate students, and postdocs have the right to representation and the right to bargaining in the first place is because the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour decision in 2014 by the Supreme Court of Canada underlined that the prohibition on the right to strike for faculty and other provincially represented unions, if you will, was, in fact, unconstitutional, that freedom of association is the fundamental freedom, the Charter right that underlines the right to choose a bargaining agent and then ultimately the right to withdraw labour, and that that is, in fact, a constitutional right in this country.

At the time of drafting the legislation that the New Democrats brought in, it was communicated to us through consultation, a novel concept, that those associations wanted more time to understand the impact of the legislation, what would be expected of them as bargaining agents, and they didn't quite, I think, have the capacity at that time – I think “capacity” is the right term – to fully grapple with what it might mean to choose their own bargaining agent. That was then; this is now.

Those organizations – we're talking about relatively small groups of people affected by this change. Postdoctoral fellows are, you know, maybe a few dozen at the University of Lethbridge. Certainly, the academic staff association is larger, and the graduate student association is of reasonable size. The University of Lethbridge is still relatively small compared to U of A and U of C, obviously. But there is no question that they have had a front-row seat for what it means to be represented in a bargaining relationship and to be included in a normalized labour relations environment as a result of that Supreme Court decision in 2014.

That is because the University of Lethbridge faculty found themselves on strike after a protracted back-and-forth period of negotiations over some time, and 300-plus faculty walked a picket line for some weeks, I think just shy of two months. I could stand to be corrected on that, but I think it was around that time. Maybe it was a little bit more. I certainly felt like it was a long time as I visited the picket lines very often. One was walking distance from my house, and the other was over on the west side, up at the actual campus, where the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West also joined me to chat with faculty walking the picket line.

Nobody wanted to be there. Everybody wanted to be teaching and doing research and, you know, undertaking scientific work in the neuroscience building, in the new science building, in biological sciences, in chemistry, in mathematics, in music education – I'm just trying to go through all of the different conversations that I had with liberal arts professors, with professors of economics and business management and all of the disciplines that the University of Lethbridge excels at. Of course, they came to find themselves walking that picket line as a result of the $20 million of cuts over four years that have trickled down from this House into my community.

It was just such a shame to watch all of that happen given the fact that the cuts have been severe. When you pull $20 million over four years out of a community of 100,000, that is a tremendous economic multiplier effect, and it has had an effect on businesses, small, medium, and large. It has had an effect on real estate, on families having to make decisions about whether to stay or whether to go. Certainly, meeting people on the doorstep who say: there's no way I would ever support the UCP because I just lost my job because of them. You know, canvassing in Lethbridge-East and Lethbridge-West, that is something I hear.

Again, concentrating those cuts so narrowly in that city certainly has tremendous effects, but all of this came about because there was a normalized bargaining relationship, which the academic staff, graduate students, and postdoctoral fellows all deserve, and that's why this legislation is problematic.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Bill 17 is before the Assembly. I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. It's an important piece of legislation and, for the most part, I guess, does three main things.

With respect to changes to reservists' leave we support our reservists and the important work they do for our country. Removing the 20-day limit on job-protected leave is the right thing to do, and it will certainly bring Alberta in line with other Canadian jurisdictions.

The second thing: with respect to bereavement leave I think it's critically important that grief and other responses that may surround a pregnancy loss are recognized or duly recognized. Since there are a range of emotional, mental, physical health experiences that can follow these events, those who experience that are in the best position to describe that, to share what they need. I think that giving those Albertans time away from the workplace to process that loss is certainly a positive step.

However, one concern is that it only specifies leaves when someone has a miscarriage or stillbirth, and it does not include abortion or termination for medical reasons. This bill needs to be amended to include all types of pregnancy loss so that abortion and termination for medical reasons can be included as well. We should not leave room for interpretation.

Earlier the Premier was asked about this, and the minister of labour just said that there will be amendments. He was very hesitant – in fact, all members of the UCP caucus were hesitant – to even utter the word “abortion.” As it stands now, I think this bill does not go far enough. It is not clear enough. It needs to be amended to include abortion. It needs to be amended to include termination for medical reasons. It needs to cover a range of experiences.

Many of my colleagues shared their experiences, and I thank them for that. This bill needs to do exactly that and provide for a range of experiences that come with this loss. They need to specify what loss will be covered and what loss will not be covered.

With respect to the other changes contained in this piece of legislation, the postsecondary changes, it will identify members of the staff associations and put them in legislation, recognize them in legislation as a bargaining unit.

The problem with those changes is the same as with many other steps that the government has taken. This government has an attitude that they know best, and they do not consult with relevant stakeholders when making these changes. We have heard from those impacted by these changes that they were not consulted. It's deeply concerning because this government has made a number of changes to postsecondary institutions without consulting them.

Postsecondary institutions have been on the chopping block from day one, when the UCP began government. Their funds were cut by $700 million without any consultation with universities and postsecondary institutions. Their staff was fired. Their grants were cut. Tuition fees were raised. Interest on student loans was raised. All these things were done without consultation with the postsecondary institutions, not just without consultation but despite strong opposition from postsecondary institutions, despite evidence that we need a strong postsecondary sector to grow our economy, to diversify our economy, to be a part of the modern economy. But this government did not listen to anyone, and now they're making further changes that will impact postsecondary institutions without consulting them.

These are the reasons why, whenever this government comes close to educational institutions, postsecondary institutions, or does anything, nobody trusts them. Their goal is to keep postsecondary education out of reach of everyday Albertans and to do much damage to these institutions. As it stands now, I think there need to be substantial amendments in order for us to support this piece of legislation.

With that, I will take my seat.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call on the minister to close debate.

[Motion carried; Bill 17 read a second time]

Bill 11 Continuing Care Act

Ms Gray moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the government has not carried out sufficient consultations on the contents of the bill with families whose loved ones lost their lives from COVID-19 while in continuing care.

[Debate adjourned on the amendment May 3]

The Speaker: Hon. members, on amendment RA1 to Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview would like to add to the debate.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to join the debate on referral of Bill 11 to committee and that this not be read further. I mean, I've spoken already regarding the Continuing Care Act. You know, this is described as framework legislation, so it's legislation that, really, sets a framework. It doesn't have a lot of detail in it, and therein lies the concern.

This is such a key area. Since we've just experienced some very difficult years because of COVID-19, this area in our province has had so much difficulty. We know that more than 1,600 people have died in continuing care facilities, residents of continuing care facilities, throughout our province. According to the National Institute on Ageing we've had the highest number of outbreaks in facilities in Canada here in our province. These are sad statistics.

This means that so many families have grieved lost loved ones and, I'm sure, are continuing to grieve as each sort of milestone – another birthday, another holiday like Christmas – comes up, you know, memories of that individual.

Sadly, so many of these deaths were preventable, but for a multitude of reasons I think the services that these families needed, that these residents needed were not provided. Sadly, they were put in harm's way. That's why it's so important that this bill not be read again.

One of the major things that's a huge concern, I would say, was just, you know, how the UCP really dragged their feet on that one-site work order of the chief medical officer. When they did finally bring it forward, after we had for months – I think it was two months we were calling for it, and other jurisdictions had been doing this. They finally did bring it in. But guess what? Unfortunately, there were so many exemptions to this one-site work order that, really, it still meant that it didn't have much power to mandate that workers would only work at one site. The reason that that was so important, of course, as we remember, is because oftentimes COVID was transmitted by these health care workers because they worked at multiple facilities. Sometimes they worked in other kinds of jobs. They were spreading COVID-19 amongst the residents, and that, obviously, had deadly consequences, as I've just noted, with over 1,600 residents dying here in Alberta.

Things could have been handled very much differently. The urgency and the importance of Bill 11 is key. The tragic thing is – I mean, we were hoping for some transformational legislation, quite frankly, but what we got here is, really, an administrative bill. As I said, it's framework legislation that gives very few details about what exactly is going to be transformed. The question is: will it transform our continuing care system in Alberta? Really, we know – and COVID has shone the light very brightly – that it does need to be transformed. We knew this before COVID, but of course the pandemic did really show us very clearly how much that system needs revamping.

You know, we're grindingly slowly moving forward. But I guess what I would say to the government is: where's the urgency? Where's the urgency? What does it take to see the importance of this? A pretty serious consequence has already happened, but we're told now that it's going to be still spring 2023 when any of the detail, which is going to be in regulations, will come about. I just want to express my concern about that, really, again just seeing how this UCP government has not supported seniors. Not all residents of continuing care facilities are seniors, but I would say that the large majority are. Certainly, families of those residents really feel that they can't depend on the UCP to competently manage the continuing care system, to have the best interests of their loved ones in mind.

This isn't the only area where the UCP has really, you know, abandoned seniors, I'm sad to say, because they've done other things, and I guess I just want to identify that one of the other things that they've done is that they closed the Seniors Advocate office. That was one of the first things they did when they became government. Of course, that office did tremendous work to advocate for seniors, to help them navigate provincial programs. I mean, it's a complex system. The work that the social workers, that the advocate herself did at the time made a big difference.

It was a new office that, of course, we created when we were government. I had the honour of being the Minister of Seniors and Housing at that time, and we took great pains to make sure that we had a really high-calibre, qualified individual to lead that office and, you know, just set it up, obviously, and have staff and really develop that whole Seniors Advocate office. We chose Dr. Sheree Kwong See, who was a professor at the University of Alberta, continues to be a professor there, of course, as a specialist in seniors' services. Certainly, she was a strong advocate. I met with her on a quarterly basis, and she certainly told me many times all the ways we were failing as a government. She pushed the envelope, and that was her job. I feel like she made me a better minister because she challenged what we were doing.

Certainly, one of the things that she taught me was just about, you know, sort of being much more respectful in terms of our language. Sometimes when we talk about seniors, people will say, "Our seniors," as if they're little children or something. No, no, no. That's not very respectful. She was often critiquing how information came out from the ministry and made sure that we had respectful language.

But, sadly, as I said, when the UCP was elected, one of the first acts was to close that office. At the time the minister said it was because: oh, well, the Health Advocate can do that. Shortly after the UCP was elected, that Health Advocate position was open, and the Minister of Health at the time actually stopped the sort of recruitment process, the interviewing process, and put in a hand-picked UCP supporter, Janice Harrington, who really has no background in, certainly, health or seniors and sort of really, I think, created a question of credibility for that office.

Despite the Minister of Seniors and Housing's commitment to me, certainly, in multiple estimates that I've asked her about or even in this House, asking questions that seniors' concerns were being addressed by the Health Advocate, she has not met with the Health Advocate. I asked her that specifically in estimates, you know, again this year. Refused to answer that. I can only assume from that that she's not meeting with them. I asked the Health minister the same question because that's what the Minister of Seniors and Housing advised me to do, because she says: that's Health. That makes me question whether she actually is listening to the Health Advocate or the Health Advocate actually is doing anything to support seniors. And he told me that he didn't know if they'd been meeting. He had met with the Health Advocate regarding concerns for his Health ministry but nothing about, specifically, the seniors ministry.

Anyway, despite the Minister of Seniors and Housing saying that, yes, absolutely, seniors' concerns will be met and supported and advanced through that office, the Health Advocate, because they're just amalgamating it, so seniors will still – it's not happening. There wasn't even a report this year. You know, every year an annual report is submitted by the advocate, and there was nothing even this year, so we have no public record even of what's going on. Again, this is just an example of the UCP not advancing the concerns of seniors, not providing supports for them. In Bill 11 again we're being told, "Yes, yes, yes; it's all going to be taken care of," but again it's a delay. We won't hear anything until the spring of 2023. Again, I just feel this is a lack of urgency on the part of government, because we've been through a very difficult time, and there are things that could be done right now to make a huge difference for residents of continuing care facilities.

I guess another area where it shows we just can't trust this government, can't trust the UCP, is Bill 70, the COVID-19 Related Measures Act. I think it was last spring that that bill was passed, and it took away the right of families to seek justice. So if loved ones were neglected or indeed passed away in continuing care facilities due to negligence on the part of the facility, no longer could families seek justice. Again, this is just another way the UCP is abandoning seniors and is deeply disturbing to me.

Another – well, this is sort of an overall issue with some of the continuing care system, that there are many private facilities, there's a for-profit model. That can create difficulties, I would say, in the system because we know from research – and it's been extensive – that the best outcomes for residents of continuing care facilities, the best outcomes for the residents themselves, come from public facilities; second, nonprofit facilities; third, we know that the privates do the worst in terms of how they support seniors. We know that the private operators – when they got, you know, I think it was the federal money for COVID support, we know that a lot of that money went to shareholders. Herein lies the issue with some of the private continuing care facilities, because they're operating to make profit. It's not so much about service delivery; it's more about making profit for their shareholders.

Also, the staff are being squeezed because they're not getting the supports they need to be able to serve seniors well. We know that that is one of the most important aspects of continuing care, that staff are well supported, well trained, yet we know that most of the staff in continuing care are low-paid, precarious workers – most of them are women – and that they are often newcomers to our country. That makes it pretty volatile for everyone involved in that system because if you have workers that aren't well supported, it's hard for them to do the job that they need to.

Serving vulnerable seniors: you know, that's not easy work. That work requires training. Certainly, you have to develop a relationship with people, so if the staff are always changing, which happens oftentimes with precarious workers, then of course the health outcomes for the seniors themselves will be much diminished. You get to know seniors, and you know, perhaps, what they like or how they like things to be done, those kinds of things. If workers are always changing, they can't be supported.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on the amendment the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this afternoon to speak to Bill 11, the Continuing Care Act, under RA1. This is not the first amendment that we have put forward. Previously in the debate we put forward an amendment to refer this piece of legislation to committee based on what we've been hearing from Albertans, and what we see in this legislation is that there's absolutely no action in this bill. We advocated, when we were requesting for it to go to committee – and I will continue to advocate like my colleagues have on this referral amendment – that this bill not proceed in the way that it's been written.

We have seen devastating outcomes for Albertans. I would say that having over 1,600 loved ones die in continuing care in Alberta is a tragedy, and it absolutely has to be a call for action. Bill 11 was a wonderful opportunity for the government to do that, but unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, when we look through this, it doesn't have the action that's required. I would suggest that members really consider not allowing this piece of legislation to be read a second time and that the UCP really take the time to talk to Albertans about what this act should do.

I know that throughout COVID I've had many important people in my life either working in continuing care or have loved ones in the continuing care facilities in the province, and their stories are heartbreaking. We saw the stories emerge throughout COVID when the military was called in to assist. That made the national stage, talking about the care that seniors are having in these facilities, and I think that we need to have that same kind of transparency and real action about what needs to be done. The best way to come up with solutions is to ask those that are living it, ask those that work in those environments, ask the loved ones who have their people in those continuing care residences.

And like the Member for . . .

Mr. Bilous: West Henday.

Ms Goehring: No.

Mr. Feehan: Riverview.

Ms Goehring: . . . Edmonton-Riverview was talking about, this is their home. So when we're talking about job and safety standards and those types of things, there's a certain amount of intimacy that happens when the work that you're doing is providing care to someone in their home. I know my experience working in group care with young people: I had an incredible privilege to work in their home. First and foremost, it was an expectation of myself and my staff that we treat it as their home. Yes, this is our place of employment, but first and foremost this is where the people that we work with live.

Having that intimate relationship with people is so important, and that care can't be completed in a way that is expected if there are so many barriers that are being forced on them. When we talk about hours, when we talk about ratios, this isn't how many people can fit in a capacity, in a space, if you work at, let's say, a stadium and you're looking at how many people meet fire code. These are person-to-person ratios. These are expectations of the people providing the care and the utmost respect and quality of care that we're expecting to be provided to seniors that are living in these facilities.

We made an attempt to have this referred to committee, and that was defeated, and now we're making an attempt that it not be read a second time, that the government take the opportunity to really talk to those loved ones and have the conversation about what it was like when COVID was at its peak. What is it like now? Have there been any sort of changes or implementations that need to happen that are being missed? That information isn't relayed in this bill. We know that if we gave opportunity to speak to grieving families, there is a lot that they would say. They're coming from a place of first-hand experience of the tragedies that happened to their loved ones, and with legislation this government took away the rights of grieving families. It provides an opportunity, if we were to agree on this amendment, for the government to really get it right, to listen to those that have been impacted.

One of my dearest friends provided care for her great-aunt living in a facility. My friend worked full-time. Her husband worked full-time. Both of her kids were university students. The staff were so overwhelmed at the facility. They weren't able to actually provide the care that was required to feed her. My girlfriend said that it would take anywhere from 45 minutes to an hour. She was not capable of feeding herself. She needed to be assisted quite significantly, and the staff just couldn't do it, so my girlfriend and her loved ones took turns. They were there two, three times a day just making sure that her basic need of eating was taken care of.

Now, when we look at what it's been like for those that are working in these types of facilities, the stress has been absolutely unbearable for many. I know that I've had calls from physicians, from health care workers, from nurses, from aides that told me that their workplace has been filled with professionals that hide in closets crying because they're so overwhelmed with the work conditions and the workloads and the care that they're providing. So many have told me that they want to do more, they want things to change, and they need the support from government to be able to do that. I know that if I'm hearing it, members of government are hearing it, Mr. Speaker.

I think that by not moving forward with this legislation and approving and voting in support of this RA1, it really gives an opportunity to just pause it, reach out, talk to those Albertans that have so many stories to share. It's an opportunity to really get this right. We know that there are so many that have been impacted by these 1,600 Albertans that tragically passed away from COVID, that 1,600 individuals and countless others that loved them, that knew them, that are grieving. They could have some significant insight on the impacts that should be in this Continuing Care Act, the action that needs to be taken at this time. I don't understand why there's this need to get this through legislation right now when we're hearing loud and clear that it does nothing. Let's listen to those that work in the care facilities. Let's talk about some of the substantive changes that could occur.

We know that there's a mistrust from those working in health care for this government based on how they've been treated. We know that there's continuous action that has created chaos. And we've seen that this government is just simply incapable of managing a complex health care system. Let's turn to those that are the front lines, the family, the residents, and get this right. It's an opportunity to be leading in how we respond to our continuing care facilities. We want to be able to shine the light on what's going wrong. We don't want it to be hidden in some report; we want it to be talked about and fixed. The UCP claim that that's something they want to do, yet this legislation doesn't do that. I think that when we hear the UCP time and time and time again say, "It's coming in regulation; just trust us" – the record of trust that has been broken continuously from this government leads so many to believe that they can't trust the UCP. Having clear, comprehensive legislation provides an opportunity to get it right, to talk about it.

I know that one of the things that this government did early on was that they closed the Seniors Advocate office. I think of all of that missed information that really could have been shared to really make this piece of legislation a piece of action, listening to the concerns of seniors. They would have been able to report directly to the Legislature and make recommendations. But we don't have that. That's not something that this government thought was a priority. So in lieu of having that, why not talk to those living in continuing care? Why not talk to those residents that are impacted?

I know the trauma that exists around the health care workers, the residents being trapped in their private rooms without knowing what was going on with their neighbours. Hearing of tragic loss and death and sickness has an impact. When you're working in people's homes and you're establishing incredible relationships with people, the grief and loss that you're feeling through this needs to be heard. It needs to be listened to. We need to be able to show Albertans that their loss and tragedy meant something, that a government that truly cares takes action. We take information, we take experience, we listen to those that have lived this, and then we do better. I would argue that through this referral amendment that gives government that perfect opportunity to just pause what they're proposing to do, actually implement something that has real, tangible action. I would really encourage all members of this House to really think about the stories that they've been hearing and what the change could look like.

I know all of us in this Chamber know someone who's aging. If they're not currently in a facility, there are those conversations about whether or not they should be. Knowing the state that it is right now and the fear that's surrounding it, I would argue that that's a discussion that has a lot of consequence.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I would really encourage all members of this House to vote in support of RA1 and just pause this legislation. Get it right. Let's do something that has real action, not just words, something that has a true impact on those that are continuing to work in these environments, those that are continuing to live in those environments, and those that are going to be entering those environments. Seniors deserve the best possible care, and we owe it to them.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on amendment RA1 are there others? The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to thank the members for Edmonton-Riverview and St. Albert for their comments on this bill. I'd like to speak to the amendment, and I'd like to speak against the amendment. While I appreciate the comments made by the members across the way about their passion for supporting seniors and the need for us to move forward, supporting this motion, which actually stalls us in our tracks and prohibits us from taking action, is actually not the way to do that.

Mr. Speaker, if we read the motion, you know, the single largest reason why they suggest that the bill not be read a second time is because there have been insufficient consultations. I'd like to speak to that in a second. The other reason that the members opposite give are the concerns of what's not in the bill in terms of transformation. We agree that we need to transform the system, and I'll speak to that. Finally, the suggestion that the legislation does nothing, that it doesn't take action: I'd like to speak to that because, again, simply, that is not the case.

Now, on the first item in regard to consultation, Mr. Speaker, there has been significant consultation. Over the years many continuing care stakeholders have asked the Ministry of Health to review Alberta's legislation to address challenges that exist in the system. This legislation review is part of our broader commitment to transform our continuing care system, to do everything we can to ensure that Albertans have access to high-quality continuing care. Now, we engaged numerous continuing care stakeholder organizations, and we received 33 written submissions that identified issues and recommendations for improvement. Additionally, input was received through home-care and nursing care regulation review. The legislative review was also informed by advice and recommendations from the facility-based continuing care review process.

I'd like to point out that that process occurred after we had already had some experience with COVID. We were into that for a year, and we heard through part of that review feedback from over 7,000 Albertans, including residents, family members, caregivers, operators, and community organizations. We heard stories of people that were impacted by COVID living in the seniors' facilities. We heard stories of families who were impacted, and we heard suggestions and recommendations through the FBCC to be able to make changes. I'll speak in a minute on the changes that we're making. All of this we took into account when we put this legislation into place. So, Mr. Speaker, there was sufficient consultation.

The second point I'd like to make is on the concern about what's not in the bill. Mr. Speaker, concerns were raised by the other side that, you know: we can't trust the government to take action, to put it into regulation. Well, this bill is a framework, and I'll talk a little bit about what it does. They're quite right that it sets the frame for us to be able to do the transformation, that the policies and the changes are appropriately in regulation, as they are now. What we're doing is that we're taking disparate acts, six acts, pulling them together into one to have one consistent framework so we can ensure that we can have better outcomes and better governance of the entire sector and then work with the sector over the course of the coming months to build regulations to be able to deliver on the policies.

But I can say, Mr. Speaker, that we are taking action. We are putting our money where our mouths are. In Budget 2022 we increased the funding for continuing care, community care, and home care by over $200 million, expanding access to home care. We also as part of our budget will be building over 1,500 more spaces in continuing care this year. Plus, we've added an additional $200 million for additional spaces over the next three years. That is commitment. That is action that we are taking.

Part of that has been informed by the facility-based continuing care review, which suggested that one of the challenges associated with COVID – some of the worst outcomes in certain continuing care facilities were not associated with whether it was private or public; it was actually more associated with whether it was old or new, the age, and whether or not there were shared accommodations or shared washrooms. We're already taking action in terms of making renovations and changes to move away from the shared accommodations in recognition of that, and we will be doing more.

Mr. Speaker, we have put our money where our mouth is. This is a first step in terms of the funding, but that's the appropriate place where this will be. As the hon. members know, when they were in government, you don't put the budget, you don't put the policy, you don't put the details in regard to the staffing in the legislation. That goes in the regulations. That goes in the policy.

I'd like to talk a little bit about what this act does do, because it does enable us to be able to build a better system. It's the foundation. It will provide for greater system accountability, Mr. Speaker. It will align continuing care accommodation services, transparency, compliance, and monitoring, and it'll help us protect the quality of care and services and residents and clients. It puts all of that in place, better administration, so I urge . . .

The Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt; however, the hon. Minister of Health will have nine minutes remaining should he choose to use it the next time this item is called for debate.

Hon. members, pursuant to Standing Order 3(1) the House stands adjourned until this evening at 7:30.

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 22

Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022

[Debate adjourned May 4: Mr. Eggen speaking]

The Speaker: Hon. members, for second reading, Bill 22. Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. At this point in the evening I don't have an opportunity to make a direct connection between the game, because it doesn't start for another 30 minutes, but I imagine there might be opportunities in other bills or stages of debate tonight.

The Speaker: The atmosphere is electric.

Ms Hoffman: The atmosphere is electric: way to light it up, Mr. Speaker. I feel pretty charged as we enter into consideration of Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022. Maybe not a hockey pun quite yet, but it seems like we will have quite a few electricity-related opportunities to be connected and charged up.

We haven't had this bill for long. We've had it for a couple of days now, but it seems like there are many positives at this point in reading some of the efforts that are in this bill. I think that they could have positive long-term impacts if implemented properly and through thoughtful regulations, but we definitely have seen a lack of interest in supporting ordinary Alberta families, regular ratepayers and consumers, when it comes to the government's initiatives and actually standing by those who – I think everyone in Alberta should be able to have a good quality of life, should be able to work one full-time job to be able to support a family, if they so choose, have a home, and be able to have electricity, of course, to support functioning in that home.

As I think about the importance of an affordable electricity system, I think about the many, many families who relied on technology even more over the last two years than they did before. Of course, we've seen such a significant change in how society has been interconnected and modernized over the last two generations, in particular, as it relates to connectivity and the Internet, and of course none of us would be able to stay connected if we didn't have power and electricity to support that as well.

I can't help but reflect on a set of questions from earlier today that really focused on what the person asking the questions, the Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat, deemed to be problematic, dangerous solar power. When I talk to my neighbours and constituents throughout Edmonton-Glenora, many people are very excited in trying to grow their opportunities for renewable electricity for a number of reasons. Number one, I think that many people want to reduce the amount of individual fossil fuel consumption in their own home, and if they can do that in a way that doesn't negatively impact their quality of life and the power that they consume personally, I think that that could be of benefit, of course, to us all.

One of the ways that we have seen the municipal and the federal governments step up is through programs to support people in putting their own modules on their own homes to produce as much electricity as possible locally and tie it back into the grid, of course, and create opportunities for their neighbours and others to use that electricity as well.

We could see the current government find ways to increase affordability and really get more opportunities into the hands of everyday residents throughout the province who want to access those opportunities, but unfortunately we haven't seen that. What we have seen are skyrocketing bills over the last several months, and regularly we'll hear the associate minister sort of shrug it off and say how confident he is in the free market and that everything's just fine. Then occasionally we'll hear – well, we heard it several weeks ago now; almost two months, actually – that the government made a decision to move forward on bringing forward a rebate, and thank goodness.

Because I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the number of households that told me their bills went from $300 to $500 in just a matter of one or two months – I can't even keep track of how many families told me that. An almost 100 per cent increase to their bills, probably about an 80 per cent increase to many households throughout the province. The government, you know, instead of helping out with these massive increases, $200 increases, said that they would do $50 a month for the first three months of the fiscal year. They actually brought forward a request to this House for supplementary supply. Of course, those first three months of the year were in the last fiscal year, not the current fiscal year, so they needed us to approve them spending money out of last year's budget to be able to pass these savings on to ordinary families.

We, of course, want to see families have any kind of relief. They would like the relief to be more substantial. I know even members of the UCP caucus have referred to the rebate as paltry. But, you know, even a paltry $50-a-month rebate for three months is better than nothing, I guess, Mr. Speaker. Of course, Albertans expect much more from a government that brags about being flush with cash right now, but they'll take what they can get.

Except that it was the end of March when we were asked to support the supplementary supply, and now here we are into May, and Albertans still haven't seen the impacts of that rebate and can't even seem to get a concrete date or a commitment that the associate minister is willing to stake his reputation and ultimately his job on the effective distribution of that rebate. I will tell you that whether he wants to stake his job on it or not, his job rests on that. That is a big portion of what people will remember and hold him to account for when it comes to all of us asking for an opportunity to come back to this place and continue the work that we've done on behalf of Albertans. So I would encourage the associate minister and all members of the government to actually get on with it. They asked for support in supplementary supply, and it has been granted. It's been quite some weeks now.

I will say that in terms of the trust component it is not very high right now in terms of ordinary Albertans being able to count on their government to follow through on promises that they've made and actually do anything to directly support them and their families when it comes to the skyrocketing bills that they're facing for electricity. Of course, the current government has delayed making changes to the grid that could provide long-term relief for Albertans in their utility costs and continues to try to lay any blame on the brief period of time when Conservatives weren't solely responsible for the decisions being made as it relates to electricity. I hate to remind the associate minister that, you know, he's been in his role now for three years. Families are really feeling significant pressure under his leadership. What most voters would like to see in terms of electricity is, obviously, constant supply and for it to be made more affordable. There are a number of ways that we could do that, that we hope the government will continue to explore as we move forward.

We do have a couple of questions that I hope that we can get some responses to as we continue to debate this bill, Bill 22, here tonight. One of the questions was around – there was a bill last session that has been now brought back quite similarly. I guess one of the questions would be: why did the minister allow the former iteration of this bill to die on the Order Paper, and what has changed between then and now in terms of the content of the bill and the political appetite from the current government?

Then another question would be, of course: why did it take as long as it did for this bill to come back? Here we are, Bill 22. A very similar bill was debated in previous sessions. Why wasn't this a higher priority and dealt with earlier in the session than where we are at now in terms of the timeline?

To summarize a little bit of what I understand from the bill – and I certainly look forward to opportunities to hear from government members on their perceptions of some of these pieces as well – it appears that there are sort of four main areas in the bill. The first is about defining energy storage. Good. The second is about self-supply and export. Good. The third is about requiring distribution facility owners, DFOs, to prepare long-term distribution system plans, which have to be given regulatory approval, so they have to receive regulatory approval before they can move forward, and then the last piece appears to be sections dealing with dissolving of the Balancing Pool.

Again, Mr. Speaker, generally I'd say that the content for those four areas isn't of significant concern for us at this point, so at this point I would say I'm leaning more towards supporting the bill than cautioning against it. Of course, it all comes down, in the end, to – the devil is in the details, right? We don't have a lot of details in many of the bills that come forward to this place under the current government. We have a lot of enabling provisions and a lot of opportunities through regulation to define in greater detail, but of course regulations aren't debated in public.

The regulations aren't even debated by all members of the Assembly or even all members of the governing party. Regulations go through cabinet committees and to cabinet, and that's the legal requirement as it relates to that. I think Albertans are right to want greater transparency from this government when it comes to decision-making and as many details as possible to be considered through the legislation rather than so many things being funnelled through regulation.

In terms of the sections that we sort of have highlighted, being part of this legislation, the first one relates to energy storage, as we said, and it's previously undefined largely because the energy storage has traditionally not been a factor in electricity grids. I think a big part of that is because the types of electricity that we've had here in Alberta primarily were on demand, right? We would see a lot of coal-fired electricity. You don't need to store coal – you don't need to burn it ahead of time and store it. But when we have the additional forms of energy, including wind and solar, which, of course, are dependent on the conditions of the day, and some days we will produce a significant amount, and some days that amount will be produced when most people aren't drawing from the grid, so of course we will need to feed it into the grid and have ways to actually store it so that it can be used when most necessary; for example, at 8 o'clock when everyone turns on their TVs to watch the hockey game. Making sure that we have the power that's been produced during the day available for families to be able to consume in 15-ish minutes I think is something that we are wise to define, and I'm glad that the bill does define storage.

It seems to enable energy storage projects, which, of course, would be larger scale than what most people anticipate with local battery storage close to the source, but we will need storage projects and some significant ones to meet our needs in a diversified energy economy. The lack of definition previously prevented effective regulations and made energy storage projects more difficult to move forward, so I do hope that the government puts some significant focus on getting more storage projects available throughout the province. We are so fortunate to have all of the nonrenewable energy that we have, but we also are very fortunate to have so much opportunity in renewables as well, so why wouldn't we ensure that we have greater opportunities for storage and to access and harness the wind and the sun?

This will also allow storage to be integrated into the distribution and transmission, which we hope will help to lower transmission costs for consumers throughout the province. I regularly hear and feel the impacts of those transmission costs on our bills, transmission costs that were committed to by former Conservative governments, and we all have unfortunately been living through the excessive costs that are continuing to grow in that area.

Energy storage will also be important to guarantee reliable and lower cost power moving forward, so I think that the increased discussion through this bill around energy storage is a move in the right direction. The bill defines storage to recategorize the unique role energy storage can play in our electricity system and support more energy storage projects as they go forward, and that absolutely is a good thing.

This relates to the Electric Utilities Act because it defines energy storage resources as the energy that's stored for the purposes of energy storage as separate from the generation unit. "The component of an energy storage facility that uses a technology or process that is capable of using . . ." [Ms Hoffman's speaking time expired] Oh, shoot.

The Speaker: My apologies for not reminding the member that we were ending her opportunity to speak. I'm sure she'll have others.

Are there others who wish to join in the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was going to pause to see if any government members wanted to speak to this bill, but I am pleased to rise and speak to it now, Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022. My colleague the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood said that probably nobody is going to be listening to our comments because of the hockey game. Actually, my comments, for those who are watching, are going to come in the 15 minutes before the game starts. So if people are really looking to be pumped up and electrified before the game starts, I am happy to provide them the enthusiasm and electrification they need.

In any event, I am pleased to speak to this bill as it comes before this House today. You know, I think the Member for Edmonton-Glenora made some important comments. I will get into the content of the bill in a moment. Certainly, electricity is something that's very much on the minds of a lot of Albertans right now. We are seeing, of course, Albertans shocked at the rise of their electricity bills, and to see many of their bills, not just electricity but all utility bills and insurance, groceries – everything is going up, and that's really a challenge for many Albertans. We also have an Alberta government that is very slow to respond. A lot of talk but not a lot of action.

In fact, you know, even earlier today we still had not heard any clear answer. We heard a lot of juvenile heckling, but we did not actually get a clear answer from the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity about when Albertans can expect to see rebates, that the Official Opposition has been calling for for several months. Couldn't answer the question, and I think that's a deep concern. In fact, it's a question that not just the Official Opposition but Albertans are asking and have repeatedly asked and have yet to get an answer to as to when they can actually expect any relief on their electricity bills.

Of course, this is affecting not just residential owners and households; it's actually affecting business. It's affecting industries who obviously rely heavily on electricity. This is an impact on our economy as a whole, and we certainly need to get these costs under control and to see some relief for Albertans as soon as possible. I certainly hope that sometime this year the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity decides to make this a priority, to actually take action.

In any event, we are seeing a delayed reaction in terms of this bill that's before us today. As we are aware, this is actually legislation that was tabled before this House some months ago yet, for some reason, was not brought forward for debate. We saw several other pet projects come forward by the government, yet for some reason this bill, which actually does, I think, chart a path to start making some credible progress on our electricity grid, was delayed. I guess better late than never could be the motto for some things for this government. I think there are probably less charitable mottos that many Albertans have, but let's give it a better late than never on this one. As the Member for Edmonton-Glenora said, going through the bill, there are a number of provisions that, you know, actually sound like a good step forward in charting the path for our electricity grid.

As I understand it, Bill 22 essentially has four main areas. The first is that it addresses defining energy storage. This is important because it was undefined. The concept or term of energy storage was undefined in legislation governing our electricity grid. That's largely because energy storage wasn't actually a huge factor in our electricity grid for many years. But, of course, things are shifting and changing. This will actually enable energy storage products.

I know that in consultations we have done through the Alberta's future initiative – Mr. Speaker and all those listening, I invite you to go to albertasfuture.ca because we've done a number of consultations, hundreds actually, on a number of economic policies, including on issues related to renewable energy and, you know, energy storage. We know that Albertans have certainly been providing us with their feedback, their advice, what pitfalls to avoid, but also what things to consider, and we've developed a number of economic policies. I know I've sat in on energy consultations that we've done where energy storage has certainly come up as something that we're not only going to need but that presents a great opportunity for our economy and our energy grid going forward.

Without having the concept of energy storage defined in legislation, it has actually prevented these projects from being able to move forward in a meaningful way because they weren't covered by existing regulations. As I understand it, under Bill 22 this will allow energy storage to be, you know, integrated into distribution and transmission, which over time will hopefully lower transmission costs. This will be important to guarantee what many Albertans need, which is reliable and lower cost power going forward. This is certainly something that I think is important.

With respect to, you know, this idea of energy storage it sets out – of course, this bill amends a number of different pieces of legislation and a number of statutes, including the Electric Utilities Act, the Hydro and Electric Energy Act, and the Alberta Utilities Commission Act, and it defines energy storage within the context of each of those individual pieces of legislation to sort of recognize the unique role that energy storage can play in our electricity system and support more energy projects going forward.

I think the Member for Edmonton-Glenora was starting to get into the definitions, but I want to just talk about how this actually also relates to – I believe that the bill also requires distribution facility owners to prepare long-term distribution system plans, which will have to receive regulatory approval. Why I wanted to bring that piece up, which is another element of the act, is that this can help plan for the transition to the increased electrification in electric vehicles.

I don't know about you, Mr. Speaker, but I can tell you that I've heard a lot of Albertans talking about moving to more electrified vehicles. I can tell you that my nine-year-old son is a little bit obsessed right now with electric vehicles and is constantly reporting back to me on the progress that's being made on new electric vehicles, what's coming forward. He's informed me of one vehicle, which he has said he really wants us to get, which is not even available on the market yet. But, of course, my son is obsessively doing the research. Gosh, he's going to be really upset with me if I get the name of the car wrong, but it is, like, an Ioniq Seven, I believe, and he informed me that it's actually driven by a joystick. That, I have to say, was my big hesitation, apart from, I imagine, the significant cost, but you know he's very excited about the idea of electric vehicles. We talk about it quite a bit.

I know that the market right now to get electric vehicles is really tough, actually. You have to go on waiting lists for – you know, I think it's up to 18 months for electric vehicles right now. I know because we were looking at it ourselves in our house, and we were able to replace a vehicle that was no longer functional with a plug-in hybrid vehicle. Of course, yes, it's now on our minds a little bit more about: where do we get more electricity to run more of these vehicles? Because that is the way I think the market is going. We see that large pickup trucks are going to be now electrified. This is going to be happening in every model of vehicle imaginable. I think that more and more Albertans and Canadians are going to be moving in that direction, would like to move in that direction, and we, of course, need to make sure that we have the electric capacity to handle that.

I think that there are some very good questions being raised right now about whether or not we do have that capacity and how do we raise that. Of course, you know, electricity doesn't always come with – I mean, it also has some environmental impacts as well, Mr. Speaker. It's not necessarily a panacea. Moving away from fossil fuel driven vehicles to electrification does not automatically mean that there's no environmental impact. We know there is. We've learned a lot, I think, from the vehicles that we've all been driving for decades.

You know, we need to be preparing for not only an electrical grid that can manage and store the needed power to serve the greater car market for electric vehicles but also do so in an environmentally responsible way. There are going to be some challenges there. We know that, Mr. Speaker, but I think efforts being made to allow for that innovation as well as conversations around increasing energy storage are critical to that discussion. This bill, I think, supports moving in that direction, and I think that's a good thing.

I did have some questions about – you know, I think one of the other provisions around the bill was to allow unlimited self-supply with export. But I understand, because one of the questions I had – essentially, Mr. Speaker, under the Electric Utilities Act what this means or what it's defined as meaning is "the production of electric energy on a property of which a person is the owner or a tenant where any of the electric energy is consumed on that property by that owner or tenant." Basically, it's self-supplying.

Also, of course, there's always going to be – especially when we're talking about moving to things like solar panels, there'll be more electricity that will be put back into the grid, right? That's a conversation, again, that I know a lot of Albertans are having. They're looking at getting that assessment done about solar energy and how to, you know, generate enough for their own use in their own home but also what that means in terms of putting energy back into the grid. These are conversations that Albertans are already having.

I think that if I were to express, you know, one of my frustrations – and I have many – with this current government, it's that they are dragging their heels and are slow to respond to the conversations that are already happening in this province. Rather than leading in those discussions and rather than showing leadership in where energy is going, we've seen incredible resistance, which is not just, I guess, a bit outdated; it's also damaging to our economy. It's damaging in terms of our reputation of being what we have been for decades in this province, which are energy leaders.

We've already shown innovation and creativity and leadership in this space, so I'm kind of exhausted by this government's continued efforts to tarnish that reputation by refusing to harness the energy that's already coming from both Albertans and the energy sector around where they want to go moving forward. We see great interest in renewables not just from, you know, environmentalists, but that interest is coming from global investors. That interest is coming from the energy sector itself, who's looking for those opportunities.

I think, you know, when we talk about energy storage, as this bill does, we also have to be talking about attracting the talent to do some of this creative work, to do some of this innovative work. I know, for example, many of my colleagues – and I'm seeing the Member for Edmonton-City Centre, who has been such an advocate on the tech industry, as well as my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. But that's because we can lead in that. Tech isn't some sort of sector that is separate from what we're talking about here in Bill 22. Tech is integral to actually the innovation that we need.

Member Irwin: Diversification, right?

Ms Pancholi: Yeah. It is a diversification of our economy, and it is doing what we do best, which is being leaders in innovation and in the energy sector.

You know, I'm excited about opportunities to do that. Albertans are excited about opportunities to do that. We see the rhetoric from this government not reflect that, not reflect the conversations. I know my colleagues and I have spent a fair bit of time recently, in particular, in Calgary. When I talk to folks in the energy sector, they are excited. There are things that they want to do. They have to at some point, they're telling me, just ignore what this government's rhetoric is because it's damaging their reputation and it's making it less likely that people would want to invest in Alberta for these innovative projects.

I guess, you know, regardless of where this government is going in dragging their heels on this, taking six months to do this, Alberta will move ahead without this government. They are doing that. The private sector is. And I have a feeling, Mr. Speaker, that there are many Albertans who are excited by the conversations that we've been having with them for the last three years and even the years before that about renewable energy and moving our electricity grid into that new and innovative space.

Mr. Speaker, I think I can say, you know, that I have frustrations overall with the approach that this government has taken to our renewable energy space, to our electricity grid. I mean, Albertans are feeling that right now in their pocketbooks, in their household budgets, the dragging of the feet by this government. But what I am confident in is that Albertans will continue to do what we do best, which is lead, and I'm also excited about the opportunity to lead with them.

I think that the question Albertans will ask is: do they want a government that is not willing to look into the future and is more likely to look in the past, or do they want a government that will do the opposite? I'm proud that I think we will be that government.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others wishing to join the debate this evening? The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has risen.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022. When I saw this bill come in and I started to take a look at what it was about and seeing it talking about enabling more energy storage, working on that part of the industry in the province of Alberta, it put me in mind of an entrepreneur I had met a few years back. As my colleague for Edmonton-Whitemud noted, here in Edmonton-City Centre the tech and innovation industry is an important part of growing the economy in our downtown. Certainly, our government did make, I think, some smart investments and introduced some programs to help grow that industry and set it on a good trajectory, for which now this current government likes to take credit. I think a lot of the efforts we made helped begin that momentum and start it moving forward.

At one of the events here in downtown Edmonton, over at the Edmonton Convention Centre, where we had a number of folks getting together to talk about growing companies, I had the chance to meet Connie Stacey, who is the founder and president of Growing Greener Innovations. Connie grew up in Newfoundland and in Alberta, so she was quite aware of energy production, usage, sort of saw it in the field. She herself was working, actually, in sports administration and then in software development, starting into the tech field, but she had an experience. She was out driving one day with her wife and their children, and their children had fallen asleep in the vehicle. They passed a construction site. As they passed that construction site, a generator kicked in, and it was very loud. She was a bit concerned. It sort of startled her, and she was concerned it was going to wake the kids.

She started thinking about that, being a woman who is a thinker, an innovator, sort of thinking about problems. She started to think about: "Well, this traditional diesel generator is noisy. It's smelly. It's not good for the environment. There must be a better way to approach this." So she put her mind to work. She started talking with people who work with generators, and she started to realize that one of the biggest problems with trying to replace that generator technology was developing a battery that was relatively easy to recharge on the fly.

In 2014 she founded Growing Greener Innovations. Her intent was, first of all, to create a better generator, one that would be silent, one that wouldn't create fumes, and one that wouldn't contribute to global warming. In 2015 she saw that the market for efficient, portable batteries was starting to expand. It was becoming an opportunity, and she saw in that a way to create a sustainable business that could also be of real benefit as we were all looking for new options in energy that are lower carbon.

She talks about that. She says: you know, one of the things people don't recognize is that studies show that access to energy is perfectly correlated to economic growth. Certainly, that is something that we have heard many members of this House talk about, the importance of access to energy as part of an economy, absolutely. She was looking for a way that she could develop that specifically because she also recognizes it as part of tackling energy poverty. Noting that more than a billion people world-wide have zero access to electricity, she wanted to find a way that it could be made portable and easily brought to them.

Through her company, Growing Greener Innovations, they have worked to develop portable battery technology, batteries that can be stacked on top of each other, can be mixed and matched to easily create power sources. Now, they've had some challenges, but they've done, actually, quite well with the company. At first they had trouble getting interest, but what happened eventually is that they won a contest with the U.S. Department of Defence, that was looking for folks to put forward innovative, sustainable new technologies, and they indeed won a U.S. defence innovation award. That began to open some doors for them, and they have developed what they call now their patented Grengine. It's a rechargeable and stackable battery generator.

That's expanded now into energy storage and a smart battery management system. They have a number of things now. Generally what they are offering right now are solutions for home based that work with solar panels, that allow people to create that energy through the solar panel and then store it for reuse. But they continue to expand. Indeed, they are part right now of a program with the Department of National Defence here in Canada, one of three Canadian innovators that are working with them to develop solutions to provide integrated energy, water, and waste management systems for relocatable, temporary camps used by the Canadian Armed Forces.

It's wonderful to see, I think, these kinds of entrepreneurs, you know, growing here in the province of Alberta, developing innovative technology in the realm of energy storage and production. I recognize that the intent of this bill is to grow that on an industrial scale. Now, again, GGI are working on a smaller scale, certainly working towards perhaps larger opportunities, potentially scalable technology. But we are talking here about working with larger industrial providers who are looking to do much the same thing.

We have the bill here, which is defining what energy storage is; that being, on a grid level any technology that allows energy to be captured when it's generated and to be utilized at a later point in time. The bill is laying out terms in terms of self-supply and export, requires the folks that are running the distribution facilities to prepare some long-term distribution system plans that would have to seek regulatory approval, and then we have the sections that are dealing with the dissolving of the Balancing Pool.

Certainly, I think, as my colleagues have noted, we are generally in support of the direction that this bill is looking to go. As has been shown by GGI and other folks who are working to innovate, the ability to store and then later distribute electricity is a major step towards being able to incorporate other forms of energy creation into our system, things like wind energy, solar energy, the ability to store those things for, as members of this House have been often wont to talk about when they are talking about renewable energy, the times when the sun does not shine and the wind does not blow.

It's an important part of that being a sustainable part of our grid. From what we're seeing here, certainly it appears that the framework that this legislation is looking to set up, the groundwork, laying the foundation it's putting down, is an appropriate one to incent more of this kind of work and to allow for sustainable growth of the levels of electricity that we need to have and potentially, then, reducing the greenhouse gases that are created along the way.

As my colleagues have also noted, this does seem to be largely the revisiting of a piece of legislation which had been brought forward in the last session, Bill 86, I believe. It does seem to be very, very similar here. One of the only real differences here, of course, is the addition of the sections on the dissolving of the Balancing Pool. You know, I suppose, as my colleagues also noted, better late than never, Mr. Speaker.

There have been a lot of concerns from Albertans, as my colleagues have noted, regarding the cost of electricity. Certainly, the government was a bit late to the game in recognizing the importance of that. There was nothing about it in the budget initially, and it did not seem that that had been a calculation or consideration that that was a concern of Albertans. But they did come around eventually to sort of try to come up with a plan, and we are seeing them move forward with their electricity rebate, which Albertans may see as late as, it appears, October, November, December, certainly not the most speedy and expeditious rebate, again sort of perhaps belying the johnny-come-lately nature of the government's response on this. That said, they are moving forward on that.

I do have to wonder if, to some extent, perhaps that was part of what spurred this legislation to be resurrected, as it were, that the government felt it needed to display that it was taking some sort of action to try to reduce electricity rates. It's entirely possible, Mr. Speaker, that indeed this legislation may in fact aid in that. I don't think it's going to provide much in the way of immediate relief. Some would say the same, perhaps, of the government's electricity rebate, which may not arrive till the end of the year. That will at least likely arrive before, necessarily, some of the benefits we'll see from this legislation, but, that said, certainly it is still beneficial to take these steps and to make these plans. It does strike me as prudent planning for the future. Certainly, as much as I may criticize the government, I will give them credit when I do see them doing something that seems to be the right thing to do, and it does appear that many pieces in this bill indeed are that.

We do recognize that previously there was not a definition for energy storage, because traditionally, really, energy storage has not really been a factor in electricity grids until today, but of course we know that that is shifting. As I noted, of course, Connie and the folks at GGI have been working on that aspect, and I think that indeed that is an area of some innovation and a lot of exploration in the tech field as we look for those sources where we can have more effective, long-lasting storage of electricity. Certainly, when we are able to arrive at that point – we're seeing, I think, some rapid evolution of that technology – that will be a significant game changer as we continue to look for greener sources of energy and be able to make that worth while, make that sustainable, make that affordable and accessible for more individuals.

[Mr. Amery in the chair]

It's my understanding that the lack of a definition previously prevented some of the effect of regulations, made it more difficult to move forward with energy storage projects. Indeed, again, I think that we're quite clear on why that's a valuable thing. I certainly recognize that that could help us move towards addressing some of the cost issues and other long-standing challenges in the electricity industry, so it seems reasonable to move forward with that here. The bill defines energy storage to recognize, I think, the unique role that energy storage can play in an electricity system. It supports more of those sorts of projects to go forward.

Now, the bill also allows for unlimited self-supply with export. That's defined under the Electric Utilities Act as "the production of electric energy on a property of which a person is the owner or a tenant where . . . the electric energy is consumed on that property by that . . . tenant." Basically, before what we had was a situation where self-suppliers had to get an exemption if they wanted to export. An example of that would be cogeneration facilities, certainly something that we have seen used often in the oil sands. This is making it easier for more folks to be able to partake in that, to be able to work to provide export when they have that self-supply without some of the regulation and other encumbrances. Again, it seems reasonable, Mr. Speaker, to allow for more opportunities for folks to be able to generate that, put it back in, export, sell it back into the grid.

Again, of course, we know that homeowners with solar panels have been doing this for a while. That was enabled in the system, and that's certainly been beneficial. Again, the kinds of technology that we see from GGI and others are certainly working toward that end, but this is giving more opportunities within the larger industrial setting, to my understanding, for a similar sort of situation to be able to work, so then facilities that were operating before January 1, 2022, can apply to continue to be classified as industrial systems, to continue under the rules that they currently have.

There are some bits here about requiring the distribution facility owners to prepare a long-term distribution plan, which will then have to seek regulatory approval. That's a model that's already in place, my understanding is, for transmission. It can help us in planning for some of the transition that will be involved to increase electrification. Certainly, there has been a lot of conversation about that recently, Mr. Speaker. I've been seeing a few articles recently where they're talking about the rise of electric vehicles, and certainly that presents for us a grand opportunity, I think, for the reduction of greenhouse gases from transportation. But that then does require a much more robust electricity system. We certainly know that we are going to be drawing much more on that. This helps towards the planning for that transition, increased electrification, in helping us figure out how we are going to manage those systems provide that energy that's needed.

In general, Mr. Speaker, again, while we certainly have had our concerns with some of the government's approaches on electricity and, in particular, how it's impacted consumers over the last few months – certainly, we'll continue to raise those concerns and, I think, speak about those issues as a large number of our constituents are reaching out to us on that. That aside, I think that in general what we are seeing with Bill 22 is prudent legislation and, I think, laying some good groundwork for some important steps that we need to take in the evolution of our electricity system here in the province of Alberta. I do appreciate that the minister has brought this forward and has taken these steps, and I look forward to the opportunity for further debate.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members who wish to debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Yeah. I mean, I was just being respectful and trying to leave time for some government members to join debate, thought perhaps the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity might want to weigh in. But I know he'll be listening with rapt attention to my remarks, just like many are right now as we – has the hockey game begun?

Ms Hoffman: Yeah.

Member Irwin: It has. Okay. The game has begun, so we've got to have at least two people watching right now.

You know, I listened intently to some of my colleague's remarks and, as always, was quite intrigued. Just as I shared earlier in a press conference, I am certainly no lawyer. I will preface my remarks by saying that I'm certainly no energy expert, to be clear. Yeah. Just because we've all, at least on this side of the House, been speaking to a lot of bills lately, it feels again like déjà vu as I stand and speak to Bill 22. Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022, is another piece of legislation where again there's – as my colleagues have said, I mean, we're mostly supportive of a lot of aspects of this bill, with some questions, of course.

But I ask – again, this government had such an opportunity to really bring forward legislation that could in the here and now have a tangible positive impact on the lives of Albertans. There's no clearer an example of Albertans struggling than when it comes to electricity costs and it comes to their skyrocketing bills. I've talked ad nauseam in this House, in fact, about the fact that we are hearing that. We're hearing that at the doors. We're seeing it in our e-mail inboxes and in our messages from constituents. They're struggling. It's not just folks in my riding of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood who are telling me this; it's others as well. You know, we've seen this government just continuing to ignore the problem of skyrocketing bills.

I can actually just think – I was just having a conversation with a few folks just a couple of hours ago, in fact, and chatting with someone from Public Interest Alberta. They do great work. Brad LaFortune is the executive director there. Just chatting about the fact that – and if you don't know what Public Interest Alberta does . . .

Ms Hoffman: It's kind of like Friends of Medicare.

Member Irwin: It is a bit like Friends of Medicare – that's right – which is another great organization, led by Chris Gallaway.

Friends of Medicare is a great organization, but Public Interest Alberta really focuses a lot on connecting with Albertans and hearing their concerns in the public interest. No surprise there. One of the things that we talked about is just the fact that this government – you know, what a time to take the opportunity to tangibly improve the lives of Albertans, and this government is choosing not to.

Brad LaFortune from Public Interest Alberta actually pointed out in one of his recent releases:

Despite Premier Kenney's audacious trumpeting that 2022 is a turnaround year for Alberta, many Albertans are struggling with the escalating affordability crisis.

"Cost of living and interest rates are exploding" . . . "Working people are having [such] a tough time . . . Wages are . . . not going as far as they used to. It's a struggle to afford necessities like food, gas, utilities, rent or mortgage, never mind being able to save for the future. It seems callous for Kenney to herald now as a great time for Alberta, when in reality, so many are [struggling]."

This is why – and I wanted to raise this because this is what we heard again in the Chamber earlier today, in question period, trumpeting how great Alberta is doing and how great Albertans are doing without an understanding of what's really going on on the ground. A lot of Albertans are struggling with affordability.

[The Speaker in the chair]

This is an opportunity for this government to take action, and instead they've dithered, right? You know, this associate minister has promised relief and promised support, and what do we see? We see inaction, right? According to that same minister Albertans will now have to wait for months to get any sort of action. They failed to get direct support out the door that could help Alberta families with skyrocketing utility bills. [interjection] Okay. In the interest of being amicable, I will let the associate minister speak.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the hon. member for the comments. It looked like she was wanting to embrace some interventions, so I thought I would participate. It's true. We recognize that there's a higher cost of energy, so we are providing short-term relief while we do the longer term work to bring prices down. The relief that we've provided, of course, is $2 billion worth of relief between the gas, the electricity, and the tax at the pump.

But the pieces that I wanted to focus on, because we need to do the long-term work – and the storage is the piece that I would encourage the member to look at because not only does energy storage help with the intermittency of renewable energy; it makes it more efficient, which helps bring down cost. It's also a nonwire solution, a less costly alternative to transmission, and that is a big advantage of storage. Lastly, the self-supply with export will help bring more supply online because we know the path forward for lower prices is through more choice, increased competition. Self-supply with export will allow companies to export to the grid.

Member Irwin: Thank you to the associate minister for that. Happy to have him intervene. I am getting there. I'm getting to some of the specific aspects of the bill.

But I have to ask. I have to ask the minister. This UCP government introduced similar legislation last fall but abandoned it and only reintroduced it six months later, so I would love to hear an apology if I just missed the explanation for that. Sometimes I do tune out. I know I shouldn't admit that on Hansard, but sometimes I miss things. Why the delay? If this is something that is so critical and so important – my colleagues have said it far more succinctly than I have, but, you know, why? If this is so critical, why the delay? Why delay making changes to the grid that would provide long-term relief for Albertans? It's an example again of not being able to trust this UCP government, because if this were so critical and if this were so necessary, why not make the changes then? That's one of the key questions we have. Again, I look forward to hearing more from the associate minister and perhaps other MLAs as well. Yeah. Why did he abandon the bill last session?

And I want to touch on a couple of points. Actually, my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre talked a little bit about Connie Stacey just as an example of someone really doing innovative work in the field. I've had the opportunity, too, to meet Connie Stacey from Growing Greener Innovations. You know, she has been a forerunner – is that the correct word? [interjection] Thank you – when it comes to clean energy technologies, and what an example, just one example of many folks around our province who are innovators and who are doing this leading work when it comes to green, clean technology.

You know, obviously, this bill, when we're talking about the grid, ties into solar as well, and I've been very fortunate to learn more about solar energy and, really, the relief that it can provide.

For those folks who don't know, anybody in this Chamber, anybody watching at home, I would love for you to come by my Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood constituency office, where we have solar panels on . . .

Ms Hoffman: Modules.

Member Irwin: That's right. Modules. Thank you. The Member for Edmonton-Glenora is far more versed on solar than I am, because I believe she has solar on her home.

Ms Hoffman: Yeah.

Member Irwin: Yeah. So I should say solar modules and not panels. That's right. I do know that distinction. But I'm so proud to have those. They were actually supplied by a local solar provider in my riding, Warren, who's part of green and gold solar. He's a great human with excellent dogs. Yeah. You know, I've had the opportunity to meet with him and some of his team members, and it's such an area for potential.

I hope that by discussing bills like this, we open the conversation for more investment in solar and in greener forms of energy. I don't think I've heard it much today, maybe a little bit from my colleagues, but we are facing a climate crisis, and we are facing temperatures at the poles higher than we've ever seen. It truly is a dire crisis, and we must – we must – be leaders. Folks in this Chamber should be pushing for economic diversification and for a move towards greener, cleaner energy sources.

My colleague – I believe it was from Edmonton-City Centre again; actually, it might have been Edmonton-Glenora – talked about coal-fired power as well. I know I've shared this. I believe I've shared this story in the past, maybe in 2019, just having lived in Forestburg, Alberta, gosh, 10 years ago now, 11 years ago now. Forestburg, if you don't know, does have a coal-fired power plant. You know, I can tell you that I actually talked directly to workers at that plant who – obviously, they know how critical that plant is to the vitality of their community, for sure, but were really asking for different opportunities and different ways to support that fantastic community that is Forestburg.

In fact, there was a fellow – I'm sure he won't mind me mentioning, because he's a great person. There was a fellow I dated, actually, back when I was, you know, dating men. His name was Robert, and he worked at the power plant. He actually would come home and he'd have, like, black in his ears. Like, he'd have just – and he would talk about just how, like: I'm worried about this. Like, he would express his concerns about the impact of working at the power plant. So I think of Robert many years later and those workers who were really asking for support, not wanting the power plant just to be shut down – absolutely not – but for a transition and for plans.

I was really proud of what members in this Chamber on our side of the House did to support a climate leadership plan when they were in office. It was incredible work. It was a bold plan, but there's more to do. There's a lot more to do, and sadly we're not seeing that same interest. You know, we've got climate change deniers in this Chamber, in fact, people who've gone on the record to question the science of climate change. Sorry. The science of climate change. That's a fact. The member for Vermilion-Lloydminster – I'm probably going to get his riding wrong. We've got him quoted in this Chamber a couple of times questioning the science of climate change.

You know, with all of that, like I said, I mean, we are supportive of a number of elements of Bill 22, but I would ask, I would urge this government to do more and to be bolder when it comes to looking at energy transformation in this province, because they really can. If this Premier and if this government and many of the government ministers are going to brag about swagger and Alberta booming – and we’ve talked about this in the Chamber before – it’s very difficult to accept such logic when you’re not looking at the bigger picture, right? People want to come to a province that has a healthy environment, where there’s a plan for the future. They want to come to a province where the Rocky Mountains aren’t under threat from coal mining, where our water sources aren’t under threat, and the list goes on.

I’m hopeful. You know, I’m hopeful that we’ll get a few more answers on some of the questions that we’ve asked. I could go into some of the specifics around the requirements in this bill, like requiring distribution facility owners to prepare a long-term distribution system which will receive regulatory approval, which I gather is the model that is in place for transmission currently. I know there’s a lot in here about the dissolution of the Balancing Pool, which is something I had to read a fair bit about just to understand. I don’t mind admitting when I’m not an expert on things.

Again, I know there are some differences as well between Bill 22 and the previous iteration, which was, I believe, Bill 86. Again, I’d like to perhaps just hear a bit more from the minister on what those differences are. Again, why the delay in moving forward with Bill 22 if it was such a priority of this government?

I would urge folks to, yeah, read more about energy storage, like I did, and with . . . [interjection] Oh, never mind. I will let the associate minister intervene, and then I can talk again.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the questions. Happy to share the – the big two differences are that on the self-supply with export there were a number of stakeholders that were doing self-supply with export at the time, and they’d made investments based on a current economic climate. They’d indicated to us that to change that climate could potentially disadvantage them and their investors. So we agreed with that, and we made some concessions to allow them to have a path towards ISD, which is industrial system designation. It doesn’t preclude anyone else from applying for ISD. It just gave them a clearer path to have that done. The second piece is that we added the Balancing Pool. That was the wind-down strategy. We’ve been working on the wind-down strategy for a while. The bottleneck, of course, on that was that there are some liabilities and some lawsuits that we had to take care of. But, essentially, those are the two differences.

Member Irwin: Thanks to the associate minister for that clarity.

You know, I will end my remarks shortly, but I just want to again reiterate the point that they’ve introduced this bill six months later, and as a result we’ve lost almost six months in taking steps to modernize our grid and to add energy storage that could of course reduce costs in the long term.

We do of course support adding more energy storage to the grid – that’s indisputable – on this side of the House, and we’ve been consulting. I’m proud of the work that my colleagues have been doing, including our critic for Energy, on adding more storage and ways that we can achieve a net-zero grid by 2035 while creating 60,000 more jobs through Alberta’s future project. Check it out at albertasfuture.ca.

With that, I would like to adjourn debate, Mr. Speaker.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 21

Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

[Debate adjourned May 3: Mr. Feehan speaking]

The Speaker: Hon. members, on second reading of Bill 21, are there other members wishing to join in the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thanks. I think you’ve always called me that, Mr. Speaker, even with the new change. Really appreciate it. Thank you so much. I have to say, as we kick off Bill 21, which is titled Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, that I am going to take us on a little trip down memory lane to a week ago – a week ago; maybe it was a week and a half, not long, anyway – when the sponsoring minister, the associate minister responsible for red tape and Member for Calgary-Peigan, at a media briefing very definitively stated that part of the bill’s intention was to ensure that the money that parents and others might be paying towards private schools need not be publicly reported because it wasn’t public money. And it wasn’t just stated. It was also addressed in subsequent follow-up questions from the media, from reporters, from community members.

Of course, many of the questions were around the fact that in Alberta private schools are entitled to 70 per cent of the funding for operational costs that public schools are. They are receiving a significant amount of private funding from the government of Alberta, from the people of Alberta, who are contributing, and therefore the people of Alberta should have every right to know what additional funds these private schools are charging and how much is in their balance sheet: how much are we continuing to contribute to private schools?

Now, I want to clarify, because there often will be accusations from members within the government caucus that we think that private schools are the bane of all evil, they will assert, and that we are out to get them. I want to be very clear, Mr. Speaker, that I stand by the decisions we made while we were in government for four years, the first time in my adult memory we had four years of education stability in this province, four years of consistent funding in this province.

Prior to that, I’d served on the Edmonton public school board for five years. We never once had a year where we could anticipate what next year’s budget would be with any certainty. Prior to that, I did my master’s in education and my undergrad, and before that, my parents also taught. So for most of my life I spent the spring sort of bracing ourselves for what might be coming with the upcoming budget. The spring presentation of the budget regularly would see significant reductions to education funding, and then there would be protests, often just a few metres from here, 100 metres or so from here, on the steps of the Legislature.

Eventually the government would typically rescind the cuts and restore some of the funding that they had cut. At the very beginning it would happen very quickly. Like, within two weeks there’d be an amendment to the budget. We’d get on with it. Everyone would realize: “Oh, yeah. Parents do actually really care about education. We’d better not mess with it. We should restore educational funding.” Then it would happen a little bit later. Maybe it wouldn’t happen in March or April, when the budget was presented, but it would happen before the end of the school year. And then later on, under the time of Premier Stelmach, I believe, it would happen later and later but still before kids would go back to school. This was the game that Conservatives were playing with Alberta families around continually attacking education funding and making people protest to be able to defend their child's right to a quality education in the province of Alberta.

Then we had the reprieve of the four years under the NDP government, where we committed to stable and adequate funding that funded for enrolment growth and that would provide that continuity for Alberta educators and Alberta families so that they wouldn't have to spend all of their time fighting the government for the educational rights that their child should so be inclined to receive without question.

But that doesn't stop the current government, the government that has actually cut educational funding. They have cut funding for students with disabilities. They have cut funding for years 4 and 5 of high school, again, often disabled students who access those additional final two years of high school. The current government has cut that, and then also, at a time when educational needs and often educational enrolment have gone up, the government has refused to actually fund for any of that increase. The minister will take credit for the fact that the federal government did discharge some funds during COVID to address additional pandemic pressures, but the thing that the minister fails to highlight is the fact that that essentially replaced some of the money, most of the money that was cut under the provincial budget that year.

The minister responsible for red tape presents this bill in April. The bill comes forward, and at the tech briefing, at all the media events it was made very clear that one of the intended pieces in this bill as it relates to education was to reduce the amount of burdensome public reporting with regard to tuition and balance sheets for private schools, because that should be private information. Only the parents need to know, and they would report to the parents. Of course, they would. They would invoice the parents. They would invoice the employer of the parents, whoever it is that happens to be paying the tuition.

I want to say that there is a broad range in what private schools charge in tuition. There are some private schools that charge nothing, that cater to students who are incredibly vulnerable, whether that's physical or developmental disabilities or youth who are houseless. There are private schools that definitely focus on addressing vulnerable students. Then there are other types of private schools that charge upwards, some even in excess of $20,000 a year to send your child to said independent private school. There's a big range, Mr. Speaker. For the government to set one formula and say "70 per cent" and to no longer, through the intent of the mover of the bill, require public, transparent reporting on how much is being charged in tuition and how much is on the balance sheet set a lot of Albertans off. They were deeply concerned, especially when they are seeing the impacts of educational funding cuts in their own children's schools. For example – we're in Edmonton – Edmonton public: 1,700 kids going to school next year without a dime to fund them.

And we will hear the government say: well, but we're providing stability; give us a pat on the back. Stability when your demand is growing, when your needs are growing is less for everyone else. You are taking away from everyone to give the scraps that are left for the new kids who are showing up at school. No matter how much time you want to spend focused on one line item and trying to justify decisions that result in less for more, Alberta families know and will live through the reality; that is, seeing the impacts of more students in the classroom without adequate support to fund them.

At the same time, the sponsoring minister for this bill says: Albertans don't have a right to know how much private schools are charging in tuition or how much they have in their balance sheets.

Of course, Albertans appropriately pushed back, just like they did on the steps of the Legislature through most of my life during the budget cycle as it related to education. What happened here is that we saw not the sponsor of the bill, a different minister, the Minister of Education, go to the Internet many hours later, after the technical briefing where this information was shared, after the stories had been filed where this information was published, after Albertans rightfully were incredibly upset with the double standard that was being set and the lack of transparency that was being pushed through the intention of this bill – they rightfully pushed back.

The minister or the minister's team took to the Internet to do damage control the same night, many hours later, probably six or eight hours after the briefing and all of the stories had been filed, to do damage control and to say: no, no, no; that isn't what's happening, and that wasn't going to be allowed. Well, the mover of the bill, the bill's sponsor – the name is on the title of the bill – clearly said that that was the intent. Many of us scoured Bill 21. We read through that section forwards, backwards, sideways, upside down, talked to every lawyer we knew, and the truth is that the bill is really fuzzy. The bill is as opaque as one could imagine a bill could be in those sections. So we have to ask questions of the intent, and the intent has been very clearly stated as having less transparency, less overt filings, less oversight. And then a different minister says: no, no, no; that's not going to happen. Well, bills shouldn't be that wishy-washy, fuzzy, confusing.

I have stated already publicly, and I will call on the government again. I think that the opportunity – it would be wise to seize the opportunity to actually amend these sections as they relate to education and the transparency of private school tuition and balance sheets in this legislation. I think Albertans deserve that at a minimum because, clearly, two people sitting at the same cabinet table have different understandings of what this bill does, or maybe they had the same understanding, saw what the public push-back was, realized that the bill was written in a way that was vague enough that they could maybe just brush that aside. I would say: no, no, no; do not attempt to brush this aside. I think Albertans have rightfully said – and even the minister of a different ministry, the Minister of Education, has said: no, we're not going to do that.

I sincerely hope and I'm confident – we make jokes about not a ton of people potentially watching this debate. I am confident that there are people in the department of red tape reduction and in the Department of Education right now watching this debate. I'm confident that there are political staff listening to this debate, trying to work through what some of the key points are. So my question to you, public servants and political staff and the ministers responsible, is: don't you want to make sure that the bill is most clear and most transparent and most consistent so Albertans know and can interpret the law fairly and consistently? I do sincerely hope that the mover of the bill was wrong in presentation of what the actual intent of this section was, but the best way to actually have that trust is to verify it through an amendment to this section. So I sincerely hope that the drafters, that the political staff, that the ministers are all doing their best work to put forward clarifying language to actually deliver the intent of the Minister of Education.

Well, I'm missing out on a good joke right here. I can feel it. Perhaps I'll hear it from the next speaker.

I look forward to an opportunity to have greater clarity through an amendment. Certainly, we can do our best to draft amendments that relate to this section to try to meet what the Education minister says the actual intent of this section is, but it certainly, I think, would be beneficial to all members if we had the expertise of the people who drafted the original bill to put forward an amendment in this section. But, you know, if the government fails to do that, to fix the errors and the drafting that resulted in such significant pushback from the public, certainly we are ready and willing and will work with Parliamentary Counsel to do our best to ensure that the door that was opened by the sponsoring minister gets closed.

We already have seen this government recognized by media outlets across the country as being the most secretive government in Canada. We have heard about significant concerns with entities, agencies, boards, and commissions that the government has set up intentionally being outside of information and privacy sharing legislation, and that only raises the ire of concern among the general public.

I will say to all of the parents who are out there thinking: “Why is my child losing out on educational opportunities? Why is my child losing an educational assistant? Why are my bus fees going up? Why are my educational property taxes going up?” Not just to parents; that’s all of us. Educational property taxes under the UCP: going up. Why are we all being asked to pay more? Where is that money going? We absolutely, at a minimum, deserve to know where it’s going, deserve to know places we are putting our money, how much money they are charging in other areas, and how much they currently have on their balance sheet. That is just prudent, open, transparent governance.

We certainly see this in other areas of government, too. This is as it relates to Education, but there are other areas where private and nonprofit service delivery are done and government is also funding operators. I’m thinking right now, of course, about long-term care and assisted living in this province. I know that the people of Alberta would like to see greater accountability and transparency when it comes to the services that are provided, that are publicly paid for but aren’t delivered publicly. Making sure that we have as much transparency as possible is crucial.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thought perhaps we might hear from some government members, particularly members of cabinet who could shed some light on the important questions that my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Glenora raised about the misunderstanding, the miscommunication. Perhaps cabinet members haven’t all read their own bill, but there is a lot of confusion right now around the changes that Bill 21, this Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, makes to the Education Act around the transparency of private school funding and tuition payments. It doesn’t seem like it should be that difficult to get a straightforward answer about what’s happening, but for some reason Albertans are not getting that from this government.

I will come back to those changes to the Education Act that are made through this bill if I get the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, but I’d like to focus on what appears to be just a small administrative change but raises some bigger questions for myself that are within Bill 21, and those are specifically the changes that are made to the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act. According to Bill 21 this change that’s proposed in the bill would remove the one-year maximum on all licences, new and renewals, for residential facilities in the child intervention system – so that includes group homes and foster homes – and it would move those limits to the regulation. Specifically, what it does is that it amends section 105.3 of the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, which deals with both initial licences and renewals of licences for these residential facilities.

Specifically, it changes subsection (3) of 105.3. The current wording in the act says:

- (3) Unless otherwise specified in the licence, the term of a residential facility licence is one year from the date of its issue.

And the changes being made under Bill 21 will now say:

- (3) Unless otherwise specified in the licence, the term of a residential facility licence is the term specified in the regulations.

That sounds minor, but I just want to point out that again there is a miscommunication between what is in this bill and what was being communicated by the government about the change that’s being made.

Specifically, according to the news release related to Bill 21, this change to this residential facility licensing term only applies to renewals. But, Mr. Speaker, if you look back at what I just read out, that subsection of 105.3 is not limited to renewals. It actually specifically addresses initial terms of licences for residential facilities, a minor thing perhaps, but once again what’s being communicated about what’s in this bill to Albertans through their communication networks is different than what’s in the bill. So I’d like some clarification from the associate minister for red tape as to: which is it? Is this change limited to simply renewals, or does it also apply to the initial term?

Now, that’s perhaps a minor quibble, Mr. Speaker. You know, it should be able to be cleared up. But I want to just outline what this change does, right? What it does is that it basically says that a residential facility no longer is subject to a one-year licence, which would have to be renewed every year. And, of course, part of renewing a residential facility licence means going through all the health and safety requirements, making sure that all the standards are met in terms of accreditation of the program so that it actually meets the standards that are necessary. All of those pieces, that are important, wouldn’t have to happen every year. It could happen – who knows how long the term is? We put it in regulation, and the government will get to decide, through regulation, how often to renew those terms.

Now, a residential facility – when we’re talking about children in care and child intervention, I think we need to really understand what we’re talking about here. I’ve had the opportunity recently to tour a number of residential facilities, particularly in Calgary, to get an idea – because I think all Albertans should get a picture of what residential facilities look like for children in care. When they’re in a residential facility – and it’s not just group care homes, but let’s specifically talk about group care homes – we’re talking about children who the government has not successfully placed in either a foster home or a kinship home because of either a lack of a suitable home or the particular challenges that a child in the intervention system has: behavioural challenges, you know, mental health challenges, addictions challenges. These are kids who are quite possibly the most vulnerable.

Residential facilities: the staff there do incredibly important work, and they are caring for children who are the responsibility of the government but cannot be placed in a home setting, a home-based setting, for all of the reasons I discussed, Mr. Speaker. I don’t know that licensing them, those facilities, those group homes, should be referred to as red tape. I have a problem with that, just as I have a problem with looking at health and safety standards and quality standards in early learning and child care programs as red tape. But I know that that’s how the government views those things that are in place to keep children safe, to keep children healthy, and that’s the bare minimum. There are also things about the quality of the programming and the care and the treatment that they’re receiving. I have a real concern about dismissing that as simply red tape.

So I would like to see the rationale as to why we should be moving to longer terms for licences. I would like to hear about that. I appreciate that residential facilities are doing important work, and perhaps constantly renewing their licence might be administrative work that's not, you know, the best use of their time. If that's the case, I want to know what assurances Albertans have, these care providers have, these children in care have that they are still going to receive the utmost level of support and safety and care and that Albertans can hold this government accountable for that. I don't think that's too much to ask when we're talking about children in the child intervention system, but we have a hard time in this province trusting this government on a number of issues but particularly on the care for children that are their responsibility, children in the child intervention system.

I have a larger concern, Mr. Speaker, around this provision in Bill 21. It is that we have a crisis going on in this child intervention system in Alberta. I have spoken at length in this House about the numbers of children and youth, either in care or transitioning out of care, who have died in this province in the last year. Record numbers, Mr. Speaker – record numbers – numbers that nobody could have predicted in the years coming before that. Record numbers of young people aging out of care. To put forward at that time – the only change, the only proposed amendment and reconsideration of the primary legislation that governs our child intervention system, which is the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, the only change this government has put forward has been as red tape reduction. In fact, I think this is the second time that the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act is being amended through either red tape reduction bills or miscellaneous statutes amendment acts.

I'll say that again, Mr. Speaker. We have a crisis going on in child intervention, and the governing legislation that deals with that has only been dealt with by this government as red tape. Let me tell you. In the conversations that I've had as to what should be done with the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act – well, first of all, I'll go back and say that the Ministerial Panel on Child Intervention, that was convened by our government in 2018, conducted extensive consultations with stakeholders, with experts, with Indigenous communities, with care providers, with former children in care. That work produced a number of recommendations. One of those recommendations – actually, two of them – dealt with amendments. Sorry. Three of them, actually, dealt with amendments to the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act.

One was immediate changes related to the role of the office of the Child and Youth Advocate. Those changes were brought in by the NDP government, the former government.

The second was to actually review the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act to make changes related to the role of the band designate. The band designate, Mr. Speaker, is the person who is designated by a band to represent the band on decisions related to children that are First Nations children, to make decisions about their apprehension, about their care, about their placement, about their development. They are a key person, and consultation with that band designate is critical to make sure that we don't repeat the tragedies of the '60s scoop and through residential schools of making decisions about Indigenous children without the involvement and the say-so and the decision-making of Indigenous communities. We committed under that Ministerial Panel on Child Intervention that the role of the band designate needed to be reviewed and updated. That was supposed to be a short-term action that was supposed to be completed, which this government has not done.

And, more importantly, one of the other recommendations from that panel that came forward, one action was to actually do a complete review of the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, to put it before a committee of the Legislature for a complete review, to look at all of the pieces and to consult with stakeholders and to talk about making the changes that were needed. That was four years ago, Mr. Speaker. I've sat on committees for the last three years and not once has that been brought forward to a committee, to review the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act. And this is at a time when the child intervention system in Alberta is in a crisis like never before.

It is insulting, Mr. Speaker, I have to say, that the only time that I get to speak to legislative amendments to the governing framework for our child intervention system is as red tape reduction. It, frankly, frustrates me beyond belief. Let me tell you about some of the things that should be considered – and this is not an exhaustive list, because we should be doing a full committee review of this legislation to hear from stakeholders, to actually come up with a new legislative framework that will actually address some of the issues that will keep Indigenous children connected to their communities and their traditions. But some of the things, off the top, that we should be considering, Mr. Speaker: the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act should be reviewed to align with Bill C-92, which is the federal legislation around ensuring that First Nations and Indigenous communities have the authority to make decisions and govern their own child and family services.

One of the pieces that sticks out at me very much – and I've spoken to experts and legal experts in this field who have talked to me about this – is that one of the things that Bill C-92 has that our legislation clearly needs in Alberta is that section 15 of Bill C-92 says that a child, especially as it relates to an Indigenous child, cannot be “apprehended solely on the basis of his or her socio-economic conditions, including poverty, lack of adequate housing or infrastructure or the state of health of his or her parent or the care provider.” Why is that important, Mr. Speaker? Because too many children are apprehended because their families are poor, because the government has failed to support them by – it's all levels of government that have failed to provide them with adequate housing, food security, addictions and mental health supports, and they should not have their children taken away from them solely because of poverty.

We should be amending our provincial legislation to contain just that kind of a provision, Mr. Speaker. I can tell you what, when I talk to experts in this field, what they say is: if we were to not apprehend families on the basis of poverty, if we were actually to provide families with the things they need to get out of poverty, we would not see the level of child apprehension that we see now. That is really – it's neglect. When you look at the number of reasons, the reasons why most children in care are actually apprehended and why reports of a requirement for intervention are made, it's because of the neglect. And neglect is often because of lack of housing. It's because of lack of food security.

I would like to see the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act revised given that we've now had three years of seeing how the revised role of the office of the Child and Youth Advocate has been working, and we should amend it to address the recommendations that have come from the advocate repeatedly, particularly over the last year, that there is not enough accountability from government ministries for how they respond to recommendations made from the advocate. This would be a good time to review this legislation and to consider whether or not that needs to be enshrined in this act, that there is accountability from all ministries who deal with recommendations from the office of the Child and Youth Advocate to report publicly on their work. That's something that I think should be included in a review of the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act.

We should also be looking at the process for appeals and transparency when a report is made and a decision is made by Children's Services about whether or not to conduct an intake or move that intake on to assessment. Intake is the initial report of a child being in need of intervention, and somebody makes a decision about whether or not the circumstances described are sufficient enough to warrant an assessment about whether or not perhaps that child is in need of intervention. Those decisions are made with very little transparency and accountability.

I hear all the time about families and young people saying, "I don't know why they didn't follow up on this intake; I don't know why I didn't go to assessment" or "I don't know why they did, and I can't get any information." That's something that the act should be reviewed in light of, Mr. Speaker.

I only have a few seconds left. If my frustration isn't clear, I'll state it again. There's really important work to be done in the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act. What we see today, what we see repeatedly from this government is treating those amendments, minor amendments, as red tape reduction. It's an insult. It's because they're afraid to do the work, and they're afraid to do their job, which is to protect the children in their care.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to speak to the bill? The Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. A pleasure to be in this Chamber this evening to speak about a significant piece of legislation. Of course, it's another major omnibus bill that the government has brought in under the guise of red tape reduction. Of course, they attempt to do a lot of other things that may not be readily apparent, and it's up to us, of course, as the opposition to bring those to light and ensure that the public is aware of the minutiae that may be hidden within the bill and some of the changes that might not be readily apparent.

As we continue with debate on Bill 21, I'm sure that there will be issues that arise that right now even may not be jumping right out at members of the opposition, but as we dig into it, we see things that at least beg questions. My intention here this evening is to raise some of the questions that have occurred to me upon initial investigation and reading of the bill, and I'd like to start that off by considering some of the changes that are being prompted by the bill to the Railway (Alberta) Act, section 13.

I'd really like to hear a little bit more background from the minister on how these changes came to be and if there really was an urgency around them. Now, when I've spoken to short-line railway operators recently, it wasn't what they were asking about. These weren't changes that I heard come up in conversation. Perhaps the minister could explain a little bit more. There may be a difference between what the act is calling heritage railways versus the short-line operators, which are actually carrying freight, in particular grain, Mr. Speaker, on a regular basis from rural areas and avoiding having to truck a lot of grain. The changes in this section of the act would allow heritage railways to operate under the same set of rules as industrial railways.

In the conversations I've had, Mr. Speaker, with the operators of short-line railways, which are used to collect grain and minimize truckload after truckload of grain going from farmers' fields to long distances, there are useful conveyance mechanisms now that are surviving kind of on a shoestring. I think that they're worthy of maintenance and consideration. One of the things that the operator that I spoke to was talking about requiring was perhaps some consideration not to be forced or allowed to operate under the, quote, same set of rules as the industrial railways but to perhaps be allowed to vary somewhat from those rules. In question in particular were level crossings which were uncontrolled. In some cases the short-line operators were being forced to follow the industrial carriers' rules and put in a regulated crossing, which would mean lights and automated crossing arms at some very remote locations, which really didn't seem to warrant it because of the traffic or the sightlines. This is the type of thing that the short-line railway operators were looking for, perhaps for some variance or relaxation of the industrial carriers' rules, not to be operating under the same set of rules but to actually be allowed to have variances granted to them from those rules.

I know that the definitions and so forth of heritage and short-line commercial railways may differ somewhat. I know that those short-line grain carrying railways: the people that I've talked to are looking for ways to stay afloat, to survive, and to ensure that they can serve the agricultural community with their short-line railways, which take a lot of transport trucks off of our highways when hauling grain off the farm directly into the railway system and export markets to the west coast primarily.

I'm wondering if the minister would be able to clarify exactly who has been calling for measures that would allow them to operate under the same set of rules as industrial railways when some of them that I've been talking to are saying that they want to be granted variances from those rules. I'm not certain why a heritage railway would have to submit a request for approval to the railway administrator to be able to operate under these new rules. In fact, they're seeming to want to avoid that. Obviously, I've got questions, and I seek clarification. I don't know who was actually advocating for this on behalf of the railway operators, the heritage railway operators. Practically speaking, what would the implications of these changes be if indeed the heritage operators were, quote, unquote, allowed to operate under the rules of the industrial railway? So a number of questions regarding the important operation of short-line railways, which haul freight, namely grain.

There is perhaps opportunity in the future, Mr. Speaker, to expand the number of the short-line railways that do exist, because there are other pieces of track in the province which are sitting fallow and perhaps could be operationalized if indeed the economic feasibility of the short-line railways was more positive and had a better outlook. Yet the people that I've spoken to are looking at gaining access to relaxation of some of the rules, keeping in mind provisions of safety at all times but also realizing that there are significant costs to a short-line railway to install such things as flashing lights and crossing arms that they simply don't have the capacity to absorb whereas a mainline railway operator, of course, has the revenue streams and so forth. It's kind of unrealistic to think that on a very remote level crossing a short-line rail operator might have to suffer that type of regulatory expense when it may not be justifiable from a safety standpoint. So that's one of the things that I wanted to bring up when I was initially reviewing the legislation because it directly affects my critic role as the critic for Transportation.

I think we'd all be disappointed to think that any regulatory changes we made in the name of red tape would mean the death knell for one of these. I think there are only three of the actual short-line railway operators hauling grain in the province right now, so it's a struggling industry that we should be nurturing and not impeding, and that's something that I'm concerned about for rural Alberta and future rail developments in the province. Rail is a big a topic of discussion in Alberta right now on many fronts, and this one is, I think, maybe of lesser known public significance but nonetheless worthy of making sure that we don't do damage when we're looking at doing red tape reduction, doing damage to something that would otherwise perhaps be economically viable except for the changes that are contemplated under the bill to the heritage railways.

Another thing, Mr. Speaker, changing gears a little bit in the act: the Animal Health Act in section 1. It continually shows that the UCP are moving important pieces of legislation away into regulation to avoid accountability. This is a theme that we've seen repeatedly under the Red Tape Reduction Act versions that have come before the House, where the government is using the smokescreen of red tape reduction to accomplish things they otherwise might do in such an upfront way. I don't know if the UCP government is taking the required steps and shouldering the correct level of responsibility, as I mentioned in question period today in questions I directed towards the minister of agriculture and forestry regarding the avian flu and the spread of avian flu throughout our poultry producers' flocks.

Granted, I agree that is a very difficult flu to maintain. It's a disease that's being spread by wild species of birds, from small songbirds to larger migratory birds as well, notwithstanding the high level of the antibacterial and antiviral protections that one finds on poultry farms. I've visited them. I've had to dress in the PPE and the full mask and booties and suits to make sure we don't bring in outside infections into the poultry-raising areas. So I agree that there already are significantly high measures in place to prevent infections in our poultry flocks, but obviously, as I mentioned in question period today, Mr. Speaker, those protections have been breached. In fact, I believe the number is 58 farms are now infected with the avian flu, and over 600,000 – I think the number that the minister quoted today was 800,000 and counting – birds have been euthanized as a result.

I don't know if indeed the minister has done well enough to tell farmers what support precisely and what stability the farmers and producers can be expected to receive as a result of the spread of the avian flu. More to the point, as I said, notwithstanding the difficulty there doesn't seem to be any effort or intent on the part of the minister of agriculture and forestry to focus on prevention. You know, the minister has talked at length about how many efforts were being made to provide supports to farmers to help them euthanize their flocks when, in fact, I'm sure I'm correct in saying that every poultry producer in the province would much rather be securing efforts to keep their flocks alive; in other words, to find ways to prevent this flu even though it is an insidious avian flu, something that returns on a routine basis over time.

There are new technological advances all the time. There are ways indeed in which we need to address this avian flu.

It's a huge cost and undertaking for producers to have to exterminate their whole flock and then repopulate once again and then perhaps go through the same cost again and completely sanitize all of their barns. It's a monstrous and very, very difficult, stressful operation to have to go through for any producer of livestock, and poultry is no exception, Mr. Speaker.

I would really like to hear from the minister in terms of taking measures in the act to support notification of disease within 24 hours. He's looking, in this act, to have that designation or notification requirement moved from legislation just to regulation. Indeed, it's weakening the very type of rules and regulations at a time when we need them to be stiff and strict. You will not go onto a poultry farm, Mr. Speaker, without being held directly responsible by the owner, the producer, to suit up properly and be extremely careful. It's not only his or her livelihood that they're protecting when they ensure that any visitors to that farm or any workers or any suppliers who visit or get even close to the barns will have to suit up. It's not only them that they're protecting, their livelihood, but it's the livelihood of every other poultry producer in the province.

That responsibility lies with the minister ultimately, and I'm not convinced, indeed, that the minister has the concept of prevention at heart. I think he's just conceded that the avian flu is something that's here and is not a preventable type of infection and that the only thing you can do is support the culling of flocks that are infected. I disagree with that wholeheartedly, Mr. Speaker. If I was a poultry producer, I'd be wanting the minister to tell me what, indeed, measures the government of Alberta is taking to provide extra layers of protection given new technology that might be involved and available. Is there a way of ensuring that there's a vaccine, perhaps, that could be used? Are there other methods of protecting against the farmyard or the building actually having birds come to it? Is there a netting capacity to make sure we have that physical layer of protection from migratory birds and other birds that might infect a flock?

So lots of questions, and those are only two points, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has risen.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 21, another in the continuing series of the government's red tape reduction statutes acts. There are a number, as has been the case before in such omnibus legislation, of changes that are being made, but I'd like to speak in particular about some changes being made in sections 11 and 12 regarding the Provincial Parks Act and the Public Lands Act.

We have seen, Mr. Speaker, a repeated pattern with this government. They are very fond of awarding their ministers new powers. Now, when you're appointed to cabinet, I mean, that is an incredible privilege, and that comes with a considerable amount of power: the ability to make changes, decisions, bring forward legislation that has profound impacts on the people of Alberta. But this government in many respects has not been satisfied with the power that's been available to them. They have repeatedly chosen to make changes to give themselves more.

I think back to Bill 21, when it was brought forward in the fall of 2019, where this government decided that their Minister of Health needed to have the power to unilaterally tear up the province's agreement with doctors. Now, of course, the government's argument at that time was that they were just clarifying a power that was already there. However, a lot of other folks really disagreed with that. But that was a power they felt the minister needed to have, and indeed he exercised that at the end of February 2020. Well, we all know the saga that has rolled out since. It was later that year, in 2020, I think around May, that we had the government come forward with Bill 10. Actually, it was probably a little earlier given that it was Bill 10, probably April, May 2020.

Bill 10 hit the floor of the Legislature, in which the government decided that in the midst of a public health emergency they, all cabinet ministers, should have the ability not to simply amend current legislation or expand on current legislation but create entirely new legislation without ever setting foot in the Alberta Legislature during a public health emergency. It was an amendment to the Public Health Act. Now, that, Mr. Speaker, is a sweeping addition of power.

Now, of course, at the time we brought forward a number of amendments. We noted some concerns. Those were all brushed aside by the government. We were patted on the head and told that everything was just fine. But we very quickly saw some very strong push-back from the public, to the point where this government eventually had to strike an entire committee to provide cover for them to walk back their egregious mistake, so a massive use of taxpayer resources, hours of time, to do a full review of the Public Health Act and make many of the changes that had been brought forward as amendments during the initial debate in 2020.

However, it seems this government has not learned from its previous experiences, because here again, in this red tape reduction bill, Bill 21, we have them awarding new, sweeping powers to the Minister of Environment and Parks. Now, in this case, Mr. Speaker, it is particularly egregious because this is a minister and these are some particular areas where this government has completely lost trust with Albertans.

When it comes to the subject of public parks, Mr. Speaker, you can still go to many neighbourhoods in Edmonton and Calgary and find signs that say: protect our parks. That is the legacy of this government and that particular minister, of having attempted to sell off parks in the province of Alberta, as much as he denied it, but that legacy remains.

Of course, he is also the minister of environment, and we have seen what this government has done in terms of the environment on its coal policy. He was the one who, through a change in regulation on a long weekend in May 2020, changed regulations to override the 1976 coal policy, and we all know what the legacy of that has been, Mr. Speaker, despite the fact that this government attempted to at first deny that that was what they had done. Secondly, they created an entire website to try to help their MLAs convince their constituents that they were, in fact, wrong on this issue and that it was a wonderful idea to allow coal mining in the eastern slopes of the Rockies.

After much public push-back – again, we had to mount an entire panel. We had to do an entire consultation process. The government dragged its feet on finally putting it out before finally, to some extent, walking things back but still leaving a fair amount of latitude in the hands of their ministers on an issue on which Albertans have been one hundred per cent, abundantly clear: they do not want coal mining in the eastern Rockies.

What we have here now in this bill: where previously the government had the ability to set out standards, directives, practices, guidelines, objectives, or other rules in existing regulations, the minister may now set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines, or rules relating to any matter in respect of a regulation that could be made under the act. So no longer is the minister only able to tweak; he is able to just create entirely new possibilities. Again, this government is giving a sweeping, almost unfettered power to a minister who has already demonstrated that he has no trust with Albertans. This, Mr. Speaker, is considered to be, by this government, red tape. Democracy is apparently an inconvenience for this government.

Now, when this was raised with the minister, he told the folks at CBC that the reason for making this change in the bill was simply to make it easier for regional park and land managers to make seasonal trail closures or change signage without having to go through a senior ministry official. The minister said:

I would not want to see our officials have to go all the way to Edmonton to get permission to put up a sign to be able to protect that habitat . . . this speeds up their process to do simple decisions like that in the field. It does not change the Parks Act at all.

That, Mr. Speaker, I think, is what is known as an understatement.

Indeed, if the minister's intent was simply to make it easier for a parks and wildlife manager, a parkland manager to simply make small adjustments to a seasonal trail closure, change a sign, this is attempting to kill a fly with a sledgehammer. It would have been easy, I imagine, to make a much smaller, much more targeted, much more focused amendment that would accomplish that purpose, but that is not what this government is attempting to do in this legislation. They want to give this minister broad, sweeping powers to set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines, objectives, or rules regarding any matter in the act. Carte blanche, a blank cheque, Mr. Speaker. We have heard no justification from these members, from this government other than the rather specious reasoning put forward by the minister.

It's not just us that's raising this concern, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, some of the good folks that have been on the front lines standing against this minister's attempts to undermine our parks systems, to endanger our environment and our water in the province of Alberta have also stepped up to speak on this. Chris Smith, a conservation analyst with CPAWS, Northern Alberta, says:

If the government's main goal with this was to, say, provide local park management with the authority to change signs for trail usage, then this is a very broad way to achieve that goal. It raises some questions to us as to why it needs to be so broad to accomplish that goal.

Ms Hoffman: Keep talking, David. We're up 2-nothing. Keep going.

Mr. Shepherd: Apparently, the Oilers are now up 2-nothing, so there we go. It appears that my lambasting of the government is good luck. Mr. Speaker, I guess I get about another five minutes to continue. We'll see if we can do any favours for the Oilers in that time remaining.

There are concerns that were brought forward by CPAWS, Mr. Speaker, that this indeed now could lead to, in fact, a patchwork of inconsistent rules across parks, that the minister could use this new, sweeping power, which this government apparently wants to award him, to create confusion for people who want to use public lands. Indeed, we have already seen that this minister seems to have some favourites in terms of who he favours in terms of the use of public lands. We recall that this is the minister, of course, that imposed park fees on the Kananaskis but failed to do so for the folks at a spot a little further away where they use off-road vehicles. He said that he would, but to date, to the best of my knowledge, he has not actually imposed those fees on off-highway vehicles.

This minister now could have the sweeping power to apply similarly unbalanced policies across parks, across public lands. He would never have to set foot in the Legislature to do it. He could do it with the stroke of a pen. I don't think that's going to help win back the trust that this government has so badly lost with Albertans when it comes to issues of parks and the environment, the use of public lands. There are very real questions why this government wants to secret this new power for the minister away in the backrooms of a bill on red tape reduction.

There are reasons why we have checks and balances in the system, Mr. Speaker: to help ensure that the public remains informed, to help ensure that ministers do not simply have unchecked power, to ensure that ministers actually consult with Albertans before making these kinds of decisions. But this is a government that time and again seems to feel it should have the right to override, sidestep, or otherwise escape those responsibilities. I disagree, and I think a wide swath of Albertans disagree as well. That seems to be the case when one looks at this government's polling numbers, certainly those of the Premier.

Certainly, I'll be looking for the Minister of Environment and Parks to rise in this place and perhaps provide some actual justification for these changes made, beyond the rather embarrassing attempt he made in conversation with the CBC.

I look forward to that perhaps at a future opportunity of debate.

At this time I will look to adjourn debate on Bill 21.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

9:30 Government Bills and Orders
Committee of the Whole

[Mr. van Dijken in the chair]

The Acting Chair: I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 14
Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training)
Amendment Act, 2022

The Acting Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill? The member from . . .

Member Irwin: Come on. Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

The Acting Chair: Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock, come on.

Ms Hoffman: You can say the member from Barrhead.

Member Irwin: The member from Barrhead originally. That's right. I trust that the chair will never forget Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood again, and I'm going to mention Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood multiple times just so he does not.

We are going to be speaking to a quite serious bill here and one that I'm very happy to speak to, but I am told, again, that the Oilers are still up 2-nothing, so I'm cheering them on and hoping for the best for Edmonton's hockey team.

What I'd like to do is just talk a little bit about Bill 14. I've been on the record in second reading. You know, as I shared on that day, I talked about the fact that on this side of the House we are really happy to see a number of aspects of this bill. I have been happy. I don't mind putting on the record that I did have a chance to speak with the associate minister a little bit about it as well. I know she actually reached out to a stakeholder who'd had some questions about the bill as well, so I do appreciate that.

These are conversations that we need to be having. You know, we've said in this Chamber many times that all of us as legislators must do all we can to not just elevate conversations around sexual assaults and sexual violence but to take action, right? Words are important, but actions are what matter.

I'm going to recap a few of my comments. Spoiler alert: I do have an amendment coming. I'm going to just recap a few of the comments that I shared in second and hopefully have an opportunity for some dialogue with the associate minister and perhaps anybody else on the government side as well.

We are glad to see the requirement for sexual assault and social context training for anybody who's hoping to be appointed as a provincial judge. You know, we are saying, of course, that training should be extended to all sitting judges. We've heard already, again a common theme from this government, that they're sort of asking us to trust them that sitting judges will have an opportunity to get this training through existing education plans. The reason why it's hard to trust this government on an issue as important and as sensitive as this one is that I witnessed this government ram through the just simply horrific cuts to the victims of crime fund.

I've said in this House – and I don't mind sharing it more – that on two occasions I had three different folks, three different what we call validators, who were willing to share their stories about how either the victims of crime fund helped them or how it would have helped them. You know, to hear the stories, the absolutely traumatic stories of assault that all three of these women experienced, one sexual assault and one physical assault and the other one sexual violence as well – I still remember the one validator. She had never shared her story publicly before, so to be willing to do so in the hopes, genuinely in the hopes, that this government would be willing to listen and would be willing to reverse their changes, changes that included a 45-day limit on accessing those funds – we all know in this Chamber or should know that survivors of a horrific event like sexual assault or sexual violence: some will never share their stories, and some, many, take a very long time to come forward. To ask people, survivors, at one of the toughest times in their lives to rush through and to expedite their application for funds doesn't make sense.

It was hard. It was, of course, you know, a different person in the role of minister of status of women at the time, but it was certainly hard to see her and her government justify those changes and those cuts with very little justification other than to say that they were looking at it and there would be a review and there would be further changes coming. We said: "You know what? That's great that you're looking at it, that you're examining the process, but in the meantime don't make it harder for survivors to access supports." I need to share that, and I need to just share the fact that, you know, it's hard, it's tough to take this government seriously when they say that they're taking action to support survivors when they justify cruel decisions such as that one.

I also want to talk a little bit about – oh, gosh, there are a few other things that I wanted to talk about. I mean, we laid out – and I know we've mentioned her in this Chamber before – in second reading of this bill, like, that we must address, you know, the myths and stereotypes that exist when it comes to sexual assault and sexual violence. Jennifer Koshan, who is, of course, a professor, who's fantastic at analyzing legislation and, more than that, at offering solutions as well, laid out the case for the need for governments to implement mandatory judicial education about intimate partner violence, social context, the myths, and the stereotypes.

You know, one of the things that we talked about – and I think the associate minister will weigh in on this a little bit. I know she's chatted with some key stakeholders, including – I'll name her because I know she won't mind – Jan Reimer from the Alberta Council of Women's Shelters, who does great work looking at domestic violence and ways to support women and all folks, gender-diverse folks as well, men too, fleeing domestic violence. I know she had an opportunity to talk with the associate minister, so it would be nice just to hear a little bit more while we are in committee about why the associate minister chose not to include intimate partner violence.

We do know one of the pieces that is – there are very few metrics in the business plan for Status of Women, as I called out both in the last budget estimates and the one in the prior year as well. You know, how are you able to track anything when you have no performance metrics – right? – when you have no metrics to support the outcomes that you have laid out? To give them credit, that is one that the Associate Ministry of Status of Women has in there, police-reported intimate partner violence. I recall just the other day in the Chamber that the Associate Minister of Status of Women, when asked by me about the need for data for trans and nonbinary folks coming out of the latest census data, committed to that. I'm hopeful that that will continue to be a priority for those populations.

But I can't help but think about my colleague here for Edmonton-City Centre, who has asked many questions about race-based data and, of course, through his private member's bill, Bill 204, outlined the dire need for race-based data and the support for racialized folks. Yet, of course, that bill was shamefully shot down by this government. You know, I talk a lot and this associate minister has heard me talk a lot about intersectionality. Let's think about those intersections of racialized women – right? – and the need for there to be data.

I mean, let's talk about racialized trans folks. Racialized trans folks: we don't have a lot of data here in Canada yet, but we know that racialized trans folks in the United States experience far higher levels of violence and discrimination than their cisgender, nonracialized counterparts, as an example. That is one piece of data that we do have from the States. Hopefully, we will have more coming out of Canada with the new census data and in Alberta as well.

We've got a few questions. I know my colleagues have a few other pieces that they want to outline, but I do want to make sure – because, gosh knows, if I don't, I will likely forget, and then I'll run out of time – that I would like to introduce an amendment on Bill 14.

The Acting Chair: The amendment will be known as A1.

The member may proceed.

Member Irwin: Okay. Just remind me. It's been a while since I got to introduce an amendment. I read the whole thing into the record?

The Acting Chair: Yeah.

Member Irwin: Wonderful. Thank you.

Ms Hoffman: But not your name.

Member Irwin: Thank you. But not my name, which I would have absolutely done.

The Member for, and say it with me, Chair, Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood moves that Bill 14 – he's not even listening – the Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022, be amended as follows: in section 2 by striking out “clause (a.01)” wherever it appears and substituting “clause (a.02)” and by adding the following immediately after the proposed section 1(a):

(a.01) “approved sexual assault law education program” means a program established or approved under section 9(2.11);

In section 3, in the proposed section 9.1, as follows: in subsection (2) by striking out “education in sexual assault law and social context issues” and substituting “an approved sexual assault law education program”; in subsection (2.1) by striking out “undertakes to complete education in sexual assault law and social context issues after being appointed” and substituting “undertakes to complete, within 1 year of being appointed as a judge, an approved sexual assault law education program”; by adding the following immediately after subsection (2.1):

(2.11) The Judicial Council may establish a program or approve an existing program that

(a) is developed in consultation with the following, as the Judicial Council considers appropriate:

- (i) individuals who are sexual assault survivors;
- (ii) individuals or organizations that represent or support sexual assault survivors, including Indigenous leaders and representatives of Indigenous communities, and

(b) includes educational content or training in respect of each of the following:

- (i) evidentiary prohibitions;
- (ii) principles of consent;
- (iii) the conduct of sexual assault proceedings;
- (iv) education regarding myths and stereotypes associated with sexual assault survivors and complainants;
- (v) social context issues relating to sexual assault including systemic racism and discrimination.

All right. I've now read that into the record.

We have a number of questions. Like I said, I know I've got some colleagues who will probably go into more detail on this as well. As written, Bill 14 in its current form does leave us with a lot of questions. Who is responsible for ensuring that the content of the education in sexual assault law and social context issues is adequate? What's the check on that? What's the control on that? What needs to be in the curriculum of that training to meet the intent of that legislation? Gosh, well, don't worry; I won't get into a whole diatribe about curriculum here although that was my world for many years.

We know that curriculum documents need to be developed meaningfully and in consultation with key stakeholders. So who will be consulted in the development of that curriculum? Whose voices will be at the table? Whose voices won't be at the table? How do we address the training of those on the approval list when this bill comes into force, to ensure that they don't sit on the bench for years before getting that training? I think that's something where we can, obviously, with some support, ask that question, because, you know, we've seen examples of judges who've been on the bench for a period of time or, obviously, of those perhaps who are very much in need. How will we make sure that that delay is not an issue?

The goal of this legislation is to ensure that Provincial Court judges will be receiving the same training that is required for federal and federally appointed judges. This amendment, as we've written it, will ensure that the legislation better meets that goal, better addresses that goal, and it does that in a number of ways.

First of all, it adds a definition of an approved sexual assault law education program. Second, it requires that appointees on the list when this legislation comes into force will have to take that training within one year. Based on what we've heard from our briefing with officials, that won't be prohibitive at all, you know, as the bill won't come into force until those training programs are established. Third, it requires that the Judicial Council, which is established under the Judicature Act, approve or establish a program, and that can be done without amending that act as that act allows for another enactment to legislative duty on that council.

Fourth, and this is one that's, you know – well, they're all important, but this one is really important to me. It requires consultation in the development of an educational program, consultation that will include, as I noted, those who've experienced sexual assault; sexual assault survivors. We need to hear from those who've experienced it first-hand. Their voices are critical. Individuals or organizations that represent or support sexual assault survivors, including Indigenous leaders and representatives of Indigenous communities: that's a really important one as well, making sure that those voices, the community voices, are diverse and are varied. I really hope that the Indigenous piece is included. These individuals, these organizations are best equipped. I mean, again, they're the ones on the front lines. They're the ones who get these issues inside out.

In my role as critic for Status of Women I've had the opportunity to meet with a number of individuals and organizations who are working, both those who are working on the front lines and individuals who are in leadership positions, and, you know, they get it. They're the experts, and that's – I think about my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud here. We've had a lot of meetings with various organizations who work in the areas of sexual assault, sexual violence, domestic violence. We go into those meetings and we say: “We want to listen. We want to hear how things are going for you, and we want to hear the real situation. You don't need to sugar-coat things for us. You might be fearful of speaking out publicly because perhaps your funding comes, much of it, from this provincial government. You might be fearful about being truthful about your situation, but what you share with us is – if we've agreed that it will stay within this conversation, then it does, right?" I want those folks to know that their voices are valuable and that they're doing the good work and that they would have an important role in consulting on this bill.

The federal bill, as I understand, did go through considerable consultation prior to getting to its final form, which includes additional consultation on the training development, so, you know, again, let's heed that advice. Let's look at what the feds have done on this and try to head off any of those possible issues that could come in the future.

Finally, it inserts minimum content in the training: evidentiary prohibitions; principles of consult; the conduct of sexual assault proceedings; education regarding myths and stereotypes, as I talked about prior; social context issues relating to sexual assault, including systemic racism and discrimination, which, again, is a crucial piece here that I know my colleagues have talked about. We talked about the implications on the justice system. We've talked about the fact that we still very much have an issue in front of us where we see Indigenous folks and racialized folks overrepresented in the justice system, and we need to talk about the systemic barriers, the racism, the discrimination and talk about and unpack and try to act on some of the factors that lead to that. Again, we can look to the federal legislation for some guidance on this area.

Yeah. I will mention, you know, and I would love for the Associate Minister of Status of Women to talk a little bit more about this because we did, as I alluded to earlier, consider bringing forth an amendment that would address domestic violence or intimate partner violence. There is currently legislation in Parliament addressing just this issue, but from what I gather, that could potentially change the intent of this bill. That may have also – and I can defer to my lawyer caucus on this one – required amendments to family law, which, I gather, would be a big undertaking.

We would encourage this government – and I'll end with this. I would encourage this government to think about how they might address issues around intimate partner violence in the future, domestic violence as well, if the minister or associate minister confirms with me, in fact, that this would have been out of scope and would have changed the intent. I would encourage them to think about a focus on that piece moving forward and perhaps bringing forward legislation that could enhance the training that Provincial Court judges receive to ensure that survivors of intimate partner violence don't face additional barriers when navigating an already complex court system and already very challenging-to-navigate judicial system.

So, with that, you know, I do hope and encourage the members opposite to support this amendment. I think we can all agree in this Chamber that we want to get this right and that we want to, again, amplify the voices of those on the front lines and of survivors. We want to do the best job that we can, and I think this amendment will certainly help with that.

With that, I will conclude my remarks.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you very much, hon. member.

Are there any members looking to join debate on amendment A1? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to rise in Committee of the Whole and speak to the amendment tabled by my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood on Bill 14. I believe it's amendment A1, if I'm correct.

I appreciate the opportunity not only to speak to this amendment, but I appreciate this amendment because I actually believe that throughout debate on this bill and certainly in conversations that I know many of our members have had with government members as well as with stakeholders as well as in statements made by government members, I think we're actually all quite unified on this bill and the objective that it seeks to meet, which is, of course, to ensure that those who are in a position of judging and making determinations in cases before them in Provincial Court, judges making those decisions that are critical to respecting and adjudicating sexual assault trials, are not making those decisions under the influence of rape myths and stereotypes, that we know, unfortunately, have been far too pervasive in our judicial system in the past and even not so past, Mr. Chair.

I think we're united in that. There seems to be a real consensus around the idea that we want to make sure that those in those positions do have appropriate sexual assault awareness training, that those who are making determinations that deeply affect the lives of sexual assault victims and even those who are accused are making so free from this prejudice. That is a huge shadow that's been hanging over sexual assault for so long, which has been one of the key factors that has deterred women in particular but all victims of sexual assault from coming forward to report cases.

It's all of those myths around, you know, perhaps what the person was wearing or if they had consumed alcohol or their sexual history or even: can consent be revoked? All of those stereotypes have made it so difficult for women to seek justice, to tell their stories, and to be heard. A key part of this bill is, I think, meant to address that by making sure that they do not fear that when they go into a court system, they will be subject to those stereotypes and prejudices.

It's not an easy task, Mr. Chair. I'm not by any means suggesting – and I don't think anybody is – that this bill will solve that issue, but it is a key part of it. It is a key step that needs to be taken to make sure that we are creating a safe space for victims of sexual assault to be able to come forward, to report to police, to be heard in court in a fair and impartial way based on the evidence, not based on prejudice.

So with that united goal, that I believe we all have, we also sort of have the objective of wanting to make this bill as effective as possible and to make sure that it is very clear that it serves the purposes it seeks to serve. I want to note that I think what's been put forward in an amendment here by my colleague really seeks to align what is going to be taking place for training for provincial judges with what's already happening in federal legislation.

Key to that – and these are points that I know that I raised when I had the opportunity to speak to this bill in second reading – were two pieces, to me, that stand out immediately. One is that we need some understanding about what that education program that judges will be receiving will look like, and, importantly: who is contributing to developing that education program?

I note that Bill C-3, which is the federal legislation that is similar, you know, requires that that education program, that sexual assault education program for judges, be developed in consultation with survivors of sexual assault as well as in consultation with Indigenous communities and organizations. That's critical because – I know I'm echoing some of the comments made by the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood – we understand and recognize the intersectionality that is at play, particularly in sexual assault.

We know the disproportionately high number of racialized Indigenous women who are victimized by sexual assault, women with disabilities – and, again, I shouldn't limit my comments to only women. It's gender-diverse folks. We know that trans folks are absolutely at high risk of sexual assault. So when we talk about intersectionality, it is absolutely a critical issue to recognize and acknowledge in sexual assault awareness training.

So developing that education program in consultation not only with those groups who can reflect that intersectionality but, of course, with survivors themselves is absolutely critical because they can speak to, you know, I guess, perhaps some of the concerns and barriers that they may have felt in actually coming forward, speaking to their unfortunate real-life experiences in interacting with the judicial system and breaking down those stereotypes. It can really only be done by hearing their voices and making sure that they are participating in an active way in the development of the sexual assault awareness education program that judges will receive. You know, I see in this amendment that it's key to establishing that the Judicial Council, which would describe the education program and would establish it, would do that development in consultation. That part is key.

I also note that through this amendment it's addressing, I believe, sort of what the ambiguities of the bill are as it's tabled right now, which are around: what does social context mean? You know, currently in Bill 14 it indicates that, you know, no person may be appointed as a judge unless they have completed education in sexual assault law and social context issues, but social context issues are not defined in Bill 14.

We do know that in Bill C-3, which is the federal legislation, social context is defined, and it is described as, you know: social context issues relating to sexual assault, including systemic racism and discrimination. Through this amendment it is providing that further clarification as to what the term "social context" means. It means understanding systemic racism and discrimination. I think, again, that's really important when we talk about the intersectionality.

Again, we understand that rape myths and sexual assault myths and stereotypes have arisen in a context of systemic racism and discrimination. It is systemic, and again this bill will not solve all of those problems. By the very nature of it being systemic, we need multipronged approaches on all levels and in various institutions: police, to judges, to councillors, to teachers, to all of the systems that support survivors of sexual assault. They need to be addressed, certainly, understanding that judges should have training in social context, and by social context we mean training with respect to systemic racism and discrimination.

I'm very pleased to see this amendment that actually kind of provides that clarification in Bill 14, and again it's intended to meet the same goal that I believe the government brought this forward with.

I do also appreciate that this amendment clarifies that this training for newly appointed judges must take place within a year of that judge being appointed. We understand that that is not an onerous undertaking and that it should be done. It does place some urgency because certainly in that period of time, unless there is a prohibition on the judge actually hearing cases of sexual assault until they've had the training, which is not included in the bill – you know, I think it's important to kind of put some timelines around that. I think that's a very useful piece.

I do think that the amendment here does not address this, but it is something that I raised in the context of second reading on this bill. You know, this bill is very much targeted towards new judges and newly appointed judges and judges going forward. Of course, we have a number on the judicial bench who have been appointed for many years, many of whom are incredibly – I certainly do not want to be seen to be critiquing the skills of those sitting judges.

However, we do know that sexual assault myths and stereotypes training has not been made available to all judges. They would not have received it. I told the story in second reading about how even in law school, when I attended law school, which is now 20 years ago, there wasn't this kind of specific training around sexual assault myths and stereotypes at the law school level, so it's very likely that there are many sitting judges who have never received any of this specific kind of training. I do think it would be, you know, really meaningful to make sure that as part of their continuing education all sitting judges, no matter when they were appointed, are required to take any kind of education program as is determined by the Judicial Council. I think that that's really important.

The truth of the matter is that one of the reasons why we're all talking about this is because of the situation that arose with Justice Robin Camp, who, not that long ago, Mr. Chair, at the Alberta Provincial Court level, you know, made some comments during a sexual assault trial that horrified most people but clearly didn't horrify Justice Camp – well, Mr. Camp, I'll say, because of his title now – at the time that he said it.

You know, he made some statements in that sexual assault trial which were the deepest and most insidious of stereotypes around sexual assault. Likely, there are many with years of experience at the bench and in law school who may not have ever received this kind of training. I think it would be incumbent upon – it would be great to see existing and sitting judges also do this kind of training. I think that would be really useful.

I really do sincerely hope that this amendment is received and supported in the spirit in which it was tabled, which is really to align the legislation that is proposed with federal legislation but also, really, to ensure that we are providing the best framework for new judges who are appointed the Provincial Court to receive the best and most thorough education program in sexual assault awareness that we can.

Really, this is about treating those individual survivors who do come to the courts fairly. That goes without saying. It absolutely is about treating them fairly. I know we've already talked about in this House that, you know, only 6 per cent of those who experience sexual assault actually report that to police. Then from that point, of those who report to police, even fewer make it to court, so there are already significant barriers. We want to make sure that those who actually get to court have a fair hearing, have a true hearing based on the evidence, not based on predetermined or prejudicial or discriminatory views about sexual assault.

The bigger purpose is also to break down that systemic discrimination, those systemic barriers that discourage survivors of sexual assault from coming forward. Really, what we're trying to do is create more of a safe space for that to happen, and we want to really ensure that this is one piece of that. They should not have to be subjected – and let's be clear. The court process is already incredibly stressful. It's traumatic for survivors of violence: reliving experiences, being challenged by attorneys, having intimate, intimate details brought up in a public space. It is incredibly traumatizing, and we need to do whatever we can while also making sure we have a fair judicial process for the accused, who do have rights. The accused definitely have rights, but we want to make that process as fair as possible to encourage more women and survivors of sexual assault to feel like it is safe to come forward and to report their assault so that we can all work to break down those systemic barriers.

With that, Mr. Chair, I certainly hope that all members present will vote in favour of this amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you very much.

I see the hon. government whip has risen to respond.

Ms Issik: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. I'd like to say that I, you know, appreciate the spirit behind this amendment. I think it shows that there's been some thought into the reasoning behind putting Bill 14 up in the first place. I have some concerns with the amendment, and I'm just going to go through a couple of them now, and then I just want to speak more broadly about some of the issues that this amendment gives rise to.

First of all, in this amendment it speaks to striking out "education in sexual assault law and social context issues" and substituting "an approved sexual assault law education program." What I don't see in this amendment is any mention of who approves that. I'm going to come back to who approves what for whom in a moment, but I will note that it just says "approved," and it doesn't note who would possibly approve that. I have a concern about that, and I'll bring that up in a moment.

Next it says, "undertakes to complete, within 1 year of being appointed as a judge, an approved sexual assault law education program." Well, Mr. Chair, the bill as it exists now refers to: those who are on the approved appointment list would make an undertaking to take this education piece. It was made very clear, when this bill was moved and when we did the press conference about it, that there's no way functionally for government or this legislative body to tell the judiciary what they can do or cannot do within a prescribed time frame, particularly when it comes to something such as education. I'm going to come back to that in a moment as well.

I will say that in the section of this amendment that speaks to some of the particulars that they would like to see in the education piece – I mean, these are good pieces; these are good points. I can't imagine that in today's world, where somebody was designing an education piece on sexual assault training and context issues, these would not be included. I think they're very good. They're very good. I think the intent behind this amendment is great on this point. However, it is quite specific, so the concern that I have and the reason that I wouldn't support this amendment, although I understand that there's good intention behind it, is because of judicial independence and the need for our judiciary to be independent.

You know, judicial independence is a building block of a free and democratic society, and it exists for the benefit of everyone. As we know, as we've seen, judges make life-altering decisions, and they must be able to do that free from any sort of influence. To be blunt and to be, actually, pretty specific, that includes influence from government and influence from the legislative branch as well. The executive branch and the legislative branch are meant to be completely separate, and the judicial branch is meant to be completely independent.

Now, the Supreme Court of Canada has enunciated three major components or three main components for judicial independence. They are, first, security of tenure; second, financial security; and third, administrative independence. Administrative independence can be seen to be an extension of the judicial function. Administrative independence means that decisions about how courts operate must, first and foremost, be in the hands of judges. That's important.

The members across had talked about education of judges and who in particular educates. They mentioned, you know: who creates these education programs? Who develops the curriculum? Who delivers these education components? Those are important questions.

At the federal level the CJC issues the professional development requirements for federally appointed judges. The CJC has noted – this is the Canadian Judicial Council – that "training sessions provided to judges must . . . serve the interests of justice alone and not that of external forces, governmental or otherwise."

The National Judicial Institute is the primary training and education provider for federally appointed judges and is an independent organization led by judges. The NJI, which is an organization that I mentioned in the press conference when we first brought this bill forward, works with judges, courts, and other judicial education organizations to provide education to judges in person and online. The NJI has been an effective forum in which continuing education of judges is accomplished. That's at the federal level.

On the issue of content, you know, there's an emerging consensus about education on the subjects that we're talking about specifically, that are actually in the federal bill. According to the Advocates' Society, "While there is an emerging consensus that education on this subject would serve the interests of justice, judicial independence may be threatened when the executive or legislature attempts to determine the content of judicial education." So there's a concern out there that's been expressed, I would say, by a pretty competent stakeholder, and that speaks directly to what I'm concerned about.

Now in Alberta, you know, we've had good conversations with the Chief Judge. The Chief Judge has been very generous, I must say, with his time. He came to the MMIWG joint working group for a very lengthy consultation, and it was a very useful conversation.

I just want to talk a little bit about how the Alberta courts education process works. In Alberta the education is provided by the Alberta Provincial Judges' Association, so judges, the Canadian Association of Provincial Court Judges – this is the Provincial Court judges from all of the provinces and territories – the National Judicial Institute, which I mentioned earlier, and the Provincial Court itself also does some education. In 2014 the Provincial Court established an education committee, and the mandate of it is to "support, improve and enhance professional competence of the Court's Judges and Justices of the Peace."

The Provincial Court's 2021 new judges education plan is actually available on the Internet. I went through their website the other day. It includes shadowing and mentoring programs as well as a requirement to attend two new judges programs which address substantive law, judicial skills, social context, and judicial development, with particular emphasis on topics including sexual offences law, Indigenous justice, and programs to understand the cultural dimensions of judging. New judges are further expected to develop education plans for their first five years on the bench, which must include sexual offences law education if relevant.

The Provincial Court also has a more general education plan to establish measurable goals for 2021 to 2024 and provide judges and justices of the peace with a broad range of educational opportunities. Certainly, Chief Judge Redman was kind enough to share that information with us, those of us sitting on the MMIWG joint working group. In that group some of these issues were raised with respect to, you know, what kind of content this education should have. Chief Judge Redman was very amenable, very agreeable to consideration of many of the issues that are actually listed in this amendment. So it's hard for me to contemplate that these issues would be left out of curriculum.

But it's clear that judicial independence requires us to not interfere with judges developing education for judges. I would note that this bill is primarily intended to ensure that lawyers who wish to become judges undertake this education piece as mandatory in order to apply to be a judge, and in that way we're actually filling the pipeline for not only the Provincial Court but also for, eventually, the Court of Queen's Bench because many provincial judges become federal judges. Judicial independence is very, very important, and I think it's something that we all need to respect.

Like I said, while I appreciate the intent of this amendment, I do think that we risk crossing the line that no legislative or executive branch of government should do. With that, I would ask members to not support the amendment. I'm happy to say that I look forward to further discussions with the opposition as we work towards resolving other issues that are of importance, including intimate partner violence and all the issues surrounding that.

With that, I'll take my seat, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate the comments from the Associate Minister of Status of Women. I just wanted to clarify a few pieces just to fully understand what the amendment was put before. I heard the associate minister express concerns about not understanding who would approve the sexual assault education program as proposed under this amendment. I just want to indicate that it does state in the amendment that in the new section, a.01, it would mean an "approved sexual assault law education program" means a program established or approved under section 9(2.11)." So it's approved under that section, and then that's the new section that we have added in the amendment. Section 9(2.11) indicates that it's the Judicial Council that would establish the program or approve an existing program. So in response to that question, it is the Judicial Council that would make that approval. Again, that is very similar to the process that the associate minister described in terms of what happens at the federal level, which is that there is a Judicial Council that sets out the content.

Key here is, again, that "the Judicial Council may establish a program or approve," so it's not the executive directing the Judicial Council to do so. It is empowering the Judicial Council to do so but simply saying that that existing program would be developed in consultation with sexual assault survivors and, you know, representatives from Indigenous leaders and Indigenous communities. Again, that's mirroring what is in Bill C-3. As well, the description of what social context is: this is again mirroring what's happening in Bill C-3, which was not passed that long ago.

I'm certain there will be some stakeholders who, you know, have concerns about what the Legislature or Parliament is directing. This is very discretionary, but it's clear that it is still the Judicial Council who is the one who approves it and develops that education program. It's not intended to be overreach by the Legislature into this role; it's simply to make sure that that education program does include those important voices when being developed and to provide that clarification around what social context would mean.

I would invite, given that I feel like the associate minister did overall seem to express, she said a couple of times that the intent of this amendment – and I hear her concern about whether or not the education program could be completed within one year of being appointed as a judge. Certainly, if the associate minister would be willing to entertain or to put forward a subamendment to remove that piece, you know, that it must be undertaken to be completed within one year of being appointed as a judge, I certainly think that the Official Opposition – and I don't want to speak for the mover of the amendment – would consider that to be something we'd accept and support.

Ultimately, we believe that the rest of the content of the amendment is really important and seems to align with, you know, the federal legislation, trying to make this as effective as possible without overreaching into direction from the Legislature and Executive Council into how lawyers govern themselves but still providing guidance as to expectations, which is precisely, honestly, what the entirety of this bill is about. It's saying that there are expectations that the elected bodies have for how judicial appointments are made and approved and the requirements that they have to meet in terms of education. I think that's the purpose of this bill.

Again, our objectives are aligned. I would hope that perhaps the associate minister would consider putting forward a subamendment to remove that one section that she believes is inappropriate, because I believe that there's really good stuff in the rest of the amendment. I would hope that the associate minister would consider that.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you very much, hon. member.

Are there any other members on amendment A1 looking to debate?

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Deputy Chair: We are back on the main bill, Bill 14, Provincial Court (Sexual Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022. Are there any hon. members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Associate Minister of Status of Women has risen.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Chair. At this time I would like to offer up an amendment. It is a change to the title of the bill.

The Deputy Chair: Just hand it on to the pages, including the original, and once I've got a copy, I'll give you some more quick instructions once I see it.

Ms Issik: Will you read it then?

The Deputy Chair: Once I see it, yeah.

Ms Issik: Can I take a copy?

The Deputy Chair: Keep a copy.

Thank you, hon. minister. If you'd be so kind to read it into the record.

Obviously, copies will be provided to everyone. This will be referred to as amendment A2 for debate. Thank you.

Please continue.

Ms Issik: I move that the bill be amended as follows: the title of the bill is amended by adding "Assault" after "Sexual."

The Deputy Chair: Are there any members wishing to join debate on amendment A2?

[Motion on amendment A2 carried]

The Deputy Chair: We are back on the main bill, Bill 14. Are there any members wishing to join debate? Seeing none, I am – oh. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has risen.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and just briefly address Bill 14, the Provincial Court (Sexual Assault Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022, that has been up for debate this evening. I appreciate those who ventured into debate, particularly around amendments. And thank you to the minister for engaging in debate and talking about the thoughts on this particular piece.

I really just wanted to rise in support of removing barriers to victims coming forward, victims who have experienced sexual assault. We know that few victims will report sexual assault and even fewer will go through the process to enter into the court system and get that far. Certainly, as has been outlined during the debate on Bill 14, there have been several very high-profile examples of archaic stereotypes and misconceptions leading to Provincial Court judges obviously using completely outdated and false narratives and perceptions when dealing with victims of sexual assault in our court system. Of course, those stories impede the confidence that victims have in our justice system and being able to bring forward their concerns and their complaints.

Knowing that all appointees, as a requirement for being appointed, will need to take training and ensure that victims are protected from those biases and stereotypes I think is incredibly positive. I would note that Manitoba is debating very similar legislation, and we've seen federal legislation implemented as well to make sure that judges are educated in sexual assault awareness training.

I do think that the amendment that my colleagues brought forward, my colleague from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood and also referred to by my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud, would have been an improvement to this bill, but even so that amendment was not accepted. Based off the debate that I've seen at second reading and based off the good that the Provincial Court (Sexual Assault Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022, can have in building confidence in our justice system for victims of sexual assault, I will be voting in support of Bill 14 as we conclude debate in Committee of the Whole.

I do just want to thank everyone who's entered into this debate in a respectful way. This is an issue of incredible importance, incredible sensitivity, and I believe it's a positive step that these changes are being implemented here in the province of Alberta. I appreciate the opportunity to join in the debate and to just briefly reflect my thoughts on Bill 14.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Issik: Mr. Chair, I move that the committee rise and report Bill 14.

The Deputy Chair: I appreciate the goal there. What I would say is that we should take the opportunity to ensure that there are no other individuals looking to join debate on the bill.

I see the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley has risen.

Mr. Loewen: Yes. Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I just wanted to take a few minutes to talk about Bill 14, the Provincial Court (Sexual Assault Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022. I support this training, and I guess one of the reasons why I support it is that I know it's hard to put yourself in the place of a victim to know exactly what they're going through. I know that's impossible for me, and anybody that hasn't been through it: I think it's impossible for them, too. I have, however, been in that situation where I've had to accompany someone through this process personally, and I have to say that it's incredibly hard. It's heart-wrenching. Yeah.

The process itself, even before they get to the courtroom, is an incredibly hard process, and it takes a lot of guts and a lot of nerve and a lot of strength to be able to get through that process. I think we need to alleviate absolutely every possible negative interaction that victims would have to go through. Of course, we can't circumvent the fair justice process, but this doesn't take away anything from the fairness of the justice process.

I think this is important enough that we should just do it. I don't know that we needed to have legislation to do this. I don't know how much influence the Legislature has had on the training of judges in the province of Alberta, but I think this is important, that we should be just doing it. You know, this legislative process: it's always good to be able to talk about these things in the Legislature, but it would be great if this was already happening.

Hopefully, this will encourage more reporting of sexual assaults and potentially preventing more in the future. It is, you know, a little disappointing that this doesn't have any implications for current sitting judges. That would be nice, too. I guess if there was any way we could encourage the current judges to go through this training, too, I think that would be great.

We need to make sure that victims come forward. I think the statistics are alarming, the number of sexual assault victims that don't come forward. That's incredibly alarming. I think we need to have greater reporting, and of course we need to be able to have the people, the victims, that come forward feel that they're going to be treated well all the way through the whole process. Of course, we're talking about sexual assault, one of the most personal and intimate things that could happen to anybody in such a horrible way, so the survivors of sexual assault need confidence in our justice system. We've seen in the past where this hasn't happened, that they didn't have the confidence, and they were mistreated in our justice system, and we need to make sure we do everything we can to prevent that from happening in the future.

Of course, one of the best ways that we can combat this kind of misinformation and stereotypes is through education and training. We need to make sure that judges understand the nature of sexual assault and the humiliation experienced by victims and how so many of them don't report it or once they start the process, actually quit partway through the process because the process, again, is already hard, and, again, we don't need, in the end, to be mistreated by a judge in the courtroom.

I just wanted to say that I support this bill and look forward to it passing in this Legislature. Again, hopefully, we can make a difference for so many people that have been victims of sexual assault in this province.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate on Bill 14?

Seeing none, I am prepared.

[The remaining clauses of Bill 14 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to as amended]

The Deputy Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chair: Any opposed? Carried and so ordered.

Oh, I see the hon. Associate Minister of Status of Women has risen.

Ms Issik: I didn't want to jump the gun this time. Mr. Chair, I move that the committee rise and report Bill 14.

[Motion carried]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain has risen.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill: Bill 14.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Acting Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. That is carried and so ordered.

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, I move that the Assembly be adjourned until 9 a.m. Thursday, May 5, 2022.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 10:36 p.m.]

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 14

Provincial Court (Sexual Assault Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Good morning. I rise today to move third reading of Bill 14, Provincial Court (Sexual Assault Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022.

As we all know, a well-functioning justice system is key to keeping our neighbourhoods, communities, and province running properly and safely. The courts are an integral part of this, as are judges, who are in charge of their courtrooms, including overall conduct of and the experience in the courtroom. The life experiences, circumstances, and perspectives of those who come to their courts, either by choice or requirement, can be varied and complicated. It can be a very nerve-wracking process and experience, particularly for victims who are testifying, vulnerable Albertans, and those who are not familiar with the court process, including families of victims. Sadly, we know that victims: some of them never appear in court because they have sadly lost their lives.

This bill is intended to help with this by making sure that those who apply to be a judge have to complete sexual assault law and social context issues education before they're eligible to be appointed. This will help set up the next generation of judges with the tools to understand the circumstances and life contexts of those appearing in their courts, including victims. This is intended to build trust, trust that all those who enter the courtroom will be treated fairly and respectfully. By building this confidence, we will ultimately create greater confidence for victims to come forward and report. Greater reporting, in turn, will ultimately help us eliminate sexual violence. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that is a goal that we can all agree upon.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the Associate Minister of Status of Women has moved third reading of Bill 14. Are there others wishing to join in the debate this morning? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview has the call.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to join the debate in third reading on Bill 14. I did speak on it earlier in the debate, but first I'd just like to acknowledge that today is Red Dress Day. I know that many of my female colleagues are wearing dresses just to honour missing and murdered women. Speaking of this bill today, of course, it's extremely appropriate that we are highlighting this deep concern in our society, where Indigenous women and girls have suffered so much more, and there is profound discrimination to this day. So I certainly stand in solidarity with my Indigenous sisters and certainly want to shift our society into respect for women, whatever background, and certainly, of course, Indigenous women.

I grew up in the north. I grew up in a small town in the Peace Country, Valleyview. We had a very large Indian reserve right next to us. It still is up in Valleyview, Sturgeon Lake Indian band. I saw, really, on a daily basis just discrimination. I grew up, you know – I guess I was going into school in the late '60s, in the '70s, so many, many years ago. But I know I was profoundly impacted by what I saw all the time and how Indigenous people and, specifically, women and girls were treated. It always disturbed me profoundly, and I think it's one of the reasons I made the decision to go in to the social work profession. I felt like things can be different. We don't have to have so much dissension and discrimination in our society. Actually, we can be inclusive and supportive. So I did make that decision more than 30 years ago.

Here as an elected official and certainly as part of the NDP caucus I'm so proud of the work my colleagues have done to really make sure that all Albertans are counted and, specifically on this day, today, that Indigenous women and girls are honoured and respected. I wear this red dress in honour of that.

We are talking about Bill 14, Provincial Court (Sexual Assault Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022, in third reading, as the associate minister just shared. Of course, this bill largely is a mandate for sexual awareness training for judges, which, of course, we on this side of the House think is an important move, and we want to make sure that judges in Alberta are absolutely fulfilling on this training and make sure that they understand and have an awareness, as it says, the sexual assault awareness training.

This training follows the federal process, where the training is overseen and implemented by independent professional bodies – or we would like it to be this way. I think that that is – I'm not sure if that's explicitly identified in the legislation, but I think it's really important that it be implemented and overseen by independent, professional bodies and, of course, developed in consultation with sexual assault survivors.

You know, I talked about this yesterday. We want to make sure always that there's Nothing about Us without Us, right? Who knows best about any particular issue is someone with that lived experience, so it's really important for survivors of sexual assault to have input into what the contents of this training will be. Perhaps there needs to be an opportunity for sexual assault survivors to share their stories with the judges in the training so they really see what these survivors have been through and just to bring the import of that to them. Certainly, we see that as very important and want the government to fulfill on that.

Certainly, you know, on this side of the House we've been somewhat concerned by some of the decisions that the UCP have made, in particular issues with the victims of crime fund. We know that survivors have been denied access to the fund, shortened time limits for reporting. We know that when you've been through this type of experience of a sexual assault or some attack, oftentimes it takes even years for people to feel they have the fortitude, the willingness to step forward and talk about it. It can be very traumatic for them and very difficult for them to go forward. I guess this is another area, speaking about the same population that this bill is addressing to support, that the UCP would be encouraged to understand, the lived experience of survivors and why they need that extended period of time.

Certainly, we know that, you know, judges are just like the rest of us, really. They grow up in this culture. It's sort of the fishbowl, that sometimes we don't know the water that we're swimming in. That's why this sexual awareness training is so important. We grow up with attitudes perpetuated from previous thoughts that are antiquated now. We certainly as a society have moved forward in a most fundamental way, I guess. Like, women are no longer chattels; at one time they were. We're independent people who have our own human rights.

Sadly, sometimes some of that, you know, antiquated thinking is still very much part of our society. Of course, the rape mythology, where prejudiced, stereotyped, and false beliefs about sexual assault are perpetrated, is something that people need their awareness raised about, and judges specifically, of course. With the sexual awareness training I hope that that will dispel those mythologies because, you know, it happens still, to this day, that sexual aggression is excused. Also, sometimes this creates hostility towards the victims themselves and biases criminal prosecution. These rape myths can significantly influence the perspectives of jurors, the investigative process, judges, perpetrators of sexual violence, and victims themselves. Victims themselves, we know, blame themselves. They often say: well, I should have done this; I should have done this; I should have done this. But, again, this is all part of not understanding the issue.

Certainly, when I was younger, I mean, I would hear, "Well, don't wear those clothes" or "You have to look a certain way" or "Make sure you're not walking at a certain time of day, and you shouldn't walk here or there." There were so many rules for me as a young girl, woman growing up in a northern Alberta town that – let's face it – was kind of a rough town. You know, we had a couple of bars in town. One of them was called The Zoo because it literally was the zoo. It was very important that we did not go near The Zoo because – who knows? – there'd be some guy there, and he might grab you or something.

I certainly was told this all the time when I was a kid, and I remember thinking: "How come it's all about me? Why is it me that has to change? I'm not doing anything wrong. You know, I'm just existing on the planet. Why is it me that has to be so careful about what I do, like I'm provoking somehow these negative sexual interactions or whatever?" I always felt that was outrageous. It made absolutely no sense to me. But that absolutely was the culture that I grew up in, and I had a lot – perhaps I still do – of anger as a young woman because of that, because I felt like: hey, this isn't fair. Of course, that has spurred me to stand up in many different ways throughout my life to, you know, say: hey, this isn't fair, and why are women, why are girls being unduly blamed or told to be responsible about their deportment but guys can do whatever they want?

You know, as a woman in her early 60s now I still feel that rage, and I still feel how important it is for all of society to take responsibility. I must say that things have shifted, certainly, in my lifetime. It's not perfect. We certainly don't have equality in our province, in our country, in our world. But this, of course, initiative, this Bill 14, to have judges take sexual awareness training is a good step in the right direction, so I do commend the government for moving on this because, as I've just articulated, so many judgments against women or girls still continue to this day, and sadly still cases before the court are prejudiced against the survivors. I certainly do hope that this training goes a long way to alleviating those kinds of prejudices and stereotypes about women and girls and that fair decisions are going to be made in our society. Of course, you know, I know the associate minister. I think we've talked extensively about: how can we, besides with this legislation – and this legislation, as I've said, Bill 14, is a positive step in the right direction, but there are so many other issues in terms of equality for women in our society.

I always like to reference the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives, because on an annual basis they rank, you know, the best and worst places in Canada, in terms of major cities, for women to live. Of the about 25 major centres – it's the largest centres – Edmonton turns out to be 24th down the list. It's not the worst, but it's only one up from the worst, and Calgary is the 23rd. Again, Alberta's major centres are not great places for women to live, and there are a multitude of reasons for that. Some of the metrics that this organization uses talk about economic security for women. The income gap between men and women is most profound here in Alberta. Also, women in leadership, in municipal government, in industry: women aren't in those senior positions. It doesn't look at the provincial government. It just looks at the municipal government, so women in leadership is low.

Reports of health and well-being, you know, self-reports by women: stress is extremely high, and that's another huge issue and can really negatively impact women's lives. Another one is just personal security – that's another metric – like intimate partner violence, police-reported sexual assault, police-reported criminal harassment. Of course, that fits very well with Bill 14 as we move to make sure that judges have training so that they don't have prejudices against the survivors themselves. On personal security, we have high rates of all those things that I just said: intimate partner violence, police-reported sexual assault, and police-reported criminal harassment.

That's, you know, absolutely nothing to be proud of here in Alberta. I mean, what's more fundamental than that, the security of your person, that you can feel that you can go out and walk on the streets or go out in the evening or even be in your own home? We know that intimate partner violence is extremely high in our province. What's it like to live with the threat of that, to know that you may be hurt at any time? Of course, that is a negative indicator of a good place for women to live, and sadly Edmonton and Calgary are some of the worst places for women to live in Canada of the major centres.

Then the fifth indicator is education, actually. Again, Alberta lags behind other provinces.

Anyway, these are just some of the metrics that this study has used, the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives. I'd just commend the associate minister to look at this study and, you know, bring forward policies that really impact those indicators. I think that that could make a huge difference for women in our province, and I'd just encourage her to really look at some of these issues and also move legislation to support that.

Certainly, we know, as I said about personal security, that 1 in 3 women have experienced sexual assault, but only 1 in 10 report it. Again, I think it is a lot because of women feeling exactly that, that prejudice against them: no one is going to believe me. There could be self-blame, so they're not going to put themselves out there. They'll think: okay; well, I did this, and I did this. It is like blaming the victim. The survivors themselves are maybe thinking in their own head that they are responsible for it.

You know, it's so important that women feel that if they do step forward, then indeed they will be supported and that they won't be put before a judge who does have those prejudices and questions their integrity and creates further trauma for them.

You know, some years ago, when we were government, the Sexual Assault Centre had a campaign called I Believe You. That one sentence is so important when you're working with survivors because so many people don't believe them. Sadly, in my own extended family, well, one of my cousins – this happened to her. I guess that her mother didn't not believe her, but she didn't do anything about it. It was just, like: oh, well, you're fine. She minimized it. I mean, there are so many issues in our society about women coming forward and not being heard about this. This I Believe You campaign was, I thought, extremely powerful and really very respectful of the survivors themselves.

Certainly, in my experience as a social worker so many people that I worked with minimized whatever kind of abuse had happened to come their way and really didn't see themselves as worthy of – I don't know – being treated fairly. One of my jobs as a social worker was to honour them, to believe them, to support them, to help them kind of take that apart and understand why what happened to them wasn't okay and that they don't have to be in relationships like that. They're adults now. They have their own autonomy. They don't have to make that okay. I mean, that's the thing. A lot of times people who are survivors of abuse sort of make it okay what their abuser did. That, of course, is not okay.

Only 1 in 10 women report this. You know, making sure that judges have that training, have that understanding will make a significant difference for survivors coming forward to share their stories and then having justice done, very frankly, Mr. Speaker, so that this can't happen to someone else. I mean, I know that many survivors say: I came forward because I didn't want this to happen to anybody else. Good for them. They put themselves in harm's way, but good for them.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Second reading of Bill 14.

Ms Issik: Third reading.

The Speaker: Oh. Correction. Third reading.

Are there others? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to this bill. I am speaking to this bill in the month of May, which is sexual assault awareness week. To that end I'm going to begin my comments about this legislation and the necessity for it with a story from one of my constituents. I'm just scrolling through to pull it up here. It's a social media post. The post itself was made to support a fundraising effort for the child and youth advocacy centre, a place where children who have experienced sexual assault or sexual abuse trauma can go for better counselling services and an appropriate approach to supporting children through many of these traumatic events.

My friend Melanie works with her husband, Courtney Atkinson, at one of Lethbridge's largest real estate firms. In fact, the Atkinson Team at EXP Realty Lethbridge and the Atkinson Team at EXP Realty Medicine Hat have committed $100,000 to the child and youth advocacy centre to assist with their building costs.

Melanie's post notes:

Kristine Cassie and Cheryl Pollmuller, among others, have raised enough awareness and money that the CYAC is currently functional with counseling services.

That is a good thing, that certainly began some years ago.

But the Centre is seeking monetary donations which will be used towards completing the physical space. A space that will make kids feel safe, comfortable and heard.

I'm going to just read really quickly from what happened to Melanie and what she was brave enough to share with the community in service of making sure that we have these sorts of support services available to people of any age but, in particular, children. She writes:

As a very young girl I was sexually abused . . .

While I won't share the details of the abuse, I am going to share my experience regarding the process after the abuse was identified.

In the early 80s there wasn't much for education surrounding sexual abuse, in particular, what to look for, what to say, or how to support victims, particularly children.

At least as Melanie writes from her experience.

When [the person in question] was found to be a molester, I was taken to meet a social worker in a very clinical, dark and unfamiliar space. It was scary, uncomfortable and being there for 1 hour, I asked to never go there again. I was introduced to the social worker, taken from my mom and placed in a mahogany office alone with someone I had never met. From there I was given 2 dolls and asked to replicate the abuse. I . . . left without any understanding as to what or why that was happening. The [counsellor] meant well and the environment created was a product of knowledge at that time.

She writes:

My quietness, discomfort and stubbornness to go back for further sessions no doubt resulted in [the man's] 1 week jail time. I'm not sure if he was convicted, but I do know he [did continue] to abuse.

Things have changed drastically since then,

Melanie points out,

but the change needs [our] help.

This post then goes on to ask our community in Lethbridge and in southern Alberta to support the Chinook Sexual Assault Centre's efforts to fully fund the child and youth advocacy centre.

Melanie writes at the end:

I can tell you first hand that had there of been a CYAC things would of been [very] different. How I was approached would of been different. The safety I felt in sharing my story would of been different. The outcome would of been different. [The man in question] would likely of received a harsher conviction (if he received one at all) and less chance of abusing more kids.

I share that, Mr. Speaker, number one, because it is my job, first and foremost, to come to this place and share the stories of my community, and that is one. It came across my radar relatively recently because I have the honour and the privilege of being a friend of Melanie's. There are very few community endeavours where you don't see her and her partner, Courtney Atkinson, and Atkinson realty in some way, shape, or form trying to do what they can to build community, whether it's in the arts, in social services, as we saw, or in downtown revitalization efforts. I want to make sure that during this sexual assault month of May we honour and lift up those voices, not only the stories of what has happened but what people are trying to do make it better and how people are channelling their impatience with what has gone before, with the injustice of what has gone before, into doing something good.

So here we see where the system failed this particular child in the '80s. I think it does not defy imagination that the system, quote, unquote, in many ways likely continues to fail children and their families and certainly other survivors of sexual assault and sexual abuse. This is why we need an appropriate counselling and support system in order to make sure that justice is both done and seen to be done and felt to be done by the community, the family, and the survivors themselves.

I will table later on the recommendations to the government from the Alberta Association of Sexual Assault Services. They provided recommendations some months ago to the government around the uses of the victims of crime fund and appropriate counselling and support services for victims. Why is this important and germane to this bill?

When I read through the language of the act, Mr. Speaker, it struck me that we are spending this time making sure that judges have the support that they need, but we still struggle with how to ensure that victims of crime have the support they need. You know, judges get all this professional development training, and that is good and right and nobody is saying there's a problem with it. This bill is good and right and I think is a step in the right direction, coming as it does out of certainly anecdotal stories that I have heard of survivors coming forward and how they go through the criminal justice system but also even stories that have hit the headlines coming out of our own province over the years: Justice McClung and the other fellow that saw fit to write some fairly egregious things in his decision. Certainly, action had to be taken by the federal Justice minister, because he was completely unfit to be hearing such cases and had no comprehension of the concept of trauma, victimization, and so on. So this is good.

In my view, there are a number of ways that both the federal government and the provincial government need to act to make sure that justices at all levels, whether it's Provincial Court, QB, or elsewhere, have the appropriate training in place. I'm glad that the government has taken action in this way.

The victims' rights movement in the United States came out of a development through the 1970s of two things. One was sexual assault and domestic violence survivors, primarily women, and the women's movement in the 1970s finding that they were not appropriately heard when they got into court, if they ever did. We note, in the background provided by the Alberta Association of Sexual Assault Services, that it remains the case that in only 5 per cent of instances of sexual assault survivors in Canada report to police, and the rate of attrition in sexual assault cases through the criminal justice system is very high. This obviously was also the case, and the women's movement grappled with this issue in both Canada and the United States.

But then there was in the United States one event that precipitated even more action around the concept of victims' rights, and that was the assassination of Harvey Milk, who was the first openly gay elected person, as far as we know, certainly in the United States and quite possibly in Canada as well – this was in the 1970s – and, really, in North America. He was assassinated by one of his fellow Board of Supervisors members in San Francisco – the city is run by a board of supervisors, not by a city council; anyway – and Mr. Milk's murderer got off very lightly through the criminal justice system. There was an incredible just roar of action across the continent about what happened and how the justice system dealt with that murder. As a result, that confluence of LGBT activists and the women's movement through the 1970s then became a societal push.

Now, what ended up happening, of course, through the 1980s was that this narrative of victims' rights was then sort of appropriated for a long time, you know, became an excuse for excessive criminalization and incarceration such that the United States now finds itself with the highest levels of incarceration, really, in the industrialized world, certainly among democracies. But the kernel of it remains that victims of serious and egregious crimes both need to have an appropriate support through the criminal justice system, and justice needs to be done by a criminal justice system that understands the trauma and the harm that has been caused to people and the life-altering effects of those crimes upon people.

You know, fast-forward to 2021, and here we are in the fall of 2021 with the Alberta Association of Sexual Assault Services proposing six recommendations for a new Alberta victim assistance program that are specific to victims of sexual assault and sexual abuse in Alberta.

One of them is the approval of applications and adjudications of any appeals taking into consideration the unique characteristics of sexual assault trauma and the barriers and challenges that victims face as a result of the societal context of sexual violence in our province.

There are a number of other recommendations in terms of victims of sexual offences being eligible to apply for benefits with no timeline restrictions based on when the crime occurred and being excluded from application timelines that may apply to other offence categories.

Recommendation 3 is that the new program be a hybrid system that allows victims to access funds and community-based programs and services directly and also provide lump-sum payments to victims of sexual assault and sexual abuse; that the fund categories be expanded to include financial support during and after court proceedings.

Again, these recommendations have not been taken up by this government, and it has been almost two years since the victims of crime fund was raided to pay for other, no doubt virtuous, undertakings by government and public expenditure, that being, of course, the expansion of Crown prosecutors. That is fine, Mr. Speaker, but we have left victims behind. I wish that the government would take up their support of victims with as much enthusiasm as they bring forward this bill.

There is no question that victims of crime, particularly egregious crimes of sexual assault and sexual abuse, continue to require that support, and it is owed to them. We owe it to them as a society. We owe all kinds of other things, too, such as better education, better overall antipoverty strategies, as the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview pointed out, in terms of what we owe in terms a society to take care of one another and prevent these things from happening in the first place. Once they are in that criminal justice system, we need to make sure absolutely that judges are disabused of their preconceived notions, stereotypes, and so on but also that we as a society have done everything we can to repair the damage that has been done to victims.

The victims' rights movement in the first instance was about ensuring that people who are victims of intersectional violence and abuse, coming as it does out of the LGBT and women's movements of the 1970s – we owe it to ourselves to remind ourselves of that history and to move forward knowing what we know and doing better.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others at third reading? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is an absolute pleasure to speak to this bill, Bill 14, Provincial Court (Sexual Assault Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022. When I did get up to speak to this bill previously during second reading, it was near the end of the morning and I didn't have a lot of time to put some ideas on the record, so I'm very eager to get some on the record now.

Last time I spoke to this, I had ended by saying that, you know, I was raised by a wonderful mother. She was a strong Latina feminist. I was mentioning that she was the kind of woman that didn't take any – how could we put it? I'm thinking of a specific word.

An Hon. Member: Crap.

An Hon. Member: Guff.

Member Loyola: Yeah. Okay. I'll go with that. It was said for me. That's the one. I was thinking another word.

She was super serious and super straight. You know, at a very early age my mother would tell me: I'm not your maid. She would make me wash my own clothes, iron my clothes, do things around the house.

I remember having discussions with my mother about how, you know, things are changing. She expressed to me one time that there have always been individuals, regardless of if they're women or men, who just believe in a fair society. To my mother, the problem, amongst the many others, when it came to the relationship between people of different genders was, of course, patriarchy when it came to her own personal experience. I think that's the real problem, the underlying cultural, political, economic, social problem that we really need to address as a Legislature. Now, we have so much work to do.

Of course, this bill addresses one particular aspect of our judicial system. I will argue that it does not go far enough, but before I do that, Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to get a definition of patriarchy on the record so that we can think about this. It's defined as "a system of social structures and practices, in which men govern, oppress and exploit women." I go back to the comments of my mother and think that, well, you know, there have always been individuals who have been against the oppression and exploitation of women, but those people just haven't been in positions of power to actually change the law, to actually make a difference in changing the way that women are viewed in our society. I'm grateful that we've come a long way, but I would argue that even back then there were people who knew that it was wrong, but they just weren't the majority in order to make the change happen.

Now, the fact that women used to be considered property of a man: there were people who were against this. There were people who were against it, but they just weren't in positions of power to make it into law to recognize the sovereignty of a woman and the rights that a woman has. Now, luckily, we've made significant advances, and I think it has been because of the juxtaposition of patriarchal power and those who are consistently challenging it, those who see that it is wrong to have a patriarchal mentality – by that, I go back to the definition – that think that somehow it is appropriate to govern in terms of oppressing and exploiting women, that somehow that is right.

I want to be firm on the record and say that, you know, this is an all right piece of legislation for me. It's all right. It's definitely a step in the right direction. However, one of the things that I haven't heard in debate up until now and defended by the government or anyone in cabinet is why the existing judges don't have to go through this training. Like, that's what I find just highly questionable. If you agree that sexual assault awareness training is indeed necessary, why is it, then, only applicable to new hires into the judicial system? I just can't understand that, that somehow, you know, those that have already been in the system are somehow grandfathered in and they aren't going to have to go through the training. Those are the people that indeed need to be changed, need to understand that this is something very important in order to address it. As has been described by several of my colleagues on this side of the House, we're dealing with the actual impact on survivors of sexual assault.

The other aspect that I find questionable is that – I believe it was last night in committee – there was an actual amendment that talked about involving individuals who are sexual assault survivors. This was actually turned down by the members on the other side of the House, and I can't understand why. Why wouldn't you want to include individuals who are survivors of sexual assault and make sure that they're involved in any kind of educational program, especially for judges? Of course, this is an education program that – perhaps everybody who is in the public service should have to go through an educational program like this. I think that we really need to question ourselves as a Legislature on all the work that needs to be done in order to really rid our society of patriarchy and the oppression and exploitation of women. We have a long way to go. A long way to go.

You know, I don't want to get too partisan on this, but there are a lot of questions that I have when it comes to the actions of this government. It's important that we address these, but of course I haven't heard in the debate responses to these particular queries. I think that the Alberta public is due these answers, and it's really important.

We know, for example, that at the federal level there's a private member's bill before the House of Commons that seeks to update the federal legislation that mandates sexual assault law education and social context training. It was introduced on February 7 of this year.

Why did the associate minister choose to leave intimate partner violence out of the scope of this legislation, particularly since tracking the rates of police-reported intimate partner violence is one of the performance indicators of the Associate Ministry of Status of Women? You know, this is an important one. I think that it's really important to address that, well, all kinds of sexual abuse, sexual assault. All of that is enabled, I would say – that's the word that I'm really looking for – by a patriarchal system that somehow sees women as less in a society, so therefore it's okay to abuse them. That's the cultural context in which we are, Mr. Speaker, and that's the cultural context that a lot of individuals and specifically men in our society actually use to justify their actions when it comes to intimate partner violence.

I've heard from a number of constituents who, you know, are going through sexual assault experiences with their intimate partner. Police will show up at the residence, and rather than believe what the woman is saying and how she's been attacked or assaulted, somehow it's like the men are just allowed to carry on.

Even within our police system we need to, like, make sure that we are doing more to address and educate people when it comes to sexual assault awareness, especially when it comes to intimate partner violence. As was indicated by the Member for Edmonton-Riverview, Edmonton and Calgary are two of the worst cities to live in for women, and this is one of the factors. This intimate partner violence is one of the factors, so it's surprising that the associate minister would leave this out of the legislation.

The Court of Queen's Bench undertakes training for federally appointed judges and new judges. So then it begs the question: what body is responsible for the training of judges and justices of the peace in the Provincial Court? Who's actually going to take this on? That's why the proposed amendment last night was dealing with this. How is this going to be done? Who is going to participate? Are individuals who are the survivors of sexual assault going to be permitted to at least provide insight into the education program? I think that that's something that would've been really good for the associate minister to actually include in this piece of legislation.

Of course, as with other bills, I can only imagine that perhaps the associate minister will be like: well, this will be set in regulation. We on this side of the House are left to just having to trust, and the Alberta public is having to trust that the government is actually going to include this in regulation, but we have no indication as to whether it will be or not.

This bill legislates a requirement that in the future anyone seeking appointment as a provincial judge will be required to undertake sexual assault law and social context training. Who will be responsible for this training given that they are not yet judges? How much is this expected to cost, and how will those funds be delivered to the delivering bodies? How will it be guaranteed that the pretraining and posttraining will line up and ensure cohesiveness in the justice system, particularly for sexual assault and intimate partner violence cases? Of course, these are some of the questions that we still have, I would say, unanswered when it comes to this piece of legislation.

The Acting Speaker: Any other members looking to add to debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's nice to see you in the chair this morning. I rise today to speak to Bill 14, the Provincial Court (Sexual Assault Awareness Training) Amendment Act, 2022. Like my hon. colleague, I also want to acknowledge that today, May 5, is Red Dress Day. Today is a day that brings awareness and calls to all Canadians to speak about violence against Indigenous women, girls, and gender-diverse people. I think that that's important to note specifically regarding this debate.

This is a call to action, and I think that when we look at our judges and our justice system, there's so much that needs to be done, and I think that seeing a requirement for sexual assault and social context training in order to be appointed as a provincial judge is a wonderful first step. However, you know, I've been on the record before that I believe that this is something that should be extended to all sitting judges.

I believe that we in Canada have made progress when it comes to awareness and rights. However, it's fairly new still, Mr. Speaker. It wasn't until 2016 that we celebrated the 100-year anniversary of women's right to vote. I proudly wear my Mace pin that has the 100 years. As a woman in politics it's something that I absolutely do not take for granted. That's new in Canada.

I think that we need to ensure that the education is happening to those that have such an impact on individuals that have suffered often traumatic crimes. When we look at Canada and our justice system, it wasn't until, actually, January 4, 1983, that it became a criminal offence for a man's sexual assault against his wife. Nineteen eighty-three.

Unfortunately, there is still a marital myth that exists within our justice system. We saw in 2017 a justice use the marital rape myth in his decision between a husband and wife and whether or not a sexual assault occurred. His ruling quoted incredible, disgusting remarks about this marital myth. That's 2017. It was put on the record that it was clear to him that her allegations were an attempt to influence the family law proceeding that was before the courts at the time, that a woman couldn't claim sexual assault from her partner, and that the intention was to have an outcome and an impact on their family law court matter that was before the courts. I can tell you that this is something that occurs today. This was 2017.

There are many, many myths that exist around sexual violence, sexual assault, sexual harassment. There is so much language when it comes to definitions of consent and an understanding of rape culture. We're still at a place where it's upon the victim to defend themselves and to provide enough context and understanding about what's happening in this situation.

That's by the time it gets to court. We've heard in this Chamber significant statistics around sexual assault and sexual violence and sexual harassment. We know that for it to actually get to the court process is a very, very unlikely outcome.

There are so many barriers when it comes to individuals reporting sexual violence. When we look at sexual violence on men, the stigma exists to even tell someone that it occurred. We have a society that has so much judgment around sexual violence, sexual assault, sexual harassment. To be brave enough and courageous enough to tell someone and then, hopefully, that individual is believed: hearing the words "I believe you" can have such an impact on what happens next.

I know that as a social worker I participated in group training. It was a program that was between Children's Services and the Edmonton police, and it was specific around children and sexual abuse. I can tell you of the experience of listening to the police officers and the anxiety that they indicated they got when they received a call and it was child sexual abuse. Many indicated that they did not feel equipped to respond to that call. It's because there wasn't an education, there wasn't an understanding of how we support individuals that are reporting sexual assault. This training was for those that expressed an interest in wanting to come forward and have more understanding and be able to better respond to those calls.

When we look at Bill 14, it shouldn't be a choice. We look at the existing judges that are out there, and I think that having this training would be so beneficial to Albertans in better outcomes, and it would have a ripple effect on those that come forward, those that report. I think that this is a good first step, but it could be so much better, Mr. Speaker.

With that, I'd like to end my remarks. Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call the hon. associate minister to close debate.

Ms Issik: Waived.

[Motion carried; Bill 14 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 22

Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate May 4: Member Irwin]

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday has risen.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a privilege to rise to speak to Bill 22, Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022. It's a long name, but I think that within it we see some changes that are quite reasonable and positive. You know, in this bill we see some proposals that are likely to modernize Alberta's electricity grid and, if implemented, will likely have positive long-term impacts on our electricity system and impacts for Albertans across the board, whether we're talking about opportunities for investment or opportunities to have more affordable electricity. I've appreciated the debate that we've heard so far, and it's nice to be able to stand in this House every once in a while, not too often but every once in a while, and be able to agree with the decisions that this government is making.

Obviously, the idea of modernizing the system specifically in one key area we are talking about in terms of battery storage: it's an important step forward and something that is increasingly becoming prominent in terms of our ability to provide sustainable and reliable energy to Albertans and to all of the world, really. Again, when we look at battery storage resources, it seems like there is a lot of potential here, quite clearly, and also a lot of concern, I suppose, about the ability of it to disrupt the status quo, especially in a system like our own, where for so long we have been dependent on coal. We continue down a path of transitioning away from that, which is positive, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker. While we in the opposition and the current UCP government might disagree about how we get there, I think that through this legislation, specifically, again, around the opportunity for – providing a regulatory framework for, in this instance, battery storage is an important move and something that we need to move forward as quickly as we can as long as we get it right.

Now, I would highlight, as many other members, many other colleagues of mine have brought forward, that we had seen similar legislation introduced last fall. The government made a decision to essentially abandon that, and now we see it reintroduced six months later. I'd be interested to find out exactly what happened through that process, if maybe they got some pieces wrong, if some new, supplemental information came forward that they felt was important and was potentially missing from the legislation previously. I'd be interested to find out what has changed over that six months. Maybe the minister can answer that.

Again, while this legislation is incredibly important as we look to transition to more renewables, which is an important endeavour, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that we currently are faced with skyrocketing bills. While this legislation is important for the long-term sustainability, reliability of our system and ensuring that we are able to manage costs to consumers, the unfortunate piece that is missing from this government in terms of their own policies and direction is real support now, today, and in the near future to ensure that Albertans are able to afford their electricity right now, because so many Albertans have come forward sharing their concerns with the cost of electricity, the cost of utilities across the board. Unfortunately, we have seen a real lack of commitment on that issue from this UCP government.

Of course, they've removed caps that would have protected Albertans on their utilities, among many other issues that we've talked about in this House, also including tuition and automobile insurance. You know, these are all impacts or costs that are having consequences for Alberta families because this government is so unwilling to take action on those. I really hope that this government has been able to implement or pass legislation regarding rebates for utilities, that in the near future – it should have happened weeks if not months ago, Mr. Speaker. We've been talking about it for several months now, and the government has made that commitment several months ago, that Albertans would see rebates and support on their utilities, but unfortunately that hasn't been the case so far. Now that they have that opportunity, hopefully we will see that very shortly. Better late than never, I suppose. The fact is that thousands of Albertans are currently being cut off from their utilities. That is simply not acceptable, and this government must take action.

I will digress from that point for now, Mr. Speaker. I do want to get back to Bill 22 and look at some of the main areas that are being considered through this legislation. Defining energy storage is a big one and something that is incredibly important as we consider moving forward with the regulations and ensuring that we are able to set up a system that provides opportunities for companies to join in on this important work and to, I guess, have the certainty that Alberta has the framework in place to ensure that when they are coming to the government with proposals for whether it be renewable projects or energy storage projects, the framework is in place to support that work and to ensure that their investment is well placed.

Another main area in here is the self-supply and export piece, which is another very important piece of this legislation; beyond that, requiring distribution facility owners to prepare long-term distribution system plans, which will have to receive regulatory approval; and finally, sections dealing with the dissolving of the Balancing Pool. You know, when we look at preparing for the long-term distribution system's plans, again, this is an important piece along with energy storage to ensure that the market is going to work effectively and that it's sustainable and that we aren't creating any, I guess, undue issues as we transition to a grid that is more based on renewables and less on the traditional burning of fossil fuels or, specifically, coal generation.

Again, these are issues that we in the opposition take very seriously. It's important that we do make that transition, so ensuring that there is legislation and a framework in place is very important. Again, when we look at the move to define energy storage, the lack of definition previously prevented effective regulations and made these storage projects more difficult to move forward, so this will provide certainty to Alberta investors or investors that are looking to Alberta for opportunities.

Now, the International Energy Agency states that "Global installed storage capacity is forecast to expand by 56% in the next five years to reach over 270 [gigawatts] by 2026." This is an incredible figure, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, and something that we can't take lightly. I think that as Albertans we want to take part in this energy transformation, and we need to ensure, again, that the regulatory framework is in place to be a part of that. We see investors and institutions increasingly looking to opportunities to invest in renewable and less so in the more traditional generation, specifically again looking at coal. While we look to make that transition, it has always been a concern in terms of reliability, so the move to provide opportunities and a framework for energy storage is so important as we move forward.

Again, the main driver for this is an increasing need for system flexibility and storage around the world to fully utilize and integrate larger shares of variable renewable energy into power systems. There's no doubt that there are concerns about reliability with our renewable energy options. While Alberta is, I would say, one of the best places in the world to consider building a renewable energy project, whether we're talking about solar, whether we're talking about wind, there are issues in terms of ensuring that that system is reliable and available to all Albertans at any time of the day, no matter when they need it. So this move to define energy storage, again, is an important move that I completely support. But I do wonder as well why it took quite this long and why we saw the legislation come forward in previous sessions, about six months ago, I believe, and didn't see that move forward at that time.

I think that there are many opportunities for investors that will be enabled by this framework, specifically around the idea of value stacking and opportunities to potentially make more money based on when we are releasing that energy back onto the market. I can appreciate that as well, more opportunities for investors. Again, while we may disagree quite often about specifically how we transition away from coal-fired generation and how we support those workers in that transition and potentially even what projects we might believe to be the way of the future in terms of whether it's renewable and how we support those investors to bring their dollars and those jobs to our province, I think that, at the end of the day, with this legislation it is ensuring that there is a framework in place to support a sustainable energy market into the future, to in the long term provide relief to Albertans.

You know, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that while this is good news for our economy and our electricity system in the long term, Albertans are expecting more from this government when it comes to support in the short term for so many who have been affected by the pandemic. The job loss and the loss of economic opportunities have left a lot of Albertans feeling the pinch, and they need support today. Unfortunately, this government made the decision, again, to not extend the cap on utilities that we had previously put in place, and many Albertans are feeling that pain now. While I support this legislation, so much more needs to be done by this government because they have failed to support the Albertans who need it most. Unfortunately, right now many of them are facing power cut-offs. If that hasn't happened already, that might be happening in the very near future.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I'll take my seat, but I do appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022. I do see myself supporting that, and with that I'll take my seat.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Again, like many of my colleagues, I see the positive aspects of this bill and just wanted to summarize some of the things that are within my understanding. In this bill we have four main areas. There's defining energy storage, the self-supply and export, then we have the requiring distribution facility owners to prepare long-term distribution system plans which will have to receive regulatory approval, and sections dealing with the dissolving of the Balancing Pool.

Of course, energy storage was previously undefined, and this is largely because energy storage has traditionally not been a factor in electricity grids. The definition seems to enable energy storage projects, and the lack of definition previously prevented effective regulations and made energy storage projects more difficult to move forward. This will allow energy storage to be integrated into distribution and transmission, which could help lower transmission costs over time. Energy storage will also be important to guarantee reliability and lower power costs going forward.

On that note, I just want to say that for constituents of mine who have been focused on being as environmentally friendly as possible, who have even put solar panels up on their houses, on their roofs, some of them on the roof of their house and their garage, one of the things that they would constantly talk to me about is, "Okay; well, being able to be off-grid but then also being able to sell some of that energy back into the system," so this is an important step. I think that for those constituents that have been ahead of the game for a while now – I'm talking about constituents that have had solar panels on the top of their house for a decade if not two already, who made the initial investment a long time ago because they knew it was the right way to go – they'll be happy to know that this government is catching us up in legislation by actually defining energy storage, bringing that into the bill. I think that those constituents will be highly supportive of something like this.

Then, of course, that will truly help the industry as a whole or the economy as a whole, as it involves several industry players, to help move in that particular direction, which will bring us to more environmentally friendly practices here in the province of Alberta. That I highly encourage, what this government is doing.

The bill defines energy storage to recognize the unique role energy storage can play in our electricity system and support more energy storage projects to go forward, and then the Electric Utilities Act defines energy storage resource as the energy that is stored for the purpose of energy storage as separate from a generation unit. It says:

the component of an energy storage facility that uses a technology or process that is capable of using electric energy as an input, storing the energy for a period of time and then discharging electric energy as an output, and includes a share of the following associated facilities that are necessary for the safe, reliable and economic operation of the energy storage resource, which may be used in common with other energy storage resources.

In the Hydro and Electric Energy Act it defines an energy storage facility as "a facility that uses any technology or process that is capable of using electric energy as an input, storing the energy for a period of time and then discharging electric energy as an output."

The Alberta Utilities Commission Act brings energy storage under the Alberta Utilities Commission's process and clarifies how storage has to follow the rules and mandates of the electricity market. It enables storage as part of the distribution and transmission systems, but these storage facilities, owned by distribution facility owners and transmission facility owners, are prohibited from participating in the competitive energy-only market. They recover their costs through the guaranteed rate of return that they receive from other transmission and distribution infrastructure. So to go that route, DFOs have to prove that a competitive option is not in the public interest or possible. This does not currently apply to the transmission facility owners, of course.

The bill speaks of allowing unlimited supply with export. Of course, it defines, under the Electric Utilities Act, "production of electric energy on a property of which a person is the owner or a tenant where any of the electric energy is consumed on that property by that owner or tenant." Given the minimum scale of five megawatts this will likely only affect industrial consumers. Previously a self-supplier had to get an exemption to export. Cogeneration facilities that feed it back to the grid are an example of that. Homeowners with solar panels that sell back to the grid are not affected by this as the Alberta Utilities Commission has its own process for that.

Under Bill 22 companies that are self-supplying and exporting can be required to pay a tariff by the Alberta Utilities Commission. Previously self-supply and export facilities did not pay a tariff, which allowed them to lower their transmission costs, which then ultimately had to be paid by other consumers. If done correctly, this could lower transmission costs in the long term. So facilities that were operational before January 1, 2022, can apply to continue to be classified as industrial systems and continue under the rules that they currently operate. And certain facilities that technically fall under self-supply and export, but it might be desirable for them to produce electricity, can be regulated separately. Flare gas is one example that this may apply to. Nigel Bankes estimated that in 2020 around 5,004 megawatts of approved capacity in Alberta was classified as industrial systems. Alberta had a total capacity close to 16,000 megawatts.

The bill also speaks about, as I mentioned at the beginning, requiring distribution facility owners, or DFOs, to prepare long-term distribution system plans, which will have to receive regulatory approval. The model is in place for transmission. This can help with planning for the transition to increased electrification such as more use in electric vehicles, for example. Currently it can be the case that the person that causes a need for a distribution system update has to bear the cost, which could be a user of an electric vehicle. It does require distribution facility owners to consider nonwire alternatives where they are economic. The act does not define nonwires. The Hydro and Electric Energy Act definition of transmission line includes wires, which “means a system or arrangement of lines of wire or other conductors and transformation equipment, wholly in Alberta, whereby electric energy, however produced, is transmitted in bulk, and includes” the transmission circuits composed of conductors that form the minimum set required to so transmit electric energy and insulating and supportive structures, substations, and operational and control devices.

The bill also talks about sections dealing with the dissolution of the Balancing Pool. It allows an administrative fee to be charged to finance the Alberta utility advocate – the advocate was previously funded through the Balancing Pool – so the fee would go on Albertans’ bills, but it would likely be rather low or not impact Albertans substantially.

It moves the administration of small-scale generation from the Balancing Pool to the independent system operator. According to the government it is intended to work the same, and owners will likely not notice the difference. The Balancing Pool used to contract the bidding to an independent contractor. Now the independent operator will do the same and bid into the market the same way. It allows the government to designate an entity to make regulation with regard to municipality-owned utilities such as payments under the payment of tax under the Income Tax Act at the federal level or the Alberta Corporate Tax Act or other payments that would have gone to the Balancing Pool. Previously the power was with the Balancing Pool.

Of course, this is the, I would say, second reiteration of this particular bill. The minister took a while in having to bring back this particular piece of legislation. Essentially, the previous one was just kind of, like, abandoned. Now he’s brought back this similar bill, so I think it’s important to highlight the differences between the last bill and this one. Of course, the previous bill had no provisions dealing with the dissolution of the Balancing Pool. You know, rather than the highly charged rhetoric that we are getting from the associate minister, it would be ideal if he could actually bring insight into the debate on why this is being included now so that we could hear it from his own perspective. Under the previous bill there was no provision for current industrial systems to apply to continue under their current arrangements. So these are some of the questions that I have of the minister.

On that note, I would just say that the debate on this particular bill has been highly charged. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that on both sides of the House, you know, there’s rhetoric shared, I would say. But with this particular bill I have to say how disappointed I am because even right off the bat this minister has just attempted to create discord in the House. How can I say it? It’s just – well, what I will say is that the minister, including in question period, makes personal attacks on the critic for that position. I would really appreciate it if this minister could really stick to the legislation, as I have tried in debate on this particular Bill 22, to discuss the issues, understand why in this reiteration of the bill specifically he is going to be cancelling out the Balancing Pool, and the insights that he has gained from stakeholders, perhaps, on why that is the most appropriate move to make.

As I’ve mentioned before in debate, one of the ideological perspectives of the members on the other side is that by introducing competition, it will bring the price down. Honestly, since 1996 this has not been the case for a lot of Albertans. When we moved from the traditional system to the market-only system, it was promised that the price of electricity would go down, and of course that’s not what we’re seeing. Like, they’ve had since 1996 to actually demonstrate this would fail.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to this Bill 22, which actually makes a number of positive changes to modernize our electricity grid. I’m sure that, if done correctly, these changes will have positive long-term impacts. However, we have also seen that Albertans are struggling with the rising utility costs, and they’re looking for something in terms of relief that they can avail right now. The government so far has been dithering on that file, and they have used the debate on this bill to make accusations that somehow the rising utility costs are because of overbuilds in the transmission system that we are responsible for somehow, that coal-fired plants that were retired earlier than their actual retirement date, which was done under our government, are the reason for the soaring energy prices.

I will briefly touch on that, too, but let me say that the concept of energy storage is critical to a reliable and efficient electricity grid. It is critical to reducing GHG emissions. We have technology now. There are enough technological developments that we can produce energy, when conditions are favourable, through solar, through wind, and through renewable resources, and we can store it for later use. That certainly is a step in the right direction, and that will help us make our grid more efficient, more reliable, and more environmentally friendly. So that is a good step.

Similarly, I think the bill requires the distribution facility owners to produce long-term distribution system plans. Usually government doesn’t like planning because they believe in free market, but now they’re requiring those distribution facility owners to have those long-term plans through the regulatory process, of course. That will, again, certainly help us make our electricity system a bit more reliable, a bit more predictable. That’s about this.

They’re also dissolving the Balancing Pool. Again, that was the PC’s doing back in the day when they deregulated the market and gave sweetheart deals to their insiders through PPAs and all that. They’re now dissolving that. But six months ago they had similar legislation that they abandoned, and they never said anything about it.

Let’s look at who was building transmission lines. They often blame that they were built under our government. I was elected seven years ago today, and I don’t remember in those seven years that there was any major transmission project undertaken. So that must be before we were elected.

Back in 2009-2010 the PCs even granted themselves powers to approve transmission lines without any public consultations whatsoever, and that’s when they started building transmission lines. I was the critic for a little bit of this file, and the major lines – that is, the western Alberta transmission line and the eastern Alberta transmission line – were both approved in 2012, Mr. Speaker. For the record we got elected on May 5, 2015, so that was certainly before we were elected to this Legislature, before we were the government. That was their predecessors who went on to build these transmission lines. My colleagues who were then part of this Legislature – the Member for Edmonton-North West, the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, and the leader back then, Brian Mason – were all opposed to this. They all cautioned the government of the day that that will result in spikes in utility costs. But, no, they did not listen.

Somehow when the minister or anyone from the UCP gets up and says, “Oh, it’s because of the NDP; they built transmission lines,” two things come to mind. Either they’re completely unaware of this file, what happened, incompetent, or they’re not up front with Albertans about this. I find it dishonest that the government will try to kind of jam every blame between 2015 and ’19 and forget about the rest of Alberta’s history. Those transmission lines that the government mentions every day, that the minister mentions every day, were built by their predecessors, by the PCs, and we were opposed to those lines then.

The second thing. The minister even suggested: oh, well, they didn’t build it, but they didn’t cancel it. There is a thing called a contract, and when it’s signed – especially when they were signed by the PCs, they were so onerous and restrictive to get out of that it would have cost Albertans more to get out of those contracts. That’s what they have done with PPAs. The profit goes to private companies; losses come to the Balancing Pool, to be shared by all Albertans. That’s what they did with the Redwater Sturgeon refinery contracts. That’s what they did with those contracts for seniors’ homes. That’s how they used to write contracts. The profits will be privatized – they will go to corporate owners – and losses will be socialized. These contracts were no different. That was the reason that no government would be able to get out of those contracts.

Another thing that we get to hear is that we retired the coal power plants, and somehow that is the reason for energy spikes. Before that, again in 2012, there were 18 coal plants in Alberta, and 12 of those plants were shut down by Stephen Harper’s Conservative government, that the Premier was a part of. Twelve out of 18 plants: they were shut down under a regulation called reduction of carbon dioxide emissions from coal-fired generation of electricity regulations statutory orders and regulations 2012-167.

Before, I guess, talking about coal plants, I would urge the minister to learn his file, to read the developments, quite recent developments, that have occurred under federal and provincial Conservatives. There were only six of the 18 plants remaining. TransAlta, ATCO, and Capital Power: they own them. Not only did we work with these companies; we also worked and consulted with those who were working at these sites. We provided $40 million to make sure that those who work at these plants have an opportunity to get retrained, have an opportunity to adapt and be able to maintain their jobs with upgrading in other sectors; $40 million was spent on that.

Then government talks about $1.36 billion. Sure. That was the money that was pledged over 14 years to convert these six plants to gas so that Albertans have a reliable supply of electricity going forward. That was investment in our grid. It was not an investment like KXL, a pipeline to absolutely nowhere, just a blind bet on Donald Trump getting re-elected, $1.3 billion. That’s the background when the government gets up and says that we shut down coal plants or we built electricity grids and that’s why we are seeing spikes in the prices.

There is another thing. They never mention why we are seeing rising utility costs, and they’re so scared of saying that, and that’s that the corporate profits are through the roof in the last six to 12 months. Every time the minister gets up, he talks about everything but will never mention that there is that corporate profit thing that is reason one for rising utility costs. Then for the last three or four months the minister has been promising rebates, and he has not been able to get that right, get that $50 cheque. He has not yet figured out how to send that to Albertans.

So the changes, as they stand in this legislation, are good, but I don’t trust this minister or this government that they will be able to get it right. It’s important that we get these changes right and we make sure that our grid has storage capacity and, whenever we can, we utilize more wind, more solar, more renewables and save them so that we can use them at a future date. That will help us reduce our greenhouse gas emissions as well. That is good for our grid, and that is good for our environment as well.

How much time, Mr. Speaker, do I have?

The Speaker: Eight seconds.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call the question.

[Motion carried; Bill 22 read a second time]

Bill 21

Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate May 4: Mr. Shepherd]

The Speaker: Hon. members, second reading of Bill 21. It seems to me the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West is rising.

Mr. Eggen: Yes. Thank you. You saw my clue there. I had my mask hooked onto my glasses. I don’t know if any of you have ever done that, projected your glasses across the room with the elastic from your mask. I’ve done it several times over the last couple of years.

Thanks for the opportunity to speak to Bill 21. In reviewing this bill, one thing that strikes me is that, you know, with these red tape reduction bills – right? – it’s kind of like throwing a new coat of paint on a very old idea, an idea that I just generally as a legislator don’t accept, which is omnibus legislation from a whole wide range of different areas and departments and ministries, with no particular connection to one or the other.

Mr. Speaker, you know as well as I do that in using omnibus legislation, or in this case, as I say, putting a new coat of paint on it and calling it a red tape reduction bill, by having perhaps some ideas that have merit combined together in the same bill with something that’s obscure and probably slightly devious or even malicious, they cancel each other out. Quite frankly, if you have ideas that are all just kind of jammed together in what I would say is sort of omnibus legislation, then you’ve created something that is usually pretty hard to vote for unless you are just a well-whipped government member. Then, you know, good luck, right? So this is kind of that, I think, Bill 21.

It has 16 different sections to it, amending different acts in a whole number of different departments. There’s an Animal Health Act change. There’s a Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act change. There’s a change to the Cooperatives Act, the Education Act, health statutes, highways, the Local Authorities Election Act, the Motor Vehicles Accident Claims Act, the Municipal Government Act, pharmacy, provincial parks, lands, railways, residential tenancies, rural utilities, and surveys. The challenge: if you can find a thread through any of those things, I mean, good luck, right? Of course, the government will say: “Well, it’s all red tape – right? – and away we go. That’s what we’re here for, to reduce red tape.” But, you know, you have to look at each thing. You just can’t have a checklist and say, “We can measure how many regulations we’ve removed by weight,” somehow just putting them all in a box and weighing the box and saying, “We took out 15 kilograms of red tape, so that’s a good thing.”

You have to actually analyze these things and just make sure that there is no compromise to the public good and public safety and all of those things, why people have made regulations and laws in the first place. Sometimes laws are outdated, right? You might have a law around, you know, which wagon should give way on Jasper Avenue: oxen or horses? Maybe there are not so many oxen and horse carts on Jasper Avenue anymore, so you can change that law, right? But some laws work pretty well in perpetuity, too, around stealing and public safety, public health, and so forth. Let's just take a look at some of these and see what actually this UCP government is trying to do with Bill 21.

The first one is around the Animal Health Act, removing regulation and removing the need to report notifiable diseases within 24 hours from legislation down to regulation, so sort of downgrading this protection for animals and so forth. You know, we just don't have to look any further than the front page of the news to be concerned about this downgrading of protection to our agriculture industry, because, of course, we're right in the midst of an avian flu outbreak – right? – which is spreading across the province and the country and North America at quite a rapid rate, so any compromise to the obligation to report notifiable diseases and to do it in a timely manner is a cause for concern.

I remember – probably many of us do – the mad cow disease issue, right? It was really causing a lot of concern around our beef industry, and when the Premier of the day intimated that you shoot, shovel, and shut up, that didn't go over really well. Of course, not only was it compromising one of our essential agriculture industries, the beef industry, but it had an element of dishonesty and a lack of accountability built into it. Really, when we make laws here and regulations and so forth, that is what they are all founded on, which is reliability and security and trust.

You know, making this change to the Animal Health Act, degrading the reporting of the presence of notifiable disease within 24 hours from legislation to regulation, you've got to wonder what and why that is taking place here. Perhaps the minister can explain that to us.

The second one, the second section that I see, is in regard to the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act. You know, again, you don't have to look any further than the front page of the news to see that we've just witnessed the most deadly year on record for children in care, and then this red tape section is removing statutory time limits on residential facilities in the child intervention system, again just pulling up an electric third rail of concern that we have around the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act. This change says that it only will apply to renewals, but really, if this government was serious about only wanting this change to apply to renewals, they could have amended the act to state that explicitly. Instead, they've failed to do so, and again that whole foundation of trust is compromised, I would suggest. So concern number two. Just rolling through here.

The third section that is being changed in this Bill 21 is around the Cooperatives Act. I just want to know on these changes: have they been consulted on? Is it something that co-operatives have in fact asked for, right? There are so many different versions of co-operatives, Mr. Speaker, as you probably know, and they're engaged in so many different industries and not necessarily having a lot in common. Is there some particular part of the co-operative community in Alberta that was looking for changes? There are, in fact, 90 subsections that are making changes here to the Cooperatives Act, so it's not insubstantial.

One of the ones that's most significant is that the bill now would only require 25 per cent of members of a co-operative to have

Canadian citizenship as opposed to 50 per cent. I mean, I think that that is probably not unreasonable. I'm just curious to know what precipitated that, though. The government also is stating changes to make more use of electronic records and processes for a lot of the paperwork that's concerned around co-operatives. I mean, that seems pretty straightforward. Then there are lots of clauses that seem to update sections with new language, talking about directorships, commissions, and so forth.

Again, my question, Mr. Speaker, is just that this seems to be looking at specific types of co-operatives, and I'm curious to know how this was consulted on. Were these changes brought forward by co-operatives, or was it the government just presuming that this was some version of modernization? Are they just looking for ways to check that box to throw more regulations into the bin so that they can hit their quota of red tape reduction?

The next section that is in this Bill 21 is around the Education Act, and this is talking about private schools and the collection of tuition fees. We saw some quite public confusion when this was announced, some discrepancy between the red tape minister's version of events and the Minister of Education's. You know, again, I think that all that did was help to add to the confusion around the financing of different types of schools here in the province. It didn't help to clarify anything at all, really. Making this kind of a change – right? – in the Education Act as part of an omnibus bill, again, immediately raises suspicion amongst people as to what is being changed and why and why there would be confusion. Confusion, Mr. Speaker, of course, breeds suspicion always.

I'm just curious to know how the government managed to get so far off message. Were they trying one thing and thought quickly that it's not going to work, so they scrambled to do another? I'm not the only one who would like to know. I mean, it seems fairly obvious that they were trying to play some kind of politics, to curry favour with some groups, and all it really did was add to the confusion and uncertainty around education in this province.

The next section that this Bill 21 seems to be dealing with is in regard to the Health Statutes Amendment Act. I have never heard the minister – probably the Health minister would be better to explain it and not add that confusion of two ministers, like we saw with the Education Act changes. Why is this necessary? You know, this was an amendment act that just came through here last year, right? I seem to remember debating it, so it's not a very old one. I'm just curious to know what the changes are.

I mean, again, this could be something that could be part of a miscellaneous statutes act, right? That's another common tool that's used in parliamentary systems. What you do, in case you don't know, folks out there, is that you talk to all parties in the Legislature, in this case the Official Opposition, and you make an agreement beforehand so that the miscellaneous statutes don't get in the way of more substantial debate that needs to be taken here in the Legislature, right?

Instead, we seem to be blurring those lines by building this new thing, which is really an old thing, as I said, a new coat of paint on this red tape reduction scheme that the government has come up with. Really, something like this could belong in a miscellaneous statutes act, which, I suspect, will still come forward here, Mr. Speaker, before the end of this legislative session. I fully expect we will see one of those. Maybe this section 5 could have been part of that. It's entirely possible. Some free advice from me, through you, to the government.

The next section, the Highways Development and Protection Act, seems to be something that we have no concern about. But, again, using that suggestion that I just put forward, when you're making such a minor change like this, just throw it into a miscellaneous statutes act, have a prior agreement with the Official Opposition, and Bob's your uncle, right? That's the way you do it.

The next section is the Local Authorities Election Act, section 7: again, you know, fairly straightforward, talking about making the campaign disclosures for municipal and school board elections. It's interesting that the Edmonton municipal political contribution lists were just kind of coming out here today in the news. Again, this is absolutely essential information for people to see how much people are spending on their municipal campaigns and who is contributing, right? It is worth while to know, and it is certainly an important part of our democracy. Any time you have a campaign on any level, even if it's a leadership campaign, and you are not properly disclosing who is financing that leadership campaign, then it compromises the integrity of that election, and it compromises people's trust again. You know, we don't have to go any further than to look at the outstanding campaign contribution files that should have been disclosed by the UCP during their leadership campaign. As these things hang on for years, so grows the lack of trust and the greater suspicion, like, of what was really going on.

Again, moving forward on the red tape reduction, section 9 . . . [Mr. Eggen's speaking time expired] Oh, dear. Time flies when you're having fun, eh?

The Speaker: Hon. members, the bill before the Assembly is the red tape reduction act. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to join the debate on Bill 21 – the book, really – Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. Yeah. It's a little over 100 pages, so it really had to be bound. This is an omnibus bill, of course. It seems like the ministry of red tape reduction is responsible for – I haven't kept count, actually, but there have been several of these bills. You know, it's always interesting to me to see what difference it makes when the UCP was in opposition and when the UCP is in government. When they were in opposition, if we dared to bring any kind of omnibus legislation, even a couple of acts together to present a bill, they would cry foul and say: "This is way too much legislation to have together. This is way too much for us to have to analyze. It's unfair of the government. You're ramming this through, and this isn't okay." But, as I said, we've had several of these omnibus bills from specifically the red tape ministry.

You know, it's just very cavalierly done; as the member before me spoke, saying that it's like 15 different pieces of legislation that are sort of all put together in this bill without necessarily any congruence, any relatedness. Some of it is administrative, certainly, but other parts of it make a significant difference, and other parts of it are just plain confusing. So for us to understand the legislation, I think it's important for the government to, you know, parse that out, make sense of it for Albertans because if we as legislators need to tackle this, I mean, the average Albertan is certainly going to be confused by the magnitude and, yeah, the confusing things.

Even ministers of the government have said that are not – you know, one minister said one thing, and one minister says the other, and they're not the same. Let me just say that, you know, it really questions the competence of this government. Certainly, I know that the UCP wants us to trust them, but unfortunately so many times they are not trustworthy, and that is a great tragedy. We want our governments to be trustworthy, and we want them to fulfill on what they say they will and have integrity, but sadly it seems like that's not the playbook of this government.

I'm going to start with the public lands piece of this legislation because I think this is perhaps one of the key issues with this legislation. The changes proposed will, you know, sort of create a patchwork of rules and weaken environmental protections. This isn't our Official Opposition saying this, necessarily. It's the Canadian Parks and Wilderness Society. They certainly expressed a deep concern, and they want certainly to be heard by the government. They want consultation before adopting this legislation into law.

What they identify: some of the issues are just the breadth of the changes. It's so tremendously broad. You know, to hear the minister speak, it's just like: oh, it's just about changing a few signs in a particular park. Mr. Speaker, that's ridiculous. It's not about that, and you can see that right in the legislation. I'm just looking on page 95, and it just says:

Minister's directives and codes

1.2 The Minister may set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines, objectives or other rules relating to any matter in respect of which a regulation may be made under this Act.

Well, that's not just changing signs, Mr. Speaker. That's just government rhetoric. This is a profound shift and gives the minister extraordinary powers that, you know, he doesn't have any oversight regarding.

Of course, this is an organization, the Canadian Parks and Wilderness Society, that cares very much about Alberta parks and is dedicated to making sure – and they are certainly one of the stakeholders that should be consulted with. They're asking the government: please let's meet to discuss this because this seems to be much broader than certainly indicated by the talking notes of the minister. Of course, the issues are the breadth of the changes, so broad, going well beyond the changing of the signage, which is what the minister wants us all to believe.

I'll just say once again that we know we can't trust what the minister is saying. Certainly, the society is concerned that inappropriate recreational usage may create conflict for Albertans using public lands. There could be quite distinct and different expectations, rules, guidelines – what are all the things? – objectives at individual parks. You know, they went to one provincial park last weekend, and now we're going to another one this weekend, but actually you can't do those same kinds of activities, so who's going to enforce all of that? Is that just going to be left to regular Albertans to try to say, "Well, I'm just here to ride my bike"? Someone else has a motorized vehicle of some sort, and they think that they can both coexist, and sometimes the coexistence is difficult. Having no continuity will create some havoc, I would say.

I do want to, you know, I guess, commend the government to listen, to listen to the Canadian Parks and Wilderness Society, whose, I think, concerns are quite valid. Certainly, our critic for Environment and Parks has concurred with the concerns that have been presented and has spoken about that. I do recommend that the government listen and make sure that they're not creating more problems. Hopefully, legislation changes are improving our province, not creating more havoc in our province. That is a significant part of the bill that I think is questionable and certainly is of concern.

I guess one of the concerns of this government for me is just that they have continued to give ministers extraordinary powers in areas that show no oversight. I know that Bill 78 gives the Minister of Seniors and Housing – she can designate affordable housing. What's affordable housing? She gets to just decide that, and that can have huge implications for funding, for support, for people having access to affordable housing. You know, this is something that we've seen previously from this government, and I just caution them that again they are doing that with little oversight. Will they be creating more confusion and concerns rather than helping the situation? Despite the minister's comments it is much more than just changing a sign. It is very, very broad, what they're indicating they will have the power to change or the minister will have the authority to do.

We also know – again, this is another area of the bill, the Animal Health Act. It moves important pieces of legislation into regulation. Why is that? Why is information that was in legislation being moved to regulation? I mean, obviously, something that is in legislation: it's statutory. There's an accountability piece that's very strong compared to something that's in regulation. Like, a minister can just change whatever is in a regulation. They don't have to present that regulation here in the House. We don't have to – you know, it doesn't have to be seen by all members of elected office here in this Legislature, whether you're in opposition, whether you're independent, whether you're part of the government. It can be done behind closed doors. That's the key piece with legislation: it makes it transparent, we all get to see what it is, and Albertans, of course, can tune in and see what's going on. Reporters cover issues so that we understand what is going on.

But when you move information from statutory legislation into regulations, then people may not know about it, and it can be kind of sequestered away, secretly done, and then where is the accountability? When this is being done in the Animal Health Act, section 1, we ask about accountability. Why is the government doing that? We want to make sure – I mean, I know that the UCP has certainly said that they want accountability. They want things to be transparent. You know, they talk a lot about wanting democracy – the more involvement the better – yet this flies in the face of that. It's sort of the opposite kind of a policy. I guess I ask all those questions, make all those comments to the minister regarding this because it seems like the opposite is true, that actually the UCP does not want to be accountable, and they're keeping things behind closed doors and giving extraordinary powers to ministers. Yeah, that's an absolute concern for me.

Let's move on now because we have so many bills to cover here. Let's go to the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act. This is a very important piece of legislation. Really, you know, my involvement even in being in elected office sort of comes from the work I did in child welfare. I used to be a caseworker and also a supervisor in Children's Services. It's now over 20 years ago, but I certainly was deeply concerned about how the ministry supported children in care. That experience really awoke my political concerns, and I wondered what the government was doing. I was concerned that they weren't very focused on caring for vulnerable children, supporting families to stay intact, to be able to overcome so many barriers to their healthy functioning. I always felt, when I worked for child welfare, Children's Services, that it was all about budget. It wasn't about actually caring about people or individuals; it was very much about budget. Consequently, I think it really awoke my political interest, and here I am today as an elected official because I had deep concerns about the choices of government at that time and continue to.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

In this Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act they are removing some statutory limits on residential facilities used in the child intervention system. We know that renewals will be only up to three years, but previously it was a maximum of one year, so moving from more scrutiny to less. Again, this is something that sort of surprises me a bit. Certainly, the UCP do like to express that they care very much about accountability, but, you know, having every three years as opposed to every one year a review of facilities that serve children in care shows less scrutiny, I guess. I wonder if that's a wise decision. I think that it was brought in back in 2003 because of multiple allegations of a lack of care, issues in the system, and that, of course, at the time was a Conservative government. There was a class-action suit, which the Conservative government lost, so they did bring in this level of scrutiny. It seems like, I guess, all these years later the UCP think that is not needed, but it may still very well be needed. I mean, tragically, we've heard certainly . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to speak to Bill 21? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise at this second reading stage of debate to provide some comments on Bill 21, a very large piece of legislation proposed before this House that makes amendments to a number of different acts. As has been observed by my hon. colleagues on the Official Opposition side, this is a sort of omnibus set of changes to various different acts, some of which do not rise much above the level of miscellaneous statutes. In review of this bill the majority of the changes, I would say, are less omnibus than they are omniboring, and I wonder about the job satisfaction of the red tape reduction minister, satisfying a deputy ministers' committee and some sort of bureaucratic metrics exercises, little relation to well-being and improving people's lives in measurable ways, which I suppose is why, you know, if a lot of the business of this bill could have been placed in miscellaneous statutes or close to it – some of it is still relatively substantive and, frankly, unproblematic but is very, very straightforward. One would think, then, that on the pieces of legislation that might arouse more public comment, public question, scrutiny in the media, and so on, the minister would have a much better understanding of what the legislation actually accomplishes in those areas where there's going to be significant public scrutiny.

I'm thinking here of the education portion of this legislation. Now, there is no question that education is vote determining for Albertans. Certainly, when I have been out on the doorsteps in Calgary and in Lethbridge-East and in Lethbridge-West, I have heard concerns about education on the doorstep from previous UCP voters who have assured me that they will not do any such thing once again. When I get that sort of feedback on the doorstep, it does remind me of late 2014 and into the first quarter of 2015 being out on the doorstep, when there were a number of cuts to the education system at that time, and sort of these, you know, middle-of-the-road kind of PC voters saying to me: no; this is vote determining for me, and I am deeply disappointed in the approach to the K to 12 education system.

You know, oftentimes what shows up in our public opinion polling – when you read the ranking of people's issues of most concern, when you read the public domain publications of issue ranking in Alberta politics and, frankly, across the country, usually one sees the economy and health care, often both federally and provincially, and health care is always a matter of concern for people, but the extent to which it's vote determining often depends on the social conditions such as a pandemic, for example, but also any changes that the government has made, or the public expects them to make, and they have not done so.

But education flies under the radar a little bit, and I think that because the other two issues are a bit more universal, sometimes we lose sight of the extent to which people really do care about the K to 12 education system. It's not just people with kids, like me. It's not just teachers or retired teachers or people who are working in schools as educational assistants or even on the custodial maintenance side or in school divisions. It's not just those folks at all.

The other day I had a guy I was talking to on his doorstep. He was a heavy-duty mechanic, and I said, "So what's on your mind these days?" He said, "Well, education, the curriculum, no question." I saw his kids running around, and I said, "Oh, do you work in education?" He said, "No, and my kids will be out of elementary school by the time they introduce this curriculum, and I'm a heavy-duty mechanic, but I really care about this issue and this one thing alone cements it for me." I said, "All right." He'll put up a sign, and that'll be great.

But that's kind of a long way to get around to saying, Madam Speaker, that I was, frankly, agape at watching the red tape reduction minister state one thing in no uncertain terms to the media and to the public, creating a great deal of confusion, and the Education minister or her staff or whoever tweeting out at, like, 10 o'clock at night a complete repudiation and a one-eighty on what was said a few hours previous at the news conference.

No one seemed to know what was going on in this bill for a good 24 hours until it was sort of clarified, and that was the minister of red tape reduction claiming that private schools – that is to say, schools where people have to pay a certain amount of tuition – will no longer have to produce financial data, like what it collects in tuition fees, and the Minister of Education bouncing up and down and saying: "No, that isn't true. Audited statements, including tuition fees, would still be required." Then, all the more confusing for Albertans, the government did produce a media handout stating that tuition fee data would not be collected, but then the amendments through this legislation make it quite clear that financial data will be reported. Well, what a tangled web we weave when we practise to not know what we are doing. It would be hilarious if it wasn't so sad, Madam Speaker.

You know, the minister of red tape reduction: all she has to do once a session is read through her legislation, figure out what it means, communicate it, and she's done. That's all she's got to do. Take the recommendations from the various deputy minister committees or whatever with their little metrics and their little beans and say: "Okay; throw this all into an act, most of which is miscellaneous statutes. I'm the minister of stuff that sails through the Legislature because it concerns itself mostly with commas." Congratulations. I guess you get a fleet car. Wonderful for you.

You know, but this piece, that is so deeply important to people in the manners which I have described, she couldn't get her head around and communicate appropriately. I can well appreciate that sometimes it's tough to three-legged race a file in government with other ministries, and that's fair. But this is just: read the talking points off the page and get it straight. Like, they couldn't even do that, right?

You know, for that reason alone, leaving aside the parks issues, that are fundamental and ultimately indicate that they don't want to bring forward a free-standing piece of legislation, if they want to actually change parks, we have some significant concerns with this bill, Madam Speaker.

With that, I will conclude my comments and move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 19 Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022

Ms Ganley moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment May 3: Ms Pancholi]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, we are on Bill 19 in second reading, on referral amendment REF1. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday rising to speak.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's an honour to rise to speak to Bill 19, the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, of course, as you mentioned, specifically on the referral amendment. I completely agree with my colleagues that this should be referred to a standing committee because the fact is that it's simply not ready, as I will get into. There are advocates within the industry who believe that to be the case in terms of it not being ready because, you know, we see some changes here, some more substantial than others.

First of all, I guess, I'll discuss the changes around voting to streamline and simplify the voting process, which are presented in Bill 19, and just start off by saying that I completely support what the minister has put forward and what people in the industry have asked for in terms of simplifying this voting process specifically for procedural things like accepting an agenda or, you know, moving minutes or things that shouldn't be burdensome for condo boards or associations. No doubt these are reasonable changes that are quite easy, in my opinion, to support. With that being said, if an owner feels that they want to have the more thorough voting process, at any point they are able to ask for that and it will be granted to them, as far as I can tell, through the legislation. So that is something that's easy to support.

Now, where we begin to have concerns are the changes that are being proposed by the minister specific to the idea of chargeback in this legislation. Of course, owning a condo is – well, buying a condo in the first place is one of the most costly investments that you might consider. It is life changing, obviously, and very expensive and in most cases a very positive experience, and living in a condo, just the same, is often a very positive experience. But we have seen and will continue to see forevermore, whether we support this legislation or don't or make other changes regarding tribunal systems, which I will get into – the fact is that it's a complex relationship that you have with not only your own neighbours, in the instance of living in a condo, where you have neighbours on potentially both sides, potentially under and on top of you. That is a lot of interaction to have, not only, of course, when you're living inside your unit and hearing the noise and whatever else is going on but also when you are sharing things like common areas, which are more specific to the idea of chargebacks in this legislation.

Now, I completely understand that condo corporations and condo boards and the industry as a whole are concerned about increasing costs based on having to take on losses that are potentially happening because of negligence from a condo owner or damages that are caused. I completely understand that. We've heard – it comes up quite often in the media and just in conversations – the idea of special assessments on condominium properties and how burdensome that can be to find out. Obviously, you're planning your budget and have an expectation of X being the cost of your rent or the cost of your mortgage, and all of a sudden because of something, potentially damage that happened to a common area within a condominium property, you are having a special assessment because of somebody else that's at fault. I completely understand how frustrating that might be. That has affected so many Albertans across this province, so we need to take action, no doubt, Madam Speaker.

Now, my concern comes from the fact that what we are seeing in this legislation in regard to chargeback is essentially a complete reversal of the responsibility, going from a process where a condo owner who is being potentially fined or charged by a condominium corporation or by a board is right now essentially innocent until proven guilty, and what this legislation is going to do is reverse that role and make them guilty until proven innocent. So if a condo corporation comes to them and says, "It seems that you created this damage," and they may or may not have clear evidence – and that is something that this minister has clarified has to be done through regulations, which I understand.

But, again, based on many decisions that this government has made and this minister, it is quite hard to accept things at face value and accept that the hard work of ensuring that the framework is in place is going to be dealt with through regulations and not come through the Legislature. That is always a concern.

We have this changing dynamic between the relationship and the ability of an owner to have due process, in my opinion, Madam Speaker. I understand, again, the frustrations that are here. When any other owner who was not responsible for the damage to a common area has to pay for somebody else's negligence, that, I know, can be extremely frustrating.

I would accept, I think, the idea of chargebacks – we see it in many other jurisdictions – if there was a framework for a dispute resolution mechanism put in place. Unfortunately, even though this government and this minister have been having these conversations about dispute resolutions or civil resolution tribunals – they have been having these conversations since 2020 but have not been able to bring forward, well, anything, let alone something substantial, to support condo owners as well as condo corporations and condo boards.

Now, again, my concern becomes that without the tribunal system in place, condo owners are not going to be able to defend themselves from these costs without going to court, which is truly unacceptable, in my opinion, Madam Speaker. First of all, the point of this legislation was supposed to be to reduce the amount of time spent in court. I mean, it's very possible now that unit owners are going to have to go to court to prove their own innocence, which very likely will cost more than the damage that is being charged against them in the first place. That's a concern. And the amount of time that we are going to potentially see spent in court for these things: while it might be reduced, I don't necessarily think it's for the right reasons.

With all the time that the minister has had and all of the resources and information that are at the minister's disposal and that have been brought forward and the education provided by so many people within the condominium industry and condo owners and advocates and managers – they have all been very clear, even with the introduction of this legislation, that what they wanted more than anything was to have a tribunal system put in place. Unfortunately, we don't see that. The minister says, you know, that it's not necessarily – let's see here. An Edmonton Journal article says it "is not at the top of the government's list of immediate priorities." Well, why, Madam Speaker? The top priority should be keeping these cases out of court, yet we are going to continue down this path.

We, again, had advocates representing condo owners coming forward. Specifically in this case, Terry Gibson, the president of the Condo Owners Forum Society of Alberta, told Postmedia that the delay came as a "big disappointment," and I completely agree. He goes on to say that "we've lost years" and it's not uncommon during disputes for collective court costs to hit $100,000. I don't think anyone wants to pay that kind of money for potentially a relatively simple or minor dispute. Whether it be the condo corporation or a condo owner, I don't think either side wants to continue down this path of going to court.

Unfortunately, this minister says that it's a matter of a lack of resources, so here we have a minister admitting that because they're not willing to put forward however much it might cost, the court system is going to continue bearing that cost, and the nature and relationship between condo owners, potentially neighbours, potentially the relationship between a condo owner and the condo corporation are going to continue down a negative path, in my opinion, in many of these circumstances. This goes on, I would say, to show the lack of vision within this ministry, lack of vision from this government.

We saw back in, I believe, January of 2020 that Service Alberta laid off 26 of their managers. When we talk about having the infrastructure in place to put forward civil resolution tribunals like the one that we see in British Columbia, something that, as far as I can tell, is working relatively well and keeping many of these cases out of the court and actually expanding the opportunities for both sides to hold each other accountable – it's truly disappointing, but it's not surprising because of the actions of this government, of this minister to reduce very helpful staff in their own departments, managers who understand these issues, specifically on the IT side of things. When we talk about comparing to British Columbia's online tribunal, I can only imagine that dealing with things like this, implementing systems like this becomes quite a bit harder if you don't have the staff in your own ministry.

I want to take a moment to look at British Columbia's resolution tribunal if I have time here, Madam Speaker, because the fact is that I don't necessarily think that there's that much work that has to go into this. Obviously, we need to consider differences between Alberta and British Columbia, which I'm sure is the case, but I don't think it should take several years to implement this because the fact is that there are systems across Canada that at least have a framework for us to consider. At least we could bring these tribunal ideas to the table and decide what we like about them and what we don't like about them.

What we can see from the Civil Resolution Tribunal in British Columbia is that not only does it deal with things of chargeback when damage happens to common areas, but it also deals with things like bylaw infractions. If a condo board tries to fine somebody potentially for leaving something in a common area, not necessarily damaging it but creating an insurance concern potentially or maybe a parking ticket fine or maybe, you know, you took a left turn into oncoming traffic in the parking lot of the condominium complex – I mean, there are many reasons that a condominium board or corporation brings forward fines when somebody is potentially in contravention of the bylaws, but again, there should be mechanisms and appeal processes in place for owners or renters of these condominiums to have their voices heard and ensure that there is a due process.

Again, not only have we not taken the first steps to ensure there's a tribunal process in place for chargebacks where there's potential damage to common areas, but we aren't even considering right now the idea of offering these tribunals for bylaw infractions as well.

Again, I don't think we have to reinvent the wheel here. I'm sure that there are amendments and changes that we can make to the tribunal systems that we see across Canada, but for the government to not have any plan in place, prepared to share with us and instead just come forward with this very one-sided proposal that takes away, in my opinion, due process or the ability for a condo owner as part of this dispute to have an appeal process is relatively one-sided, Madam Speaker.

I don't think that this legislation is nearly finished enough. I think it's deeply unfortunate that instead of finishing what needs to get done in respect to supporting condo corporations and condo owners and the complex relationship between the two, instead of finishing the work that has to be done there, the minister instead brought something that was half finished to this Legislature, which is incredibly disappointing.

I hope that in the very near future, even though the minister claims that it's not a top priority of this government, we see a civil resolution process come forward, because it will strengthen the relationship between owners and boards and corporations. It is something that is desperately missing from legislation and regulations in this province, and we owe it to these homeowners, which make up about 12 per cent of the population, as far as I can tell. Upwards of 500,000 people are in these condominium complexes, and they deserve legislation that supports them and ensures that they are able to have a positive relationship with every party involved.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to the amendment. I believe this is a referral amendment to committee, which I support. I have spoken to this bill once and want to thank my colleague the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday for his comments. You know, he's been our Service Alberta critic for some time and is quite engaged on this file and has spoken with a number of industry experts and leaders within the condominium space who have been weighing in on this bill and, quite frankly, previous pieces of legislation that were brought forward under our government as well as under the UCP government. I think it's very important for us to get this right. I know that there are a lot of different interests that need to be represented and balanced.

Here we have certain elements of this bill that, like my colleagues, I can support. You know, again, changes to the voting process to make it easier and more efficient I think are a great step to bring existing condominium rules and legislation into today's reality of being able to do so in an easier way as opposed to continuing on the same path of the past. That's a positive step forward. I appreciate, well, the changes to the voting: all of it, the changes under the unit factor vote as well as how unit owners can vote in meetings.

Now, the damage chargebacks that allow the condo board to charge condo owners for damage: I appreciate that the government has communicated that these will be small fees, but we don't know. Those are going to be left up to regulation. The challenge with that, Madam Speaker – you know, I'll go through the argument that government often gives, which is that if we put those fees into legislation and we didn't get them right, then it's onerous to bring legislation, through the process, back into the Chamber as opposed to regulations, where if we don't get those fine figures correct, then it's very easy to change. I don't disagree with that. The challenge is that those fees and those figures are decided behind closed doors by cabinet. Again, when we hear comments from government such as "Trust us" and "Take our word for it" and "We will engage," there's a whole host of examples where the current government has done the opposite and actually has broken the trust of Albertans and said one thing and done another.

You know, an example that is in the face of Albertans right now as we face record-high inflation: you have a government that campaigned on not increasing taxes, yet in the past three years user fees and costs under this government have shot up dramatically. I hope that members of the UCP shake their heads or at least feel a tad ashamed of the fact that their leader 20 years ago was screaming at the federal government for bracket creep, for deindexing personal income tax, calling it a sneaky tax grab and pernicious – I mean, there are many clips, and I encourage Albertans to take a look at that online, that show that he was vehemently opposed to it – yet 20 years later: "No. It's not a tax increase. No, no, no. It's perfectly fine. It's good."

Now, I'm not saying that people can't change their positions over time, but, I mean, give me a break. These are increased costs on Albertans, and with the accelerated increase in inflation that figure is close to a billion dollars that the Alberta government is taking out of the pockets of Albertans at a time when costs have shot through the roof, whether it's at the pump, whether it's on your groceries, on your utilities. By the way, I do want to just mention, Madam Speaker, that yesterday the government did talk about the gas tax rebate, but if the rebate is still going on – as of today gas is about $1.60 and going up – either the retailers have said, "Thank you very much; we'll pocket that difference and still charge $1.60," or that rebate has ended and the government hasn't yet told Albertans that it ended. I'm sure we'll get some clarification on that in the coming days.

Regardless, the supports that the government has provided to Albertans have been minimal. I mean, $50 a month on your electricity bill when bills have doubled for many Albertans is actually a joke, and if Albertans weren't in such a difficult position of having to afford groceries and keep their lights and heat on, it would actually be laughable; $50 a month, $150 over three months, doesn't even provide relief for the majority of Albertans for one month, but that was this government's solution.

Now, the tax rebate. You know, you could argue that it did have an impact for a short period of time for Albertans and help them, but as I've pointed out, conversations that were taking place on the radio yesterday were on the fact that gas prices have shot back up. Many people were asking whether that break on gas taxes was still in effect, because you can't tell. If it is still in effect, it's lost its benefit unless the government is going to jump up and say: "No. Actually, gas should be $1.73, and we're saving that 13 cents."

The point of this, Madam Speaker, is that times are very tough for Albertans, right? I mean, the other challenge that Canadians are going to be facing is that interest rates are going to continue to go up. I mean, everyone has forecast that those are going to go up. I know that yesterday the Federal Reserve bumped it by .5 per cent. I'm not weighing in on whether or not they should or shouldn't – I'll leave that to the experts – and I appreciate that these are efforts to combat the high and continually rising inflation rates. But the implication of that, what it means for the average Albertan, is that their borrowing costs have just gone up, so that also will impact their pocketbook.

All of this is built on the theme of the government saying: trust us. Where this comes back to this bill, Bill 19, and why I'm supporting the referral is because the amount that a condo owner can be charged will be decided in the regulations. That's the first challenge that I have.

The second is that there is no recourse or there is no process set out in this bill for condominium owners to have due process. There's no tribunal process indicated in this. Again, we have a government that has said: well, that'll come later on in the regs. Well, no. That should be in the legislation. It should be a law and not in regulations as far as what that process looks like. That was something, Madam Speaker, that the UCP government promised Albertans. They said that the tribunal process would be included in this piece of legislation, and it's not. That's the main reason that I'm supporting this referral motion and why I cannot support that this bill continue forward, because it's only half done, and a major piece that will impact condominium owners is, again, their right to due process.

I know that when we look to our neighbours, there is a tribunal process in British Columbia that has supported condominium owners and given them that right to a fair dispute mechanism. That's something that I can tell you, Madam Speaker. I was Service Alberta minister for about six months when we were first elected – I held the twin portfolios of Municipal Affairs and Service Alberta – and I engaged in a number of condominium consultations with folks. I know that there is a varied opinion on it, and I know that there are some challenges that exist within the condominium act.

You know, one of the things that we were working on as government was just that, that process, that formation of a dispute resolution tribunal, which is critical. Quite frankly, I believe that had we formed government in 2019, we would have already had that implemented. But here we have an opportunity for the government to tap the brakes on this bill in its current state. Let's bring in a few stakeholders by sending this to committee, and let's add that to the bill and get that dispute resolution mechanism into this bill. I'm confident that the opposition could support this bill with that piece added to it, because it is so critical.

Madam Speaker, with that, I will take my seat and allow my colleagues to continue the discussion on this, but I strongly urge members to consider voting in favour of this referral. Let's get it right, let's get it right now, and we can all celebrate together.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to my colleague from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview for his thoughtful comments. I will also be speaking strongly in support of this. You know that in 2020 on June 13 a huge hailstorm hit northeast Calgary, and people's homes, people's vehicles, their businesses – everything was destroyed. While I do not have many condominiums in my riding, there are a few. Mostly, the people who live in those condominiums are senior citizens, and they are people on fixed incomes.

After that hailstorm I was reached out to by condominium owners who thought that their corporation didn't deal with them fairly. They were slapped with those special assessments, and at the same time they felt like their corporation also didn't share what the negotiations were between them and the insurance company. There was clearly a dispute, and I wasn't able to help them much other than that the corporation was taking them to court, and they had to follow the lawsuit and go through the pain of hiring a lawyer – not that lawyers are not good, but legal fees and all that – and pursue the lawsuit. Clearly, there was an issue between the owners and corporations, and there was absolutely no mechanism whatsoever to resolve that. On one hand, now the corporation was incurring expenses on legal fees, and now the residents, who are mostly seniors who are on fixed incomes, are also forced to hire a lawyer and proceed with the lawsuit.

The reason this referral is important, that we do know – we hear that in our ridings – is that we do need a dispute resolution mechanism that is more accessible, that is more efficient, and that is less costly as well. And as my colleague mentioned, the UCP government promised that there will be a tribunal, and we do not see that tribunal in this legislation. I think that the single most important thing that condominium owners need is a tribunal where they can go and adjudicate these issues without going through the court. That will help us address these issues facing condominium owners and corporations. While this condominium ownership is not known to common law, it's a very unique kind of ownership. It comes with certain legal rights, responsibilities, and financial obligations as well, and having that tribunal will certainly help corporations and owners to efficiently adjudicate any disputes that may arise from those rights, obligations, and responsibilities.

The second thing, the reason I support that this bill be sent to the committee, is that the government is now giving corporations certain rights that they can take the owners to court. That will also impact court resources. That will strain our court resources, which are already stretched because of this UCP government's cutting the Justice department budget, because of the pandemic putting pressures on courts, and because of the Supreme Court decisions in the Jordan case. There are already so many cases that are pending in court. They are already stretched, and I do not believe that sending further matters, that could easily be dealt with in a different setting, to courts is wise.

The Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, hon. member, but the clock strikes 12. The House stands adjourned until 1:30 this afternoon.

[The Assembly adjourned at 12 p.m.]

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, we will be led in the singing of God Save the Queen by Ms Brooklyn Elhard. I invite you to participate in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

God save our gracious Queen,
Long live our noble Queen,
God save the Queen!
Send her victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us,
God save the Queen!

Statement by the Speaker

Red Dress Day

The Speaker: Hon. members, today we pause to recognize the National Day of Awareness for Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls and two-spirited people, also known as Red Dress Day. We wear red and display red clothing to remember and honour the lives of the missing and murdered Indigenous women, girls, and two-spirited people in Canada. I know that there are several members who have joined in recognizing this important day through their dress.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, joining us today are a number of very special guests in the members' gallery. They are the family of the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche. Please welcome his wife, Kim Jean, his daughter Annabella Jean, and their friend Kristin Morrison. I ask you each to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Hon. members, also joining us in the galleries today are three early childhood educators, who are guests of the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud. Please join me in welcoming them: Thula Sibanda, Ashak Bara-Morad, and Kathy Rickett. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Finally, members, there is a large group of students joining us from the constituency of Chestermere-Strathmore. Please welcome students and teachers from Westmount school. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Government Policies and Cost of Living

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, Albertans judge a government by actions, not words, and with the UCP Albertans get lots of words but virtually no action to back it up. There's no more clear example of this than the debacle this government has made when it comes to supporting Alberta families coping with the cost-of-living crisis this government created.

The UCP lifted caps that our government put in place to protect consumers and did nothing as prices began to climb. The Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity showed the true colours of his government when he told Albertans that his plan to support them was to do nothing. The UCP then announced their rebates, but after months not a single Albertan has seen one cent, and according to the UCP's own plan Albertans might be waiting until December 31 to see the electricity rebates that the Premier promised in March. As for the natural gas rebate that Albertans were promised in February: not until October.

This is more than just incompetence. This is what you get when you have a government that is reluctant to do anything at all to support Albertans in their time of need. They put their friends in the insurance industry before their constituents and let premiums climb by 30 per cent. They used a tactic that the Premier used to oppose in Ottawa, to use inflation to take a billion dollars from Alberta families. They decided to slash supports for disabled Albertans and seniors, taking thousands from them. They decided to make it harder and harder for people to get an education by slashing tuition, hiking interest rates on student loans, and levelling deep cuts on Alberta's postsecondary institutions.

This is a government that fundamentally does not care about Albertans, and their decision to delay these rebates for months just shows how true that is. Albertans know that while the UCP doesn't care about them, the Alberta NDP has their backs, has a leader and a team that will always put them first.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I hope that you will indulge me just for a brief moment. I did notice that the hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche's family snuck in just moments following the introductions, so I hope that you'll please welcome them. Kim, Annabella, and Kristin, please rise and receive the welcome of the Assembly.

The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Red Dress Day

Mr. Long: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Red Dress Day is held every year on May 5 in honour of missing and murdered Indigenous women and girls. Hanging red dresses or wearing red on this day helps raise awareness of missing and murdered Indigenous women, girls, and 2SLGBTQQIA-plus people. These are people who are loved and are mourned. We stand with the survivors and the loved ones of those impacted by this crisis.

Like Sisters in Spirit Day, Red Dress Day has been a grassroots movement to raise awareness about Indigenous strength and resilience despite the high rates of violence they face. People will hang red dresses in private and public spaces to remember those they've lost. Others will gather in places around the province to remember their lost loved ones, including in Edmonton today.

Higher rates of violence against Indigenous women, girls, and 2SLGBTQQIA-plus people stem from root causes that need to be addressed. Mr. Speaker, during my time as a member of the Alberta Joint Working Group on Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls, along with the other members, I had the chance to hear from Indigenous communities, survivors, loved ones, and families about how to address these urgent issues.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta's government is choosing action. We set up the Alberta joint working group to review the calls for justice that the National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls identified. The Alberta joint working group's research and engagement with families and communities helped clarify actions the government of Alberta can take to change outcomes.

We'll have more to say on this in the coming weeks, but I want to assure survivors and their loved ones that this is something that we take very seriously, and we are committed to getting it right to make real and meaningful change. Alberta's government has also established the Public Security Indigenous Advisory Group to help improve the safety of Indigenous communities, with Indigenous people playing a central role in developing solutions and strategies to improve public safety across Alberta.

We all have a part to play in ending racism and violence, so if you see it, call it out. On Red Dress Day I want families, loved ones, and survivors to know that we will honour those lost by working together to address this crisis.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Physician Supply

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On February 26 it was my honour to host the Premier, ministers, and many other local leaders to mark the official opening of the Grande Prairie regional hospital. The new hospital began accepting patients on December 4, 2021, and I was there at 5:30 in the morning cheering on the arrival of the first patients and the first ambulance dispatched to the new facility.

This hospital is a key investment in health service to northern residents, boasting 62 additional private in-patient rooms, five additional operating rooms, one dedicated to obstetrics and two dedicated to driving down surgical wait times for Albertans, and also a new state-of-the-art cancer centre with two radiation vaults.

Mr. Speaker, finally getting to this point to offer better acute and surgical care is a huge win for Grande Prairie and the surrounding region. However, I still hear from my constituents that it's hard to find a family doctor. Staffing challenges in rural areas have been a long-standing issue, and without accessible primary care, many Albertans cannot be referred to the health care services they need.

That's why I'm proud to see our government working for rural Alberta when it comes to recruiting and retaining doctors in rural communities. In the past two months alone two more pediatricians have been hired in Grande Prairie, and that's just the start, Mr. Speaker. The ministers of Advanced Education and Health are continuing to work with postsecondary institutions to train more health workers, dedicating spots for rural students. In particular, I want to highlight $6 million in funding dedicated to rural medical education, providing rural rotations for nearly 1,000 medical students and a two-year rural-based family medicine residency training program.

Health has been funded at the highest level in Alberta's history, Mr. Speaker, by this government, but we know that throwing money alone at the problem won't fix it, and that's why we're dedicated to system transformation to provide real results for Albertans. We know there are challenges, and we are dedicated to hearing them and addressing them with real action.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Red Dress Day

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today, May 5, is Red Dress Day, a day that honours the spirits of missing and murdered Indigenous women, girls, and two-spirited people. The red dress acts as a visual reminder and is a powerful symbol of the Indigenous women, girls, and two-spirited people who have been murdered or gone missing across this country.

1:40

Métis artist Jaime Black helped to inspire the red dress movement. Throughout the province you will see red dresses hung from windows and trees, a representation of the pain and loss felt by loved ones. The colour red was chosen by the artist after conversations with a friend who told her that red is the only colour that spirits can see. In the words of Jaime Black: it is a calling back of the spirits of these women and allowing them a chance to be among us and have their voices heard through their family members and community.

Today in Edmonton many of us gathered to march from Churchill Square to beaver hills park, many wearing red dresses to remember the loved ones that are so very dearly missed. For everyone who visits the Federal Building, one of the first things you will see upon entering is a red dress that was presented to the Minister of Indigenous Relations by the Awo Taan Healing Lodge in Calgary and created by artist Emily Taylor.

This is important because in order to truly honour the missing and murdered Indigenous women, girls, and two-spirited people, we need to take action every day. This means working with our Indigenous and Métis brothers and sisters to action the calls to justice from the final report of the National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls. That also means ensuring we learn about Indigenous-Canadian history from the Indigenous perspective, listening to the truths shared through the inquiry, and being an ally.

Today I encourage all members of this Assembly to visit the red dress and listen to the voices of the spirits and pledge to ensure their voices are heard and the genocide of Indigenous women, girls, and two-spirited people ends.

Thank you.

North American Energy Security

Ms Rosin: Mr. Speaker, in the wake of everything going on around us, we need to talk about the importance of North American energy security. Alberta is home to the third-largest oil reserves in the world. We produce 4.6 million barrels of crude per day, and we do it with the highest human rights, labour, and environmental standards. Now, there are those on the left who would have you believe we can just shut the taps off overnight and cease production, but at a time when much of the world has been unable to impose the sanctions that could truly cripple the Russian petrostate's war on Ukraine because of their dependence on Russian oil and gas, phasing out the energy sector right now is nothing more than a pipe dream.

Alberta recently had a visit by United States Senator Joe Manchin. Not only is he chair of the U.S. Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, but he is an important vote in an evenly divided Senate, a vocal supporter of oil and gas, and, Mr. Speaker, he's a Democrat. Senator Manchin is evidence that heating our homes, commuting to work, and manufacturing household goods should not be partisan issues. During his visit to Alberta's oil sands he was clear: North America could be the energy leaders of the world, but it can only be possible with Canada's help and alliance.

Mr. Speaker, at a time when the U.S., under Democrat leadership, is scrambling to fill oil and gas shortages, Senator Manchin is powerful, because honest recognition of the need for a true North American energy alliance is what the world needs. It's not a partisan issue. Our oil reserves could lift millions of people out of poverty and siphon away the funding stream of the Russia-Ukraine conflict if we allow them to, but we need international collaboration and a concerted, unified strategy. Canada has been blessed with an endowment of natural riches beneath our surface, and the world needs our energy now more than ever. With bipartisan international collaboration, one day we'll get it to them.

Early Childhood Educators

Ms Pancholi: May 20 is Early Childhood Educator Day in Alberta. It's a day to recognize and celebrate the incredible early childhood educators who are not just caregivers for our youngest children but are professionals in early learning and child development. I want to highlight one very special early childhood educator, Mr. Speaker, who is here in the gallery today. Thula Sibanda is one of 11 Alberta early childhood educators who was recently recognized with a Prime Minister's award of excellence in early childhood education. Like many educators, Thula has superpowers, and her superpower is always meeting each child where they are. Her teaching and care is tailored specifically to the interests of the child, empowering them to learn from play and to embrace their own path of development.

When I heard that Thula had received this extraordinary national recognition, Mr. Speaker, I have to say that I wasn't surprised, because my daughter was one of the children who, as a toddler, was lucky to have been taught and loved by Thula. With her today in the gallery is another former Prime Minister's award recipient, Ashak Bara-Morad, who was a big part of both of my children's early learning and a big part of our hearts. They're joined by Kathy Rickett, the incredible director at Edmonton northwest child care centre.

Mr. Speaker, early childhood educators are the foundation and most critical part of quality early learning, but it's a sector that is struggling profoundly. The low pay, lack of benefits, professional recognition, and career opportunities mean programs can't find qualified staff for existing child care spaces, let alone the 10,000 new spaces that are supposed to be created this year. Because the UCP has never believed in a publicly supported system of universal, affordable, quality child care, they've wasted over three years without addressing any of the challenges that would support educators and grow the workforce now, when we need it the most.

But the Alberta NDP has always understood that early childhood educators are professionals who deserve not just thanks but to be valued, supported, and compensated properly. We know that educators are the most important part of quality early learning, and we can't wait to build that strong system with them.

Congratulations, Thula. You truly deserve it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Camrose is next.

Sexual Violence Awareness Month

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and take this time to recognize Sexual Violence Awareness Month. Each year in May we focus our attention on serious issues related to sexual violence in workplaces, schools, homes, and communities in Alberta. We celebrate the work of front-line responders, who help survivors heal, get justice, and move forward with their lives.

Two in three women and 1 in 3 men in Alberta experience sexual violence in their lifetime. These numbers are horrifying. Given the prevalence of sexual violence I'm sure that many if not all in this Assembly have experienced it or know someone who has. Whether it's being catcalled in the street, hearing inappropriate comments from a co-worker, or being forced into a sexual situation by a partner, sexual violence must not be tolerated. Sexual violence strips you of your confidence, your sense of safety, your freedom. It's an attack on a person's most intimate parts of themselves. It leaves deep emotional scars that never truly heal.

Far too long society has ignored the warning signs and actions that lead to violence. It's time to fight back, and we always are responsible for taking action. These actions can be simple and ones that everyone can take. Learn to recognize the signs of sexual violence. Be an active bystander. Look to intervene or notify authorities when someone is being harassed or assaulted. Listen when someone confides in you and support them in finding the help they need to heal.

Alberta's government has introduced Bill 14 to help those seeking justice to be more confident in the system and ensure they are treated with respect. Throughout May Alberta's government will be sharing resources regarding sexual violence and what supports are available.

Many community partners such as the Association of Alberta Sexual Assault Services are hosting events. I encourage every Albertan to take part in this month and help build a safer province for everyone.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Federal Greenhouse Gas Emission Reduction Targets

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again I stand in this House in disbelief as I reflect on comments made by our federal leaders. Last week a federal Liberal MP said, quote: this country will be unable to meet its climate change targets by 2030 if certain provinces don't do their part. She called the inaction of Ontario's government irresponsible and, quote, a crime against humanity. Greenhouse gas emissions are a serious issue for Canada and the world, but it's no crime against humanity if provinces aren't able to help meet unachievable federal targets in eight short years.

Alberta has done an exceptional job when it comes to reducing emissions and continues to do so not only by reducing its carbon footprint but also by spending the time, the money, and the resources on renewable energy. To hear this Liberal MP knock on provincial efforts to reduce emissions and compare them to such horrible events is absurd. Earlier this year we saw their trust-fund leader Justin Trudeau call Canadians terrorists and bigots when they stood up for their rights under the Constitution. To see a member of his Parliament compare underwhelming climate change initiatives to the Holocaust is outrageous.

Alberta leads when it comes to environmental stewardship and conservation, but we're always under pressure by this federal government to do even more. Just last week I read an article showcasing how this federal government is unfairly expecting Alberta to carry the weight of reaching those emission goals. In that article, Mr. Speaker, policy-makers at Ag Canada said that they are concerned about greenhouse gas emissions from wheat, barley, and other cereal crops, crops that alongside our oil sands are a pillar to both the Canadian and international economies. Ag producers work extremely hard to feed us in a carbon footprint limited manner.

Alberta should not be the province this federal government continues to focus on when it comes to environmental stewardship. Alberta has made leaps and bounds in trying to reduce emissions. The federal government and their NDP opposition supporters need to reconsider how they plan to reach climate change goals if they continue to put down provinces like Alberta.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton Glenora has question 1.

Utility Rebate Timeline

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, Albertans need help with their utility bills today, but the UCP is way behind. It's been 93 days since the Premier promised natural gas rebates and 59 days since he promised to deliver electricity rebates. Today neither rebate is out the door, and Albertans have been waiting months, but the government now says that the electricity rebate won't be delivered until December, 200 days from now. Can the Premier explain why help for bills from January, February, and March won't come until Christmas?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. What an absolute despicable display from a caucus that has proven themselves to be as desperate as they are irrelevant. To frighten Albertans with categorically false information is disappointing. We had royal assent of this legislation on Friday; we handed the regulations to the retailers yesterday. In fact, we've moved at speed, and we've asked the retailers to do the same as well. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Ms Hoffman: I can see that the UCP is angry, but you know who's really angry, Mr. Speaker? It's Albertans who are waiting for help.

The Premier also promised that they would fix the fake natural gas rebate, but the government's own fact sheet says that it won't be in effect until October, 150 days from now. Can anyone in the current government explain to Albertans struggling to pay their bills why they should trust the UCP when the current Premier is telling everyone to wait five months before he might maybe possibly try to help do something?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, I'm sorry there's nobody in that caucus that knows how to read a regulation. If there was, they would know that that date was put in there as nothing more than a safety net, because we're going to be giving this rebate to 1.9 million Albertans and we know that there are going to be, out of 1.9 million, some that have moved, and for whatever reason they may have an issue. We put the date as far out as possible to capture every Albertan to make sure they get the rebate. We know the vast majority of the 1.9 million will get these rebates sooner as opposed to later despite what they may have to say.

Ms Hoffman: The UCP is trying to take a victory lap on this while telling families that their March electricity rebates might not arrive until Christmas. They are celebrating natural gas rebates that won't be in effect until October at the earliest. We are tired of this government that refuses to act. We asked them to put in a deadline by the end of this month, and they said no. Albertans are being forced to choose between paying their bills or buying their groceries. Instead of telling Albertans to get a better job or to wait until Christmas, why doesn't anyone in the UCP just pick up a pen and get these cheques out this month? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The Minister of Finance has the call.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are taking action on affordability. We are moving forward with electricity rebates, price protection for natural gas users, and we suspended the fuel tax. What I find hypocritical is that the members opposite introduced and brought in a carbon tax designed to increase the cost of electricity, designed to increase the cost of utilities, and then they sit there across the way complaining about the cost. This government is taking action. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Gasoline Prices

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, nobody trusts this Premier or his Finance minister to understand the struggles of regular working families. If he tried to put gas in his own truck, he would see today that prices have shot up. They're over a buck 60 across the province. Albertans are looking for long-term relief and actual help with the cost of living, but prices keep shooting up under the UCP. Why won't the government launch a third-party audit of gas prices to ensure that Albertans aren't getting ripped off at the pump?

Mr. Toews: Again, Mr. Speaker, we recognize that there are affordability challenges in this province, and that's why we're taking action. That's why we're moving forward with the electricity rebate, price protection for natural gas users, suspending the fuel tax. Again I'll make the same point: the members opposite, when they were in government, brought in the largest tax increase in Alberta's history, unannounced, the carbon tax, the carbon tax designed to increase fuel prices, increase utility prices, increase electricity prices. We're taking action.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, life under the UCP keeps getting more expensive. We're paying more for electricity, more for car insurance, more for tuition, and the UCP clearly doesn't care. The Premier cares more about photo ops where he pretends to pump his own gas than he does about how much it costs ordinary families to do the same. Why won't the government promise an independent, third-party audit of gas prices? Albertans can't trust the UCP to stand up for them.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a well-known fact that 60 per cent of the cost of gasoline is related to the cost of crude oil. The cost of crude oil is going astronomically high – it was a buck eight this morning – in part because of the European Union ban on Russian oil that takes effect at the end of the year. It's also a result of OPEC not increasing supply. The cost of oil is going astronomically high. That funnels down into the cost of gasoline.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, the current Premier jet-sets around the world complaining about having to take a yellow cab because back home he has a personal chauffeur. He drinks fancy whisky on the roof of the sky palace with his liquor cabinet while more than half of Alberta households are reporting that they are $200 away from not being able to make ends meet. Why doesn't the Premier come down from the sky palace, drive himself over to a gas station, look at the price of gas, and then actually do something about it?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, this government has taken more action on affordability than any provincial government across the nation. We've suspended the fuel tax – that's 13 cents a litre – creating additional savings for every Albertan . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: . . . offering savings to every Albertan every time they fill up their vehicle to go to work, to take their kids to dance, providing affordability relief for every senior and every business every time they fill up their tank. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Depending on the order in which you would like, the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Children's Health Care

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Overwhelmed: that is one Calgary parent describing how they felt waiting in line with their children at the Alberta Children's hospital this week, a line so long it extended through the doors to the ER and outside onto the sidewalk. We're seeing the impacts of the UCP's mismanagement of the health care system, and it's not good for Alberta families: wait times of up to nine hours. Albertans expect to see lineups of children at amusement parks, not hospitals. To the Premier: is he concerned by this event, and what action is he taking to address it today?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the hon. member for the question. During our media avail with Dr. Hinshaw last week we recognized that the system right now is under strain, and this is for a number of reasons. It's because we are actually getting through now on the other side of BA.2. We're coming down, but we're still going to see increased pressures on our hospitals. We're also dealing with the flu, which is actually adding to pressures. Plus, there's increased acuity because individuals who didn't go to their family physician are showing up at hospitals. We're adding capacity, and I'll talk more to that in a moment.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, the minister is right. There are a number of factors, and they are all factors his government made worse. Indeed, we're seeing rising COVID numbers coupled with the late influenza season, and that is impacting children. Indeed, Dr. Stephen Freedman, a professor of pediatrics, emergency medicine, called it a perfect storm. He said that the rising number of children presenting with respiratory illness in recent weeks is clearly linked to the lifting of restrictions. To the Premier: was this scenario ever flagged as a concern by health officials, and if so, why did they not take action to prepare for this?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, the system is under strain, and the system is under strain not unlike we're seeing across the entire country, not unlike we've actually seen in earlier periods where there are high instances of flu. But we are taking action. We know that we need to invest in capacity to be able to ensure that we can respond not only to other waves of COVID in the future but whatever is thrown at our health care system, and we're doing that: $600 million this year, $600 million next year, and $600 million after that. I want to thank all of our health care workers for the tremendous work they're doing. Relief is coming.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, this crisis is happening now. Indeed, Dr. Freedman also noted that a lot of Alberta children under five are undervaccinated against COVID-19. According to provincial data only 49 per cent of children five to 11 have received one dose; only 34 per cent have received two. This UCP government refused to offer vaccines in schools. They said that they didn't need to do more to ensure that that population was vaccinated. The minister promised that he was going to do more to get people vaccinated, but we have not seen much action. Will the Premier rise today, admit it was a serious mistake not to invest in this and one that is contributing to rising illness amongst children in our province?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, we have made vaccines widely available, and in regard to the provision of vaccines at school, when we did this for the older age groups, it was not very successful. We continue to urge all parents to get their kids vaccinated. We continue to urge all Albertans to get all the doses that they're eligible for, and I want to thank all Albertans who have gotten their doses so far. As indicated in the House earlier, we'll be running another campaign to increase the rates of vaccination, but we need to invest in capacity. That's the way we solve this. We are taking action, we are doing it, we are investing far more than any government in the past has done, and we will continue to invest in our health care system for . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Women's Reproductive Health Care in Rural Alberta

Member Irwin: Once again the UCP is letting down folks in rural Alberta, particularly those seeking reproductive health care. Getting ready for the birth of a child can be an exciting moment, but it can also be uncertain and anxious at the best of times. No one knows when a baby is ready to be delivered, and having a lack of local options for obstetrics can be deeply challenging. Why is this government putting the well-being of so many Albertans in harm's way by refusing to support obstetric services across this province?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, we are working to ensure that all expecting mothers have access to the services they need, including a plan and a place where they can safely deliver their babies. Now, as I've already indicated in the House, we do have certain challenges in certain areas due to a shortage of doctors. We are assuring expectant mothers that there's a plan in place and that they can go nearby to be able to deliver their babies while we are working on ensuring we can attract and retain doctors. We are putting our money where our mouth is. We are providing $90 million this year to be able to recruit and retain doctors, and I'll be able to speak to that.

Member Irwin: Nearby isn't good enough because expecting parents in Whitecourt already have to leave their community to give birth, and now the service has been cut into June, so they have to drive hundreds of kilometres, figure out costs of accommodation, travel, alongside trying to anticipate when birth might happen. As it turns out, babies don't take into account your calendar and planning when it comes time to be born. Whitecourt joins – let's see – Sundre, Rimbey, Three Hills, Provost, St. Paul, Lac La Biche, my hometown of Barrhead as places where UCP failures mean expectant parents cannot access the services they need. Will the Premier provide clear and accurate details today on how critical obstetric services will reopen across the province?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. We fully appreciate that we want to provide these services across the entire province, and there are some challenges in doing so right now, but I just want to put this in context. The hon. member talked about Whitecourt. Well, nearly half of all deliveries for Whitecourt moms are done in centres normally outside of Whitecourt. That's because for the level of service and the expertise required, they'll go to Edson, which is about 97 kilometres away. Now, unfortunately, we've had to temporarily suspend these services in Whitecourt. That has impacted two families at this point in time, but we're working very hard to get the services stated back there, and we understand that . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Unbelievable.

Obstetrics isn't the only way rural Albertans are struggling to access reproductive health care. Abortion, as we know, is medically essential, but currently there are no abortion services offered in rural Alberta, none whatsoever. Yesterday the Minister of Health said that he has no intention of further allowing access to reproductive rights in rural Alberta. It turns out the UCP just don't support anyone being pregnant or wanting an abortion in rural Alberta. Can anyone over there explain why pregnant Albertans or those seeking abortions don't deserve access to those services simply because of where they live?

The Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I mentioned yesterday and the day before, part of the issue with access to services in this province for rural Albertans is due to the fact that the opposition, when they were in government, actually diverted health care capital away from rural Alberta to urban centres. I will also point out that in this province the actual drive time to access abortion services is actually shorter for most of the geography of Alberta as compared to other provinces, and that's the . . . Hydrogen Industry

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have seen significant movement in the hydrogen sector recently, including key investments announced as a result of the first Canadian Hydrogen Convention. This includes the Alberta government's own clean hydrogen centre of excellence, a $50 million centralizing organization that will help expand hydrogen technology across our provincial economy while supporting Alberta-led innovation. To the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity: can you advise this House on what hydrogen means for Alberta's economy and the transportation sector?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for that question. Hydrogen-fuelled transportation can drive both decarbonization and demand for clean hydrogen from local producers, something our hydrogen road map recognizes as essential for scaling up hydrogen production for export readiness. At the Canadian hydrogen conference last week we learned about Nikola motors' hydrogen-fuelled heavy transport trucks . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At the Canadian hydrogen conference last week we learned about Nikola motors' hydrogen-fuelled heavy transport trucks, Mitsubishi's passenger vehicle, and just yesterday ATCO announced it will build hydrogen production facilities and refuelling stations to support CP Rail's new hydrogen-powered locomotives.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the associate minister for that answer. Given that hydrogen is an emerging technology and that there are many myths about the safety and availability of the fuel and given that much of this stems from information and incidents from decades ago, again to the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity: can you tell the House about the advancements in liquefied hydrogen as a sustainable fuel source?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We recognize that this hydrogen may make people uncomfortable because it's a new technology, but I can assure you that hydrogen fuel cells have been around for generations. In fact, I can assure you that I personally reviewed the safety features of these vehicles. Industry has done a great job in making these vehicles safe. In fact, I took a drive in a hydrogen fuel cell vehicle last week. A phenomenal experience. I'm proud to tell you: hydrogen is not the future; it's the present.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Given the extremely competitive Alberta petrochemical incentive program, low corporate tax rates, reduced red tape in the province, a skilled workforce, and enormous reserves of natural resources to produce clean hydrogen and given that there is a tremendous interest in developing made-in-Alberta advancements in the space, can the minister inform this House on the industry's current response to Alberta's approach to hydrogen technologies?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am proud to say that our Alberta petrochemical incentive program, which applies to hydrogen as well, has received $24 billion worth of applications, and the vast majority of those are for hydrogen. Authorities like the Edmonton International Airport are also seeing tremendous international interest in advancing hydrogen technologies in Alberta thanks to our many intentional and natural advantages. Last week I was honoured to witness EIA sign over a dozen partnerships with local and international organizations.

Hate-motivated and Violent Crime Prevention

Mr. Sabir: The number of hate-motivated crimes in Edmonton is increasing at an alarming rate, with nearly double the number of attacks in the first quarter of 2022 compared to last year. Racialized Albertans are living in fear. This province belongs to all of us regardless of race, religion, colour, or ethnicity. We should all be able to feel safe in our communities, but that clearly isn't the case. Yet this government does nothing. Why is this government failing to ensure that racialized Albertans can feel safe in their communities?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am actually very proud to respond to this question. As a government we have done so much to make sure that racialized communities feel safe, welcome, and able to achieve their . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Unparliamentary remarks, on or off the record, are still unparliamentary.

The Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, the members opposite are heckling because they know that they have nothing to stand on. For four solid years, when they were in office, they lifted no finger to help racialized communities in our province. We were the government that banned carding, we were the government that included First Nation police services in our Police Act, and we have so much more to do.

Mr. Sabir: Given that people have been physically assaulted, threatened with firearms, spat on, had racial slurs shouted at them, and are being discriminated against systematically and given that this government still refuses to even debate a bill to collect race-based data and given that we are increasingly seeing the rise of racist rhetoric on the right, apparent in the recent trucker convoy that shut down our border and occupied our nation's capital as many waved Confederate and Nazi flags, yet members of this government actually supported this group, why?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Albertans can be confident that their government shares their anger and disgust with hate crimes. We continue to work in making our province a safer and more welcoming place, and that's why the Minister of Labour and Immigration, when he was in my role, had established the hate crimes community liaison, establishing that to engage with communities that are most affected by hate crimes. Province-wide collaboration among law enforcement agencies has been enhanced and will further be strengthened by the new hate crime co-ordination unit when it launches later this year.

Mr. Sabir: Given that we aren't just seeing crime on the rise in Edmonton, that we are also seeing increased violence in Calgary, drug overdoses, and even murders, and given that many of these crimes are increasingly taking place with weapons, including guns, and given that this government actually wants to put more guns in people's hands while increasing barriers to accessing mental health and addictions, the question I have is: what is the government doing to stop these killings in Calgary and across this province and address the rise in crime?

Mr. Shandro: Well, first of all, Mr. Speaker, the premise of the question is totally incorrect and totally false. I will say, though, that it is a multifaceted approach, and we are leaving no stone unturned in either of our major urbans or in rural crime. I know that the member failed to mention even the rising rural crime rates that we continue to see. But we are taking action on rural crime as well as the increasing crime in our major urbans. We're going to continue to work in a multifaceted approach with our law enforcement agencies when it comes to addressing these issues and continue to work in building a recovery-oriented system of care.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Affordable Housing and Health Care Costs

Ms Sigurdson: Poverty is a health care issue. Albertans who do not have the stability of a home face worse health outcomes because they are more likely to have precarious living situations, less access to healthy food, and have experienced trauma. Therefore, increased poverty adds pressure and strain on the system. Unfortunately, under the UCP both poverty and chaos in the health care system are increasing. To the Minister of Seniors and Housing. Communities across the province are losing access to health care by also not having provincial support to build affordable housing. Why isn't the UCP building affordable housing to ease the strain on the health care system?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Currently this government is building approximately 1,500 units over the past two years. As well, we have our stronger foundations, Alberta's 10-year affordable housing strategy, which is increasing, changing dramatically how our government builds in support of affordable housing. With this housing, we will create an additional 25,000 households and increase it by 40 per cent by the end of 10 years.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that a night in a hospital is more expensive than one in a shelter and that a night in a subsidized home is cheaper than both and given that since the UCP are not maintaining homeless support at levels they have for the last two years – Edmonton is set to lose 800 shelter spots in June, and homelessness is also rising in Calgary and across the province – and given that the UCP has also refused to work with municipalities to build permanent supportive housing and has left hundreds of millions in federal money on the table, to the Minister of Health: how much more is the UCP spending on health care because of their bad decisions?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is so shameful that the NDP repeat and repeat again the same question, that we leave the federal dollars. We left nothing on the table. We spent every single penny, and currently we have a commitment to work with the federal government. We committed $561 million for affordable housing. Again, the former NDP government's Minister of Seniors and Housing is aware of this agreement, but she still keeps questioning about it.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that a recent study published in the Harm Reduction Journal proved that preventing overdoses saves over a thousand dollars per visit to an emergency room and nearly $400 per ambulance visit and given that housing provides stability to people with mental health concerns and provides dignity while also saving money in the health system – I know that the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions doesn't support the science and the evidence, but will he stand in this Chamber and explain how much his government's decision to not invest in permanent supportive housing and harm reduction measures is costing the Alberta health system?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The member opposite would probably be aware of this if she had attended the select special committee on safe supply, that more opioids in the community actually causes more harm to the community. That's actually what the experts say. We are committed to a recovery-oriented system of care. We want to help people with the illness of addiction. It is a health care issue, and we are going to continue to help people with their addictions. [interjections]

AGLC Charitable Gaming Model and Rural Alberta

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The ability and opportunity to fund raise within a community is extremely important. Fundraising can help to subsidize the costs of certain activities or events that are popular and important to communities, making them more affordable for individuals and families. Given that I've recently heard complaints and concerns from my constituents in Airdrie-East about the disadvantage that they have when it comes to fundraising opportunities with the AGLC, especially compared to our neighbours in Calgary, can the Minister of Finance please tell us how smaller towns or cities such as Airdrie can receive fair fundraising opportunities?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. AGLC initiated a review of the province's charitable gaming model in 2019 to examine how the model is meeting the needs of Albertans and to look for opportunities to improve it. The review has involved a comprehensive engagement with our many varied stakeholders involved in charitable gaming in the province, including more than 90 charitable organizations throughout Alberta, both urban and rural. I assure you that the government and AGLC remain committed to maintaining and maximizing charitable gaming proceeds to support eligible programs and services.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie-East.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the Airdrie Skating Club has high ice costs, comparable to the prices in Calgary, and that Airdrie is trying to reduce costs for families in order to encourage kids to be active and participate in sports and given that our opportunities to fund raise are less frequent, bringing in significantly less funding than the clubs in Calgary, putting us at a disadvantage to the point where we often lose families to Calgary that can subsidize their ice costs, Minister: can you please tell us what the AGLC's plan is to make fundraising fair for rural areas like Airdrie when they're competing with the larger cities? [interjection]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We know the importance of civil society organizations and addressing issues and creating opportunities in our communities. I'm proud to report that AGLC has received a milestone of 38 per cent reduction in red tape, which is part of the solution to efficiency. In two years AGLC has reduced over 9,100 pieces of red tape, including a number of policy changes that reduce financial reporting and admin requirements for charities, allowing these organizations greater flexibility to put resources back into their communities.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the minister. Given that my constituency of Airdrie-East is trying our best to fund raise and make things affordable, such as the skating club, for families in our community and given that the AGLC will assign fundraising opportunities to groups that are registered with them and apply to participate but given that rural areas are at a significant disadvantage when it comes to these opportunities and that casinos are allocated less frequently and that the casinos assigned to rural groups are much quieter and therefore don't have the same earning capacity, Minister, could you please tell us how rural areas can receive more fundraising opportunities from the AGLC?

Mr. Toews: Well, I want to thank the hon. member for her questions and the commitment she has demonstrated to the charities in her community. I know full well the importance of charities and that there are indeed unique qualities to our province's rural areas that rural charitable organizations deliver on. We've made tangible changes, including greater flexibility on how charitable organizations can use their proceeds. AGLC announced these important changes relating to charities earlier this week. For those who are interested, more details can be found on their website.

Diabetes Treatment Coverage

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's clear when I hear from my constituents that this government is not doing enough about the cost of living. Indeed, it seems the UCP is more focused on their internal squabbles than the needs of Albertans, and now they've decided that more than 4,000 Albertans living with type 1 diabetes should fend for themselves by discontinuing the insulin pump therapy program without any warning. Apparently, the UCP would rather fight for insurance profits than for Albertans with life-saving medication. Can the minister today attest that the changes he's making to the program will not increase the cost of living for a single Albertan?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. We are supporting Albertans with diabetes. We are making changes to improve access to supplies and new technology while at the same time enabling us to manage costs. Phase 1 of this was expanding coverage of supplies. Phase 2 was access to continuous glucose monitors for our youth, and then phase 3, which is access to new insulin pumps. Now, as part of the way to manage costs, we are transferring individuals as part of that program on to the Blue Cross program. Many are already on those programs, and I'll speak to more about that in a second.

Mr. Dang: Given that the minister admits that the cost of managing type 1 diabetes is rising and given that the insulin pump can cost someone between $6,000 to $8,000 and given that a lot of the employer-backed insurance programs don't cover the pumps because previously the government's insulin pump therapy program covered them, can the minister explain how this change benefits those who have to switch back to multiple insulin injections a day because they are unable to afford the care that they need since he refuses to provide actual clarity about these changes?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as previously indicated, many individuals already are on government plans in terms of Blue Cross plans, and the coverage for the pumps move over there. In addition, there are also a number of individuals who are covered under their private plans in terms of pumps. I'd like to point out that our Blue Cross plan, for those who don't already have plans or are not already on them, is a subsidized plan through the Alberta government. Everyone on this program will have access to this. They will not need to be spending the $6,000. For those who are low income, there will be no cost associated with them in terms of moving over to the program.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the minister has just acknowledged, of course, that there may even be insurance premiums required for these changes and given that that means many Albertans will see higher costs than they saw under the insulin pump therapy program and given that this government is responsible for many Albertans struggling with the exponentially increasing cost of living, can the minister explain to these families how he sleeps at night while they're up worrying about these new costs?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, as I already indicated, low-income families will be fully covered and there will be no additional cost. In addition, many of these families are already on these Blue Cross or insurance policies, whether private or the government-subsidized programs, so there will be no additional costs to them. Our focus is to be able to provide new technologies for those with diabetes. The cost of insulin pumps to the government has basically doubled over the last five years. We are spending $50 million, and we need to put our program on a sustainable path so we can be able to cover those who are suffering from diabetes now and into the future.

Confined Feeding Operation Proposal

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, this government is considering approval for a feedlot near Pigeon Lake, a very popular spot for Albertans to visit, especially over the summer, without enough notice to residents and neighbours. Most users of this area found out about the project through a small weekly flyer and understandably were upset that they did not have adequate time to provide feedback or to ask questions about the impacts on the lake. Pigeon Lake already experiences runoff with cow manure and, given its slow water turnover, is very vulnerable to algal blooms, which residents in this area have already spent millions of dollars fighting to fix. Why did the Member for Maskwacis-Wetaskiwin do nothing to defend Pigeon Lake?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The natural resources board, the NRCB, is the regulator that regulates confined feeding operations in Alberta. The public notice period for this project closed on April 7, and the NRCB is now reviewing all of those statements of concern submitted by the public. It's the responsibility of the NRCB to ensure that the proponent offered reasonable accommodation to all those concerns, and they will be reviewing those statements of concern.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that the government refuses to accept any responsibility for this matter and given that residents and users of this area were only given a short window to provide comments and that the board's narrow window only judges concerns for those who are directly affected, excluding many residents who own recreational properties at the lake, and given that, despite this government's attempt to restrict deadlines for feedback and ignore the concerns of Albertans, more than 300 people filed statements of concern with the board anyway and given that the county of Wetaskiwin has asked for an environmental impact assessment as well, will the Minister of Environment and Parks actually listen to Albertans, pause this project, and do his job for once?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister of agriculture and forestry.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The NRCB published official notice of the application in the local newspaper, which covers the area in which the proposed confined operation is located. The NRCB also posted the notice on its website and sent courtesy letters to neighbours residing on or owning land within the notification radius. NRCB granted Wetaskiwin county's requests for extension of the response deadline to April 21 from April 7 to provide additional information on its initial response.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that Pigeon Lake consistently sees health warnings due to levels of toxins in the water from existing cattle manure runoff, which can cause gastrointestinal illness, skin, ear, and eye infections, and given that over 100,000 Albertans use this lake annually for fishing, camping, boating, hiking, and beaches, which become rendered unusable by the consistent algal blooms, and given that the blue-green algae escalates with warm weather and we're on track for more record-breaking temperatures this summer, only making the problem worse, will the minister not make the problem worse and conduct a proper environmental impact assessment on this problem?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister of agriculture and forestry.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The role of Environment and Parks regarding confined feeding operations is to regulate the use of water under the Water Act, and the department will respond to the NRCB regarding these requirements in due course. Albertans place very a high value on this province's water resources, and there's been significant effort in protecting and improving water quality at Pigeon Lake, including development of the Pigeon Lake watershed management plan.

Federal-provincial Relations

Mr. Jean: Mr. Speaker, in 2017 I introduced the idea of Albertans forcing constitutional changes via an equalization referendum. The Premier picked up on the idea. Last October a clear majority of Albertans endorsed the referendum; a few weeks later this Legislature passed a constitutional resolution giving force to that referendum. Can the Premier tell us when he wrote to the Prime Minister and the other Premiers informing them of the constitutional resolution passed in this Legislature? Can he tell us, please, when the constitutional negotiations are set to begin?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member. Welcome to him for coming back to the House. As well, thank you to the Premier for being the only politician in Alberta with a vision to bring two political families together to defeat the NDP to form a Conservative government that got more votes than any other party in the history of this province. It's because of that vision that we were able to introduce Dr. Morton's idea of a referendum on equalization.

Mr. Jean: Given that constitutional discussions are never easy and given that the Premier has admitted that Canada is broken – equalization is unfair to Alberta. Alberta is underrepresented in both houses of Parliament and the Senate. The Trudeau government has also passed laws that are designed to hurt only Alberta. All of these things can be fixed with constitutional changes. Will this government commit to standing up for Albertans and demanding that the rest of the country come to the constitutional table to work at fixing Canada?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Under the leadership of this Premier our government has challenged the federal incursions into, for example, the federal carbon tax. We've challenged the constitutionality of the no-more-pipelines bill, Bill C-69; the Alberta tanker ban bill, C-48; and we intervened in Quebec's challenge to Bill C-92. We are fighting the federal firearm ban, and we're intervening in challenges to federal use of the Emergencies Act to be heard in federal court this July. This government makes no apologies for standing up for the people of Alberta.

Mr. Jean: Given that while constitutional change is never easy, it isn't impossible – in the last few weeks the House of Commons, the Senate, and the Saskatchewan Legislature have changed the Constitution section that applies to Saskatchewan and CP Rail. By the way, that same section exists in the Constitution about CP Rail in Alberta. So since constitutional change is actually possible in Canada, what will it take to make the government of Alberta stand up for the needs and worries of Albertans and start the process of fixing Canada? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Shandro: Well, Mr. Speaker, let me be clear. This government has stood up for, is standing up for, and will continue to stand up for Albertans. Under this Premier's guidance all of Canada's provinces unanimously supported Alberta's request to fix the broken fiscal stabilization program, which sees Alberta support Canada through tough times only to have Ottawa turn its back on Alberta when we need support the most. Alberta's government has publicly called on the federal government to respect the wishes of Albertans regarding equalization and continues to demand a fair deal for Alberta in the federation.

Alberta Joint Working Group on Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls

Mr. Feehan: Today we remember, reflect, and fight for missing and murdered Indigenous women and girls. We do not know the true number of Indigenous women and girls missing or murdered in Alberta. That alone is a tragedy. Here are some numbers that we do know: 1,068, the number of days since the national inquiry report was released; 792, the number of days since the Alberta joint working group was formed. The Alberta website states that the final report will be published January 5, 2022; 121 days later and still no public report. Why has the minister failed to release the report, and when will he release it?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. First, we are committed to building a safer province for Indigenous women, girls, and two-spirited people. I and the hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations were pleased to formally receive the report and recommendations from the joint working group to inform our response to the national inquiry's final report. Thank you to each member, by the way, for all their incredible work on the joint working group. My colleague will be providing an update on Alberta's response this spring.

Mr. Feehan: It's been your whole term in office, and you've not done it.

Given that the families and the communities of missing and murdered Indigenous women and girls deserve justice, peace, and reconciliation and given that the minister has had the final report from the Alberta working group for four months and given that each day without a strategy could mean more women and girls are lost to these horrific crimes, why has the UCP government failed to present a plan and recommendations from the report?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. It is an important issue. Alberta's government is now reviewing the recommendations from the joint working group and their final report. This is a crossgovernmental effort, and we all have to work to create safety for Indigenous women, girls, and two-spirited people. My colleague the Minister of Indigenous Relations will be providing an update later this spring on Alberta's response to the national inquiry's final report.

Mr. Feehan: Given that the final report from the national inquiry includes 231 calls for justice and given that the UCP government stated that it is, quote, committed to true, meaningful, reconciliation, unquote, but has failed to provide the necessary resources across all ministries to achieve this and given that zero action means zero steps toward reconciliation and given that each and every one of us has a duty to address reconciliation, something this government has yet to fully commit to, can any member of the front bench tell me today why they have chosen to fail these women?

Mr. Shandro: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and I are going to agree on something, that this is an important issue. Because it's an important issue, we want to do it right. I think we also will agree on how many recommendations there were. There were quite a lot, and because of that, it takes time necessary to study the recommendations in the final report. As I said, my colleague the hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations will be providing an update on Alberta's response this spring.

Invest Alberta

Mr. Bilous: Invest Alberta has now been in operation for almost two years, and we still have very little insight into their operations beyond their press releases and what the minister tells Albertans. For almost two years they were not subject to access-to-information laws. Requests have been filed and denied, shrouding the Crown corporation in secrecy, much like the UCP's war room. When I asked about this yesterday, the minister informed me that he signed the paperwork to open Invest Alberta up to FOIP. My question is: why the delay? Why did it take the government almost two years to do this?

Mr. Glubish: Well, Mr. Speaker, the Alberta Investment Attraction Act established the Invest Alberta Corporation in 2020 with a mandate to promote, identify, and pursue investment for Alberta. As per the act Invest Alberta is a corporation with one share owned by the Crown. It is the government of Alberta's intent to designate Invest Alberta as a public body under the FOIP Act, and on May 2 of this year Service Alberta received a request from the Minister of Jobs, Economy and Innovation to designate the Invest Alberta Corporation as a public body under the FOIP Act. We're following up on that request, and our intent is to follow through with that, to designate it as a public body.

Mr. Bilous: Given that Invest Alberta was created almost two years ago but wasn't open to FOIP because of either incompetent oversight or intentional secrecy by this government and given that we have partial records pertaining to a lavish dinner hosted by Invest Alberta in Lake Louise, where several ministers and their staff attended, and given that Invest Alberta is now open to FOIP but access to information requests take several months under this government, will the minister release all of the expenses related to their party in Lake Louise, and if not . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Mr. Speaker, as the member noted, it is true that it is taking longer than normal to process FOIP requests. This is very understandable given the fact that we have just come through two years of a pandemic, and all aspects of government have been a little bit slower to tackle the challenges that they have had over the last two years, and our FOIP department is no different. But we have been making investments to ensure that our FOIP divisions in government are operating more efficiently. We have added new tools to help them to process requests more quickly. That work will continue, and we will take our obligations on disclosures through FOIP very, very seriously.

Mr. Bilous: Given that Invest Alberta has signed a hefty sponsorship deal with Alpine Canada and the event at Lake Louise was an FIS World Cup race put on by Alpine Canada and given that questions have been raised about the relationship between an Invest Alberta board member and an Alpine Canada board member and given that the UCP claims to suddenly be all about transparency, will they release the details of this sponsorship deal, including board meeting minutes and any communication related to the deal?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Additional information will be forthcoming, but Invest Alberta has been a key piece of positioning this province for investment attraction and economic growth, and I want to point out a few metrics. These are 2022 metrics versus 2019, when the members opposite were in government: business and corporations, up 42 per cent; wholesale trade, up 29 per cent; manufacturing sales, up 34 per cent; merchandise exports, up 81 per cent. Our economic plan is working. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Greenhouse Gas Emission Reduction Strategies

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It would appear that the Liberal-NDP elites are once again at odds with everyday Albertans. The clean fuel standard will be placing a carbon tax on trucks. Trucks that are critical to wealth production in Alberta could face a tax from $1,000 to $4,000 each. It was recently reported that one-third of pickups are bought by Albertans, who make up about 11 per cent of Canada's population, while one-third of cars sold in Canada go to Quebecers, who make up 24 per cent of the population. Does the Minister of Energy believe that the Trudeau Liberal-NDP alliance would have brought in this tax if it had targeted the eastern urban elites?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We do know that any tax that targets pickup trucks would be disproportionately aimed at Albertans. While we haven't heard any specifics on this tax, we do know that Steven Guilbeault and the Trudeau-NDP alliance are continuously moving the goalposts when it comes to emission reduction policies, targets, and taxes. They continually say one thing and then move the goalposts. That's why we continue to stand up to Ottawa-made policies that discriminate against Alberta, and we always will.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the Trudeau government intends to use the clean fuel standard tax to subsidize the purchase of EVs and given that the EV subsidy could rise to $8,000 or more per vehicle and given that the average income of an EV purchaser is in excess of $100,000 while the income of the average truck buyer is just over $60,000 and given that this plan is a transfer of wealth from the Alberta middle class to the eastern upper classes, to the Minister of Energy: is the government of Alberta supportive of the Trudeau Liberal-NDP alliance's desire to support the subsidization of electric vehicles, predominantly found in Quebec?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. No, we are not considering a rebate for electric vehicles here in his province. We believe a defensible approach is the market-based approach. In fact, we're convinced that if we depart from the market-based approach, there will be unintended consequences such as extra pressure on our electricity grid before it meets its time. We are not in favour of subsidizing one vehicle type over another. Pickup trucks have a great future in Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that EVs are mostly bought by affluent eastern urban dwellers to commute to work and given that an EV simply isn't practical for a rural Albertan because of the distances we have to travel, their limited battery range, and too few recharging stations and given that you cannot trust the Trudeau Liberal-NDP alliance, whose support for EVs is an attack on hard-working Albertans under the guise of carbon reduction, to the Minister of Energy: how will the Alberta government balance the need to reduce carbon while still maintaining their support for Albertans' jobs and our economy?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We've been really clear. Alberta will not accept or develop any emissions plan that will drive up inflation, drive up costs, hit Canadians' pocketbooks, and do little, if anything, to reduce emissions. We can and we must balance the need for responsible resource development and protecting the environment, and we can do that. This isn't an either/or proposition. This government is making great progress on lowering emissions using real-world, practical solutions, and at the same time our oil and gas sector is thriving and having its best year ever.

The Speaker: Hon. members, that concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. [interjections] Order. In 30 seconds or less we will return to the remainder of the daily Routine.

Child and Youth Mental Health

Ms Sigurdson: This Saturday marks National Child and Youth Mental Health Day, part of Mental Health Awareness Week. The theme this year is empathy, the ability to understand and share the feelings of another. All people are being called upon to listen to the concerns, anxieties, and issues that our neighbours, friends, families, and colleagues are facing and to support them however we can. Mental health awareness is crucial against stigma to ensure that everyone is able to grow and prosper. We mark this day to acknowledge that we must act to end the discrimination on mental health issues and support youth in all of their needs.

This year it is even more critical as we see the impact of the past two years of the pandemic on Alberta's youth. Youth have dealt with so much over the past two years, and we as a Legislature, a province, and a people must be there for them in any way that we can.

Our caucus will never stop advocating for the mental health of Albertans. We have called for every school in Alberta to have a counsellor to be there for the support of their students. We are committed to ensuring that every Albertan has access to at least five mental health sessions.

Many things have changed over the years, Mr. Speaker. While we are still far from perfect when it comes to helping people dealing with mental health issues, I can attest that certain things have improved, but as we are called upon to do this week and on Saturday, we must first listen, be compassionate, and be empathetic.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell children and everyone who is suffering from mental health issues that they can call the mental health helpline at 1.877.303.2642. They are not alone.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Community and Social Services has a tabling.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table five copies of the disability advocate's 2020-2021 annual report.

I'll be also tabling five copies of Family Violence Death Review Committee 2020-2021 annual report.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members there are no points of order today; a gold star for everyone.

Just prior to calling Orders of the Day, I beg the indulgence of the Assembly just for one brief moment because I see that the chief of staff for the Hon. Ted Arnott, the Speaker of the province of Ontario, has joined the Assembly this afternoon. Ms Rachel Nauta, I invite you to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 16

Insurance Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to move third reading of Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act, 2022.

This legislation proposes improvements to Alberta's insurance regulatory framework with a goal to diversify Alberta's insurance industry and modernize our financial services sector. The amendments propose to make Alberta the first Canadian jurisdiction to allow provincial companies to focus on reinsurance and raise capital through limited partnerships. Increasing the availability of insurance in the province, Mr. Speaker, is good for our entire insurance market. By allowing insurers to attract more capacity to Alberta, we're enabling the entire industry to be better positioned in serving its customers.

The amendments also propose improvements to our new legislation for captive insurance companies. Alberta is getting ready to welcome captives, and this amendment is intended to facilitate smooth relocation of foreign captives into the province. It would give Alberta and Canadian companies contemplating moving their foreign captives here – it would provide them certainty around the relocation process.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 16 is about moving our economy forward by supporting diversification, attracting investment, and creating jobs. I encourage all members to support this bill.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

With that, I move third reading. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and offer some comments on Bill 16 in third reading. Let me first of all extend my gratitude to the Minister of Finance for his best speech ever in this House. I think it had a total running time of about three minutes and contained nothing but facts. Well done, to the minister, for a real stellar job. I wish that every speech and every answer that he gave in this House were as factually accurate and as succinct as that speech. Thank you very much for that.

I want to spend some time with my comments this afternoon on this issue of reinsurance because the Minister of Finance is on record as saying that the reason that the province of Alberta is allowing the establishment of reinsurance companies here is to allow for oil and gas companies, which are awash in cash right now, to use some of that cash to fund their own reinsurance programs or fund reinsurance companies to provide reinsurance to themselves. We here in the NDP Official Opposition have no issue with that. We think that reinsurance may very well serve the public interest when it comes to providing those services to the oil and gas sector.

I think it's interesting to talk about one example where reinsurance was a help to the public interest, and that's with the Deepwater Horizon disaster in the Gulf of Mexico, in 2010. The costs of that disaster were so astronomically high that British Petroleum had to access reinsurance in order to cover some of the costs related to controlling, ending the release of the oil from the well and cleaning up some of the mess in the Gulf of Mexico and compensating the people who lived along the coast of the Gulf of Mexico for some of the hardship that they endured as a result of that disaster.

I'm pleased to see that this kind of financial safeguard for potential environmental disasters is being allowed here in the province of Alberta because everybody knows that the oil and gas companies here in the province of Alberta have significant unaddressed environmental liabilities. It's my hope that by allowing reinsurance companies here in the province of Alberta, oil and gas companies will have the reinsurance that they need to cover some of the costs of those environmental liabilities should those costs spiral out of control.

But I think that on this issue of getting environmental liabilities in the oil and gas sector under control, much more needs to be done. Reinsurance will not be a sufficient measure to get environmental liabilities related to the oil and gas sector under control. We know that right now the mine financial security program is woefully underfunded. There are hundreds of billions of dollars of potential environmental liabilities attributed to oil sands companies alone that do not have sufficient funds in place under the mine financial security program to cover those costs if those companies are unable to deal with the costs on their own. We have yet to see anybody from Executive Council present a coherent plan to the people of Alberta for dealing with those costs, and my fear is that it will be the average Albertan who will be left on the hook to pay for those expenses.

It would be bad enough, Madam Speaker, if the government had just left the mine financial security program alone and did nothing to address the issue, but they actually scaled back the financial requirements for oil sands companies last year. Oil sands companies paid less in 2021 than they did in the previous year because – the minister gave the excuse of low resource prices. Well, you know, covering the costs of these environmental liabilities should take precedence over a whole host of other costs that oil and gas companies need to meet, so I don't buy this argument that because oil and gas companies had reduced profits, they couldn't afford to contribute the same amount as they did before to the mine financial security program.

Moreover, we currently see oil trading at well over $100 a barrel, yet the minister has been completely silent about what the future of the mine financial security program holds for oil sands companies. As far as we know, the rates of contributions that will be expected from those oil sands companies aren't actually going to increase from last year. How is it that when oil sands companies are suffering from low oil prices, they get a premium reduction on their mine financial security obligations, but when prices go up, nothing is done about it? That's not fair, Madam Speaker, and I think that the taxpayers of Alberta are being left at significant risk of having to pay for these environmental liabilities once the oil sands companies are no longer viable, whenever that happens, at some point in the future. We hope that they will continue to make money and have enough money set aside for dealing with those liabilities, but this government has done nothing to ensure that that happens.

We also see the same issue in the traditional oil and gas sector. It's been a privilege of mine to participate on the Select Special Committee on Real Property Rights, and I've had the chance to travel to a couple of different locations around Alberta to hear from landowners who are having extreme difficulties dealing with traditional oil and gas companies and trying to get them to deal with their oil and gas liabilities. There are thousands and thousands of landowners who are going without lease payments right now. They've got inactive wells that need to be abandoned and sites that need to be reclaimed – and there's nothing being done – hundreds of thousands of sites all across the province where the traditional oil and gas, conventional oil and gas companies are not addressing their liabilities either.

It is my hope that by allowing these conventional oil and gas companies to set up their own reinsurance companies, they will provide some means of dealing with these liabilities, but I don't think that it will be sufficient. More needs to be done to protect the interests of landowners who will be left to suffer the consequences, because these oil and gas companies are very quickly reaching the end of their lives, so to speak.

Municipalities as well are going without tax payments from oil and gas companies. This government has done nothing to address any of those outstanding liabilities of the conventional oil and gas companies either. People in Alberta are incredibly upset. They see that the price of oil is as high as it's ever been, oil and gas companies are making more money than they've ever had before, yet the debts that they are owed are not being paid, and that is not fair.

Madam Speaker, I am pleased to offer my support for this bill along with all of my Official Opposition colleagues. It is my sincere hope that this reinsurance scheme that the Minister of Finance is proposing will help to address some of these environmental liabilities, but I hope that members of Executive Council understand that much more needs to be done to make sure that oil and gas companies clean up the messes that they have made and that they don't leave the average Albertan on the hook for covering these costs.

With that, Madam Speaker, I will conclude my remarks.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join in on Bill 16? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Of course, it gives me great pleasure to stand and speak to third reading of this bill and discuss not so much the fact that – you know, I'm in agreement with the fact that it's very important that this bill create opportunity for reinsurance here in the province of Alberta, but the bigger issue, of course, is the fact that this government has had an opportunity to actually address issues regarding insurance coverage for Albertans, specifically car insurance and even home insurance. Unfortunately, over the past year and a half people's car insurance has actually gone up, in some cases by 30 per cent.

You know, to your average family out there – I find it interesting that a member across the way was talking about urban elites. I've never thought of myself as an urban elite. I come from a very working-class background, a very humble background. Both my parents worked every day. They did not run their own business or anything, but they brought home a paycheque, and they made sure food was on the table and that we were fed. We didn't have everything we wanted, but we didn't go without. We had everything we needed. Of course, I come from a family where I was raised with three other brothers. There were four of us. I remember that at the time in the '80s when my parents decided to purchase a house or put a mortgage on a house, interest rates were, like, 17, 18, 19 per cent. It was a real difficult time.

For any average Albertan, you know, they obviously have their household budget that they need to deal with, and when the cost of insurance goes up by 30 per cent, I can tell you that that puts a tremendous amount of anxiety on those average Albertans. Maybe they're saving a little bit every paycheque. Maybe. I'm sure that, like other members on the other side of the House know, every paycheque that comes in: you save a little bit and you put it aside, but there always seems to be some kind of issue that will come up that will take down that amount that you're saving every month.

Currently, in the economy that we have right now, those average Albertans are finding it harder and harder and harder to put, you know, $100 aside every paycheque. We're hearing from Albertans that they're $200 away from not being able to make ends meet here in this province. So for me it's a shame that the minister wouldn't actually address this issue more concretely when it comes to insurance here in the province of Alberta. For the first time in a hundred years the minister decided to, I can only assume, hide the report on insurance profits. It's a report that comes out every year, but for some reason this year it didn't come out. Is that a coincidence? I don't know.

I can tell you that when that report came out, I heard from several Albertans that were just awestruck at the fact that insurance companies have gotten away with such huge profits while they have had to endure very difficult times during this economic crisis, that, of course, were made even worse with COVID-19. So many of them – and I remember in debate getting up in this House and telling members of this House that there were teachers, for example, that at the beginning of COVID were told to stay home, so, you know, they didn't have to drive anywhere. Maybe they went to the local grocery store. There could have been something worked out with the insurance companies to actually lower the monthly payments or the amounts paid to insurance companies, but this government decided to do nothing about that.

I get it because their ideology, Madam Speaker, is to let the free market do its thing; don't get involved. That's why, for example, when in the House I asked the associate minister of natural gas what he was going to do about utility bills, he got up very proudly and said: I'm going to do nothing. That's the ideology of these Conservatives. Their ideology is to let the free market do its will, and it doesn't matter how that's going to impact your average Albertan. But average Albertans want a government that's actually going to defend them, to stand up for them, to help them.

You know, it's very plausible that the minister – although he may not agree with a cap, well, then I invite him to come up with some other alternatives but to actually stand up for Albertans, because that's his job inside of this House. If he doesn't like the idea of a cap, then come up with something else. Work with the private sector, work with the insurance companies to actually come up with an alternative that makes the lives of Albertans easier when it comes to this issue, this problem, this deep concern that they have.

Unfortunately, we don't see things getting any better. The minister gets up in this House time and time again, and he says that insurance companies are actually coming down, but that's only 10 companies that have applied for their premiums to come down. We know, last I heard, that seven companies are actually requesting to increase their premiums. So what is it? Is it coming down? Are they going up? What's the case?

Again I go back to the issue at hand. You know, Conservatives and champions of laissez-faire economics continue to tell us that more competition is actually going to drive the price down, but that's not what Albertans are seeing. That is absolutely not what Albertans are seeing.

I asked the minister the other day in debate – was it 46 insurance companies or 76?

Mr. Toews: Forty-five.

Member Loyola: Forty-five. Thank you, Minister.

There are actually 45 insurance companies here in the province of Alberta. Now, you'd think, you know, according to Conservative ideology and free-market principles, that 45 companies would be enough to bring down the price of insurance for Albertans . . .

An Hon. Member: Do you want to nationalize one?

Member Loyola: . . . yet we're not seeing the decrease of prices.

The members on the other side are like: okay; well, do you want to nationalize it? We're talking about the fact – how many companies are going to be needed? Is it going to be 50? Is it going to be 70? Is it going to be 100? How many do we actually need? [interjection] Go ahead, Minister.

Mr. Toews: Well, Madam Speaker, I'd like to thank the member, through you, for giving way. I just want to provide some metrics that are helpful here. According to the statistics from the National Insurance Agency in 2020, the most recent year we have data for, automobile insurance companies in Alberta had a profit, but they netted $11.59 per vehicle insured in this province. That is an independent statistical agency. I think that's helpful for members in the House. That's why we brought in Bill 41. That's why we looked to deal with the systemic issues that were driving up costs. We do have a competitive market in this province, and this data point would demonstrate that. We need to maintain the competitive market and drive down costs.

Member Loyola: Well, I appreciate that, Minister, but it's not working. What Albertans are actually seeing are their premiums going higher and higher and higher under this UCP government. I mean, I can appreciate that you have data and that you're presenting that in the House, but it's . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt. Just direct your comments through the chair, please.

Member Loyola: Of course, Madam Speaker.

Through you to the minister, the outcome is what's important. That has been the primary focus of my intervention here today, that Albertans are spending way too much on insurance, not to mention all the other costs that they have related to the family budget. That is the main concern, and that is what we should be addressing as a Legislature, making sure that we're making life for Albertans easier and not harder.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity just to address this bill for a few moments at the end of this day. In general, of course, this bill will get the support of myself and, I believe, my colleagues as we move forward. We certainly appreciate the need to keep refining the insurance industry in this province for the benefit of Albertans. I'm happy to see the government redo their bills when they've made mistakes in the past, as this one does and as we've seen a number of times in this particular session of the Legislature, having to go over bills that failed to do what they were supposed to do in the first place. But, you know, credit where credit is due: good second try.

I want to take a few moments just to speak about some of the concerns I have about what we have just heard from the Minister of Finance in response to the member who was just previously speaking, Edmonton-Ellerslie. That is that we have had deep concerns on this side of the House with average Albertans' experiences over the last number of years, particularly in response to the direct action of this government to remove a limit on increasing insurance rates that were clearly going up in this province and clearly putting people in dire straits.

Businesses were telling us that they were seriously going to think about closing their doors because of dramatically increased business insurance rates. People were parking their cars in spite of often needing them for work purposes because of increasing insurance rates, and people were concerned about being able to maintain their own homes. So a very serious hit on people and their lives. Of course, people do their best to try to adapt. They cut back where they can. Unfortunately, some people ended up suffering serious consequences because they simply couldn't make it all work, just living too close to the line, which is unfortunate. But, of course, we know a significant number of people at any time are in the position of actually doing that.

I'm concerned because, you know, the Minister of Finance has stood up in this House a number of times and listed companies who have reduced their rates this year, but he does not give you the full facts when he does that. That's what I'm very concerned about. What we saw were some increases in insurance rates that were upwards of 30 per cent for people in the province of Alberta and basically across the board. It almost didn't matter which insurance company you were with, with some minor exceptions, I'm going to admit, we saw this dramatic increase.

Then we see only a small portion of the 45 insurance companies in this province – I think there were seven listed by the Finance minister – who had applied in the second year to actually reduce their rates, but reducing their rates by approximately 5 per cent. So what they're not telling you is that your rates went up 30 per cent and down by 5, and they're equating it to as if they're the same, and they're not. They're not the same when 100 per cent, or close to 100 per cent, of the businesses go up, but only a small proportion, some, you know, approximately 15 to 20 per cent, go down. There are not equivalencies. My concern here is that what we have is the government really not admitting to the set of facts that Albertans are experiencing and not addressing the consequences.

Now, what we have heard the Finance minister say is that we need to leave this to the market, and the market will, you know, deal with this. There will be competition in the market, more companies will join, and we'll see the rates go down. But this is not a normal open market, and I think we have to be really clear about that. There are only approximately 45 companies in the province of Alberta, and I know the minister is hoping more will join, but what is he hoping? That two, three, four, five more will join? He hasn't actually stood up and said to this House that when we reach a thousand insurance companies then we will have true market competition, because he knows that will never happen.

He also knows that in a market the size of 45 you actually don't have fulsome competition. You don't have fulsome competition because the companies are quite able to work together. I'm not talking about collusion. I'm not talking about a dishonest, you know, sort of under-the-table kind of working together. I mean that they just understand each other and understand how things work. So they all raise the rates knowing that it will be supported across the board because there is no real competition. There is no one standout company, for example, in the last year who said: "Has your insurance gone up 30 per cent? Well, we're going to give you not only an insurance rate that doesn't go up 30 per cent, but we're going to drop it by 5 or 10 per cent." Not one company made that advertisement, so that tells you that they all rose with the market.

What happens in these situations, that the Conservatives do not speak to, is the fact that the lives of individual Albertans are driven into chaos. Even if they are right and eventually somewhere down in this magical future competition will result in some reduction of the bills, in the meantime the people of the province of Alberta have experienced extreme distress. Some, as I say, have had to make really critical decisions in terms of their personal finances or their small-business finances. Unfortunately, the Conservatives' answer is always, "Don't worry; this will resolve itself in due time," this being the in-due-time government. I think what that says is: "Well, you know what? Those of us who have wealth will ride through this because it really won't make a huge difference in our lives, and those of you who don't have wealth can just suffer the consequences because in due time it'll be okay again." Two years of trauma in terms of being unable to pay your bills is really unacceptable, yet it doesn't matter to this Conservative government.

I certainly would like to see this Conservative government make a decision that is about everyday Albertans in their everyday lived experience and not just sort of cast them to the winds, hoping that somehow they will land in good conditions. You know, we simply cannot be the farmer who casts the grain across the fields, allowing some of it to fall on rugged land and some of it to fall on fertile land, because those that fall on rugged land will not thrive and survive. We have a responsibility to make sure that they do not fall on that land and that they only end up in fertile land.

This government is refusing to do that because they believe that in due course things will resolve, which is an easy thing to say when you have the money. It's an easy thing to say when you're sitting in this House and you're earning $120,000 a year or more in cabinet, almost $200,000 a year in cabinet, and those increases of 30 per cent are, at worst, inconveniences, but when you are a small-business owner and your insurance goes up to the point that you have to consider whether or not you're closing your shop, when you're a family that has to look at maybe taking the kids out of hockey this year because you just simply can't afford it, that's a very different kind of question. I really would like, for once, this government to stand up on the side of those average Albertans and not always on the side of corporations, who are ultimately the beneficiaries.

We can see that they are the beneficiaries because we've seen the report that was hidden by this government for months, a report that had been issued in this province for over 107 years. When did they release that report? On Holy Thursday, just while everybody is distracted, while people are not in the House. They hid that report and then released it at a time when nobody would be paying attention. Fortunately, on this side of the House we are always paying attention, and we saw that report, and we found that insurance companies were not in a desperate strait. They did not need to increase the fees for their services by 30 per cent. In fact, they were making record profits.

What we have is a government making a decision: whose side am I going to be on, the insurance companies who are making record profits or the average, everyday Albertans who are going to have to say to the kids, "No hockey this year"? I can tell you that on this side of the House we're on the side of hockey.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate?

Seeing none, would the minister like to close us out?

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I would like to close this out, just make a couple of comments around Bill 16, the Insurance Amendment Act. This bill is about taking action. This bill is, in fact, about creating more capacity for Alberta consumers. This bill is about creating innovative solutions for not only industry, key industry elements within the province, but much more broadly for consumers throughout the province.

I just want to close with this. You know, we hear from the members opposite that we're not taking action on issues of affordability. Madam Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. We have taken action time and time again, and we will continue to take action to ensure that Alberta consumers have the maximum number of product offerings available. Madam Speaker, that's what Bill 16 is about.

I appreciate the debate, and I appreciate that the members opposite have indicated they're going to support the bill. I very much appreciate that. I encourage all members to support Bill 16.

[Motion carried; Bill 16 read a third time]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I think a lot of great work has been done this week, but at this moment I think it's time that – I'd like to move that we adjourn the Assembly . . . [interjections] Do you want me to adjourn or not? I would like to move that we adjourn the Assembly until Monday, May 9 at 1:30 p.m.

The Deputy Speaker: Just a reminder: we don't bang on desks anymore as per the standing orders.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 3:21 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Members, we will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by Mr. Akesh Aheer. I would invite you to all participate in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all of us command.
With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
The True North strong and free!
From far and wide, O Canada,
We stand on guard for thee.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, I'm pleased to welcome our anthem singer today, sitting in the Speaker's gallery, Mr. Akesh Aheer, a student of music. His recent accomplishments include singing at provincials after having won scholarships at the local festival. Along with being an award-winning singer, Mr. Aheer is also the son of the hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore. Hon. members, please join me in thanking him.

Hon. members, also joining us in the Speaker's gallery today are some very, very special guests of the hon. the Member for Morinville-St. Albert, the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity. Please join me in welcoming Kevin and Gail Nally, the parents of the hon. member. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

We also have this afternoon a school at the Legislature, a group joining us from the constituency of Strathcona-Sherwood Park, Uncas school.

Last but not least, joining us in the galleries today is Sierra Garner, a constituent of the Member for Lethbridge-West.

I invite you to all rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Gasoline Prices

Mr. Rowswell: Mr. Speaker, 2022 has been a year of records or at least for record gas prices, which hit a new record it seems every few weeks. Our rising gasoline prices increase the cost of living by 1.4 per cent alone. While the increase in gas prices has been driven by an increase in commodity prices, they do not have to be as high as they are. That is a choice of various governments. For example, the federal government levies an excise tax, a carbon tax, and a GST on gasoline, which together add up to more than 28 cents per litre. This is passed directly on to consumers and indirectly through increased transportation costs, which increase food prices.

The federal government decided in April to increase gasoline and food prices more by increasing their carbon tax. This was a deliberate move by the federal government to increase the cost of living for Albertans and all Canadians. The federal government could have helped. After all, here in Alberta the provincial gasoline tax has been removed for as long as oil prices remain high. This tax relief, according to University of Calgary economist Trevor Tombe, was passed directly through to Albertans and continues to be passed through weeks after it began.

A simple look at national gas prices will tell you that something is very different and cheaper in Alberta. The price in Halifax is $1.91; the price in Toronto, $1.94; the price in Victoria, $2.10; and leading the country in the most cost imposed is Vancouver at $2.14. Meanwhile gasoline in Alberta is $1.54 in Edmonton and $1.59 in Calgary.

Clearly, there's a difference between Alberta and the rest of Canada, and that difference is that while other governments brought in taxes, resulting in increasing costs of living and punishing their constituents who need the fuel to drive vehicles to work, Alberta removed taxes and costs from all constituents.

Children's Health Care

Ms Pancholi: Sick children being forced to line up outside the children's hospitals in Calgary and Edmonton because there's no room for them to even sit and rest in the emergency room, a six-year-old being cut off from access to an insulin pump he needs to live, the lowest vaccination rate for children over five in the country, emergency room closures throughout rural Alberta, 43,000 residents and climbing in Lethbridge without a doctor: this is what health care chaos caused by the UCP looks like, and I barely cracked the surface.

Emergency room physicians, heroes during the pandemic, say that things are as bad now as they've ever been. They don't recall a time when it took 90 minutes just to triage a sick child. Ninety minutes. As a parent this is a nightmare. This is heartbreaking. It's cruel, and it's a crisis. Yet Albertans get nothing but talking points from the government, a Premier too embroiled in trying to save his own job to care, a Health minister that won't even take the phone calls of parents fearing for their child's life.

Albertans deserve so much better. Alberta's children deserve so much better. They deserve a government that will put public health care first, that will properly fund emergency rooms, that will ensure ambulances don't have to wait in line with their critical patients onboard, that will recruit new doctors and end the fighting with front-line heroes. They deserve a government that knows that, yes, public health care matters. It's part of being Canadian. It's how we take care of each other and, most importantly, how we as a community take care of our children.

I promise Alberta's children and their parents this: Alberta's NDP hears each and every one of you. We hear the pain and the fear in your voice. We're listening, we're acting, and if we have the privilege of forming the next government, we will be there for you.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Economic Recovery and Women

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta is booming. In 2021 Alberta beat the national average in real gross domestic product growth, coming in at 5.1 per cent. Alberta quickly recovered postpandemic to its original position in Canada as the economic workhorse of this country, and people around the country and the world are noticing.

Within the last quarter of 2021 Alberta led large provinces in international and interprovincial immigration. The spike in GDP and immigration to this province is due to new investments from Amazon, Northern Petrochemical, Dow Chemical, Telus, and Pace Canada, just to name a few. These investments have shown that Alberta is the place to do business, and I am excited to see what this new outlook has in store.

Let's not forget, Mr. Speaker, that while this government has achieved all of this, they have still managed to balance the budget and increase funding for programs that Albertans value most. This is the Alberta advantage.

While this is great news, our government also recognizes the systemic barriers that women face in the workforce, and that is why our government has created an extra $1 million bursary to assist women in their pursuit of careers in STEM and the trades. This government has also begun negotiations and has been working very hard to reduce licensed daycare fees to help working parents enter and stay in the workforce and participate in this economy.

Mr. Speaker, this government's efforts to reduce barriers for women are working. In March of 2022 the unemployment rate for women was 6.7 per cent, with an employment rate of 60.7 per cent. ATB reported that female workers in Alberta experienced a more pronounced labour market recovery postpandemic than male workers. Employment rates for women in Alberta have led the nation for five consecutive months. Under this government all Albertans, no matter their gender, will have an opportunity to participate fully in this economy.

Thank you.

Health Care System

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, just over three years ago columnist Don Braid wrote some prophetic words. He said that the UCP's plans for cuts to health care would guarantee "a return to the chaos of the Progressive Conservative years, and maybe worse." That prediction has sadly, tragically come true. Last week Braid spoke with Dr. Paul Parks, head of AMA's section of emergency medicine, on the dire state of our health care system under the UCP. "Albertans are dying," he says, because they can't access care.

We know some of these people have very serious outcomes and even deaths . . . The idea of a patient seeing the right person in the right place at the right time has completely fallen apart . . . We are desperate, just desperate for Albertans to understand how bad this is . . . There's a strong feeling among medical professionals that the troubles will only get worse because they have spread into so many corners of health care.

This, Mr. Speaker, is not just seasonal pressure like the Health minister likes to blandly claim. It didn't have to be this way. This government isn't a victim of circumstance. It repeatedly ignored warnings and made choices that led us directly here. As Dr. Parks says, "There is only one government making decisions and its policies are devastating."

You know what else Don Braid wrote back in 2019? "The NDP calmed down the system, made significant improvements and provided stability for health planners, professionals and workers." Keith Gerein wrote: "Alberta's health system has enjoyed one of its most uninterrupted periods of stability under the NDP's reign." But, as Braid wrote: "A new bunch of UCP politicians arrived in 2019, claiming to know exactly what was needed for health care. This is what we got." Chaos, Mr. Speaker, three years of mismanagement,

It's clear, Mr. Speaker, that if we want to save our health care system, Alberta needs a new government, and the Alberta NDP is ready.

Camrose County Fire Services Safety Training

Ms Lovely: Thank you to the fire chief of the Camrose county volunteer fire service for inviting me to participate as a casualty in a safety training scenario which took place with the firefighting team, Wildrose safety training, and EMS. We gathered in a field at Silver Creek Paintball, close to New Norway, with a school bus turned on its side and a car placed in a collision position head-on with the bus.

There was a team of us gathered inside the bus, posing with various injuries. The Wildrose safety team outlined characters for each one of us to play, reviewing injuries and behaviour that they wanted us to exhibit so as to best provide learning experience for the volunteer firefighters. My character had two fingers severed, a head injury, confusion, memory loss, and a tendency to wander. One casualty was lodged in between the bus seats. Another had her arms stuck under the bus with the hands severed off. An additional casualty suffered the loss of an ear. With lifelike props and theatre makeup the team provided a very real scenario.

The volunteer firefighters were provided a call and sent to the scene, not knowing what they would find. The next two hours resulted in this dedicated team helping each casualty one by one. We were brought to a safe spot beside the bus, and the driver of the car was extracted, with the roof being removed and the driver carefully extracted on a body board.

Co-ordination and planning went into creating this scenario so as to provide valuable training for each of these volunteers. It was an honour for me to be asked to participate, and I came away from the exercise with tremendous respect for the time and commitment each one of these volunteers provides to their community. This participation means time away from family and work. It also puts them in places of danger to themselves in order to protect the safety and well-being of others.

This same team recently celebrated the grand opening of their new Camrose county regional fire services hall #2 with a barbecue and fundraiser. At the end of the event the alarm went off. They jumped into action.

Thank you for all you do. You are valued and appreciated.

Government Record

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, Albertans have been subjected to this government's boasting about their economic wizardry for months. It's embarrassing, and it's unbecoming and part of why no one trusts the UCP. The price of oil went up – that's it – otherwise, they'd still be running the highest deficit in Alberta history given how they've been happy to waste billions of the public's money. But while the Premier, his Finance minister, and the rest of the UCP liquor cabinet are popping champagne corks on the sky palace, Albertans don't buy it because they aren't feeling it, and that's why it's so disrespectful.

People are struggling because of the cost-of-living crisis that the UCP created, a full billion taken out of Albertans' pockets because of the hikes to personal income tax. They lifted the caps on utility rates. They've done nothing at all when rates skyrocketed and families were forced to choose between gas and groceries and keeping the lights on. The minister even declared in this House that the preferred UCP plan to help those Albertans was to do "nothing."

Electricity bills, natural gas, insurance premiums, income tax, student fees: Albertans are paying more and getting less. We have lineups outside of emergency rooms. Forty thousand of my fellow southern Albertans don't have a family doctor. And did they create jobs? No. Calgary's unemployment is still the highest of any Canadian major city, but still the government forks out money for private flights for the Premier and his friends, the fanciest hotels, millions for his secret war room, and time and again, over and over again, justifying a billion for a nonexistent pipeline. That's why this is the least trusted Premier in Canada, only able to hold on to his job by putting his thumb on the scale of an internal UCP process.

This is a party and a government that does not have respect for our tax dollars, our health care, or trimming waste in government. Albertans are asking for a government they can trust and that has respect for our province and the hard-working folks who build it every day. Whether it's in 12 weeks or 12 months, Alberta's NDP is ready to restore respect for Albertans yet again.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright.

Exercise Maple Resolve 2022 at CFB Wainwright

Mr. Rowswell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Many here know of Wainwright as the location of the 3rd Canadian Division support base detachment for the Canadian military. This is one of the busiest army bases in Canada. Over 600 military personnel drawn from all over Canada, many with their families, are stationed here for training. The role of the detachment is to provide extensive training to military individuals to prepare for active duty. Throughout the year military personnel are trained in a variety of military activities, primarily in-field exercises, live firing, and unit tactical operations.

Every spring, in May, the exercise Maple Resolve begins. This is a multinational exercise, involving 3,500 U.S. and Canadian troops as well as personnel from Great Britain, Australia, and France. This annual exercise identifies interoperability issues between the forces, allowing the partner nations to overcome them during training. This is not only sensible but acts as a force multiplier. It teaches individuals in the military across the world how to interact with army forces and to allow forces and units to operate together.

I'm reminded of this quote attributed to Thomas Jefferson: "The price of freedom is eternal vigilance." The important activity of CFB Wainwright and the Maple Resolve exercise is part of that vigilance. I ask everyone here to join with me in paying tribute to our Canadian Armed Forces and to remain mindful of the important training that takes place year in and year out in humble Wainwright.

Government Record

Mr. Loewen: Democracy. It's a word we all know. It's a word we all use, maybe too casually, but let's dig into it. Democracy in Greek means "rule by the people." It must be stressed that this means all people. Of course, we have many elements of majority rule in our political system; for instance, we govern ourselves in this Legislature by majority vote. We allow the party that wins the most seats to govern. We have conducted referendums on various topics that respect the will of the majority.

However, democracy is the rule by the people, all people, and that's why we also have mechanisms to include the minority. For example, we possess rights and civil liberties like free assembly, religious freedom, and even free speech for unpopular opinions. We believe in the rule of law, with the understanding that the system must always be fair and just to all people. We believe in the role of opposition and the rights of elected representatives to challenge government power, holding them to account.

However, I am troubled that this Premier does not seem to understand that he is a servant of the people. We have seen civil liberties trampled. We have seen corrupt practices that undermine our faith in fairness and the rule of law. We have seen critical and dissenting voices treated with contempt and mockery. The government seems to have little use for the people or the public's right to oversee their own government's increasing power. The Premier's so-called big tent seems just about big enough to fit his own ego and nothing else.

A government that forgets its place under the people is one that rapidly grows out of touch. Ralph Klein spoke about the dangers of dome disease and the temptation of government officials to become more obsessed with their own tight groups of insiders, ignoring the regular people outside these walls. Not everyone will agree with every decision, but the people have stopped trusting that the decisions of this government are being made for the right reason. They ultimately question whether we have true rule by the people or rule by a small group of elites and well-connected insiders.

The will of the people may be temporarily ignored, but it cannot be suppressed forever. Their demands for good governance, honesty from their MLAs, and the end of corruption will be met one way or another, either by this group or their replacements.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Children's Health Care

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, Albertans expect to see lineups of children at amusement parks, not outside their hospitals. Today the crisis in health care has reached ERs at both the Stollery and Alberta Children's hospital: packed waiting rooms, families waiting up to 16 hours, lineups of children going out the door. This UCP's mismanagement of the pandemic pushed our hospitals to the brink, and now it's our children who are paying the price. To the Premier: does he accept any responsibility for this crisis, and what is he doing to fix it? Be specific.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's regrettable but not unprecedented that we see acute pressures in our health care system. That's the case right now, and it's in part because we do have 1,000 people in hospital with COVID; thankfully, only about 45 in ICUs with COVID at this point, in addition to two years of stress on our health care workforce. That's why Alberta's government has added roughly $2 billion to the baseline budget for Alberta Health Services. We have 100 more doctors working in the system now than a year ago, 1,800 more nurses, and 1,300 more EMS personnel. We fully expect AHS to use those resources to address these pressure points.

Ms Notley: Well, it's not working, Mr. Speaker. Quote: ER doctors are the canary down the coal mine of health care; well, the canary has keeled over and died. That's Dr. Paul Parks in Medicine Hat. Quote: every funded bed is occupied. That's Dr. Eddy Lang in Calgary. Quote: the biggest worry is that a child dies. That's Dr. Shazma Mithani, who works at the Stollery children's hospital in Edmonton. Why doesn't the Premier take out his earplugs and listen to these doctors and realize he needs to do more because doing the same is not working?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the member that there is inadequate capacity in our health care system, which is why we are funding and implementing a plan to increase that capacity. My question for her is: why did she leave government after four years with the second-highest per capita health expenditures in Canada but the lowest per capita number of ICU beds with longer wait times both for surgeries and diagnostics? Why did she for four years oversee one of the most expensive systems with inadequate results?

Ms Notley: I left government with zero children standing in lineups outside of emergency rooms, Mr. Speaker.

Now, part of the problem is that children are experiencing high levels of COVID-19. Doctors provide several explanations for that, including the fact that Alberta has the lowest vaccination rate among children aged five to 11 in the country. Now, this UCP government claimed that in-school vaccinations don't work, but provinces that put vaccines in schools have vaccinated up to 20 per cent more children in their province. Just how long do the lineups at the ER have to get before this Premier reverses his . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, we encourage all eligible Albertans over the age of 12 to get the protection of vaccines. They're safe and effective, and the opposition is right. They are kids. Their parents are responsible for their health care decisions, so I find it regrettable that the NDP leader is attacking parents who have chosen not to get the vaccination for their kids. We support the choices that parents make for their minor children, but perhaps, like the Ontario NDP, she wants to throw unvaccinated kids out of our schools. We think that would be irresponsible.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition for the second set of questions.

Ms Notley: An irresponsible misstatement of the facts by that Premier.

Utility Rebate Timeline

Ms Notley: Now, meanwhile Albertans struggling to pay their utility bills are waiting and waiting and waiting. That's because when it comes to Albertans getting their electricity rebates, the UCP is speaking out of both sides of their mouth. The minister claimed June or July, but last week this government quietly passed regulations giving power producers until December 31. They rejected our deadline for the end of May, and now Albertans are discovering it will be sometime in the next seven months. To the Premier: is it any wonder Albertans don't trust him or his government?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we recognize the very significant cost pressures on people with inflation, with carbon taxes, with energy inflation, that the NDP has been calling for. They imposed the largest tax increase in the history of Alberta, their job-killing carbon tax. They cheered on Mr. Trudeau's plan to raise it by 25 per cent on April 1. They want to quadruple it. Meanwhile this Conservative government suspended the collection of Alberta's fuel tax, a $1.3 billion annualized savings, together with the gas rebate and electricity rebate, about $2 billion of support on an annual basis.

Ms Notley: They promised June; now it's December.

Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, the same goes for the Premier's fake natural gas rebate. He announced it in February at a price his own budget said would never be triggered. Lo and behold, prices in April shot through the roof. Yesterday it was $8.29. The minister recently claimed they were talking about expanding the eligibility period to cover these spikes, but information online now says it's still October. So, Premier, clear this up. Will your natural gas rebates cover the spikes Albertans are experiencing this spring, or are you making them wait again?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, when she said that the consumer protection on the natural gas price was above what was projected in the budget, that's the whole point. We were preparing Albertans for a potential increase in that price. It triggers at $6.50. We've been averaging gas prices in the last month of about $7.50, so that relief will be forthcoming together with the 13-cent-a-litre savings on the fuel tax and the electricity rebate, by far the largest consumer support of any government, provincial or federal, in the Dominion.

Ms Notley: Clearly, Albertans are still waiting for an answer on whether they are eligible now or not.

You know, meanwhile this Premier didn't hesitate to tax inflation. One call from the insurance lobby and, poof, the cap on premiums was gone. Tuition hikes every year, like clockwork. When the Premier sped up his billion-dollar handout to big, profitable corporations, it took him just two days, but when it's hundreds of thousands of struggling families, he makes them wait months, and he won't give them a clear black-and-white answer. Can the Premier explain why there is such a big difference about who it is he shows up to work on behalf of?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, the NDP is phony about a lot of things, but they're not phonier than – the phoniest issue for them is the cost of living, because they brought in a tax whose entire purpose is to increase the cost of living on Albertans. Their carbon tax . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, their carbon tax is costing average Alberta families $600 a year now, but that's not enough. They want to quadruple it. They want it to cost Alberta families over $2,000 a year. They want to dig into people's pockets. We won't let them.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Diabetes Treatment Coverage

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, just this morning I stood with over 20 Albertans, some with diabetes, others family of people with diabetes, who were infuriated with this government's plan to cancel the insulin pump therapy program. The minister has created uncertainty and chaos in the lives of Albertans who depend on these pumps and their families. People do not know how they will pay for their pump once these changes are put into place. To the Premier. Simple question: will the UCP stop this chaos, restore peace of mind for those who rely on an insulin pump by committing now to not make any further changes without comprehensive consultation with Albertans who depend on the pumps, including those in the gallery . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we all know that diabetes is a serious health issue for many Albertans, and that's why we've taken measures to actually increase access to support, particularly for lower income people and children with diabetes. We're making changes to provide Albertans with the newest technologies to better manage diabetes to maintain and improve their health and well-being. In phase 1 of the plan we provided expanded coverage for diabetes test strips and other diabetes supplies. In phase 2 we expanded coverage for continuous glucose monitors for kids under the age of 18 under supplementary health benefits.

Mr. Shepherd: Empty talking points, Mr. Speaker, while Albertans with diabetes watch this Premier. Six-year-old Conor is sitting up in the gallery today. His dad, Jason, shared with us that, quote, the fact that Conor has an insulin pump means he can safely go to school with minimal support and still be safe. Their family's care plan is built on Conor having the pump going into grade 1. If he doesn't, Jason or his wife may have to leave their job, find one with more flexibility to give Conor the care he needs during the day while he's at school. What does the Premier have to say to these families or those in similar situations who planned on having a pump but now fear losing it? Where are the details?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, we estimate that more than 1,500 children will benefit from this expanded coverage that I've mentioned, saving parents about $4,200 annually. Phase 3 of the plan will allow us to cover a new generation of insulin pumps to better support diabetic Albertans, and this involves transferring insulin pump benefits from the insulin pump therapy program to government-sponsored health benefit programs like Blue Cross nongroup coverage as of August 1. We expect that the vast majority of 4,000 Albertans receiving pumps and supplies at no cost in this program will continue to receive coverage.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, if that's what they expect, then they've done the work. Show it to the families. Let's see the plan. The people in the gallery today are just the tip of the iceberg. Both Lisa Hart and her daughter live with type 1 diabetes. After the UCP's announcement to cancel the program, they're worried that they may have to pay thousands out of pocket to keep their pumps. That'll be on top of other costs that they pay, including potential premiums, copays associated with private insurance, costs that are not associated with the current program. Can this Premier simply admit that he's made a mistake, apologize, commit to halting this cancellation and not moving one step further until he actually consults with these Albertans?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we're having consultations, and I should note that about 30 per cent, or 1,300 people, are already enrolled in government plans, and about 500 low-income Albertans will continue to receive coverage at no cost after the transition. About 60 per cent of those involved in the insulin pump therapy program do have private coverage already. Nongroup coverage costs about $63 per month for a single Albertan, plus a copayment, but seniors will only have to pay a fee of 30 per cent for a claim of up to $25. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Alberta School Councils' Association

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, the Alberta schools council has seen almost all of its funding cut over the past year. ASCA provides critical advocacy support for 1,500 school councils and more than 50,000 parent volunteers. Under the UCP this vital organization funding has gone from $650,000 in 2020 to nearly zero this spring. What is the Premier afraid of? Why is he undermining this organization that acts as representatives for thousands of diverse parent voices?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Great question. I've been a long supporter of the Alberta School Councils' Association and school councils in general. That's why I've allocated... [interjections]

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Member LaGrange: That's why, Mr. Speaker, I've allocated a million dollars to go to school councils. That's $500 for every school council to engage with their parents. Additionally, on top of that, I started up the parent advisory council. Also, I've provided a grant to the Alberta school council to do their much-needed work.

Ms Hoffman: The Alberta School Councils' Association offers critical training and education to help school councils do their work in a meaningful way and ensure that their school community has diverse representation. Yet this is another attack on public education. Many parents involved in ASCA feel that this cruel cut is happening because the UCP is vengeful. Parents throughout Alberta have been voicing their frustration with the UCP's COVID mismanagement and this government's discredited Dumpster-fire curriculum. Will the Premier tell students, staff, and families why the UCP wants to bankrupt parent advocacy and why they won't work with democratically elected parents?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. In fact, I've worked with the Alberta school council. In fact, the member opposite probably doesn't know that when I was a trustee, I actually received the friend of the Alberta School Councils' award because of my advocacy work on behalf of parents, because I believe in the... [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. minister.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I believe in the advocacy of parents. I fully support it, and that's why we continue to work with the Alberta school councils. We provided them a grant for this year to work on learning disruptions. We will continue to provide grants to them when they put them forward.

Ms Hoffman: The Alberta School Councils' Association celebrated their 90th anniversary the year the current Education minister was appointed, but under the UCP they seem dead set on shutting down ASCA and silencing elected parents who advocate for Alberta students. This is clearly a move to undermine the role of democratically elected parent volunteers. Mr. Speaker, since the current Education minister refuses to answer the actual question, I have a declaration. I've put it in writing to the President of ASCA: under an NDP government we will absolutely restore the $650,000 a year that they get to do their important work, because we stand with parents while the minister sits beside the Premier.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. More and more empty promises from the other side, empty promises that they never follow through on. That's what we heard. That's what I heard when I was a trustee. Therefore, I can assure you that we continue... [interjections]

The Sergeant-at-Arms: Order.

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, we do not fund any other association for operating costs. In the past that's what we were doing with the Alberta School Councils' Association. We are now treating them like every other association, like the Alberta School Boards Association, the College of Alberta School Superintendents, et cetera. We provide them grant funding to do specific project work.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein is next.

Springbank Reservoir Flood Mitigation Project

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The floods of 2013 caused billions of dollars in damage, forced dozens of communities to declare states of emergency, and took the lives of five people. It even forced the quick evacuation of the youth shelter I managed, destroying much of the youths' belongings and displacing these youth. In the years since this natural disaster Alberta's government has worked tirelessly with all levels of government, stakeholders, and landowners to develop plans for SR 1, the Springbank off-stream reservoir. To the Minister of Transportation: can you tell us about this historic announcement that was made last week on the banks of the Elbow and the Bow rivers?

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you to the member for the question. Mr. Speaker, we must never forget the destruction and chaos, and we must never forget those who perished. Last Thursday the Premier, fellow cabinet members, and I announced the start of construction on this once-in-a-generation project. Vinci Construction won the contract to build a dry reservoir that will divert flood waters from the Elbow River during extreme flood events. It has taken many years of collaboration, and I'm truly grateful to all of our stakeholders for their input to get us to this milestone.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for her efforts. Given that a project of this scale and magnitude is not cheap and given that costs have increased dramatically since 2017's forecast of $432 million and given that during last week's announcement the Premier said that this new total would be $744 million, to the minister: can she tell us why this project, with its escalating cost, is an important use of taxpayer dollars?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, the new total is reflected in Budget 2022. Since the original approved budget in 2017 costs have skyrocketed for construction, materials, utility and pipeline relocation, and land purchases. It's important to note that the federal government is contributing 168 and a half million dollars to this project. Without flood mitigation Alberta risks losing billions of dollars when the next major flood hits. When SR 1 is operational in a few years, it will protect lives, property, businesses, and the economy.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again to the minister for her efforts. Given that, as the minister mentioned, Vinci Construction won the contract to construct SR 1 and given that with the reservoir mapped out, crews are currently moving dirt to build the dry dam and given that part of the agreement includes work that will be done by First Nations and Métis nations in the region, to the minister: can you talk about how government engaged with Indigenous communities throughout this process?

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you for the question. Mr. Speaker, for many years Alberta's government engaged in discussion and conducted site visits with Treaty 6 First Nations, Treaty 7 First Nations, and the Métis Nation of Alberta Region 3. Alberta Transportation signed 31 agreements for various work for Indigenous contractors, from excavation and site preparation to road and bridge construction. A community liaison was also established to work with Indigenous groups and other stakeholders to address any concerns they may have had with the project.

Political Party Membership Sale and Purchase

Mr. Sabir: Bill 81 is bad for Alberta. Those aren't just my opinions; those are the opinions of at least four UCP caucus members, three of whom voted against this bill and one who filed a complaint with Elections Alberta citing concerns about membership purchases in the UCP leadership race. These are very serious concerns that require the full action of Alberta's government to ensure that the democratic traditions in Alberta are upheld and maintained. Will the minister agree to work with the opposition to immediately reverse the section of Bill 81 that allows the bulk purchasing of memberships without . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Let me say right away that that particular member is mistaken and is misinforming the general public. There is absolutely nothing in Bill 81 that allows for bulk membership. What we have in Bill 81 right now is still similar to the provision that we had prior in section 25. I'm happy to report that the Chief Electoral Officer has confirmed in a revised bulletin that there is nothing in Bill 81 that allows for bulk members without the consent of Albertans.

Mr. Sabir: Given that the UCP Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul was prevented by this government from being able to introduce his amendment to prevent someone from buying party memberships without individual consent and given that 4,000 memberships bought on six credit cards show that this type of accountability, blocked by the UCP, needs to be looked into, will the Minister of Justice agree to take the amendment from his colleague, turn it into a government bill, pass it by tomorrow, and end this unethical practice?

Mr. Madu: You know, I mean, let me say that one more time: there is nothing in Bill 81 that allows for bulk membership without the consent of party members. The process that we have right now is the process that we had prior to Bill 81. [interjections] Mr. Speaker, they are heckling because they are not interested in facts or the truth. They just want to misinform the general public. We will ensure that we don't allow the NDP to misinform Albertans on Bill 81. I am happy to have brought in . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Given that it appears the minister has not read the bill and given that Elections Alberta has confirmed that they are investigating the alleged bulk membership purchases and given that the last time they were investigated by Elections Alberta, they rushed to fire the Election Commissioner, showing the true colours of the Premier and the former Justice minister, will the four Justice ministers stand and promise that the election officer job is safe while this investigation is ongoing, or is accountability still a four-letter word for this government?

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what that particular member is talking about. There is no . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The minister.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You can see that they are heckling because they are not interested in facts and the substance of the issue. They are only interested in misinformation and disinformation. There is no threat whatsoever to the job of the Chief Electoral Officer. Let me repeat that once again: our party's, the United Conservative Party's, regulation requires consent before you can pick up a party membership, unlike the NDP. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Gasoline Prices

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, in April the UCP government declared victory on gasoline prices after they cut the provincial fuel tax, but now we see gasoline prices back on the rise and close to the same levels they were before the UCP cut the fuel tax. In the end Albertans are no further ahead than they were a month ago, and experts are saying that gas could go even higher as the war on Ukraine continues and summer driving season approaches. What is this government going to do to provide relief at the pumps for Albertans? Or is the Premier not aware of these increases since he can't even fill up his own gas tank?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I find that question ridiculous. Has that member read the newspaper? Has he looked at other provinces' fuel rates? Alberta is by far and away the lowest cost jurisdiction for gasoline, for diesel fuel. Why? Because we have an efficient system but, more importantly, because we suspended the fuel tax in this province. We're providing real relief for Albertans, more protection than any other province.

Mr. Carson: Well, given that the UCP said that the savings from the fuel tax would be passed on to Albertans and given that we have asked for an independent review to ensure this is the case but the UCP continues to refuse to provide any kind of transparency or accountability and given that fuel prices are back on the rise as Albertans already struggle to make ends meet, will this government finally agree to an independent review to ensure that all of the rebate is being passed on to Albertans? If not, why are they so scared of transparency?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, I find that question ridiculous. We monitored gasoline prices when we suspended the fuel tax, and they dropped almost across the board by 13 cents a litre. There are a lot of factors that go into the price of retail gasoline and diesel, including WTI prices, refining margins – many factors – but one thing I can say for sure today: Alberta has the lowest gasoline costs of any province in this country.

Mr. Carson: Well, given that Albertans are falling further behind under this UCP government – in fact, wages are failing to keep up with inflation, and Alberta has the slowest wage growth across the country – and given that the UCP is making a bad situation worse by piling on additional costs – income taxes, property taxes, tuition, utilities, and auto insurance have all increased drastically due to this government – and given that fuel prices are back on the rise but the UCP is doing nothing to provide transparency, why is this government okay with these rising costs as Albertans struggle to pay for basic necessities?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We recognize that affordability is an issue, and that's why we're providing real relief, almost $2 billion of annualized relief. I find it really odd, the members opposite raising the issue of affordability, being the members, when they were in government, that brought in the largest tax increase in this province's history. They brought in the carbon tax. It increased costs for everything from fuel to groceries to utilities. It affected every family, every business, every senior.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Lobbyists Act

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government has an all-too-cozy relationship between senior officials and its favoured lobbyists. When the Conservative Party of Canada was first elected in 2006, its top priority was the Federal Accountability Act, which included measures to close a revolving door between the PMO and lobbying. Sixteen years later Alberta still has some of the most lax lobbying rules in Confederation. Provincially the cooling-off periods are just one year and can be waived upon request instead of Harper's five years. To the Premier: why are cooling-off periods important federally but not for Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Indigenous Relations has risen.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I want to thank the member for his hard work on this file. The Alberta Lobbyists Act regulates lobbying activities in Alberta, and it balances free and open access to government with public transparency and accountability with respect to who is going to access it and to seek influence in government.

Mr. Barnes: Given that it shocked Albertans to see UCP members on a UCP-dominated committee block any substantive changes to the Lobbyists Act, voting down at least a dozen recommendations, including some straight from our Ethics Commissioner, and given that a proper ban on family members lobbying immediate family members is long overdue as there is currently nothing in the Lobbyists Act to prevent a lobbyist from orchestrating a deal with a staffer family member and given the perception that at least one contract has been awarded in such a scenario, Mr. Premier, are you keeping this obvious loophole open?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations has risen.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again thank you for the question. Unfortunately, many of the recommendations that were presented were unclear and, if adopted, would have created mountains of burdensome red tape. Others already exist, like recommending a cooling-off period for former government staff.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, given that the entire purpose of lobbying rules and regulations is to prevent special interests from exerting undue influence denied to regular Albertans and given that there is currently nothing within the Lobbyists Act to prevent UCP provincial board members from lobbying the government and given that there is currently a registered lobbyist sitting on the UCP's provincial board and given that the leadership review's returning officer is also a registered lobbyist, can the Premier tell us: if all the lobbyists he meets with work for the UCP, who is working for Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the Alberta lobbyist registry is a free online registration system which lobbyists must use to register their lobbying activities in Alberta to be in compliance with the Alberta Lobbyists Act. All registrations are searchable and viewable by the public free of charge at any time. Also, ultimately, Alberta's Lobbyists Act is one of the most stringent in the country, and I believe the committee felt that these recommendations were not going to be helpful to improve it.

2:20 Live Events Industry Support

Ms Goehring: Mr. Speaker, the events industry, artists, theatres, and venues were hit hard by the pandemic. They were the first industry to close their doors and limit their audiences and performances, because of public health orders, and the last to open. Many took on debt and had to lay off staff just to survive the pandemic. Many are struggling to get back on their feet, and they are looking to this government for support to be able to recover. The stabilize program was meant to help, but I've heard concerns that many are still waiting for support. Can the minister confirm that every cent of the stabilize program has gone out the door?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Culture.

Mr. Orr: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes. We fully recognize that the live events industry, everything from rodeos to music to theatre, was definitely hard hit, first to close and last to open. The stabilize program has come to an end. The money, to my knowledge, has gone out. I'd also like to add that we've actually increased the budget this year for arts and culture. There will actually be more money available this year than there was last year.

Thank you.

Ms Goehring: Given that for many this funding came late, which meant additional pressures for them as they waited for the government to catch up to the commitment that they made to them, and given that artists and the events industry pivoted their projects, platforms, and services in response to the pandemic without initial help from the government for far too long and given that the stabilize program didn't help artists or spaces with these retroactive costs, which they asked for, can the minister explain why so many were forced to wait for this essential funding? Has he apologized to those who were forced to stress because this government was unable to live up to their commitments?

Mr. Orr: Well, Mr. Speaker, I don't accept the implication of that question. While I realize that everybody in this province struggled and was under stress, the reality is that we worked very hard with the entire industry to try and help them out, and we received a lot of input of them. As I said earlier, this coming year there will be even more money available than there was last year.

Ms Goehring: Given that I have heard from venues in the live experience industry about the pressures that they are experiencing as a result of inflation and the cost-of-living crisis the UCP created and given that skyrocketing utility bills, higher costs are compounding with debt many of these organizations had to take out to survive the pandemic, raising concern for many that they might not be sustainable, and given that the rebates that this government promised but won't deliver for months aren't enough for many, what supports will the minister roll out to help the industry survive this latest crisis? Will it be to tell them that they're on their own again?

Mr. Orr: Well, Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the NDP would have done – they would have had every live event completely shut down, completely locked down, and everybody told to stay home – we made a point of making sure that they could be open, that they could continue to have business. I'd like to tell you that Alberta is open for business. When I talk to the live events industry now, they are booked solid. When Alberta thrives, culture thrives. Things are looking up in Alberta, and they're going to continue to look up.

South Edmonton Hospital Construction Funding

Member Loyola: The Minister of Infrastructure is making an egregious mistake of pursuing the P3 model for the $2 billion Edmonton south hospital. Other provinces, like Saskatchewan, Ontario, Manitoba, have had bad experiences with P3 projects. Even the previous Alberta Conservative government knew P3s were a mistake. The only apparent reason that this minister is pursuing the P3 is to consider this government's mission to funnel public funding into the hands of private corporations. To the minister: will he now give Albertans a clear and unequivocal answer that he will not waste $2 billion of public taxpayer funding on pursuing a P3 model?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, I cannot go against the will of Albertans, who have voted for our campaign commitment to aggressively pursue public-private partnerships where it makes sense, where our taxpayers get the best benefit. In this particular case we haven't decided what the procurement method is yet.

Member Loyola: Given that the minister seems to ignore the past failure of P3 projects in Alberta and given that the Bessie Nichols school was a P3 program that was a disaster and cost the taxpayers millions more than the traditional model and given that private contractors weren't allowing school administrators to even control the thermostat on the coldest days and that there were incidents of student injury, is this minister really okay with sick patients forced to bundle up on cold days or willing to make doctors, nurses, and health care aides work around failed and potentially dangerous infrastructure just so your government can get more public funds into the pockets of profitable corporations?

Mr. Panda: To that particular member "profit" is a word that I don't know if he understands what it is. He hates that word, "profit," but that's a different subject, Mr. Speaker.

Let me correct him. The experience of P3s in the previous government was validated by the Auditor General when they determined the value for Albertans. There were some things to be fixed in delivering schools, for example, which we are working on. But the hospital project, if we go through P3s, will still be safe.

Member Loyola: Given that the city of Edmonton tried this risky P3 experiment for the valley line LRT and given that this risky experiment has resulted in years of delays and cost millions more than anticipated and given that the previous mayor has called for the province to stop forcing more P3 projects down their throats, to the minister: will you finally listen to the city of Edmonton and commit to not forcing municipalities to accept projects built on your ideological P3 agenda and just finally get the Edmonton south hospital built?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, we'll work with the city of Edmonton. If they have any concerns about P3s, we'll address them. And we'll definitely continue the work on this Edmonton hospital. But when the member opposite is talking about ideology, theirs was the risky ideology, which Albertans are still trying to recover from after four years of their risky ideological policies.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East is next.

Oil and Gas Export

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta is making rapid progress in its economic recovery plan. The unemployment rate is the lowest since the government took office. Alberta now tops the rest of the country in overall employment rate. The energy sector provides more economic opportunities. Oil and gas production from Alberta's oil sands extraction continues to increase, higher than it was in 2019. To the minister: what plans are in place to ensure that Alberta's energy supply continues to reach both Canadian and international markets?

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you for that question. As the world moves to weed out Russian oil and gas, it also has highlighted the shortage of supply and it's exposed the weaknesses in energy security. It's also shown that the world will continue to use oil and gas for decades, even in a world that's transitioning towards net zero. The question is: where will that supply come from? Every single barrel of oil that we leave in the ground here will come out of the ground somewhere else, and we believe that energy should come from Alberta. Mr. Speaker, that's why we are accelerating our efforts in North American energy security.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that Alberta still has more capacity to increase its energy export to other countries and within Canada and that that is likely to increase the revenue flow in the province's economic recovery plan and given that Alberta's ethically produced oil is the solution and substitute for Russia's conflict oil, what is the minister doing in terms of investment in energy infrastructure to increase Alberta's oil and gas exportation nationally and globally?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We sit on top of the third-largest reserves of oil in the world, and on this side of the House we treat our oil and gas industry like a strategic asset, something to be proud of and support, not something to demonize. That's why our government supports all forms of egress. North, south, east, west: we've supported every single pipeline proposed, and our export market always has been and continues to be North America and the United States. That's why we have been working with Senator Joe Manchin, the proud Democrat from West Virginia, on energy security.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that Alberta still requires more investment in the energy sector to increase the supply and, further, given that there are higher prospects for Alberta's energy in the global markets in the short and long term, to the minister: what are the efforts that have been taken and timelines put in place to remove antienergy legislation that deprives Alberta's energy supply from reaching global and regional markets?

The Speaker: The minister.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We all know the history, the very sad history, of cancelled and vetoed pipelines at the hands of the Trudeau government, supported by the NDP governments. The history of vetoes and pipeline cancellations will go down as one of the biggest mistakes that this country has made in its history, but we have an opportunity to reset as the world grapples with energy security. We have an opportunity to reset energy policy, one that includes challenging bills C-69 and C-48, creating efficient and predictable regulatory processes, eliminating red tape, and working on North American energy security.

2:30 Antiracism Initiatives in Education

Mr. Deol: Recently the John Humphrey Centre for Peace and Human Rights led workshops across the province where parents, teachers, school board trustees, and community members shared ideas on how to curb racism in academic settings. Those workshops resulted in a final report and calls to action. It is clear that across school districts and areas of the province it is up to each individual school board to look to address racism. Can the Minister of Education explain why there is no guidance from the ministry on developing antiracism policies? Racism isn't reasonable.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and a great question. It's something we're all very concerned about. School authorities do develop their policies. It is incumbent on school authorities to make sure that they have strong, safe, welcoming, caring school policies. Many of them go to extra lengths, particularly to combat racism right across the whole school authority, divisions right across this province. Again, we're working with school authorities because they are the ones that are putting in place policies and implementing them.

Mr. Deol: Given that school boards are trying to address this issue in the face of ever-decreasing funding from the province and given that there are no clear guidelines, goals, timelines, or targeted funding in the Ministry of Education to combat racism and given that the Action Alberta report recommends stable funding for antiracism initiatives in education and given that under the UCP there are currently no grants open or available to support antiracism, will the minister commit today to ensuring that all school districts have access to consistent funding to address racism within the education system?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I indicated earlier, school authorities are looking to make sure that they have strong policies in this area, but beyond that, we're addressing it in the curriculum for the first time ever. We are ensuring that our curriculum is focused on: every student is welcomed regardless of where they come from, regardless of . . . [interjections] It's very hard to actually give you great answers, because the opposition continues to heckle on something that is such an important issue. Antiracism is everybody's responsibility, including our schools.

Mr. Deol: Given that many Indigenous and racialized Albertans have repeatedly said that they do not see themselves reflected in the education system and given that in order to address racism, we need to increase the diversity of educators and given that we need to focus not only on hiring more Indigenous and racialized Albertans but that we also need to focus on recruiting and training more diverse educators, can the Minister of Education explain what work has been undertaken with the Minister of Advanced Education to address this issue in the education system and what benchmarks the government is targeting to increase the diversity of educators?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. You know, this is actually an issue that all of us agree on. I think my one request to the members opposite is to support the curriculum, because – guess what? – for the first time in our history the K to 6 draft curriculum actually addressed racism and included minority, cultural, religious groups in that same curriculum that the members opposite are opposed to.

Legal Aid Alberta Contract

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, this government talks a big game about supporting the rule of law, but as Albertans have come to see, it's all just empty words. Legal aid ensures that all Albertans can get fair access to the justice system. However, under the UCP it is under attack. Only days ago it was reported that dozens of lawyers were removed from the legal aid roster for refusing to sign a new contract that was described by a 25-year veteran of legal aid as, quote, terrible. Why has the Justice minister failed to protect the justice system by allowing this crisis to develop on his watch?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Wilson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. We continue to fund and work with Legal Aid Alberta so that Albertans can access legal aid. Legal aid is key to ensuring access to justice, and the legal aid program is integral to the administration of justice by supporting some of our most vulnerable citizens.

Mr. Sabir: Given that Deborah Hatch, a lawyer who has worked with legal aid for over 25 years, when asked about the prospect of losing so many senior lawyers from legal aid, has stated, quote, I would be very, very, deeply concerned for what that means for the state of justice in Alberta, end quote, and given that the Justice minister has already done untold damage to our health system with his war on doctors, can the minister explain why it seems that wherever he goes, things get worse for Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Indigenous Relations is rising.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. As you know, Alberta's government's pandemic response has led our justice system and legal aid to innovate. They now offer a balance of remote, digital, and in-person legal aid services to ensure Albertans have safe access to justice. Continued partnerships, including the one between this government and legal aid in Alberta, help ensure fairness in the justice system, which benefits all Albertans. We will continue to support Albertans by keeping legal aid part of an accessible justice system. Since 2014 the Alberta government has increased legal aid funding by $29 million.

Mr. Sabir: Given that in a shocking revelation Deborah then stated that she was told by someone she described as being in a position of power that she might be supported to become a Queen's Counsel if she toned down her public concern about the legal aid contract and given that previously a former NDP staff member was denied a QC while all of the eligible people who support the current government got theirs and given that these instances raise serious ethical concerns – and I hope the Justice minister takes them seriously and will work to address them – can the minister tell this House what he is going to do to address this situation?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration is rising.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. I am actually shocked by that question. The Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall is a lawyer by training, and the Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall knows that there is a process for the designation of QCs. There is an independent committee, that's made up of judges both from the Provincial Court and the Court of Queen's Bench and members of the Law Society, that vets applications before making recommendations to the Minister of Justice. That member should be ashamed of himself.

Utility Costs and Rebates

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With the pandemic getting further into the rear-view mirror, we now have an inflationary mess caused by the Trudeau government's spending and tax-raising antics. This cost rising has been hard on families throughout Lesser Slave Lake between the struggle of powering and heating their homes and the rising cost of fuel to get around. To the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity: what steps have been taken to ease these costs, that continue to rise for my constituents and all Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. We recognize the burden that the increase in utilities and other costs is having on Albertans, and that's why we're bringing in short-term supports to help Albertans while we do the longer term work to lower prices. We are bringing in the natural gas rebate, the electricity rebate, and, of course, the 13 cents a litre that we paused at the pump. That's $2 billion worth of supports, by far the most generous in the country. We have demonstrated that we will always have Albertans' backs.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, and thank you to the minister. Given that the rebates are greatly needed right away as many people continue to struggle with these costs and given that I have also received concern from my constituents in Lesser Slave Lake about how soon they will see this relief because of the continual fact-twisting antics of the NDP to spread false information, to the same minister: how will these rebates be applied to the bills of those living throughout Lesser Slave Lake? This may be hard for the NDP to listen to, but how soon will we see them applied? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. The hon. the associate minister is the only one with the call.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Despite the NDP's best efforts to slow down the passage of this bill – and that's right; you can't make this stuff up. The NDP actually voted to slow down passage of this bill, an absolute outrage at a time when Albertans need these supports. We moved at speed to get the legislation through the Legislature. We moved at speed to write the regulations . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The hon. associate minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We got royal assent on April 29, we wrote the regulations in under three days, and then we got the rules to the retailers, and they're moving at speed as well.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks again to the minister. Given that these rebates will help in the short term and provide much-needed relief to those throughout Alberta and given that these increased costs will still be part of their future bills, which some worry about when the rebates end, to the same minister: what else is the government doing to improve the electricity costs for all Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. I don't have a conversation with either the Premier or cabinet about electricity that doesn't start or end with: how do we lower prices for all Albertans? We know that the path forward for cheaper prices is through increased choice and more competition. That's why we've introduced Bill 22, which is about modernizing the electricity grid and increasing generation options for Albertans. They broke the electricity grid, and we're going to fix it.

The Speaker: Hon. members, this concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will continue to the remainder of the daily Routine.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Premier's Leadership

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In 2015 conservatives split the vote between two conservative parties, that led to 28 constituencies going to the NDP and giving them 54 seats in the Legislature, allowing them to form a majority government that, thankfully, only lasted one term.

Mr. Speaker, Albertans will never forget the way they were treated by the NDP government. They couldn't trust them then, and they can't trust them in the future. Parents will never forget the way choice for their children's education was robbed. Albertans will never forget the NDP's carbon tax, driving billions of dollars out of our province and putting thousands of people out of work.

It is for these reasons that Albertans will never elect an NDP government again. As we approach a monumental moment for conservatives in Alberta, we must ask ourselves: how important is unity? Mr. Speaker, under the current Premier Alberta has faced a triple black swan event: negative oil prices, a recession, and a global pandemic. I don't think a single member in this House ran for office expecting to face such extreme circumstances, but in a way that only Albertans can, we rose to the challenge and overcame.

As made clear in the last election, Albertans want a conservative government, which is why they must stay united, ensuring that the NDP, who are untrustworthy, never sit on this side of the House again. It is true that you can't make everyone happy in government. If you want proof, just ask the NDP Twitter mob. But I am proud of the government's fiscal management, the countless investments brought back to Alberta, the jobs created, infrastructure built, industry diversification and growth – it goes on, Mr. Speaker – and a balanced budget, something the NDP could never figure out. Now, with over 90 per cent of our campaign promises having already been fulfilled by this government despite the exceptional challenges we've faced, we continue to move forward.

The province is better off with the UCP, and Albertans know it. That is why the United Conservatives will win the election in 2023, and I'm excited to see that happen under the current Premier.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Are there tablings? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has a tabling.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In my questions earlier today I referred to a letter that I sent to the president of the Alberta School Councils' Association, Brandi Rai, notifying the ASCA that if the NDP is re-elected, we will restore funding for Alberta school councils.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of the hon. Mr. Copping, Minister of Health, pursuant to the Health Professions Act the Alberta College of Social Workers annual report 2021, the College of Registered Nurses of Alberta annual report 2020-21.

The Speaker: Hon. members, a gold star for everyone. This is two days in a row with no points of order, and as such we are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 202

Public Health (Transparency and Accountability) Amendment Act, 2022

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Let me start by stating that it is an honour to be here in the Legislature to speak to second reading of my private member's bill.

The right and the opportunity for private members to independently bring forward legislation is vital to the proper functioning of our Assembly. Unfortunately, Bill 202, which was the second private member's bill for this session, is finally seeing second reading after nine weeks in session.

I have often stated in the Chamber that each and every MLA's first duty is to represent the families and communities of our constituencies, and bringing forward private members' bills is essential. However, I want to add that Bill 202 isn't solely supported by the good people of the central Peace. In fact, this bill is a direct result of a province-wide consultation process. In addition to gathering input online and through social media, I have personally visited dozens of communities over the past six months. In each and every community people have expressed deep concerns about Alberta's pandemic management during the repeatedly declared, rescinded, then redeclared public health emergencies.

This shouldn't come as a surprise to anyone here today. I know that each and every one of us has received hundreds of phone calls and e-mails about pandemic management over the past two years. More than any other issue over the past decade this one has impacted the lives of every single Albertan from every corner of our province. As the pandemic unfolded on a week-to-week and even day-to-day basis, this government took contradictory positions on a variety of measures, swinging from the open for good to directly infringing on constitutionally protected rights.

In addition, the scattershot directives resulted in a confusing and contradictory mix of restrictions that failed common-sense tests for many Albertans. Here's one example with which many of us are familiar. At one point some smaller church services' attendance was allowed to proceed while funerals were not allowed with the same numbers. There clearly is no scientific argument for such nonsense, and none was ever offered.

By seeking to enforce such contradictory directives, the government did more harm than good when it came to overall compliance with pandemic measures. When MLAs, myself included, attempted to speak up and explain the situation to government, more often than not we were dismissed out of hand and even vilified for daring to speak out on behalf of our constituents. This wasn't helpful or necessary, and it just dumped gas on the fire as greater numbers of Albertans started to question the lack of checks and balances in place to prevent authoritarian government overreach.

I should note that this government was warned about this issue beforehand. These concerns were raised as part of a legislative review of Alberta's Public Health Act. The report issued following the review specifically noted that the Public Health Act should be amended to enhance transparency and democratic accountability. Speaking to the Select Special Public Health Act Review Committee on August 27, 2020, the chief medical officer of health, Dr. Deena Hinshaw, stated:

[Recognizing that] there need to be checks and balances, there need to be assurances that there's not going to be use of this act in an inappropriate way, I would advocate that tools not be taken out but, rather, if additional checks and balances are needed, that those be put in.

As I've stated previously, the committee's report called for three key measures: first, that an order declaring a state of public health emergency under section 52.1 cannot lapse and subsequently be reinstalled without the approval of the Legislative Assembly; secondly, that ministerial orders issued under section 52.1 cannot be renewed without the approval of the Legislative Assembly; thirdly, that sunset clauses be included under section 52.1 to ensure that health orders are reviewed in a timely manner to ensure that they are removed when no longer necessary. All three of these are reasonable recommendations widely supported in communities across our province, and all three have been ignored.

Mr. Speaker, the fact is that democracy matters more during an emergency situation, not less. A government that is unwilling to debate, defend, or alter its public health restrictions cannot complain when compliance drops or misinformation spreads. The moral authority needed to navigate a crisis, any crisis, is not granted by law but by public will. This is exactly why, for example, the federal government requires a vote of the House of Commons and the Senate to ratify use of its Emergencies Act. You may remember that earlier this year, when the Prime Minister chose to invoke the Emergencies Act, it was widely seen as authoritarian overreach. In fact, the members of the Assembly here in Alberta adopted Motion 10, which condemned the invocation of the Emergencies Act and declared, in part, that it "infringes upon the constitutionally guaranteed rights of Albertans and all Canadians." In the run-up to the Senate vote on ratifying the Emergencies Act, it became clear that the federal government could not clearly demonstrate its case for maintaining the Emergencies Act, and the state of emergency was lifted.

In my consultations with Albertans I can tell you that people here find it clearly hypocritical that the Alberta government chose to repeatedly declare public health emergencies without a single ratification vote, yet criticized the federal government on its use of the federal Emergencies Act. The bottom line is this: Albertans want checks and balances added to the Public Health Act to ensure that there is greater accountability and transparency during declared public health emergencies.

Furthermore, Albertans want to make it clear, to this government in particular, that democratic oversight of pandemic management and other emergencies is not something to be avoided or disregarded. It is something to be embraced, and with good reason. The moral authority necessary to govern during difficult times is derived directly from free and fair votes. The very word "democracy" itself comes from two root words, "dēmos," meaning people, and "kratos," meaning rule. I believe we can do a much better job respecting our democratic traditions while protecting public health. To make this happen, changes are necessary, but here's the good news: we can fix this.

Bill 202 provides MLAs with additional oversight powers during a public health state of emergency. Under Bill 202 the Assembly's essential role in debating and voting on extensions of public health states of emergency will be strengthened. Future ministers of Health will be prevented from circumventing the Assembly by allowing a state of emergency to lapse only to declare a new state of emergency without seeking the Assembly's approval. In addition, Bill 202 proposes that a new section be added to the Public Health Act. This new section provides a framework by which the Assembly may opt to review, revoke, or amend some public health measures during a public health state of emergency. Under Bill 202 any two members of the Assembly may file a written request with the minister to initiate the Assembly's oversight process. This process must be carried out "within 2 sitting days." It must include a debate of "at least 2 hours," and a vote must follow the debate.

Now, I've heard from some who oppose this bill, who fear that it would weaken the powers of the medical officers of health at the wrong time. This is demonstrably false. Bill 202 doesn't include a single word that alters the powers of the medical officers of health in any way, nor does it impede officers of health from issuing such orders as they see fit, when they see fit. Rather, Bill 202 simply provides the Assembly with the ability to ratify and adjust such orders following debate. Why anybody would seek to minimize or avoid such debate is beyond me. Debate is the beating heart of our parliamentary tradition. Frankly, if the government can't provide the scientific data to convince the majority of 87 MLAs to ratify health orders, how can it convince the public of the necessity to comply with these same orders? In short, it can't. Furthermore, it is self-evident that the democratic oversight won't weaken pandemic management. If anything it will improve public compliance with health orders, making severe restrictions that infringe on constitutionally protected rights unnecessary.

Finally, Bill 202 includes some simple and straightforward transparency measures. First, under Bill 202 medical officers of health will continue to be able to issue isolation and quarantine orders as well as exemptions to these orders. Bill 202 requires that such orders be tabled in the Legislature in a timely fashion to ensure that legislators and the public understand the nature of the orders, including which specific section of the Public Health Act is being invoked. Bill 202 applies to general orders only and not to orders that may allow private citizens to be identified.

Secondly, under Bill 202 cabinet will continue to be able to issue orders that may be necessary to protect public health, including the emergency closure of specific facilities. In addition, for example, the government may request that the Lieutenant Governor delay an election. Bill 202 requires that such orders be tabled in the Legislature on a timely basis to ensure that legislators and the public understand the nature of the orders.

Finally, under Bill 202 the Minister of Health may declare a public health state of emergency in consultation with the chief medical officer of health. Bill 202 requires that such declarations be tabled in the Legislature on a timely basis to ensure that legislators and the public understand the nature of such declarations, including which specific section of the Public Health Act is being invoked.

Why are these changes needed? The fact is that during the recent COVID-19 pandemic elected officials and the public grew frustrated and concerned regarding the emergency powers being exercised by the government and public health officials. These three measures are necessary to provide clarity to legislators and the public alike. In addition, these changes are needed to combat misinformation.

There are those, like the federal government, who believe the answer is to veer towards authoritarianism and restrict free expression; however, I am not one of those people. The fact is that restricting speech will only make things worse. The answer, rather, is to provide clear and accurate information in a timely manner. The more we can proactively do to promptly address Albertans' concerns and reduce unnecessary public frustrations, the better.

I also believe the government has a role to play in minimizing panic.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

For clarity, I just want to ensure for the record that it's your intention to be moving second reading. Correct?

Mr. Loewen: Yeah.

The Acting Speaker: Yes. All right.

Are there any other members looking to join debate?

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, today the Minister of Health was actually in Calgary to announce a new $2 million program which aims to improve the identification of potential donors, support families considering consent at a really difficult time, and save more lives. The specialists in end-of-life care, neuroprognostication, and donation, otherwise known as SEND program, will see 22 specialist physicians co-ordinating organ donation and transplantation opportunities. This program goes hand in hand with a private member's bill we have on the docket, Bill 205, Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022, introduced to this Chamber by the Member for Highwood. I think that given the timing of this announcement, it would be prudent to move to debate on second reading of this bill; therefore, I move to adjourn debate on Bill 202, Public Health (Transparency and Accountability) Amendment Act, 2022.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 205 Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022

The Acting Speaker: I see that the hon. Member for Highwood has risen.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to move second reading on my private member's bill, Bill 205, Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022, and to take time to tell today a couple of stories that have really ignited my passion for building a much stronger organ and tissue donation system here in the province of Alberta.

The story of Dan and Jennifer Woolfsmith's daughter is both heartbreaking and inspiring and important to share. Mackenzy, their daughter, was just 22 months old when she suffered a devastating injury and was declared brain-dead.

As a parent this is the worst possible news you could ever receive. But due to the circumstances of Mackenzy's death there was a chance of organ donation. Organ donation was something that the Woolfsmiths found clarity in. They knew that their daughter would have wanted to help others, and organ donation was one way to do that. However, there was a moment in the process when Mackenzy was almost disqualified as a donor.

As I have mentioned in earlier speeches, only 1 to 2 per cent of individuals who signed up to be donors can qualify to donate. To donate one's organs, there normally must be neurological determination of death, also referred to as brain death, which means that the brain has permanently lost all function and a diagnosis of death using neurological criteria has been determined. But in order to donate once brain death has occurred, an individual has to stay on life support, meaning that in the case of Mackenzy, her organs had to continue to work until the surgeries were complete. That is why identification of donors early on in the process is so critically important, to ensure there are no missed donor opportunities and that the viability of organs for donation is preserved.

Mackenzy was ultimately able to save the lives of four other children and give the gift of life. There are many people who are awaiting organ donation right now whose opportunities for transplant have been missed because of delay, causing a loss of viability, something that was thankfully missed in the case of Mackenzy and those four other children that she saved.

As many of my colleagues know, these individuals' lives are significantly worse of organ failure, those who continue to wait for organ and tissue transplantation. Sadly, Mr. Speaker, there are 4,500 Canadians currently waiting for a transplant, and in Alberta alone that number is almost 700.

Mr. Speaker, there is currently a seven-year wait time for a liver transplant. We know that for those who are living with liver failure, life is extremely hard. This life is filled with blood tests, imaging tests, surgical examinations, medications, and constant trips to the hospital for liver dialysis, which is time away from their families. This is completely time consuming and physically and emotionally draining for these individuals. The seven-year wait time to receive a liver is a direct result of there being so few donors and donor opportunities right now.

The sad reality, Mr. Speaker, is that we know that organ transplants save lives. For most organs patient survival is greater than 80 per cent after five years. Take Helen Determan's story. She was the third patient to ever receive a liver transplant in Edmonton back in 1989. She was told that she had five years to live afterwards, but luckily she received the gift of life, which completely changed her life. Helen went on to travel globally as she represented Canada in the World Transplant Games. Helen recently passed away, just recently, but she is a symbol of resiliency, strength, and determination, and she will always be remembered. It is my goal to be able to hear more stories like this and like Helen's as the years go on.

That is exactly the intent of why I've brought to this Assembly Bill 205, which I move second reading of today, to improve this system by spreading awareness and education on organ and tissue donations, by having specialized professionals speaking with families like the Woolfsmiths to encourage organ and tissue donation, and by improving agency guidelines so that we can have annual reviews and reports.

All of these steps are crucial to build a stronger system of organ and tissue donation in the province of Alberta. We need to work hard to pass this legislation so that the wait-lists can start to decline and so that more Albertans can live their best lives possible free from constant assessments, medications, and worries, more time that they can spend with their families.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I move second reading of Bill 205.

The Acting Speaker: Okay. Are there any members wishing to join the debate? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am compelled to rise once again in support of Bill 205. Organ donation is more important than many of us realize. It saves lives and significantly improves the quality of life for many people. In fact, as the hon. member shared, there are currently somewhere around 700 Albertans on transplant wait-lists. Bill 205 will put in place three vital recommendations to build a strong foundation for a significantly better human tissue and organ donation system here in Alberta. First, it will implement a mandatory referral process; second, it will improve agency guidelines; and third, it will improve education and awareness.

To go back to the first and maybe the most important, the change to mandatory referral, a change from our current law of only mandatory consideration, mandatory referral is the legal requirement for health care professionals to report all patients who may become potential donors to their organ donation organization. This requirement is an essential building block of a highly functioning organ and tissue donation and transplantation system because it supports the timely identification, referral, and assessment of potential donors. Notifying the ODD reduces the effect of clinical bias or lack of knowledge regarding donations, which has been identified as a leading cause of nonreferral cases.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to mention that mandatory referral is independent of the consent model and does not affect how families are approached to discuss consent to donate. Registering as an organ donor or sharing your wishes with your family does not necessarily mean you will automatically become an organ donor. The pathway to become an organ donor is complex since individuals must die in circumstances where donation is possible. Contrary to common assumptions, those circumstances are rare. As a proportion of total deaths in Canada approximately 1.2 per cent have the potential to become donors. Each patient who is a potential donor is rare, and identification and referral of those patients is the only way they can become actual donors. However, failure to identify those possible donors is the single largest factor explaining the differences in deceased donation rates here nationally versus internationally.

Missed donor opportunities occur when potential donors are not identified, ODDs are not notified, or referrals are received too late. Missed donor opportunities also arise when potential donors are identified by the treating medical team but they choose not to notify the ODD. In cases of late or nonreferral life-sustaining therapy is withdrawn in a way that excludes the possibility for donation, preventing the wishes of the patient and their family towards donation from even being considered.

Mandatory referral ensures that every family and individual is given the opportunity to include donation in their end-of-life care if they so desire. The patient's medical suitability for donation is assessed earlier by clinicians who are experts in donation and transplantation. This may reduce delays for the hospital and ensure that availability of supporting infrastructure, for example, an operating room, is made available. Assessment of donation suitability can occur in all instances with the timely identification of potential organ donors, helping avoid missed donation opportunities. It ensures that a potential donor is maintained on life support, which is essential for the usability of those organs.

Family discussions can be planned for when suitability for donation has been determined, which gives families the right information at the right time. This reduces uncertainty and disappointment on occasions when families are approached too soon or are later told that their loved one is not actually eligible to be a donor.

In the second part amendments to the Organ and Tissue Donation Agency will pave the way for annual reviews, reports, and suggestions submitted directly to the minister. Since mandatory referral is only effective if there is a way to review those referrals, this is a critical part of the bill to verify that a stronger system of donation is continued in the future.

Third, or last, the education component of Bill 205 expands the information provided to Albertans to ensure that they have access to the most current and up-to-date information, education, and awareness.

This bill is an excellent piece of legislation brought to modernize and strengthen Alberta's tissue and organ donation system. It is brought forward to help the system be better and save lives. I commend the Member for Highwood for bringing this bill forward. I hope that all in this Chamber will continue to support this bill so that we can see it made law and help those throughout Alberta and possibly even across Canada.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Next, hon. members, I see the hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. My colleague did a beautiful job in describing the bill, and I don't have a lot more to add to that other than some personal anecdotes. I don't know – for those of you who remember my maiden speech when I was first elected in the opposition, I spoke about Jaydon Sommerfeld, who was actually killed in a car accident traversing across the highway from Chestermere high school. That's a very dangerous piece of highway out in my riding. Jaydon was one of the best friends to my son Sehran, and Sehran was at school the day we lost Jaydon.

As a result of that entire tragedy, his parents were able to save eight lives with Jaydon. Jaydon, at the tender age of 16, had actually signed to donate his organs and tissues and was such a blessing to so many. To this day – I just saw his mom the other day – it's still hard to not embrace each other and cry. For any of us who love a child in any capacity, whether they're yours or you're an auntie, uncle, or whatever, some mentor to these children, the impact that these kiddos have on our lives is humongous, especially when we lose them so young.

Also, Morgahan Krieger was a student of mine and of my girlfriend. She was a voice student, a beautiful young woman, had type 1 diabetes, and passed away while she was at school out east. Her parents had to fly out. They're watching this debate, actually, very closely because it's very important to them, as you can imagine. She would have celebrated her 24th birthday on May 6. My son, who you saw singing in the Legislature today, was very good friends with Morghan. They sang together on a regular basis.

Morghan's mom actually got to go to Halifax, the Stanfield airport, to meet with Monique, who was the recipient of Morghan's heart. She felt her daughter's heart beating very, very strong in the chest of Monique. It is a story that, when you think about what that would feel like or even the strength of her mom and dad and their son to be able to meet with Monique and to feel that heart beat strong and what it meant to that family – and many of Morghan's organs and tissues were also donated. The lives not only of the people that they've saved but the contributions even to the family to be able to participate in such a meaningful way – and I want to thank our wonderful MLA for Highwood for bringing this forward and continuing to have the discussion.

I will end with something that is related. I think it's really important. These private members' bills are an absolute blessing in this Legislature. We might not always completely agree on how that legislation should come to be, but private members' legislation has been a staple in this space since, really, like, 1993. Ralph Klein fought very, very hard along with the opposition to make sure that private members' legislation was able to be discussed and to be able to participate fully. Quite often private members' legislation is based on the needs of constituents, is based on being able to elevate legislation, and whether or not we agree with that legislation, the ability to debate that legislation is purely about democracy in this House. That democracy cannot be suppressed, should not be suppressed, and should be considered a privilege by each one of us who holds space in this place.

I have been very, very blessed to have three of my bills come to the floor as a private member, and in fact one of them was incorporated by the government, which is the FGM bill, which hopefully will still come back to the floor.

I just want to say how grateful I am that legislation from the private members is here, and I would ask that as we debate this very important piece of legislation, as we come forward on this legislation, we understand the privilege of that and that we continue to elevate discussions of private members' bills, that we debate them fulsomely in this house, that they make it to the floor, that we honour our responsibility and, in particular, Ralph Klein, who made the decision along with the leaders of the opposition at that time to be able to bring forward legislation that comes from private members. There's been a huge history in this Legislature of drafting that legislation, the importance of drafting that legislation, and the very robust debate that comes out of that legislation.

We can debate, we can amend, we can even vote against it should we choose to at the end of the day, but this is a bill that shows the importance and the work that the MLA for Highwood has done to bring this bill to the floor. I have two people in my own personal life that are watching this bill. They're watching how it's coming forward, and it will impact their lives in ways that we can't even imagine. So with my privilege and standing here, I ask that we always consider that the MLA for Highwood is having the privilege of debating his bill on this floor and that we always take that privilege very seriously and that we do not suppress democracy and that we continue to allow these bills to hold space in this place.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Next I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has risen.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 205, the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. Before I begin, I want to thank the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore for her comments regarding the importance of the private members' legislation process.

Indeed, I would like to congratulate the Member for Highwood for being given the opportunity to bring his bill to the floor, an opportunity that has been systematically and, I do believe, intentionally denied by members of this government to almost every single bill brought forward by an opposition member. That is a disgraceful record for this government. As the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore noted, it is highly outside the normal practice of this House. It is an affront to democracy. That's it. The poor behaviour and lack of ethics of his colleagues or, I suppose, that member, if he supports this system, do not impinge on the quality of his bill. Certainly, unlike members of government, I'm quite happy to consider a bill that is brought forward by the other party in this House.

Now, Bill 205 focuses on the question of organ donation. Let me be clear, Mr. Speaker, that all of us in the Alberta NDP caucus strongly support organ donation and steps that can be taken to help improve donor participation rates in Alberta. That is always a good thing to do. Certainly, in my role as the critic for Health I've had the opportunity to speak with many Albertans about their experiences going through the transplant system, sometimes about challenges they've faced or delays, because certainly we recognize that there can be a limited number of organs available. There are a number of things that have to be considered in determining whether someone is eligible for a transplant, so it is a complex system. Certainly, I could understand how fraught that is for the individuals that are caught in that when they know the difference in their life that receiving that transplant organ could make.

Certainly, I support efforts to try to find ways that we can streamline and improve this system and indeed allow for more individuals to be inspired to step up and participate as a donor when possible. We know that organ donation saves lives, and, frankly, Mr. Speaker, it is inspiring. I think we are all inspired by and grateful to those who make that choice to be an organ donor.

Indeed, we've had the opportunity to hear from many stakeholders about the importance of considering mandatory referrals, and we support that proposal in this legislation. Now, as has been laid out, the bill lays out the system for mandatory referrals. Currently a medical practitioner has to consider if someone's organs are suitable for donation after they die. If we pass Bill 205, it would make it mandatory for a medical practitioner to then share that information if someone is judged to be imminent for death. This will provide more opportunities to ensure that every potential organ that could go to potentially save a life will have the opportunity to be used, and that, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely a good thing.

The bill makes a number of administrative changes, creates a board of directors for the Alberta Organ and Tissue Donation Agency, gives it more responsibilities and capabilities. Again, Mr. Speaker, that seems to me to be reasonable. It makes sense that we would review the systems we have, find more efficient ways to optimize them, find ways that we can make sure they are working for the benefit of Albertans, and I appreciate that the member has done, to my understanding, some considerable consultation on how to achieve that and talked with a number of advocates in this area to bring forward the ideas in this bill.

The bill makes it clear that people can express refusal to have their organs donated, and people who have registered to donate their organs can also change their position after the fact. That, too, Mr. Speaker, is appropriate. We want to make sure that individuals have a clear choice. Certainly, it should be up to an individual to determine what is done with their body. The bill allows donors to determine if they want to donate their entire body or just specific organs or tissues and what purposes those can be used for. I appreciate the thought that has been put into this bill.

Now, certainly, we will be interested to see how this might interact with the announcement from the government today regarding the new specialist in end-of-life care, neuroprognostication, and donation, or SEND, program, by which we will now have 22 specialist physicians across the province of Alberta who will help to co-ordinate organ donation and transplantation opportunities, specialists who should be available 24/7 to improve the identification of potential donors and support families who are considering consent at a difficult time, hopefully save more lives. Again, that's practical and reasonable, Mr. Speaker.

I applaud the government for looking for a real and tangible way that we can improve this system and that in this particular case they appear to have actually worked collaboratively with physicians and experts in the health care field to achieve this, because tragically that has not been the general record of this government. Even as we speak, our emergency rooms across the province are in crisis because this government chose to go to war with some of these very physicians, because of repeated decisions to push our health care system to the absolute limits in the midst of a global pandemic and to continue to try to find ways to grind down particular physicians or health care workers and again now push those very workers to the absolute limits with extreme, mandated overtime to try to keep up with the implications of the chaos this government has sown in the health care system.

Mr. Speaker, certainly, it is important work for this government to look at how we can improve our systems. These are important steps to improve the organ donation and transplantation system, but let's remember that that system lives within a larger ecosystem in the midst of health care, an ecosystem which this government chose to tromp into, sow disorder, attempt to bully and overturn in an attempt to force through their particular ideology and change. That affects the ability for these physicians, for these individuals to continue to provide this important and life-saving care. Because of decisions of this government we saw tens of thousands of surgeries that were cancelled and delayed in the midst of the pandemic. We are still dealing with that backlog now, and indeed in many jurisdictions we are seeing serious implications. Indeed, in the Red Deer regional hospital last night I confirmed that there was no doctor of internal medicine available or no doctor to perform cardiology. None. That is because of repeated decisions by this government.

Now, of course, that isn't the individual direct decision of the Member for Highwood, and certainly it's his decision whether he supports government policies, but in this particular case the bill that he has brought forward is a thoughtful one. Indeed, despite the incredible damage – I'd say the most damage that's ever been done to a public health care system by a sitting government in the history of this province – that does not negate the value of this bill and does not negate the potential good it could do should we have a government in the province of Alberta that finally brings some stability back to our health care system.

As I was saying, we look forward to learning a bit more about how the SEND program is going to work, how that will interact with a new mandatory referral system in the province of Alberta, and it is my hope that the government will follow the lead of the Member for Highwood in terms of the thoughtful consideration he has put into this bill, in terms of how this legislation is potentially integrated should it pass this House.

I thank the Member for Highwood for bringing this forward, and I look forward to further debate.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat has risen.

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am honoured to rise in this House to speak on Bill 205, Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. On behalf of my constituents I would like to extend gratitude and my thank yous to the Member for Highwood for putting together such a thoughtful piece of legislation and something that I hope that the entire House can get behind.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, with over 700 Albertans currently on transplant lists I think that we can all agree that this is a very important issue. Many of us in this Assembly will know of somebody who is waiting for some type of transplant, or maybe we have a loved one who's waiting for a transplant. That could be a close family member or a friend, or perhaps it might be a constituent who's waiting for the good news that one day they'll be receiving a new heart or a kidney or something like that.

Regardless of the circumstances, though, this bill is good news for Alberta, I think, and it will ensure that this government is doing more to help improve the process of donating organs or tissue. Just a month ago, Mr. Speaker, on April 7 we recognized Green Shirt Day. Of course, this is a day that honoured one of the young Humboldt Broncos hockey players that passed away as a result of the traumatic accident that happened in April 2018. I actually had the pleasure of reading the book by one of the surviving members of the crash, Kaleb Dahlgren. It's called Crossroads. It's an excellent book, very well written. A smart young man put together a book of his life and how he got there and also detailed some of the ways in which he recovered from the crash and spoke very highly of organ donation.

Of course, Logan Boulet was a defenceman for the Humboldt Broncos, and it's with great respect to his life and to his family that we celebrate and honour him for his choice to donate his organs after tragically passing away due to his injuries. But because of the choice that Logan had made, six other people were able to live because of life-saving organ transplants, and although he was only 21 years old when he passed away tragically, he recognized and understood how this selfless act of donating is one of the most heroic things that a person could do.

Because of this, I think everyone can say that the awareness was definitely raised, and more and more people have now registered to become organ and tissue donors. In fact, Mr. Speaker, of course, when everyone heard of the Humboldt Broncos crash, it really rocked us all, I think, to our core, and to see that tragic loss of life, especially these young men who had so much potential and were going to do such great things, I'm sure, with all their families – I know that I was inspired by the selflessness of Logan Boulet.

Actually, I went to the registry that week and registered as an organ donor myself. Now there's a little heart on my driver's licence that says that I am a donor. I'm very proud of that because I think it's just a way that the Logan Boulet effect, as they call it, really touched everyone, even people in this Chamber, and it continues to inspire thousands of Canadians every day to register as organ and tissue donors. It's estimated that almost 150,000 Canadians registered as organ and tissue donors just weeks after this tragic crash, which is truly impressive, of course.

As I've said before, Alberta has a long list of individuals who are waiting for a new organ or new tissue, and, if passed, this bill will shorten that list as it will help to create more opportunities for eligible donors. With this legislation physicians will be required to refer patients to respective organ donation organizations, if they might be eligible, as soon as they're recognized, and by referring patients, Mr. Speaker, we'll be optimizing opportunities for those who are on the wait-list and informing potential donors who might not be fully aware or understand the organ donation system as it is.

It's understandable that a physician would sometimes be hesitant to bring up organ donation to the family of a dying loved one, but it's important that we do not miss potential opportunities to save lives. I note some surveys taken from physicians who do not regularly refer patients: 59 per cent indicated their reasoning is due to their own predetermination that the patient would not be eligible. You know, of course, I respect and trust that these doctors were making the decisions as best they could, but one intention of this legislation is that it would not be up to the doctor to make that choice, and their only responsibility would then be to offer a referral.

Forty-five per cent of physicians brought up that they don't offer referrals because of the family being too upset. Of course, I mean, this is a very tragic and hard time for families. I mean, you see a loved one pass away – it could be tragically, unexpectedly, who knows what – and I'm sure that that question would be overwhelming for many. I know I haven't been in that position, and I don't really ever want to be. As we know, because of that very painful end of life and mourning, I hope that if this legislation passes, physicians will take the opportunity to simply educate families of dying loved ones about the lives that could be saved. I know that because of Logan Boulet's hard work and his dedication to helping others through organ donation, his effect will live on. The incredible thing today is that there are six people living because of just one person's choice, and that was Logan's choice.

For 39 per cent of surveyed physicians, they are concerned that the family may have a religious belief that would prevent them from donating organs or tissue. Of course, that's a very fair concern. We want to respect those people's decisions, but it's important to continue to raise the awareness of organ and tissue donors, to be able to speak up and have a discussion like we're having today, Mr. Speaker.

I will note that I didn't – you know, before the Humboldt crash and before the tragic loss of life that we saw from those young men and support staff and coaches and trainers and so on in that event, I don't really know if we really talked about organ donation nearly as much as we do now, especially not in such a public setting. It was more of a quiet conversation, so maybe this will destigmatize some of it as well and bring up opportunities for us to talk about the benefits of organ donation and kind of normalize talking about it in public places to allow more people to make that choice.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that these things that I've shared today will help more Albertans consider registering as an organ and tissue donor. As of now, over 4,500 Canadians are awaiting a transplant of some kind, and over 700 of them reside in Alberta. With the number of donors lower than neighbouring provinces, I think we can all realize how important it is to have this discussion right here at home, and it truly is giving the gift of life to register as an organ donor.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. Member for Highwood. I note that he has been very passionate about this, especially in his former careers, and I know that he really cares about this and has done extensive consultation, so I think that, you know, I'm glad to hear, politics aside in this Chamber, that we're all supporting the Member for Highwood and his desire to do this for his constituents and for all Albertans. I think that many Albertans are grateful to see members of all sides of the House focus on bettering the system that we have for organ and tissue donation. I think this is a bill that's really going to save lives and impact people in a positive way.

Thank you for your time, Mr. Speaker. I just want to say again that I completely support Bill 205, and I hope that other members will do the same.

3:30

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate? I see that the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to join debate and follow my colleague from Brooks-Medicine Hat and likewise say that I will be supporting Bill 205, Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. I must say also that I'm learning a deal just from my colleagues, both my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre, the Member for Highwood, who talked about this, the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore, who also talked about this earlier, and just reading through the bill and kind of seeing the care and sensitivity with which it talks about the different aspects of human tissue donation. As we know, towards the end of life can be a situation quite fraught with emotion and confusion. Anything that improves upon that situation both for the medical practitioners, doctors, who are dealing with the patient, potential donor, as well as family members is a good thing. I, too, welcome the opportunity to see improvements to this act.

I just want to also, I guess, mirror or echo the views of my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre, who expressed concern with the government in its lack of genuineness around dealing with the private member's bill brought forward by opposition members, most notably Bill 204, Anti-Racism Act, something that was – we know that the city of Edmonton, both the police services and the administration, was embroiled in a situation where many members of the community were coming forward and wanting greater accountability from the authorities around tragic occurrences in the community of Edmonton that seemed to point to differential treatment of people of colour by the authorities when compared to nonracialized individuals in Edmonton. It would have been great to have that improvement, that act on the books as well. That didn't occur.

I think members of the opposition know that whenever there is an ability, an opportunity to improve acts, we should take that opportunity and bring our best recommendations forward. We do that often with amendments, and we do that often with motions arising or, indeed, referrals to try and improve things. In this case, with Bill 205, I don't think any of that's necessary.

As I was saying earlier, I strongly support organ donation, any steps that will help improve donor participation rates in Alberta. Hearing that, regrettably, only 1 to 2 per cent of potential donors and organ donations actually take place is, obviously, something that needs to and can be improved upon. I, like the previous speakers, believe that if there's any opportunity to improve the lives of those 700 Albertans who are waiting for organs, we should take that opportunity, and this House is doing that today around improvements to the mandatory referral process, around improvements to accountabilities and the Organ and Tissue Donation Agency.

I was reflecting on members of that agency's board of directors, and I see that one of the expertise points, that a director will be appointed who has expertise in the area of clinical ethics, is a good thing, Mr. Speaker, because this area, as many people before me have talked about, is fraught with potential challenges. An individual with expertise in clinical ethics is a good requirement to make sure that some of the challenges, some of the ethical concerns that are related to donations and people donating are sorted through with a skill set that perhaps not everybody has.

I note also that other directors have to have expertise in the area of organ and tissue donation. That's pretty understandable. Another one has to have expertise in nonprofit organizations who are dealing in this organ and tissue donation area. Then the fourth person has to have a connection to the regional health authority. It seems like a comprehensive board of directors. That looks like it's new in this act because it's not amending anything. I give kudos to the thoughtfulness of bringing that forward.

I think the last thing that I want to focus on and say, of course, is to focus once again on these end-of-life conversations about organ donation, making sure that they happen sooner and establish a quicker process. Clarifying this is in everyone's best interest, recognizing that it doesn't override a person's consent. They can still decide for themselves not to consent to organ donation. But once they have made that decision, then that is an area that needs to be clearly understood in terms of who does what when.

With those things said, Mr. Speaker, I'll take my seat and listen to other parts of the debate. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise in second reading and speak to Bill 205, the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. I want to also give my thanks to the Member for Highwood for bringing forward this bill. Many of the members of this Assembly will recall a private member's bill that was brought forward on organ donation a couple of sessions ago. I've lost track of time a little bit now. At that time, you know, there were some questions about some of the provisions of that bill although in spirit I think all members were very much united on the idea of promoting organ donation and increasing the likelihood of organ donation by making it more available. More information would be out there.

Now, as I recall, the previous – and I think it was also Bill 205, brought forward by the Member for Calgary-South East – had a sort of opt-out provision for organ donation so that it was presumed that all individuals were organ donors unless they specifically opted out. I understand that there were some concerns around that, and some consultation was done. I think other members of the Assembly have spoken to the consultation that the Member for Highwood did, and that's the result, that we see a new private member's bill which basically requires a physician to do a mandatory referral for organ donation even before somebody has passed away, so having that opportunity for education and engagement with a family or an individual who is close to passing about the benefits of organ donation.

I understand, of course, that there are a number of other administrative measures in here that are very important. Again, I seem to sense, obviously, a consensus amongst members of supporting the importance of this bill, of increasing organ donation. I do want to make a couple of small comments during my time here.

Again, I think this is a good example of how important a private member's bill, legislation, is. We've heard members of the government speak of that and how important it is that individual members have the opportunity to bring forward concerns from their constituents in a private member's bill. I do feel that it's important to note that the privilege of a private member's bill coming forward, which has been a long-standing tradition of this House and of many Houses across the country, has been undermined significantly under this current government. Not one single private member's bill brought forward by an opposition member has made it to this floor for debate. We should highlight that, Mr. Speaker, that some of our basic democratic principles have been undermined significantly and continue to be.

But I, just like many of my colleagues, will stand in support of private members' bills that we believe are serving the public good and would seek to serve our constituents' needs. Therefore, I am happy to support Bill 205 as well as many other private members' bills that have come before this House.

In particular, on organ donation, this is something that I think we've all kind of shared some stories perhaps of – well, there are the statistics of how many people could benefit from organ donation, how many Albertans are waiting on lists, but I think that many of us in this House actually have very personal stories of individuals that we know, and I'd like to highlight that now.

First, I'd like to mention that my father was an organ donor when he passed away in 1994. He was an organ donor, and I'm very happy that while that was a loss for us, other families and other individuals got to benefit as a result of my father's passing. When you're trying to look for silver linings in losing a loved one, that is one that I know my family felt some solace from. Certainly, I know the importance of individuals agreeing to be an organ donor. My dad was a proud organ donor, actually. He had signed his card, and he had talked to us about it, and that was back when the licences were those old paper ones, and nobody asked you when you got your licence whether or not that was something that you wanted to do, but he had signed it well before he ever knew that he would be a donor himself.

Certainly, that's something that in our household we did talk about, the benefits of organ donation and the opportunity not only to contribute to another family's or individual's well-being but as an act of giving. I am so glad that we have made some changes even since that time to encourage individuals to become organ donors, lots of public education campaigns, but also, yes, when I most recently renewed my driver's licence, I was informed by the registry agent about the importance of organ donation, and I'm proud to have signed that on my driver's licence as well.

I also feel compelled to speak about some of my constituents, Mr. Speaker. One constituent who is very close to my heart is a young man – he's not quite six yet; I'm not sure if he's turned six yet – George Kemp and his parents, Lindsey and Randy Kemp. George has been the recipient of two heart donations in his very short, young life. I know that I myself and, of course, his family are incredibly grateful that he did receive those heart donations because that is why he is here with us today. You know, with the first donation, sadly, his body was rejecting it, and it wasn't working out well. I know that his family lived in anguish for many months, thinking that the chances of getting a heart donation once seemed unlikely, so to get a second donation seemed incredibly unlikely. George lived at the Stollery hospital for, I believe, almost nine months. I'm sure Lindsey will correct me if she's watching this. I'll let her know to correct me. But it was well over six months, I know for sure.

He lived at the Stollery waiting for that second donation of a heart. Of course, when a child receives a heart as a donation, it's only because another child has passed, and what a big, generous gift by that family, to go through such incredible loss and then to have donated. That's why George is here. Of course, during this pandemic I know his family was deeply concerned, given his immunocompromised state, about safety. You know, Lindsey and I spoke many times and she wrote to me many times about her concerns about George, who had gone through so much to be able to go to school, to be able to be a normal kindergartner going to school, then feeling unsafe at school. There were some anguishing decisions for Lindsey and for Randy about what to do. They wanted

George, who had grown up, essentially, in a children's hospital, to spend more time socializing, but then the pandemic hit, and they didn't feel that school was safe. I know that that put an enormous amount of stress on them.

I am grateful to the families who agreed to donate their child's organs and a chance, through grief, to really continue another life. I hope, actually – I don't know, but I hope – that that brings them some comfort as well.

I also want to talk about a very special constituent of mine, Anne Halpin, who is an incredibly brilliant woman. She's the one who first talked to me, when I was thinking of running for office, about the importance of that lab that we were going to build as the NDP. I'm going to get all of her credentials wrong, but she is an incredibly brilliant laboratory scientist who cares very deeply about that. She's also a woman who walks the talk, because she's long been an advocate of organ donation and she recently signed up to be a living donor of a kidney. I understand that due to some challenges that transplant did not take place, but she is still indicating that she is willing to donate a kidney as a living donor, and I think that speaks to exactly who she is.

There are so many Albertans who inspire, and I want to speak about one more, who is a young man named Mason. He's actually a year younger than my son, so he's eight years old, and I know that the Member for Edmonton-Glenora knows this family very well. Their mom, Tamara, is a close friend as well as their dad, Clifton. Mason went to daycare with my son. He has kidney challenges, kidney troubles, and he was diagnosed young with that. He has been told that before the age of 18 he will likely require a kidney transplant. I know his mom had hoped to be that donor at some point, but due to her own health conditions she may not be in a situation to be able to do that, which is probably the part that has been most devastating for her.

This is all to say that these are very real lives that are impacted by the need for organ donation. There are some very real lives impacted by being an organ donor. It's incredibly important. Let me take this opportunity to once again encourage Albertans to sign up and to be organ donors, to speak to their family members about their wishes, and to have those conversations openly. I think that so much of the reason why we don't have more donors is because, you know, the conversation isn't had until the family is going through a very difficult time, the imminent death or the death of a loved one. That can be an incredibly traumatic time. There are high emotions, and at that time it might be too difficult to have those conversations.

I think that sometimes it may be difficult to make decisions around organ donation at such a difficult time, so part of the reason why I think we're having this discussion, that the Member for Highwood brought this bill forward, and why we've been supportive in this House is that we're encouraging individuals and Albertans to really speak openly about organ donation, because not only does it save a life, but you could really give a life.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Grande Prairie has risen.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise this afternoon and speak to second reading of Bill 205, the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. I'd like to start, as many have this afternoon, by thanking my colleague the hon. Member for Highwood for his tremendous work and the time he's dedicated in consulting with Albertans and bringing this bill forward.

It's my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that Bill 205 will dramatically impact life for many Albertans, most notably the 700 Albertans who are waiting for a life-saving transplant and their families. While almost 90 per cent of Canadians say that they support organ donation, approximately 32 per cent have actually registered their intent to donate. Unfortunately, of that number, a very small number, approximately 1.2 per cent, of people that pass away are considered viable for organ donation in Alberta for various reasons. Therefore, the more people that understand and choose to register and the better the notification system to the organ donation organization, the more lives will be saved, and that really is the intent and the heart of this bill.

At this point in time there are over 4,500 Canadians waiting for a transplant that could save, extend, or improve their lives. As I mentioned already, of those 4,500, 700 of them are Albertans, Mr. Speaker. These numbers directly represent the urgency and the need for donors and a clear process or a clearer process here in Alberta.

It's troublesome that Alberta has fallen behind other jurisdictions in terms of our rate of successful donation, which is costing Albertans on the transplant wait-list their lives. I was inspired by the member opposite, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud, and her story of that little boy. Think about being the mom of that child waiting for not one but two hearts. As she mentioned so eloquently, one organ donation can save up to eight lives, and a tissue donation can improve the quality of life for up to 75 other people.

As I mentioned already, the intent of this bill is to establish a mandatory referral process and increase donor opportunities throughout the province. Bill 205 will improve the information provided to individuals within Alberta registries to better educate Albertans on the process and on the importance of organ and tissue donation. Unfortunately, consent to donate is of little value if potential donors are not properly identified and referred to donor specialists in a timely fashion, and as the member opposite also mentioned, I think that quite often what happens is that you're in a crisis. You're having to make some very tragic decisions in the middle of a tragic situation in your immediate family, and for most people, that's not the time to be considering what you want to do. I appreciate the thoughtfulness in this bill to educate Albertans and give them that information up front, long before it's a crisis situation, to make an informed decision outside of that window of crisis.

Mr. Speaker, an opt-in program with the clarifications made in this bill will serve to benefit Albertans, the hundreds that are currently in need of organ and tissue donation as well as those who will need one in the future. Accidents and tragic diagnoses are unpredictable, and Bill 205 addresses the time sensitivity of these urgent needs as they arise. We need to think of those that are waiting for transplants, transplants that, as I've said already, will either improve, extend, or save their lives.

This morning the Member for Highwood was present with the Minister of Health to announce the specialist in end-of-life care, neuroprognostication, and donation, or SEND, initiative, that is being given $2 million. This program will allow 22 specialist physicians to co-ordinate organ donation and transplantation opportunities across the province, and I think that's incredible. The services under SEND will be available 24/7 in order to improve identification of potential donors, support families considering consent at an unimaginably difficult time, and ultimately save more lives of Albertans.

Prior to this program there were no dedicated donation physician positions for individual hospitals and intensive care units, but with this now in place it would provide for six SEND physicians and one program lead in Calgary; six SEND physicians and one program lead here in Edmonton; one SEND physician in Red Deer, the third-largest city in Alberta; two SEND physicians, a shared position, in Lethbridge; two SEND physicians, again a shared position, in my home constituency of Grande Prairie, and I'm very thankful for that; one pediatric SEND physician at Alberta Children's hospital, which, I'm sure, would have been very important to the family of that little boy; two pediatric SEND physicians, again one shared position, here at the Stollery children's hospital. It's expected that the program will expand to Medicine Hat and Fort McMurray in 2023, and I just think that's remarkable. The timing of this private member's bill, coupled with that announcement, I really hope will transform our transplant and organ donation system.

The allotment of $2 million to this initiative demonstrates its importance. It allows for intensive care units and emergency departments across the province to work together to co-ordinate a province-wide response for organ donation and transplantation opportunities. Mr. Speaker, since 2011 Alberta's donation rate has increased by 28 per cent, and that's remarkable. While this is fantastic news, hundreds are still waiting for life-saving transplants, and Alberta has lagged behind other provinces for many years with respect to organ and tissue donation. This is a reality we cannot continue, and I believe all members of this Assembly – I believe that's what I'm hearing this afternoon – are in support of changing that reality and assisting in shifting this troubling trend in service to our constituents right across the province.

Mr. Speaker, I've seen first-hand how being a donor can help others, and it's only served to inspire me, and I, too, would like to share a couple of personal stories. I had the opportunity to already speak to this bill at concurrence, and I'm going to share this story again because I think it's worthy of sharing as many times as I get the opportunity.

I have a friend. Her name is Dianna Havin. She lives right here in the city of Edmonton. She's originally – at least when I met her, she was from Peace River. We first met as business owners, and we bonded over that challenge and that time in our life. But we bonded even more over the fact that we were young moms and working business owners. Dianna is a retired nurse, and she also happens to be a living donor, which is, I think, a fairly unique choice that few make. As a retired nurse Dianna has a rare blood type, and she understood, with that rare blood type, how critical it is, how challenging it would be for somebody who required a transplant who also shared that blood type to find a donor, like finding a needle in a haystack.

She understood that, Mr. Speaker. She saw a need, and she stepped up. I don't know if it was the pandemic or what in particular, but she did it during the pandemic. I think the pandemic gave all of us an opportunity to take stock of our priorities and our purpose in life. For Dianna, this was, really, a part of her process as she processed the pandemic. She saw an opportunity that she couldn't deny, and she really felt compelled, so she chose last year to donate one of her kidneys. I just wanted to thank her and her family, her husband, Mark, and their kids for their support of this choice. It's a risky choice and a scary choice, but ultimately she saved a life. That person will never know who it was who saved their life, but we know here in this Chamber that Dianna Havin is a hero and that there are many others like her. This bill, while it talks about organ donation and transplant typically upon the loss of a loved one, is another facet to transplantation and donation.

I also, again, tie back to my time as a young mom. When I first moved to Grande Prairie, I was expecting my first child, who I can't believe is going to be 25 this fall. I don't know where the years have gone, Mr. Speaker. I'm starting to sound like my grandma when I say things like that, so I will not continue on in that vein. Almost 25 years ago I moved to Grande Prairie expecting my first son, Nicolas, and I met the most wonderful group of neighbours in Grande Prairie. I will tell you that when we moved to Grande Prairie, we were so amazed by how hospitable the community was. It was overwhelming, and this neighbourhood that we lived in for just eight short weeks – while we were waiting for the final construction on our home, we rented this place for just eight short weeks. In those eight weeks we made lifelong friendships in this little neighbourhood in Grande Prairie.

Sort of the key person: her name was Claire Newnham. She was a lovely, lovely lady, and she introduced us to all the neighbourhood. She got everybody working where they were going to make cookies for this new little pregnant lady that moved into the neighbourhood. It was quite inspiring, Mr. Speaker. We were in the middle of setting up business, and I was expecting, and we had this house under construction, a lot of things going on. We came in from a different province. But I'll get back to the point of the bill. One of the people in this neighbourhood was in desperate need of a lung transplant, a double lung transplant. She had been on the wait-list for more than a year, and she was dying. In these eight short weeks in the neighbourhood I was amazed – I have 10 seconds? Oh, wow. Okay. I was amazed that she got this lung transplant, and her life was saved.

I have so much more to say, and I'll be happy to share it in Committee of the Whole. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows has risen.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise in the House to speak to Bill 205, Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022, on behalf of my constituents. I'm happy to say that we support the position of this bill. It was not long ago, just last week, that I visited the family of a community leader who passed away last week. I just wanted to share the feelings. The family was feeling grateful to see that their family member did not only work hard and contribute to the community for a living but also for how concerned he was with education and how aware he was in that he also donated his whole body after his death, that he can still contribute to save the lives of his fellow Albertans.

I also have a story going back a few years, four or five years, where the family of the person who died anxiously wanted to donate the body of the family member since the family member had not registered herself into the registry in advance and the hassle they went through and the struggle they had. Eventually they were not able to get it onto the registry and donate the body of their loved one. I assume the changes in this bill will definitely help not only education around donations of the organs and the bodies but also will fix some of the challenges and the process that people many times feel are challenging when it comes to donating specifically not themselves, when it comes to donating the body or the organs of their family members or their loved ones.

We strongly support organ donations and steps that will help improve the donor process and the participation rates in Alberta. Organ donation saves lives, and we are so grateful for people, Albertans – I personally know a few of them – that have donated. They made their decision on this life-saving process.

We have also heard from the stakeholders the importance that, specifically proposed in this Bill 205, Albertans see the importance of mandatory referrals, and we support this proposal in the legislation.

I also wanted to thank the Member for Highwood for bringing this bill forward that will not only help people bring education and awareness about donating their organs and bodies, but also it will help Albertans save lives.

What is happening right now: the medical practitioner must consider if someone's organs are suitable for donation after they die. We assume that if this bill passes, it would make it mandatory for medical practitioners to share this information if someone is imminent for death. The process following the information of the organs being donated remains, I think, unchanged to current practice when medical consent has not been provided, that the donation organization must seek it from the family member, spouse, adult child, parents, or their relatives.

This effectively causes the conversation about organ donation to happen sooner or establishes a quicker process. This has been advocated by Toby Boulet, who is the father of Logan Boulet, the Humboldt Bronco hockey player who died weeks after he registered to be an organ donor.

Bill 205 also makes many administrative changes, including to the Alberta Organ and Tissue Donation Agency by creating a board of directors and giving it more responsibility and capability.

The bill will also make explicitly clear that people can express refusal to have their organs donated. People who have registered to donate their organs can also change their positions after changing their minds after the fact. The bill would allow a donor to determine if they want to donate their entire body or specific organs and tissue and for what purposes those parts are allowed to be used, so they can specifically mark the purposes they are donating for, either for scientific research, transplantation, or medical education.

The changes brought by the bill make addition to the powers of the agency to release and report the statistics on refused consent percentage, donor identifications, and referrals.

The bill amends section 7 of the Human Tissue and Organ Donation Act to oblige medical practitioners to provide donation organizations with information to allow them to determine the suitability of organ or tissue for donation, so they will be obliged to provide the information around

- (a) the age of the person;
- (b) the cause, or expected cause, of the person's death;
- (c) if death has occurred, the time of death of the person; [or]
- (d) any available past and current personal information of the person that is relevant to their medical suitability for tissue or organ transplantation.

Currently this information is shared after a donor dies. If passed, this bill requires the information to be shared if death is imminent.

Section of 9 of this bill will add section 12.5 into the act, which obliges the chair of the board of the agency to provide an annual report. That's very important. That's a very good proposal. In this legislation: a summary of the activity carried out in the preceding year; statistics on the number of donors' identifications, referrals, and consent rates; its recommendations.

Now, donors in Alberta and Canada: the information shows that in Canada in 2017 415 people withdrew from the wait-list, and 245 people died while on the wait-list; 67 of those who withdrew and 35 of those who died were Albertans. According to Alberta Health there are over 700 Albertans on the wait-list to get an organ transplant. According to the Canadian Institute for Health Information the deceased donor rate in Canada increased by 42 per cent between 2009 and 2018, from 14.5 to 20.6 donors per million population, which translates to 487 deceased donors in 2009 and 700 ... [Mr. Deol's speaking time expired]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland has risen.

Mr. Getson: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the member here. For those who are following along at home, the Member for Highwood brought forward Bill 205 – again, this is a private member's bill – Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022.

The biggest thing that is changing in this – I mean, we've had a donation program for a number of years. I believe the existing legislation is over 30 years old, so firstly it was in need of a revamp, and then, secondly, I'd like to thank the member and other members here for coming forward on this business. This is one of the most impactful things that we can have, I believe, on Albertans' lives.

Some of the concerns out there, some quick stats. There are over 700 Albertans out there right now waiting for transplants. Through the process the way it is sitting currently, it puts a ton of pressure on the system and organizations to react within a given time limit. Unfortunately, what's happening there is that the organs and the folks that are donating may not be receiving recipients in time, Mr. Speaker, which is obviously a real problem given the circumstances that that comes about on.

There are a few major items that are covered off here. The first one – well, there are about three major components, from what I can see reading through the bill, and we'll let the member correct me later on through debate, but the first one is to implement a mandatory referral process. In essence, what that does: instead of waiting until the fact of the individual passing and then starting the process, it compels them to start to talk to the organizations, talk to the donors themselves and to the family to start the process. Change of notification will streamline it so that it's making it more efficient. It gives an adequate timeline. Again, everything is compressed around those timelines, and it's such a stressful circumstance. That'll decrease the missed opportunities, as mentioned.

Now, it's interesting to note – you know, I've already said that there are 700 Albertans. There are over 4,500 Canadians waiting for these transplants currently. When the physicians were polled on this to see where some of the impediments were, some of the feedback that we received on this, of some of the referrals not taking place currently without this mandatory process, was: 59 per cent said that they didn't do this because they deemed the patient to be an ineligible donor, may or may not be the case; 45 per cent said due to the family being too upset, so they didn't want to intrude on these types of circumstances, obviously, and that's a consideration for the personal needs; 39 per cent believed that the family had a religious bias; 34 per cent said due to their desire to leave the hospital unit, so they didn't want to remove them there. Mandatory referral increases the probability of these very difficult conversations taking place and helps provide a mechanism, quite frankly, whether falling back on it can become a procedure that they can have those discussions.

The other one was to improve the agency guidelines. The changes to the Organ and Tissue Donation Agency will pave the way for a renewal of reviews, reports, suggestions directly to the minister to help minimize misused donor opportunities and build a stronger system of donation in the future. Again, there are several organizations out there that are kind of in this wheelhouse. This is their backyard of how they deal with it. This is, again, going to help improve that that process has some consistency as well.

Improve the education and awareness: those are big deals, to understand how the process takes place and what the benefits are to that, so improve the information provided to individuals through Alberta registries to better educate Albertans on the process and on the importance of organ donation and tissues.

Now, again, being a father of four, hearing some of the stories in here – I mean, it is just absolutely heartbreaking that you would think of circumstances where you have to put yourself in that consideration not only for, you know, being a parent in your prime, trying to protect your child; you've raised him since little and doing all those things. Firstly, to have something tragic happen to them: I don't think that there's anybody in here that wouldn't tear up if you put yourself in that circumstance. Secondly, being on the other end, where you have a child that is in need and you're doing all that you can and you're looking down the end of a loaded gun, so to speak, and knowing what the probable circumstances are – so to hear some of the stories that are so heartwarming, and the Member for Highwood had mentioned that part of the inspiration was from a young girl by the name of Morghan. Because her parents had the wherewithal, because they dealt with these things head-on, the impact from that was that there were seven or eight other people that have a better future, a brighter hope, and that can carry on. I mean, that's something amazing.

If all it takes is a little bit of a legislative change here in this House, is a private member to work through this, to help facilitate those types of outcomes without people being put in that circumstance at the very end of having to deal with all the other consequences, let alone that, I think that's one of the most meaningful things that we could ever do here in this House. You know, my father-in-law – God rest his soul – was a doc for 30 years, ran the hospital up in Lac La Biche for 30 years as chief of staff, and I'd asked him for some of the highlights of his career. He said: honestly, Shane, there were only two times in my life in over those 30 years of managing that I really felt that I saved somebody's life. Being a doc, most things kind of cure themselves and take care of it. Considering that we as legislators here have the potential to save hundreds of lives by tweaking some laws: that's profound.

I was, you know, reflective in the last little bit of some health concerns I had personally and wondering what impacts and what I've really done here in this House. You know, in prior life in projects there's something tangible that you can look back and see. I was searching for a couple of things, because you're looking at where you can put your stick in. This one, honestly, to the Member for Highwood: you made it real again. You've resonated with what it means and why we're elected and why we're here and some substantial changes that we can make. This, honestly, will be one of the things that I can put in – win, lose, or draw next election or otherwise – that I did something meaningful, impactful, to jump on your coattails of something that you managed to get through here as a private member, to be able to make some substantial differences in Albertans' lives and to help, as it would appear, the over 700 people that are currently waiting in this circumstance.

Now, I do know a person, an individual that was a mentor to me, ironically, who was a recipient of a liver transplant, Wayne Huddleston. I first met him up on a project at BHP, a diamond mine project, in the middle of nowhere in the territories, and Wayne, at that time, was the lead for the millwrights, so all the big, heavy equipment that was being put together. He and Lloyd Jackson were like Mutt and Jeff up there kind of organizing this, and we had a 24/7 operation that was nonstop for just about three years. Wayne was managing all that heavy equipment going together, all the conveyor lifts and all the machines.

Well, it turns out that at that time Wayne was actually having liver failure. Here's a man that's up on a project in the middle of nowhere, still doing these projects and suffering these major circumstances. Now, in Wayne's condition he couldn't find a donor. There wasn't a donor out there. I lost touch with him for a couple of years. He ended up getting a second lease on life because his brother-in-law actually bellied up and said – well, you know, he must have liked his brother-in-law because he donated half his liver to him.

With that gift, it gave Wayne at least another 15 years' lease on life, and the next time I talked to Wayne – you know, being one of my mentors, we kept in touch. I called him up, and it was on a project down in Estevan, Saskatchewan. It was going right sideways, and I needed somebody who could understand that side of the business, who could work with the crews out there, who could get the inspection guys back together and do those things. I'm just thinking of what a massive gap there would have been out there without having Wayne around. He ended up following me around in that whole pipeline industry for another 10 years after that.

He recently passed, this last fall, unfortunately, and it was due to complications with that transplant. But I know that his family was immensely grateful, and I know that there are so many other countless people out there that he touched over the time that he was, you know, extended with us. Credit to his brother-in-law again for doing that, for being a donor, for stepping up and doing that, for putting himself through that circumstance. That gift is insurmountable.

Again, with the member here bringing together some very common-sense legislation to have that meaningful impact – and I hope that with, you know, my little bit of a speech here talking about this, folks will consider filling out those donor cards, that they'll consider that gift that's out there. We never want to talk about our own expiry dates, but, believe it or not, we are on a termination schedule, and we can only do so much with the time we have. Whether it's a gift or whether it's a consequence, we don't know when that time is up.

Again, if we can do something as impactful and meaningful here by putting legislation through, I'd challenge everybody as well to make sure that you do that next step kind of like Wayne's brother-in-law did and fill out those cards to make sure that those donations can take place, that those tissues can be there, that the medical experts that we have, that we're very fortunate to have in this province, can do their best to extend and give that longevity to someone else's life.

Without rambling on too far, I'm very much in support of this, very appreciative of the member for bringing it forward, and very happy for the good, fulsome debate that we've had and for the interests of Albertans in doing this. Again, quite frankly, seeing this legislation, if, God willing, the creek don't rise and we can all get along in here to get it passed, this will be one of those items I can talk about in the future, to say that it was worth it and I did something meaningful.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join? The individual who caught my eye is the hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Mr. Amery: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to begin by taking the opportunity to thank the hon. Member for Highwood for introducing this very important bill in this House, and I also want to take an opportunity to thank some of the members in this Chamber who spoke on this bill – the Member for Grande Prairie, the Member for Edmonton-Meadows, the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud – for presenting their own personal accounts and their own experiences about this topic and this debate here this afternoon, and certainly my good friend from Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland, who gave a wonderful presentation about this particular bill. I appreciate the personal accounts that they all gave here this afternoon, and I certainly rise to also speak in favour of this bill. I'm honoured today to rise and speak about this Bill 205, namely the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022.

Mr. Speaker, legislative reform is essential for modernizing Alberta's organ and tissue donation and transplantation system, and

I believe that that is exactly and precisely what this bill is doing. I had the pleasure of hearing the hon. Member for Highwood at the committee – that is, the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills – who gave his initial presentation on this particular bill, and he certainly provided those committee members with some of that preliminary information. I certainly appreciate the debate that is happening here, and I believe that we are making significant progress with respect to discussing this bill and, hopefully, seeing it pass through here.

Mr. Speaker, implementing a mandatory referral process means that physicians will refer patients to the appropriate organ donation organization when death is near or approaching. As my friend mentioned earlier, nobody likes to talk about these particular issues, but we need to talk about these issues, and ultimately we are all headed that way. Certainly, preparation and discussion, despite how difficult it may be at times, is something that I think is incredibly important.

Now, based on the surveys, that we assume are completed by physicians on this particular topic, those physicians have listed things like family grief, their perception of a family's religious bias, and their desire to leave the hospital unit as reasons for their decision not to address this particular topic. Certainly, I cannot speak for physicians – I'm not a physician – but I cannot even imagine how difficult it is to ask patients or their families questions about tissue and organ donation.

Prior to coming into this Chamber, I worked as a lawyer for almost a decade, Mr. Speaker, and a lot of those discussions focused on wills and estate planning. One of the most difficult discussions for young, healthy Albertans was talking about how to structure their estates, what to put in their wills, who to name as an executor, who to name as beneficiaries. These are discussions that take place, most times, with young, healthy Albertans. So certainly talking about these types of issues with people who may be facing impending death is a difficult topic, far more than the ones that I'm experienced with.

What we do know, Mr. Speaker, is that this bill has accounted for this particular factor. As a result, discussions about donations with families who are experiencing a tragedy are conducted by specialists explicitly educated and trained in this area. Professionally trained organ donation organizations can best deal with the families and are not biased against organ donation one way or the other. This should decrease, in my view, the likelihood of overpromising and underdelivering or missing having conversations with families who wish to donate. This referral process will play a considerable role in optimization efforts and streamlining the notification process to ensure reasonable timelines for accessing potential donor viability and decreasing missed donation opportunities.

Again, I refer to some of the statements that my friends here made earlier today, and certainly I want to reiterate what my friend from Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland mentioned just earlier today. This process will not compel anyone, but it will increase the probabilities of open and frank discussion, and that is specifically what I think the member who presented this bill intended to do. Mr. Speaker, let's pave the way for open discussion. Let's pave the way to discuss, to engage, to raise awareness. I'm all for that. I think my colleagues and, I hope, all members of this House agree with that as well.

Now, the content of this bill is really nothing new, nor is this the first time that legislation of this sort has been presented in Alberta. What's more, several jurisdictions world-wide have already implemented similar mandatory referral processes when it comes to organ and tissue donation. For example, in 2021 Nova Scotia became the first jurisdiction in North America to enact a presumed consent law for organ and tissue donation. Since then the province has seen a significant increase in tissue donations and large increases in the availability of both tissues and organs for transplants.

Mr. Speaker, it's important to note for all the people watching here today that what was implemented in Nova Scotia is not necessarily being presented here in Alberta. Under Nova Scotia law people are presumed to agree to donate their organs when they pass away unless they choose to opt out, but we recognize that not everyone may be comfortable with donation, not everyone may be comfortable with that presumption that Nova Scotia law has implemented. We will ensure that each individual's wishes are honoured regardless of whether they wish to donate or not.

Mr. Speaker, it's important to note that it is critical to also remember that registering as an organ donor does not mean you will become an organ donor. The path to becoming a deceased organ donor is extremely complex because individuals need to die in certain circumstances where donation is even possible. Unfortunately, and contrary to some of the common misconceptions, those circumstances are relatively rare. Of the proportion of total deaths in Canada approximately 1.2 per cent have the potential to become organ donors. That's far lower than what I expected, and certainly the facts speak for themselves.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, there have been questions about why we chose the mandatory referral process instead of taking another approach such as one similar to the law in Nova Scotia, so I want to share the findings of the 2021 International Donation and Transplantation Legislative and Policy Forum with you on the evidence-based practice of mandatory referral as explained by the experts in the fields of donation and transplant.

Mr. Speaker, when comparing the two most common models of donation, mandatory and presumed consent, what stands out most to me is that under mandatory referral, clinicians or administrators notify the organ donation organization about the potential donor for evaluation, and if deemed medically eligible, the families of eligible potential donors are then approached for their consent. On the other hand, the presumed consent model makes the assumption that all individuals have consented to donation unless they have opted out before death. I should also mention that although Nova Scotia has legislated the presumed consent model, their legislation also includes mandatory referral as well, so all donor identification practices and ethical consent models are involved in deciding to donate. Mr. Speaker, all things considered, this brings us to why mandatory referral is more beneficial to its counterpart.

This is an important bill. I hope that all members of this Chamber vote in favour.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I believe the hon. member who caught my eye is the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased to rise on this piece of legislation brought forward by the Member for Highwood, an important issue to all Albertans, Bill 205, the private member's bill titled Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. This afternoon, while deliberating this piece of legislation, this private member's bill, we've heard from many legislators here speaking to the bill, bringing forward personal anecdotes and stories that were very, very touching and very intimate stories of tragic circumstances and, in some cases, very happy circumstances. Those are the two sides of the coin when it comes to organ transplant. Unless it's a tissue donation or a live organ or a partial organ donation, somebody's death must occur before, in fact, the saving of a life can happen.

We heard a number of stories from families of members of this Legislature, and because of the numbers it's easy to surmise, Mr.

Speaker, that there is no family in this province that is untouched by this issue of human tissue and organ donation. It's a widespread phenomenon that there are concerns about the lack of availability of organs, and of course this piece of legislation attempts to address that. It is a private member's bill which I think is timely. It's always important to do what we can to improve the number of people whose lives can be saved or bettered by a tissue or organ donation, and I think this legislation addresses it. I strongly support the measures in Bill 205, brought forward by the Member for Highwood.

Some things that people may not be aware of are the actual sort of circumstances around which a tissue or organ may be donated. For example, Mr. Speaker, about organ donation, as I mentioned earlier, it may be that you can have a living donor. It means that the donating organ has to be free of disease and not harm the individual, but certainly there are a number of different organs that can be donated by way of live donation, and that's something that is a huge gift. I know of individuals personally who have done such a thing, and it's an amazing gift to give somebody else.

The organs themselves that may be transplanted include – of course, this would be after-death transplantation, after the death of the donor in most cases. Heart, lungs, liver, kidney, pancreas, which many people will not be aware of, pancreas islet cells, small bowel, and the stomach are organs that can be donated. Of course, tissues that may be donated include the cornea, the sclera, which is the white of the eye, heart valves, skin, bone, tendons, and amniotic tissue.

We heard earlier today, Mr. Speaker, that there are over 4,500 Canadians waiting for a transplant that will save their lives. All of us have heard the tragic stories of people on dialysis, whether liver or kidney, struggling to stay alive until a donor is found. Sadly, many people die waiting on that list for a transplant. That is something, of course, this bill seeks to address and ensure that we increase the number of donors who provide that life-giving gift of a transplant of a tissue or an organ.

As I mentioned earlier, the Member for Highwood has brought this bill forward, and I give him kudos for that. Every family in this House has been affected in some way, either directly or indirectly, and every Albertan family is, and my family is no different. As I mentioned before in this House, I had a younger brother named Kevin Dach who was killed in a car accident, tragically, just after graduating from high school. He was attending Lakeland College up in Vermilion, and the wish of the family, of course, was to have his organs donated. Unfortunately, his injuries were too severe for that, and we weren't able to move forward with that. We faced as a family that traumatic decision at a very point in time where the crisis of death was imminent, and I feel for every family who has to go through that.

The measures in this legislation, Bill 205, I think, help to make the process one of – it gives it pathways, gives it some roadways for families to follow, and it normalizes and makes it very clear. Back in 1977 things weren't quite as clear. You could express your wishes, but there certainly could have been a debate among family members about donation or not, and then if there were dissenting family members, probabilitywise the physician would have felt unable to move forward. Certainly, as I said, every family is touched by this in Alberta, and we welcome measures that are going to help more Alberta families keep their loved ones alive and extend their lives and allow the wishes of many family members to proceed and make sure that an organ donation can occur when, in fact, the deceased has made those wishes known on their driver's licence or through the Alberta care system or followed online to make the wishes of themselves known.

Now, we did mention in this House a few times, with other speakers previous to me, how important, how precious the whole concept of private members' bills is to members in this House. The public may not be aware, but a member can go through three or four or more terms, a whole career, without ever having the privilege of having their name drawn to bring forward a private member's bill. That is something that many members have expressed regret over, that they never got the opportunity. This opportunity is something that I think the Member for Highwood has taken full advantage of. As we all know, from our side of the House or the government side of the House, anyone who brings forward a private member's bill and gets it to the point of the floor of the Legislature debate has put an awful lot of work into the whole process, and regardless of the subject matter of the bill the effort that it takes to get a private member's bill to this spot in this House and actually debate it here is something that the public should recognize.

What's happened recently, Mr. Speaker, in this Legislature is that no opposition private members' bills have received the ability to be debated on the floor of the House. They were blocked by government members in committee, the public bills committee, who decide whether or not to allow a bill to proceed to the floor of the Legislature for debate. They were blocked not because they were in some way deficient in their content, in my humble opinion, but they were blocked because they were opposition bills and the government did not want to see any opposition bill getting debated in the Legislature simply because they came from the opposition. This is, I believe, a black stain on our democratic process here in the House. It's something I don't want to see permitted to happen over the long haul.

Right now the government of the day sees fit to completely stifle the debate that members of this House wish to bring forward as private members' bills, and I think it's something that should receive the condemnation of all legislators in this House and also the public, because when government members simply block a private member's bill because it comes from the opposition regardless of the inherent value of that piece of legislation, what they're doing is expressing that they really don't believe in giving the opposition a fair hearing just because they might have opposing views. There have been 10 – 10 – of these private members' bills, I think nine or 10, that have been actually . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The individual who did catch my eye was the hon. Member for Camrose.

Ms Lovely: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to speak in favour of Bill 205, the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. I first want to thank the Member for Highwood for his hard work in bringing this bill forward to this House. It's important to promote organ and tissue donation because organ and tissue donation can save lives.

Currently organ and tissue donation rates in Alberta are lower than many of our neighbouring Canadian provinces and other top-performing countries. In Canada right now there are over 4,500 Canadians waiting for a transplant that will save their lives and even more people that are waiting for tissue transplant that will increase their quality of life. Of these Canadians on transplant wait-lists, over 700 of them are from right here in Alberta. Organ failure and organ donation impacts the lives of not just the recipients but their families as well.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 205 will include measures that will improve the effectiveness of organ donation and the transplant system as a whole. Organ donation is the ultimate gift of life, but there is need for improvements to the organ and tissue donation system. Bill 205 contains three major components that will improve the organ and tissue donation system. This will in turn help address the shortage of organ and tissue donors and increase the number of lives that can be saved.

The first major component contained in this bill is the implementation of a mandatory referral process. Mr. Speaker, last year the International Donation and Transplantation Legislative and Policy Forum assembled a panel of international experts in the fields of donation and transplantation to provide expert guidance on the structure of an ideal organ and tissue donation and transplantation system. The forum concluded that the mandatory referral is a key, evidence-based, best practice among global deceased organ and tissue donation and transplantation leaders.

Contrary to popular belief, registering as an organ donor or sharing your wishes with your family does not mean that you'll become an organ donor. The pathway to becoming a deceased organ donor is a complex one because individuals need to die in circumstances where donation is even possible, and these circumstances are rare. As a proportion of total deaths in Canada only approximately 1.2 per cent have the potential to become donors. Each patient who is a potential donor is rare, and identification and referral of these patients is the only way they will become an actual donor. Failure to identify possible donors is the biggest factor in explaining differences in deceased donation rates nationally and internationally.

Missed donor opportunities occur when potential donors are not identified and the appropriate organ donation organization is not notified or referrals are received too late. Missed donor opportunities also occur when potential donors are identified by the treating medical team but they choose not to notify the organ donation organization. In cases of late or nonreferral, life-sustaining therapy is withdrawn in a way that excludes the possibility of donation, preventing the wishes of the patient and their families to even be considered. A study found that reasons for physicians not referring patients to organ donation organizations are as follows: they deem the patient to be not an eligible donor; they did not due to the family being too upset; they did not due to their belief that the family had a religious bias; they did not due to their desire to leave the hospital unit.

Mandatory referral will help address these issues by increasing the chances to make sure discussions with the patient's family about donation are conducted by specialists who are educated specifically in this area. Under a mandatory referral process a physician would be required to refer a patient to the appropriate organ donation organization when death is deemed to be imminent. This is expected to play a huge part in optimization efforts. This change in notification will create a streamlined notification system that will ensure a more adequate timeline for assessing the viability of potential donors and will decrease missed opportunities. This should decrease the likelihood of overpromising and underdelivering or missing the opportunity to have the conversation with families who wish to donate. Both situations can add to the stress a family is experiencing at one of the most worst times of their life.

Mr. Speaker, we know that legal and ethical practices like mandatory referral are essential to establishing a strong donation culture. The decision on whether to donate a loved one's organs can be an extremely difficult one, especially under the umbrella of a family tragedy. This is why we need trained professionals engaging this process to provide the best support possible for Albertans. Professionally trained organ donation organizations are better able to help families and are not biased against organ donation. Consent to donate is of little value if potential donors are not properly identified and referred to donor specialists at the right time.

[The Speaker in the chair]

The second major component of this bill is that it will improve agency guidelines. The changes to the Organ and Tissue Donation Agency will also pave the way for annual reviews, reports, and suggestions directly to the minister to help minimize missed donor opportunities. These measures will help, to conclude, to build a stronger system of donation in the future.

The third component of this bill is improved education and awareness around the donor process. This bill will improve the quality of information provided to individuals within our Alberta registries in order to better educate Albertans on the process of organ and tissue donation and its importance.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is a major and necessary step forward to modernize Alberta's tissue and organ donation systems. I'm pleased to support this bill and would encourage all members of this House to do the same.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to take an opportunity to speak to this bill also. I've supported organ donation my whole life, and I remember signing an organ donation card decades ago. In fact, I think it was maybe even before I was 18. I actually think my parents had to cosign or sign on my behalf to make sure that could happen. This morning, knowing this bill was coming up, too, I thought I would actually check my donor status, so I went online, checked the status, and, sure enough, I was registered as a donor, which I was happy to see.

I know this process in the past has been complicated, but the new online process that I think has been in place for maybe two years now I thought was relatively simple. I know it could be simpler. I know we could have processes that are far more simple to make sure that we have everybody that wants to have their organs donated if something happened to them, make sure that they are taken care of and that that process happens, so I think this is a good discussion to have.

However, the process of private members' bills: let's face it; it's been manipulated by the UCP here. After nine weeks in session we are looking at bills 202 and 205 right now, which are the second and fifth drawings in this session, and they're finally hitting the process where they could actually see second reading, which is the first opportunity in this Legislature to actually debate a private member's bill. It's taken us nine weeks to get to this process.

Now, if the government really wants private members' bills to proceed, as there seems to be anxiety for this, an anxiousness for this bill to proceed as fast as possible – if they really wanted this bill to proceed as fast as possible, they would have done away with the private members' bill committee and concurrence, that delays private members' bills and motions by weeks. Now, again, everybody is talking about urgency, but nobody is doing anything to truly move this process along faster.

Now, when I look at this bill here, Bill 205, the member who brought this bill forward asked for concurrence in this Legislature, which actually delayed this bill an extra week, asking for and having to discuss concurrence. I believe it was the Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain who asked for concurrence on my Bill 202, which delayed my bill, and by pushing my bill back, that pushes Bill 205 back because it's further along on the Order Paper.

Now, this government, if they're really serious about this, could make this a government bill, and that would ensure that it's debated and passed in the fastest process possible. They could actually ask for unanimous consent to allow these bills to pass multiple stages in the same day. They could actually collapse debate and force the vote on it today so that we could move on to the next stage of the process even faster, but I'm not convinced that the government actually wants this bill to really pass, because they're doing nothing to show that to us.

With only a couple of Mondays left, which is the only time we have member time, there's a chance that this bill, even pushed along, won't be able to pass because on the next Monday we have – there are two bills up for concurrence. We could have concurrence discussed, which would take up that Monday, too.

I just want to say that I think the most important thing to remember here is that the process has been manipulated, and it's left us in a situation where we don't get the work done that we should be getting done in this Legislature. Again, nine weeks and we're barely discussing the first two private members' bills.

With that, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate lost]

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 205, Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Mandatory Referral) Amendment Act, 2022. Before I add my comments about this piece of legislation, I would also like to just echo what some of the other members in this place have said about private member bills. I sat through some of the comments earlier from the member for – was it Rocky View? Strathmore?

Member Irwin: Which one? Oh, Chestermere-Strathmore.

Ms Renaud: Chestermere-Strathmore. The Member for Chestermere-Strathmore made it very clear how important she believed private members' bills were, that we needed to clear the way for this important legislation. You know, all of us know that we really just only have a chance to bring something forward if we essentially win a lottery. She talked about how important the different topics were and how hard different members worked to be able to do that, which I found really odd given her and other members' actions over the last nine weeks of this session. That has been to, at every turn, shut down opportunities for the opposition bills to make it to this place so that we can debate them in the fashion that we were sent here to do.

You know, another example of just the blatant hypocrisy in this place is a little bit – it should be shocking, Mr. Speaker, but sadly it isn't because we're getting used to it. In any event, it is unfortunate that the UCP MLAs are really sort of intent on eroding the democracy that we should be upholding and protecting, but they erode it almost every day that we are in this place, sadly.

To Bill 205, human tissue and organ donation, I listened with interest as some of my colleagues talked about people, whether they were constituents or people in their lives, that had been successful recipients of organs, and it was actually really quite inspiring to hear just the incredible, life-giving nature of human tissue and organ donation. I'd like to tell you about someone in my life that I knew, and this was my first introduction to somebody that did require . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt; however, the 115 minutes allotted for debate at second reading have elapsed, and that allows the Member for Highwood five minutes to close debate.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I first want to start by thanking all my colleagues in the House today for sharing their input and their stories around such an important issue, an issue that I'm extremely passionate about, which is organ and tissue donation here in the province of Alberta. I've heard a lot about how important this is. I think we've identified how critical it is to move forward as quickly as possible with 700 Albertans awaiting either organ or tissue donation here in the province of Alberta. I think it's critical that as legislators we do everything possible to ensure that we are creating the best system possible to make sure that there are the most opportunities for that chance. We've spoken to how limited those chances are; roughly 1.2 per cent of all instances present an opportunity. We have to make sure that we maximize on those and minimize donor opportunities.

It's great to hear overall that there seems to be a general consensus in this House and support for this bill because, as I mentioned, it is important for all those people whose lives really are on the line, awaiting either organ or tissue donation. I also want to note and recognize the number of foundations, organizations, and individuals that have really supplied the input here. This is a bill by Albertans for Albertans to save Albertans. I have spent over a year working with AOG, Heart and Stroke, and Kidney Foundation. I know this morning we had the SEND presentation, and I had a chance to speak to Joyce Van Deurzen, who is an executive director with the Kidney Foundation, and was able to have really important conversations with her. Flavia Robles, as well, is an executive director with the Kidney Foundation and has been critical in the input that she's provided to me and the support for this bill, and I'm very appreciative of that.

You know, these stories, the stories that I've heard, stories around Cindy Krieger and her daughter Morghan, Dan and Jennifer Woolfsmith and their daughter Mackenzy: I think they're incredibly powerful, and they highlight how critical it is for us to move forward as quickly as possible on finally getting this legislation passed. Before I close debate, I just want to read something that was provided to me by Jennifer Woolfsmith, and I think it says a lot. She sent me an e-mail that says:

We talk about Mackenzy [her daughter] and the gift she gave openly and often in our house. Having our children, both Owen and Declan, understand all the hard work that went into this by so many as well as witness the important step forward first-hand on what would be meaningful to our whole family.

She states that

Declan asked me just the other day how Mackenzy's organs got to other kids. I was beginning to explain that the doctors did it very carefully and lovingly when he asked me if she had surgery, because one of his classmates recently had surgery and she got a lollipop for being brave. When I answered that it was indeed surgery, he replied, "I hope that Mackenzy got a thousand lollipops." Although he often cries that he misses his sister that he never had the chance to know, he also knows how incredibly meaningful the gift was that she gave.

I think all of us here today need to be brave, brave like Mackenzy and Declan and Owen, and recognize how important it is for us to move forward with this legislation. Thank you to everyone who spoke today.

With that, I close debate. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for second reading carried]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to ask for unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 9(1) in order to proceed to debate on Motion Other than Government Motion 507.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Motions Other than Government Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Public Service

507. Mr. Neudorf moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to review the rate of growth of the number of public servants employed by departments, public agencies, and municipalities and establish benchmarks for hiring new employees that are linked to population and population growth to ensure that the size of the public service is appropriate.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As municipal governments increase services, they add staff. Then their labour costs grow, and inevitably municipal tax rates increase. It's important to remember that, at the end of the day, there is only one taxpayer. People have to pay their share of property taxes along with business taxes and school taxes. There are also federal and provincial personal income taxes, payroll and business taxes, fuel taxes, not to mention Justin Trudeau's carbon tax. You can also add fees as well as licences and membership costs to people and businesses, and it all adds up.

Mr. Speaker, did you know that May 24 is Tax Freedom Day in Canada? Through the research I did for Motion 507, I learned that families of two or more pay 39.1 per cent of their income to taxes. Think about it: that's almost 40 per cent of a family's budget paying various levels of government taxes.

Let me explain how this has worked in our province. Here are some facts reported by Franco Terrazzano with the Canadian Taxpayers Federation on June 30, 2020, in an article titled Alberta Municipal Gov't Labour Costs Out of Touch with Reality. Calgary's and Edmonton's municipal budgets have labour costs of over 50 per cent of their total spend, both increasing by more than $200 million between the years 2014 and 2018. That's each. I can confirm to the Assembly that neither of their populations increased proportionately by that much over those four years.

A statistic on pensions for the city of Calgary blew me away, Mr. Speaker. Did you know that Calgary spends more on pensions for its employees and elected officials than every other major Canadian city? Calgary provides some of its employees not just one, not only two, but in some cases three pensions to a single employee. If that wasn't enough to make you shake your head, the council pension plan costs Calgaryans more than council pensions in Vancouver, Edmonton, and Ottawa combined. Let that sink in.

Mr. Speaker, not to single out our largest metropolitan cities too much, small municipal governments are not exempt from this trend. Of those with populations between 5,000 and 30,000 people such as the municipal districts of Taber, Greenview, and Blackfalds, some of them have the fastest growing labour costs. Small towns which saw their labour costs double are the villages of Edberg, Gadsby, and Lougheed. Between 2014 and 2018 Edberg's population declined from 163 people to 146. Gadsby saw an increase of 36 to 61 citizens but not quite double. Lougheed's population increased from 256 to 267, by 11 people.

It begs the question: does it make sense to see their labour costs double in those jurisdictions during that same period of time? Overall, in Alberta municipal government labour costs increased by nearly $837 million, or 17 per cent, which outpaces the population growth of only 5.3 per cent and is still higher even when inflation is added in at its 7 per cent rate. Setting benchmarks tied to population growth would be one simple tool to protect every single Albertan taxpayer on an annual basis year over year for as long as they are adhered to. Aside from that, it is simply good governance, exemplifying transparency, accountability, and predictability.

Mr. Speaker, I bring forward this motion today in the spirit of Daniel Webster, who said, "The Constitution was made to guard the people against the dangers of good intention." I say that to recognize the typical cycle of human society. For example, the pioneers who first settled the land, started farms, worked mines, gathered at forts, and established towns quickly focused on building schools, town halls, libraries, and hospitals, requiring staff to be hired, first to do the work and then to administer the respective institutions.

It wasn't long before there was a need to see governance and planning for towns, industrial growth, regulations and bylaws for order, policing and jails, courthouses, offices to guide fair trade and security of goods, post offices, water treatment plants and waste depots, and the growth continues. People continue to come to developed areas. Hamlets become villages, villages become towns, towns become cities, and cities become metropolises. The public service continues to grow, providing social services; help for those with disabilities, mental health, and addictions; supportive housing; the provision and connection of utilities, water, waste water, garbage, and recycling; public transit; colleges and universities; and more. These are all very good things that are needed and, in fact, often demanded by the citizenry, but all services come at a cost to the ratepayer and the taxpayer. Not only do services cost more over time due to inflation, but that cost is further augmented due to the volume as the population increases.

But the most invisible of all is the growth of scope, things that used to be done privately that are now done publicly and paid for by the public purse. To more clearly define this, Mr. Speaker, I will remind you and my colleagues in the Chamber here today of the following. Schools of all kinds – from K to 12, colleges and universities, trade schools and vocational schools – were originally established and operated privately. Just watch Anne of Green Gables for a trip down memory lane in this respect. Nearly all hospitals were established and operated by churches and funded by donations, and wealthy philanthropists often built wings and units that bear their names. Libraries, banks, railroads, and even resource development are other examples of industries that began privately that now, in whole or in part, have seen government or public agencies take a hand in administration.

Again, Mr. Speaker, all these things are very important, needed, and often demanded by the people. The arguments for consistency, access, affordability, transparency, and fairness are all valid. Due to time, relative comfort, and wealth, we see more and more of society expecting these things. My goal today is not to wage war on those ideals or have that debate but merely to warn of the dangers therein and, more specifically, to provide a comprehensive way of keeping that invisible exponential growth in check, to shine a light on the pitfalls of trying to, quote, unquote, keep up with the Joneses, or, more appropriately, to warn of the cost of small towns wanting to be mid-sized cities and mid-sized cities trying to be metro cities.

I take some wisdom from history, particularly from many of the founding fathers of the United States and the writers of their Constitution. Thomas Jefferson said:

A wise & frugal government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another, shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, & shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned. This is the sum of good government; & this is necessary to close the circle of our felicities.

In essence, good government must be restrained, held in check, and not allowed to grow without deep and careful consideration.

James Madison said it this way:

The powers of the federal government are enumerated; it can only operate in certain cases; it has legislative powers on defined and [united] objects, beyond which it cannot extend its jurisdiction.

The key words: “enumerated” and “defined,” which mean to establish the number of or to mention one by one, making these powers clear, defined, limited, beyond which it cannot extend its jurisdiction. It requires an incredible amount of self-discipline to exact that self-control and not extend the jurisdiction of government, the highest authority of the land. Depending on your beliefs, that may be debatable, but government is definitely the largest and most powerful. Therefore, it begs the question: who or what controls that apex predator unless it controls itself?

This principle is so important, so powerful, so invisible that those founding fathers and legendary leaders almost all spoke to it in one way or another. As Thomas Paine said: government is best which governs least.

I humbly ask all members in this Chamber to please support this motion. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on Motion other than Government Motion 507 are there others? The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the wonderful Member for Lethbridge-East, who brought forward this motion. I’m going to read it into the record again just because my folks may not be watching his feed.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to review the rate of growth of the number of public servants employed by departments, public agencies, and municipalities and establish benchmarks for hiring new employees that are linked to population and population growth to ensure that the size of the public service is appropriate.

In layman’s terms on that, typically on project sites or in private industry we kind of look at that ratio, so management to services ratio. One of the other things that helps us drive that in the process of how many people you need to do things is looking at the physical processes themselves.

In a former life I used to go in as a consultant to a lot of organizations and look for efficiencies. One of the things that freaked a lot of people out: when you go in as an outside person and you start lifting up the hood, so to speak, and looking at what their processes do and what the efficiencies are, typically they’re concerned that there are going to be layoffs. What I’ve found most times in that consideration is that it actually increases throughput. So when you start looking at efficiencies within the system or you have some type of metrics or something to guide by, typically those departments become more productive, and hence the throughput and the services increase.

Now, in the government context, some are rock stars; some aren’t. Like, it depends on which department. When I was a first-time candidate, I was actually down in Yuma, of all places, because we’ve got lots of snowbirds down there. I went down for an air show and ended up talking to a bunch of folks from my own constituency, ironically. One of the individuals there, Wendy, took me over – she grabbed another person that she knew that was from Edmonton. He was retired out of the Transportation department. He was around right during that time when Ralph Klein and everybody were looking at cutbacks. You know, regardless of history lessons or otherwise, essentially everything became so darned bloated at the time. The government couldn’t borrow cash; they had to have some drastic measures to look at cutbacks.

Now, this gentleman was recruited from an engineering company to come over to Transportation at the time. He gets there just as these cutbacks are taking place. He was divulging to me some of the context, that the department was very much upset. They were very concerned about how this was going to work. He said: quite frankly, after the first year of going through those changes, the attitudes increased; the workplace satisfaction went up. He said that the throughputs went just through the roof. They were doing more than less and very happy with it.

It’s counterintuitive. It may seem to some that when you don’t have so many people around, the morale actually goes up. Again, it’s job satisfaction, getting those throughputs, concentrating on which items. In governments at all levels I think it behooves us to not have some type of metric to tie the number of people we have with throughputs.

Now, the other thing is that I really like the concept of tying it to the population as kind of a starting point. But, again, depending on the services and the systems that each one of these departments is offering, it may be because it’s cumbersome till you get more people. Also, another thing: it’s counterintuitive. Because we have computers, sometimes it takes more people to do work where we were all sold on how it was supposed to be less labour intensive. So there has to be some tongue in cheek there.

What I am going to do is talk about some of the items that the member pointed out: 39 per cent of our tax dollars go to some level, way, shape, or form of government in this country. Thirty-nine per cent. So we’re pushing almost 40 per cent of our tax dollars going to pay for services that we may or may not tap into, that we may or may not have an input into, that we may or may not see in the first place, which is just wild.

The fact that the pension plans – and this one jumped right off the page. The pensions from Calgary – and I’ve got to find it here; it just blew me away. Edmonton, Vancouver, and Ottawa combined pale in comparison to the pensions paid out by Calgary for the public service. Like, folks in Calgary, if you’re listening to this, the pucker factor, for me, is pretty high in hearing about it. The fact that you guys are living the dream is another one. So you can see, when some of these things don’t have checks and balances in place, how that compounding tax effect just keeps taking place.

I do have some rock stars out in my area. I’m going to give some plugs out to the county of Parkland, the county of Lac Ste. Anne, the county of Sturgeon, the counties of Yellowhead and Westlock. I’m very fortunate to work with those folks. When I first started talking about this, coming in as newly elected, Mr. Speaker, all fired up about our platform commitments, looking for efficiencies, red tape reductions, and all those things, they were already doing it. So before we even got here, those counties were already looking at efficiencies internally. The collaboration that they were looking at between them: when it comes to firefighting services, when they're looking at the Villeneuve landing network, as an example, they were utilizing their own business development groups between those organizations.

When they were looking at landing a manufacturing company, XCMG, that produces industrial equipment – they were competing between here and Texas and us – those groups came together utilizing their existing resources in an efficient manner to try to land these projects, to try to land these companies and organizations.

So those are the types of things that can happen when those departments are lean and mean and working on doing that.

The other thing that really pushed Parkland to be very efficient, I would hazard to say, was the premature phase-out of the coal mines. Again, you've heard me speak about that a few times, that they lost 25 per cent of their revenues on the front end because of that. So they needed to find innovative ways to make sure that they were turning over tax revenue, and they had to develop what assets they have. That meant building permits. That meant building out the Acheson industrial park to do that, and the way they had to do that was to get very lean and mean within their approval process. Unfortunately, when you look at processes, some of the impediments become personnel themselves. If they can't get on with the new program, then they have to go.

Now, the Alberta government itself: I would like to give credit to the Minister of Finance. He's in behind the scenes and through all the other ministries as well over the last few budgets. I heard the Member for Lethbridge-West – sorry. I'm trying not to laugh, but it does strike me as odd. The only reason, she felt, that we balanced the budget was that the price of oil went up. Well, I'm here to tell you that that isn't quite the case. Budgets don't balance themselves, and just because the price of oil, the old Texas tea, goes up doesn't make it all happen. In behind the scenes there were lots of efficiencies looked at through an attrition process, through all the hires that have taken place and not backfilling those positions, looking for efficiencies in your own backyard before you put more burden on the taxpayers to ask for more.

The other one that comes with that is that once you have some of these metrics tied into place, you can have incentive plans or incentive packages or performance metrics that people can now achieve, being these departments and organizations. If they can do more with less, they're happy about it. They actually start to achieve these goals. Once they understand what the rule of the game is, rather than building fiefdoms or having these convoluted processes, once they're efficient, everything starts to fall into place because now you're benefiting from an improved process. You're getting people to work together. You're also looking at the right culture to come into place. Sometimes it's very awkward to have someone from the outside come in and take a look at what you're doing but also to have those bookends and put it in place.

It's a sobering thought when we think that some of this has just happened and grown over the years. Again coming back to that engineer that was with – now he's retired at this point and packaged out down in Yuma. When he was talking about that department, he said: we did all these cuts, and everything took place. He says that, quite frankly, when he left, it had ballooned and popped right back up to that again. Again, there wasn't that need or that necessity, and it's not until sometimes we have a crisis, whether it's a cash crunch or anything else, that we have to look at these.

From the Member for Lethbridge-West for being one of the grown-ups in the room looking at – Lethbridge-East; I apologize. East, west: west is the best; east is the least, or the other way around in that case. From the Member for Lethbridge-East being the grown-up in the room and understanding that it's not the price of oil: it comes down to little steps that you can take along the place, and if you don't have performance metrics in place, then you're only rising to the lowest level of performance in the first place, and the easy thing is just to hire somebody else. Where you have that intestinal fortitude, have to look inwards at what you're doing with what you have and making sure that you're spending every taxpayer dollar as if it's your last to make sure that we don't have to rely on commodity prices – there isn't a Hail Mary – and doing prudent business practices in hiring and making sure that we're held to account: that's what we've got to do to get things forward.

Mr. Speaker, with that, I'd like to close my remarks, and thank you very much to the Member for Lethbridge-East for bringing this motion forward.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Mr. Stephan: Sure. I'd like to stand briefly and lend my support to the private member's motion. I'll read it for the record as well.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to review the rate of growth of the number of public servants employed by departments, public agencies, and municipalities and establish benchmarks for hiring new employees that are linked to population and population growth to ensure that the size of the public service is appropriate.

Mr. Speaker, before I became a Member of the Legislative Assembly, I had the opportunity to serve as a tax lawyer in the city of Red Deer, and over the last couple of years – you know, I love the city that I live in. It's where I grew up and came back to raise my family and to start a business, and I wanted Red Deer to be the best community that it could possibly be. One of those things is that when I met with individuals and families in my community, they were concerned about the increase in their property tax rates. I started to do some investigations as a public service, and I formed with some other members in the community an organization called the Red Deer Taxpayers' Association. Actually, you can go online and look it up. It's in the public domain there.

One of the things that we measured is that over a period of a number of years we looked at and compared the combined rate of population and inflation growth and compared that to the operation expenses of the municipality. Just looking at the website, it's really interesting. I think it was mentioned that we talk about compounding impact and a municipality that spends above population and inflation growth every single year: it's quite extraordinary, actually, what that compounding impact can result in.

As it related to the city of Red Deer, just looking, there was a measurement done over a 15-year period where you had a combined population and inflation growth of about 72 per cent, and during that time operating expenses went up over 215 per cent. When you look at kind of the compounding impact, if you kind of compare, if they had just kept their spending in line with inflation and population growth versus what their actual spending is, you see this large area, this large growing difference from the compounding impact. In the city's case, over a 15-year period to 2018 that difference had compounded to over $125 million in a year. It was almost double of what their budget had been had they just kept their spending in line with population growth. So over a 15-year period the compounding impact almost doubled, in fact, their operating expenses versus if they had just kept it in line with population and inflation growth.

But one of the things that I think is really good about this as well is that it's not only important that we do the analysis to have that accountability, but it's just as important that we report it and let the public know the truth. In our communities we want to encourage all of the communities that we live in to be the best that we can be. Certainly, when we report and when we're accountable to the public in the communities that we live in on how we're doing, then that strengthens democracy. It changes culture. The more that the truth is known, the stronger culture you have in government.

With that, I really appreciate this wonderful motion, and I look forward to supporting it. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has the call.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for an opportunity to briefly address this motion before us. You know, I come at it from both being a public servant in Calgary for eight years and then getting elected to city council for 15 years. In those times there certainly was – long-service employees would get a contribution at the end of their service to the city of Calgary, but that's changed. That has been eliminated, and I don't think the mover of the motion reflected that in what he was saying. He was talking about things that were in the past and done in the past in Calgary, and the way the new council is going forward is very much having set a time limit on that kind of contribution to long-service employees, people who had spent 25 years plus with the city of Calgary, and they were retiring and they did get a contribution. That is not what employees signing up today will be achieving, will be getting. So there is some old news in what the mover was talking about, and the new news is the city's actions going forward.

You know, I was just wondering about this establishing benchmarks for new hiring based on population and population growth. Mr. Speaker, that's how I understand municipalities, for the most part, look at hiring. They look at hiring as a lagging effect of their population growth. They look at hiring. They look at business processes first to see if they can address the service, perhaps, that citizens are asking for, and they, in a lagging way, will then go to build their staff complement up once their population or population percentage goes up.

It used to be said around the council table: constituents never ask for less service; they always ask for more service. That's the dilemma that many municipalities find themselves in. Constituents aren't happy with less garbage collection, less roadway work done; they want more. In many councils that I was a part of, the times didn't afford us to increase property taxes, so we had to do a lot more with less, or the workers had to do a lot more with less.

The other point I wanted to make, Mr. Speaker, just listening to the information that came from the mover, is that while being a city employee, I went through two or three organizational reviews where the management was tasked by the city government of the day to look at: is the city in the right business? I was in the community and social services area: is the city in the business properly of addressing the needs of citizens, and can we change it? We very much got changed a couple of times from doing direct counselling work with constituents who would be either referred or come to our doors to doing community development work, not individual work but group work. Then the city moved out of daycare, child care services to just kind of monitoring or regulating child care services.

So the entire time of my entire profession of being both a city employee as well as on the governance of city council, I knew the municipality to be involved with and active in always deciding the kind of work it should be doing on behalf of the citizens. I knew it to hire in a lagging way, where if the population grew, then down the road the number of employees for the city would grow.

The other thing I guess I wonder is: where will the benchmarks, how will the benchmarks be established? Will they be truly benchmarks amongst peers – I'm talking about other governments, other municipalities, other departments, and other public agencies – or will they be benchmarks between apples and oranges? Like, that wasn't really made clear by the mover.

The last thing I guess I'll just say is that, you know, this government has done, in my estimation and the estimation of probably many people in Alberta, many things to increase the size of government in ways that didn't benefit the population in Alberta. For instance, the whole war room grew – I don't know – maybe 15 to 20 people that are either government or they're an agency of government, and I don't see the value for money there, Mr. Speaker. So this government has done many things to increase the size of the public service in ways that have provided no value, in my estimation and the estimation of many Albertans who are critical of the work of the war room and other places.

I will sit down and listen to the rest of the debate, Mr. Speaker, but just wanted to get on the record that municipalities, for one, have done a lot of this work already. I'm not aware that the mover has spoken to any of the municipal agencies, whether it's RMA or Alberta Municipalities, to share what their views are, in fact, of the motion he's bringing forward.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall, followed by the hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to this motion.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to review the rate of growth of the number of public servants employed by departments, public agencies, and municipalities and establish benchmarks for hiring new employees that are linked to population and population growth to ensure that the size of the public service is appropriate.

Of course, our caucus supports this motion, but the remarks we heard earlier completely skipped over the departments and public agencies and went straight to attacking municipalities, which are also independent bodies duly elected by their constituents and should have every right to manage their affairs as they see fit, and the data that was used also was not up to date with respect to municipalities.

When we talk about the government departments and public agencies – like, for instance, we can look at an example from Education. We can look at Alberta Health Services. One thing for sure that we do firmly believe is that we do need a strong public service. There is a strong role for public service, and we think that services that government provides, government departments provide, government agencies provide should keep up with population growth and inflation, those kind of parameters. Instead of, I guess, poking at and talking about what municipalities do, government should look at their departments first. They should mind their business first.

For instance, Alberta's student population has grown every year. There are more kids in the classroom than there were in 2019, than there were in 2020. Instead of adding more teachers, instead of taking into account population growth, that this motion says that government should, what we see in the government budget, in their own documents, is that there are 954 fewer teachers in our classrooms now. There are more students in our classroom, and instead of keeping pace with the student population growth, government is slashing teachers. It's slashing public service from that school system, exactly the opposite of what this motion is asking government to do. Those are facts coming from their own budget documents, that they have fewer teachers now.

That only happened because the government was pushing through its ideological agenda of cutting public services, slashing services, so that they can give corporate handouts to the wealthiest in this country. On one hand corporations got $4.7 billion dollars from this government, but education is seeing a cut. We're seeing a cut even to, like, supports for individuals with disabilities. They deindexed AISH. They also changed the schedule for supplemental benefits. They're denying those benefits as well. They didn't do anything to make sure that our education system keeps pace with the growing number of students. So, certainly, this is a good motion, and government should look into what they did to education.

The second thing with respect to education: early on in the pandemic the government fired 20,000 staff from the Education department via a tweet. Those were education assistants. Those were people who were making sure that students who are coming through our education system have the supports that they need. Twenty thousand staff from the education system, and over the same period we saw an increase in the growth of our student population.

Similarly, when we take the example of health care, the government may say whatever they choose to about spending more on health care, but every day what we are hearing is that because of this government's mismanagement our health system is not keeping pace with the population growth. We are seeing ER rooms getting shut down every day. We are seeing services cut every day. Government certainly didn't care when they were slashing the health budget, when they went to war with doctors. They didn't make sure that services that government is providing keep pace with the growing population needs. The record that we have so far is that this government did not make sure that our services keep pace with the population growth.

[The Speaker in the chair]

On top, the motion talks about some kind of transparent benchmark. This is the government that has not shared a thing about a $120 million entity known as the war room and exempted that entity from FOIP. What kind of benchmark is the Member for Lethbridge-East talking about? I would be interested in knowing: why doesn't he support some kind of benchmark for the war room that's spending $30 million every day? We don't know how many employees they have. We don't know what kind of budget they have. We don't know where they are spending money. We don't know who they are contracting out their advertisement to. We don't know where they steal their logos and how much they pay for that. I hope that member will agree with me that we need some kind of benchmark there as well.

We have Invest Alberta. Up until last week that was not FOIPable. That's a government agency. No wonder that this government got an award from the Association of Journalists, a code of silence award in secrecy. That's the record of this government.

So they can bring forward this feel-good motion, but their actions are completely opposite of what this motion is saying. We will certainly support it, and should we become government, we will make sure that the public service keeps pace with the population growth and inflation. We will make sure that there is a benchmark and that entities like the war room are not exempt from FOIP and other laws that make such entities transparent.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise with just a few short minutes left in our debate this afternoon. I'm pleased to rise to speak to Motion 507, brought forward by the Member for Lethbridge-East, and I just wanted to thank the member for his diligence and his work in general as an MLA and certainly on this motion. I also wanted to take this opportunity to thank the members of the public service that I have had the pleasure of working with in my time in office. I've had many, including members of the Legislative Assembly offices, that you would be well aware of, Mr. Speaker, and also municipal leaders across the province. We seem to have sort of focused the discussion today on municipalities, but I don't think that was the intent of the motion. It was broader in focus than that.

However, since we've talked about it – and I've heard members opposite thank the member and suggest that they would support the motion, which is great to hear, Mr. Speaker. I just wanted to thank the municipal leaders across Alberta that I've had the pleasure of knowing and working with and particularly – and I don't want to play favourites here, because I am a rural MLA – the rural municipal leaders that I've had the pleasure of meeting, because many of them have the practice of doing more with less for the duration of their careers because of where they live. It's just a fact of their geography. I just wanted to thank them for their creativity, for their ideas, for their ability to do more with less, for their commitment to do so, and for their commitment to rightsizing government on behalf of Alberta taxpayers, which I think goes to the heart of this motion.

I wanted to talk a little bit about this. I realize that my time is very brief, but I thought I would start with a quote from our friend Benjamin Franklin, his famous words in a letter that he penned to – and I'm going to probably say this name wrong – Jean-Baptiste Le Roy. I'm assuming it's a French name, but anyway we'll see how that goes. It was penned in 1789, which was shocking for me to read. And the famous words are: in this world nothing can be said to be certain except for death and taxes. Sadly, those words remain true to this very day. I think the heart of this motion is really about limiting the tax burden to the people, and I would fully support the intent of that in any opportunity that I would have to do so.

There are so many things that I could talk about. One of the things I believe the Member for Calgary-Buffalo had mentioned, you know: are we going to compare apples to apples? Well, with respect to municipal governments, which is what he was talking about, this government did put together a tool that municipal leaders can use. I apologize, Mr. Speaker; I can't remember the proper title. It became coined as the municipal report card and that stuck in my brain, so I can't think of what it actually is called, but it provides municipal leaders right across Alberta the opportunity to go onto the site, that's populated every year by Alberta's public service, and provide them with the ability to compare and benchmark themselves against municipalities of similar size.

It's really important, the apples-to-apples conversation, because built into that software, built into that system are flags. For example, if I was a municipal leader in Grande Prairie, the amazing, wonderful constituency and city of Grande Prairie, and I wanted to compare my budgets and my staffing levels to that of Calgary, the system would flag me that this is not a great comparator because of the differential in size. I think that there are already tools in place that have been put in place by this government to allow municipal leaders to benchmark themselves. This is just another way to look at this.

I believe that any time you want to create great public policy, there should be guardrails in place. I can say as a former member of Executive Council that one of the things that's challenging are the silos that exist in government. So to have an overarching motion that says that we're going to look at the public service as a whole instead of just the pieces, I think, is really valuable and important.

I can also say that there are times when things bloat because technology shifts but the organizations don't shift in response, and some positions do become unnecessary or redundant. That's just a reality in any organization. When that happens, if there's no way to benchmark ourselves, if there's no guardrail in place, if there's no anchor to look at that, that will remain unchecked. We owe it to ourselves, we owe it to the taxpayers to ensure that we're doing the very best with the dollars that we take from them and also to ensure that we take the fewest dollars possible from them to provide the best service.

That goes back to my time in rural Alberta with those municipal leaders there, who I believe really understand that concept and really work diligently to make sure that that happens. I think we could learn a lot of lessons from rural Alberta. I probably sound a little bit biased.

I think I have about one or two minutes left. I just wanted to talk a little bit about the situation when there is a bloated labour pool. There are a number of inefficiencies that are inherent culturally in a bloated labour pool. Other members of this Assembly have spoken about that this afternoon. I know that the hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland spoke about that from his industrial experience, and I can speak about that from my time in restaurant.

The Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt; however, the time for debate has now passed, and pursuant to Standing Order 3(1) the House stands adjourned until this evening at 7:30.

[The Assembly adjourned at 6 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Monday, May 9, 2022

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 19

Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022

Ms Ganley moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, be amended by deleting all of the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Debate adjourned on the amendment May 5: Mr. Sabir speaking]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen to debate.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the opportunity to speak to Bill 19, Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022, this evening. Of course, we’re on a referral amendment. The reason why, I think, that on this side of the House we are so adamant that this be referred to committee, of course, is because the number one reason for the bill: I think that many individuals and stakeholders have been wanting from the government and not only from this government but even governments going back into the Progressive Conservative years, actually, a tribunal. What we realize is that a lot of these issues end up clogging our courts, and it’s not the most effective way of addressing a lot of the issues that need to be worked out.

We’ve heard from a number of property owners, condominium owners, of course, but also people who live in these condominiums who could be renting from the owners that there are a number of issues that end up coming up because of the relationship that exists between the board and then also the condominium. Like, there’s a whole series of concerns regarding chargebacks and whether some upgrades that have been done to the condominium weren’t actually agreed upon by all the members of the condominium who own units there in the condominium, yet the owner of the building actually decides that this actually needs to move forward.

Of course, people are left kind of hanging because they’re saying: well, I didn’t agree to this, I didn’t agree to this issue, and why do I have to pay for it? Sometimes these upgrades that condominium owners want to make end up costing people in the thousands and thousands of dollars. Especially now, in the time that we’re living right now, where people are stretched pretty thin, having to come up with, you know, $5,000, $10,000, sometimes even $15,000 for an upgrade that you don’t even remember taking a vote on could actually be a considerable issue that could then eventually end up in our courts because of how things go.

It’s important to note that tribunals have been something that stakeholders on all sides have been asking for for a very, very long time. That’s why it’s important for us to – well, it’s one of the major reasons, I would say, why this bill actually needs to be referred to committee, to actually see how this actually can be resolved, right? I mean, some of the more not-as-immediate, I would say, concerns of people have been dealt with in this piece of legislation – and I applaud the minister for that – in terms of votes being done although there are some concerns with that particular aspect.

It’s very possible for individuals to be scapegoated. For example, it’s very easy for a group to decide: okay; well, we’re all going to vote that whatever particular reason we need to bring in some kind of service, it’s all going to have to be paid by one individual. I’m sure that many of my colleagues on this side of the House have described situations like that. I’ve only heard of them third-hand, Mr. Speaker. I’ll be honest. I’ve never lived in a condominium and don’t ever plan on living in a condominium as far as I know – who knows? – but things change. I can’t say that I’ve experienced any of this first-hand; I’m just hearing it second-hand by others. The stories that you end up hearing, though, are that individuals could be scapegoated. For example, I’ve heard stories of there being, like, one particular individual that, you know, perhaps is not as well liked by other individuals that happen to live in a condo, and it’s something that definitely needs to be looked at. Like, how can we make sure that individuals aren’t going to be scapegoated by the rest of the people who actually live in the condo?

That being said, I think it’s really important that we continue to pressure the government on the issue of these tribunals. For example, in B.C., Ontario, and Nova Scotia they all have versions of condo tribunals, you know, so it would have been very easy for the minister and the minister’s staff to do a crossjurisdictional and look at where in Canada there are other versions of condo tribunals and perhaps even picked the best elements out of each one of those cases and proposed something here in legislation for all of us to consider. It’s not as if this is a new idea or it’s a new ask; it’s something that’s been asked for for quite a while, as I stated.

For example, in B.C. they have what is called a Civil Resolution Tribunal, which resolves condominium disputes of any amount and handles other issues in B.C. under $5,000. B.C.’s residential tenancies branch was not involved in developing it, but the tribunal resolves issues of fees and fines, condominium bylaws that are arbitrary or unfair, financial responsibilities, irregularities of board interpretation of condo legislation, and common property. Like, just irregularity of a board interpretation of condo legislation: I’m sure that there are a number of issues there that people get into. It’s quite unfortunate that we don’t have a tribunal here, and something as simple as the interpretation of condo legislation could end up clogging our courts when the judicial system, I would say, has – I mean, I understand that it’s important for these individuals who are actually living the problem. It’s important for them but all the more reason that there should be a tribunal to actually look into this so that our courts can be freed up to actually deal with, I would say, more pressing matters.

On that note, though, in B.C. the Civil Resolution Tribunal does not deal with the sale of condos, court orders on property, dealings with developers, and significant issues with the board such as conflicts of interest or human rights concerns. In B.C. through the Civil Resolution Tribunal resolutions can take anywhere from four to six months. I think that Albertans would really benefit from something like that. You know, between four to six months for something to get resolved seems pretty reasonable to me, and it would be great if we had something like that here.

In Ontario, for example, they have the Condominium Authority of Ontario, which is at arm’s length from the government. It has tribunal authority. It has programs that are administered by a $50 levy from all condos and then fees for service. It’s administered online, and the system goes through stages of negotiation, mediation, and adjudication. Currently the only disputes dealt with are related to condo corporations keeping records.

Nova Scotia has a condominium dispute officer and has a condominium arbitration process. The officers deal with issues regarding a corporation's failing to provide necessary records and issues related to the common areas.

As I stated, you know, there are examples of versions of tribunals across Canada that the minister could have very well looked into and developed something here. I have to wonder if during this process – I mean, from past examples of proposed pieces of legislation in this House I know that the minister does a pretty good job of consulting with individuals, so I wouldn't mind knowing who the minister consulted with on this particular piece of legislation and if the issue of tribunals was brought up or not. I mean, on this side of the House, we're hearing that it continues to be a pressing matter for a lot of people. Of course, it's something that could easily be constructed through the ministry and brought into the House in proposed legislation. Albertans would take real good advantage of that.

The most important thing, though, as I alluded to, Mr. Speaker, is that it wouldn't be clogging up our courts. It wouldn't be clogging up our courts for very important matters that need to be dealt with there. Of course, I think that it's very important that that be provided because, I mean, government resources, as we know, are limited. I mean, there's talk about strikes happening because there haven't been raises. They don't feel that there's the adequate amount of resources being given, and I think it's something that – I mean, there's a whole lot of issues, I understand, that this government needs to deal with when it comes to our judicial system, but this small decision through this bill could alleviate a lot of the pressures being experienced by the judicial system. For me, it sounds like it's a no-brainer, why members on that side of the House wouldn't be supportive of moving towards Alberta having a tribunal here for this particular process.

You know, all this is in – as I stated, for a lot of these people who live in the condominiums with these issues, they're feeling pressed economically at this time. But even beyond that, Mr. Speaker, I think that housing continues to become more and more unaffordable for many people – right? – whereas condominiums were seen as an option for people to kind of get into because the cost of housing was going so high. It reminds me that even when I was first elected – and it continues to this day. I'll meet constituents at some kind of event – like, for example, the community league is hosting an event – and individuals that I will meet there will actually bring up to me, like, the cost of housing: why is it so incredibly high? Like, to pay $600,000, $650,000, $700,000 for a house that just three years ago, you know, was costing $300,000: they just can't understand that. Of course, they often say to me, "Well, is there any way to control house prices?" And I tell them, "Look, if I were to walk into this Legislature and say that we have to have price controls on the housing market, the members on the other side would call me a communist." Right?

Some Hon. Members: Yup.

Member Loyola: Of course, no debate there. See?

The issue being that Albertans are so pressed because of the cost of housing. It's becoming more and more unaffordable, more like first-time homebuyers are having more and more of an issue actually getting into a home. Yet from this government – you know, they can laugh about calling me a communist, but I actually care about Albertans that are trying to get into a home. I actually care about that. I want them to get a home.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you very much, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs has risen to debate.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise to speak to Bill 19, the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2022. I believe we're on a referral. I know that I've spoken to this bill and have expressed some significant concerns about not having a tribunal. I know that when we look at the court system that's in the province right now, it's overwhelmed. Simple things that shouldn't be taking a significant amount of time – I can tell you that I had a constituent reach out to me regarding a speeding ticket, and it has been adjourned. It's now going on three years from the time the speeding ticket occurred to when they're going to see their day in court to fight that speeding ticket.

I can't imagine taking something as significant as where you live, your place of residence, your condo. To wait significant amounts of time, to invest money in a court system that's already backlogged: that is increasing stress for Albertans. When we look at the proposal to have this bill referred to committee, I think it makes sense. I think that we would hear very loudly and clearly in that committee what the opposition is already hearing, that life is not affordable, that there are some really easy steps that could have made this piece of legislation something that actually has a positive impact on those living in condos. They would be able to share their experience and their story, and I think the committee is the ideal place to do that.

When we were government, we started a review regarding condominiums, and the UCP stopped that. I know that there would have been some significant feedback that would have been heard there. I know that when I first started my career in mediation, Mr. Speaker, the very first mediation that I did was with the city of Edmonton, with a condominium board and a resident. To give you some context, a typical mediation is one hour. From the time that we meet – everybody puts their issues on the table; we talk about some sort of dispute resolution, some sort of ideas that both parties could agree with – to the very end of wrapping up with an agreement that both parties are in support of: one hour.

The mediation that we had done with individuals of the condo and the condo board was five hours the first day and three hours the second day. This is something that people are incredibly invested in, as I'm sure you can well imagine. It's your home. This is where you want to be able to come home to after a stressful day, find peace. If there's some sort of issue that's happening, it shouldn't be taken to the extreme, where the automatic is to go to court. That is the worst case scenario.

I know that in many other fields of law, when it comes to the court system, there's mediation that's offered, there's justice dispute resolution that's offered, all in attempts to avoid a matter going to court. When we look at this piece of legislation and we don't see that there's a tribunal established, it's confusing why the government believes that referring it to an already burdened system is the solution.

We see a crisis in the province with housing and affordability. When people are making a home purchase, it's a big decision. I would argue that it's probably the biggest financial investment that Albertans will make. When they're entering into this, they should have some sort of ability to dispute in a reasonable, time-efficient way. When we look at other jurisdictions, it's working. I don't understand why, at this point in the legislation and when this government is saying that there's consultation that's occurred, the glaringly obvious tribunal process is excluded.

I think that perhaps if we had this in committee and we invited condo owners, if we invited perhaps the people in the courts system that would be disputing these, if they were to give feedback on what that experience would be like in and out of court, what the cost perhaps could be if it was through a tribunal versus through the court process, what the impact on condominium owners would be, I think that that's all valid information where a committee could very easily put a call out, listen to those that respond, take that feedback, and provide a really thorough report to give back to the minister to talk about some of those suggestions. We're hearing it on this side of the House.

You have this piece of legislation here. We're amending the act. Why not get it right? Why not do what Albertans are asking for? They're not asking to take things to court. That's just a process that has so many negative impacts: time, finances. I can tell you that it's not good for a relationship when parties are sent to court. There's a very strong message that that gives when the alternative could be to have some sort of dispute resolution that could be done outside of the court process.

You have to live here, Mr. Speaker. This is your home. These are your neighbours. To have such a disruptive process as the solution is not conducive to healthy relationships within your community. When you live in a condo, you don't have the luxury, that you have in a single-family dwelling, to drive into your garage and never talk to your neighbours. You're going to have people that you are in conflict with, going to court with, that you interact with potentially every single day when it could be resolved in a more time-efficient manner, a less costly way, and a way less combative approach than going through our already overburdened court system.

I think that having a condo dispute resolution would not only reduce the stress of the individuals involved, but it would help with the burden that's already on our court system. I think that having a committee do that work makes sense. I know that when I was a chair, we had several pieces of legislation brought forward, and it was a wonderful process to be able to engage with Albertans. Some incredible suggestions came out of that process. As the committee you're able to provide the space to allow Albertans to talk to you, to provide written reports, submissions, to provide an opportunity to come and present to the committee. We have individuals in this very Chamber that represent the committee, and any member that's interested can attend. It's a wonderful opportunity for Albertans to engage on a more transparent platform, to be able to go in and talk to the committee, to talk to their legislators about what their concerns are.

I'm sure they would come through and say that some of this legislation would be helpful, but why not make it actually beneficial to Albertans, especially when we're looking at an affordability crisis, when we're looking at a housing crisis? I think that in having that opportunity to send it to committee, to have Albertans be able to respond, to talk about what the real-life implications are if this bill was to go ahead without a tribunal, it could have an impact.

I think that the committee has the capacity and the ability to do that work. It doesn't need to be incredibly time consuming. I know that the committees can work quite efficiently. We have incredible supports through the LAO that support the committee work. They're able to do cross-jurisdictional scans. They're able to do all of the work that helps the committee run along smoothly. Having those presentations come in, to get actual feedback in a transparent way, that's on the record, with some ideas that would have some significant change, reduce stress for condo owners, reduce conflict between neighbours: to me, that's a success. To be able to, then, at the end of the committee have the report, to be able to prepare and submit it to the Legislature and to the minister, who could take this piece of legislation and make it actually beneficial to Albertans living in condos: to me, that is just a simple way to do this. It's something that makes sense.

It's something that we know individuals that are living in condos would like to see. They don't want to go to court, Mr. Speaker. That in itself is such a conflictual experience. By being able to hear from Albertans directly in the committee, it's a process that works. It's so complete and down to the minute of how exactly to roll out a committee meeting once a referral from the Legislature has been done, and it provides opportunity for some real expression and to hear those stories of those individuals. It seems that when we're saying it in opposition, it's just disregarded despite having the information come directly from individuals that are being impacted. Perhaps in hearing it first-hand in the committee from those individuals that are asking for a noncombative system, asking for a dispute resolution system that would take pressure off our courts and reduce costs, maybe then this government would listen and implement that.

I think that when we're talking about something as significant as someone's home, we should be giving every opportunity to make sure that it's a successful experience. When there are issues that come up, it's ideal to have them resolved quickly, with the minimal amount of conflict possible. To have a tribunal makes sense. You know, I haven't heard any information about why the court system is the solution. There's been nothing in the debate that supports why going straight to court is to the benefit of Albertans. I haven't heard from condo owners that have asked for that. Nobody wants to go to court if they don't have to. If there's a process that's set up where it can be resolved, I'm sure that that would be what the committee would hear. Perhaps not, but I think that having it referred to committee, where there's an opportunity for Albertans to reach out and share their voice: that, to me, is what makes sense.

I would really encourage all members in this Chamber to vote yes in support of this referral, to vote yes in support of having Albertans' voices heard, to vote yes in support of having perhaps an extra piece to this legislation that could actually make a difference and could actually do something that Albertans are asking for.

I think that we have so many costs right now that are being piled on Albertans and so many stressors. People are struggling, Mr. Speaker, and adding the stressor of having to go to court over an issue that comes up in your condo doesn't need to be one of them. People should have the ability to have their dispute resolved in a time-efficient manner without having to go to court.

We've seen this government come up with legislation that speaks to our court system and our justice system, and none of the changes would lead me to believe that it's going to take any sort of pressure off the court system. Adding yet another level of dispute that needs to be resolved in the court process just doesn't make sense.

I would really encourage members, when they're looking at this legislation and they're considering it, to support it and vote yes. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has risen.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate an opportunity to speak briefly on the matter of referring Bill 19 to committee. Certainly, I am also supportive of that idea. I think that there are a lot of changes that do need to be made in regard to the Condominium Property Act, but there seem to be some issues here that are just not being resolved in this current iteration of an amendment. It's a shame, too, really, because I've seen, you know, in my own constituency quite a number of issues, especially in larger condos that have been built probably in the last 15 years or so, where there've been categorical structural problems that needed to be dealt with. I think that any number of MLAs in this Chamber here tonight would be dealing with a similar problem in the so-called leaky condo situation.

You can see the telltale signs of a leaky condo structure when the exterior cladding of a building is coming off, right? Usually that kind of stucco choice for exterior cladding, which is not entirely appropriate, I think, for this climate, at least here in Edmonton, is prone to separating and it's prone to getting water in between the exterior cladding and then the interior insulation. That is often made worse, Mr. Speaker, by having balconies on the exterior of the condo that are not necessarily draining away from the structure. So over time the water is being pushed in from the balconies into the interior walls, and of course that can create terrible damage to the structure of a building.

In the absence of proper regulation and building code standards, you know, this has been going on for quite a long time, not just in Alberta but, of course, in British Columbia, where the leaky condo namesake came from. But, you know, the reason that I bring it up is, of course, that as part of your agreement for being part of a condominium complex people are left on the hook for those damages. For example, I have one large structure that's just north of what used to be the Safeway on 137th Avenue and 127th Street, where the collective bill for paying for the leaky condo structure just literally forced at least 10 per cent of the condo owners to just walk away – right? – because they could not afford this bill. They just left their mortgage and had to walk away from their home, right? So these condominium laws certainly have direct cause and effect for protecting condominium owners, and we have to make sure we're really careful about how we structure them, quite frankly.

Part of the issue that I have with Bill 19 is that it doesn't make it necessarily a fair process for individuals that could be perceived as being blamed for specific damages, right? Like, let's say that someone leaves their sink on in the bathroom and it leaks down a couple of floors, or let's say that they have an outbreak of bedbugs in a unit. Under this amendment act it doesn't seem as though there's a fair due process that can be accessed for people to have justice. For people just to make a judgment on any one individual causing damage, collective damage, for a whole condominium complex, you have to make sure that that's fair, right? You don't just have a process by which someone gets blamed arbitrarily and then is left with the bill, so to speak.

You know, that judgment process has to be accessible. I'm not sure that deferring things to the courts straightaway is the best way to handle that, Mr. Speaker. We hear, of course, the interrelationship between different bills that we debate in the House here in this session, that while we're talking about putting more burden on the courts to resolve disputes, we also know that the courts are in a terrible backup position right now, with a shortage of staff and resources and whatnot.

For us in full knowledge over in the Department of Justice, knowing that there's a backlog in capacity in our court system, for us to be then passing another bill which would add more burden on that backlog in our court system, I mean, that alone I think is not necessarily good, sound judgment.

As well, of course, suggesting that we do put more of the disputes that happen around condominiums to the courts, you know, I think that that really leaves a gap and an unfair circumstance for a lot of people, right? Just accessing courts and being part of a court case – right? – in the legal system is not something that many people are comfortable with.

You know, having a condo board and having a dispute resolution system that perhaps uses a tribunal – right? – is a much less onerous way by which you can resolve disputes, and I think it's a bit of a softer, more easily accessible way by which you can find a resolution, Mr. Speaker, instead of having to go to a formal court system, which can be a bit intimidating. Having a tribunal resolution system based on less antagonism but more looking for resolution, amicable resolution for people with damages to a building, and so forth, I think is a way better way to go.

I mean, we do have more of our population than ever living in condos, and indeed many of our urban centres are looking for more dense urban settings, and I think that that's a good thing, right? It helps to build a more resilient urban structure. It helps to provide more services in close proximity to where people need them. It allows people to live closer to where they work. All of those things – right? – point to the population of Albertans that are living in condos to be increasing over the next 10 or 20 or 30 years. So it's important and incumbent upon our Legislature here today to build sound legislation around condominiums and dispute resolution in particular because we just know that a whole lot more Albertans will be living in condos not just now but in the foreseeable future.

Yeah, I mean, honestly, you've heard from my colleagues. I totally concur with them that the lack of a tribunal in this bill really seems to be a gaping exclusion. You know, I'm curious to know, like: by doing that, how much more of a cost is going to be associated with taking disputes to the court? Of course, does that cost exceed, in many circumstances, the damages that are trying to be brought forward or to be resolved? Someone drives over their parking spot plug-in, and they have to go to court. Those court costs far exceed replacing that plug that someone maybe accidentally drove over: a small example. I think that we can create something that's more in keeping with and proportional to the little things that happen in a condo, right? Somebody scratches the wall when they are moving in their couch, and you can find an amicable way by which to deal with that and not have to resort to the court system.

You know, I know that there are some parts of this bill that I certainly do not disagree with. I know from condo owners themselves in my constituency and then in talking to condo associations – right? – about the changes in Bill 19 in regard to the voting process at condo meetings to allow for easier notes and establishing the process for that: I think it's okay. Changing voting in more simple manners – right? – and making those meetings less onerous and more accessible: I think that's not unreasonable.

Again I go back to my first example, Mr. Speaker, which is, like, around more significant damages. When you have things around, like, elevator systems or garages or, you know, water leakage into those systems or having to take off the exterior cladding on an entire building – right? – we need to make sure that people are having a fair and affordable way by which to deal with those things.

I would strongly suggest that the condo amendment should include strong action on building codes and penalties for condo developers that are not following the highest standard of building codes. Part of the problem with dealing with the leaky condo situation, Mr. Speaker, is that we've had a terrible, you know, situation where a builder might put up a series of structures and then get sued for leaky condos, fold that company, and then re-emerge as a completely different company. This was happening all over the city of Edmonton, probably in Calgary and other places, too, sort of analogous, I would say, to some unscrupulous drilling companies – right? – where they have built into their drilling business plan the idea that you drill and you extract and then you leave and then you go out of business and you re-emerge somewhere else under a different name.

This is the same kind of thing that we do see with condo developments. So I would strongly suggest again that, you know, in concert with condominium property management revisions, we look at more strict building code standards and more strict ways by which contractors should not be able to walk away from inadequate building that they had been responsible for so that we can chase down some of the perpetrators of these buildings that really are not habitable after a number of years.

I think, again, not in Edmonton but the terrible situation with the condo structures in Fort McMurray on the upstream side close to Keyano College, where suddenly an entire condominium complex – the people had, like, an hour to get out of there, Mr. Speaker. People were having their dinners or whatever, and then they said, “You must evacuate.” And they said, “Okay; well, what’s happening?” They said, “Well, no, you need to evacuate now; these buildings have been assessed to imminent collapse.” So dozens of families had to leave on the hour, leave everything behind, and then still be stuck with mortgages for a building that you could never possibly sell again because, of course, it was dangerous. They quite literally had structural, foundational problems and, as they said, could fall down at any time, right? Lots of people are still stuck with those mortgages now for the condos that don’t even exist anymore. They just had to tear them down, and, you know, the whole problem just snowballed, right?

There are lots of things that we can do to build a more equitable and fair and protected condominium environment for people. You know, we need to make sure that we build a lot of affordable houses and homes here in this province right now, right? We don’t have to look any further than other cities in Canada. Don’t think that we’re not immune from the same problems that places like Vancouver and Toronto have, where there’s just a dire shortage of affordable housing. We can start to see the – it’s on the horizon here in Edmonton and Calgary right now, and now is the time to build those places. If you don’t, you quite literally are shutting out a whole class of people that can’t afford to live in those places.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, anyone else looking to speak to REF1? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this referral amendment. Having had the opportunity to speak previously to this in the main, I just will take a few moments to reiterate some of the concerns that have been addressed. I think that listening to my peers speak about this, we can see that there are a number of issues, kind of fairly wide ranging for a small bill, in fact, and I think perhaps it’s time that we actually give some second thought to this bill and some reconsideration of it.

I think that the first thing that I really want to cover in sort of some depth is the lack of tribunals. I know it’s been quite well articulated by the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie that there have indeed been – in many provinces there are tribunals that handle these issues. They’ve been designed in slightly different ways, you know, to handle only the smaller issues, like under $5,000 in B.C., for example, or at least some of the provinces such as Nova Scotia have a dispute resolution officer, that kind of thing. So we see that there’s nothing unusual about having one.

But I also want to add to the fact that there’s nothing unusual about having tribunals even in the government of Alberta. There are a number of situations in which we have tribunals. For example, when I was the Minister of Indigenous Relations, I worked very closely with the Métis settlements tribunal. It would be very much like that, that we would see in this act a tribunal that was established by appointing an individual by the government who would be responsible for establishing the tribunal so that the actual putting of people on the committee of the tribunal, as it is with the Metis Settlements Act, is independent from government interference. Indeed, in that particular case, for example, it is people who have some relationship to the Métis settlements, some knowledge or perhaps have lived there or are Métis themselves, that are put on that tribunal. You know, it means that decisions are made by people who are close to the ground, who understand the process and procedure, and it seems to work extremely well.

I mean, even this government, who has dismantled so many other things since they got into power, has not dismantled the Métis settlements tribunal, so they obviously must recognize that the tribunal works as intended. I guess my point is that we know how to make tribunals work well. We certainly have the benefit of bringing the decisions closer to the front lines of people who are experiencing the issues, and I think that it’s a huge absence in this particular case.

Now, I know that part of the reason for even bringing this bill forward is that the government was approached by some of the condo associations and corporations. They made a decision to listen to people at that level, which always concerns me because the reason that was presented as to why they needed to move forward is one, actually, I accept, and that is that being able to only resolve problems when somebody is causing damage in the communal areas by going to court really is not a good use of our court time, especially at a time when our court time is highly stressed, and makes it financially difficult for the corporations that need to move ahead to try to get somebody to be responsible for damage in the common areas. You know, actually, I support the argument, but that’s not a good way to resolve what essentially, for the most part, is a minor claim.

So I would have been happy if the government had pursued that, but they didn’t. All they did is shift who goes to court. They didn’t actually reduce the going to court. They just took the burden off the corporations and put the burden on the individuals, yet again this government siding itself with a business interest over the interests of individual Albertans. I don’t know why they continually do that, but they do. It’s been pretty consistent. I’ve brought this up before, and I don’t understand why they do it. They certainly aren’t interested in saving money for the government because, of course, they’ve not removed the section on going to court. They just changed who has to go to court and who has to bear that burden.

Of course, they put the burden on the people who are least likely to be able to afford it and therefore essentially have effectively made a decision based on your social class as to whether or not you get justice. You know, it used to be that people with money were able to pursue justice because they had the money to do so. Now people without money cannot get justice because they don’t have the money to do so. It’s just a huge mistake. There’s no reason for it. We can actually improve this bill by putting in some kind of a process that keeps it out of court and is satisfactory to both sides.

This government has experience with tribunals. They know that. I mentioned the Métis settlements tribunal, but I also know that tribunals are also used, for example, in appeals for social services, for public assistance, and other places in government. There’s certainly some appropriate experience. Certainly, the intent of the government to keep it out of the courts would be better served if we actually took this bill away and made some changes to it and had some further consultations. They have yet to have presented any reasons why we shouldn't have a tribunal. I've been listening very closely and have not heard any significant arguments as to why a tribunal is not a useful thing to have, so I certainly wish the government would take a step back.

I also think it's really important that we not put any more barriers into the possibility of home ownership, which essentially this becomes for many people, because if they have a dispute with their board, they suddenly may find themselves in a place where they cannot afford to pay the costs that they're confronted with. It undermines their ability to have home ownership, and I think that's a significant problem. I don't know why this government would not be trying to encourage people in the area of home ownership. We know that the existence of private home ownership and the ability to build equity is actually extremely good for the Alberta economy. It should be encouraged as widely as possible because people who have a home and are able to build equity in that home are then able often to use that equity to further other interests like starting a small business, for example, or going back to school or doing something else that actually contributes to the local economy.

If the only people that can afford to buy a home now, because of the costs that are on them, are people who are already homeowners or corporations who own multiple homes, then what we have is a pooling of money that does not actually help the local economy. The average individual, when they use their equity from their own home, uses it in the local economy, uses it in their neighbourhood on the other small businesses in the other communities in the neighbourhood, and that's good. But if we have a major corporation that's buying all the condos and all the homes, because they're the only ones that are able to do so because of the cost burdens, then what we have is a pooling of money, and that money does not get spent locally. Only a portion of it gets spent locally. Instead, it goes offshore. It goes to other places, where they buy interests in major corporations in other parts of the world or holiday places in resort locations. It's really a negative to shift our emphasis away from individual Albertans being able to build equity to corporations having ultimate control over a circumstance.

Again, I don't know why the government would want to undermine that process, which actually has worked very effectively for many people. I can tell you, you know, that the example of First Nations communities, where people cannot own a home on-reserve and, as a result, cannot build equity, has proven to me, again, in my experience, that it's not a good idea to stop people from being able to build up equity, because what you find, of course, on First Nations is that people can't then use their home to get on and do some of the other things like going back to school or even improving the home for ultimate resale value or starting a small business or many of the other things. It means that we see people in First Nations communities really struggling to get together equity in order to be able to do some of the things we really would encourage them to do.

You would think a government that represents itself as being pro business would understand these lines of argument, but consistently they're not pro business. They're certainly pro corporation but not pro business. I can tell you that I continuously hear from small businesses in my community that the government is not on their side, not making decisions, and is constantly funnelling money away from local Albertans into large entities who frequently take that money offshore and therefore reduce the circulation of the money in the province of Alberta. It's just bad economic decision-making here. I wish the government would take the time with this referral motion to get this one piece right. It would be a model for them getting a bunch of other pieces right that they have gotten wrong consistently over the last number of years. It's just something I can't understand, why they would choose to do it.

I certainly, you know, support some of the changes here. As I said when I first spoke to it, I would have liked to have been able to support the bill in terms of making voting procedures better although I did have some concerns about some of the things that were said by the Member for Grande Prairie at the time. But I think I can get past that, and I think I can see some desire to support making things function better in condominium associations since house prices have gone up so much, so ridiculously high over the last little while and apparently in Alberta are about to take another big jump up.

Then I'm very worried about the next generation being able to afford a home, so anything we can do to get them into a home – and if that's a condominium because they can't afford the extremely high prices for houses, I certainly would like to see the government do that. It always discourages me when the government does not take into consideration the next generation and the difficulties they have. They just sort of say, "Well, let the market decide," but we can see what the market has decided, and the market has decided that young people are not going to be able to afford homes on average, or if they do, they're essentially going to be house poor for most of their lives because the price of a home nowadays – I know my own home is now worth more than three times what it was when I originally bought it.

I know that one of my children moved to Vancouver some years ago, and they watched house prices go up by four times in Vancouver. We know that's about to happen in Alberta as well. All the real estate agents are in the process of having conversations with people selling in large markets like Toronto and Vancouver, coming back to Alberta, and buying up, for the purposes of creating rental properties, homes and therefore elevating the market here in the province of Alberta. Again, very good for the corporations that can afford to do that; terrible for average Albertans who are just trying to put together a living and just trying to, you know, establish a future for themselves and their children.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to recommend adjournment of debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 21

Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate May 5: Ms Phillips]

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members looking to join on Bill 21? We are on the main bill. I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall has risen.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. Let me preface by saying that whenever this government tables an omnibus piece of legislation, based on my experience, it is usually to hide controversial changes. Also, I think I would remind the government that whenever we had a piece of legislation, even very related pieces of legislation put together in a piece of legislation – for instance, labour relations and changes to the labour code – this government, the opposition back then, would cry foul, that this is an omnibus piece of legislation and that it's not possible for them to analyze and debate this bill effectively.

But this government has consistently put forward red tape reduction bills containing changes that are way more substantial than just red tape, than just streamlining process, than just making things easier for Albertans. Most of these changes are substantial and should be discussed as stand-alone pieces of legislation. For instance, this bill gives enormous and widespread powers to the minister of environment over provincial parks. This alone is enough not to support this bill.

I will quote directly from this bill. Under the heading Minister's Directives and Codes the bill says, "The Minister may set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines . . . or other rules relating to any matter in respect of which a regulation may be made under this Act." That's a huge and wide power that this bill is giving to a minister who nobody trusts. Let me interpret it for them. What this provision is saying is that the minister can do anything he wants, basically anything. That's what this provision is saying. And when we look at this government's record on parks, I don't think that this Legislature should be giving this minister these kinds of powers. That's a disservice to Albertans. That's a disservice to our constituents.

Initially they tried to close down and sell off our parks. Then the public found out, and then they were pushed to back off from those changes. Then they leased out the Rocky Mountains for coal mining. Then they got push-back, and it's still not clear whether they have reversed everything yet or not. And now this government is asking this Legislature to give the same minister carte blanche, that he could set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines, and other rules relating to the matters within this act. I don't think that such broad power is needed for any minister and especially this government and this Minister of Environment and Parks.

Again, these changes are buried in this red tape reduction bill in the name of red tape. I think the government is giving itself power to essentially partially privatize our parks. They have already put fees on Kananaskis Country, that was free for five decades for all Albertans to go to, but during the pandemic they found out that Albertans are visiting it quite often: let's slap them with a charge. Now Albertans have to pay $90 per year. I can see that the Member for Banff-Kananaskis is cheering that on.

Ms Rosin: I sure am.

Mr. Sabir: I think that because this legislation gives the minister fairly universal powers, I urge each and every member of this House to oppose this piece of legislation, oppose these kinds of powers. They are not good for our environment, they are not good for our parks, and they are not good for this government, that cannot be trusted with parks or anything, for that matter.

The second thing: we are also concerned about the government agenda with respect to the Education Act. Even the government is confused about: what are the changes contained in this act? The minister who put forward this piece of legislation is claiming one thing, and the Minister of Education is claiming things which are exactly the opposite. To add to that confusion, the government released a background on what this legislation does to the Education Act from the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction that appears totally inaccurate and which the Minister of Education even thinks is inaccurate.

It's clear that there are changes in this piece of legislation that have nothing to do with red tape – it's just furthering the government agenda to destroy our parks, our pristine nature – and there are changes contained in this piece of legislation that further erode accountability, so we cannot support this piece of legislation. These changes are not worth supporting. I think, with that in mind, that these changes are way more than red tape reduction, that these changes are substantial, Mr. Speaker, I would like to move an amendment, a referral amendment to this legislation. I have the requisite copies ready to be distributed.

The Acting Speaker: Once I have a copy of it, I'll just give you a few further instructions.

Thank you, hon. member. If you could please read the amendment into the record for the benefit of all those watching. As well, for the purposes of debate this will be referred to as REF1. All members will of course receive a copy.

If the hon. member could please continue, with about six minutes remaining.

Mr. Sabir: I move that the motion for second reading of Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 21, Red Tape Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

As I said, this bill amends 16 pieces of legislation. I do want to acknowledge that there are amendments which are administrative in nature and part of this piece of legislation, this miscellaneous statutes amendment act, but there are changes that give wide power to the minister of environment to do all kinds of things without oversight from anyone, for that matter. The second thing is that this bill also removes accountability by making changes to the Education Act. At least these two changes are not acceptable under any circumstances and since, I think, changes made to the Alberta parks act are fairly substantial.

This bill and the subject matter should be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship, where we can look at the changes and how they will impact our parks, what Albertans have to say about these changes. And trust me that at this point if this government asked the public that they be given powers over their parks, powers over their natural beauty, I don't think Albertans would be giving them that power, because Albertans don't trust them. They cannot trust them. Their track record on this file is that at first they tried to sell off parks, then they tried to close down parks, then they put fees on the parks, then they tried to strip-mine the Rocky Mountains, and the list goes on and on. They've been trying to hide all those things until they are caught by the public, and then they will backtrack. So I don't think that the minister has earned the trust of Albertans to ask for these kinds of sweeping powers. These powers should not be given to this government or this minister, and Albertans should not trust and we don't trust this government on that.

The second thing. The changes contained with respect to the Education Act are confusing, and even the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction and the Minister of Education can't be on the same page with respect to these changes. One was telling the public that they will not have to report. The other one is saying that, no, they will still have to report. It's still very confusing. I would suggest that people are paying for these schools, whether they're private, whether they're charter, and Albertans have every right to know how much in funds Albertans are paying and how those funds are spent, how those funds are helping with education. But now this government is removing those reporting measures, that will now be under the discretion of the school and under the discretion of the minister.

This government has a problem with accountability. Like, they have done things from day one where they will try to hide information. For instance, Mr. Speaker, you will know about the war room, a $120 million entity. Three years in and nobody knows how many people they're employing, what work they are doing, where they are stealing their logos from and how much they are paying for them, all those kinds of things. They have exempted that from FOIP. I think a similar kind of thing is going on, that public funds are spent on private education, but they are refusing now to share that information so that the public can hold this government to account.

So that's why it's important that we not read this bill for the second time – it's not worth reading – and send the subject matter of this bill to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship, where we can discuss this bill in detail. It's important that we send at least one bill to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship because when the Premier was sitting in opposition, he would ask that every bill be sent through the committee process because that was happening in Ottawa, and he thought that was a very good process, an excellent process. That was an excellent opportunity for people to engage, Canadians to engage, and he wanted to bring that back here. Now, I guess, for this government that's an opportunity. Send this piece to that committee so that Albertans can weigh in, stakeholders can weigh in, and they can make this legislation a bit better.

With that, I urge all members of this House to support in favour of this referral and refuse to give the minister of environment any more powers on Alberta parks or the Rocky Mountains and demand accountability from this government and not curtail that accountability any further.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join on REF1? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday has risen.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a privilege to rise this evening to speak to Bill 21, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, and, more specifically, on the referral amendment put forward by the Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall. Again, just reviewing it, that this piece of legislation, Bill 21, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

I completely support this amendment for many reasons, that I will get into, the first one being that, I think with any government but maybe this one in particular, there is a lack of accountability, as the previous member was speaking to, on many issues and also a failure to communicate, Mr. Speaker, on, again, this issue but many others that came before it. Unfortunately, from this government we have seen a pattern of rolling out legislation or proposing changes to regulations, legislation, and there are a few instances of that within this, not only on the sweeping powers that the government is proposing be given to the minister of environment but also on the changes that are being proposed from the Ministry of Education around transparency and reporting in terms of the funding that's provided and tuition costs.

In both of these instances we see a government that is failing to communicate clearly to the public. As we see so often from this government, instead of clearly ensuring that the communication is understandable and that Albertans can see why these things are being proposed, like so many times before it, we have a government that instead would blame Albertans, blame the opposition, blame everyone but themselves for not understanding this.

We saw this from essentially day one, Mr. Speaker, when the opposition back in early days of 2019 were putting forward reasonable comments towards legislation, just like we always do, and instead of engaging in the debate, as a government should on their own legislation, they actually came into the Legislature and put earplugs in their ears, the majority of the members from the government, and it was actually the Premier who handed them out. It really goes back to the attitude of this cabinet and this government, that instead of listening to the debate that is taking place, listening to the concerns of Albertans, understanding and empathizing with them for their concerns and potentially the confusion from a lack of clarity that they have communicated, instead they would rather ignore those concerns and just continue on, steamroll through.

Again, that goes back to why I am supporting this referral amendment, because, like so many other pieces of legislation before it, there's an opportunity for us to take the time to hear from stakeholders, from experts who are, rightfully so, concerned about the sweeping changes that the minister of environment is proposing we accept in this legislation. It should come as no surprise to you, Mr. Speaker, that we in the opposition, above and beyond all the many expert stakeholders in this field, are concerned about this legislation because of the track record of this environment minister and when we look at what is being proposed in here, the opportunity for the minister, if this legislation is passed, to set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines, or other rules relating to any matter in respect of which a regulation be made under this act.

What we heard from the minister is that there are concerns around being able to change signage in specific parks or other areas, so we have to accept that these sweeping changes are the only way for that minister to carry that out, which, first of all, is unbelievable to me, Mr. Speaker, but, second of all, is quite a massive change in the legislation to allow this minister to do much more than allowing signs to be changed with less red tape. I think that, again, there are already opportunities to do this quite clearly, but if it is the case that there are issues there, we could be considering something much less expansive, I suppose, than what is being proposed by the minister in here.

Again, when we look at the track record of the environment minister, the move to sell or privatize our parks, only from the massive amount of push-back – and you have to understand, Mr. Speaker, that it was a lot of push-back, because for this government to actually listen to the people of Alberta requires a whole heck of a lot of push-back, I would add.

As the previous member also talked about, the rescinding of the Lougheed coal policy is another thing that caused great concern for experts and regular Albertans because, above all else, when it comes to our nature, they believe that we need to do our best to respect it and protect it and ensure that it is there for generations to come.

Again, beyond that, when we look at the changes that the environment minister has carried out and even with the large outcry from the public around the $90 Kananaskis pass – and I know that even this evening the Member for Banff-Kananaskis heckled the Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall when he brought up that point. But it again goes back to the great amount of disconnect from this government when so many Albertans are concerned about this government moving to charge more for being able to access things like Kananaskis and, instead of listening to them and understanding what their concerns are, just barreling ahead, which goes back to why this should be referred to the committee, the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship.

Again and again this government has proven that they aren't willing to listen, but I think that it is our job as an opposition to offer them another opportunity to sit down with the stakeholders and truly understand why they are so concerned about the sweeping changes that are being proposed in here regarding the ability and the power of the minister to change standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines, and beyond.

This isn't the first time that we've seen UCP ministers try to propose such sweeping changes and, well, really trying – you know, in this instance we're calling it the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, but it is much more than that, Mr. Speaker. Previously we saw the Health minister proposing changes in Bill 10 that would have allowed that minister to pass laws without actually coming to the Legislature, and it wasn't until great outcries, specifically from members that they would identify as their traditional supporters, came out and attacked them for those changes. So this isn't the first time that we've seen this government propose sweeping changes to legislation that would give their ministers so much power above and beyond what they are communicating to the public.

Whether it is on the issue of Environment and Parks and the powers that this minister is trying to give to themselves or the changes to the transparency of reporting of tuition for schools in our province, which was also very ineffectively communicated to the public – it has left so many questions even between the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction and the Minister of Education. We can't even get a straight answer between the two of them. They both have very different thoughts on what the changes are actually making. One says, you know, that transparency is going to be increased and that more reporting is going to be required, and the other minister says the exact opposite in terms of the amount of reporting that is required. We can't even get the ministers to agree on what these changes are, yet the government expects Albertans to accept those changes at face value.

I think that it is important for us as legislators and as members to take the time to evaluate what is truly being proposed in here, what the full range and scope of powers are being proposed by the minister of environment to give to himself and his ministry, because it doesn't seem clear that the government, maybe even the minister based on the way that he is communicating these changes, actually understands what is being proposed in this legislation. And we might find ourselves in a situation just like we did with Bill 10, where the government has to come back to the Legislature and actually revoke some of the powers that are being given to themselves, which is very unlikely, Mr. Speaker. I think that there were specific reasons for what transpired with Bill 10. Very unlikely that the environment minister would admit a mistake in the first place but actually come back and fix it. Very doubtful.

But that is why it's so important for us to take the time to review Bill 21, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, because I believe on the topic of reporting and accountability and transparency, there are other concerns around reporting for things like avian flu, which is so topical right now in our province because of the devastation that that is causing. There is an opportunity here for us to get this right, for us to reduce red tape, as this government is proposing to do through this legislation, and ensure that the proper stakeholders are at the table and that all Albertans truly understand what is being proposed here, because I don't think that we have come to a place where we can accept at face value what the minister of environment and the Minister of Education are proposing through this legislation.

With that, I think I'll take my seat. Again, I appreciate the Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall putting forward this referral amendment. I also appreciate the member's comments because they were very relevant and very clear and showed the track record of this government and why in so many instances, including this one, the government, the UCP, and its ministers can simply not be trusted.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Next on REF1 I see the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has risen.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm just going to talk here for a couple of minutes and correct a few things. The other folks seem to be confused. They've been in this House. They ask questions. They don't understand, amongst other things, what a great job the environment minister is doing. Particularly, I love it when they're talking about Kananaskis. For four years they did nothing. I guess I would just point out to them that it's a little more work to do what our government is doing, trying to keep the backcountry of Alberta available to Albertans to go and enjoy it and to plan to do improvements there and to let people use it.

Now, I appreciate the other side. Their whole effort was to lock Albertans out of the backcountry and not let them ever go there. I suppose that would preserve the backcountry, but they forgot that we haven't forgotten, on this side, that we work for Albertans. On the other side I'm not sure who they were working for, but it sure wasn't the people that live in this great province.

It takes a little more effort. In fact, you want your environment minister to have some authority to make changes, because in the more complicated world that we want for Albertans, where they can go and enjoy their province – not the NDP's province; Albertans' province – sometimes when you've got people out there in the backcountry doing things, it comes around to a place where something needs to be changed, and that's the point where you want your environment minister to have some authority.

On the other side they want to lock everybody out and basically put a fence around the outdoors of Alberta. I suppose that's less complicated and a little easier to govern. In fact, I guess we saw an extension of that even during COVID, when they wanted Albertans all locked in their homes for months on end, essentially two years, for the most part. I guess they prefer simplicity in government by locking Albertans in their homes, not letting them go out into the backcountry, not letting them enjoy their lives.

On this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, we work for Albertans, and we know that Albertans want to leave their homes. They want to gather. They want to get together. They want to go and get a meal at a restaurant. They want to go hiking in the backcountry. They want to take their ATV out in the backcountry. They want to go fishing. Some of them want to go hunting. This is a little more complicated because under the UCP government we want Albertans to go out and enjoy their whole province, which means there are moving parts; 4.3 million moving parts called people. And, you know, when we all want to allow those people to go out and enjoy this great province that we all live in, because it's their province, that's why you need your environment minister to have some authority to make changes along the way when it becomes apparent that some rules and regulations need to be adjusted.

So I can see, when they want everybody locked in their homes and out of the backcountry, why they don't think the minister needs any authority. They seem to envision a stagnant Alberta where people stay in their homes, they're not allowed to go out for a walk or a hike in the woods, not allowed to go on an ATV or go fishing or go hunting. I suppose that if that's the case, then the minister doesn't really need much authority, because in the almost police state that the folks across would prefer – yeah. Okay. In that scenario, I suppose, ministers don't need that much authority, but on this side when we want 4.3 million people using, enjoying, and looking after the whole province, you need your minister to have some authority, some flexibility.

The minister has done a great job. The award-winning Kananaskis pass is giving this government some resources and some ability to improve things in the park, to improve how often the garbage is picked up, to improve the number of peace officers out there making sure that when those good 4.3 million Albertans forget to follow the rules, someone's there to responsibly remind them to follow the rules.

I understand why the folks across don't understand this, but if they did, they wouldn't put forward an amendment that would stop all this ability for our government to look after the backcountry and give our government the ability to make changes when people are out. We don't want people locked in their homes. We want people to use the backcountry. We don't want Albertans locked out of, essentially, the entire outback or the whole great group of nature, the millions of square kilometres of nature in this province. The folks across don't want Albertans to use that, to see that, and enjoy that. On this side we do. That's why the minister needs some authority, which is why this amendment shows, basically, a lack of understanding of what Albertans want.

I don't know about you, Mr. Speaker, but I certainly won't be supporting this amendment.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Next I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs has risen.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this evening to speak to Bill 21, the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, on REF1. The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following: "Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2."

I have to say that I agree wholeheartedly that this should be referred to committee. I think that when we're talking about a piece of legislation that has ministries of red tape, Education, Municipal Affairs, agriculture, Children's Services, environment, Health, Service Alberta, Transportation, Treasury Board and Finance – and then, on top of that, there are 16 sections with amendments to 16 acts. Those acts, Mr. Speaker, are the Animal Health Act, the child and family enhancement act, the Cooperatives Act, the Education Act, the Health Statutes Amendment Act, 2021, the Highways Development and Protection Act, the Local Authorities Election Act, the Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Act, the Municipal Government Act, the Pharmacy and Drug Act, the Provincial Parks Act, the Public Lands Act, the Railway (Alberta) Act, the Residential Tenancies Act, the Rural Utilities Act, and the Surveys Act.

Now, there have been ongoing questions from this government about what it is that Albertans want, and all of the legislation that we have seen is not actually addressing the concerns. We have a minister who's responsible for red tape who I question why even has a ministry when each minister under those previous acts should be able to go through their own ministry and articulate what is being impacted and what needs to change.

We have a situation that happened between the red tape ministry and the Education ministry. On one hand, the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction was claiming loudly and vocally that private schools will no longer have to produce financial data, and then we had the Minister of Education claiming loudly and vocally that that isn't true. We have a ministry created to go through all of the other ministries, and then the ministers responsible for those ministries are contradicting what's happening. So we can't even trust this government to talk to each other. How can we trust that they've actually spoken to Albertans?

I think that when we talk about referring a piece of legislation to a committee, this would be a prime example. I think there would be many people from Children's Services, environment, Health, Service Alberta, Transportation, Treasury Board and Finance, Municipal Affairs, agriculture that would love to come to the table to talk about the changes that are impacting them and perhaps a minister that hasn't consulted not only with the ministries but, I would suggest, with Albertans.

I think that when we have the opportunity to send a piece of legislation to a committee, they're able to do a robust job in outreach, in talking to those Albertans that are being impacted by this legislation. There's an incredible opportunity to have that information presented either by written submission, or there's an opportunity to hear directly from stakeholders. I would argue that this piece of legislation, this omnibus, is one of those times when there are probably a lot of individuals and stakeholders that have a lot to say about the ministries that are being impacted when it seems the own minister isn't in agreement with what the red tape ministry is doing.

So when we see that kind of thing happening within the Legislature, it begs the question: who is this minister talking to? If she's not talking to the ministers responsible for the actual acts, who is providing this information and this feedback that these red tape reductions are required? I would argue that it should be the people that are actually being impacted by the legislative proposals that are in the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act.

One of the best ways to do that is to utilize the committees that we have set up through this Legislature, to use the incredible services of the LAO when it comes to research and a cross-jurisdictional scan. They're able to do outreach requests. They're able to reach out to Albertans in ways to have them provide feedback. I would argue, Mr. Speaker, that it doesn't seem that this minister has actually done what's required, so when we're looking at this much legislation and 16 acts that are being asked to be changed, I would think that being able to have the committee review the information with stakeholders and hear directly from Albertans would simply make sense.

I think that when we have something as serious as CYFEA before this Legislature under the Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, I just question why the minister of red tape is overseeing this piece of legislation when we've witnessed the most deadly year on record for children in care. I would think that this should be something that should be handled directly under the Children's Services ministry. We've been asking for this government to do something, and what we have instead is this UCP government saying: just trust us.

We have this really essential piece of legislation under CYFEA being opened up by the red tape reduction minister. I don't understand how something that is this significant and this important and serious, that's happening right now – why is the red tape minister addressing it? Why isn't it coming directly from the Minister of Children's Services? We have so many heartbreaking stories of children dying in care. For it to come through and be opened through red tape, it just doesn't speak to the importance that this government sees for the children in care.

I know that there are restrictions in place and minimums in place because of concerns that had previously been brought forward by other reviews. I know that in 2003 there was a review that happened, and it changed some of those regulations in those time periods. There were significant concerns at the time about I believe it was the Child Welfare Act that were brought forward. There were significant allegations of lack of care and protection in that system. The consequence of that was that a class-action suit was brought against the government, and the government lost. So instead of really looking at what's happening in the current child and family enhancement act and the Children's Services system, instead of opening it and doing a really thorough evaluation, they're sending it off to the red tape reduction statutes, which, to me, is very concerning, and it speaks volumes to the level of concern that this government sees for children in care.

I know that children in care is a very complex system. I know the CYFEA act is very complicated, and I know that workers working under that piece of legislation work under several pieces of legislation. They have CYFEA, they have the Family Law Act, they have PSECA, they have the Drug-endangered Children Act. There are so many different pieces of just that work environment that impact CYFEA.

Then to hand it off to the red tape minister: it doesn't make sense. I think that it's a huge detriment to children in care and families when it's being passed off like this. I think that when we're seeing the reports that are coming out of the Child and Youth Advocate's office, when we're hearing the cries from Children's Services workers, from foster parents, from kinship providers, from physicians, from people that provide mental health services to children and youth, there is a crisis happening with children in care.

When this government decided to stop providing services to youth over 22, when they rolled it back from 24, that was such a damaging decision, and the impact has been that children are dying. Instead of opening up that legislation and really getting to the heart of the concern and listening to the recommendations that are coming, what they're doing is that they're handing a piece of it off to the red tape reduction statutes minister under piles and piles of legislation. What are they trying to hide?

I think this government has shown an incredible lack of transparency, lack of consultation. I hear over and over from constituents that have had decisions made that they can't believe it's happening. When we have what is the deadliest year on record for deaths of children in care, I just can't understand how a piece of the legislation under CYFEA is being handed off to red tape reduction. There was an opportunity to open up that legislation, look at the minister responsible, and make some impactful, meaningful changes. Instead, we have this omnibus legislation that's being pushed through.

I'm curious how many other pieces in this legislation are going to be handed off to a minister that didn't really consult with other ministries. We saw that with Education, where there were two complete opposite messages happening. That's concerning. I think that by referring it to committee, it provides a real opportunity to get to the heart of what this government is trying to do. At least provide some transparency. At least identify if the stakeholders that are being impacted by these changes believe that the changes are actually red tape reduction. We've seen, over and over, pieces of legislation brought forward by this ministry in what seems to be an attempt to create work when every one of these ministries has capacity to look through their own ministry and identify concerns, areas that need to be changed, make good decisions to really reduce red tape, but when we're giving it to a minister that doesn't have the depth and understanding of each one of these decisions in these ministries, there are some significant concerns.

I think that when it comes to referral to committee, I would argue that committee would be able to give the time that's deserved to go through this incredible legislation. There's so much: 16 acts, Mr. Speaker. I think that this would give opportunity for some real robust consultation to occur. This would give some opportunities for those engaged in many different industries to have voice, because that's a theme that we've heard the entire time that the UCP has been in government, that there isn't consultation, that stakeholders aren't feeling heard. By providing the opportunity for this legislation to go to committee, it does exactly that. It invites those that are impacted by this omnibus legislation to come forward and present their ideas and their information. If it really is about reducing red tape, I would say: get it right the first time; make sure that you're doing things that the people are actually asking for.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I would ask that everybody support the amendment to refer to committee.

The Speaker: On amendment REF1 are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has the call.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to speak to this referral, which shouldn't come as a surprise to members of the Assembly, that I support. You know, I'll take my time to speak about elements of this bill that I do support, again, that I wish weren't bundled with amendments to various pieces of legislation that I can't support or at least not in its current state. Recognizing that we're in second reading, there are opportunities to amend this bill, and I hope that the government will be amenable to the amendments that the opposition will put forward.

You know what's interesting about this bill, Mr. Speaker? I appreciate the spirit of what the government is attempting to do, and I don't disagree. I mean, the difference between this government and the previous government was that each cabinet minister took it upon themselves to look at regulations that were under their purview in each ministry and, every time they were up for renewal, which is what governments for decades and decades had done, put a time allocation on when regulations would have to be renewed by cabinet. Honestly, that's what preoccupies the majority of time of cabinet, reviewing regulations that have a review date on them. Now, one could argue that that's red tape and time consuming. Yes, but you could equally argue the opposite, that the fact that cabinet has to review previous regulations that are attached to a bill means that they're putting that day's lens five years later, a current lens, on previous regulations to ensure that there's a conversation around: are these regulations necessary, and can they be amended? Can they be ameliorated? Can they be cut out altogether?

You know what? I can't help but think about examples when the current government came into power and talked about all of the regulations that Alberta had – but Alberta still had, I think, a third or a fourth of the regulations that the province of British Columbia had – and how much further we were ahead. Part of that is because – I remember, Mr. Speaker, getting briefed by my department, when I had economic development and trade, that there was a regulation in the province of British Columbia for bar owners about the height that a television could be. Now, I don't know the backstory and the history as to why there was a regulation prescribing how high a television could be off the ground, but there was.

British Columbia got rid of that regulation and many others, and the government of the day looked at how many they got rid of and used that as a comparator for Alberta. But the problem with that and the reason that it's apples to oranges is that Alberta has never had regulations prescribing where bars and pubs can have their televisions. Like, for us today it's ridiculous, or at least that was my reaction thinking about that regulation that existed in British Columbia. They eliminated that, but that was part of the total tally of the regulations that British Columbia had, so when you compare it to Alberta, it's apples to oranges.

I'll give you another example, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud to be the minister that signed onto the new Canadian free trade agreement and negotiated a number of reductions in regulations. In fact – and this is where I have fun with the current Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction – how many golden scissors does she have? As government we negotiated with other ministries across Canada to reduce red tape, to enable further trade with other provinces, so to reduce those barriers. I'll be the first to admit that there are ridiculous barriers and barriers that I pushed back against.

I mean, the fact – here, I'll give you a great example, Mr. Speaker. There are differing regulations on the containers for dairy creamers between provinces, so if you are a company that puts dairy products like coffee cream into different containers, you cannot do it once uniformly across the country. Every province has different stipulations for the size of the dairy creamer you can use. Now, if you're shaking your head, Mr. Speaker, so was I. That seems absolutely ridiculous. There is a black-and-white example of red tape that is costing our producers dollars for no reason today. Now, I'm not about to argue whether there was a valid reason in the past for why that existed – I'll leave that be – but why that exists today makes absolutely no sense. So as much as we can harmonize, those examples I'm behind a hundred per cent.

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of areas that we need to work together on, but the challenge that I presented the Premier with years ago, in fact, the first year that we were in estimates, was the fact that, you know, when I was at the bargaining table negotiating the Canadian free trade agreement and other provinces complained about the fact that Alberta had – and this is how you skew statistics – more exemptions than other provinces, other provinces used that as a way to attack Alberta.

But when I turned around and said, "Our exemptions, for example, for our energy sector are very specific to elements of our energy sector and not just elements within oil or gas or electricity but within those spaces very, very limited," other provinces argued, "Well, you have more exemptions than we do." Yeah. Do you want to know why that is? Because in Ontario they exempt the whole of their energy sector. The whole of their energy sector is not reciprocal for the rest of the country. How is that more of a free trade economy than Alberta, that had a higher number but the exemptions were pinpoints? They weren't exempting the whole energy space. That was the argument that I put forward every time to my former colleagues who were trade ministers.

The point of this, Mr. Speaker, is that, you know, you can use any stats you want and skew the heck out of them in your favour, but the reality is that at that time . . .

Mr. Rehn: You do it regularly.

Mr. Bilous: If members are accusing us of doing that regularly, just listen to your front bench. Give me a break.

The point is, Mr. Speaker, that if we're fighting for the outcome, then that's what we should be looking at and, you know, not all the rest. There are numerous examples where the opposition presses the government on outcomes and on showing and demonstrating those outcomes where it's frustrating when the government doesn't subscribe to that same logic. I mean, I can give you countless examples where throughout estimates I've talked to and challenged the minister to demonstrate or articulate – not even demonstrate; articulate – the outcomes of different entities, and I couldn't get a straight answer. This is where government can talk about how much they want government to be like the private sector. Well, if you're like the private sector, then you have to have targets and outcomes, and if you can't demonstrate that you're reaching those outcomes, there are consequences. This government: not at all. Not at all. Articulate a single outcome or target of Invest Alberta, and then show the metrics: can you? You can't. Trust me, in a couple of weeks I'll highlight that.

The point is, Mr. Speaker, that what we want to see – and on this side of the House we're also in favour of whatever measures the government can implement to expediate business and to make Alberta more business friendly, but what we see in a number of these red tape reduction bills are either examples that could be done within the ministry that don't need legislation – but the government needs to prove that they're actually doing something in this space – or we see examples where the government is confused. There have been a number of examples or instances where my colleagues have pointed out the fact that there's been a discrepancy between the words of the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction and the Minister of Education. To my knowledge, there still has not been a clarification on this, so when it comes to private schools having to disclose their spending, there's still a confusion as to what needs to be disclosed.

But I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, I'm – you know what? If private schools were funded privately, 100 per cent privately, they don't have to disclose. They're like a private corporation. They don't need to put out their financials. But if a private school receives a dollar of public funding, so similar to the TSX, for all my investor friends – if it's a publicly traded company, they have to disclose their financials. What is the difference between that and this bill? There isn't. If a private school is receiving funding from taxpayer dollars, then they should disclose. That is the issue that I have with this bill.

Now, I could go on for a long time, as every member in this Chamber knows, and I will.

Mr. McIver: Please do.

Mr. Bilous: Oh, I make that commitment, not in this instance, but I will. I will, especially for the Minister of Municipal Affairs, because he's asked me to and I respect him in that.

However, Mr. Speaker, I've said my piece. For that, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Speaker: The deputy government whip.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move that the Assembly be adjourned until 10 a.m. Tuesday, May 10, 2022.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 9:32 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

10 a.m.

Tuesday, May 10, 2022

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Good morning, hon. members.

Prayers

The Deputy Speaker: Let us pray. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideals but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 23 Professional Governance Act

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Madam Speaker. It is an honour to rise and move second reading of Bill 23, the Professional Governance Act.

The proposed act will govern the 22 nonhealth professional regulatory organizations for which Labour and Immigration is responsible. The Alberta government delegates self-governing responsibilities for certain professions and occupations to professional regulatory organizations. These organizations are responsible for the governance, registration, conduct, and discipline of their registrants. They are also responsible for ensuring their registrants deliver services in a way that protects life, health, property, the environment, economy, and public interest of Albertans. A few examples are the Association of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of Alberta, the Alberta Institute of Agrologists, Chartered Professional Accountants of Alberta, the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association, and the Alberta Association of Architects.

Currently, Madam Speaker, these 22 organizations are governed by an inconsistent and confusing patchwork of legislation, one that includes nine separate acts and 28 supporting regulations. This current patchwork has created inconsistencies and inefficiencies in how professional regulatory organizations are governed and operate. Some of the legislation is also outdated. The proposed Professional Governance Act will consolidate and streamline this patchwork into a single umbrella act with a minimal number of supporting regulations. This will make it easier for professional regulatory organizations to do their important work of protecting the public interest of Albertans. This act will provide a consistent and standard way for professional regulatory organizations to carry out their common core functions such as governance, registration, and addressing professional conduct and discipline.

We realize that some organizations and their professions may have unique needs and requirements. This will be addressed through adding profession-specific schedules into the regulations. We will develop those schedules in consultation with the professional regulatory organizations in the coming months.

Madam Speaker, the new act will provide a consistent process for professional regulatory organizations in similar fields who wish to amalgamate. Some organizations may find it more efficient to have a single source of governance for that profession. Some professions have successfully done this already such as accounting and forestry. The new legislation will set out a transparent process for deregistration and the registration of new professional organizations. Currently there is no consistent way for approving amalgamations, deregistration, or creating new professional regulatory organizations. The new act will provide that consistency.

Madam Speaker, professional regulatory organizations do a good job and contribute to the economic success of our province. I am confident that that will continue.

The new act provides for the appointment of a public administrator when a professional organization is no longer able to fulfill its obligations, act in good faith, or serve the public interest and public safety. This will be used only in exceptional circumstances when there is a clear threat to the public interest or the interest of public safety. For example, a professional regulatory organization may become insolvent and cease to operate, so they can no longer regulate their profession. Madam Speaker, I want to emphasize that this provision will be used only in rare and extreme circumstances. We strongly support professional self-governance. Bill 23 is designed to minimize government involvement with regulating professions as much as is possible or feasible. This option to appoint a public administrator would only be used as a last resort.

Madam Speaker, speaking of protecting the public interest, public members are essential to help professional regulatory organizations carry out their duties. The government appoints public members to the organizations' governing bodies to ensure the public interest is represented. Public members serve on professional regulatory organizations governed by this along with tribunals for complaints, discipline, or appeals. This will continue under the proposed Professional Governance Act, and it will continue in a more consistent and efficient manner. This includes creating a roster of public members which PROs can utilize for discipline tribunals and appeals.

Madam Speaker, Bill 23 will also bring professional legislation into the modern era. Some of the current legislation is more than 40 years old and didn't take technological advances or other changes into account. For example, the new act provides for electronic means of communication and the ability to hold meetings virtually.

The new act will also provide greater flexibility to professional regulatory organizations to manage the regulation of their respective professions. It does this by allowing PROs a greater ability to make bylaws to regulate their professions while still maintaining government oversight. This will ensure that professional regulatory organizations can be more responsive to changing needs and will also remove unnecessary government oversight. There will be less red tape, and it will be easier for organizations to make or change their own bylaws. It provides greater flexibility for self-regulating professions while retaining an appropriate amount of government oversight.

Madam Speaker, speaking of updates, the new act will align with a couple of other recent acts, the Labour Mobility Act and the Fair Registration Practices Act. The alignment is critical for reducing barriers for regulated professionals from other provinces and other countries. Their credentials can be recognized in Alberta more quickly and efficiently, and they can be recognized on a temporary basis to allow out-of-province professionals to work in Alberta on short-term projects or during emergencies. This helps our province attract the professionals we need to fill labour shortages and support Alberta's economy.

Madam Speaker, stakeholder input has been critical as we move forward with streamlining Alberta's professional legislation. Labour and Immigration met regularly with stakeholders throughout the development of the proposed Professional Governance Act. These included existing professional regulatory organizations and associations who may wish to become professional regulatory organizations in the future. Thanks to their valuable input, Bill 23 will serve the needs of self-regulating professions now and into the future and ultimately serve the needs of Albertans through protecting the public interest and public safety.

Madam Speaker, I am confident that Bill 23 will pass. After the bill passes, we will continue to engage with professional regulatory organizations as we develop the regulation and organization-specific schedules in the coming months. I am confident that their input will continue to help us make Alberta's professional legislation the best in the country. If passed, the Professional Governance Act will take effect upon proclamation, which is expected to happen in early 2023. I ask my colleagues in this Assembly to support Bill 23. By passing this bill, we can begin a new era for professional governance legislation in Alberta.

With that, Madam Speaker, I move second reading of Bill 23.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others wishing to join the debate on Bill 23 in second reading? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker and to the minister for going through a high overview of what he believes Bill 23 will achieve for this province. You know, my own background with regard to some of this area – and maybe I'll just share – is not in the professional regulatory organizations, not here, because these are the 22 nonhealth PROs. It was the Alberta College of Social Workers, and I don't believe that's in this bill. I just scanned the 22, and I didn't pick it up. Perhaps I missed it.

I was a member of that organization for several years, had to provide information – to continue to be accredited, you had to provide information on an annual basis, and it was spot-checked or monitored or reviewed. I have some experience with a PRO, and they did great work and continue to do great work in regulating and making sure social workers throughout the province who use that designation have the appropriate skills to be able to assist Albertans in their needs.

The other aspect of my connection to this kind of work is the agencies, boards, and commissions. Of course, when I was Finance minister, we reviewed all – I think there were around 150 or more agencies, boards, and commissions that were connected to the province of Alberta. They had staff. They had significant roles. Like, AGLC – AGL Ceci – is one of those agencies, boards, and commissions. My role, our role was to harmonize, essentially, what the level of remuneration across those boards would be. There were kind of like A, B, C levels of remuneration based on the level of import, the level of responsibility, work that those agencies, boards, and commissions did. I kind of have some understanding of the challenges this area faces, potentially the minister.

You know, I support the desire to be consistent and efficient, of course. Those are kind of – “efficiency” was a word that came up regularly in the minister's speech. I think that's important. I think it's important to be transparent, of course, and to hold these PROs accountable for what they do and for them to hold their members accountable. It seems like a great deal of the impetus behind this work is around the whole idea of including professionals from other provinces and countries across the many responsibilities that we see: assessors, architects, landscape architects, agrologists.

Perhaps one of the better known ones in that list is APEGA and maybe the Veterinary Medical Association, not to say that the others aren't important.

Ms Hoffman: APEGA advertises more and represents a lot of people.

Member Ceci: Yeah. I was going to say the same thing. There are huge billboards across the province. It's something like: if you want to know how this building works, ask a member of APEGA because they helped design it.

That group, in my mind, has a stellar ability to regulate their own members, to include new members from other places, to make sure that the buildings that we are in are designed and built to the highest standards possible. It's curious that the kind of views that I heard the minister talk about in terms of making them better, making sure they do a good job, making sure they're stronger with this new act, that they'll be better as a result of this new act: I think they're already pretty good, APEGA being a good example of that.

I think also that the bill goes too far in many ways because the bill – not only is it difficult to get through and very convoluted and very confusing, but it leaves too much scope, in my view and the view of many people and perhaps stakeholders who have looked at this bill from a legal perspective. It provides too much scope to the minister in being able to address the bylaws and even the existence of some of these PROs that are out there. I think, just on a quick read of some of the areas and reflection on some of the feedback that I'm aware of, the legislation is confusing and leaves too much to regulations and schedules which are to come in the future.

The minister said that, you know, assent of this will be sometime early in the new year. That's to give opportunity and time for the regulations, I presume, to be written, so there's a lot that we're not seeing here, that's not transparent, that's not before us, that we're going to have to take the minister's word on that it will address the needs of PROs, many of whom are functioning well and have been doing that for many years.

Some of the feedback I'm aware of as well is that this legislation is based in part on B.C.'s Professional Governance Act, which was passed in 2018, but that act does not contain some of the things that are in this act. It does not contain the same sweeping powers that this legislation gives the minister, so why does the Minister of Labour and Immigration need that kind of sweeping power to give him oversight onto all aspects of Bill 23 when we know that groups like APEGA are functioning adequately at this point in time?

I think that we know that there are many changes that are going to be coming down the pipe for these PROs, and the minister talked a little bit about stakeholder engagement, but really there's not a lot in this, not a lot in the speech, and not a lot that I've been able to review. As well, I've been able to hear from some stakeholders, through other parties, where their engagement, their participation was minimal. The minister talked about meeting regularly, but when I was listening, it sounded like he met with some groups who wanted to become PROs and who wanted to benefit from the creation or be able to benefit from what's in this bill in terms of becoming a PRO in the future. I didn't hear a lot about the existing PROs that are identified, the 22 here, and what their view of this act is.

I think, Madam Speaker, that the number of nonprofessional PROs that are identified here and their functioning and what they think of this act should be reported on by the minister. We should hear what their feedback is, and we're starting to engage with those. The opposition hears from them, and I can tell you that they're still working through this legislation. As I said, it's very substantive in bulk, and it changes the way they work. There's a concern, of course, that the ability of the minister to regulate the advocacy role of these organizations is changing as a result of this act, and I know from my own example that the College of Social Workers sees its role very strongly as advocates for improving the quality of life of Albertans and is not shy to take on bad legislation or bad policy that affects Albertans. I think that's what professionals should do. That's a concern that's been reported, that the advocacy role of these associations is being limited or changed or neutered as a result of this act.

Another bit of feedback – and I think I shared this already – is that consultation was very limited in structure, lacked reasonable timelines, and indicated a predetermined outcome, which always is a concern if you're going into a meeting with stakeholders with the answer you want to achieve as opposed to a true negotiation. Madam Speaker, the lack of transparency in going into those kinds of discussions is evident, you know, if you only look for one answer.

Those are some of the concerns. I think the primary ones are that this legislation leaves too much to regulations and schedules, which haven't been put before us. The timelines to achieve that are, like, less than seven months in the future, eight months in the future. If you've got 22 organizations, a convoluted bill, and you're expecting royal assent and everyone to line up, then you should be doing a lot more work to make that happen. What I heard from the minister is that some engagement went on with stakeholders, and I think there needs to be a lot more.

I don't think this bill should pass, Madam Speaker. The government should immediately take it back and work with each and every stakeholder who's going to be impacted before considering passing this in the Assembly. I think there's more work to do. As I said, just on a quick review and some of the stakeholder feedback there is too much prescription in this. The minister has too much power over each of these PROs and can change things without reasonable engagement with them. I don't think that's the kind of stakeholder outreach that we want, that I want. I want to see the minister talk about how he would behave going forward, how the act would enable the government to work together with these PROs.

PROs, as in APEGA's case – that one has been around for a long time, doing incredible work, and has a sophisticated way of engaging its members, its new members, people who want to become members. Certainly, there has been some feedback from those wishing to be engineers in this province that it hasn't happened fast enough for them. I think the way to improve that is to incentivize the PRO to find better ways to ensure that the skill sets of those applying to become registered members so that they can work in this province are assessed, given transitional support to make the grade if they're not there, and to have additional resources put into a place, like APEGA, where members are tasked with streamlining their process and the bar is held high for them. I'm not sure Bill 23 does that in ways that can find a co-operative relationship, a we-found-this-way-together approach.

The number of things that I've pointed out – and I think some of my colleagues will continue to talk on this bill. The bill itself seems really prescriptive. PROs can't even begin to do the necessary work to meet the regulations, which, you know, we're being told will take months to come together before they can begin looking at them to make sure that they're addressing those regulations. That's a problem, Madam Speaker.

I think that with those kinds of comments to start things off, I'll sit down and listen to the rest of the debate around the Professional Governance Act. I just know that from what I've heard, what I've seen in the act so far, I think I'm supportive of improving professional regulatory organizations, but I'm not sure that this bill does it in ways that will be beneficial for PROs. I think it goes beyond what's necessary, and I think that the minister's power to determine the scope and the bylaws and even the existence of PROs is a step too far.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have to rise this morning to provide some initial comments here to Bill 23, Professional Governance Act. You know, I guess I can appreciate the minister getting up and kicking off debate about how he feels about what the bill is going to do and how great it is, but quite frankly this seems like a problem that is just looking for a place to happen.

This bill causes me great concern, especially around the scope that the minister is providing for himself around this bill. As I've said before, you know, members of the government bench, members of the government caucus that served in the 29th Legislature: whenever they saw any kind of extra abilities that were being given to a minister, let's just say that the comments were very serious, very pointed, and came in a flurry. When you see the ability for the minister to determine the scope, the bylaws, and, quite frankly, even their existence, I can just imagine what those members would have said back then. My guess is that the debate would have been very robust, very heated, yet I suspect that we'll probably see those same members simply sit here and say nothing with regard to Bill 23.

When you're looking at that and what the minister is basically going to be able to prescribe – I think it was my friend from Calgary-Buffalo who had said, you know, that you have professional organizations, and I think again my friend from Calgary-Buffalo mentioned one there with APEGA. This is an organization of individuals, very highly skilled, very highly educated, who carry an immense responsibility in terms of what they do, as he said, designing the very buildings that we work in each and every day. I'm curious what the minister feels that he can come in and do better. I can sit here and challenge him in this House about three simple words – “may,” “will,” and “shall” – and our disagreement on those, yet he's going to try to prescribe to these individuals how they should govern themselves.

Now, I would never, of course, ever say that we don't want to be transparent, providing accountability, being consistent in your actions. You know, if that is indeed the case, well, maybe I would suggest to the minister that he suggests to the rest of the government that they try that a little bit more in terms of consistency, transparency, and accountability. It feels like Bill 23 has been rushed for some reason, needing to get something out the door to be able to talk about in this House. I've seen several bills now that are coming out and trying to change things.

You know, maybe there's been some – and I'm using the term “consultation” loosely here. Instead of, rather, consul-tate, it's probably consul-told, and then, “Well, we're going to do it in regulations,” again, something members of the government bench and members of the government caucus that served previously would have significant problems with in that case. That's what we have here.

I mean, we've just recently seen a change with regard, for instance, to insulin pumps. You know, making the changes, but nobody seems to understand what's going on. That is of great concern to people, myself personally as my daughter is a type 1 diabetic. She is furious about this change. This is the pattern that we're seeing with the government in terms of legislation. Same with Bill 23: "Well, we'll figure out all the details later," and then give virtually no time to adapt. My friend from Calgary-Buffalo was talking about: what kind of timelines are we going to allow these organizations to adjust? Are they going to be reasonable, or is it just going to simply be an after fact and "Well, you're on your own to figure it out"? For a government that really doesn't want to be involved in things, you're getting involved in a lot of things, a significant number of things.

You know, the changes here around the timelines and approving applications for registration are now going to propose three different timelines that they're going to have to try to adhere to. That, by definition, is red tape. You just increased the difficulty to be able to do these things. So I'd be curious as to maybe some comments from the red tape minister on that particular part of the bill. Or did the Minister of Labour and Immigration even consult with the red tape ministry? I would certainly hope so because the red tape ministry is costing taxpayers anywhere between $10 million and $15 million over the course of this term. I would hope that they're a resource to all of the ministries when they're creating red tape. This would be a significant one just by itself.

I guess you could almost say, you know, that there's the chance for some very unpleasant, unintended consequences. I remember that word a lot. We used to hear it a lot, the unintended consequences. With the list of these professional organizations that are available to us that are being affected, I'm curious: did any of them say, "Yes; please create more barriers in terms of the timelines for these application approvals"? I'd be curious to know if any organization actually said: "Yes. We want more hurdles. We want more red tape there." But, like I said, I suspect it was more consult-told rather than consult-tate around this.

As my friend from Calgary-Buffalo had said, this bill significantly needs some work to it. It seems very haphazard in some of the things. You know, perhaps maybe even pressing the pause button to give a chance for any of these organizations to weigh in on some of these proposed changes like, for instance, what I just mentioned around red tape and the application process. I think that the minister should be forthcoming with those discussions. There seems to be a habit of the government wanting to form all kinds of panels and create reports and whatnot. Well, why don't we get a quick report on this from these organizations about how they feel this legislation looks?

This is a significant piece of legislation. You know, I can remember members opposite – whenever a bill got bigger than 50 pages, there was concern about being able to go out and find out from stakeholders about how they felt around things. As you can imagine, Bill 23 is significantly larger than that. Maybe we should find out. Maybe we should take that time to be able to get the input from these organizations.

I guess the next aspect I'm looking at – when I look at the scopes of some of these different professional organizations, having them essentially under one umbrella feels like you're just simply trying to mash a whole bunch of organizations together. I mean, we have everything from architects to agrologists, engineers, veterinary, chartered accountants, electrical contractors, yet you're going to come in and start prescribing to all these organizations potentially what their bylaws might be. I mean, they didn't reach becoming professional organizations in terms of self-governing just by accident. They had to work towards that. They had to prove that they could indeed govern themselves with accountability, integrity, transparency, and now, all of a sudden, we feel we have to smash all of these organizations together.

Again, I seem to remember that those same members serving before had a problem with things like one size fits all, yet here we are in Bill 23 doing that exact thing. It's always interesting. Again, as I've always said, Madam Speaker, when you start analyzing the language, what it says, what it doesn't say, what are you saying about it, what have you done in the past, persistently and consistently these things are always butting up against each other, much to the dismay of Albertans, because they are the ones caught in the middle and affected by these changes.

Again, it's a whole lot of: well, just trust us to get it right. I'm telling you right now that trust is in very, very thin supply with this government – very thin supply – and you just lost a whole bunch more trust with diabetics. I do believe I'm actually going to take a little bit of a personal insult to that because my daughter is type 1. There are maybe individuals that have private insurance that might be able to get to that; she's not one of them.

I guess – and, of course, I do realize that this is second reading, Madam Speaker. Hopefully, we'll get a chance to get more questions answered as we move along in debate and to Committee of the Whole. I'm hoping we'll see some answers around Bill 23. Why has the government chosen this direction? You know, why did we choose to increase red tape around these timelines for applications? How does the bill allow for the minister to prescribe how each organization can register? What got to that point?

You know, let's hear what was heard around the consultations – again using that term a little bit loosely here. I guess the big one: if you are indeed just going to pass this through – and I'd never presuppose the decision of the House, but that's likely what's going to happen – what kind of supports are you planning to put in place to help these organizations make this transition? Again, are you just going to leave them out in the wind, or are you actually going to back them up with these changes?

Now, past habits would show me that that's probably the case; they'll be left to their own devices, as we've seen with so many different changes brought in over the course of this government's term. Then maybe when there's a significant enough blowback, they start to make some changes. I mean, you've been promising help to Albertans for months around rebates. Still waiting. Is that the same kind of thing we're going to get out of Bill 23 should the minister decide to create a whole bunch of upheaval? Are we going to be able to go to these organizations like, for instance, the Society of Professional Biologists and say, "There's help available for you"? You know, are you going to give reasonable timelines if you're going to ask them to rewrite their bylaws because of the changes from Bill 23? Are you going to give them the proper amount of time that they require to effectively change these things?

The Deputy Speaker: Are there others to join the debate on Bill 23 in second reading? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm very pleased to rise this morning to speak to Bill 23, Professional Governance Act. I believe I could think of a number of different titles to the act and perhaps submit them for tentative amendments. One that comes to mind, after reading the act in a cursory way, is that it's the Minister-Knows-Best Control Act. It certainly smacks of a heavy-handed piece of legislation that seeks to exercise a significant amount of control and shows in a very dramatic way why not only individual Albertans can't trust this government to govern in their interest, but now the crosshairs are focused completely and very resolutely on the business community with this piece of legislation.

Business, looking at this legislation, can't trust this UCP government to look after their interests, because they are certainly not doing so with this piece of legislation. This is a three-alarm fire as far as I'm concerned, and the business community will be rallying, I think, against it, because I don't remember, Madam Speaker, reading any headlines saying: professional regulated organizations demand the minister take control of their organizations with an umbrella act such as this. There was no such headline and no such demand. There were organizations that acted independently under rules and guidelines that already exist in legislation, and I don't recall hearing any groundswell demanding that the government undertake a sweeping change to basically overtake the governance of many of these organizations which have been around for decades and decades in this province, which represent thousands and thousands of independent businesses who are now being told by the government that they don't have legitimacy to operate their own organization.

Some of my comments are based on the Field Law assessment of Bill 23 that really shows it to be a massive change in governance of some incredible organizations in this province that have been instrumental in building this province, yet the government seems to believe that they need to intervene on their own in order to have complete control over these organizations.

Now, it's stunning, Madam Speaker, to see the control that the government wants to exercise over these organizations, and I'm not speaking about fly-by-night organizations. The 22 professional regulated organizations that they seek to limit are well-known organizations that most Albertans would recognize: the professional engineers, professional accountants of Alberta, Consulting Engineers of Alberta, Alberta Institute of Agrolgists, Land Surveyors' Association, Professional Planners Institute; you know, these individuals who are continuously in trouble and flaunting the law. Well, no, they're not, actually. You don't see those headlines because, indeed, they have been operating with integrity for decades in this province, yet somehow the government sees the need to add them to the targeted list of people that they want to control in this province. Now, you know, businesses are squarely in the crosshairs of this government, and businesses looking at this are going to say: we can't trust these guys; look what they're doing. [interjection] I'll accept the intervention.

Member Irwin: Thank you to the Member for Edmonton-McClung for accepting my intervention. I know he was just getting started there, and he's got a lot more to say on this bill. What piqued my interest were his comments that he was starting to say about trust. I'm seeing – and I think he is as well – a clear pattern of a lack of trust with this government. We've said that honestly, I think. What are we on? Bill 23, and it's been a theme with at least, I would say, 21 of the bills that we've seen in front of us.

You know, I would ask that member to just talk a little bit more about some of the concerns that he sees around trusting this government. We've seen multiple times the justification from this government. They say, "Oh, you know, just trust us that the kinks in this bill will be worked out in regulations" or "Just trust us that we've gotten the consultation right; just trust us that this is what stakeholders want."

Thank you.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood for bringing up the question of trust as a matter of grave concern with this piece of legislation. Basically, what the government is doing, in a way that wasn't solicited by the business community – that's for sure – is telling them: "We don't trust you. We don't trust you to operate yourselves with integrity, and therefore we're going to create a piece of legislation, Bill 23, which is going to provide us with the ability to have the minister, never mind the cabinet but to have the minister, dictate to you how you operate your businesses and your professional organizations, and if we don't like you, we're going to put the screws to you. We've got the tools in this legislation to actually discontinue your existence." That's how draconian this is.

I can only imagine, Madam Speaker, what the groundswell will be from businesses who feel they can no longer trust this government themselves, like Albertans across the province who don't trust this government as far as managing the pandemic and treating health care professionals, tearing up contracts with doctors, looking after the vagaries of inflation. The list goes on and on, and now the government aims directly at professional organizations, telling them that they are now the target and that they will be ruled by the minister, basically. That's the ulterior motive here, and it seems to be the ultimate goal.

The recourse in the event of a dispute with the professional regulatory organizations is simply to go to the Court of Queen's Bench. Well, that's a pretty difficult process to undertake if indeed you feel you have a minister trying to dictate how you're operating, and now the only recourse you've got is the Court of Queen's Bench.

The government, the minister can direct the professional regulatory organization under Bill 23 to adopt specific rules or specified rules of professional conduct, codes of ethics, or standards of practices or amend any of these, as if the organizations didn't have those elements to their governance right now. It can make, amend, or repeal any bylaws. It can carry out any power, duty, or function in the act or the regulations to be done in a specific manner. If they don't comply, the minister may actually override them and require that they be implemented.

Now, what business operator in any of the fields, whether you're an engineer, you're an accountant, you're an electrical contractor, whether you're a certified management consultant, whether you're a local government manager of Alberta, whether you're involved in the Supply Chain Management Association of Alberta or any of the businesses that operate under those professional categories – and there are thousands of them. What indeed are you thinking as a business operator or business owner when you read this legislation, seeing the government basically reaching its arms into the doors of your business and telling you how indeed you're going to operate? This is shocking. [interjection] I'll accept the intervention.

Member Irwin: Thank you again to the Member for Edmonton-McClung for being so accepting of my interventions this morning. I just feel very much like I need to stick my nose into this piece of legislation. You know, it's interesting. What I hear from his remarks, too, is that it's just – for a government that speaks a big game about reducing red tape and reducing barriers for business and organizations, they seem to be adding a whole lot of additional burdens, and that's concerning to me.

I think, you know, an example that my colleague from Edmonton-Decore shared earlier was around the issue of insulin pumps, and I know, clearly, that's not directly related to this bill, but what a clear, relevant example of this government adding barriers to folks at a time when they should be reducing them, when they should be supporting Albertans. That's an issue that I need to raise because we are hearing from thousands of Albertans on that one.

Mr. Dach: Thank you for that intervention, Member. I certainly see a number of barriers that are being added to the operation of professional organizations that the minister will now control. The barriers include allowing the minister to actually limit the advocacy role of the PRO, the professional regulatory organization.

Now, does this sound familiar to anybody in this province, Madam Speaker? I'm sure it should because it follows a theme of the government not liking any opposition in any form whatsoever to anything that it decides it wants to do. A good example of it was seen recently with the number of private members' bills that the government refused to even let out of committee and be debated in this House simply because they were opposition members' bills.

That's the type of control that this government wishes to exercise over private businesses by passing Bill 23 in this House and giving itself the ability through the minister – through the minister only – without recourse except to the Court of Queens' Bench, to actually dictate how a business will operate through the governance regulations that this minister will now have total authority over. It's a quick process that should be shocking to every professional organization that will be governed under this act and others who might seek it. If you are a self-regulated organization looking perhaps to become a PRO in your future, you might have second thoughts, Madam Speaker, about doing that because of the amount of draconian control over your business that this piece of legislation is blatantly looking to exercise.

Now, some of these things used to happen behind closed doors, Madam Speaker, in the past under Conservative governments in this province. I've been here all my life, and certainly the stories were pretty much open and public knowledge. Governments would have their way or step on whatever organization they wished to have change its practices by simply having conversations with them over coffee, breakfast, or – who knows? – maybe Jameson on the steps of some local establishment. Now what the UCP government is doing in this legislation is legitimizing that backroom process and enshrining it in legislation. It's indeed a brazen – not an attempt; it's a brazen, blatant means of establishing the past practices in legislation so that they have total control over the regulatory models that the professional regulated organizations have.

If I was a business operator in this province and if I was a member of these regulated professional institutions or organizations, I would be shocked to know that this bill will empower the minister to establish a regulatory model for each PRO through regulations. It also creates a professional governance officer to advise the minister on the choice of regulatory models. Now, the professional governance officers are not necessarily going to be operating in the interests of the organizations that are about to be regulated. There are existing PROs that are continued under the act until the regulations are made, quote, unquote, but the minister is going to be authorized to make regulations respecting regulatory models. As the Field Law review of this Bill 23 suggests, it gives the minister immense power over the regulation of the professions through regulations. They are also permitted to apply for a change of regulatory model, but it's subject to the discretion of the minister.

One of the most shocking things that I find in this piece of legislation – and it may be slipping past the public's sight, but I want to bring it to the public's attention – is the limitations that the government intends through the minister to be able to put on the advocacy roles of these professional organizations. If you are perhaps an engineer or you're involved in land surveying and you have something that you think is in the public interest to bring forward regarding amending the legislation or the practices of your particular business and how it operates for the safety or betterment of the public and you bring that forward and the government doesn't like it, this legislation, through the governance act changes that it contemplates, will allow the minister to limit the amount of advocacy that you can bring forward on a particular issue.

Now, this is shocking because it indeed touches upon the fact that you can't trust this government in terms of your ability to exercise your free speech in this country, in terms of how it wants to perhaps maintain bubble zones around abortion clinics so that that will impede access to abortion in this province. Other things that one could contemplate are pretty scary, Madam Speaker, given this exemplary power of limiting advocacy. [interjection] I'll accept the intervention.

Member Irwin: Oh, very kind of the Member for Edmonton-McClung to accept my third and final intervention on this. I wasn't planning necessarily to jump up, but then he brought in the comments around abortion and bubble zones. Don't worry; I won't get on a long tangent about that, but it is . . .

Ms Hoffman: You only have 50 seconds.

Member Irwin: That's right. I only have 50 seconds. Gosh.

You know, it is interesting because what he was getting at is that in the case of Bill 23 really a lot of power is given to the minister, potentially what this same government would label as government overreach. They talk a big game about free speech and about the free market and so forth. The number of times we hear concerns about the federal government – if we drank every time we heard Justin Trudeau's name from that side, we'd be in trouble over here. It's intriguing that this same government continues to be quite hypocritical in their legislation.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Member, for that intervention. I'll be brief. I think I only have a few moments left. I wanted to build on those remarks by saying that, yes, indeed, in Alberta this government prides itself on being the bastion and protector of free enterprise, but what they are doing with this piece of legislation, Madam Speaker, is actually stifling the ability of business.

I was in business for 30 years before being elected to this House, as were many members of this opposition assembly. Therefore, I wanted to know why this government decided to stifle the adaptation ability of business, the innovation, the evolution and adaptability of legislation, throwing all that out the window because the UCP government knows best. Through their minister they're looking to stifle the creativity of businesses by creating a wall around their professional organizations, a wall of control that should be shocking every business owner, under the guise of this legislation and those that might even contemplate joining professional organizations.

In fact, the whole business community, particularly small businesses but large businesses also, is impacted by this legislation in a very large way. It is shocking to see the amount of control that this minister and government wants to have over businesses. I think that the business community should be standing up and saying: "What in the world is going on? What do you think you're trying to pull? We're not standing for it."

With that, Madam Speaker, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

11:00 Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 22
Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022

The Chair: This is its first time being debated in Committee of the Whole. Are there members wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I was hoping that the minister might answer the questions that we'd asked at previous stages, but perhaps a little bit later in committee since we will have multiple times to pop up and ask them.

I would start by sort of reiterating one of the main questions I asked in second and would sincerely like to get a response on, and that's the fact that this bill, a very similar version of this bill, was brought forward in a previous sitting of this Legislature and died on the Order Paper. We've waited about six months, and now the government has brought it back. They added one more piece to it that I'm aware of. It seems like the Balancing Pool provisions were added to this bill, but other than that, the bill largely was already before this Chamber and being considered. While I think that generally I'm quite supportive of this bill, I would love to have some clarity from the government about why it is they didn't pass this bill when it was in this Chamber previously. What kind of feedback did they receive that caused them to let the bill die on the Order Paper and then wait six months before bringing it back?

To me, it would seem that defining energy storage is a significant step in the right direction, and I would have liked to have seen the government move quickly in doing that. Energy storage is something that I think many of us are much more aware of now than when I was a kid. We certainly didn't talk much about energy storage because everything was based on short-term, surge energy needs, primarily coal, and then a lot of people still had oil furnaces burning in their houses, too – right? – so they heated their homes with short-term, immediate energy sources. But now, when we look at our electricity grid, more and more of it is coming from other forms, including natural gas as well as renewables, and the opportunities that have surfaced for increased energy storage are significant.

We've seen many, many researchers dedicate their careers to creating better storage mechanisms for energy users here in North America but also around the world. When you look at some of the work that's being done internationally around poverty reduction, access to information, access to the Internet, and access to energy storage so that locally produced renewable energies can be accessed in the long term are two of the big things that poverty reduction is really focusing on in terms of foreign aid and work that's happening around the world.

Making sure that we actually define energy storage, especially when the need is growing so significantly around the world, that we define it and what it means here in the province of Alberta, I would think would be a priority for any sitting government. So why did the government fail to pass the legislation that did that in the previous sitting of this Legislature, six months ago? I definitely think that it is something that I support us moving forward on at some point. What was the reason for the delay? Sometimes governments get feedback after a bill has been introduced and take that into consideration, so if there was a reason for the delay, I think it would be really important for us to know so that we could assess if the reason for the delay has been addressed by the time the bill has been brought back to this place, now, for further consideration.

Another area, of course, is self-supply and export. We are proudly one of the biggest energy producers in the world, and making sure that we can address our own energy needs as well as export needs is something that I think most Albertans would be supportive of. Again, what was the feedback gathered when this bill was originally introduced, about half a year ago, that required it to be delayed to this point, and has that feedback been addressed through this later version of the bill, which we are now considering as Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022?

And then a third area is requiring distribution facility owners, DFOs, to prepare long-term distribution system plans, which will have to receive regulatory approval. So, again, as I recall, this is something that was in the previous iteration of this bill. What has changed between that bill – why did the government fail to pass it six months ago, and why is it coming forward now? What are the changes? I don't think that these are onerous questions to ask of the government that has brought this bill forward now twice in two different versions but failed to actually get it through the legislative process.

I would like to enthusiastically support this bill, and giving this information, this basic information, not just to members of this Assembly but to the public – because this is about to become a law, should this receive full support from the Assembly or even majority support from the Assembly. And when we are asked to pass a law that was already proposed six months ago, that the government didn't care enough to pass at that point in time, I think we should know why. I think we should know why they didn't bother to move this forward six months ago, when it was already on the Order Paper, when it was already up for consideration, when it had already received some level of engagement, and why is it in a better position to become the law today? Pretty simple questions.

Then, of course, the fourth main area in the bill is about dissolving the Balancing Pool. I won't get into lengthy debate on the merits for and against the Balancing Pool. The government certainly has the opportunity to make that decision and drive in that direction if they so choose. I wish that we were debating where we were at a number of years ago, more than 20 – I'm sure now probably more than 30 – when we moved to such a deregulated, market-based model, really, the most extreme model in North America. The only other one that sort of compares is Texas, and I think many of us remember what happened to energy needs last year, when so many people in Texas were without power for such a long period of time. That caused significant hardships on families and on economies. So I wish we had an opportunity to consider many of the decisions that were driven by other Conservative governments in the past, that have resulted in us being in the situation where we are today.

And I wish this government was really, actually doing something to focus on the main energy issue that comes forward to me every time I talk to people about what's on their mind, what are their biggest issues, and one of the number one issues that comes up here in Edmonton-Glenora, in Canmore, in Calgary, in Spruce Grove-Stony Plain: like, regularly people bring up affordability and affordability specifically as it relates to energy costs. We know that this government has sat by while energy prices, specifically electricity prices, power prices for ordinary families have gone up significantly. Many people have talked about hundreds of dollars each and every month being added to their power bills, and we know that this government has been hearing that feedback because they have at least in language talked about rebates, right? They've said that they're going to bring forward some energy rebates that were for January, February, and March. They said this to us in March.

They had us pass supplementary supply, a spending bill, to be able to pay for that money out of the last fiscal year, in March, because they were going to give people $50 a month – not significant but $50 a month – for each of those three months that people were seeing hundreds of dollars in terms of increased costs on their power bills. So the government finally said, “Okay; we will bring forward some kind of a rebate,” asked us all to move this forward quickly in March. Here we are, the middle of May, and Alberta families are still waiting for that, what the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland referred to as a paltry rebate – not significant but something – and the government can’t even get it out the door.

When we’ve actually asked for clarification that it will be out the door by the end of May, still a full two and a half months after they originally brought up this idea for Albertans, they refused to pass that amendment and have moved this, kicked the can further down the road, making Alberta families wait months more before giving them any guarantee that they will actually get that paltry rebate into their household budgets. In the meantime Alberta families are paying hundreds of dollars more each and every month, and that time keeps adding up, and the pressure keeps growing.

I really wish that this bill we’re considering today, Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta’s Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022 – I think it has many, many worthwhile pieces in it. I think that the government is really missing the big picture, though, which is how desperate Albertans are to see their government do anything to address affordability for them and their families. For a government that campaigned hard on one particular aspect of affordability in the last campaign, I think that a lot of Albertans expected to see significant savings for them and their families; instead, what we’ve seen over the last three years is that costs have gone up for pretty much everything, including the cost for electricity, significantly, under the present government’s leadership.

So when it comes to a government that will actually stand up for you and your family, for your individual bank accounts, for the energy needs that you have, I think we’ve seen time and time again that you can’t count on the UCP to stand up for you and your family. You can’t trust them to actually follow through on the things that they espouse during an election. They’ve ignored the problem of skyrocketing bills for months, and they keep failing Albertans in that regard, and we deserve to have the direct support for individual Albertans. Again, why did the minister take so long to bring this bill back, and why did this bill fail to be implemented in the last session?

I also want to take a few moments to talk about energy needs and what so many Albertans are doing in spite of their government. One of those pieces is that many are moving forward with harnessing wind and harnessing the sun to do whatever they can to both reduce their own personal emissions in terms of their household consumption but also to reduce their monthly bills, because most of the research shows that in somewhere between five and 10 years you can amortize the cost of solar module installation for a personal household. It definitely makes a big difference to the monthly bill, especially once you’ve hit that mark where you’ve paid off the upfront capital investment. That’s one of the reasons why, when the money for the price on carbon was actually staying in Alberta instead of all being sent to Ottawa, energy efficiency as well as initiatives around reducing the actual draw on the grid were priorities. They aren’t for the current government. I’m very well aware of that.

But we still have a federal rebate, and many municipalities are bringing forward their own rebates as well to try to off-set some of that upfront original capital pressure that’s put on so many families, when they’re already paying hundreds of dollars more on their power bills and they’re trying to find a way to get out from under that pressure, and the province is failing to give them any sort of incentive to further reduce their household consumption.

Part of why people want to reduce their household consumption is because there are many ways that you can reduce your emissions for a financial benefit without having a negative impact on your quality of life, and this is certainly one of them. When you’re running your dishwasher and watching your TV, whether it’s being powered by natural gas or formerly by coal or by renewables, most people at the time they’re turning on their device just want to make sure that they can wash their dishes and watch TV. That’s what their driver is. And it doesn’t impact them in a negative quality-of-life way to know that that energy is coming from a variety of sources at the time of consumption. The biggest impact, of course, is when you look at your bill and you see how much your usage was that month.

One of the reasons why many governments, including – right now we’re in the city of Edmonton – the government of Canada, and many other provinces have moved forward on rebates is to help with that upfront cost at the very beginning of the capital install to create more opportunities for energy to be produced locally through renewables. What it also means is that there are more other forms of energy that can be saved for other markets or for other types of use outside of individual household consumption.

So why the government here still fails to see the benefits and actually do anything to address affordability for Alberta families – because obviously there are two ways that I’ve highlighted so far in my remarks as they relate to Bill 22 that the government could quite easily do to address affordability for consumers, for people who need energy, and we all need energy. One is, of course, to have an actual rebate plan that’s meaningful and that’s timely, and another would be to find more ways for people to address their own energy needs and reduce their bills over the short and long term. The government here has failed to do either of those things to actually address affordability for everyday families.

I do want to again say that I think the piece around defining storage is very good news, and I think it does relate primarily to forms of energy that are produced through renewables. Sometimes you’ll hear people who don’t like renewables saying: well, it’s not windy every day. That’s true, but we have some of the best wind of anywhere in the world, and many other countries have found ways to harness the wind on windy days and store that energy for use in future times when they need it.

Us actually defining storage for energy storage, I think, is an important step forward for us to be able to actually have full utilization of the natural resources that we are so fortunate to have, both renewable and nonrenewable. We have many exceptional forms of energy here in the province of Alberta, and making sure that we can harness it all, I think, is the wise thing to do, and I think that we all know how much people across the planet need energy to be able to function.

I know that I’ve read about people having – oh, shoot, I forget it. The term escapes me. But when their power bills are at risk of being shut off, there are sort of energy consumption limits put on somebody’s bill and put on their address so that you can only use a certain amount of energy per monthly billing cycle. We’ve heard from people who needed their energy for things like running their oxygen machines, and they couldn’t draw on the grid and have to run their oxygen machine and run their microwave or run, you know, their washing machine at the same time. That definitely doesn’t speak to the kind of dignity that I think we all aspire for every Albertan to have, the ability to have reliable, cost-effective energy that’s there when you need it.

I think that those are a couple of things I wish this bill would do to take it from where we are now to a better place, where we could all even more enthusiastically support it. I think that it is important that we move this bill forward. Again, though, given that the minister is the same – it's not like we've seen a change around the cabinet table as it relates to this area of responsibility in the bill. So understanding the backstory about what happened between when this bill, in its previous form, was introduced and what happened when it was brought back I think would help us have a better understanding of what exactly is going on behind the curtain, so to speak, because there is a lot of concern from everyday Albertans that this government is so stuck in their own political drama that they are keeping the actual needs of ordinary Albertans as an afterthought.

And that's one of the ways it feels in this bill: it's an afterthought in terms of affordability. Nothing is really being done in this bill to address the biggest issue facing most Alberta families. The number of Alberta families who report being $200 away from financial ruin is an embarrassment, and it is shameful that in a province as rich as ours we have so many families on the brink of bankruptcy. The fact that this bill does nothing to address affordability and has done nothing to answer the questions about why it was delayed for so long between prior readings, between prior sessions and now – certainly, a lot has gone on politically over the last six months.

We know that there are many people in the UCP, many sitting MLAs in the UCP, who are more focused on infighting and on who's in the position of power – and I'm sure for good reasons. I'm sure that they have been frustrated by the way the current Premier has been treating them and party members, specifically when I think about the kinds of messages that have leaked out over the last several months, where there is name-calling directed towards people within their own party, probably, it appears, people within the caucus. And when those types of messages make their way out, it's clear that the Premier and probably his cabinet and probably his MLAs are spending more energy focused on infighting and on how they're going to arrange the deck chairs on the Titanic than they are on the issues that matter most to Alberta families.

I would say that clearly this bill has missed the mark when it comes to addressing energy affordability, but the other pieces in it, again, I'm fine with and I think are probably going to move our system forward and therefore should probably be passed. In fact, they probably should have been passed six months ago, when the government first brought these ideas forward to this Assembly and then sat on the bill and waited for it to die on the Order Paper. So by failing to say why this bill is better than the previous bill, by failing to say why the government chose not to move forward on those first three really big pieces – again, defining energy storage, self-supply and export, and requiring distribution facility owners to prepare a long-term distribution system plan which will have to receive government approval... [Ms Hoffman's speaking time expired]

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on Bill 22? The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Madam Chair. I am excited to talk about Bill 22 and electric power for Albertans. As Bill 22 seeks to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of electric power production for Alberta businesses and families, it is something that I hope that all of us in the Legislature can support.

Madam Chair, I need to express the truth that the NDP were a disaster for power in Alberta. The NDP accelerated – I am excited to let all Albertans know the truth. The NDP accelerated the shutdown of coal power production prior – prior – to the end of the economic life of this infrastructure and . . .

Mr. Dach: It saved lives.

Mr. Stephan: Madam Chair, that dysfunctional thinking saddled Alberta taxpayers with having to pay over a billion dollars of compensation to producers. At the end of the day, whether they want to admit it or not, the NDP made things worse. They made power cost more, yet they attack our government. They say that we should do more.

We need to understand, whatever rebate is provided, who is going to actually pay for it. Who is paying for a rebate to Alberta power users? Madam Chair, Alberta taxpayers are paying for it. I want to ask the question: should Alberta taxpayers subsidize the utility cost for themselves? Is there another way? Let's pull back the curtain. How about this? How about getting Quebec taxpayers to pay for the power of Alberta residents? How would we feel about that? It sounds kind of crazy – doesn't it? – but that is exactly what they are doing to us.

I want to share the truth with all Albertans, and here it is. Quebec enjoys the lowest residential power rates in all of North America. How do they do that? Quebec Hydro is using their Crown corporation, Quebec Hydro, to get money from Alberta businesses and families. You see, Quebec Hydro sells their power to Quebec residents at under market, the lowest in all of North America. You know what? When the NDP were in power, they absolutely did nothing. They did absolutely nothing. They made things worse.

The Quebec government: by selling their power at under market to Quebec residents, what they do is that they actually decrease their fiscal capacity. Equalization is determined by looking at each individual province's fiscal capacity. So by selling their power at under market to Quebec residents, lowest in North America, they actually decrease their fiscal capacity. By decreasing their fiscal capacity, they get more equalization. Their principal source of equalization is Alberta businesses and families. We pay over $10 billion every single year to Quebec indirectly. While we are saddled with high power rates, we are indirectly subsidizing Quebec residents with the lowest power rates in all of North America. Madam Chair, why aren't we confronting that? Why is it that Alberta taxpayers are having to not only pay for the power of Alberta residents but Quebec residents also?

Now, Madam Chair, how would we replicate that result? You know what we would have to do? We would have to provide power to Albertans through a Crown corporation at below market prices just like Quebec does with Quebec Hydro, and we would have to manufacture losses in this Crown corporation in a way that decreases Alberta's fiscal capacity in the billions, reducing our capacity to pay billions more in equalization to Quebec.

Now, a challenge with this strategy is that it could be undermined with amendments to an equalization formula to punish Alberta or frustrate attempts to stop having to subsidize Quebec. Madam Chair, with the Supreme Court of Canada saying that carbon taxes are okay, which the NDP love, by the way, the Trudeau-NDP axis government can simply adjust or come up with new, creative carbon taxes that are even more prejudicial to Alberta to attack Alberta businesses and families.

We need to remember, Madam Chair, that the Premier of Quebec says that one of his favourite things about Canada is equalization. Now, I want to ask the question to Albertans, to Canadians. If Quebec did not get to take from Canada, from Alberta, would they still be here? We know the truth; the answer is no. They would have left a long time ago. The only change to equalization that Quebec and Ottawa will support is a change that allows them to take even more from Alberta businesses and families. They are ignoring the equalization result, and nothing is happening.

Madam Chair, do we think for a minute that as Quebec and Ottawa accelerate towards becoming fiscal basket cases, they will look at the economic success of Alberta and leave us alone? No. They will absolutely not. Why do I say this? Because we can look back and see what they have been doing for decades in varying degrees.

Now, this is a very serious matter, but I'm not saying this in anger. But there is no point in sticking one's head in the sand and pretending to ignore the reality of our circumstances, both the great blessings we have but also the threats from this NDP-Liberal axis. They are a clear and present danger to Albertans. How are we going to protect ourselves? How do we move towards having more self-reliance? Madam Chair, this is a very difficult situation, but one thing that we can do is – there is great safety in the truth. I love the truth. In the end, the truth always prevails notwithstanding lies and distortions, and numbers don't alter the truth. If a majority believes in a lie, truth is unaffected, and in the end it does prevail.

Madam Chair, as it relates to electric power, we need to let every Alberta ratepayer know the truth, that every year Albertans are paying billions of dollars to Quebec to subsidize the lowest power rates in North America as they are suffering under high power rates. The more Albertans know the truth, even if it challenges the status quo, the more Albertans will push Alberta government to do what is right. The more Albertans know the truth, the more accountable government will be. The more accountable government will be, the better they will be. We want government to have the best culture of government possible. The NDP were a failure. I'd love, as we strive to be better in every single way, to have a culture of excellence in government, and Bill 22 is moving in the right direction, but there's more to do.

Thank you.

11:30

The Chair: Are there others? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's nice to hear a mention of Bill 22 towards the end of the member's speech. That's how I kind of realized that the speech was about Bill 22. Although it's a good bill, many things that the government talks about with respect to the bill and the government member talked about with respect to the bill have nothing to do with facts, truth, or anything resembling that. [interjections] When I hear these talking points, two things come to mind.

Mr. Getson: To accelerate phasing out coal to save the environment, apparently, was ridiculous.

Mr. Sabir: Are you done with that?

The Chair: Hon. members, I think it's a good time to remind members to direct their comments through the chair. Also, only one member has the floor to speak.

The hon. member.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Through you, I was trying to make sure that the member was done with whatever he was trying to say.

When I hear government speaking notes and government talking points on this file and this bill, two things come to mind. One, either they are completely incompetent, or they are not truthful about this file. I think I will go back a little bit. When we talk about the rising cost of utilities, that Albertans are hurting, that they're looking for relief, the government promised many times that Albertans will get a $50 paltry rebate, but still they are waiting for it, and their utility bills are through the roof. Government members will get up and they will try to tell Albertans, tell this House that somehow from '15 to '19 there were transmission lines built which are the reason for these rising utility prices.

Back in 2008-2009 the then PC government gave cabinet powers to approve energy infrastructure without any public hearing. That's a matter of public record. That's what the previous government did. The two major lines that were built – like, they started building those lines back in 2009. The western Alberta transmission line, eastern Alberta transmission line: they were both approved in 2012, and 2012 is well before when we became government. That's when the PCs were building energy infrastructure, and yes, it was overbuilt. Back then NDP leader Brian Mason was opposed to it. He warned government then that this will result in higher energy prices and Albertans ultimately will pay for that. The government, so conveniently, ignores all of that and wants Albertans to believe that somehow transmission lines were built in '15 to '19.

One day even the minister suggested that our fault is that we didn't cancel those. Madam Chair, let me tell you that the contracts that we see government used to sign were always cheaper to honour than to cancel because they often had put clauses there that would socialize all kinds of losses onto Albertans, and profits would be taken by their insiders, by their close friends, and by big corporations. That's exactly how they have signed on to these contracts and overbuilding this energy transmission.

There is no truth to any of those assertions that the NDP were responsible for building transmission lines. It was all PCs, and government members should look into Hansard, government members should look into Alberta's legislative records instead of blindly standing up for this government. They should stand up for their constituents, and they should tell them that the number one reason for rising cost prices is the profits that companies are making. That's the number one reason. That's the people from, you know, the University of Calgary School of Public Policy, that came out last month and with facts and figures showed how over the last year or so companies are making the profit in excessive amounts, and that's the number one factor for the rising gas prices.

The second thing. Government will get up and tell us that our government shut down coal plants and that's the reason for the rising electricity prices. For everyone's information, Madam Chair, there was a regulation passed by the federal government – and the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche will know that; back then he was a member of the federal Parliament – and the name of the regulation was reduction of carbon dioxide emissions from coal-fired generation of electricity regulation. That's a federal regulation, and the statutory order and regulation number is 2012-167. I strongly urge the members of government caucus to look up this regulation and look up what this regulation did to Alberta's electricity market or Alberta's coal-fired plants. At that time there were 18 plants in Alberta that were coal powered, and out of that 12 of them were scheduled to shut down through this regulation by December 31, 2029 . . .

Mr. Getson: You didn't accelerate any of the other ones?

Mr. Sabir: . . . twelve out of 18.

Mr. Getson: And you didn't have to pay out $1.3 billion in contracts?

Mr. Sabir: Madam Chair, through you, if the member wants to talk, if he's allowed to talk, I am willing to cede the floor to him, but I'm sure he's not allowed to talk.

Anyway, 12 out of 18 plants were shut down under the Harper government, and that was in 2012. The workers who were in these plants didn't get any support whatsoever. These business owners didn't get any support whatsoever from the federal Conservative government. These are 12 out of 18 plants.

The remaining six plants were TransAlta, ATCO, and Capital Power. When we accelerated their transition, we negotiated with them, and their plants were converted to gas so that Albertans would have a reliable supply of electricity from a relatively cleaner source using Alberta's natural gas. With that, we also provided $40 million to Albertans whose livelihoods were impacted so that they can get the training, so that they can get the skills upgrade and transition into new jobs while the federal government just shut down 12 of the 18 with the dint of law without giving a penny to Albertans, without any regard for the jobs of those who were in those plants.

Then, yes, we also worked with them. Oftentimes the government talks about $1.36 billion. That was money committed over 14 years so that those plants can transition to gas plants and Albertans can have a reliable source of energy. I think I would argue, and Albertans will agree, that that investment was better than spending $1.3 billion on a pipeline to nowhere; $1.3 billion on Keystone XL that didn't go anywhere. It was literally a bet on Donald Trump winning the U.S. election.

Mr. Stephan: They fired you.

Mr. Getson: And they honoured foreign policy, national security.

Mr. Sabir: They wasted that $1.3 billion, Madam Chair.

Mr. Getson: Look at what's happening with Ukraine.

Mr. Sabir: If they want to speak to that waste or any other waste, they certainly could, Madam Chair, through you. But they don't want to listen to facts. They don't want to listen to truth.

These are the facts, what the PC government did from 2009 to 2014. That's part of Hansard. That's part of Alberta's legislative history, what the Stephen Harper government did. I think that if they are on talking terms, they could ask the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche that that was done when federal Conservatives were in government; 12 out of 18 plants were shut down back then.

So against this backdrop, when I hear government assertions that somehow from '15 to '19 we built transmission lines, we did everything wrong, and that's how prices are up, electricity prices: that's not true. If this government believes that to be true, then this government cannot be trusted and they are incompetent. If this government knows this history and is still not telling Albertans the whole story, then they are not up front with Albertans about the facts.

At any rate, they will blame anyone and everyone for their failures, for their mistakes, for their lack of leadership because that's what we have heard from this government from day one. Anything that happens here – if they are caught drinking liquor in the sky palace, it's somebody's fault because somebody took a picture, not their fault. They were not supposed to get caught. It's not their fault. Somebody should not have taken the picture without their consent, without letting them know. That's their fault.

Mr. Nally: Let's talk about Bill 22.

Mr. Sabir: Anyway, Bill 22 still is a good piece of legislation. It defines energy storage. It will help us capture energy at one point and let us store it for use at another. This is important for a couple of reasons. One, it will make sure that Albertans have a reliable source and supply of energy. So that's a really good thing about it.

The second thing is that it will also help us address the environment, that this government doesn't care much – sometimes even they don't believe in climate change, but the fact is that this energy storage can help us address climate change as well. We do know that most people do believe in climate change. They think that as humans, as legislators we need to take climate change seriously. We need to take action on addressing climate change. I think that by creating room for energy storage, by creating a legal framework for energy storage, that will help us create efficiencies for the grid. It will help us reduce GHG emissions by introducing more flexibility and by integrating energy to a storage system from more environment-friendly sources such as solar, such as renewables, such as wind. I think that's a good step, and it will help Albertans in the long run, and I recognize that it's a good thing that government did.

Another thing. While the Member for Red Deer-South was speaking – when he was speaking, he was talking about Quebec Hydro and some other provincially owned corporations. Before I became elected, I was working on a file that had something to do with another Crown corporation, Manitoba Hydro, and I was doing some due diligence for some First Nation on a file. I started looking at Manitoba Hydro's record. They were not only providing the cheapest electricity at that point in Canada; they were also providing technical assistance to 55 countries across the world. Not only were they providing electricity, the cheapest electricity, to the people of Manitoba; they were exporting that electricity, and they were also providing technical assistance to 55 countries: how to generate electricity, how to, I guess, export electricity, and how to deal with electricity markets. [interjections] That's the capacity of one Crown corporation that I know of. I think that they pick and choose whatever suits their arguments. They will bring that forward and ignore everything else; it doesn't matter how relevant, how factual.

Anyway, in closing, I think that energy storage is a good step. It will help us reduce our GHG emissions. It's good for the environment. It's good for Albertans. Also, requiring distribution facility owners to do long-term planning will, again, go against the ideological belief of this government that they don't want to intervene in markets or don't want to require anyone to plan ahead because the market does everything on its own. But this provision in this act will require market actors, distribution facility owners to prepare long-term distribution system plans. Madam Chair, there is a chance that they might prepare plans which are not good, so an additional safeguard is that they will need regulatory approval from the government so that the government will make sure that the plans they prepared are good and they are in the best interests of Albertans, the best interests of our grid. The government is now intervening in the market to make sure that distribution system owners have the plans in place with respect to their business.

Lastly, I would say that the government also had one piece of legislation, a similar piece of legislation, six months ago. The government didn't pass that piece of legislation. I think it will be important to know: from that time on, what has changed? Had government received any feedback? Had government consulted with anyone in the industry? Their record on consultation is really, really poor as well. They think they know the best, and they don't bother themselves with any kind of consultation, so it will be important to know what has changed since they dropped the last piece of legislation. What's new in this one in terms of consultations with the stakeholders?

I think that with that, I will take a seat, and I would also urge the government that whenever they are talking about Bill 22, they should talk about Bill 22.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there are others? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. This has been a very, very nice conversation in here this morning. I just wanted to thank the minister for this bill and for looking at this, in particular the Balancing Pool. We all know some of the concerns that we've had in the past, and I think that, you know, when you have the privilege of being in government and you're working with such a diverse group of people, especially folks from all ends of the spectrum of – and electricity is confusing even when you understand it. It's very, very complex. It's difficult. There are a lot of different organizations and, actually, a lot of personalities at the table, too.

Again, I want to thank the minister for being able to co-ordinate and collaborate with so many of these organizations, because I think all of us have struggled from time to time in this place in trying to understand what's in the best interest not only of this sector, but in particular I think every one of us right now in this place is receiving bazillions of e-mails of the difficulties that people are having, how hard it is. You know, there is so much going on. We are looking at inflation. We're looking at increased rates for electricity. We're looking at how it is that we can support people who are vulnerable.

So many things that are on the personal side, but then also when we look at the grid, the important thing for me in this legislation is really exposing and having some transparency around the Balancing Pool. As we bring that together – and again thank you so much to the minister for the opportunity. I'm not quite – you know, there'll be always things in electricity that have to be tweaked and fixed. When you take a look at your own legislation and you realize that it's not working exactly right and you're willing to come back to the drawing board and look at that and fix it, that takes a lot of guts, and it takes a real, good consultation with the folks that you're dealing with. Thank you so much, Minister, for doing that.

It's so hard to predict what's going to happen. There is so much that goes into the discussions around this, but one of the things I wanted to say – and I just want to touch on this for a bit – is that the ability to debate it here is one of the most important things that we can do. Every single one of us is coming from a very different position, whether we're rural MLAs, we're city MLAs, about the impacts that this is having on our constituents. When you have more generators that are able to apply and supply into the grid and are contributing, the hope is, and particularly in being able to put it with AESO versus the Balancing Pool, to have a more stable structure. I think that, at the end of the day, if that's what we're able to accomplish through this legislation and other pieces of legislation going forward, it's a really, really good step in the right direction.

Again, I think that, you know, we're looking at – if I'm understanding it correctly, like, we have a lot of large producers that are already enabled to be able to participate, and this is very enabling legislation, the process being that the more the market is able to be a market and bring people into the market, the more stable the prices will be for the people of Alberta. I really look forward to seeing how this bill will engage not only with the stakeholders but with the people of Alberta, and I just want to take a minute to thank the minister for bringing the bill forward.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 22, Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022. Just before I address a couple of things that were said, let me just say that I agree. This is my first time speaking to this bill, so just to put on the record that I do believe that there are a lot of positives in this bill that have the potential to help modernize Alberta's electricity grid, which is a good thing, and if implemented well, these certainly will have a positive long-term impact.

Now, the associate minister is – you know, hopefully, he'll answer the question. I know that two of my colleagues have, before me, asked the same question, and I think it would be great to hear an answer from him. Those were: why did it take the minister so long to bring back the legislation – I'm sure there's a good reason; perhaps it was around consultation – and why did the minister abandon the bill last session and now bring back a similar bill? Just to shed some light on that would be super helpful. If he would jump up and explain that or answer that question, that would be great. I'm guessing that's going to be a big no.

The Chair: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt. Pursuant to Standing Order 4(3) we will now rise and report progress.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Ms Rosin: Madam Speaker, Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 22.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. That is carried. Looking for the hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity to perhaps move an adjournment.

Mr. Nally: You want to break for lunch?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. associate minister.

Mr. Nally: I didn't realize. Yeah, thank you, Madam Speaker. Should really wake me up earlier next time.

I make a motion that we break for lunch – no; adjourn.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:56 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, May 10, 2022

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, I do have a number of very special guests joining us today, and I beg your indulgence for a little bit of extra time this afternoon as well. Members, this morning I had the privilege of meeting with a very special guest who is joining us in the Speaker's gallery. Please welcome the ambassador of the Kingdom of Belgium, His Excellency Patrick Van Gheel, accompanied by Mr. Arnaud Gaspart, deputy head of mission at the Belgian embassy, and Ms Lori Schmidt, honorary consul designate for Belgium in Alberta. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Also joining us in the Speaker's gallery is a delegation from the Central Alberta Economic Partnership. It is Economic Development Week. I ask that you please welcome Chief Leonard Standing on the road of the Montana First Nation at Maskwacis and vice-chair of CAEP; James Carpenter, chair of CAEP; and Kimberley Worthington, executive director of CAEP. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Last, hon. members, certainly not least, it's my great honour and pleasure to introduce to you a former member, Mr. Neville Roper, who sits in the Speaker's gallery today. Neville joined the air force in 1941 just shy of his 19th birthday and served until his discharge in the fall of 1945, when he returned home to Rimbey, Alberta. He has been a member of the Royal Canadian Legion Branch branch 36 for over 76 years. Always an active member of his community, Neville was a member of the Rimbey firefighting brigade, a town councillor, and was also the mayor for 11 years. From 1967 to 1971 Neville Roper served as the Member of the Legislative Assembly representing the constituency of Ponoka.

He and his wife, Edith, travelled extensively until her passing in 1999. Neville continued to explore the world, celebrating his 78th birthday building houses in Fiji with Habitat for Humanity and his 82nd birthday while on a bus tour in the Dominican Republic. Members, Neville Sydney Roper celebrated his 100th birthday on March 5 and is here to participate in a project we're working on in association with former Members of the Legislative Assembly to capture the stories behind the service of former MLAs. He is joined by his daughter Lisa Madsen and his 92-year-old sister Doris Moonie. I would invite you all to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. [Standing ovation]

Mr. Roper reported many, many stories to me today, including that of stealing former member Tom Copithorne's boots and having the pages scurry them out. I'm glad that the members are equally as well behaved today as they were when you were a member.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, joining us in the gallery are two guests of the hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod. Please welcome Liz Charyna and Deborah Storlien-Cundy.

Also joining us is Karen Gosbee, a guest of the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

Also in the gallery are Burton Bailey and Emma Kunaka, Red Deer-North constituency office, and Vesna Sertic, constituency manager for Calgary-Peigan. I invite you to all rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Ministerial Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Federal Impact Assessment Act

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, for an opportunity to rise on a ministerial statement today on a very important issue. In August 2019 the Trudeau government brought into force a new set of regulations for federal environmental impact assessments, also known as Bill C-69 or better known here in Alberta as the no-more-pipelines bill.

Mr. Speaker, this law weaponized environmental law to attack industries and provinces that do not agree with the environmental zealots in Ottawa. Alberta's government very quickly responded and launched a constitutional challenge to the act on the grounds that the no-more-pipelines bill was a federal intrusion on provincial jurisdiction.

In February 2021 the Alberta Court of Appeal heard the case. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it's important to note that Alberta was supported by many key partners who intervened in support of our province in this case, including the Attorney General of Ontario, the Attorney General of Saskatchewan, the Woodland Cree First Nation, the Indian Resource Council, the Canadian Taxpayers Federation, the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers, the Explorers and Producers Association of Canada, the Canadian Energy Pipeline Association, the Independent Contractors and Businesses Association, and Alberta Enterprise Group. We would like to take a moment and thank all of those intervenors for their critical support in defending against the Trudeau Liberals' intrusion on provincial rights.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to report to the House that today in the Alberta Court of Appeal there was a decision made on this case. In a historical ruling, ruling in favour, the court clearly ruled in favour of our province's argument. This ruling represents one of the most significant rulings on environmental law in the history of our country. This is very good news. As of today Bill C-69, the no-more-pipelines law, can no longer handcuff Alberta and our job creators coming to invest in this great province.

Now, I'd like to take this opportunity to read some of the key points from this historical decision. I would draw your attention to paragraph 421 of the decision, where it says, "the [Impact Assessment Act] constitutes a profound invasion into provincial legislative jurisdiction and provincial proprietary rights." Strong words, Mr. Speaker.

From paragraph 423 it says:

The unavoidable effect of the [Impact Assessment Act] would be the centralization of the governance of Canada to the point this country would no longer be recognized as a real federation. This is not what the framers of our Constitution intended. And it is certainly not what provincial governments agreed to either on patriation of the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize this. The Court of Appeal today clearly stated that this type of legislation and constitutional infringement would make our country unrecognizable. I will point out that the job of the federal government is to keep our nation united, but sadly Trudeau and his Liberal government are insisting on using laws to break our very country apart.

I will go further into this ruling, Mr. Speaker, and draw your attention to paragraph 424 in its entirety. It says:

Where natural resources are involved, it is each province that is concerned with the sustainable development of its natural resources, not the federal government. It is the province that owns these natural resources, not the federal government. And it is the province and its people who lose if those natural resources cannot be developed, not the federal government. The federal government does not have the constitutional right to veto an intra-provincial designated project based on its view of the public interest. Nor does the federal government have the constitutional right to appropriate the birthright and economic future of the citizens of a province.

Mr. Speaker, for those reasons the Alberta Court of Appeal found the Federal Impact Assessment, Bill C-69, or the no-more-pipelines bill, ultra vires Parliament. That means that with the no-more-pipelines bill the federal government has completely – and I want to stress this; completely – overstepped their powers and disrespected the concept of the Canadian Confederation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would also like to take a moment to recognize the critical role of Indigenous communities and what they played in this case. Alberta's government has heard loud and clear from Indigenous communities that they can and that they want to participate in and benefit from responsible natural resource development in Alberta, which is why the Minister of Indigenous Relations created the Indigenous litigation fund to make sure the voices of Indigenous people could be heard in legal actions that were attempting to hinder responsible resource development in our country and make sure that Indigenous peoples could be heard in those moments and make their desires for increased market access for natural resources or pipeline development be known and ultimately make sure that they can share in the economic benefit of these projects.

Mr. Speaker, this fund helped the Woodland Cree First Nation to intervene in Alberta's constitutional challenge of the federal Impact Assessment Act in late February 2021. I'd also like to note that the litigation fund is also currently being used to support Fort McKay Métis Nation and Willow Lake Métis Nation's challenge to the federal Oil Tanker Moratorium Act. I know that the Minister of Energy looks forward to updating this Chamber on this important litigation in the future.

Mr. Speaker, our government is proud to back Indigenous communities to take legal actions that support their decisions to own, manage, and participate in natural resource development projects. We are working with Indigenous peoples to build a prosperous future that benefits all the people of Alberta. The court found in paragraph 315 that this legislative scheme . . .

referring to Bill C-69,

. . . permits the federal executive to stop intra-provincial designated projects authorized by a province or provincial authority even where agreements have been made by an Indigenous entity with either or both the provincial government and project proponent and with provincial approval again constitutes federal overreach. It also underscores that the true purpose of this legislative scheme is to empower the federal executive to veto intra-provincial designated projects based on its view of the public interest, not what is in the interests of the Indigenous entity involved, never mind the interests of the province in question and its citizens.

Additionally, the court also noted that all three appellate courts that heard the Greenhouse Gas References concluded that the federal government did not have the constitutional jurisdiction to regulate GHG emissions in a province.

The court found that the federal government does not have the right under the national concern doctrine to regulate GHG emissions generally within a province including from intra-provincial designated projects approved by that province, much less stop such projects from proceeding.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta's government followed through on our commitment to stand up for Albertans against the unjustified intrusion into provincial jurisdiction by the Trudeau government, better known as the Liberal-NDP alliance, which, it is important to make clear, is supported by the provincial NDP, who continue to support Ottawa's efforts to attack our largest industry. Alberta agrees with the Court of Appeal that the impact assessment goes against what the framers of our Constitution intended and is certainly not what provincial governments agreed to when they agreed to the patriation of our Constitution. This decision means that the impact assessment cannot be used by Canada in Alberta. The act is unconstitutional, and, in the opinion of the court, the federal government has overstepped its powers.

The Court of Appeal agreed, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government is needlessly overhauling a regulatory and environmental review process that is already one of the world's best, putting jobs and investment at risk. Alberta wants to see investment grow, not driven away by unbalanced, unpredictable new rules for large-scale infrastructure projects. Alberta stands by the principle that provinces are best situated to make policy decisions for our own unique economies and for our own citizens. The Ottawa-knows-best attitude of the federal government disrupts the constitutional balance of our federation, and it undermines our rights to manage our own affairs, and the Alberta Court of Appeal's decision is a major step in correcting this trend.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, the decision of the court is clear.

Where natural resources are involved, it is each province that is concerned with the . . . development of its natural resources, not the federal government. It is the province that owns those natural resources, not the federal government. And it is the province and its people who lose if those natural resources cannot be developed, not the federal government. The federal government does not have the constitutional right to veto and intra-provincial designated project based on its view of the public interest. Nor does the federal government have the constitutional right to appropriate the birthright and economic future of the citizens of a province.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear that this country cannot be a federation at all if this type of legislation is allowed to stand. The Liberal-NDP alliance must stand down now its weaponization of environmental law against our largest industries and respect the rights of provinces all across this country. Alberta will continue to vigorously defend our constitutional rights and the people of the great province of Alberta.

The Speaker: Hon. members, a member of the opposition has up to three minutes to respond to the ministerial statement. I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to reply. Now, as is customary in the Chamber, the Official Opposition did not receive any notice that there was going to be a ministerial statement, so my reply will be necessarily brief and necessarily unscripted.

However, I thank the government for bringing forward their analysis of the just-released decision. I thank them for providing the House with some of their commentary and some of their analysis. Of course, as intervenors they would have been provided some heads-up that the decision was coming. However, we as the Official Opposition did not benefit from that, so we are still reviewing the ABCA decision and how that decision lines up with the concerns that we brought through to the Senate of Canada through various means through our intergovernmental relations work through 2018 and '19, and we can provide further comment about that to this House at the appropriate time, Mr. Speaker.

There is no question that there were serious concerns both with the legislation and with the regulations that were ultimately gazetted in the summer of 2019, Mr. Speaker. That analysis was done, and we found many points of agreement with the current government in that analysis through the development of this legislation. There is no question that as we review the ABCA decision, we will do so through the lens of finding full value for our resources, getting our oil and gas products to market, and building an economy with good-paying jobs for Alberta's future, and that remains our focus.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to provide this reply to the ministerial statement.

Members' Statements

Unemployment, Wages, and Cost of Living

Mr. Deol: Mr. Speaker, the UCP likes to talk a lot about booms and swagger, but the reality is that Albertans are feeling the pinch. Despite the April job numbers showing an uptick, there are several concerning facts the UCP continues to ignore.

Alberta's unemployment rate is still higher than the national average, Calgary has the highest unemployment rate of any city in the country, and Alberta has the highest long-term unemployment rate in the country. Roughly 1 in 3 unemployed workers have been unemployed for six months or longer. At the same time, wages are failing to keep pace with inflation. In fact, Alberta has had the slowest wage growth in the country since the start of the pandemic, and investment and GDP are still below prepandemic levels.

Meanwhile the UCP piles on additional costs as half of Albertans are just $200 away from not meeting their financial obligations at the end of the month. Income taxes, property taxes, tuition, utilities, and auto insurance have all gone up because of this government. They are literally pushing Albertans to the brink. Rather than recognize these challenges, the UCP tells Albertans that everything is fine or that someone else is to blame, and rather than focusing on the needs of Albertans, the UCP is focused on themselves.

It is time for a government that puts Albertans first, one that puts more money in Albertans' pockets, creates good jobs, and helps hard-working Albertans get ahead. It is time for an NDP government.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Calgary Office Revitalization and Expansion Working Group Report

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, last month our party released a fully costed plan for revitalizing Calgary's downtown, a serious, quantified investment in tower conversion, small-business grants, and support for cultural events along with a world-class innovation district. So I was flabbergasted to read the government's report today, the one that's eight months late, to discover that the UCP is so far behind. No commitments. No funding. To the Premier: why is this report more about identifying an already-known problem than funding the solution, or, put another way, where's the money?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, can you feel that, what's in the air right now? Can you feel it? NDP hypocrisy. Not only did they chase away investment by the billions; right now in this province the unemployment rate: 5.9 per cent. The last time it was that low in Alberta, we had another Conservative government. We're cleaning up the mess that they left behind. We have a plan for the downtown of Calgary endorsed by the chamber of commerce. We have eminent people from across Alberta on that panel. We're reviewing it. Thank god the NDP are not in office anymore.

Ms Notley: There's a lot of hot air there, Mr. Speaker. What's not there is money.

In fact, the biggest number in this report is the number of task forces it recommends. This report was due in September, and after spinning in circles for a year, Albertans now have to wait for five more task forces. Mr. Speaker, this is a master class in dithering. They've kicked the can so far down the road, it's landed somewhere in Saskatchewan. Why is the UCP plan so short on action? Why do they care so little about the future of downtown Calgary?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, it is amazing that the NDP have such little regard for all the people that dedicated their time to put together that report as well as the Calgary Chamber of commerce, who resoundingly endorsed the report that came out, but let's talk about some more of these economic highlights. Albertans can look forward to the fact that they do not have an NDP government that is simply chasing away investment. Under that government, when it comes to diversification, they thought a good year for venture capital was $37 million. We had over $200 million in just the first quarter alone.

Ms Notley: Our downtown plan, $160 million; theirs, $5 million.

Now, another part of this report talks about a very important issue, the need to reinvest in social supports for the most vulnerable. At least they talk about it. News flash: if this UCP government, that's frozen benefits, slashed affordable housing, cut income support, and reduced rental supplements – to date the UCP have actively increased poverty, full stop. Rather than sending this report off to gather dust, as the minister promised today, will the Premier stand in the House today and reverse his cuts and increase funding to vulnerable Albertans?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we're proud of the work that our Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions as well as our Minister of Justice are doing to ensure safety across this province. The committee report that came through emphasized the fact that community safety in our downtown core is important long term.

This is the one thing I have to tell Albertans across this province. There's one thing as well. I mentioned earlier on. There's this thing in the air, Mr. Speaker – you can feel it – economic momentum in Alberta. We're forecasted to lead the country in growth. You can rest assured we will not let the NDP come back to destroy Alberta's economy.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition. Second set of questions.

Ms Notley: Let's turn down the panic meter just a little bit there, Mr. Speaker.

Child Care Affordability

Ms Notley: More and more Alberta families are struggling, and they need a government to act. A good start would be to aggressively cut child care fees in half using the new federal dollars. Now, the UCP claimed that the 50 per cent reduction would have happened already. However, according to a report today by the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives Alberta families won't see a full 50 per cent cut any time in 2022 or perhaps ever. Can the Premier explain how his UCP government found a way to miss the mark again when it comes to child care?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. What we're doing in terms of child care is exactly the opposite of what the members opposite did. We are not picking winners and losers. We are not telling parents where they can and cannot access support to accessible, high-quality early learning and child care. We have in fact met the parameters of our first year in this agreement with the federal government. We have seen child care fees reduced by, on average, 50 per cent in every single licensed space across this province in the centre of parents' choice.

Ms Notley: Well, in fact, according to the report this minister has not met her targets. She has, however, picked losers. This report indicates that the lowest income families are paying around $400 more. That's compared to the zero dollars they paid under our government. To the Premier: how on earth could you get $3.8 billion from Ottawa and still find a way to make the most vulnerable Alberta families pay more?

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, I will take the facts any day over the stories and spin being shared by a union-funded, left-wing think tank. Let me tell you what Alberta parents already know. Child care fees, on average, have been reduced by half, and right across this province, in the setting of parents' choice, parents are paying between $10 and $25 a day. And you know what? The most supports are being targeted to the parents who need it the most.

Ms Notley: Well, even if she was right, on average does not include Calgary. According to the report Calgary continues to have among the highest fees in Canada across all age groups under this Premier and this minister. Nearly every province and territory signing on to this plan has found a way to make the plan work. Instead of leading the pack in lowering costs, this minister ensures that Albertans continue to pay more, and this will hurt our economy. Why doesn't the Premier understand that his indifference to the child care issue has a real economic cost to the future of this province?

Ms Schulz: You know who's not listening to the NDP spin, Mr. Speaker? More than 90,000 parents right across this province who are benefiting from reduced child care fees in the centre and space of their choice. More than 90,000. This is a good plan. Why is it a good plan? Because it is not based on NDP ideology or spin. It is based on the feedback and the concerns that we heard from Alberta parents, child care operators, and educators right across this province; 90,000-plus parents think that this is a great deal for Alberta families. I wish the NDP thought it was as great as Alberta parents do.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Opposition for her third set of questions.

Government Policies and Cost of Living

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, over the weekend, if the Premier had picked up a copy of the Herald, he would have seen a column from economist Trevor Tombe. He wrote that we need a sensible solution to inflation. A very reasonable position, I think. In fact, he acknowledged the value of the gas tax deferral, but he also listed some other things the Premier could do right now to help take the pressure off struggling families, starting with reindexing the tax code to give back almost half a billion dollars to Albertans this year. Will the Premier take his advice – yes or no? – and why not if not yes?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to answer that question, but first I would like to ask the members of this House and the Leader of the Opposition: why is the opposition not celebrating and asking questions around our victory around Bill C-69? This is a great day for Alberta. This is a great day for Canada. This is a great day for wealth creation and prosperity for future generations.

Ms Notley: Wow. Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, some Albertans are under an exceptional amount of stress and don't have time to read the Court of Appeal because they can't pay for their groceries, and that's what they're focused on.

Now, Tombe recommends boosting the child and family benefit to get another $1,000 into the hands of families. He also notes that the government could reverse decisions to freeze benefits, which has seriously hurt the ability to buy food for vulnerable Albertans across this province. Why doesn't the Premier take some good, nonpartisan advice and help most vulnerable Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are taking action on affordability. We have come forward with the suspension of the fuel tax. We have an electricity rebate in process, in motion . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. We heard the question. Let's hear the answer.

Mr. Toews: . . . and we have a consumer protection mechanism for natural gas. But it's more than that. We inherited a fiscal train wreck from the members opposite. We inherited a fiscal situation that would have meant our programs would have been unsustainable. Future generations would not have benefited. We've taken action to make these programs more sustainable.

Ms Notley: For the moment, Mr. Speaker, these guys are still in power, so they have responsibility for their decisions. Now, Tombe notes two current government policies that have more to do with inflation than the carbon tax ever would: one, their decision to drive up tuition at colleges and universities; and two, the rising vehicle insurance premiums that this government is allowing big, profitable insurance companies to charge Alberta families. Those are this government's policies. Not mine, not Ottawa's; this government's. Why won't they stand up for Albertans and act to reduce their inflation?

Mr. Toews: We are taking action, Mr. Speaker. In fact, the members opposite brought in a carbon tax, pushing up costs on every Albertan, on every Alberta family. We're taking action. Bill 41, the bill we implemented about a year and a half ago to deal with the systemic issues driving up insurance costs, has flattened insurance . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. The Leader of the Opposition had the opportunity to ask the question. If she'd like another one, I invite her to do so when it's her turn.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, in the last year and a half, after implementing Bill 41, insurance premiums have declined by almost 1 per cent. When the NDP were in office, automobile insurance premiums didn't go down; they went up by 14 per cent.

Health Care System

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, one of the most telling examples of this government's skewed priorities on health care was their decision to fire Dr. Verna Yiu. This was a body blow to front-line workers who trusted and respected her leadership. The plan of the UCP was apparently to downplay what that would mean for the system, with the Minister of Health trying to claim that it was expected that Dr. Yiu would be leaving early when all the front-line health care workers I've spoken with were shocked by the decision. Did the Premier really believe that Albertans would buy their spin that firing Dr. Yiu with a year left in her contract was no big deal and that it wouldn't lead to further chaos in our public health care system?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To respond to the hon. member's question, of course, Dr. Yiu was a valued member of our health care system. But what I really believe is happening here is that they're trying to distract from their very, very poor record on health care. When we look back over the four years that they were in government, the wait times for a hip replacement under the NDP went from 204 days to 265 days. The wait for a knee replacement went from 238 days to 298 days.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, our record? This government's record is that in everything in health care they simply break the system and leave it to others to deal with the consequences. This week alone we're seeing lines of sick children waiting over an hour to be triaged at the emergency room, longer wait times for surgical procedures, ER doctors warning that people might lose their lives as a result of this situation that the government has allowed to develop on their watch. The Premier calls this par for the course; Albertans call it a crisis. When will this Premier actually take responsibility for the devastation his government has created in our health care system instead of attacking front-line workers, trying to discredit claims from Albertans who need critical health care? Why doesn't . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Minister of Health is trying to deal with all the situations that were left from the members opposite. As I was saying, the wait time for cataract surgery went up from 202 days to 320 days. The wait time for open-heart surgery went from 60 days to 98 days. They left us a mess that we're dealing with, and we are going to fix it.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, these excuses are pathetic, just like the Minister of Health and the Premier, who knew that their decision to fire Dr. Yiu after six years of exemplary service would cause further chaos in our system. They were given specific lines on how to respond to the question of the chaos it would create. Their solution: pretend that firing her with a year left in her contract was expected and make the laughable claim that hiring her created more chaos than firing her did. Can the Premier or this minister list the number of times that sick kids were forced to wait hours in the cold outside to get in an emergency room in '15, '16, 2017, '18? That's when we were in government; this is their record.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, I want to reiterate that we valued Dr. Yiu for the work that she did, particularly through the pandemic. That being said, we have committed to Albertans that we are going to fix the health care system. We know that we have some of the lowest capacity in all of the country, and that needs to be dealt with. The NDP had four years. They didn't deal with it; we will. As I said earlier, the NDP record speaks for itself; 204 days for a hip replacement under the NDP went to 265. I could go on and on.

Alberta at Work Initiative and Veterinarian Supply

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, the Alberta at work initiative is directly investing in programs to help get more Albertans back to work while also addressing the province's structural unemployment problem. Some of these labour shortages greatly affect rural Alberta and our agricultural sector. One of these critical labour shortages is the shortage of large-animal veterinarians in rural Alberta, which could threaten the sustainability of our agricultural sector. To the Minister of Labour and Immigration: what is Alberta's government doing to address the current shortages of large-animal veterinarians for future projected shortages?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the hon. member for that very important question. Alberta's government is investing $8.4 million to support the enrolment expansion of the University of Calgary Faculty of Veterinary Medicine. We are making a capital investment of $59 million to support the construction of new infrastructure to expand the veterinarian medicine program at the University of Calgary. This funding is part of the Alberta at work initiative, and it will double the amount of vets trained right here in Alberta, in return providing more opportunities for young Albertans who enter veterinary professions to support the workforce needs of businesses and communities.

The Speaker: The Member for Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for his answer. Given that in 2017 Alberta decided not to renew its funding agreement with the Western College of Veterinary Medicine in Saskatchewan and given that these investments are aimed to ensure Albertans can learn the skills and knowledge they need to meet the labour demands of tomorrow while addressing critical labour shortages, can the minister elaborate on the value of having access to training close to home with the help of these targeted investments?

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, the Alberta at work initiative is here to get Albertans back to work while also addressing Alberta's structural unemployment problem. To retain our skilled workers, we need to be able to provide them the skills, the training, and knowledge right here in our province. The expansion of the vet med school at the U of C does just that. Through this program we will be able to double the amount of veterinarians trained here in Alberta. By providing this training close to home, these graduates can find fulfilling careers right here in our province as we address this critical labour shortage.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again thank you to the minister for his answer. Given that we now know how the Alberta at work initiative will help address specific labour shortages such as the shortage of large-animal veterinarians and given that Alberta's government invested $600 million towards the Alberta at work initiative, can the minister expand on the other sectors Alberta's government is investing in and how this funding will help get Albertans back to work?

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, again I thank the hon. member for that very important question. We are investing a record $255 million through Advanced Education towards various supports for students. Through my own ministry Alberta's government is proud to invest $64 million over the next three years to support Alberta's workers to develop new skills and talents in our province. We believe every Albertan deserves the opportunity to participate in their communities and in the workplace, which is why we are investing $20 million to provide support for these Albertans.

Child and Youth Deaths during COVID-19 Pandemic

Mr. Deol: Mr. Speaker, Alberta saw a spike in excess deaths during the pandemic, and the rates for youth were high. A study recently published said that youth make up a large portion of non COVID-19 related deaths, including from the drug poisoning crisis. This data is important to shape public policy on how people are cared for. Following this sobering information, what will the UCP announce today so that we do not see tragic deaths of youth in this quantity again?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Any death of a young person is tragic, and our hearts go out to them, their families, all of the people that knew them. Reported COVID and overdose deaths account for the vast majority of the increases in deaths in the pandemic in Alberta, but there have likely been other deaths beyond the normal for a range of reasons. The AHS's paper gives rough estimates based on our assumptions about what would be normal in that period compared to other prior years. There is a wide range of methodologies to calculate excess deaths in the pandemic based on different assumptions and giving different results.

Mr. Deol: Given that the children's hospitals in Calgary and Edmonton are full and that young Albertans are struggling to get the care they need and given that there have been tragically high numbers of children dying in care and given that the drug poisoning crisis has taken the lives of young people at rates higher than ever, when will enough be enough for this UCP government? When will they stop the chaos in health care and guarantee that children will be able to access the care they need?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services has risen.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I've said before, the death of any child but especially a child who has been in the child intervention system is not only a tragedy, but it is, in fact, a call to action. My ministry: I did ask them to look into what we are seeing in this past year. Unfortunately, we have seen an increase of opioid- and addictions-related deaths. That is why we are working so closely with the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions to direct additional supports to help young people who need it. That work will continue. It's also going to take community partners working alongside us. That work is under way.

Mr. Deol: Given that more must be done to decrease the number of excess deaths in Alberta, especially young people, and given that the study does not have race-based information and that we know that racialized communities have more difficulties accessing government services in the health system, making this data essential, why is this government failing Albertans by refusing to collect race-based data?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Immigration and Multiculturalism.

Mr. Yaseen: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. First of all, the assumption in the question is totally baseless. We plan to address and we have addressed already a number of issues, and we plan to address the challenges of racism, including the collection of race-based data, through more efficient and collaborative methods and in a way that is considered in harmony with Albertans' privacy.

Utility Load Limiters

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe I have to stand in this Legislature and ask about people having their heat and electricity turned off at a time when utility bills have skyrocketed and the UCP has failed to deliver the meagre relief in the form of rebates that they promised. Now we're reading about Calgary families whose electricity and heat are being rationed, and families are going without. Can the minister explain why he believes people should go without heat and electricity because he can't do his job and people are waiting until next year for a meagre rebate?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. We recognize that the higher cost of utilities is having a burden on Albertans. That's why we put forward the electricity rebate that we did. Unfortunately, the caucus opposite actually voted against speeding up the legislative process. I mean, you can't make this stuff up. In addition to that, that's the same caucus that complains about the price of electricity. They don't even know the price of electricity. We have Albertans' backs. We've demonstrated that, and we'll continue to support them.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, given that families in Calgary are being put on what's called load limiters, which means they're being rationed, power is being withheld from families, and given that the nonprofit Harvest Hills Cares Calgary told the media that they have heard from hundreds of families who have had their utilities rationed and given that the media reported one family whose kids couldn't do school work on their laptops because it kept tripping this so-called load limiter, does the minister really think we should be denying kids an education because their parents can't cover utility bills in excess of 700 bucks a month? What is the explanation for this?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's unfortunate that there are some Albertans that are struggling from utility insecurity. The good news is that in that same article that member is referring to there are actually fewer people year over year experiencing utility insecurity. I can tell you this: since the member is aware of the utility insecurity, why didn't they speed up the passage of Bill 18, that would get electricity rebates into the pockets of Albertans that need them the most? Why don't they look at those cameras and tell Albertans why they're making them wait?

Ms Phillips: Now, Mr. Speaker, given that Harvest Hills Cares Calgary also heard from a senior dealing with a load limiter – that's rationing – who was unable to use their breathing machine and their microwave at the same time, seriously, and given that this senior was unable to use the machine they need to breathe and heat up food simultaneously, does the minister seriously believe that seniors facing UCP inflation and cost-of-living crises should have to choose whether they suffocate or starve? How is this allowed? Whose side is the minister on?

The Speaker: The hon. the associate minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I came into this House, and I asked everyone in this Chamber to give us unanimous consent so that we could speed up the passage of the rebate legislation, and on this side of the House . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On this side of the House you know how we voted. We voted to speed up the passage of that legislation. But that's not how they voted on that side of the House. They voted to slow down the legislative process and make Albertans wait, so I think they owe Albertans an answer. Why did they make them wait longer for the rebates? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hunter: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 2:16. The hon. Member for Taber-Warner raised it.

Executive Council Political Staff Communications

Mr. Loewen: Thanks to the hard work of investigative journalists, the public learned of serious allegations of a centrally co-ordinated effort by this Premier to circumvent the FOIP Act. In response to these allegations I have personally written to the Information and Privacy Commissioner to request an investigation. The allegations include direct instructions to delete e-mails, encouraging staff to use their personal cellphones for government business, and encouraging staff to use unsecured Internet messaging apps. All this begs the question: what exactly is this scandal-plagued Premier and his administration hiding from Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yet again what you see from the hon. member is similar to things that you see from his colleagues in the NDP opposition, who continued to put forward false allegations. In fact, I've lost count of how many false allegations . . .

Mr. Loewen: Point of order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: . . . that you get from the opposition, none of which, Mr. Speaker, after three years have ever been found to be true by the Chief Electoral Officer, by the Ethics Commissioner, on and on. This government takes FOIP very, very seriously. Our staff are trained to follow FOIP, and they are expected to follow FOIP.

Mr. Loewen: Given that our Legislative Assembly allocates significant taxpayer-funded resources to providing safe and secure communications and given that the reason we do so is to protect against the threat of information being intercepted, which prevents cabinet confidences from being breached by nefarious domestic or foreign interests, and given that we don't want the detailed itineraries of senior officials to be leaked as markets rise and fall on leaked and stolen information, can the Premier tell us why he would encourage his staff, just like Hillary Clinton did, to use private communications equipment?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Again, Mr. Speaker, the government and the Premier have made clear to all staff from day one of the government that they must comply with FOIP. That's the top priority of the government. All staff have received training on how to comply with FOIP, and the government takes it very, very seriously. [interjection] I hear the deputy leader of the NDP, who once in this Chamber famously said that she told all her staff to go to voice mode, so I don't think that she should be heckling inside this Chamber. Again, staff are expected to follow the FOIP law. They're trained to do so, and we expect them to do so.

Mr. Loewen: Given that that's not what the report said and given that FOIP is an essential part of ensuring transparency yet only 1 in 10 general requests were satisfied while 23 per cent of general requests can't be fulfilled due to a lack of records – go figure – and given that these latest allegations further betray the paranoid bunker mentality within this Premier's government and given damaging allegations that offices were given 24 hours' notice, providing an opportunity to delete e-mails, showing a complete disregard for transparency and ethics, please tell us why Albertans should trust a Premier that is once again setting the bar at a new low.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Again, Mr. Speaker, that was categorically false. Departments and ministerial offices are not given 24-hour notice about a FOIP. Staff are trained to do FOIPs underneath the law. They're expected to follow the law. That's been made clear by the government, and again anonymous Twitter trolls are not real allegations. This is the approach that you see from the NDP. That member and his NDP colleagues, who continue just . . .

Mr. Loewen: Point of order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: . . . to make things up, Mr. Speaker: it's very, very disappointing.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at both 2:19 as well as 2:17.

Diabetes Management Coverage

Member Irwin: Conor is six years old. He has type 1 diabetes; he relies on an insulin pump. Walker just turned eight. He has type 1 diabetes; he relies on an insulin pump. For both of these little boys and thousands of Albertans, access to an insulin pump is absolutely life saving, but in an unconscionable, indefensible decision this UCP government has cancelled the insulin pump therapy program. To the Premier: how, in any universe, can you stand up and brag about the economy when you're cutting critical life-saving supports for kids like Conor and Walker?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. You're absolutely right. We need to be concerned about our young people, and that's why we want to provide them with the newest technology. In phase 2 of this new program, the insulin pump therapy program, we have expanded coverage to provide continuous glucose monitors to children under 18 under supplementary health benefits. We estimate that more than 1,500 children will benefit from this expanded coverage, saving parents about $4,200 annually. Of course we care about our young people.

Member Irwin: Unbelievable.

Given that yesterday 25 Albertans came to speak out against the UCP's cruel cuts to the insulin pump program, just a small handful of the thousands of Albertans across our province who are going to be impacted by this despicable decision – they’re angry. They’re scared because they don’t know if they can continue with this life-saving treatment, yet those Albertans waiting in the gallery wanted an answer from the Premier. Nope. The environment minister laughed. To that minister: what exactly is so funny about Albertans losing their coverage for life-saving insulin pumps?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, again, this is ridiculous behaviour from the Official Opposition to refer to any member, saying . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. members of the opposition asked a question. The least they can do is to listen to the answer.

The Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Correct, Mr. Speaker. I certainly did not laugh at people that were in that situation. Assuming what conversations may or may not be taking place between me and colleagues on this side of the House is ridiculous, but that’s what you see from the Official Opposition.

The Premier was very, very clear yesterday, Mr. Speaker, about a significant process that is being undertaken to be able to help people that have found themselves in this situation. I want to thank the Premier and the hon. Minister of Health for taking that action and, through you, condemn the Official Opposition for continuing to play politics.

Member Irwin: Wow.

Given that it’s been a week since this government cruelly cancelled the insulin pump therapy program – and we’re all still waiting for any details. They have not released any information. This government is saying: just trust us. Albertans do not trust this government with health care. Children’s hospitals are at the brink of collapse. There are long lines of ambulances outside hospitals. Doctors are fleeing the province. Health care is in a crisis. Do the right thing for once. Please commit right now to restoring the insulin pump therapy program.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The members opposite need to know that these changes came after years of consultation and communication with diabetic Albertans and will deliver equitable coverage that includes non pump users. Numerous Albertans have written over the past years about the need for more options on insulin pumps and supplies, including newer technologies and advanced moderating devices like continuous glucose monitors. We’ve also heard from those who want equity in benefits coverage, including non pump users. Alberta Health engaged extensively with the insulin pump program’s clinical advisory committee before making decisions.

Calgary Office Revitalization and Expansion Working Group Report

Member Ceci: The UCP has finally released a report on revitalizing downtown Calgary. This comes after the Finance minister said that it wasn’t his job to help downtown Calgary and eight months after the report was supposed to be released. Upon reading it, many of the recommendations look a lot like the ones we put forward in our plan. However, the UCP has ridiculed many of these proposals, including the ones found in their own report. They’re opposed to supporting office conversion, they’ve cut affordable housing, and they’ve put barriers up to accessing mental health and addiction support. Does this mean that the UCP disagrees with their own plan?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, it must be difficult for the members opposite to stand up and ask questions on this topic, and you want to know why? Because when that member was Finance minister, the unemployment rate in Alberta skyrocketed. Right now in our province it is lower than at any point when that member was Finance minister. We have a report from the committee. It was well received by the chamber. We’re studying the report across government, with lots of opportunities for us to collaborate with all levels of government to make sure we have a vibrant, thriving downtown in Calgary. Albertans can rest assured that we’re not going to let the NDP chase away business again.

Member Ceci: Given that that member forgets there was a recession in Alberta and Canada and given that the UCP’s report on downtown Calgary is eight months late and still doesn’t have any funding attached to it except $5 million, that the CEO of the Calgary Chamber called a drop in the bucket and absolutely inadequate, and given that several of the recommendations appear to be directly lifted from our plan and given that our plan is costed, if the government is going to copy our work, can’t they at least properly cite Alberta’s NDP?

Mr. Schweitzer: When it comes to the economy, we’re not going to take advice from the no development party, the NDP. When you look at what’s happening across this province, Alberta has economic momentum. Those are words that were never – never – spoken ever in Alberta when the NDP were in office. That’s right, Mr. Speaker. Alberta has economic momentum. Alberta can rest assured that the NDP will not get back into office. We have their back. Jobs are being created right now in Alberta.

Member Ceci: Given that Alberta led GDP for two years under our watch and given that several of the recommendations from the UCP’s working group are to create more task forces to study parts of this issue even further – in other words, it’s a plan to make several plans – and given that this just means more delays and given that Calgary desperately needs support as the city continues to face the highest unemployment rate in the country and the office vacancy rate still sits around 30 per cent, why the constant delays? Or is the minister too busy getting his leadership campaign ready to help the city of Calgary, that he’s a member of?

Mr. Schweitzer: Oh, Mr. Speaker, it’s that time again. It’s time to resurrect the NDP legacy tour bus for Alberta. It is that time. When they were government, their Energy minister told Albertans: if you want a good job, you know what you should do? This is NDP advice: leave the province. Right now we’re seeing waves and waves of Canadians come to Alberta for opportunities. That is a fresh opportunity, stuff that we never heard ever when the NDP were in office. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Many Albertans are affected by diabetes, and this disease takes a ton of time and effort to manage, which is why, back in 2013, the Alberta government implemented the insulin pump benefits program to specifically support those with type 1 diabetes. The insulin pump automatically gives a small amount of insulin throughout the day and night to help control your blood sugar, without needing to give yourself several shots of insulin multiple times a day. To the Minister of Health: why was this program created in the first place, and has it been successful?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I cannot agree more than with the hon. member, because insulin pumps have been a game changer for so many Albertans with blood sugar control as they are easy and efficient. I want to assure the member, his constituents, and all Albertans that we are continuing to support diabetic Albertans. That's not only for right now but to ensure our programs are sustainable and can continue to provide devices for Albertans into the future, with the new technologies like the continuous glucose monitors and advanced insulin pumps, which so many have asked for. We're delivering.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that I've heard many stories of individuals whose lives have been drastically changed for the better once the insulin pump became available – the insulin pump provides flexibility for type 1 diabetics; before, they had to plan their entire schedule and meals around insulin, and now the insulin is delivered at the exact right moments without much thought – and given that some of my constituents are worried about the recent announcement that on August 1 the insulin pump program will be taken away, to the minister: why are we changing the benefit program, and who have we consulted on these changes? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. minister is the only one with the call.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. These changes come after years of consultation and communication with Albertans. We engaged extensively with the insulin pump program . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: No.

The hon. minister is the only one with the call.

Member LaGrange: We exchanged extensively with the insulin pump program's clinical advisory committee, all of whose members worked to make sure Alberta's diabetics get the care they need. Transferring from the insulin pump therapy program to government-sponsored health benefit plans like Blue Cross nongroup coverage means that we can now cover a new generation of insulin pumps in the third part of our three-phase plan, building on our expansion of coverage for diabetes test strips . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The insulin pump works fantastic because with this pump people can plan insulin around their lives rather than planning their lives around insulin. Given that just last week the Alberta government announced that this program will be discontinued come August 1 and given that the replacement for this program will be the government-sponsored health benefit plan but many of my constituents are worried about the lack of details about what this plan will cover, to the Minister of Health: can you provide details on what will be covered, what the cost to diabetic Albertans will be on a monthly and yearly basis?

2:30

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. We expect that the vast majority of the 4,000 Albertans in the program will continue to receive coverage through existing government and private plans. About 60 per cent already have private coverage, and about 30 per cent are already enrolled in Blue Cross. About 500 low-income Albertans will continue to receive coverage under Alberta adult health benefits at no cost to themselves. No cost. None of this happens before August 1. Premiums for Blue Cross nongroup coverage are $63.50 per month for a single Albertan.

Edmonton Remand Centre Emergency Services

Mr. Sabir: Paramedics at Edmonton Remand Centre, Canada's largest prison, will no longer be on-site as of June 1. Paramedics are qualified to handle crisis situations, trauma response, and overdose from drug poisoning, which is tragically becoming more common. Other medical staff at the Remand Centre believe this is a dangerous decision because paramedics are better equipped to respond and are a key part of the medical team. Why is the UCP removing paramedics from the Remand Centre, where they serve a critical, life-saving role?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Ellis: Oh, sorry.

Member LaGrange: No. Go ahead.

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, thank you. I apologize if I did not quite understand the member's question here, but the pandemic and related public health restrictions, of course, have caused increased harms from the illness of addiction in jurisdictions throughout North America, including Alberta, and it's no exception. You know, we're focused on addressing the cause of fatalities in opioids related to EMS calls, the illness of addiction, and we want to make sure that – and that's why we created the 8,000 new spaces for people with addiction and mental health concerns. We've removed all user fees, and we've expanded the virtual opioid dependency program.

Mr. Sabir: Given that EMS is over capacity as is and Albertans from every corner of the province wonder if they can receive an ambulance when they need one and given that emergency room wait times are increasing as well and Red Deer had 14 ambulances lined up outside the ER two weeks ago, the need for preventative and immediate measures to avoid more ambulance trips is clear. Why is the Minister of Health putting more demand on ambulances by removing on-site paramedics from the Remand Centre? I hope the question is clear this time.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just want to inform the members opposite that they are incorrect in their assumptions because there will be no reduction in services or staff at the Edmonton Remand Centre. Alberta Health Services is aligning its correctional health services at the Edmonton Remand Centre with the rest of the province to ensure patients have access to the most appropriate care. In fact, they will have registered nurses instead of paramedics in those roles. They will have enhanced care because those registered nurses actually have a broader range of spectrum of care that they are able to provide for those individuals.

Mr. Sabir: Given that many nurses do not understand why paramedics are being removed from the prison and given that the United Nurses of Alberta are in the process of filing concerns over this decision, it is clear that the UCP did not consult with them. Removing paramedics from the Remand Centre is opposed by the paramedics and nurses and could put more strain on the health care system and result in the deaths of people at the Remand Centre, so who did the UCP work with to create this plan? Why are you ignoring paramedics and nurses?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, again, registered nurses have a broader scope of practice than paramedics and will help enhance patient education, support for patients following release, and the ability to connect patients to additional treatment such as opioid dependency treatment and other recovery-based treatments and services for patients at the Edmonton Remand Centre. Impacted paramedic employees are going to be offered other positions with AHS emergency medical services under their collective agreement. Again, there is no impact to the level of care.

Disability Worker Wages AISH and Income Support Payments

Ms Renaud: This pandemic showed us many everyday heroes who went above and beyond to do their jobs and serve Albertans during difficult times. One group that doesn't get enough credit for their work is disability workers, whose work with disabled Albertans deserves the gratitude of us all. Instead, what they're getting is a crisis. The Alberta Disability Workers Association has warned that they're facing a staffing crisis because too many are unable to make ends meet with their salaries, forcing them to take on other jobs or even leave the sector. To the minister: how long is the minister prepared to let this crisis develop before acting?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services is rising.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I do want to thank disability workers right across this province. We know the last two years throughout the pandemic were extremely challenging, and we're grateful for the important work that they do. You know, our government is committed to providing a work environment where all employees are safe and treated with respect and dignity, and that includes our disability workers. I know that that's something that this government is committed to with the Minister of Community and Social Services as well.

Ms Renaud: Given that it's not just the workers who are struggling but the individuals that they work with – they're also feeling the real consequences of this government's inaction and lack of support – and given that we've heard reports from families who are concerned about the absence of supports, long wait times, and changing contracts that are leaving families behind and given that the Alberta Disability Workers Association is calling on this government to increase wages so that they can retain and attract staff that disabled Albertans rely on to live, can the minister explain why he or she has failed to listen to the concerns of disability workers?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services is rising.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Community and Social Services is working with the disability services sector and partner ministries to improve recruitment and retention strategies for the disability services sector. We did provide a grant to the Alberta Council of Disability Services to collect and analyze data. In addition, we continue to provide funding to service providers to enable them to put together solid compensation packages for their front-line and very important staff.

Ms Renaud: Given that there has been no wage adjustment – disability workers are leaving the sector; they can't afford to feed their families with what they're being paid – and what we're getting is a plan to consult to consult and given that all the minister can do is compare Alberta supports to other provinces, which does nothing to resolve the disability worker crisis, and given that the minister of social services failed to stand up for disabled Albertans in the budget by not reindexing basics, that would have been the basic thing to do, will he commit to ending the cuts to AISH and income supports and delivering a wage increase to disability workers before the session is out? People are hurting right now.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The members opposite know full well that the AISH budget increased by $12 million. They know that the Community and Social Services budget increased by $36 million this year. They know that the disability services budget is $1.4 billion, which is an increase of $61 million. We're providing an additional $34 million to enhance career and employment services to support Albertans looking for jobs, to help people get back on their feet, and our partnerships with FCSS programs help people adopt healthy lifestyles right across this province. We will continue to support those most in need.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Kinship Care

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We know that it is important to keep children connected to their families, communities, and culture wherever possible. For Indigenous children in particular it is important that children are with people familiar with the child's own cultural practices and traditions. I know a number of families that give of their lives to serve in this way. To the Minister of Children's Services: what is kinship care, and why is it a focus of your ministry?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. When a child comes into the child intervention system, our first priority is keeping families together whenever safely possible. Kinship care is a good alternative for kids that cannot safely remain with their immediate family, which, of course, would be our first option. However, these children are placed with caregivers that have a family relationship or connection to the child. For Indigenous children kinship care protects the child's connection to their family, their community, their culture. By investing in kinship care, more Indigenous children in our care will be taken care of according to traditional practices.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that we know the importance of keeping families together, especially in the case of young siblings, and given the need for children to develop pride in their personal identity alongside familial and community belonging and further given this key role that kinship caregivers can play in Indigenous families and communities, to the same minister: how are you improving care and supporting kinship care providers?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Now, this move to kinship care was one of the recommendations from the all-party panel on child intervention. As part of our investment to providing care that keeps children connected with their families, cultures, and communities, we know we're going to continually need to review and improve these supports. For example, we're providing $900 to kinship caregivers for initial and ongoing costs, welcoming a child into their home, recognizing that these are often stressful and emergency situations. We want to make sure that those families are ready, willing, and able to support children in need. We're improving how staff are trained so they understand how to successfully work with kinship caregivers, and we're adopting a timelier and more culturally appropriate home assessment practice.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again to the minister. Given that children do better when connected to their extended families, communities, and culture and that having these important aspects provides foundational relationships for their best futures and given that when a child comes into care, the ministry's primary focus is to find the best placement to meet the child's needs, to the Minister of Children's Services: how many children are receiving kinship care compared to other forms of placement?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Children do better when they are connected to their culture, their extended family, and their communities. Our continued commitment to kinship care has resulted in a greater number of children placed in kinship homes compared to foster homes. As of December in 2021 the number of kinship care homes has gone up to 2,422. This has surpassed the number of foster homes, at 1,674. This number continues to increase, which is important because we know, again, the importance of keeping kids connected to their families, their culture, and their community.

The Speaker: Hon. members, this concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will return to the remainder of Members' Statements.

The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to advise the Assembly that pursuant to Standing Order 7(8) the daily Routine may continue beyond 3 p.m.

Members' Statements

Federal Impact Assessment Act

Mr. Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, I'm happy to speak about Alberta's historic victory today over the federal government's no-more-pipelines law, Bill C-69. This morning the Alberta Court of Appeal released their decision on Alberta's constitutional challenge of C-69, blasting the federal government in a 4-1 decision for their overreach into provincial jurisdiction and their attack on Alberta resource industries.

Mr. Speaker, I want to put on record a few of the court's statements. They said that C-69 "constitutes a profound invasion into provincial legislative jurisdiction and provincial proprietary rights," a clear statement that this Legislature, not Ottawa, has the right to regulate our resources. The court went on to say that for Ottawa to have implemented C-69, it would have represented "the centralization of the governance of Canada to the point this country would no longer be recognized as a real federation." It cannot be overstated how significant this is. In addition, the highest court in Alberta has sent a message to Ottawa that the federal government does not have the "right to appropriate the birthright and economic future of the citizens of a province."

Mr. Speaker, when Canada repatriated our Constitution, in 1982, Premier Lougheed made sure that he included the promise of Alberta's right to control our own resources. This government has defended that promise. Ottawa will surely try to appeal, and Alberta will again defend our rights with the support of Alberta's highest court. I am confident that we will win again.

Mr. Speaker, when the NDP were in office, Alberta's constitutional rights were bulldozed by Justin Trudeau, and the NDP stood by and did nothing. Under this United Conservative government that will never happen again. The attack on Alberta's resource industries from the NDP-Liberal coalition stops here. It stops today. That message is what we send to Ottawa.

Housing Prices and Affordability

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, we have come to know and embrace the Alberta advantage as fundamental to Alberta's success. Recognized in different ways by each of us, for most it is about the advantages we possess in attracting people and investment while creating a sense of the spirit of inclusive opportunity we offer to Canadians and new immigrants alike. We have so much to be proud of in our province, from the beauty of our lakes, mountains, forests, foothills, and prairies to the blessings we enjoy from a bounty of natural resources and the drive, work ethic, entrepreneurial and community spirit of long-time residents and newcomers alike.

But, Mr. Speaker, we all need a roof over our heads and appropriate, affordable, and well-located housing in which to live, thrive, and grow. We are currently witnessing the challenges faced by individuals and families in other parts of our great country, and the pressure is right here in our own backyard. Housing affordability has and must continue to be seen by us as government and legislators and indeed all Albertans as a vital pillar of the Alberta advantage, now and into the future. We all have a part to play in ensuring housing affordability wherever Albertans may be on the housing continuum.

As our government remains focused on building upon our encouraging economic recovery, we must continue our commitment to health and social programs, diversification, innovation, and competitiveness, all well supported by housing choice and affordability. To attract businesses and investment, we must attract talented and ambitious people and their families by offering an enviable lifestyle and the opportunity to make a good living while building a good life. Mr. Speaker, let's keep our collective eye on the pressures we may face as we move back to a robust economy and strong net migration and ensure we work together on land and housing supply and tax and levy burdens as we recognize that, at the end of the day, it is owners and renters that not only drive our economy but prove that we can do so while ensuring the Alberta advantage is more about people than GDP.

Thank you.

Calgary Downtown Revitalization

Member Ceci: In January of last year our leader spoke to the Calgary Chamber of commerce and promised to come back with a plan to revitalize the city's downtown, and we delivered. Last month we released our plan to revitalize the downtown core, that has reached office vacancy rates not seen since the Great Depression. Our strategy, titled Bringing New Energy to Downtown Calgary, focuses on economic diversification, the creation of an innovation district, the direct funding to support the city of Calgary's greater downtown plan. Our strategy also proposes support for small businesses, events and festivals, public realm improvements, transit, more child care spaces and affordable housing units downtown, and support for mental health and addictions.

The UCP has repeatedly ridiculed our plan while offering no solutions of their own except for providing a paltry $5 million in their latest budget. Instead, all they've done is delay. After the Finance minister said that there'd be no help for downtown Calgary, the government reversed course and promised to release a plan by September of last year. Month after month went by and nothing. It took them another eight months to finally release their report, only to find out that many of the recommendations are eerily similar to ours. But the government still has to review and decide which ones to implement, if any, and there still isn't any funding attached to these proposals.

Meanwhile the office vacancy rate continues to hover around 30 per cent, and Calgary has the highest unemployment rate out of any city in the country. Calgarians can't afford any more delays. In fact, they can't afford this government. Too much is at stake. If they are looking for a plan to revitalize downtown Calgary, we have one ready and waiting to be implemented. Go to our website.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Strathmore.

Domestic Violence Survivors

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Can we please talk about coercive control and abuse and needed support for women to leave and to hold perpetrators accountable when they abuse? My dear friend Karen Gosbee, who is in the gallery today, is a survivor of 23 years of coercive control and domestic violence and courageously shared her story and advocacy for victims when she wrote A Perfect Nightmare: My Glittering Marriage and How It Almost Cost Me My Life. Quote: "There was a nonfatal strangulation attempt with guns in the house. Karen called 911 to protect herself and the children. That resulted in George freaking out even more and raving about how he would never be given the Order of Canada now despite the countless awards he had received over the years, including the Queen Elizabeth II silver jubilee medal from Premier Redford and many others. But the Order of Canada: that's the one that he coveted. And being found out as a domestic abuser would have ruined his chances. That's what was most important and what he was concerned about."

Strangulation is a predictor for future lethal violence. Victims are 750 per cent more likely to die at the hands of their abusers, and 80 per cent of women never even come forward. Mr. Speaker, it is individuals like Karen Gosbee that have the biggest impact on change, and she has contributed her advocacy to fellow survivors of coercive control and abuse. Quote: "Before I came forward, I," Karen, "was told by influential male leaders not to reveal I was a domestic abuse survivor because my advocacy would be discredited." End quote.

We are the elected leaders with the power to make decisions to make change. Maintaining one's power and control, whether that's physical or coercive control, is abuse when one's rights are sacrificed to uphold their own. When we come forward, Mr. Speaker, why do we lose power? When we speak the truth, they will try to shut us up through intimidation and bullying. We need to listen and provide opportunity and resources for women to have the courage to come forward and make real change.

Thank you.

Justice System Funding and Access

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, we are all elected to this Chamber to serve Albertans, and the most fundamental way that we do this is by creating and supporting a justice system that is accessible, fair, and, most importantly, just. Albertans deserve a justice system that treats all Albertans equally and with respect and dignity, but over the last three years the UCP has shown that this is not the priority for them.

The UCP, since taking office, has slashed the Justice budget by over $200 million, and it doesn't stop there. During their time in office the UCP has made it harder to access the justice system. They have imposed deep cuts to wraparound supports needed for a functional and effective justice system. They have cut victims of crime supports. They are making changes to Alberta's legal aid system that are opposed by the legal community and will further make it difficult to access justice for many Albertans. They ignore the calls of municipalities to drop their costly provincial police force idea. They are silent on the rising gun crimes and gun violence in Calgary.

Albertans are losing trust in this government, but this is what we can expect from a Premier and government that thinks they are above the law. They fired the Election Commissioner who was investigating them. Their Justice minister attempted to interfere in the administration of justice, and rather than sanction this behaviour, the Premier chose to reward it with a new cabinet post. They work overtime to try and silence the voices of the opposition and Albertans who oppose their agenda.

This is a government that claims to be tough on crime, but that's a talking point only since they are doing absolutely nothing to address crime and its root causes. Albertans deserve a government that addresses crime and its root causes and understands the rule of law and lives every day to uphold it, and the Alberta NDP is prepared to be that government.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Hemochromatosis Awareness Month

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my privilege to rise in this House today to acknowledge and welcome Liz and Deborah from the Canadian Hemochromatosis Society. The month of May is Hemochromatosis Awareness Month, and this year marks the 40th anniversary of this society. At the beginning of the month Liz launched her cross-Canada awareness tour, starting in Victoria, with Elsie the Bus. Liz is travelling across Canada, with Alberta stops here in Edmonton and in Calgary.

Hemochromatosis, or iron overload, is Canada's most common genetic disorder. As a result, so many people may not know that they could have it, and that's why awareness is so important. Early detection of this disorder could prevent so many Canadians from having serious life complications.

That's why people like Liz Charyna and Deborah Storlien-Cundy, both in attendance here today from the society, will be spending time over the next four months stopping in many towns and cities to help raise awareness of this disorder. They are here today in our beautiful Legislature, and I encourage all members to take time to say hello and thank them for their hard work. Their dedication, time, and effort to raise awareness for this disorder is amazing. The tour started earlier this month in Victoria and will be heading to St. John's, Newfoundland, and back.

Liz told me that they are celebrating a wide variety of things as they stop to speak to Canadians: celebrating early diagnosis, celebrating the people learning to live with hemochromatosis and knowing that they are not alone, celebrating the physicians and other health care providers who recognize the symptoms of hemochromatosis in their patients and provide treatment, and celebrating all the friends, members, and volunteers of chapters of the Canadian Hemochromatosis Society across Canada.

With the month of May being important for so many other disorders and diseases, it's important that some like hemochromatosis aren't lost in the shuffle. Thank you again to Liz and Deborah for taking the time to stop in and visit our Legislature today. The work you do is so amazing, and without you so many Canadians might not know they have a disorder like this one.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Economic Recovery and Job Creation

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I had mentioned in this House before, unemployment is a scary thought for anyone and, sadly, a reality for some. Our government cares about Albertans, and we are doing what we can to ensure that Albertans have a chance and opportunity to work and provide for themselves and their families. Despite a world-wide pandemic unemployment in Alberta is lower today than it was under the NDP.

While job creation throughout the rest of the country has come to a halt, this has not been the case for Alberta; in fact, it's been quite the opposite. Our province had created 16,000 jobs just in April alone. This marks six consecutive months of job gains in Alberta. Since the UCP took government, we have seen Alberta's unemployment rate drop, and just last week it dropped once again to 5.9 per cent. This is the lowest unemployment rate our province has had since 2015. Alberta's recovery plan is continuing to prove its success.

Our province is building momentum, diversifying, and gaining strength, all while leading the country in overall employment rate. The only thing that's holding us back is our labour shortage, which we are addressing through the Alberta at work program. Mr. Speaker, this program is taking action to help Albertans not only find jobs but to build skills and advance their careers as well. This program strengthens our province's K to 12 education system, supports access to training and career development opportunities, helps out-of-work Albertans get back into the workforce, with many other steps to benefit Alberta's workforce and point our province towards economic growth.

Mr. Speaker, we know how important economic growth is in our province, but does the opposition understand its importance? While the NDP mock red tape reduction, campaign on higher taxes for Albertans, and support long, full lockdowns in this province, our government's approach has been quite different and points Alberta towards a brighter and more secure future. Our government aims to cut red tape, has lowered the corporate tax rate, is creating jobs, and is making Alberta the most competitive economy to invest in. This plan puts Alberta in line for both short- and long-term economic growth. Our recovery plan is working. Alberta is back.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland Constituency Priorities

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I still consider myself an interloper and a newbie when it comes to politics. I don't feel that this is a detriment, however, to my constituents because, in fact, because of that, I ask more questions. One of the simple questions I ask the most often is: what matters to you? That typically gets the ball rolling.

I host interactive town halls in person and online. School board chairs, town mayors, county reeves, councillors, chambers of commerce are in attendance, and these folks get to sit up front with me in the hot seat so people in the audience can see that we work, we ask, and we interact in the province. There's no script. It's wide open, open mic when you come to a "what matters to you?" town hall. Folks get to hear about some of the great things that the government has done and that we're working on. They also get to hear about what their MLA has been up to on keeping our commitments and getting some status updates on the projects.

Corporate media doesn't cover the good news very well. Fear and conflict seems to sell more clicks. I faithfully write articles in a local newspaper to discuss the issues at our town halls, and the response has been extremely positive. Here's what I'm hearing from a lot of Albertans.

The economy. They like the economic corridors. They like the corridor authority concept. They like the balanced budget, low taxes, economic diversification. They need lower costs of input. Inflation is killing us.

Mental health supports for our youth. There's a bright future ahead for the youth, and we don't hear that very often. They need us to help deliver that message of the good things that are happening out there.

COVID response. The REP program tore the communities apart, and it's up to us to ensure that that never happens again.

Real health care reforms. Not window dressing, not more of the same, not the rhetoric of American-style health care scare tactics. Don't throw more money at it; actually get to the root of the problem and make it cost-effective, delivering quality service.

And they don't want any more socialist governments, quite frankly. They had enough of that.

They sure as heck have seen what the bromance down in Ottawa is doing, and they're done with it. They want more autonomy for the province, and Bill C-69 being turned down today by our courts is showing that.

We've got a year left, so let's make it happen.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Are there tablings? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you. I have the requisite number of copies of an article I quoted in my private member's motion yesterday, Alberta Municipal Gov't Labour Costs Out of Touch with Reality, by Franco Terrazzano.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley is rising for a tabling.

Mr. Loewen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to rise and table the story Inside the Kenney Government's System of Secrecy, that I referred to in my questions today, about the attempt to obstruct the FOIP Act.

The Speaker: Of course, the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley would never use the proper name even if he was quoting a newspaper article.

Does he have other tablings, or is that all?

Mr. Loewen: Yes. One more. I'll table the letter I sent the Information and Privacy Commissioner in regard to that information.

3:00

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've shared with the public here recently my own personal story, my health history of the vaccine injury. With that, it seemed to have popped a bit of a bubble. I have tablings here with the requisite copies of a number of individuals. Ken Hiller is one of them who had more issues with that. He's lost mobility in his arm. He had a bunch of other health issues. I have that for Mr. Ken Hiller.

I have another one here for Ms Char Barnier. Again, similar type items: having health care issues, has lost control of her arm, has had issues with heart complications, has lost time at work as well and also with a daughter who's lost employment as a nurse.

I have another tabling here of Michelle Merrett. Again, similar type of items. She works in a stressful organization, her normal work. She is now suffering from brain fog, suffering from tons of pains, aches, uncontrolled items that are still yet to be fully recognized and speaks to the process of having the federal government recognition of vaccine injuries.

I have another tabling from Lorna Kennedy. This one is talking about lymphatic issues that were brought on by it, talking about some of the other pains and aches in the legs and hands. Again, similar items with the brain fog. Her husband then had heart conditions and heart issues since that.

I'll have some more tablings for tomorrow, sir.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. At 2:16 the Member for Taber-Warner rose on a point of order, and the Deputy Government House Leader will be arguing on his behalf.

Point of Order Remarks off the Record

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We were doing so well leading up to this day with no points of order this week. However, at 2:15 the Member for Taber-Warner called a point of order. At the time the Associate Minister of Natural Gas and Electricity was answering a question from the opposition. It was quite a raucous moment in the Chamber. The comment was overheard: you're a clown. The point of order was called on the Member for Edmonton-Decore, but the reality is that I cannot confirm whether that was, in fact, the case. I did hear the comment.

I do believe this is a point of order under 23(h), (i), and (j). If whoever said that comment did in fact say it, which I believe they did, hopefully, they'd recognize how inappropriate it is and apologize, but I'll leave the rest in your hands, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Deputy Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I certainly didn't hear it and the Deputy Government House Leader didn't hear it, but I can agree that if any member has called the minister of natural gas a clown, at least in this Legislature, that would be offside the House rules, but I didn't hear it.

The Speaker: Hon. members, as you know, remarks that do not appear on the public record do not invite an intervention by the Speaker, House of Commons Procedure and Practice, 624. However, I do concur with both the Deputy Opposition House Leader and the Deputy Government House Leader that if anyone did call the minister a clown, the honourable thing would be to apologize and withdraw. I consider the matter dealt with and concluded.

At approximately 2:17 the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley rose on a point of order and then again at 2:19. I'm not sure if they are two separate incidents or if they can be combined, but I'll call upon him now.

Point of Order Allegations against a Member

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Yes. I called a point of order on 23(h), (i), and (j), "makes allegations against another Member; imputes false or unavowed motives to another Member; [and] uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder." Now, I don't have the benefit of the Blues, but the nearest I can figure what the Government House Leader said was: "continued to put forward false allegations . . . I've lost count of how many false allegations" we get from opposition, "none of which, Mr. Speaker, after three years have ever been found to be true."

The Government House Leader knows full well that the allegations regarding the unethical FOIP actions of the Premier have been made by staff in the government, some current staff and some previous staff. Now, I'm hoping that he's not calling these staff liars in this case, but he also did say that this was coming from "anonymous Twitter trolls." Now, I'm going to suggest that he's not calling government staff anonymous Twitter trolls or calling Charles Rusnell or Jennie Russell, those investigative journalists that come up with this information, Twitter trolls also.

As far as "none . . . have ever been found true" in his comments, I wanted to mention just a couple of instances. There was the sky palace party, where the Premier clearly denied anything went wrong there for multiple days and then finally admitted guilt. In fact, I think what he said at the time was that he actually had staff go back and measure the distance between the chairs, and they were actually less than two metres, which obviously made it that it was actually a fact that it was an issue and he was guilty there.

I also want to point to the kamikaze campaign, where the Premier said he knew nothing about the financing. Of course, then there are stories come out where the Premier did know about the financing. Of course, there was a couple hundred thousand dollars . . .

The Speaker: I am certain that the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley is aware that points of order are not to be used to prolong debate. I assume the point of order is with respect to the language around false allegations. I don't think we have time this afternoon to defend, argue, debate all sorts of things that may or may not have happened in the past. If the member has any other specific allegations or concerns around the point of order with respect to that language, I'm happy to hear them. If not, we'll be moving on to the government.

Mr. Loewen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, the accusation that they were false allegations is not true. The suggestion that there has never been in three years any allegations to be found true is also incorrect. I ask that the member apologize and withdraw.

Mr. Schow: Mr. Speaker, this is, of course, a matter of debate. There's a lot to unpack from the statements made from the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley, none of which rise to the threshold of a point of order. He said himself in his remarks that none of this has been substantiated. These are all allegations made by members of the public, none of which have been proven true. While the Member for Central Peace-Notley may not like the comments from the Government House Leader, I certainly don't believe they rise to the level of a point of order.

The Speaker: I would agree. This is a matter of debate and not a point of order. I consider the matter dealt with and concluded.

At 2:19 the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley rose on an additional point of order. I'm happy to hear that now should he choose to do so.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order, 23(h), (i), and (j) again. On the quote from the House leader – again I don't have the benefit of the Blues, but as near as I can recall it was, "That member and his NDP colleagues, who continue just . . . to make things up." Now, of course, this isn't true. There's no relationship with myself and the NDP. In fact, I brought this up before when I was tabling documents on March 31, to which the Government House Leader became very agitated. I guess he doesn't like to be called out when he lacks truth in his statements and comments, but he did have to apologize and withdraw twice over that incident on March 31. I was just going to suggest the best way for the Government House Leader to avoid situations where facts are laid out that prove he is incorrect is to start telling the truth. It's easy.

Thank you very much.

Mr. Schow: Well, Mr. Speaker, before I begin arguing this point of order – rather, against it – I would say that points of order should not be used as an opportunity to call the House leader a liar in however creative a way that may be. Suggesting that he "lacks truth in his statements" would indirectly be saying that, but we'll move on from that.

Mr. Speaker, in this Chamber we are all colleagues. Whether we're on the same party, same benches, or opposite sides, we are, in fact, colleagues working on behalf of the people of Alberta. To suggest that there is a problem, that saying "the Member for Central Peace-Notley and his NDP colleagues" is offensive – I can't speak for the hon. Government House Leader, but to say "the Member for Central Peace-Notley and his colleagues" is not a point of order. However, if that member is concerned about the perception of siding with the NDP, then I would suggest that he would stop playing petty politics and stop siding with them on important issues regarding this province. Siding with members who are closely seated to him would not be in his best interest if he doesn't want to be associated with such a caucus.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I do believe that this is a matter of debate and is certainly not something that should be a point of order.

The Speaker: I thank you for both of your interjections.

I do have the benefit of the Blues.

That's been made clear by the government, and . . . anonymous Twitter trolls are not real allegations. This is the approach that you see from the NDP. That member and his NDP colleagues, who continue just . . . to make things up, Mr. Speaker: it's very, very disappointing.

I will say that the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley ought to know that trying to find the most creative way possible, whether it's in point of order debate or regular debate, to call another member of the Assembly a liar is unparliamentary, just as it is and I have made many comments about making allegations that certain members, specific members, are making things up.

I would encourage both members to consider the caution appropriately. This is not a point of order. I consider this matter dealt with and concluded.

Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 17 Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Chair: This is the bill's first time in Committee of the Whole. I see the hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration standing to speak.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Madam Chair. I am very pleased to rise and speak to Bill 17 in Committee of the Whole. As I have shared with members previously, Bill 17 introduces changes that would improve Albertans' access to bereavement and reservist leaves and maintain the status quo at postsecondary institutions. Job-protected leaves like bereavement leave and reservist leave allow employees to take time away from work to attend to personal matters without fear of losing their job. To show compassion to parents grieving the loss of an unborn child, bereavement leave will be expanded to include employees who experience a miscarriage or stillbirth as the bill is currently drafted.

Madam Chair, there has been a lot of discussion with stakeholders and in this House on bereavement leave and the proposed changes to it. I thank the various stakeholders and members of this House for their thoughtful contributions to this debate so far.

Madam Chair, I do want to thank my colleague the hon. Member for Sherwood Park for his private member's bill that inspired Bill 17. The hon. Member for Sherwood Park consulted with stakeholders and partners who have invested a lifetime in pregnancy loss supports across our province. I would also like to thank them for sharing their experiences with us.

Madam Chair, I also want to offer my sincere thanks and recognize Ms Aditi Loveridge, founder and chief executive officer of the Pregnancy and Infant Loss Support Centre, for the work she and her organization do on a daily basis and her critical advocacy on this issue to see that this is a really good bill.

In response to debate in this Assembly as well as feedback from these stakeholders and as I committed in this Assembly, I would like to introduce an amendment to the sections of the bill that address bereavement leave, and I do have the requisite copies here, Madam Chair.

The Chair: I'll just wait for a copy, and then I'll have you read it into the record.

Hon. members, this will be known as amendment A1.

Hon. minister, please proceed to debate.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be amended as follows: section 1(5) is amended in the proposed section 53.983(2) by striking out clauses (b) to (d) and substituting the following:

- (b) the pregnancy of the employee ends other than as a result of a live birth;
- (c) the pregnancy of the employee's spouse or common-law partner ends other than as a result of a live birth;
- (d) the pregnancy of another person ends other than as a result of a live birth and the employee would have been a parent of a child born as a result of the pregnancy.

With this amendment the legislation would provide the broadest approach possible to address any situation where pregnancy ends other than in a live birth regardless of the reason or timing for the end of the pregnancy.

To be clear, Madam Chair, miscarriage and stillbirth are still covered, and employees experiencing miscarriage or stillbirth will be eligible for bereavement leave. Instead of naming miscarriage or stillbirth specifically, if this amendment is accepted, the legislation would use more general terminology to make it clear that any employee experiencing pregnancy loss is eligible for bereavement leave.

Madam Chair, pregnancy loss is a very difficult and highly personal circumstance. Employees experiencing any kind of pregnancy loss should be able to access bereavement leave without having to share the details of their circumstance with their employers. Once again, I would like to also thank members in this Assembly and others who have spoken out on the importance of making bereavement leave available to any employee who experiences any kind of pregnancy loss.

With that, Madam Chair, I hope that all members of this Assembly present would vote in favour of this amendment. Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on amendment A1 on Bill 17? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Madam Chair, for calling on me. I have many, many, many comments to make, but it is committee, so I may just make a few right now and then return once I've had a bit more time to digest.

Now, I want to start my remarks, actually, quite similarly to the minister. Gosh, I have to just talk about and highlight the incredible advocates who, as the minister said, have worked with this government. In fact, prior, when the Member for Sherwood Park worked on this in its previous iteration as a private member's bill, it was during that debate that, you know, we had the opportunity, all of us, to very much ask questions about the specificity of that proposed legislation. It was in that discussion, too, that we shared our shared support of folks like Aditi Loveridge, who is the head of the pregnancy and infant loss centre in Calgary. In fact, they work all over the province, and they're expanding to other areas as well.

It's never been more on my radar and on the radar of so many Albertans and Canadians, the issue of a person's right to choose and the issues around abortion. We need to look no further than the United States and the proposed overturning of Roe versus Wade, which, as everybody in this Chamber knows, has sent serious chills down the spines of many. You know, this government, when asked to debate abortion access and to talk about the real threats facing women and gender-diverse folks in this province, refused to. The associate minister responsible for Status of Women dismissed our concerns and minimized them as something that happens south of the border.

You know, it was incredibly frustrating for us and for so many who were watching at home to hear that dismissive attitude because we've seen, yeah, countless examples where threats to human rights, threats to reproductive rights are ever present. By dismissing them and by minimizing them, it puts all the freedoms that so many of us – many, many folks – have fought for. I think just prior in the Assembly to the veteran who's celebrating his 100th birthday – apologies that I forgot his name; I will find that and correct the record because that's my error for talking off the cuff – as an example of somebody who fought for our freedoms. We were so honoured to celebrate him today.

All that to say, you know, that I see this amendment in front of me from the minister, which seeks to strike out some of the clauses that we in the Official Opposition as well as stakeholders, those on the front lines, had concerns with. We really wanted to make sure that – I expressed this, and so did my colleagues in the Chamber. We don't always have a great number of opportunities to work together on pieces of legislation and really get them right, so I appreciate that we've had an opportunity to go back and forth. I appreciate that the minister was willing to listen as well to folks with lived experience, folks on the front lines.

I guess, because it is committee, again, I like – and I think I say this probably at least once a week in the Chamber. I am not a lawyer, and my key legal adviser . . . [interjection] I know; I know, to the Member for West Yellowhead, that you're shocked by this. My key – oh. I was going to say something that might be a point of order. I'm unable to consult with my key legal adviser at the moment, but I do want to get some clarity from the minister because, again, I sometimes need a little bit of guidance on language in amendments.

I see in the amendment – again, for those watching at home, we've just gotten this:

- (b) the pregnancy of the employee ends other than as a result of a live birth;
- (c) the pregnancy of the employee's spouse or common-law partner ends other than as a result of a live birth;
- (d) the pregnancy of another person ends other than as a result of a live birth and the employee would have been a parent of a child born as a result of the pregnancy.

Particularly in clauses (b) and (c) I want to get some confirmation from the minister if this amendment specifically includes termination for medical reasons and abortion. I want to get that clarity because one of the big concerns that stakeholders raised is that – listen, somebody who is experiencing pregnancy loss – and many of my colleagues have shared their own experiences, were quite vulnerable in doing so, and I respect that so much.

One of the things that they've shared and others with lived experience have shared is just, you know, that it's one of the toughest times that somebody will have to go through, and we're concerned that if there's a lack of clarity and a lack of inclusivity in the language, that's going to put a lot on the person to try to navigate understanding what exactly is written in the legislation. We can't have any room for interpretation on this bill. We can't force an employee at one of the toughest, most traumatic times of their life to have to justify why they need that leave and have to explain to their employer. You know, like I said, it's committee. I appreciate that we'll have lots of back and forth, and I know I've got colleagues who want to ask a few more questions as well, but I would like to, hopefully, get that clarity on the record from the minister.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on amendment A1? The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to be able to rise today and to speak to this amendment on Bill 17, the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. The changes that have been made by this amendment, in my mind, broaden it and change some of the language. It talks about pregnancy of the employee ending other than as a result of a live birth.

I believe that when I rose the other day to speak in second reading to Bill 17 I focused my remarks on the fact that this bill was dealing, amongst other things, with unpaid bereavement leave. This amendment focuses in on that part of this bill. The leave recognizes that a pregnancy lost to miscarriage or to stillbirth – in second reading we talked about the fact that a miscarriage or a stillbirth should be recognized, that the grief over the loss of a young child in the womb due to miscarriage and to a stillbirth has value and that we should recognize that with three days' leave for the employee or for a spouse or for any of the other situations that are mentioned within the bill.

In second reading I rose to speak in support of Bill 17 because it recognizes that all Albertans – what I believe all Albertans intuitively know, that they instinctively know, that the grief that they have is not bounded by whether that life is inside or whether it's outside of the womb. As I listened to the debate in this House, in this Legislature, the debate to that point had been gratifying to hear, that MLAs on both sides of the House understood this, that the life that we grieve has value.

Every life, Madam Chair, I believe, has value, regardless of its age or its colour or its religion or its nationality or any other precondition that you would want to put on it. Value is not placed on life as a result of its status or its income or its mental acuity or any perceived value that a society or an individual could place on it. Life has value from conception until death, not for any other reason than because it is a human life. It is a person and, in my eyes, a life that is made in the image of God. All life is worthy of life. And any loss of a valuable life is worthy of our grief and of a period of mourning.

Madam Chair, the amendment before us today I believe broadens Bill 17 in that it now refers to a pregnancy ending other than the result of a live birth. I will be supporting this amendment for two reasons. Firstly, I believe that it recognizes that in many, many cases, even in the case of an abortion, there can be and often is great and at times even debilitating grief. I believe that this amendment also recognizes that there are many circumstances under which life in utero may be lost, and in all of those circumstances it is a life that has value and has the capacity and should have the capacity to be mourned.

Madam Chair, I know there will be some people that perhaps are pro life that will question how the amendment can be supported when an unborn life in the womb that is taken not as a result of an unfortunate life circumstance but has occurred as a result of a deliberate choice could be supported by someone like me, that is pro life. While this is true, I would bring to everyone's attention the need in all of our lives for mercy, for compassion, for grace, and for love. I've met and I have listened to women of all ages who have grieved and had immense emotional pain over their abortions. They have regretted that decision, and they have mourned over the loss of the life of their child, in many cases for years and years. This amendment recognizes what many women, what many fathers, what many grandparents, what many siblings have recognized, that the life lost in the womb had value, that their grief is real, and that the time to mourn is necessary, even and maybe especially when the loss of the pregnancy is the result of an abortion.

Secondly, Madam Chair, I support this amendment because there are many circumstances in life under which life in the uterus, in utero, may be lost. Therefore, the grief will be as unique as the circumstances and the individuals involved and so must be recognized by this bill. This amendment, by broadening the language, recognizes this and is therefore, I believe, worthy of support.

Madam Chair, we've heard from both sides of this Legislature that we understand that all life, including life in the womb, has value and is worthy of the grief that we have at its loss. It is therefore reasonable to this MLA that the amendment should receive the support of this House, and I would encourage all MLAs to do so.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on amendment A1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'm going to start by saying that hearing from two government members who have never had to make a decision for themselves about whether or not they'll need an abortion, who come here and talk to us about abortion and use phrases like "life in utero" repeatedly in this place when they know how loaded those terms are, I think is disrespectful to all women who are engaged in this consideration this afternoon. I appreciate that they have an opinion and that they have every right to share it. I think that women's voices need to be heard loud and clear. Women's voices, obviously, from our caucus have been amplified, but I think women within all political parties owe it to be engaged in this debate and to be very clear about where they stand on women's rights to choose or any Albertan's right to choose.

I've definitely heard from many Albertans who don't identify as women who didn't think they'd ever be in the horrific decision of having to decide whether or not to proceed with a pregnancy because they didn't plan on having a man make them get pregnant. That was not part of what they anticipated was going to be a part of their life plan.

To any Albertan who has been in a position where they need to make a choice about their own body and their own health when it comes to reproduction, I want to say that the members of this caucus support Albertans in making those choices for themselves. To apply lots of cloaked language about whether or not somebody has a right to have time off when they've undergone a medical procedure that often causes a variety of physical responses, I think – I've heard what you've had to say, and I want to acknowledge that.

I know that many people really wanted clear language from the government in their amendment to actually spell out abortion and termination of pregnancy for medical reasons. That was a very clear ask from people who are going to be required to interpret this down the road, and I'm sure that the minister who brought forward the amendment thinks that this goes far enough in the language that he's choosing. I'm sure that he very deliberately – he very deliberately – chose language like "other than as a result of a live birth," thinking that that was probably inclusive enough. I know that people who are going to be tasked with interpreting this have asked us specifically to have the law spell out abortion and termination for medical reasons.

I want to talk for a moment about why people who are in that position deserve the opportunity to have the same protection in law, to have protected time away from work to be able to heal and to be sick, very frankly. I think that most people who – and it's interesting, too. You'll often hear men say: it's a decision that should only be between a woman and her doctor. I actually don't think it should be up to the doctor. I think it should be up to the person who's pregnant to make the determination whether or not they proceed with their pregnancy, and I really wish that the government would acknowledge that through clear language in this amendment.

If they won't put it in this amendment – and for anyone who doesn't know the details around legislative process, once a section has been amended, you can't reamend that same section. So by the government putting this language in and the government having a majority, if they so choose to pass it, it means that other people in this House can't bring forward amendments to the same section that would actually give that clarity. The government stood up – maybe they stood up – and the government was recognized immediately for standing first in the Assembly and having the attention of the person facilitating the debate. Fair enough. And the government has chosen to use this language other than the language that was very explicitly asked for from many folks for whom this issue is a very deep, personal issue.

Is this language better than where we were at before the amendment was brought forward for consideration? Probably. Is this our best work? I don't think so. I think that we could do a very good service to the people of Alberta by actually spelling out the types of pregnancy loss, including abortion and termination for medical reasons.

I also want to take a moment to say very explicitly that I know women who have had to make this difficult decision. They knew full well that if they went full term and if it resulted in a live birth, the fetus that they were carrying would not survive past the point of birth for more than a few minutes or hours based on all of the medical analysis on the status of the fetus. To say to that expectant mother, that pregnant person, "If you go full term, then you can have the guaranteed protection; if you don't, you may not have the protection of a job-protected sick leave while you're dealing with the impacts of your pregnancy termination or pregnancy loss," I think that that, again, puts this chilling effect over women and their bodies.

Member Irwin: And gender-diverse folks.

Ms Hoffman: And gender-diverse folks. Yeah. Thank you for that.

I didn't think that we'd be in a position where this would be such an area of focus for our consideration in this Legislature a few months ago. Actually, as soon as the Premier was elected, I thought that there will be things that are done covertly to roll back women's protection. Certainly, he doesn't have a track record of wanting to talk about women's reproductive health in this place.

In fact, he got up and ordered every member of his caucus – or maybe he didn't order it. But somebody directed every member of their caucus to get up and walk out of this Chamber 13 times – 13 times – almost four years ago to the day when we brought in protection to stop people from being harassed as they entered or were in the vicinity of a health facility that provided these types of services, so bubble-zone protection.

An Hon. Member: Thirteen times?

Ms Hoffman: Thirteen times, not once or twice. The first couple of times it was definitely something we'd never seen before in this place: an entire caucus get up and walk out of the Chamber, neglecting to engage in debate, engage in their jobs, actually, their jobs as it relates to making decisions in this place for Albertans, get up and walk out of this Chamber 13 times. I believe one person did speak at one stage, but nobody voted. How disrespectful that is to, obviously, the people directly impacted by the legislation but also to the people who sent them here to come and do their jobs, so frustrating and so disrespectful.

I have to say that I really wish the government had been more definitive in the actual language in the amendment. Since they haven't and since I know that there are times where laws need to be interpreted and that one of the main things that those who are interpreting do is that they go back to see what the debate was around those sections as they were being considered to become law, it would be really great if the government could just definitively state that this includes abortion and termination for medical reasons, at least on Hansard if they're not going to put it in the amendment. It would be much better in the amendment, but if they can at least put it on the record so that if we do get to the point where people are arguing over their rights as it relates to the law and the labour statutes amendment that we are considering today, I think that that would be far more appropriate than continuing to throw around coded language. I think that Albertans deserve that clarity, and anyone who needs to access this type of job-protected sick leave needs to have that clarity on the record.

It isn't just because of the 13 times every member of the UCP got up and walked out of the Chamber. It's because there are many members within the government caucus that have a long, documented history of actually fighting against women's rights to choose and all people's rights to choose, the right to choice and to bodily autonomy as it relates to pregnancy status. There is such a well-documented history, and we've all seen the images where underneath the now Premier it says, "Anti-Abortion Activist." Like, Albertans deserve to have this clarity in law. It should have been in the amendment. It needs to be in Hansard. Continuing to try to skirt around the edges of what is such a fundamental question about our rights is more than disrespectful. I think it is a dereliction of responsibility to all people of this province, who expect government to make decisions.

I'm sure my colleagues of various political persuasions have opportunities to speak to children about the role of government. One of the questions kids often ask is: "What's the toughest part?" And I say, "Sometimes you've got to make really tough decisions, and at the end of the day you have a choice to vote yes or no." I have to say that today is yet another one of those days where the government is trying to muddy up the question, not make it as clear as it should be, and that, I think, is disrespectful to everyone who is waiting for the government to definitively stand up for choice and access to abortions throughout this province.

It really came to a head, of course, last Monday, just over a week ago. On Monday night, when that draft decision of the Supreme Court in the United States became publicly available, so many of us, I think, sat on our phones or whatever devices watching the news, seeing what was happening, and felt angry, frustrated, disrespected. And I don't live south of the border; I live here. But because an attack on Roe versus Wade, which has been held up as a beacon of human rights for many of us around the world, is about to be considered for a significant retraction on those rights, because that is happening in what was once seen as such a great democracy, it sends a chilling effect over other democracies around the world and women and other folks who might need to access abortions around the world.

So when I look at what's happening with some women and other folks who are fleeing Ukraine right now and ending up in Poland, some who are pregnant and, if they were still in Ukraine, would be able to access abortion services, and reporting that they're not able to access them now that they're in Poland – and some of them have said that they got pregnant because of sexual assault by people who were invading their country on them. I don't think that anyone wants to say: well, that's another country's legal authority, and they have a right to make a decision about, you know, how they're going to determine that.

I think we should all stand in unity and say: "You know, what's happening right now, an attack against Roe versus Wade, has ripple effects around the world. It's wrong, and we stand with women and other people who might need to access abortion services. We stand with them, and we oppose what's happening and this attack on human rights." I wish the current government had the moral conviction to stand up and say that. For those who are looking to the current government for an assurance that they absolutely will not waver, I wish we saw the clarity in language in this place that Albertans and all people deserve to hear from other democratic governments around the world. It seems clear that the current Premier and members of his cabinet and, potentially, caucus continue to evade the question and continue to try to create any opportunity to distract, and I think that that is incredibly disrespectful to all of the people who are calling on their government to show some leadership.

Is this amendment better than the bill was before the amendment? Maybe. Is this amendment our best work? I don't think so. I don't think this is our best work. I don't think it's answering the question that many have asked us to engage in. It is better in that it doesn't say “miscarriage” or “stillbirth” explicitly now. The bill is amended by striking clauses (b) through (d). That’s where it specifically said “miscarriage” and “stillbirth.” Thank you to my colleague from Calgary-Buffalo for pointing that out. Replacing “miscarriage” and “stillbirth” with this language that says, “Ends other than as a result of a live birth” I guess is a possible positive step forward, but it certainly isn’t definitive clarity that so many have been asking for.

They want the government to say the words. They want the government to put the words in law, and this government fails to do that time and time again, which is one of the reasons why, when people like the Associate Minister of Status of Women say, “We haven’t made any changes; the law is the same today as it was yesterday” – well, when you refuse to actually put in law words like “abortion,” it implies that that might not actually be a choice down the road because it could result in something other than a live birth, right? It doesn’t speak to the issue of the day, the issue that’s been raised, which is that people want the words “abortion” and “termination for medical reasons” to be incorporated in this.

By skirting around it and failing to actually address the question that has been asked, the question that my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood asked in this Chamber – and the minister responsible for this amendment was directed by the Premier. I sat here. I saw it play out. The Premier said: just say yes to the amendment. Well, the amendment was to include abortion and termination for medical reasons. That’s what we were asking about. That’s what the Premier directed the minister to respond with, and that is absolutely not what is being put here definitively in black and white for us to consider.

So I have to say that it probably is better than just saying “stillbirth” or “miscarriage,” but it doesn’t answer the question that was asked, that the Premier directed the minister to bring forward an amendment to address, and I think that that is disrespectful to this place. It’s disrespectful to the member’s question when it was asked, and it’s disrespectful to women and anybody who is worried about their own bodily autonomy when it comes to reproductive health and a choice that they may have to make at some point in their lives.

While I appreciate that many men in this place have opinions on this issue and I especially appreciate the solidarity that’s felt in our caucus, I think the fact that people who haven’t had to make these decisions and will never have to make these decisions for themselves have been the only voices on the record from the government when it comes to the amendment that has been asked for from women’s rights organizations and others representing gender-diverse folks is incredibly disrespectful.

I think I will leave my remarks there for the time being and see where the conversation continues to, but this is absolutely a call to action for every single one of us in this place and particularly for women in this place because this bill is so close to the rights that we should all have protected.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on amendment A1? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Chair. It’s my pleasure to rise and speak to the amendment to Bill 17, amendment A1. First, let me say that I think Bill 17 is an important piece of legislation. I was also in the Chamber when I saw the Premier sort of communicate with the minister and just say yes about an amendment. I was encouraged that that would happen, and I think we’ve all been waiting to see what this amendment from the government would look like. I’m hoping that it’s just an oversight – and, hopefully, the minister will come back and clarify or perhaps amend the amendment and make some changes – but I don’t think it goes far enough.

Of course, I was happy to see the leave supported. I think it’s important to understand why these leaves, not just stillbirth and not just miscarriage – but there are other things where leaves are very important, and those things include abortion and termination for medical reasons. I don’t understand, Madam Chair – well, I guess I do understand why people are afraid to actually say those words. It’s almost like we work with code. You know, we’re not going to say it. We’ll say certain things that are careful – it’s a decision between someone and their doctor – but we won’t come out and say it.

But I think that we all need to step up and reaffirm that abortion is a human right. It’s a human right, and I think that it’s a critical piece of advancing the story of women’s advancement. I think it’s really important for us to recognize that for a woman or any person to have complete control over their body is important. It’s essential to advance human rights.

And it shouldn’t matter why. All too often I think that we’re qualifying things. You know, like my colleagues, actually, probably over the last year or so I watched with horror what is happening to the south, in the United States. We saw a lot of disturbing things happening in Texas. We saw the Governor of Texas I think it was in 2021, where they made abortion after six weeks’ gestation illegal. We saw some lawsuits or a threat of lawsuits to any practitioners that would offer these services to people. We saw them opening up the ability for lawsuits against them. Again, people were measuring their ability to do that, and all of this is methodically designed to reduce access to abortion.

When we saw the leaked decision for Roe v. Wade, I think – I’m not going to speak for my colleagues. You know, I was horrified by it, not entirely surprised but horrified by it. It was my hope – it became even more important that we in this place be crystal clear about what it is that we want to do, and what we want to do or what at least I hope the government wants to do is to amend their legislation to ensure that any person who has an abortion or a termination for medical reasons is covered for leave and that it shouldn’t matter what that reason is. It shouldn’t matter because they have been sexually assaulted. It shouldn’t matter that there is incest involved. It shouldn’t matter that it was contraception that didn’t work. It shouldn’t matter that it was a financial hardship or a dysfunctional, abusive relationship. It shouldn’t matter if it was a health issue like an ectopic pregnancy. None of that should matter because it is a person’s right to access an abortion.

Now, I could spend a lot of time talking about what this particular government has done wrong in terms of supporting and increasing and, at the very least, maintaining access to these services because that is dismal in this province. It was my hope that at least this amendment would clarify that any person that had a procedure like this, like the ones I described, would be eligible for a leave, but again we get this coded language that isn’t quite – you know, it’s not crystal clear. Maybe that wasn’t the intent of the government, and that’s okay, but I would love for the minister to come back and to maybe explain why the language is the way it is in this amendment.

You know, not all employers are the same. Not all employers are the same, so to have a person that wants to access this leave – let’s say that they don’t have access to anything else or any other time and they’re required to request this leave. Not all employers are informed and inclusive and accessible, and they will probe, if the language is not crystal clear, about what is covered and what is not. Then all too often people that are looking to access this leave are going to have to divulge information that they should never have to divulge. It’s personal. It’s nobody’s business other than the person who chose what they did. But without clarity in this amendment, that is not going to happen.

I think back to in my own life, my own experience – you know, I have a uterus, so, yeah, I have some experience to add to this conversation. But I'm not going to really talk about that. I'm going to talk about my friend. I was really quite fortunate. I got to be a birth coach twice in my life, which has been awesome, once for my sister and then once for my friend, and it was really interesting. My friend, at around 40, decided that being in a relationship wasn't going to happen for her at that age. She really wanted to be a mother, so she did a lot of research, and what she decided to do was to do IVF with donor sperm. That's what she did, a lot of research.

You probably didn't know that there are sperm donor catalogues. You can actually go through and select the donor based on a number of factors, a lot of which are health related, but you can actually make those decisions, and that's what she did. It was a huge financial investment for her, but this is something where she couldn't wait any longer. She knew that she wanted to be a mom and have her own child, so that's what she decided to do. It was a lot of work, but that was her right, to do it. It was her body, and it was her choice.

The first time that she had IVF, actually, we were super hopeful that things were going along quite well, and then she miscarried. For her to request a leave for her – I mean, her employer did know what was happening, so she didn't have to explain that, but imagine, if she worked in a place where the employer was not as informed, how she would have to explain all of this, knowing that she's perhaps not in a relationship. She would have to divulge a lot of personal information. Anyway, that would be covered under a miscarriage. But that was one experience. Now, her healing journey was quite a bit different than, say, someone who chose to get an abortion for whatever reason, because it actually doesn't matter why they did get an abortion. But that healing process is quite different. I'll just fast-forward and tell you that her son is actually awesome. He's playing hockey right now, and he's about eight years old, and he's fabulous.

But on the other flip side is that when I was in my early 30s, I had two children already and actually ended up getting pregnant again. I don't have to say why, but there were some complicated reasons, and I decided to have an abortion. I did that, and I can tell you that it's a really difficult decision to make, but I'm not alone. I think there are so many women. Once I came out and said what I did, so many women said to me, "Yeah, so did I; actually, I did twice," or they would tell me their own experience.

The worst part of it is that people are terrified to say it. They're terrified of the judgment. They're terrified of people just thinking things about them that are not necessarily true. They're afraid and terrified of having to explain why. And they don't have to explain why. They absolutely don't. But people are fearful because they have just not had that right to be able to control everything about their own bodies.

So I think that if we're going to do this legislation properly and if we're going to say, "You know what? This is a good thing that we want to ensure that women for whatever reason, whether it is a miscarriage or a stillbirth or a termination for a medical reason or an abortion, whatever it is – it doesn't matter why; whatever it is – have access to this leave because they are important and they are valued and they deserve the time to be well and they deserve the time to heal," then let's be crystal, crystal clear about the language that we use. Let's not mess around. Let's not be afraid to say what it is.

I can tell you we're all, you know, really into it right now, and we're focused on this legislation, but years from now, when an employer looks at, "Do I have to support this or not?" they're going to look back and they're going to see ambiguity. They might find a loophole, and they might say: "Well, I don't have to do that. It doesn't really say. I mean, it's not really crystal clear, and then I looked at Hansard and I looked at the debate, and that wasn't crystal clear." I'm hoping that my comments are crystal clear. Let's use the language. Let's not be afraid to use the words. Let's normalize it.

As I said, abortion is a human right. To control your own body and to make decisions for your life and your future is a human right. It's frustrating to me. It's incredibly frustrating to me that in 2022 we're still dancing around words because we're afraid to use them. I hope that's not the case. I truly, genuinely hope that's not the case and that this is just an oversight in this amendment. I truly hope that is the case and that the minister will stand up and reassure this House: "You know what? Let's be clear. Let's define exactly what this is so that any person that requests a leave in the future will get it because we've been crystal clear, we've done due diligence, and we've identified exactly what needs to happen."

It's called inclusive language. It's so important that we use inclusive language. My colleague is so right to point out that it's not just women. It's gender-diverse folks that really need to be included in this conversation. I make mistakes all the time with the language that I use, whether it's about referring to someone with a disability or as a disabled person. You know, I'm sometimes not sure what language to use. Or gender diverse: I'm sometimes not sure what language to use. I welcome it when my colleagues correct me and tell me what the correct language is because we're learning and we're changing. So it is my sincere hope that the minister will take these comments as: this language isn't clear enough. Let's do our best to be crystal clear about what this leave is for and who it is for and what it's meant to do. We shouldn't be afraid of language.

I think, you know, given the state of politics in our country, in North America, given the state of – we see things going backwards in so many ways that I know that I'm fearful. I know that I have fought for women's rights, for equal rights, for years, for decades. I can remember going to a march when my son was, like, seven years old. There was actually a picture of him in the Journal holding a sign. It was my expectation that by this time my daughter wouldn't have to be worried about language or using the word "abortion" or having equal access to a leave. It was my hope that we would be well past that, but I see what's happening all around us, and I see that that is not the case.

You know, I saw a really funny sign, well, a funny-sad sign, at one of the rallies that said, "The Handmaid's Tale should not be a manual," something like that. It's sad. It's sad that we're at this place that we're talking about words, and we have a government that is – I don't know. I hope they're willing to correct this. I really want to give this government the benefit of the doubt here. I truly do.

Anyway, with that, I'm going to take my seat.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on amendment A1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Madam Chair. You know, it is committee, and I appreciate the opportunity to be able to speak multiple times to this bill or to this amendment, I should say. I just have to again thank my colleagues for sharing their perspectives and particularly my colleague from St. Albert, who shared her own personal story. She's exactly right. It's a lot. I don't have my own personal story. I do have a uterus, though, like my colleagues from Edmonton-Glenora and St. Albert pointed out. I guess I was hopeful that I would hear from more government members, particularly those who would be most impacted. It's troubling to me that we've not heard back and we've not heard clarity from the minister.

We were going back and forth there, and in the spirit of collegiality I was hopeful that we would get some clarity, so I'll ask again for that clarity in the amendment. We see language around "result of a live birth." I need the minister responsible for Labour and Immigration to be unequivocal in the clarity needed around this bill, so I'll say it directly: will this bill include abortion and termination for medical reasons?

I'm incredibly frustrated when I hear – you know, we've only heard from one member opposite, and that is a member who just stated that he was pro life, or perhaps more aptly described as antichoice, and that's his prerogative, absolutely. But it's certainly concerning that I'm not hearing from members opposite that I believe would say that they may not hold the same views as that member. When that member shares stories about women regretting their abortions, I want that member to perhaps think about some of the stories that myself and my colleagues have heard.

In fact, I was communicating with somebody. She's given me her permission to talk about the work that she does, and her name is Autumn Reinhardt-Simpson. She is an abortion doula. You know, that might seem – and I'm quoting an article which I will table. It says:

That phrase might seem like an oxymoron – although she does sometimes support those who end up choosing to go through with a pregnancy, as doulas often do. Our conception of a doula might seem a little bit contradictory, but her job is all about protecting clients' well-being. She says:

I'm here to support the choice that's best for you and your family, not the choice that's going to support my ideological preference or some sort of religious goal. I try not to impose . . . my own views, I just ask a lot of questions.

I'm there to support them, she says.

But unfortunately the stigma in regards to abortion care is such that people have to turn to a complete stranger like me and trust that they can help them and get them through this.

She offered me – she said, you know: I've got countless stories of folks in Alberta struggling to access abortion.

4:10

When that government's minister responsible for Status of Women dismisses the lived experiences of folks trying to access abortion, when I hear from members opposite that there are no issues in abortion access, when I hear the very Premier of this province, who's not even willing to utter the words "abortion," "reproductive rights," "women," for that matter – in fact, I can consult Hansard, but I believe his direct words were: "that procedure." Unwilling to even talk about the issue – and as has been stated already today, this is a person well known for his antiabortion sentiment. We've not had him clear the air in this Chamber as to where he stands today on that very issue, so until he does, we'll have to assume that he's unwilling to act on the very challenges that folks face across this province in accessing abortions.

Back to Autumn, the abortion doula that I mentioned earlier. She's doing incredible work. I know, at least the last time I chatted with her, about her studies. She was doing a PhD. She's got a lot going on, so she's really doing this on the side, and she's paying a lot out of pocket just to support folks. She gave me the example today of, you know, a woman last month, who she connected with, who had to go to 10 pharmacies before she could fill her prescription for Mifegymiso because none of the pharmacists would do it despite the law. That's one story of many she can offer us, and I will ask her to share more stories like that. It's not fiction; this is the lived reality of many women and gender-diverse folks right now in the province of Alberta.

As my colleague from St. Albert talked about, in addition to the real barriers in access, you know, being turned down by doctors, obviously, trying to get a procedure, we know that there are very few sites in this province where folks can access an abortion. But people are being turned down for even getting the drug . . .

I look at my Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Mifegymiso.

Member Irwin: . . . which, you know, I was so proud to see that our government funded and supported.

They focused on expanding abortion access and focused on things like bubble zones around abortion clinics. It wasn't that long ago – gosh, when was it when I joined some counterprotesters who were there to support women and folks accessing the clinic? They were just trying to show their love and support because protesting is still happening outside the clinic in that same Member for Edmonton-Glenora's riding. It's still happening. It's the shame and, gosh, the verbal abuse that these folks have to experience, photography – right? – being outed to their families and their loved ones. It's unbelievable.

[Mrs. Frey in the chair]

So you can imagine that when I hear stories from Autumn and when I hear stories from, you know, folks who are on the front lines – I talked about folks working with the pregnancy and infant loss centre. I mean, there's still so much stigma that exists out there, and this is why we're incredibly alarmed when we see what's happening with the potential overturning of Roe versus Wade, which is why it should be incumbent on all of us in this Legislature, no matter your religious or ideological views, to ensure that women and gender-diverse folks are healthy and safe in our province.

No doubt – no doubt – we're skeptical of this government's support for reproductive health, when this is the same government that continues to attack health care in this province. What's most top of mind for me at this exact minute? Oh, I think about the cutting of the insulin pump program. Wow. You know what somebody said so aptly on Twitter this morning, yesterday? I'm not sure when. "You know, the UCP really did just wake up and say, 'You know who has it too good in this province right now? Type 1 diabetics. You know what? They're doing too well with their insulin pumps. So you know what? Let's cut that program.'" Let's give them additional barriers and red tape that they'll now have to try to manage, leaving many families across this province uncertain about the future of their insulin pump and getting no answers. Gosh, I almost feel sorry for the Education minister having to defend these decisions today, right?

Ms Hoffman: Almost.

Member Irwin: Almost. The same Education minister who talks about kids and putting children first and cuts insulin pumps for those very same kids like Conor, who is six, or Walker, who just turned eight. Unbelievable. Unbelievable.

Mr. Getson: What bill is this?

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

Member Irwin: I hope – you know, he's been doing this a lot today, the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland. I mean, not that I really want to get his perspective on abortion, but he's welcome to join debate. He's welcome to stand up and join debate instead of heckling consistently, as he does. It seems like he must be silenced because he hasn't spoken much today, but he sure has heckled a lot.

I don't think he's spoken at all, in fact. Anyways, I await his remarks. [interjection] Absolutely. I'd like to hear his views. That's right. The Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall is correct.

Again, I can point to significant barriers that women and gender-diverse folks are experiencing right now in the province of Alberta in 2022. The fact that I'm not hearing from government MLAs, other than the one so far, about their position on this speaks volumes. This is not just an urban issue, right? This is not something that just, you know, members like me and Edmonton-Glenora and Edmonton-City Centre in core areas of the city are hearing about. Members in rural Alberta are hearing about this as well, and some of the biggest barriers to access are in rural Alberta. I see a whole heck of a lot of MLAs in this Chamber who represent rural Alberta not speaking up about this or about the ongoing cuts to health care in their communities. I'm hopeful that I'll hear from them.

Again, I've certainly got more to say, but I once again want to ask for the clarity on this legislation because we haven't heard it yet. I want to again reiterate that none of us in this Chamber would want to put someone who has just experienced pregnancy loss through having to navigate understanding of this legislation, having to go back through Hansard and figure out: okay; does this bill apply to me? At a time when we should be supporting, we should make it as easy as possible for those who've experienced pregnancy loss to access leave like this, we're adding additional barriers, and we're lacking that clarity. With that, I will conclude my remarks for the moment.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on amendment A1? Seeing the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Yeah. In committee I'm excited to rise and speak again and again and again until we actually get some answers from the government about what they actually mean about this amendment, because I think that this amendment is an attempt to be vague and cloaked about what the actual language means. In committee you can rise and speak as many times as you want. Certainly, would love to get some answers from the government. Maybe they haven't had a chance to hear the question again, so let me be very clear. The language in this amendment doesn't state abortion or termination for medical reasons. It might imply it, but it does not state it.

So will any member of the government stand in this House and definitively state that this includes termination for abortion or termination for medical reasons? Anyone in the government. That is the main question that we're asking here, and we will keep asking it over and over and over again, as is our right in committee, until we get some kind of an answer from the government, because it is embarrassing that we have to ask this many times and that the government keeps trying to play games. They may be in the room, but I can tell you it sure feels like they all got up and walked out emotionally, metaphorically, and in terms of their response to this fundamental question that has been raised by a number of people in Alberta, primarily by women and other folks who think that they might need to one day access an abortion or terminate a pregnancy for medical reasons. They want the government to give clarity, so we will keep asking the question. I know the government doesn't want to answer it, but Albertans deserve answers.

You might hear from me a lot more this afternoon if the government continues to refuse to actually address the root cause, the root question, the question that was asked by my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, the critic for LGBTQ2S-plus issues as well as Status of Women, the question that was asked in this House last week in question period, following the draft decision that has been made public about overturning Roe versus Wade in the United States, the question that was asked specifically in this House that we have a chance to say that we are not attacking women's rights, that we are going to respect them and their bodily autonomy.

We have a chance in this bill that we are considering today, Bill 17, which is titled Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, but it speaks specifically in its current iteration to miscarriage or stillbirth. We have a chance to actually clarify that we want that to include other forms of pregnancy loss, including termination for an abortion or termination for medical reasons.

The people of Alberta deserve clarity from the government instead of more vague amendments and a refusal to actually even engage on their own debate. This is a government bill, a government amendment. We're asking very clear, simple questions that have been asked of us. I would like to be able to support this amendment. I really would. I do think the language is probably a little bit better than the language that's in the current iteration of the bill.

We actually had amendments prepared and ready to go that would give that clarity, but the government decided to jump up and be recognized first and then bring in this veiled language. If this passes, members of this Assembly well know that once a section of an act is amended and that amendment passes, you can't amend that same section again.

The government has decided to bring in this veiled language because they don't want us to actually put very clear, plain language that everyone can understand into this bill and to have to actually make a vote on something that has the word "abortion" in it, clearly.

The behaviour of four years ago, four years ago probably to this day because the debate lasted for a few weeks – the then Official Opposition, the United Conservative Party caucus, got up and walked out of this Chamber 13 times, and they may be sitting here today, but it sure feels like they got up and walked out of the building.

It sure feels, Madam Chair, like they are refusing to actually engage in the debate that they brought into this place. They brought forward this bill. They brought forward this amendment. We are asking very clear questions about what the amendment means, and we want it to be on the record. We do not want lawyers to be tied up for many, many billable hours trying to interpret the government's vague language through this bill, their veiled language.

People deserve clarity. They deserve to know if the government is indeed including abortion and termination to do with medical reasons in this bill, full stop. We will keep asking the question over and over again in committee, but we deserve answers. The people of Alberta deserve answers. [interjection] Excellent. I look forward to hearing a response from a member. I did wait for a quite a while before I stood up to ask the question yet again. I see a signal from a colleague in the UCP caucus that they are going to answer this question, and I certainly look forward to hearing the answer. Hopefully, it will bring me to a position where I can feel more inclined to support this amendment.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Mrs. Frey: Thank you, Madam Chair. I wouldn't of course want to rush my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora, but I do think it's worth pointing this out for the record. I've been listening to much of this debate albeit I did recently – I guess I can't say that. I haven't been in the Chamber for all that long, but I did hear lots of the debate. I know that intention is usually sussed out from the debate that we have in this place, so for the record, to make it perfectly clear to all Albertans, this amendment does include for abortion or medical termination as well.

This is, in my opinion, Madam Chair, an inclusive amendment. It is an amendment that's needed. I do actually want to thank the members opposite for bringing this forward as well. I know that we had heard this as well. Yes. This amendment does include termination for medical reasons and also abortion. I'll say that again for the record, now twice.

Madam Chair, I've been not quietly known as a pro-life individual. I am a woman. I am a rural Albertan. And I am very committed to my own personal beliefs. I also supported conscience rights legislation. I have supported pregnancy care centres in my riding. I have supported women in all difficult decisions, and I will continue to do that by recognizing that there is need to grieve the loss of a human life. I think that this amendment does that. I also think that the amendment that was to be brought forward by the opposition did that. Honestly, I could have probably voted for either amendment if we're being totally honest. But this language, I think, does that, and the intention certainly is to cover abortion and termination for medical reasons.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on amendment A1 on Bill 17? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the comments from the member opposite. I appreciate that you were able to say the word a couple of times. That's great. That's a good thing.

Member Irwin: That would be a first, actually. We didn't hear that from the Premier.

Ms Renaud: No, we did not hear that from the Premier at all.

But I guess my question again is: if, actually, the point of this amendment is to be crystal, crystal, crystal clear that this leave is covered for people who experience stillbirth, miscarriage, abortion, and termination for medical reasons, then why not say it? The member is comfortable enough using the word "abortion" twice in her short speech; why not put it in the amendment? As I said in my earlier comments, I was super hopeful that the minister would come back and work with us and say: "You know what? Maybe we didn't get it quite right. We're not afraid of saying the words. We want clarity from now until whenever this bill is changed again. We want someone to have access to the discussion. We don't want it to be open for interpretation. A year, two years, five years from now we want to be crystal clear that if you choose to have an abortion or terminate for a medical reason, you have access to this leave, period. End of story."

I'm concerned that there seems to be a silence from the government about why they're unwilling to change the language and be clear in this language. Now, we've seen a pattern, and I was hopeful, as were my colleagues, that maybe we're wrong. Maybe we're assigning some things that don't need to be assigned to the government members because we've seen them leave this Chamber 13 different times when we were debating a bubble-zone bill. I'll tell you, that piece of legislation was so important.

If any of you have ever driven by an abortion clinic, it is gross, the people that are standing there with their gross, misleading signs and pictures, harassing people looking to get basic health care, health care that is a human right. They're assaulted with these disgusting images, that are misleading and false, and are subjected to this taunting when, really, they're just trying to access health care, as is their human right. We saw members opposite leave 13 different times. I don't really know why, but they did, Madam Chair. I'm sure you'll recall that incident. Actually, I think there was only one member of the opposition at the time who spoke to that piece of legislation; everybody else ran away.

I think we've seen time and again different members that are supported by groups that finance candidates that are meant to work against increasing equity and equality around abortion. They're called pro-life groups, which – don't even get me started about why that's a ridiculous term – finance and fund these candidates, and we know that there are lots of them in the government benches. We know that. We know that the Premier – I think we all saw his picture on CNN as an antiabortion activist. That was the little thing at the bottom. That's what it read, that he went to university in San Francisco and decided that was going to be his calling. Doesn't have a uterus but wanted to stop people with uteruses from talking about it on campus. So you can imagine that there's alarm.

We see what's happening in the United States. We see what's happening in some of the southern states, where they may not have a full on ban, but they're making it increasingly difficult for women to access reproductive health care. They're making it increasingly difficult for practitioners to offer those services. It's frightening.

You know, I think back to the time when I had that procedure that I talked about a little bit earlier. I had to go to a hospital, actually, for it, and there was no signage. It was the weirdest thing that they had to give me directions: "Okay. Go down this hall. Then you'll see this picture. Then turn left here. Then knock on the door and wait." There was a bulletproof partition, glass.

I was so hopeful. When I was all done with that, I was certainly hopeful that things were going to change and women – not just women; gender-diverse folks and women would have access to health care where they didn't have to be afraid that some person with some kind of weird agenda, holding a sign, spending the day yelling at people trying to access health care. I would really hope that that would be different.

That is not the case, and that's why as legislators we have to do everything that we can to support changes that will ensure equity and ensure equality. What we're asking for is just clarity. If you're not afraid to use the word "abortion" – we heard the member opposite use it twice. Big steps. Baby steps. I'm not sure. It's good. Used the word twice. Why not be crystal clear in this amendment that if you want to access this leave that is in Bill 17, that I'm ready to support – then let's be clear. If you get an abortion for whatever reason – it does not matter; that is irrelevant – you have access to this leave. If you choose to terminate for a medical reason – does not matter why – you get access to this leave, in addition to stillbirth and miscarriage.

These are all things that require time to heal and not just physically. I'll tell you that it does require time to heal physically because it is really difficult, and it is difficult emotionally and mentally for whatever reason. That reason is irrelevant. Let's be clear that every single person going forward has access to this leave and there's no question that any person will have to go to their employer and explain why they should have access to this leave. Nobody should have to go through that. Nobody.

We can make that so here as legislators. We can be crystal clear about what this leave is meant to cover. It just takes a few words. It takes a little bit of courage. If indeed you want to promote equality and equity for all people in reproductive health and in leaves as described in Bill 17, let's fix this amendment so that it's crystal clear – crystal clear – about what it is meant to do.

Now, I think we'd probably be this passionate even if things weren't the way they are in our neighbouring country in the United States, even if we didn't see almost daily on the news the different assaults that are happening in terms of women's rights, if we didn't see women's rights being just dragged backwards. It feels like we're going back to the '50s sometimes.

I think we're reminded just how precious and fragile our rights are. It is incredibly important that we take our role as legislators very seriously, and when we're saying – you know, I think the three people that have stood up, again and again, here with uteruses are saying: let's be crystal clear. Let's use the word so that abortion is covered, so that termination for medical reasons is covered in addition to stillbirth and miscarriage. Let's leave nothing to be questioned. Let's not make any person have to go to their employer and divulge information that no person should ever have to divulge to someone that they choose not to. That's awful. We can fix that. Maybe the government just made a mistake.

Now, they don't tend to admit when they make mistakes, and it usually takes a whole lot of public pressure for them to admit that there's a mistake. Usually they throw a few people under the bus, then say, "Well, yeah, it was a mistake." But maybe it was a mistake. They can fix it. Just change the words and make it crystal clear. That's all we're asking for. Make it clear so that this bill, which can be a good bill, and this leave, which can be a great thing – let's do it properly so that in the future there is no question what it covers.

With that, I'm going to take my seat and let someone else speak to this.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on amendment A1? The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Yes. Thank you, Madam Chair. I really appreciate the insight and the debate. A lot of the members opposite kept goading me to get up and speak. Quite frankly, I am not a woman. I believe that some of the matters being discussed here are best left to our fairer sex and our colleagues along those lines. Where I do have some challenges and issues is with some of the diatribe that was coming from the member for McCall, so I will respond to some of those items here, quite frankly.

The bill that we're talking about – and I really appreciate the minister bringing this forward, and I also really appreciate, originally, the Member for Sherwood Park bringing this forward. It was done with the absolute best intent to understand that folks out there that have losses – whether it's through clinical measures, whether it's through stillbirths, whether it's through miscarriages – need to be respected and acknowledged and given a time of bereavement. That was Bill 17.

The amendment that was brought forward – here is something that I'll throw back to my colleague that actually is a lawyer and should understand full well the complexities of law in contracts, as an example. Sometimes the best thing is to keep it simple, the old KISS principle, when it comes to law. When you get too prescriptive, you can also tip the scale and the balance the other way and cause issues or concerns or court challenges later.

What I want to read into the record here again is the actual amendment that we're talking about. It is on the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. It's that section 1(5) is amended in the proposed section 53.983(2) by striking out clauses (b) to (d) and substituting the following:

- (b) the pregnancy of the employee ends other than as a result of a live birth.

Anything other than a live birth: that's pretty wide breadth. So anything that could be underneath there other than live. Unless we want to get into a debate on what's alive and what's dead, it's pretty straightforward. Again, to the barrister there who should understand that full well but seems to be reminded from a contracts guy on this side of the table.

- (c) The pregnancy of the employee's spouse or common-law partner ends other than as a result of a live birth.

Again talking about live birth, everything under the sun other than that pretext. So, again, you're asking for specific items to be added? Be careful of what you're asking for because you might inadvertently cause different consequences as well. [interjection] They're heckling again because it's all fair game. They like to do this. They like to pander and talk about something that really strikes near and dear to people's hearts without knowing their circumstances and discounting anybody else's beliefs and discounting anyone else's backgrounds . . .

An Hon. Member: Unbelievable. This is why we need clarity.

Mr. Getson: . . . experiences because they want to use this, again . . .

An Hon. Member: I was respectful.

Mr. Getson: . . . as a political football rather than understanding . . .

An Hon. Member: No. Because we want rights. We want our rights.

Mr. Getson: . . . the intent that it's being brought forward with and the absolute humanity of why this is being forwarded: to help people going through these circumstances. They'll diminish that, and they'll keep heckling me because, again, I don't fit their narrative. It's very sad, and, to me, it's actually morally reprehensible that you won't give me a chance to speak on this because you don't even know my circumstance.

An Hon. Member: You heckled us.

Mr. Getson: They're heckling again because it doesn't work for their political narrative.

The third part of this is:

- (d) the pregnancy of another person ends other than as a result of a live birth and the employee would have been a parent of a child born as a result of the pregnancy.

Now, they want to ask my positions on certain matters. It's none of their concern. They want to know about circumstances and that potentially, being a father of four, maybe I could have been a father of more, or that my wife and I had some other circumstances, or that I had friends that have lost other ones, too. We've had family circumstances. How many people I've worked with over the years on different projects where you have those awkward conversations when the lady comes in and has had something like that happen to them: they want to discount all that. The intent that was brought forward, if they look at it and just get off their political high horse for a moment and see how genuine and honest and pure this is: if anything, what we should be doing in here is agreeing to it.

Now, I didn't really want to speak too much to the amendment because I wanted to vote on it. I wanted to get this going forward, Madam Chair, through you to the heckle squad over there. To the heckle squad: let's get back to business. Let's make sure that we pass this, and let's make sure that we give those bereavements to the folks that are well deserving of it regardless of their beliefs, circumstances, or otherwise. Let's do something good as legislators in here and knock off the school ground antics.

Mr. Shepherd: If I may, Madam Chair, I think I will leave the majority of this debate to the women of our caucus, who I think have handled it quite ably. I just want to note that members of this government have no moral high ground to talk about political footballs and division. This is a government that's more than happy to grandstand on any issue that they feel they might get political gain, issues of populism. This is an issue of incredible importance to many women in the province of Alberta.

If this government wants to grandstand on things like firearms, a nonexistent truck tax, they're certainly welcome to do so, but I respect my colleagues who are reflecting the very real voices of Alberta women, who I believe have legitimate concerns seeing what has happened in the U.S. and based on the actions and words we have seen of many here in Canada and here in Alberta. I respect and appreciate the debate they've brought forward, and I certainly look forward to that continuing.

The Chair: Any other members to join the debate on amendment A1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Madam Chair. Oh, goodness. Yeah. There was certainly a lot there. You know, I think this is my third time speaking in the last little bit. I'm very, very appreciative of my colleagues from Edmonton-Glenora and St. Albert. I'm posting a little bit about this on social media as we go along, and it's shocking to hear this government, government MLAs continue to say that we are making a political football out of this when we're talking about the rights of people like me and St. Albert and Edmonton-Glenora, people who have uteruses. I'm seeing a whole lot of people on social media chiming in and saying: no uterus, no opinion.

The Chair: Hon. member, I think this is a great time to remind all members that while there isn't a specific standing order against the use of social media while you are in the Chamber, it's significantly discouraged to be distracted from the debate in the Chamber. I would recommend that perhaps the tweeting or the social media use can be done by someone other than you or outside of this Chamber but not during the debate.

I will ask that you proceed with your remarks when you are ready.

Member Irwin: Well, regardless, anybody who's been following the debate, following what's happened with the looming overturning of Roe versus Wade knows that this is very much a real and emotional issue for many of us. You know, abortion is health care, full stop.

When I hear members opposite, as I was starting to say prior to being interrupted – I was starting to say, you know, that we are not making this a political football; we are amplifying and sharing the voices of people who've reached out to us. I can point these members to countless stories of women and folks across this province who are experiencing delayed care when it comes to reproductive rights.

I talked already, but I'll say it again. We've got a few more folks in the Chamber now who need to hear it as well. Access in rural Alberta is just incredibly challenging right now. It's not just access to a physical abortion procedure; it's access to Mifegymiso, the drug. Reports, as I shared not long ago, from people on the front lines like Autumn Reinhardt-Simpson, who is an abortion doula, saying that people are being turned down getting that prescription in rural Alberta. Ten times, she heard from a woman who went around to physicians to try to get access to that pill, a potentially life-saving pill, right?

It's completely fair for us as members of the Official Opposition, particularly us members who have uteruses and rightly have an opinion on this amendment, to ask those questions. So I again want the – we did get some clarity from the Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat, and I appreciate her standing up. I truly do. I appreciate her uttering the word "abortion," I believe twice, which is more than we've ever heard this Premier say it. I appreciate that. I'm not being dismissive. I truly do. She shared her own perspective, that she is – I don't have the benefit of the Blues, but I believe I wrote down that she noted that she is, in fact, pro life, and she's helped out with pregnancy care centres and so forth. She stated her views unequivocally on the record that she wants abortion to be included in this amendment. My apologies if I didn't get her words correct.

Mr. Dach: She said that that's the intention.

Member Irwin: The intention. Thank you to the Member for Edmonton-McClung.

If I didn't get her words correct, I'm happy for her to clarify, because there's obviously a lot going on, not that I was distracted by social media, just trying to capture the debate.

But I would like to hear from the drafter of the amendment and the mover of the bill, and that's the Minister of Labour and Immigration. I just want that clarity on the record here in committee. This is what we do in committee. We go back and forth, and we ask questions, and we seek clarity. We're not seeking clarity just so that I and my colleagues can feel good; we're seeking clarity for the folks who are on the front lines, the folks with lived experiences out there, the countless folks who've reached out to us to explain how important it is that the language is clear and inclusive, right?

You know, I think back to just the other day – oh, time is confusing; I forget which day it was – when we stood on the steps of the Alberta Legislature, and myself along with our leader, the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, called on this government to be absolutely clear. We were asked about inclusivity and language. One of the members of the media asked about that and said: "You know, you talk about women. Are you also going to be talking about gender-diverse folks?" and I said, "Absolutely." I make the mistake all the time of talking about a woman's right to choose and women's rights, and I'm the critic for 2SLGBTQ-plus issues, so I admit that I still have things to learn. I hope that folks in this Chamber are willing to learn as well and to be more inclusive in our language and to be more inclusive in this bill.

The folks like Aditi from the pregnancy and infancy loss centre – I believe I got the name wrong there; I'll correct it in a second – have said that – you know what? – they make it a priority to be incredibly inclusive in their language, even things like using the word "parent," right? Not all who may experience pregnancy loss were planning to be a parent, as an example. There are a lot of ways that we can be a lot more clear and we can be open to learning. As it stands right now, without that clarity in the bill, this could potentially put a lot of folks who could benefit from this leave in a position where they're having to navigate the legislation and where they're having to seek clarity at a time when they should be supported. We don't want those folks, yeah, to have to explain and elaborate after having experienced something so traumatic.

Aditi Loveridge said it well when she spoke to this just the other day as well. She said: we want grieving individuals to feel empowered, to be able to define their experience as their own. She talked about miscarriage, stillbirth, abortion, termination for medical reasons, infertility, failed adoptions. All of those experiences deserve to be included, and they each can be defined under the loss of pregnancy.

She gave a really good, a really pertinent example. She said: when an employee tells their employer that they have cancer, they will not, or at least they certainly should not, be asked: "Well, what kind? You got lung cancer? Were you a smoker?" Like, absolutely not. And if that's happening, I mean, that's incredibly troubling to hear. But generally most employers know to be sensitive, and employees, folks who've experienced loss of pregnancy should be empowered, should have the choice if they choose to share details. We know that some folks are much more willing and open to share about their experiences than others, and that's completely fair, but no one should be put in that position where they're having to explain.

We're concerned that as it's written, discrimination could potentially still occur. Again, no one – no one, full stop – should have to justify the cause of their pregnancy loss. Again, we want to work together. I've been clear from the very moment I stood up on this bill. We've been clear that we want to work together. We shared that feeling of collegiality back when this was a private member's bill. I was on that committee. I commended the Member for Sherwood Park for the work that he'd done, for the stakeholder engagement that he'd done, for the consultation, for listening. Absolutely. But we want to get it right. We have an opportunity to get the language right.

Okay. With that, I will end my remarks for the moment.

The Chair: I see the hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Chair. I once again want to speak to the amendment that I put forward and the debate that has ensued as a consequence. I wanted to be in this Assembly, but I had an important meeting that I needed to attend.

The Chair: Hon. minister, I hesitate to interrupt, but the absence or presence of a member, including your own, is . . .

Mr. Madu: Yes. Withdrawn, Madam Chair.

I really was hoping that the members opposite would not delve into some of the stuff that they would like to talk about. The bill that we have before us is very specific, Madam Chair. We have worked hard with the stakeholders that want to make sure that this bill is as broad as it can be, but I see once again that the members opposite want to embark on their usual politics, just like they have done with every issue on matters that should not be a partisan issue.

It is disappointing that on an amendment that is the broadest possible of any bill on this particular issue, the bill that they – and I have had the benefit to see some of the amendments that they would like to introduce. That amendment is far more restrictive than the amendment that we have before the floor of this Assembly. Madam Chair, it speaks to “other than as a result of a live birth.” That phrase is the most inclusive language – the most inclusive language – that we can use to make sure that anyone out there who needs this bereavement leave, something that all of us agreed on, will not have to be denied or face any difficulty or have to explain anything to any employer. That is the goal here.

I had the chance to speak with Ms Aditi Loveridge on the day that the original bill was announced. I spoke with her. Since then my office has had to reach out to her and the stakeholders to make sure that there isn't going to be any argument on this particular issue, because this is not one of those issues that should be a subject of confusion or unnecessary debate. But here we are again with the NDP, Madam Chair. “Other than as a result of a live birth” is the most inclusive of all situations resulting in the loss of pregnancy, including miscarriage, stillbirth, and, yes, abortion, to the members opposite. I think that's what they are looking for. Yes: abortion, termination for medical reasons, and a number of other reasons. There are much more circumstances under which women can need these procedures, so we want to make sure that they are not limited whatsoever.

Madam Chair, I speak to you as someone – I think I've often told my story, the seventh of 11 children. I have four older sisters who are way ahead of me. In 2002 I watched my sister pass away in the hospital – in the hospital – from pregnancy. Luckily, we have the benefit of my twin nephews. This is a matter that is personal, and I don't think anyone here wants to play politics with this particular issue. What we are looking for is an assurance that the amendment before us is the broadest that we can have without having to name abortion, stillbirth, miscarriage, and all of those things, because there will be no end. There are circumstances that are much more than all of these things that you want us to name. That is the reason behind the amendment in the first place.

Here you have the NDP on an amendment that is the broadest that there can be ever, but they are hung up on the word “abortion.”

Are we surprised? No, we're not surprised. This is what they do best: politics, identity politics, politics of division, and stuff like that. Please. This is the broadest approach which addresses any situation with a pregnancy regardless of the reason or timing for the end of that pregnancy. For those at home watching and listening, let me say that again. The amendment before us is the broadest approach which addresses any situation where a pregnancy ends regardless of the reason or the timing for the end of the pregnancy. Yes, members opposite, that also includes abortion.

Madam Chair, I am a lawyer. I have also had the opportunity to consult with . . . [interjection] I see the Member for Calgary-Buffalo heckling. I am here now to address your concerns. We've also had the opportunity to discuss this matter with the legal services within my department and at Justice, and we are all in agreement that this is the broadest language ever. This also aligns with language used in the Employment Standards Code, precisely section 46(1.1) – you can check it out – with respect to maternity leave: “A pregnant employee whose pregnancy ends other than as a result of a live birth within 16 weeks of the estimated due date is entitled to maternity leave under this Division.”

Madam Chair, as I said before, after hearing from various stakeholders, this amendment is the broadest way that we can capture a number of experiences and circumstances without any limitations. Contrary, once again, to what the members opposite wanted to believe, this is a good amendment that will ensure people are able to access this type of bereavement leave for a variety of reasons. I should also note and would like to remind the members opposite that employees are not required to provide any proof of entitlement or reason for this leave.

Madam Chair, it is disappointing for me, listening to the totality of the submissions and arguments by the members opposite, hung up on one word and one word alone, abortion. This bill . . .

Ms Hoffman: And termination for medical reasons.

Mr. Madu: Yeah. And termination for other reasons. Yes. To the Member for Edmonton-Glenora: yes.

5:00

But if you sit here listening to them, if you read – and to members at home watching, I want to read into the record once again the amendment that we have put forward so that you know. I leave it to your judgment as to what it is that the members opposite are trying to achieve with their argument on this particular issue. The bill is amended as follows. In part A section 1(5) is amended in the proposed section 53.983(2) by striking out clauses (b) to (d) and substituting the following:

(b) the pregnancy of the employee ends other than as a result of a live birth;

Abortion is a pregnancy that ends other than as a result of a live birth. Are we clear on that?

(c) the pregnancy of the employee's spouse or common-law partner ends other than as a result of a live birth;

A pregnancy that ends as a result of any medical reason is a pregnancy that ends other than as a result of a live birth. Are we clear on that?

(d) the pregnancy of another person ends other than as a result of a live birth and the employee would have been a parent of a child born as a result of the pregnancy.

Any loss of pregnancy for whatever reason there is is absolutely covered and protected in the amendment that we've put forward. Are we clear on that?

Again, like every other issue, rather than focus on the substance of the bill before them – sometimes I wonder whether or not they actually take the time to read the bill. I don't think the Member for Edmonton-Glenora read the bill. I don't think so. I don't think so.

Even when you read it, you are not interested in the actual sections in the bill and what they say. You are much more interested in the things that you just want to pursue.

The Chair: Hon. minister, I hesitate to interrupt. Please direct your comments through the chair.

Mr. Madu: Very well, Madam Chair. It can be disappointing that I was hoping that all of us, members opposite – and I was carefully listening to their arguments and contributions since Bill 17 was originally tabled. We have taken into consideration the real concerns that they raised as well as those of other stakeholders in making sure that no woman, no person out there, no woman out there, gets to be denied the opportunity of this bereavement leave because of the lack of clarity in Bill 17 with respect to bereavement leave. That inspired this amendment today.

It is one of those instances in which I would hope that the members opposite would, for once, focus on the problem. You know, Madam Chair, when there is a problem, to solve that problem, we've got to focus on the problem rather than introduce a string of circumstances because of their ideological, philosophical pursuit. For the folks out there, Albertans who are looking to benefit from this bill, that's what they care about. That's what they want. [interjection] No. I am not interested in taking an intervention from the Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Well, you can't. It's committee.

Mr. Madu: I still have the floor.

Madam Chair, it is disappointing, extremely disappointing, that we have listened to stakeholders, listened to the members opposite, and taken into consideration all of their concerns and put forward an amendment that addresses all of those concerns, yet – yet – they are not interested in the substance of the amendment. They would rather want to, you know, make this bill, that should not be a subject of partisan conversation, a partisan issue. It doesn't help anyone on the floor of this Assembly. It doesn't help the very people out there in our communities, the ones who benefit from this particular bill.

Therefore, I would encourage and urge all members of this Assembly to vote in support of this amendment.

With that, Madam Chair, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 22

Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022

The Chair: There are no amendments currently on the floor. We are on the main bill.

Mr. Sabir: Madam Chair, you just mentioned that there are no amendments on the floor, but I have one ready to go.

The Chair: I would expect nothing less.

Mr. Sabir: I will distribute this, and we will speak about this amendment.

The Chair: Hon. members, this will be known as amendment A1. Hon. member, please proceed.

Mr. Sabir: I move that Bill 22, Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022, be amended in section 1 (a) in subsection (6) as follows: (i) in the proposed section 70.1(4) by striking out “or any other person over whom the Commission has jurisdiction or any person to whom the Commission provides services”; (ii) in the proposed section 70.1(5) (A) by striking out “or person” wherever it occurs, and (B) by striking out “subsection (2)(b)” and substituting “subsection (2)”; (iii) by striking out the proposed section 70.1(6); (iv) in the proposed section 70.1(7) by striking out “or person” wherever it occurs; and (b) in subsection (8) in the proposed section 72(1.1), by striking out “A person or owner” and substituting “An owner”.

Madam Chair, the legal interpretation of this amendment is that this amendment will stop the UCP government from piling more fees onto Albertans. It's that simple. It will disallow the administrative fee to finance the Alberta utility advocate to be charged to anyone but utilities; that is, the regular consumers, Albertans, cannot be charged the fee.

The new administrative fee results from the dissolution of the Balancing Pool. I don't think that it is fair for Albertans to be charged with additional fees. Albertans are already being hammered by the UCP increasing the cost of living on them. Madam Chair, there are utility costs, insurance costs, tuition costs, postsecondary costs, the Banff-Kananaskis park pass cost. This government has piled onto Albertans in every way possible. There is bracket creep. There are so many things. Albertans are struggling to make ends meet and cover these increased costs of living piled onto them by this UCP government and its policies.

While I do understand that fees to finance the utility advocate might not be as high, I don't think Albertans can afford any more because this government already has piled enough onto them. Since the UCP removed the cap from electricity prices, we have seen the utility bills doubled, in some cases tripled. It's been three or four months if not more that this government has been promising Albertans a rebate, a fake rebate, and Albertans are still waiting for that. Now somehow, in an otherwise good piece of legislation, they still manage to find something that they can slap onto Albertans to increase the cost of living for them. We all have constituents who are struggling with these rising costs of utilities, and I think we should all make sure that they're not slapped with extra costs.

I urge the members of this Legislature, all members of this Legislature, to think about your constituents and their rising bills and vote in favour of this amendment. Again, simply put, this amendment will disallow any fees to be piled onto everyday Albertans. It's that simple an amendment, and I hope that all members of this House support this amendment and vote in favour of this amendment to make sure that the government doesn't slap Albertans with any more costs.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there others wishing to speak to amendment A1 on Bill 22? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Chair. Sorry. I had to lean a little bit there just to catch your eye, because I know I'm kind of off to the side here a little bit. But I appreciate the chance to rise and add some comments here to Bill 22 and, of course, amendment A1, that my colleague from Calgary-Bhullar-McCall brought forward.

You know, one of the things that he mentioned, of course, was about the rising costs that Albertans are facing. We've gone over this time and time again in the House about rising insurance costs. We hear this comment around how they've been dropping. The funny thing is that none of my constituents seem to see that reflected in those bills. On top of rising property taxes, because the government is shortchanging municipalities in terms of what they need to be able to provide services – of course, those things are going up. I seem to remember past members talking about how the NDP government was waging a war on fun. I could almost say that the UCP government is doing that with their little fee just to go camping.

All of these things are starting to add up, so when you look at Bill 22 and we talk about the language – it's funny because in the previous debate we got really stuck on language, but as I've always said, it always comes down to that. When I hear comments about, "Well, we're taking a broad approach" or "We don't want it to be too prescriptive": the amount of arguments and grievances that I know I filed because language wasn't prescriptive enough and somebody was coming up with some kind of a wild interpretation of it. Hopefully, with amendment A1 we don't see that perhaps maybe we're proposing language that's too prescriptive, because right now Albertans are having a hard time, for instance, finding money to pay for their prescriptions. Maybe we should try to help that by not creating any extra costs, like my friend from Calgary-Bhullar-McCall had said.

Amendment A1 will take away that ability to just dump yet more expenses onto Albertans. They just simply can't afford it. There are already too many things going on. Their personal income taxes have been deindexed, as was mentioned. You know, their energy costs are going up. Somebody had mentioned to me in a messenger how: well, it didn't take long for us to lose ground at the gas pump; prices are almost right back up to where they were. So let's give Albertans some kind of help. They're still waiting for these rebates. They're still waiting for that help.

Of course, we heard earlier about how the NDP was supposedly blocking all of that and slowing things down. Well, it's done. It's settled. You should have had that money ready to go and out the door. Why is the minister having such a hard time getting 150 bucks out the door? Because that's really all it comes down to, 150 bucks against – you know, some of my constituents have shown me bills that are $500 for electricity costs for one month, let alone over the past three months. If that stayed consistent, it would be $1,500, yet we've offered them 150 bucks. We've offered them because they're still waiting for it to show up. We're no longer in the way. What's in the way of the government? What's holding them up? Why can't they get this money out the door, let alone, of course, any gas rebates? We still don't know what's going to be happening with that. We know at the very least that nothing is happening until at least darn near next winter, so that's not much help.

With Bill 22 and with amendment A1 we can at least offer them some hope that nothing else will get piled on. The amendment proposed by my friend from Calgary-Bhullar-McCall does just that. It's saying: you don't have to worry; there won't be any extra costs being levied against you because of this. You know, maybe we can finally stand up and say to people: look – okay? – we're not actually going to try to make your lives any more difficult. But the problem is that currently the language in Bill 22 will allow for that. So to say that maybe it's going to be too prescriptive or something like that? Come on. Be clear with Albertans what you're going to say to them.

If you're just going to outright charge them, then say it. Just say it: we're going to charge you because of this. Yeah, I can't guarantee they'll like it, but at least they'll know. Rather than dancing around like we've seen with the rebates, "Yeah, we've got help coming; any day now, it's coming; well, hopefully, maybe next week," and then after a month it's like, "Well, we're still working on it," we have an opportunity here. Let's do a little bit better with regard to Bill 22 in terms of this discussion versus the last one, when we couldn't seem to get some simple clarifying language added in.

It's funny because, you know, as my friend from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood always says, I'm not a lawyer either, but it would seem to me that lawyers, above all, should appreciate how clear, concise language is the better approach rather than soft, watered-down language that's left open to interpretation. That's always what happens. I've seen it way too many times where somebody will read that and go, "Well, it doesn't actually say that, so that means I don't have to do it," or "Well, I'm not actually being told I have to do that, so perhaps I can just skirt around it."

I think we can do better with this amendment. I'm certainly looking forward to some of the other comments around amendment A1 and how this can be of benefit to their constituents. I'm pretty certain that it's not just the constituents of Edmonton-Decore that are seeing ridiculously rising prices and expenses like their insurance, like their utility bills, like their property taxes, like their grocery bills, like their school fees, like their camping fees, and I can go on and on and on about this.

Hopefully, my colleagues might have something extra to say about that that I haven't covered, but it's certainly a good opportunity for us to go back and forth and talk about how we actually can make a bit of a difference for Albertans and not lump anything else onto it.

With that, I'll take my seat for the moment.

The Chair: Are there members to join the debate on amendment A1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to speak to the amendment brought forward by the MLA for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall that seeks to actually make it a little easier for Albertans to get through each week from paycheck to paycheck as they try to squeak by. Whether they're working at a low-wage job or even a middle-income job, things are pretty tough out there. It doesn't take more than a couple of trips down one or two grocery aisles to know how difficult it would be for families of even median incomes to be buying groceries the way they used to because their choices are limited. Their incomes are being stretched in many, many ways.

This amendment seeks to limit one extra cost that is being added to Albertans' increasing difficulty in paying their bills. By implementing a charge, a fee, on their utility bill to pay for the cost of the utilities advocate, it's kind of a callous disregard for the Albertan consumer to see fit at a time when inflation and costs are going up everywhere because of geopolitical events, because of climatic events. This decision by the government to have the utilities advocate paid for by a fee that's additional to what's being charged already in terms of rate riders and additional fees on utility bills was a fairly contemptuous oversight, totally unnecessary, and really pretty thoughtless. This amendment, Madam Chair, seeks to rectify that oversight.

Certainly, wherever it occurs, we're going to do our very best to make sure that Alberta consumers and, in fact, all Albertans, including the youngest amongst us, our children, and those who are least able to afford it, those on government-funded livelihoods like AISH, who already have been hit with a reduction of their income on an annual basis by the deindexing of their income by this government – we will do our best to try to protect Albertans from additional costs whenever we see the opportunity, and this is one opportunity that we weren't going to let go by, Madam Chair; that is, to make sure that already high utility bills don't get made higher by the addition of an administrative fee to fund the utilities advocate added onto the utility bill. It's already large enough as it is.

You'll see the different rate riders, some of them which are actually going to pay for the Progressive Conservative government's overconstruction, overbuild of the electricity grid in this province, something that the UCP government has been trying to pin on the NDP. In fact, that overbuild took place before we were ever in power, so a rather disingenuous attempt at off-loading responsibility, but indeed that's what they're trying to do in other cases, too, Madam Chair.

They're off-loading costs or downloading costs onto municipalities at an extensive rate to the point that municipalities now are looking at, including in the city of Edmonton, huge tax increases possibly being contemplated to meet the service requirements that they now have been forced to endure. It's going to be a trade-off. Because of the off-loading or downloading of responsibilities to municipalities, cities are going to be looking at having to increase their taxes or lower their services. Because of the high cost that Albertans are already facing, this is going to be an extra burden. Wherever possible I think it's incumbent, Madam Chair, upon government to not add to that burden by doing such things as they've done in Bill 22, adding an extra fee onto the utility bill to cover the cost of an individual who is going to be the utilities advocate.

I know that in any circumstance where you're looking at either a limited income or a smaller income – the major thing that we hear on the doorsteps when we go to talk to our constituents, which I do twice a week pretty religiously, Madam Chair, is the cost of everything. People are really struggling, and that comes forward very voluntarily on the doors: the cost of utilities, the cost of gasoline, the cost of groceries, and the increased use of food banks. There are at least three or four sort of pseudo-food banks, smaller operations operating out of churches and synagogues and mosques, in my constituency which are seeing increased traffic as a result of the difficulty families are facing.

I know that at the Our Saviour Lutheran church in my community there's a Sunday food bank that's being offered – I know they don't like to call it a food bank, but it's a means of distributing food – that I've actually helped to collect using my own truck, and on a Sunday afternoon it's distributed. They had – and this would be a little bit of old data – a couple of years ago at least 64 families show up to the one location, Madam Chair. The volume, I would dare say, has increased a lot. I know that in speaking with members of the executive at Edmonton's Food Bank at the chamber of commerce banquet lately, they've received awards for their stellar performance in trying to increase the volume of food and support they provide to the huge load of people that are now seeking assistance from the food bank.

That indeed is a testament to why the government should not be placing additional burdens on individual Albertans and families by very callously putting in an extra cost on top of their utility bill to cover the cost of an individual who will be acting as the utilities advocate. A fairly thoughtless thing, and this amendment, Madam Chair, catches that out and rectifies it. It's one of the things that we can do as an opposition party and one of the things that we will do should we be re-elected as government once again. We will always look at cushioning the pocketbook of Alberta consumers and making sure that particularly those most vulnerable amongst us are not harmed. I mean, we did attempt to do many things like that, in fact, did many things like that: reduced child poverty, cut it in half, and, of course, looked to raise the AISH payments. We indexed them to inflation, and of course – guess what – when the UCP took power, they rolled those things back.

5:30

They were given to sending billions of dollars to profitable corporations: $4.7 billion in a tax break which, of course, never ended up in reinvestment and creating jobs – those dollars were shown to be clearly invested offshore or went to pay dividends to shareholders – and $1.3 billion or so invested in a bet to get the Keystone XL pipeline built. That never happened. So this is big money. That's $6 billion right there, Madam Chair, when the government is betting on sort of trickle-down economics and wing-and-a-prayer policies wherein they forget that the effect of measures that they take on a daily basis in bringing forward legislation such as we see in Bill 22 is harmful to everyday Albertans, in particular those of lower or median income, who are really, really struggling.

I've watched folks particularly at the meat counter. If you watch people looking at the meat counter, they're almost timid to get the grocery cart close to it. They peek at the prices, and most people are kind of embarrassed that they can't even go near the steak section. They're hardly able to afford the hamburger these days, Madam Chair, and it's a telling story when you see that the prime cuts are going untouched and that it's the cheaper cuts that are the ones that most people can afford these days.

I urge everybody to support this amendment. It's a small gesture among many things that we as the opposition hope the government would adopt to make life more affordable for Albertans. I know that the government is not trusted well by the population right now because they really don't see them as being in their corner, and this is an example of that, Madam Chair, a small example where, if indeed the government was concerned about diligently watching out for Albertans who are least able to afford any additional cost right now, this little measure inside Bill 22 would never have passed muster. Somebody should have caught it and said: look, this is going to be an extra cost added onto everybody's bill. The public is absolutely beside themselves about the cost of utilities and gas and looking after their family budget, and it never should have seen the light of day, and that tells me that this government is preoccupied with things other than looking after the best interests of Alberta.

What it's preoccupied with is something, I think, that most Albertans are aware of, and in the back of their mind they are wondering what the options might be after May 18. When the Premier's election leadership review results are revealed, maybe we'll see a shift or a turn by this government. There are so many different balls in the air. It could end up being just another RCMP investigation. Who knows? But indeed what we end up having is a government that is very much distracted by its internal dislocations, let's say, and a leadership review which has caused the party to be in disarray. In fact, the seating arrangement has changed to reflect that in the Legislature by showing those who are least loyal along certain rows and those who are more favoured taking other positions.

There are all kinds of theatrics going on in this Legislature and with this government and – dare I say? – in caucus and in cabinet right now, Madam Chair, that are distracting the government from actually making and taking proper scrutiny of legislation they bring forward, which would have certainly caught something like this, which is going to add an additional cost on the Albertan utility bill by having the utilities advocate paid for by a special fee on the utility bill.

I'm not sure if other examples can be found where an advocate or – you know, the seniors advocate that we wanted to bring forward is certainly not going to be an extra charge brought forward on your tax bill to pay for that. I don't know if there's a special line, a health care charge, that you'd have to pay. No. It's kind of an unheard-of thing.

It's something that maybe we shouldn't be surprised by, but unfortunately it is maybe a trial balloon by the UCP government to put another cost onto something that isn't called a tax. The government, of course, likes to say: we haven't raised taxes. Well, in fact, that's an argument that is pretty easy to destroy because, in fact, bracket creep, brought in by the current Premier, is something that will cost Albertans a billion dollars. Though the Premier attempts valiantly to tell us and all Albertans that it's not a tax increase – guess what – it's going to generate a billion dollars more in taxes. And guess what. Whose pocket is it coming out of? The same Albertans who are being hurt by this Bill 22, which will add an extra cost onto their utility bill by forcing Albertans to pay a special fee for the benefit of having a utilities advocate on their behalf.

I don't know. If we have somebody who does represent consumers and other areas of utility provision, will the government contemplate putting another rate rider onto that? Maybe we should be prepared for that battle, Madam Chair, and wonder how many particular riders this government can think of so that they can pay for oversight in consumer legislation and positions that would otherwise be public servant payroll and come out of the tax base. Maybe they see this as a way of off-loading that is a convenient way of hiding the cost of providing, in this case, a utilities advocate.

The thinking behind it is something that really should have been carefully considered by the government, especially when we are at a point in time when the affordability issue is uppermost in Albertans' minds. On the doorsteps, in our media, in the newspapers – it doesn't matter where you go – it is absolutely what people are talking about because people are having great difficulty in absolutely just surviving, in buying groceries and paying the rent and mortgage payments.

Interest rates are creeping up as well, Madam Chair. It is a very difficult storm out there, and Albertans and Canadians and globally as well are being caught in the pinch. The responsibility of government is to be very careful to scrutinize their legislation that they bring through to not add to that burden. This is what they've neglected to do or forgotten to do or maybe just callously decided to go ahead with anyways even though there was an extra cost to Albertans for adding this rate rider onto the utility bills so that the utilities advocate could be paid for.

I know that there are lots of major issues going on that maybe seem more important, but this one, Madam Chair, is important to every Albertan who has a utility bill to pay and is looking at how they're going to stretch their dollar to actually get the grocery bill paid for. If the government sees fit and gets away with adding this extra little cost onto the utility bill, what's next? I mean, is it going to be another charge on your natural gas bill? Will it be some other excise tax or some other element to pay for some oversight on your home-heating bill or your natural gas or your car? Hard to say.

You know, there's one issue that has to do with the electrical grid that really hasn't received a lot of attention either in this bill or in legislative discussions or that I've heard the government talk about, and that is one of grid security and cybersecurity. Now, it's a huge issue that is not even contemplated, as far as I can tell, in Bill 22 and that will need a lot of oversight. Maybe the government is going to consider having us pay for a watchdog to look at grid security, maybe a whole panel of people to look at grid security to protect us from cyberattacks, and that will be a separate charge on the electricity bill on top of the utilities advocate.

That's something that is fair for Albertans to ask. It's a question that comes to mind. When you have something that is sort of a leading pilot project and nobody hollers about it – it's a small charge here – but, say, there's a larger issue that the government wishes to have oversight on such as cybersecurity on our electrical grid, which is a huge issue, Madam Chair, globally, I think it begs the question: would they go ahead and decide, "Well, let's pay for it by adding another fee onto the utility bill"?

I'm not sure if indeed others wish to speak, but I think that some may. I will take my seat and let some others add their comments to the debate, and I'll be happy to hear them.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on amendment A1 on Bill 22? I'm seeing the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 22, the Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022, and particularly the amendment we have in front of us. We're going to strike out the section that says, "or any other person over whom the Commission has jurisdiction or any person to whom the Commission provides services" as well as some other changes in here.

Again, Madam Chair, this is about protecting consumers, this is about protecting Albertans, and we know that there have been a number of challenges for Albertans over the last year, in particular when it comes to utilities in the province of Alberta, indeed particularly in terms of electricity. I think we've spoken about that at some length, and I guess we're going to speak about it some more because this is a real issue that has been raised with us by many Albertans, the concerns about the rising costs they are seeing under this government.

I think we've all heard from our constituents about the soaring price of electricity. Indeed, we have heard the stories, and we have seen, each of us, I think, the e-mails from individuals who are seeing power bills of hundreds of dollars at a time when they are facing many other rising costs: certainly, the rising cost of natural gas, the rising cost of groceries and other things under inflation, soaring insurance rates. This is indeed a difficult time for many Albertans.

Again, the reason that we are bringing forward this amendment and, in particular, when it comes to electricity, Madam Chair, I know the government has a low opinion of the rate cap which we had had put in place on electricity in the province of Alberta. Certainly, it would have been protecting Albertans right now in a way that this government absolutely is not. Indeed, what we have seen from this government was a promise some weeks ago, months ago, really, that they were going to take action to provide a rebate to Albertans on electricity. That was around about the time of the budget, and then nothing. Weeks went by, and then we had the announcement that, oh, they are going to provide a rebate of $50 per month for three months but no information about when that might actually come forward. Meanwhile Albertans continued to pay soaring electricity rates, soaring natural gas rates. Of course, we found out that the natural gas rebate that the government has promised was not actually going to do anything for Albertans until potentially, maybe next fall. I think Albertans had some real questions then about: well, what was going to happen with this electricity rebate?

We eventually, finally, saw the legislation brought into this House, and the legislation made absolutely no commitments whatsoever. It was a hollow shell of a bill. We attempted, Madam Chair, to bring forward some actual guarantees for Albertans because we were concerned, the government bringing this forward, that it could be months before Albertans would actually see this rebate that they had been promised and which this government had patted itself so firmly on the back for for suddenly deciding it was going to bring it forward well after they had already written the budget, which clearly showed that they had had no original intent of actually trying to take action to help Albertans on this.

The government rejected those amendments and said: "No, no. We're good. We'll get this in the regulations." Indeed, what do we find when those regulations come out, Madam Chair? That according to those regulations the rebates of $150, $50 a month for three months, could be paid out as late as October, November, December of this year. That's what this government thinks helping Albertans looks like. That's what this government apparently thinks providing relief to Albertan consumers looks like.

Frankly, Madam Chair, I don't think that's what it should look like. That's why we had brought forward amendments to help this government get it out by the end of May. This is a government which talks about its ability to move at the speed of business, yet it could not find a way to give Albertans any more assurance than: yeah, we'll make sure that's there by the end of the year. It's shameful. It truly is. Again, that is why we're continuing to act in our role as the Official Opposition to step up and offer amendments to try to make this legislation better, to try to provide real protection for Albertans at a time when they are struggling in so many ways, unfortunately, due to the decisions of this government.

Certainly, we've had some discussion today about some of the other concerns that are coming up in the electricity market, and it really again raises that question of trust with this government, which is again why we are bringing this particular amendment forward that we are talking about and debating here now. As we begin here, you know, we've heard this government sort of say: "No. It's fine. You know, nobody is actually getting cut off from electricity. It's all good." But then we find out that, well, they may not be getting cut off, but they're being put on limiters. As we heard during question period today, some families, then, have kids that cannot use their laptop to do their homework for school because that is too much on that limiter. The government can dismiss and say: well, no; our lack of action isn't actually stopping anyone from having electricity. Well, it is still having very real and serious impacts for families in the province of Alberta, Madam Chair.

Unfortunately, what we have seen with this government is that their priorities so often are not the everyday people of Alberta. Certainly, they have a strong interest in their corporate friends. They have a strong interest in their own political ends, but the interests of Albertans? Often just left by the wayside, ignored. Again that question of trust, Madam Chair: whether this government can truly be trusted to have the interests of Albertans first, whether this government can truly be trusted to speak honestly about the impacts of its decisions on Albertans, whether this government can be trusted to take actual, tangible action to help those Albertans, to do so in a timely way, in a way that prioritizes the needs of those Albertans, getting that help to them when they need it, not when it's convenient for them, which, again, is why we're choosing to bring this amendment forward to Bill 22 at this time.

Now, certainly, as I've spoken to before, there are aspects of Bill 22 which I would absolutely support. In general I think there is – the majority of this bill are things we can support. Increasing the opportunity for energy storage: we talked about that at length. Certainly, there are a number of Alberta companies which are doing great work in this field, developing technology and innovation which could contribute quite a bit in terms of building energy independence and in terms of building the opportunity for us to generate electricity and make use of electricity with far lower generation of greenhouse gases. Certainly, there are elements of this bill that will support that through providing definitions of energy storage, by clarifying and opening some of the rules around self-supply and export. There are certainly a number of things we can agree with here, but there are indeed things that I think we can also make better. There are things that can be improved. Indeed, that is why we're bringing this particular amendment forward, to see if we can help make better perhaps just one section of this bill.

But at this time, I think that's about as much as I have to offer on this particular amendment, Madam Chair. I'll perhaps give the opportunity for one of my colleagues to offer their thoughts.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. My pleasure to briefly speak to some of the things that are problematic with this bill, and I agree with my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre. There are parts of this bill that I absolutely can support – the part that has been brought forward under the notice of amendment by my colleague from Calgary-Bhullar-McCall deals with the whole area under the Alberta utility advocate, and I am totally in agreement that where we can find opportunities to reduce the costs levied on Albertans, ratepayers who are hooked up to the grid, it's a positive thing.

Now, Albertans are already being hammered by this UCP and the increasing costs of living. We know that things like insurance have gone up exponentially under this government. Tuition in postsecondary has gone up significantly, making it unaffordable for many students to go for their higher education. We know there's been a reduction in student grants and the increase to student loan interest. There's no help on the horizon, it would seem, for natural gas cost increases, no help on the horizon for electricity power increases. Though there is lots of talk, there's no real meat coming forward for Albertans.

The income tax bracket creep is real and alive under this government, and the lack of indexation of important income support programs makes it really difficult for vulnerable Albertans to keep pace with the cost of living. There's also failed help with child care costs across Alberta and not being able to deliver what was agreed to with the federal government. We have seen delays to these programs that were supposed to help Albertans out and have not helped Albertans out.

We know that this amendment will deal with a small piece of that, Madam Chair, and should be supported so that the companies like TransAlta, ATCO, and Capital Power can pay for the costs of the Alberta utility advocate instead of socializing that to all Albertans. We believe that that's in the best interests of Albertans at this time because of the significant increase to costs that is hammering Albertans. You know, the fee, while it may not be significant, still will be on the bill. Probably all of us have heard many, many times from Albertans who say that they're seeing all these costs on their bill, and they would like them to be addressed.

I'll just sit down now and let you move to adjourn.

Ms Hoffman: You move to adjourn.

Member Ceci: I move to adjourn for you.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Chair: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Chair. I move that the committee rise and report progress on Bill 17 and progress on Bill 22.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills and would like to report progress on the following bills: Bill 17 and Bill 22.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. That is carried.
The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I move that the Assembly be adjourned until 7:30 this evening.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:57 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 20 Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

[Adjourned debate May 4: Mr. Singh]

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. members. Are there any members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has risen.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words in regard to the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. You know, once again it's one of those bills where we see on first blush that it's a housekeeping bill – and indeed the Justice minister was asserting that so emphatically – but when we started looking at it, we realized that, of course, the main issue is not being dealt with, right? That's the circumstances around the victims of crime fund. Again, this really speaks to a fundamental, foundational problem with so many of the bills that we see here in this session, which is that the government asserts that it's just some housekeeping thing but underneath – like an iceberg, you only see the little tip on the top, but there's this big honking piece of ice underneath that really needs to be dealt with and is not being dealt with, and that is this whole issue around the victims of crime fund and moving that money into a different place.

You know, when you build something like the victims of crime fund, Mr. Speaker, first of all, it is designed to be a self-sustaining mechanism that uses assets that maybe have been seized from other criminal activity. Let's say that someone is busted, and they're seizing the assets of drug dealers or a drug house, and they sell the house, and they sell the vehicles and all that stuff. Then that money goes to the victims of crime fund. From the beginning it was built as a purpose-built, specialized way by which we could have that money from criminal activity moving over to help people who have been victimized by crime in some other location, or it could be the same location but probably not.

To mess with that very fine sort of logical balance – right? – is a serious problem, Mr. Speaker, and any of the changes to how people can access services for victims of crime: again, it's not just going against common sense, but it's going after a sense of balance and compassion, that is what we are meant to provide in justice, Alberta Justice, and the safety and the security that goes with that as well. For people that have been traumatized by being part of a crime, somehow witnessing a crime or being assaulted or so forth, to restrict the benefits that we can give, like psychological services or other benefits for individuals like that, is unconscionable, quite frankly.

We know very well that quite often people will be traumatized by criminal activity, and that trauma will manifest itself sometimes months or even years later. I was listening to, again, the fountain of all my anecdotal stories, the CBC Radio, just last night, I guess. It was a repeat of an investigative report where there was a teacher that was sexually molesting high school students, like, a band teacher, and some of the people who finally came out to bust this guy had the trauma associated with that manifesting itself many years later, when they were adults. The one woman went from high school and had a very successful career in the public service – I think she was an assistant deputy minister in the federal government – and then suddenly, you know, after all of those years she melted down and needed significant support, lost everything with the traumatic effects of this sustained sort of sexual assault that she had endured when she was a high school student, right?

I guess my point is that, number one, that's a terrible story, but I think it's instructive that people who have been victims of crime in the broadest possible way can have those traumatic effects manifest in their lives months or years later, so for us to put any limitation on that is irresponsible. We must always in this Legislature defer to professionals, right? We can't just be amateur psychologists and say: okay; well, you've got 30 days to apply for the psychological services, and after that, that's it. I mean, who are we to set those kinds of limits as legislators, generalists that we are? The whole premise of this bill is the – by omission the things it doesn't do: that's the problem that I have with it. You know, I think we could really do better, and it's just an obvious place to improve on with Bill 20.

As far as I can see, this bill does amend five different acts, right? It goes for the Corrections Act, Justice of the Peace Act, Missing Persons Act, Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, and then the Youth Justice Act as well. In many of those other acts, you know, Mr. Speaker, again we definitely need to focus our attention always on a constant, vigilant basis but also as these things come forward.

For example, we just saw in the last few days talk about the corrections circumstances and the health services that were being provided in corrections facilities, specifically the remand centre, somehow changing or putting into question the integrity of access to health care in that facility. Again, always it's a solemn responsibility to ensure the safety and security of all people and even people who are incarcerated, too, right? We know that if we learned anything with so many things we could learn from this pandemic, it's that, of course, the health and the collective security of all of us are intertwined, quite frankly. If you have a big outbreak in a place like the remand centre, then that could be the locus of a very large and destructive outbreak that can spread into the general population, not to mention the people that are incarcerated. They're not being incarcerated and remanded because part of their punishment is to be in a confined place where they can catch communicable diseases, right? I mean, that's not part of the system. Again, seeing any change or compromise, as we did in the last – I don't know – 48 hours or 72 hours, in regard to the level of health services that are available to persons at the remand centre: I think that's a Corrections Act issue that we need to deal with as well.

But, again, the heart, Mr. Speaker, of our concern around the changes to the victims of crime fund – we saw in 2020 the UCP introducing Bill 16, which changed the victims of crime fund to the victims of crime prevention fund, again, in direct defiance of what the whole thing was set up for in the first place, right? It was a way to deal with reacting to people that had experienced criminal trauma due to criminal activity.

You know, the whole idea that you can move one piece of money over to another reminded me, Mr. Speaker, of someone. They instructed the Premier's office, each department to go through their budgets and somehow move money around in different ledgers so that you could look like you could be reducing the deficits somehow. Taking something that was a dedicated fund, that generated its own money from criminal activities and so forth, and then somehow moving that ledger over into general revenues: I mean, that's what it appeared to be, really. Again, just, like, really bad, bad choices, right? To presume that (a) you could even touch that victims of crime fund and try to put it into a different ledger box somehow: again, I just found that to be very poor choices.

Mr. Speaker, we know that the balance of the fund for victims of crime – you know, the money is collected as part of section 737 of the Criminal Code, directed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council to be paid into the fund, right? Money collected from surcharges under this act, money received by the Crown for the purpose of assisting victims, money received pursuant to the victims restitution acts: none of these things are to do with prevention, right? I mean, we should of course have prevention. Prevention is the key to building a safer, more secure society, but taking it from the victims of crime fund to pursue that defies logic and gravity, quite frankly. I think that explaining it to anyone in a common-sense sort of way, you'd get a head nod from that as well.

Again, you know, building legislation and sort of having a grab bag of so-called housekeeping pieces is fraught with peril, Mr. Speaker, quite frankly, because if you're trying to clean up some bits of five different acts but then you're obviously missing the elephant in the room in regard to not reforming the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act for the obvious omission of not allowing those things to move forward to do the job that they need to do, then, I mean, that's quite simply wrong, right? As I said before, people will manifest the effects of being a victim of crime in various ways and sometimes over a long period of time. It's not just like cutting a cheque to say: hey, sorry you witnessed a murder; here's some money. I mean, it's all about building support and a support system so that people can somehow rebuild their lives and receive the psychological and maybe medical attention that they require. Really, I mean, I think we could do a lot better in regard to Bill 20. I implore both the minister and this government caucus to reconsider their approach to this bill.

With that, I will take my chair. I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words in regard to Bill 20.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you very much.

I'm so surprised. I actually see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie now has risen to join debate. Please, sir.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to get up and speak to Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. As was being elaborated on by the Member for Edmonton-North...

Mr. Eggen: North West.

Member Loyola: North West. I knew there was a north in there somewhere. I knew it was in Edmonton. Yeah.

I think that this bill is characteristic of what we see before us in a number of pieces of proposed legislation that have been brought in by the government during this particular session, Mr. Speaker, and that is that they totally miss the mark on the important issues that are before us and that Albertans seem to care about so deeply.

Of course, nothing can be further from the truth on that aspect when it comes to the victims of crime fund. I have a very good friend that, actually, I used to work with in this particular department. She no longer works there, unfortunately. She's moved on to other works, but I remember that when the government actually decided to come in with the previous bill, Bill 16, we had an extensive discussion on the fact that this was really alarming, the fact that victims of crime weren't going to be able to have access to important monies that actually would help them deal with the situation. You know, the victims of crime fund wasn't just for meeting the immediate material needs that the individual may have encountered because of the crime that they experienced, but it also helped with therapy.

A lot of the times when someone goes through something as traumatic as going through a crime, depending to what degree – every individual is different. That's something that she explained to me. You know, she had seen examples of people that had seen horrendous acts happen. According to the individuals they didn't need any therapy or support because of it whereas others may have gone through something that some individuals might consider minor, yet that individual did need to go to therapy. It's not about how horrendous the crime is; it's about how the individual has been impacted.

I think that this is something that a lot of Albertans are concerned about when it comes to the issue. They would like to see it rectified, or they would like to see, you know, the alternatives that are going to be put in place. How are individuals who experience crime going to be able to access money for things like therapy when it comes to these particular issues?

Now, of course, what we do have before us is a bill that actually amends five different acts, which are the Corrections Act, the Justice of the Peace Act, the Missing Persons Act, the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, and the Youth Justice Act. And as was being shared by the Member for Edmonton-North West, it's really kind of like an administrative bill. You know, I can see the reasons for these things. However, as I was saying before, it doesn't address the most important aspect that most Albertans are concerned with.

For example, under the Corrections Act it deals with compensation rates for the Alberta Parole Board members, which can now be set by order in council instead of a regulation, and this brings it in line with other agencies, boards, and commissions.

Under the Justice of the Peace Act it gives the Chief Judge of the Provincial Court of Alberta the discretion to designate a justice of the peace as either part-time or full-time. This also means that the Chief Judge can change a designation between full- and part-time if the term is not expired and other conditions are met, similar to the process for judges. Before that, the government had a process through regulations.

As you can see, a lot of these are quite administrative. I would even delve into the ground that, you know, it doesn't even have to be done in a regulation. It's now being pushed into orders in council, which, of course, puts more power in the hands of the minister and cabinet.

Under the Missing Persons Act it adds a definition of medical information. Now, the act already had provisions that allowed access to health information, but of course that will change. It allows now TV footage or other video recordings to be used in a missing person's case, and it adds a section that a justice of the peace can seal court records relating to a missing-person case if it interferes with an investigation or endangers people. It also changes the timeline for a review by a special committee of the Legislative Assembly. It will go from five years after the act coming into force to no later than 2027 and every five years after.

Of course, some of these changes are a result of a previous review. It added regulation-making powers that give the government the ability to define any term not defined in the act. I would argue, Mr. Speaker, that, of course, you wouldn't need to do this if you had proper legislation, right? It's important that we call that out.

Under the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act the changes, largely, that the UCP have made permanent are that it replaces all references to the death benefit with "funeral expense reimbursement." According to the government this does not change any benefit Albertans may be eligible for, but it is a change to reflect that the advocate felt that the term “death benefit” was inadequate as there isn’t a benefit from a death. The definition in the act stays the same, but the name of the benefit reimbursement has changed. It disestablishes the Criminal Injuries Review Board. The board was already disestablished in transitional section 22 of the act, and it strikes out the transitional sections of 19 to 23. This makes a number of the controversial changes that the UCP made permanent. Most of the transitional sections were in place to deal with a class-action lawsuit, in fact.

Under the Youth Justice Act the changes are to align the act with changes from the federal Criminal Code, changes that a notification to parents can be given by any peace officer rather than solely the officer in charge. It updates sections on forfeiture, and according to the government the changes won’t be a change in policy. As you see, these are quite slight administrative changes that the government is making.

As I was saying before, it doesn’t actually go into the victims of crime fund. Now, in 2020 the UCP introduced their Bill 16, which did change the victims of crime fund to the victims of crime and crime prevention fund. Now, I just wanted to highlight some of the changes that were made there. The fund has always been 100 per cent supported by a surcharge on fines issued by the police or the courts. Previous to the change the fund supported a wide range of community- and police-based services, and the funding was available to individual victims of violent crimes to help deal with injuries, assist them with funerals, and with supplemental benefits for people with severe injuries. Bill 16 added in emergency accommodation or protective measures, access to counselling for sexual assault victims and families of homicide victims, and court support to victims and witnesses.

According to the help for victims of crime page in order to qualify for emergency assistance or counselling through the victims of crime and public safety fund, the victim must apply within 45 days of the crime occurring. This is resulting in victims being unable to access these services, and many victims, particularly those experiencing domestic violence or sexual crimes, do not even report the crime within that window. This is leaving victims with fewer resources, and for victims of domestic violence it could result in them staying in a dangerous situation. That right there is probably one of the most important factors in this particular bill, I would say.

As we all know, it’s very difficult for those who experience domestic violence to come forward as it is. In fact, I believe that sometimes it takes a victim of domestic violence up to, like, four times to actually make the decision to finally leave the situation in which they are perpetually being the victim of. We’d think that we would want legislation to actually help people in order to make that decision rather than to make it harder for them to actually come forward. I think that that’s something that the members opposite need to take into serious consideration when it comes to providing legislation or bringing new legislation into the House.

I think that there are a lot of issues that could be dealt with, Mr. Speaker, and domestic abuse, domestic crime, domestic violence is one of those things that we need to do better at as a Legislature. Of course, you know, I often say that there’s a difference between making something law and changing the culture, but what we find is that once you establish it in law, then the culture slowly starts to change after that. I mean, in this particular instance I would think that we would want it to move as quickly as possible, and therefore we desperately need legislation that gives – and, of course, I completely understand that there are some men, but the majority of those who experience domestic violence in the home are women. We need to create the circumstances whereby it’s easier for them to actually come forward and report what’s going on. That’s why we desperately need pieces of legislation that actually will help women do that so that we can truly change the culture.

I know this is not an issue of just Alberta. It happens all over Canada. It happens all over the world. But it’s something that, you know, if we were leaders on that, Mr. Speaker, would definitely make all members on both sides of this House proud that we actually moved forward on something like that. So for me, it’s imperative that we deal with this as an important issue, that we keep moving forward on the issue of domestic violence, and this is something that this government could bring forward as a result of the changes that they actually made to the victims of crime fund, because this is where the impact is actually on Albertans.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to be able to provide my thoughts.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview has risen.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It’s my pleasure to join debate on Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. Like has happened several times before, the UCP has put forward a bill that is an omnibus bill with several acts being impacted. Of course, when many acts are opened in one bill, you know, sometimes it’s seen as not really a fair way to put forward legislation, that the acts should be dealt with individually, and there is concern. Certainly, I remember hearing much concern expressed by the UCP when we were in government if we did that on the rare occasion, but it seems to be absolutely something that is done quite regularly by this government.

Most of the changes, frankly, are more administrative, so there are not huge differences that are of concern. But there is one aspect that we, the NDP caucus, have already talked extensively about that continues to be a concern. Actually, Bill 20 was an opportunity for the UCP government. If they indeed had the political will, they could have fixed it, and that, of course, is the victims of crime fund. We know that earlier they brought in Bill 16, which really made it much more difficult for victims of crime to access the fund. You know, we spoke extensively at that time about our concerns. Bill 20, which is another justice statutes amendment act, opens up the Justice of the Peace Act and the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, so there would have been a great opportunity.

I’m so sorry that the members of the UCP government are not taking advantage of it, because all across this province survivors of sexual assault have been impacted in a negative way by Bill 16 and continue to be by Bill 20. Of course, this is a hill to die on. This is why, certainly, I will oppose this bill, and I know that my colleagues join me in opposition to this bill. We know that Bill 16 allowed the UCP to use the victims of crime fund not only to support survivors but actually to channel or move money to police initiatives, so that meant that there’s less funding for victims of crime. That certainly is not the direction that we want to go with, and we’re concerned that the UCP is doing that. Certainly, the association of sexual assault services’ CEO Deb Tomlinson, who’s someone I know from previous to being elected, is a social worker who has been a strong advocate in this area for many, many years, has spoken certainly very clearly in opposition to both Bill 16 and also this bill.

Previously, before Bill 16, there was sort of a time limit on when survivors could report sexual assault, but it was changed to only 45 days in Bill 16, which is, frankly, ridiculous. When people have experienced an assault, they’ve experienced a tremendous trauma.

For them to have the wherewithal, to have the courage to actually speak up and actually go to police regarding this is asking far too much. There should not be any moratorium. Two years was too short; 45 days is absolutely, you know, ridiculous. It's obviously not meant to support survivors at all and certainly doesn't have any understanding of their lived experience, because when you experience some assaults such as this, it has significant impacts on your life, and in order to be able to face that trauma, sometimes it can take, indeed, years.

Women in our society know that even if they did report, oftentimes justice is not done. They're retraumatized by that whole experience, so they often are very hesitant to even report. Like, it's really significantly so minimal, the number of survivors that actually report crimes to the police, because what's the point? They feel like there is not justice being done. This, again, is just another way that justice will not be done going forward because it expects people to be able to do something after a very difficult situation, and people are not ready.

We know, very sadly, that sexual assault is, you know, a crime of power, largely against women although, as my colleague previous to me said, men also experience it, but it is about power. It's a power differential in our society. We know that here in Alberta we have some of the highest rates in the country of sexual assault, so this should be top of mind for this government because they should be doing everything they can to make sure that survivors feel supported and safe, yet the UCP is doing absolutely the opposite. It just shows once again that Albertans cannot trust the UCP government.

Indeed, it seems like the more vulnerable you are, the more likely you are to have programs taken away by the UCP. We can see that in so many areas, you know, certainly the critic area that I'm responsible for, Seniors and Housing, oftentimes dealing with people on fixed incomes who have very limited resources – it's difficult oftentimes to get work at an elderly age, so they don't have a lot of options in that, and guess what this government did. These are extremely low-income seniors. They deindexed their benefits. We're experiencing tremendous inflation. There's an affordability crisis. I mean, why is it that the UCP thinks they should be picking on the most vulnerable in our society? This is just another example of that, and that is quite disturbing to me, of course, and should be to the UCP.

Bill 20 is an opportunity to actually right some wrongs that they did through Bill 16, and the fund, the victims of crime fund, shouldn't be used, you know, for whatever police initiatives they feel they should undertake. We want to make sure that the fund stays focused so survivors can access that. Certainly, we have been extremely concerned because of Bill 16 and now, again, Bill 20, that continues this sort of continued assault, almost like a systemic assault on survivors of sexual assault. Certainly, we would like the UCP to release the report completed by the working group to examine the benefits of the funds for victims. We'd like to hear more about that. We still haven't seen that.

We want the 45-day limit for the application deadline to be removed. You know, as I said previously, the two years was too short, and 45 days is certainly much too short. As I said, because of the trauma survivors have experienced, it's asking an extraordinary amount of courage and wherewithal to report, and that should be absolutely lifted.

Remove financial barriers to survivors and agencies supporting survivors. Increase the cap on counselling services from $1,000 to $3,000. Certainly, we know that even one session, like, a one-hour session seeing a registered psychologist or social worker, MSW, could be $250, so it's not very many sessions and that $1,000 is gone. We want to make sure that the survivors have the support they need, so certainly we're recommending that it be increased significantly, up to $3,000. We want to reinstate financial benefits for survivors and remove the moratorium on new grant applications from agencies serving survivors, including new programs.

I mean, those are some concrete examples of things that I think the UCP should be moving forward on, and if they are interested in increasing their level of support from Albertans and feeling like they actually are doing something for, certainly, this very vulnerable population, those are important things that the UCP should move on.

You know, there are so many levels of sort of discrimination against survivors. Certainly, many, many years ago, when I was a social worker in child welfare, I would go to court, and oftentimes I had cases where there was some kind of situation where there were issues with sexual assault. In one particular case there was a father who wanted unsupervised visits, but we knew from reports from the police that he was a pimp on the street. He was grooming his own young children for the sex trade, so of course we didn't want him to have the right to unsupervised visits with his children because we felt they were in danger.

But there were so many levels that we had to fight to make sure that the case was heard and understood. I have my master's in social work. I'm a regulated professional. I have experience. I have understanding. I wasn't anyone who experienced any kind of trauma or sexual assault or anything, yet for me that whole system was overwhelming, and the barriers were tremendous. If you can just imagine what someone who doesn't have that kind of educational background, you know, already experiencing tremendous trauma, who knows other characteristics of that particular individual – the court system isn't welcoming, frankly, Mr. Speaker, so we need to make sure that people are supported.

I mean, in this particular case that I'm talking about – I was the supervisor in the case – my staff member who was the caseworker was intimidated by the system, so I went with her to the court case, and even our legal aid lawyer wasn't very co-operative with us. They didn't even want to, you know, present some of the issues that we had, so I confronted this lawyer, and she just kind of ignored me and walked away. What happened – and I'm grateful this all happened, but I can see it also not going this way – is that we sat in the front row, right behind the lawyer. We were concerned about the safety of these children having unsupervised visits with their father, and the lawyer on our side, the legal aid lawyer, was supposed to be defending our concerns and standing up, and she sat there. She didn't do anything.

When the judge said, "Okay; well, there doesn't seem to be any problem with unsupervised visits," I started to shake my head just sort of involuntarily. Of course, we know that in court you're not supposed to even move. You know, you sit there very stoically. But I started shaking my head because I was so appalled at what happened, and the judge looked at me and pointed at me, and she said, "Who are you, and why are you shaking your head?" I told her, "I'm the supervisor in this case, and these children are at risk, and we're concerned about their safety." And she said, "Okay; let's hear some evidence." Then the lawyer stepped up, and we won that case.

So I'm very grateful that I went and supported my staff, and we were able to make sure that those kids didn't have unsupervised visits with their father, who we knew to be a danger to them, quite frankly. We did what we did, but as I said, how many people would be able to do that? I think it's expecting a lot of some folks.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I do see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has risen to join debate.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to provide some comments at this stage of debate, the second reading stage, for Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. This bill is making a few changes to a few different acts: the Corrections Act, justice of the peace, missing persons, victims of crime and public safety, and Youth Justice Act. Now, a number of these changes rise just ever so barely over the level of miscellaneous statutes, so I shall leave them aside, because the Official Opposition, having examined them, have no real quarrel with what is being done here.

The exception, of course, Mr. Speaker, is the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act changes, because essentially what happens through this bill is that the changes the government made previously, in the summer of 2020, I believe – it makes them permanent. It replaces some of the language around death benefits with funeral expense reimbursement. The definition in the act stays the same, but the name of the benefit reimbursement has changed. And there are a number of other changes. Essentially, it solidifies the changes that we saw in the summer of 2020.

Now, at the time those changes – the bill was numbered 16 in 2020. It changed the victims of crime fund to the victims of crime and crime prevention fund. Now, that fund had always been 100 per cent supported by a surcharge on fines issued by the police and the courts. Previous to the change the fund supported a wide range of community and police-based services, and funding was available to individual victims of violent crimes to deal with injuries, assistance with funerals, and supplemental benefits for people with severe injuries. There is no question that, however small, there were definitely a number of different counselling opportunities and lump-sum payments for victims of crime.

In particular, I'm going to focus my comments on sexual assault survivors because I have heard the most from various organizations on this matter. Now, the rationale at the time was that there was $74 million sitting in the victims of crime fund. The government wanted to take that money, and rather than ensuring an appropriate balance within the government's operating funds, it would take that money and use it to pay for Crown prosecutors, this, of course, after a massive multibillion-dollar corporate income tax cut that did nothing to create jobs, diversify the economy, attract investment. You know, there was a massive hole blown in the budget, so raid the victims of crime fund, I guess, to fund the prosecutors. They brought in legislation in order to do that, and this solidifies that.

What's particularly ghoulish about it at this point, Mr. Speaker, is that we have a multibillion-dollar surplus. The price of WTI today was $99. The '21-22 fiscal year is going to be a surplus numbering in a couple of billions owing to the spike in the price of oil – certainly, we will see some of that at the fiscal year-end, on June 30 – and then, of course, there's what's happening with the '22-23 budget. Again, due to a number of different geopolitical and other instabilities we are looking at a period of at least a few months of prolonged higher prices of WTI but also a pretty narrow differential – I noticed today that it was about $13 – and that improves the overall fiscal position even if the government just sits back and collects the money.

What is so galling here is that we are now cementing these changes to raid this money. The province indicated that they were going to review victims of crime and blah, blah, blah and tra-la-la. Well, what they did was that they suspended a number of the counselling sessions, they suspended a number of the lump-sum payments, and they have narrowed the reporting time to 45 days from two years. Now, two years was even not long enough in terms of reporting of a sexual assault – there's no question – but 45 days: well, I mean, it's designed to fail. It's designed not to provide victims of serious crime with what they are entitled to after there have been surcharges on fines by people who were found guilty of various things. Those fines were paid. That money was supposed to go to victims of crime. Now it's going heaven knows where, but it is certainly not going to victims of crime.

There's been all of this noise that the government made about: oh, we're going to have this, you know, travelling panel or these people to admire the problem. But nothing has actually been done, and meanwhile victims' services groups are left with fewer counselling resources, fewer resources for before court and after, and victims themselves are left with far fewer options for rebuilding their lives.

Now, the Association of Alberta Sexual Assault Services has been pretty clear with the government about what needs to happen here for victims of sexual assault, and the government has not listened. Recommendation 1, that the approval of applications and adjudication of appeals must take into consideration the unique characteristics of sexual assault trauma and the barriers and challenges victims face: not done. They haven't done anything. They have not lifted a finger on recommendation 1.

Recommendation 2, that all victims of sexual offences be eligible to apply for benefits with no timeline restrictions based on when the crime occurred and be excluded from application timelines that may apply to other offence categories: that is the recommendation from the Association of Alberta Sexual Assault Services. The government has not done it.

Number 3, that the new program be a hybrid system that allows victims to access funded and community-based programs and services directly and also provides lump-sum monetary payments to victims of sexual assault and sexual abuse: have they done it? No, they have not. They actually have made changes – and this bill solidifies them – to take that away from victims of sexual assault and sexual abuse.

Recommendation 4, that the fund categories be expanded to include financial support during and after court proceedings: are they doing this? They are not. Sexual assault victims do not have access to those funds for those services. This is a moral outrage.

Recommendation 5, that the fund categories include support that specifically addresses the long-term impacts of sexual assault and sexual abuse: totally not done.

Recommendation 6, that the fund categories include a formula or a multiplier to ensure equitable access to services for those victims of sexual assault and abuse living in rural and remote communities: nothing has been done on that for their own constituents. The UCP MLAs that are voting in favour of this should have some very serious questions for their Justice minister, how they can justify taking this money away from their own constituents, Mr. Speaker.

No. I think the position of the Official Opposition is that we will not be supporting this piece of legislation. You know, the fact of the matter is that, absent the changes to the victims of crime fund, this is a perfectly fine, serviceable piece of legislation, but those pieces certainly make it such that we cannot support it in its current form.

Now, if the government was to do the following things, we might consider it. For example, we should ensure that 75 per cent of the victims of crime fund would be reserved for victims and victim-serving agencies. How difficult is this? Three-quarters of the fine revenue that comes in from people who have committed offences – three-quarters of it – goes out to the victims of serious crime. Why is that a problem? Who would vote against that? Money is not the problem these days, but apparently the principle of supporting victims is the problem, and that's why it's not in this bill.

Now, we also proposed an amendment to Bill 16 in 2020 to ensure that accessibility to justice and financial aid is not limited to victims of crime due to reporting time frames and that minors who have witnessed acts of violence are also eligible to receive financial supports. If that was in this bill, we would vote for it, but it is not because minors who have witnessed acts of violence are not supported by these UCP MLAs and their approach to victims of crime. They're just not. They're just not. There's nothing for them here.

Now, if this bill included a restoration of financial benefits for victims who may have lasting impacts, including physical or psychological trauma, we may be able to support it, but it does not because this government is not supporting people who have lasting impacts, including physical or psychological trauma. If this bill opened up allowing for benefits beyond a severe neurological injury, we may be inclined to support it. It does not.

Now, as I described, Mr. Speaker, this is no longer about money for this government. This is about principles and values and a moral compass, and that is why the Official Opposition will not be supporting this bill. To my mind, it should be very simple at this point, when you are awash in oil revenues, you know, something that is absolutely not of the government's own making. It is true that they are certainly at the whims of fortune. The surplus as it is right now . . .

Mr. Schow: You couldn't balance the budget in these terms.

Ms Phillips: I'm being heckled, Mr. Speaker, by the Member for Cardston-Siksika, but I really actually think that he should spend his time explaining to the victims' services organizations in his riding and throughout southern Alberta why they don't have the money to do their jobs anymore. Maybe he can write a letter back to the Alberta association of sexual assault centres in response to all of those recommendations that remain unacted upon by this government. I would suggest that opening up his laptop and spending his time that way is a better use of his time than heckling me while I'm trying to speak to a bill.

Anyway, moving on, the fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that we have a multibillion-dollar surplus, so it should be reinvested in three ways, not the least of which is to start to repair some of the damage of health care, education, and other services. We should be looking at the role of savings and certainly lowering our debt-servicing costs through improving our overall fiscal position and investing in the heritage fund. We should be having a look at how we restore respect for disability services workers, for victims of crime. Clearly, certain members of the government bench would rather spend their time heckling than actually advocating on behalf of them. Certainly, we should be restoring respect for disability service workers. We should be restoring respect for teachers and, of course, restoring respect for health care, both the patients and the people who work in it.

Those should be our priorities in addition to making life more affordable, but I'll tell you what doesn't make life more affordable: having to pay out of pocket for extremely expensive counselling sessions after being a rape victim, which is what this government's changes to victims of crime have left people with, extremely expensive counselling sessions, extremely tight timelines to report that crime and to get any kind of help or assistance. I think it's five counselling sessions now. Wow. That should be the priority right now, restoring respect for our public services and the supports that we have out there in the community, the organizations that are working hard to support people, and building a province that we can be proud of, where victims of crime are given the supports they need to rebuild their lives.

It's with that concluding thought, Mr. Speaker, that I will conclude my comments on Bill 20. I look forward to the comments from the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika and him tabling letters to Alberta association of sexual assault centres in his response to their recommendations.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate on Bill 20?

Otherwise, I am prepared to ask the question and offer the opportunity to the hon. Member for Grande Prairie, I believe, to close debate should she so choose to take it. That is waived.

[Motion carried; Bill 20 read a second time]

Bill 21

Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

Mr. Sabir moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 21, Red Tape Reduction Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment May 9: Mr. Bilous]

The Acting Speaker: Thank you very much. We are on REF1. I believe the hon. member still has some time should he so choose to take it, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. However, you only have less than a minute to talk, just so you know.

Mr. Bilous: Well, Mr. Speaker, that's a problem, as every member in this Chamber knows. If I could trade some time with other members, I'd greatly appreciate that.

Mr. Eggen: No.

Mr. Bilous: I know. That's not permitted. I was just being witty.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I've spoken at length to this bill, and I have a sinking feeling that I will speak to it again. But part of the challenge that we've outlined in this bill, less so about the fact that this is an omnibus bill – I recognize that there are some good pieces to this bill, which I highlighted when I spoke earlier. As well, there are, you know, things, well, like making it easier for businesses to license across multiple municipalities. I think that's a great move, and I support that because I know that many companies operate amongst many different municipalities, and that's a challenge. That piece I like.

There are a lot of pieces that I have a challenge with, which I will highlight at the next opportunity.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you very much, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I want to thank my friend from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview for having spoken for only a minute. That was probably my favourite speech of his that he's ever given. Honestly, if the Government House Leader or any of his team is listening, I think we should give serious consideration to amending the standing orders to limit speaking time to a minute for each member.

You know, we are talking about reducing red tape and promoting efficiency in government. Just imagine how much more efficient this Legislature would be if we could only speak for a minute at every stage for every bill. We could pass hundreds and hundreds of pieces of legislation every session. I think the people of Alberta would at least have a much more interesting government if that were to be allowed.

You know, the subject of red tape is one that this government has spent a lot of time on over the last three years. First of all, I want to offer some comments to one particular member, my friend from Spruce Grove-Stony Plain, who has done such an excellent job on the Public Accounts Committee, questioning every ministry that has come before that committee for the last three years, asking it to talk about the actions that it's taken to cut red tape. Now, I will admit that I was a little bit disappointed, Mr. Speaker, because, for those who aren't familiar with how Public Accounts works, there are blocks of time where you can go back and forth with ministry officials; you ask some questions; they provide answers at the table. And then at the end of the meeting there is a three-minute block where we can submit written questions, that the ministry officials follow up on 30 days after they're answered, unless you're the Ministry of Education, in which case you take as much sweet time as you want, apparently, and disregard the authority of the Legislature. But that's an aside.

[Mrs. Frey in the chair]

The Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain generally asks questions about red tape in those question-and-answer blocks, which I look forward to. That's probably my favourite part of Public Accounts. But today he left us hanging, Madam Speaker. He refused to get to the questions on red tape for the culture and tourism ministry, no less, until the three-minute read-in section of Public Accounts. So the poor members of Public Accounts will have to wait at least 30 days until we get answers to the vital question of what the culture and tourism ministry has done in the last fiscal year to cut red tape. That is not fair.

Mr. Schow: How about that one minute?

Mr. Schmidt: Madam Speaker, I hear the Member for Cardston-Siksika asking if it's only been – it seems like it's only been a minute since I started speaking, not even. [interjections] I don't know. Maybe time is moving differently depending on the location in the Legislature, but it feels like I'm just getting started.

Anyway, I hope my friend from Spruce Grove-Stony Plain takes my helpful comments into consideration and moves those red tape reduction questions up in the questioning order at the next Public Accounts Committee.

But, you know, one of the things that I've noticed in the entire time that we've been talking about red tape is that this entire exercise has been completely meaningless. In fact, I would challenge the Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain to even stand up and tell us one particular thing that this government has done as part of its red tape reduction initiative that has made a significant impact on the lives of the people of Spruce Grove-Stony Plain or anybody else in Alberta. I bet that even though he has asked that question at every single Public Accounts meeting for the last three years, he would be hard pressed, without going back to the Hansard and reading the transcripts, to stand up and tell us any meaningful change that has been made to benefit his constituents or anybody else here in the province of Alberta.

There have been a number of changes that have caused significant concern through previous red tape reduction initiatives, those things that have impacted landowners' rights, particularly with respect to natural resource development issues. And I sincerely hope that we will have a full discussion about the impact that those changes have made in the real property rights committee, Madam Speaker, because I know that that committee is conducting its work and will be deliberating on its recommendations in the very near future. We have certainly heard from a number of landowners across the province about concerning changes that this government has made under the guise of red tape reduction that have significantly negatively impacted landowners' rights. Fortunately, there isn't a whole lot in here that seems to fall under that category, but I do think that it would be wise to . . . [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members – sorry, Member; I hesitate to interrupt – I rarely have trouble hearing the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, and I'm having trouble hearing him right now, so if we could please take our conversations to the lounge, that would be very helpful.

Go ahead. Sorry.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, Madam Speaker, I know you didn't say it, but it was the subtext that you wanted to hear the things that I said, so I'm really grateful for that. Thank you very much.

Yes, as I was saying, I think it would be wise for the members of the Legislature to vote for this amendment referring this bill to committee for further examination, because there is enough here in this bill to cause concern that I think we would be wise to spend the time in committee to dig into the issues that this bill presents and seeks to address.

First and foremost, of course, for me as the environment critic are the changes to the Provincial Parks Act and the Public Lands Act, which, if I quote from the bill, allows the minister to "set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines . . . or other rules relating to any matter in respect of which a regulation may be made under this Act." In layman's terms, this means that the minister can do anything he wants with respect to regulating provincial parks and public lands, and that's a problem because nobody trusts this government with provincial parks. We've seen already its attempt to close down and sell off hundreds of parks in 2020, and the government was stopped in its tracks in that attempt.

My fear is that this is an attempt at getting at that through other means, Madam Speaker, because we don't have any clarity on what this power that the minister is giving himself will mean. Will it mean that he'll be able to partially privatize parks? Will it mean that he'll have the power to prohibit access to parks? We don't know because it's unclear from the text of the legislation, and the minister certainly hasn't given us any clarity in any of his remarks around this bill either in the media or in debate in this Chamber. So I think that we would be wise to vote to send this bill to committee just for this section alone, just to really dig into what it means and whether or not it is actually a good idea to pass this amendment once we understand the full implications of those changes.

Now, of course, this bill doesn't just amend the Provincial Parks Act and the Public Lands Act. We have 16 acts in total, so 14 other acts that are being amended, the first, of course, being the Animal Health Act. It's particularly concerning to me, Madam Speaker, that the amendment to the Animal Health Act moves the need to report the presence of notifiable diseases in animals within 24 hours from legislation to the regulation and that now there is no specified length of time for reporting these diseases in the legislation.

I mean, I wasn't here when the original act was passed or whichever bill legislated these timelines in the first place, but I assume that there was some reason for doing it, and I assume that at the time those timelines were supported by agricultural producers. Once it's moved to regulation, Madam Speaker, of course, as you know, then cabinet can make the changes that it sees fit to the regulations behind closed doors. So my fear is that these reporting timelines may be changed without notice or any kind of consultation, and of course we can't have access to the cabinet discussions. We won't even know the reasonings behind cabinet making the changes to those reporting timelines. I think the timing of this change is particularly unfortunate given the significant impact that avian flu is having on the chicken population for our agricultural producers.

You know, again, Madam Speaker, it's really concerning to me that at a time when our agricultural producers are being hit hard by the avian flu, the minister is fiddling around with disease reporting timelines but not actually taking meaningful action to prevent the spread of avian flu. I recall an exchange in question period between my friend from Edmonton-Manning and the minister of agriculture on this very topic. I was astounded to hear the minister of agriculture say that we had heard that avian flu was going to be a problem two years ago when it started hitting flocks of chickens in other parts of the world and that they monitored the situation until it became a problem here.

Now, we are all familiar with the government's fondness of monitoring the spread of infectious diseases without doing anything about it, but it boggles the mind, Madam Speaker, to listen to the minister say that they had a two-year window in which they knew that this was going to be a problem, yet they failed to do anything to address it. Now that it's a problem that's growing, you would think that we would have some kind of policy solution coming from the ministry of agriculture, yet all we have, at least in the form of legislation here in this session, is a bill that amends the Animal Health Act so that disease reporting timelines are moved from the legislation to the regulations.

Member Loyola: The feds are taking care of it. Don't worry about it.

Mr. Schmidt: And the federal government is taking care of it. That's one of the things, that my friend from Edmonton-Ellerslie raises, that is a common theme with this government. We get bailed out time and time again by the federal government and then turn around and complain about them intruding into matters of provincial jurisdiction. You would think that a government that is, in words, anyway, so opposed to the actions of the federal government would at least follow up those words with action, stand on principle, refuse to allow the feds to intervene in our responsibilities, and do the work of looking after our agricultural producers ourselves. So it's really concerning to me, Madam Speaker, that here we are again in a dire situation where a problem is spreading out of control and we rely on the federal government to step in and save us from ourselves when we have the capacity to do this work and look after our agricultural producers on our own.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

There are a whole host of other amendments here that are causing some concern. The next piece in the legislation that's being amended is the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act. Now, these changes remove the one-year maximum on all licences for residential facilities in the child intervention system, including group homes and foster homes, and move those time limits to the regulations as well.

You know, like the Animal Health Act, the province of Alberta is in the grips of a crisis when it comes to children in care dying. We've had record numbers of children in care die in the year 2021, and I want to thank my friend from Edmonton-Whitemud for being such an effective advocate for children in care and holding the government's feet to the fire on its failure to protect those children in care. We have yet to hear any adequate explanation from members of the government as to why this time limit on licences is being moved from the legislation to the regulation. So I think that for this piece alone it's worth voting in favour of this referral amendment and getting into the details about this change and what that would mean.

So, Mr. Speaker, you know, in the brief amount of time that I've had, I've only been able to touch on a few acts, but already I think I've laid out the case for voting yes to this referral. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you very much, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate? I do see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen to join on REF1.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Of course, for those who are actually following along at home, I just wanted to give them a sense of, like, how many bills this particular proposed piece of legislation would be impacting. There are 16 acts that are going to be modified according to this bill, and they are the Animal Health Act, the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, the Cooperatives Act, the Education Act, the Health Statutes Amendment Act, the Highways Development and Protection Act, the Local Authorities Election Act, the Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Act, the Municipal Government Act, the Pharmacy and Drug Act, the Provincial Parks Act, the Public Lands Act, the Railway (Alberta) Act, the Residential Tenancies Act, the Rural Utilities Act, and the Surveys Act.

Just to give people that are listening in a sense of what is happening here, with the vast majority of the changes that are actually taking place, things are being moved out of legislation and into regulation. Of course, for those who don't know, when you place the majority of decision-making or changes on the regulation, well, the government can just choose to change those at any time that it wishes. Any time that it wants, it can just change a regulation. It doesn't actually have to come into the Legislature. It doesn't need to be debated at all, and the government can essentially just make a change whenever it likes. Of course, this is a concerning issue because then the government cannot be held to account on a lot of these things when they take place.

You know, for a government that claims that it's doing all it can to be as transparent as it possibly can, you'd think that, well, this is something that it would be trying to curb rather than instigate and bring forward. For this particular reason – and I believe that this government has given us enough examples and enough concerns to demonstrate that they just can't be trusted. Bill after bill after bill that actually comes into this House tends to be quite administrative, especially this session. What I've seen in the last three years in this Legislature from this government is that they move a lot of it to regulation, and then not only that; in the proposed pieces of legislation that they do bring into the House, Mr. Speaker, they actually put more and more power in the hands of ministers.

Now, I've gone on at length prior to today on the issue that, you know, the agencies, boards, and commissions of Alberta actually help in the democratic decision-making and in the governance here in the province of Alberta, and we count on Albertans to participate on these agencies, boards, and commissions. Actually, they do an incredible job of bringing in perspectives from stakeholders and different interested parties. It's important that we continue to carry on with that approach. However, what we've seen from this government is that not only are they taking power away from agencies or decision-making from agencies, boards, and commissions, but then they're actually taking that and giving it to the minister. That is what's concerning, because when you start adding up all of these factors, you start seeing that the government can't be held to account and that it can make sweeping changes whenever it likes. This is exactly what goes against the idea of strengthening our democracy.

You know, the members on the other side like to get up and talk about how they're strengthening democracy, but their actions are actually demonstrating that they're making it worse. This is what I find so perplexing, because we have members on the other side of the House that prior to 2019 were members of the Wildrose caucus. And I admit that the Wildrose – we may not see eye to eye on particular aspects, but accountability was part of their narrative, and keeping the government accountable was part of their narrative.

Now those same members that used to be on this side prior to 2019, who would get up and talk about strengthening democracy and that there needs to be government accountability, are the same members that are on that side of the House. You know, they're private members of the government caucus, not involved in the actual decision-making, and now they're actually supporting legislation which takes power away from agencies, boards, and commissions and gives it to the minister and then not only that; putting more and more of the decision-making process into regulation, which therefore goes against accountability, what they used to be firmly for when they were on this side of the House. That's what I find incredibly perplexing by members on that side. You know, although I don't agree with them ideologically, on strengthening our democracy and accountability I do.

So it just demonstrates for me why this government can't be trusted. It can't be trusted by these particular actions that it's taking. What's it trying to hide? Why does it need to go in – why do certain decisions have to go into regulation when before they were in legislation? I think that that's what this whole body was set up to do, bring in legislation and review the legislation. Let's debate the legislation so that then we can make the legislation better and more practical for the people of Alberta so that they can do the business that they need to do, whatever that may be. But here's a perfect example of how this government is making moves to be less accountable to the public, less accountable to this Legislature, less accountable overall, and that's why they cannot be trusted.

Now, I don't disagree. There are some parts of this proposed legislation that I see are very practical and that are indeed needed and I agree with, but there are some that I don't. That's what's concerning about this, because if they would have been brought separately, then we could have potentially voted those certain things in, and the ones that we don't we would have left out.

I think that one of the most concerning parts of the bill is actually when it comes to the decision-making of the Minister of Environment and Parks, or the minister of environment, over our provincial parks. Just to be clear, I'm going to quote from the bill. It says under minister's directives and codes that "the Minister may set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines . . . or other rules relating to any matter." I'll stress that: "any matter in respect of which a regulation may be made under this Act." It leaves one to interpret that the minister can basically just do anything that the minister wants.

Like, let me read that again to you, especially to those members who used to be on this side of the House and used to talk so much about accountability. "The Minister may set standards, directives, practices, codes, guidelines . . . or other rules relating to any matter in respect of which a regulation may be made under this Act." That is widespread, sweeping power that – and for any private member of the government caucus, regardless of which caucus they used to be part of prior to 2019, I think that would be concerning.

It has been made evident that Albertans do not trust this government with our cherished provincial parks. Many of my colleagues on this side of the House have actually gone into the reasons why. When it comes to coal mining in the eastern slopes, we saw how Albertans were actually enraged by what was being proposed by this government. Now, we actually vote this piece of legislation through, and the minister of environment will just run roughshod over all of that, because it clearly states here that, basically, the minister can do anything that the minister wants to do. Absolutely no accountability to this Legislature, never mind to the people of Alberta, and that is quite concerning. Why members from the other side of the House, private members of the government caucus, would actually agree to something like this I have no idea. I have no idea.

It could give the minister the power to partially privatize a park, perhaps powers to restrict access to a park. Of course, these are just guesses. These are just assumptions I'm making, of course, because we don't know – we don't know – because now it's no longer in legislation, and the minister will be able to bring anything that he wants into regulation through this proposed piece of legislation. You have to wonder.

You know, it seems that in any omnibus piece of legislation most of what's being proposed is, essentially, good. I mean, of course, it's debatable. But this government always tries to slide one huge piece in with its omnibus bill that is, I would say, quite controversial. None is more controversial than the one that we have before us right now with this particular proposed piece of legislation that, of course, gives such widespread and sweeping powers to the minister of the environment.

The other aspect of this is, of course, the confusion that was made between the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction and the Minister of Education. One was saying that the bill would do one thing while the other was saying that, no, it wouldn't do that. There wasn't even agreement among the front bench on what this piece of legislation would actually be doing.

So there are a number of reasons why we would need to refer this to committee, Mr. Speaker. I think that it would be wise for us to do so, considering what I've brought up in debate just now. I would highly encourage all members of this House to vote in favour of this referral amendment.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

We are on REF1. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen to join debate.

9:00

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this legislation. Time in this House is coming to a close, and I don't want to miss an opportunity to say a few things before that inevitability occurs. I think that in this particular case I certainly hope the government takes seriously the concerns that we have been expressing although it is quite evident that the government is not generally willing to heed any kind of comment or consideration that has been presented to them by anyone in this House, and in fact I think that on average that's been true of anyone in the province of Alberta, once they've made a decision. I guess my comments will be really directed toward people who are listening in and paying attention to the political process here in the province of Alberta.

The first thing I want to comment on is that we have here in front of us yet again an omnibus bill. I think that that's problematic in its own right. I know when the many members of the government were on the opposition side, if we ever put two pieces of legislation together, they complained about it being omnibus when it really wasn't.

But now we indeed have omnibus bills that come in that have involved a very wide range of unrelated legislation that should not be in the same bill because they have no purpose in being there. You know, this is another example of this government adopting the tactics of the Republican Party in the United States and copying their very antidemocratic process, something we saw when the Premier was, of course, a member of the Harper government in Ottawa, who did very similar kinds of things, purposely piling things together in order to bury certain aspects of the bill amongst the other pieces.

I can go through the bill and certainly I can find things that I think are quite reasonable and things I would like to support; for example, the change to the Municipal Government Act where it's easier to do licensing across boundaries so that people can have one business licence across many boundaries. Something like that is fine and quite appropriate, but there have been many other municipal-oriented bills that have been in this House where that piece could have been introduced into. The question is always, you know: why is it suddenly appearing here now? Why wasn't it done at the time it could have been done?

[The Speaker in the chair]

We have heard this evening a number of the speakers commenting on various aspects of the bill and presenting some very salient reasons why this bill should not proceed. Of course, I would like to add to that given that this is a referral amendment, and I can go through many different parts. Some of them, of course, are going to be supportive of comments already given by other members of the opposition.

I want to start with one piece that I have not heard a lot of conversation about so far but one that is close to my heart, and that is the change to the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, section 2. This seems to be sort of a small, you know, just sort of record-keeping kind of change, one that would be consistent with red tape reduction in the sense that it is a change just in terms of licensing procedures.

But I'm very concerned about the choice that is being made here. We are at a time when the crisis in children's services is the highest it has been in the history of the province of Alberta, essentially. We've had more deaths of children that have been in care or just recently left care this year than any other previous year, and we have to ask ourselves why that's happening. We should be spending some time doing a very deep examination of the causes of that and a real repair of the child welfare system in this province. Yet here we see in this bill not an attempt to improve situations but actually to reduce the supervision of care in the child welfare system by taking a rule which was that people needed to renew a licence on a yearly basis and extending it to three years.

Now, for many people they would say, "Well, that's not much difference," because, of course, they'd be coming from a position of perhaps, you know, a business licence for doing something like perhaps pouring sidewalks or something of that nature. You say: "Really, I mean, how much changes from one year to the next? Once somebody has got their business licence, why can't we just allow them to continue to practise for a reasonable period of time?" And in a situation of pouring sidewalks, I might support that, but in this situation I don't think that this is something that should be considered lightly, because we are not talking about pouring sidewalks. We're talking about human lives, and we know that in this day and age we are not doing a very good job of protecting those human lives. We have lost so many of them in the last year, in fact, record numbers of them in the last year.

So you have to ask: well, why would you want to extend licences from one year to three years, and why would you not want to go back and ensure every single year that the care being provided to children in the custody of the department is actually at the highest possible level of care? Why would you want to let that drift? Three years is a long time. Can you imagine being a 12-year-old child and something goes wrong in the first year that you were there, and it's not until you're 15 until somebody comes to investigate whether or not the house that you're residing in continues to meet the standards that are necessary? That's an incredible period of time between the ages of 12 and 15. I would hope this government would not allow a negative situation to continue for that period of time, and if they are extending licensing, they are essentially saying that they are going to decrease the amount of transparency and responsibility to the system from the care providers.

I'm very concerned about this, and I know that the government has said, "Oh, don't worry; this will only be used for renewables," but it doesn't actually say that in the legislation. They don't articulate that in a very clear and direct way, so I can't imagine that, in fact, is a valid argument. And even if it were, I wouldn't be supporting it. I just don't think that we should be doing anything to lessen our attempts to bring the highest level of care to children who come under the supervision of the Department of Children's Services in this province, and I wish the government would reconsider on that basis alone in this particular bill.

But moving on, I guess I have other concerns, so I will address them as well. For example, the section on co-ops and the decision to reduce the percentage of Canadian ownership for the co-ops from 50 per cent to 25 per cent. Again I'm very concerned about: why would they want to do this? Why would they want to lessen Canadian involvement in co-operatives for any particular reason? I'm just, you know, concerned that this is again something that the government is doing that appears on the surface to be a minimal administrative change but may actually have very significant consequences for people who are involved.

You know, if we continually make the decisions that we do not need to have significant local representation – and we are only asking for 50 per cent. We were only asking for half of the ownership to be Canadian before, so there's plenty of room for foreign investment. Now we are making a decision that we're going to shift it to less than 50 per cent, which means, ultimately, that foreign ownership becomes the majority on any decision that is made.

So we are ultimately taking the power for decisions to be made in the local constituency and moving it to an international constituency. Why would we do that? Why would we take the power to make decisions on very important mechanisms here in the province of Alberta and shift it to a foreign power?

Again, this is another time when the government is given a choice, and the choice is between average Albertans, who are trying to make a good living and trying to make Alberta a better place to be, and international corporations, who really don't have any interest in Alberta per se but are interested in their own growth and will be making decisions not based on what's good for Albertans but making decisions based on their own desire to expand their international well-being. So it means, ultimately, that someone who has an interest in another country will make decisions here that are not good for Albertans but are good for their services and the products that they own and they sell and the businesses they own and manufacturing and so on in other countries.

Why we would want to give that power away is beyond me except for, again, it speaks to the influence on the UCP from, you know, foreign interests that we've seen repeatedly in terms of energy and manufacturing and so on in this province. It's very concerning to me that they would make that kind of decision. Any time you give away your democratic power, you are making a mistake, and you shouldn't find yourself in a place to do that.

But then, of course, we have seen this government make many, many decisions that are essentially reducing democratic power. We've seen them, for example, create a whole new process for bills brought forward by opposition – well, brought forward by noncabinet members – into this House, that go to a committee. And, lo and behold, somehow a hundred per cent of the bills brought forward by the opposition had been killed before they arrived in the House, but that hasn't been true of any of the bills on the government side. So we can look at this and sort of say: is this a fair process? I can tell you, as an instructor of statistics at the university before I came here, that the chances of that happening are almost zero without prejudice.

Therefore, we would say that indeed there is, in fact, reason to believe statistically that this government is intentionally preventing democratic processes in this House. It introduced a process that has never existed in this Legislature up to this time. Why would they be reducing democracy? Why would they be reducing the voice of people who voted anything other than UCP in the last election? That's essentially what they've done.

This is the move of a government that is taking power and centralizing power and ensuring that there is a minimal chance that opposition will be able to speak to legislation or be able to introduce ideas into the House. We've also seen this government deny witnesses to committees and prevent them from attending these committees. We've seen this government invoke closure more than any government has done in the history of the province of Alberta to prevent opposition from speaking in this House.

In this bill we see the government handing extreme amounts of power to ministers and moving decision-making away from public transparency into the cabinet room, where we will never know what decisions have been made. That's been well articulated by the members from Edmonton-Gold Bar and Edmonton-Ellerslie.

So, you know, I think the concern that we have here is that this government is acting in a very undemocratic way, is subverting the Westminster process whenever they get a chance, and it is really unacceptable in this time. It's time for this government to stop this bill and bring it back into committee.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has risen.

Ms Phillips: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to provide some comments on Bill 21. As I understand it, we are on a referral at the moment, meaning that what we are looking for is a broader public conversation on this bill. There is no question that, given its omninature, it requires more study, I think, and a little bit more light and transparency. Certainly, Albertans are watching the government very closely. They're watching, of course, the outcome of the internal party process as of whenever it is, May 18. As a result, they're really interested in the leadership of the province and where the province is going.

When you have a bill that affects Education, Municipal Affairs, agriculture, Children's Services, environment, Health, Service Alberta, Transportation, and Treasury Board and Finance, that's going to raise a lot of questions for Albertans. Just exactly what are we trying to spirit through the Legislature under the cover of an omnibus bill, particularly – particularly – when this bill affects some really, really important things that people have raised a lot of concerns about? I'm thinking here of the tremendous public conversations that have been precipitated by the government's mishandling of parks issues and education, in particular. There's no question that there should be a bit more public comment solicited and certainly some provision of the opportunity for Albertans to have a closer look at this bill.

For example, the bill gives enormous and widespread powers to the minister of environment over provincial parks. No one trusts this minister with parks. There are still, since, you know, the summer and fall of 2020, constituencies like mine littered on the front lawns with defend our parks signs in one of the most impressive upswells of support for our natural spaces and our wild areas and, really, I think, the canary in the coal mine for the government on the issue of trust. There was very clearly a surreptitious plan to disestablish a number of parks.

Very clearly, this was not supported by the vast majority of Albertans, and people said so using what ability they had to speak out and to engage the government in their active citizenship. Given that we were not in a position to be, you know, attending town halls as citizens or doing the other things that we might do given the pandemic, people used the tool that they had, which was to put up signs, in particular throughout the city of Calgary, where a number of cabinet represent seats, where people were not at all amused with the experimentation with the parks. Not at all. So there is no question that on those grounds alone the Official Opposition believes that there needs to be more public comment on this bill.

I would certainly like to hear from people who actually have experience, perhaps retired people and others, in the appropriate management of our parks. There's no question that parks staff have been cut tremendously, so park rangers, COs, and others' ability to actually make the changes that the minister has made representations to this House are so very benign and "nothing to see here" – first of all, this business of being able to, you know, change signage and so on was already something that folks could do. But there's no question that parks have been left with fewer people to do that job.

Certainly, I think for many people, when you go out and chat with folks who are working as parks volunteers or with various societies, they don't necessarily feel supported in their work by this government, and I don't think that this bill provides them any comfort in this regard; in fact, quite the opposite, Mr. Speaker. So it is certainly of concern, and I think Albertans deserve to know and have more conversation about the fact that the minister is now receiving legislative authority to do whatever he wants with our parks. The trust has been absolutely shredded.

Mr. Schow: You closed Alberta's backyard.

Ms Phillips: Again, you know, the Member for Cardston-Siksika has a lot of opinions that he would like to share with the House. I would invite him to – he could table a letter in this Legislature outlining how the Castle parks should be disestablished, then. His minister has so far failed to do that, so if that's the position that he holds, he should be really clear about it, and maybe we can have an internal party division like we've already had on other issues on this issue.

You know, there's no question that the Member for Cardston-Siksika is also really worried about things like – well, he's not worried about his grazing lease associations, but he is worried about other activity on public land, and there's no question that he's got a lot of opinions about a lot of things. [interjection] He's chirping over there, and every time I get up to speak, he's got a lot of heckling to do. I feel like maybe he should focus less on me, because it's becoming a bit much, and focus on his constituents. I mean, he already dealt with his nomination race, but anyway.

The fact of the matter is that we have a trust gap on parks, and, you know, there's trust gap on a lot of things: public health care, for example, and certainly education and the curriculum and the management of overall finances, with billions of dollars in waste and giveaways and a government that ran the highest deficits in Alberta history. There's no question, too, that there's a trust gap that was created by a number of the southern Alberta MLAs, UCP MLAs, who couldn't give a straight answer about protection of the eastern slopes.

You know, there's absolutely no question that we need to protect our public lands. People want more oversight over the activities of the Minister of Environment and Parks, not less, and there's no question that allowing the minister to use tools for anything the minister wants is likely inappropriate. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. If hon. members want to have conversations, there are lots of places to do that. Across the aisle is certainly not one of them, particularly at this hour.

The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I mean, there's no question that there are a number of consultation opportunities within the parks act even around changing parks management plans, which are public documents, and they go out for a public comment period. You know, if the minister wants these powers to do these things, he is absolutely already, without this bill, able to do it. He just has to talk to the public for a period of time before he changes a management intent or the various uses.

Now, within the Provincial Parks Act in particular, I mean, there are a number of different uses that are allowed within that parks designation, including the development of various infrastructure like roads and even interpretive lodges and all of that kind of thing. Again, all the minister would have to do is just put that within the parks management plan and then put it out for public comment and satisfy the Indigenous consultation periods, and it would be done. So, really, this is not necessary, and there's no question that that's what has bred the distrust, Mr. Speaker, for this section of the act.

Now, there are a number of other pieces in this act that, you know, I think maybe we want a little bit more conversation around. Certainly, the piece around Alberta land titles looks good on the face of it. I just have some concerns about the overall management of land titles, and I would prefer some clarification from the government that they're not going to proceed with that very ill-advised plan to privatize land titles, for example.

I've just picked out a couple of the pieces that I will speak to in my comments on Bill 21 today, Mr. Speaker, and with that, I would like to move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 11 Continuing Care Act

Ms Gray moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 11, Continuing Care Act, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the government has not carried out sufficient consultations on the contents of the bill with families whose loved ones lost their lives from COVID-19 while in continuing care.

[Debate adjourned on the amendment May 4: Mr. Copping speaking]

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others on the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just want to make a few comments in regard to the amendment on Bill 11. Clearly, the issues that we have in continuing care are not being met by this bill. I think we've seen one of the most, you know, traumatic and difficult things in our health care system in a generation in regard to the pandemic response and how it manifested itself in continuing care systems. We literally lost more than 1,600 lives to COVID in continuing care facilities here in the province of Alberta.

You know, it's a reflection of what we have seen in other jurisdictions in Canada and around the world, but if there ever was a time to learn a lesson that we can move forward to protect our seniors in a more fundamental way, it was the loss of more than 1,600 lives in continuing care here in the province of Alberta during this ongoing COVID pandemic. Anything that moves forward to protect those lives and those people in continuing care facilities: that's what we need to focus on right now.

We as a caucus are certainly willing to stay and to build legislation and to build supports and financial supports to build a continuing care system that can withstand something like we just saw over these last couple of years. I think it's imperative that we do that right now. You know, to expedite that very important work that we should be doing, we need to move past what Bill 11 is offering us and build something that is more substantial, considerably more substantial, Mr. Speaker, because while we do have a young population, we just have a larger population in this province. What we have a shortage of is affordable, high-quality continuing care facilities for that significant group of people that will be seniors in these coming years.

It can't be just something for a privileged few that can afford thousands of dollars a month for care, but it has to be something that is universal, an extension of our universal public health system. We need that at this moment, at this juncture. Bill 11 just simply doesn't meet that standard, and for the sake of looking after those who are most vulnerable and people who are moving into that position, it's an imperative that all of us must take as a grave responsibility. There are just so many loose ends with continuing care right now. The facility-based continuing care review, for example, you know, still hangs in the air.

This whole issue around staffing and staff moving to multiple locations: we know it has been a documented medical fact that that was what was spreading COVID between facilities. We had lockdown in the facilities, yet COVID continued to spread apace, killing, as we see, more than 1,600 people, because people were working in multiple facilities and carrying it from one place to another. That whole scenario just could have been dealt with so much better. It's all about capacity, Mr. Speaker. Of course, people are working in multiple facilities because they're trying to make ends meet. They can only get part-time jobs, so they have to work at two or three different places in order to have a living wage. You know, all of these things add up together.

So even if we remain dispassionate and not look at it as a moral imperative to look after our seniors now and in the future, we can look at it scientifically to say that you literally are endangering a larger population by not doing anything about the continuing care situation. You know, we are still in a state of high COVID transmission, so it's not like we're out of that situation at all. What might come next? I mean, that's the thing, right? We can see that now, that there's a huge vulnerability around virus spread and the potential for that to occur again, and we just logically need to deal with that. If we have people in continuing care facilities that are vulnerable, then a version of that will just simply happen again, Mr. Speaker. It doesn't take rocket science to figure that out.

Bill 11, you know, I think could do much better. I certainly think that it needs to be not just amended but scrapped, and I think that my position is reflected not just in our caucus but amongst the general public as well.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I also want to speak briefly to this motion regarding Bill 11. I think we do know that the UCP has failed the residents of continuing care throughout this pandemic. Albertans cannot trust the UCP with their health care, and we have evidence that over 1,600 continuing care residents in Alberta tragically passed away from COVID-19. Those outcomes could have been different, and we don't see anything in this piece of legislation that will help us fix that.

More importantly, this bill doesn't even fulfill the UCP's own promise from a year ago: one, they will increase home care; two, the amount of hours of care that residents will receive will increase; and three, increase the proportion of full-time staff. They didn't even do that in this piece of legislation, and I think our residents in continuing care, seniors in this province, deserve far, far better than this from this government. That's why this bill should not get the support of this Legislature.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will take my seat, but prior to taking my seat, can I move a motion to seek unanimous consent that we move to one-minute bells for the remainder of this evening?

The Speaker: I'm sorry, hon. member. Can you repeat that? I just want to make sure what you're asking for. It matters as we may go in or out of committee, so there's some difference in what you're asking for. Can you clarify what you're hoping for here?

Mr. Sabir: I am seeking unanimous consent that we move to one-minute bells for everything tonight.

The Speaker: For the remainder of the evening.

Hon. members, the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall has requested unanimous consent for the remainder of the evening to go to one-minute bells, which would include the first bell in Committee of the Whole.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Speaker: Hon. members, on Bill 11, are there others?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call the question.

[Motion on amendment RA1 lost]

The Speaker: Hon. members, on Bill 11, are there others wishing to join in the debate?

Seeing none, I am prepared to call the question or ask for the Minister of Health to close debate.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for second reading carried]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Amery in the chair]

Bill 22 Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022

The Acting Chair: Are there any members who wish to speak to amendment A1? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Chair. It's an honour to rise to speak to amendment A1. I have had the opportunity to speak to the main bill, Electricity Statutes (Modernizing Alberta's Electricity Grid) Amendment Act, 2022, and I continue to have the same concerns as previously provided. Obviously, I support the idea of expanding opportunities for energy storage and opportunities for investment in our province on that specific issue, but I think there are definitely more conversations that have to be had to ensure that we are strengthening this legislation to the best of our ability.

To go further, I think that there are important conversations that we need to have regarding the lack of support for Albertans on important issues like the rising cost of living mainly because of decisions from this UCP government. When it comes to increasing utility costs at the same time as we're seeing that process take place in the province, unfortunately this government has been unwilling to provide any reassurances, based on the conversations we've heard in this House so far. While the government has committed to providing relief for utility costs specifically on electricity...

But specifically on electricity and natural gas, even when the minister is getting questions from his own bench – obviously, they've had time to prepare this exchange, and even when their own private members are asking when Albertans can expect to see relief, the minister doesn't have answers for them as well. So while I do see myself supporting the general direction and in principle what we're seeing in this legislation, I think there are opportunities to strengthen the legislation itself, much like we are seeing in the proposed amendment from the Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall. So I again rise this evening to support the changes that that member is proposing in the legislation.

With that, Mr. Chair, I think I'll take my seat. I think that there are more important conversations that we can have around this amendment, but I appreciate the opportunity.

Thank you.

The Acting Chair: Thank you.

Are there any other members who wish to speak to amendment A1? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to speak again to Bill 22 and this amendment. I certainly like the fact that we are moving forward in terms of a new electrical grid system in the province of Alberta. Of course, that requires a variety of statute changes and so on. I find it quite interesting that repeatedly on the government side of the House they have complained that we overbuilt the electrical grid system in the province and have blamed us for it in spite of the fact that it was actually a build that was designated and paid for by a Conservative government prior to our coming in. But we've been told that we should have stopped it. Of course, as all reasonable people think, the NDP should stop just about anything that the Conservatives do, and sometimes they even agree with us themselves.

What is also interesting is that recently in question period the Minister of Finance stood up and said that there was hesitancy about moving forward on electrical cars because they weren't sure the grid could handle all that electricity, which is quite ironic given the fact that he said that we overbuilt it one day, and the next day he says that we might need a bigger grid; we might need to build more. So we can see that this government is quite confused about electricity, as they are about a number of other topics, and simply, you know, are in the habit of using talking points instead of actually answering the questions from the people of Alberta or taking responsibility for their behaviour.

But I welcome this bill because this bill is actually the government trying to correct one of their previous errors. I always want to support that. When they come into the House and realize that they've made mistakes, they should fix themselves, and I'm happy to see them doing that in this particular case. There are a number of aspects of this bill which I think are important and things that I think will move forward, but I also think that we need to take some time to pay attention to what they're doing and see if there might be some things that could be improved with the bill. As such, we're here to speak to the amendment.

I think it's important that we actually put this in the context of what's happening. Around the world governments, investors, and, you know, the vast majority of leading thinkers are suggesting that we should be moving in the direction of a significant electrical supply and the replacement of nonrenewable resources for energy production. Now, that's going to have significant consequences in the province of Alberta, and I know that the government is very concerned about that because they keep wanting to go back to the 1970s, when these kinds of questions were not so complicated. Life was simpler. So I can understand that they have some confusion over where we need to be going, but I can tell you that what we really want to have in this province is for Alberta to remain a major player in the energy world. The government, unfortunately, thinks that that's going to be by going backwards in time whereas we believe that there is a future, and that future will include, of course, oil and gas in a variety of ways.

We certainly presented many ideas for how we can help oil and gas move forward into the future and not go back to the past. You only have to go to albertasfuture.ca to see policies on things such as hydrogen or lithium or the conversion of well sites to geothermal or, you know, a variety of other things like that. But we also believe that we need to make sure that we get in front of the changes that are necessary for us to have an electrical system that is less reliant on oil and gas sources and more reliant on renewable sources.

Of course, when we were in government, we did some amazing things to make that happen. We had a renewable energy bid program that brought in some of the best prices for energy, guaranteeing the price of energy for many, many years to come and doing so not only by encouraging Alberta producers to produce more renewable energy for our electrical grid through, in this case, almost all, I think all, wind turbine energy development. But we also, in our second round of the REP bid, insisted that First Nations participation be in the actual ownership of the program, and we again got incredibly good results in terms of the price bid. We know that the NDP government was looking toward the future, was moving the province ahead, and was very successful in doing so, so we appreciate anything that this government does to attempt to try to catch up with that great modelling that we provided to them.

There are a number of things that I think are interesting in this bill and some things that we probably should spend a little bit of time examining here. I think that I want to start by saying that, as I've mentioned already, there are things I like about this bill. I do appreciate that there's a tariff that will be used to reduce transmission costs for the consumers. I think that's a good idea.

I am wondering about one particular piece that's kind of attached to that, and that is the ability for people who are doing self-supply to then sell or export any excess. There aren't any definitions around limitations or expectations around that. What we might have is somebody who is doing self-supply and then selling excess, but that excess apparently could be as high as 99 per cent of the energy produced.

Is that the intention of this government, that, in fact, people could actually become exporters of electrical energy in this province, which would require, of course, a very large, well-built grid running down the centre of the province toward the places that we might export to, even though the government has constantly complained about the existence of that? In this case, because they haven't put any definitions on it, what we are not sure about is whether or not people could ostensibly appear to be self-suppliers when really, because they're selling 99 per cent of it, they're actually exporters.

Is that the intention of this government? Is this an attempt to move into exporting by simply having people set up a small shop in the site, use a small piece of the electricity for perhaps running the lights in the building that they're using to export the energy from? Is that the intention? Is that where they're going? Is this really all about the continuation of the Klein-years desires to sell Alberta's electricity into the States? This bill doesn't make it clear if that's where they're going or not.

I probably have said as much as I want to say this evening and have nothing more that I could possibly add to this and will just simply close my last three pages of comments at this time.

Thank you.

The Acting Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members who wish to speak to amendment A1? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview. Thank you.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. It's my pleasure to speak to amendment A1, brought forward by the Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall. It has to do with the Alberta utility advocate. Of course, this legislation, Bill 22, does say that the fee can be charged to Albertans for the Alberta utility advocate. Previously this was paid through the Balancing Pool. I guess this is just yet again another example of the UCP, you know, putting a burden on individual Albertans having to be responsible.

They've done so many things to increase costs out of pocket, you know, the affordability. We really are in an affordability crisis, and here yet again is something else where the UCP is reaching into the pockets of Albertans and asking them now that they must pay for this Alberta utility advocate office through a fee. That's why we brought forward this amendment. We are saying that, no, this should not be something that you're taking out of the pockets of Albertans. It's not fair. So we're helping the government out. I know that they want to make sure that Albertans aren't, you know, being asked to pay so much more.

I would commend all members of the House to please vote in favour of this amendment A1. Thank you.

The Acting Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Is there any other member who wishes to speak to amendment A1?

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

Prayers

The Acting Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideals but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: Hon. members, I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 20

Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered at this time? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows has risen.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Chair. It's my pleasure to rise in the House to add my comments to Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, on behalf of my constituents in Edmonton-Meadows and the concerned Albertans that have reached out to me in different periods of time regarding the issues in the justice system. This bill I'm looking at seems to be making some justice changes, and the biggest concern that I have about this bill is that I don't see much of it that I'm hearing from my constituents that they wanted to see in order to see the improvements, the help they are looking for in the justice system. I don't really see any of those concerns being addressed in this Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022.

Affordability has exponential stress and effects on Albertans, particularly for the past few years, and the majority of Albertans are struggling to make their ends meet due to the rising cost of commodities, the rising cost of services. When it comes to the justice system, many constituents who approach me regarding their concerns feel that the access to the justice system is questionable, is not in their range, is not in their reach, and in many ways they find many barriers. This is not something they deal with on a daily basis, and this is not the area where we would expect ordinary individuals in this society to be highly educated and aware and knowledgeable about the whole process.

I've been dealing with one of the community members from Calgary. She is in trouble due to the incident that they were in. They were defrauded by someone by cheating, and they're seeking – they're in a position like they feel that they have lost the savings of their whole life. They worked. They're in their 70s. I think they worked hard to build this life and save for their retirement. At this age, when they were depending on that very savings to live their life worry-free – or you can call it relatively comfortably – I think these savings would help them live relatively reasonable lives without being worried about being able to put food on the table or afford the daily necessities. Their savings were actually raided by cheating.

They wanted to access the justice system. They found, like, many barriers. That's why they reached out to me, because the barrier was that there were no services available in other languages. The provision in the justice system is to provide the services and translations in many other languages, but the shortage of staff and availability of the services is really impacting those individuals. I tried to help them. I tried to arrange someone from this city who could help them translate with the legal department so they could at least reach the legal aid department, see if they can qualify for the help from legal aid. Without that help that I worked on in this city, it was impossible for them to, first of all, find that the help is there, and second, if they knew that, there were additional barriers that the service was not available in any language other than English.

So what we wanted to see, the reason why I discussed this case and experience – I'm hearing from the very Albertans and racialized peoples; their first language is not English – is to have this on the record, what is happening right now in Alberta and what kind of experience the minorities, the ethnic communities, the racialized communities are having when it comes to the justice system access.

Generally speaking, we all understand – the UCP government has acknowledged this many times – that the justice system is struggling with the staffing issues, correctional officers, Crown prosecutors in a number of ways. We acknowledge that, and the UCP government did acknowledge this in many of their statements and in their announcements. Bill 20 does not address any of these issues.

So it is not possible – it is very hard for the families. They're already struggling to afford the necessities of life, not because just it is their fault, but it has also been contributed to by this UCP government's last three years of their approach of removing caps from a number of other things. I think that was their simplest approach, that they wanted to leave the very Albertans on the free market. The government does not see the responsibility or duty they have when it comes to serving their citizens, making sure that the things they need in their daily life is in their approach. They removed the cap from the insurance, they removed the cap from the tuition fees, and they removed the cap from the utility prices. It's not only that; they also increased the interest rate on student loans.

This is the approach this UC government had for the past three years, that has made the life of Albertans very hard, and when average Albertans are living this kind of life, it's very hard for Albertans to come up with an additional sum of money when it comes to seeking the access to the justice system. If we do not have enough staffing, if we do not have enough support that is required in the justice system in order to serve the very Albertans, definitely they will need to look into other avenues where they will need to come up with an additional sum of money, and that will just, you know, add another barrier for those people that need the help. In many cases that is the only resort they have to reach the justice system.

This bill does not address those issues that I'm hearing from my constituents, particularly from a racialized group of people, and also from the Albertans from the racialized communities that I talked to across the province. We need to do more. We need to hire more prosecutors, more staff. Not only to hire more staff, prosecutors, or appoint more judges; we also need to increase diversity. We need to have services available in other languages. This Bill 20 does not talk about any of those issues that the very Albertans are feeling very challenged with when it comes to seeking justice for the problems they are struggling with.

We have seen what this government's precedence is for the last three years. We have seen what they have done to a number of other things. I remember standing in this House when the government announced the Police Act review. We proposed that the government should create an antiracism panel that could go out and consult with racialized communities, particularly with Indigenous communities, that are disproportionately represented in our correctional system or justice system, so they could talk to those people and hear their stories and pain and suffering and conduct a report and bring it back to the Assembly with their recommendations. That proposal was defeated by the government House members.

We do not only need resources in the justice system to provide the full support that the justice system is lacking right now; we also need to put our focus on how disproportionately this is impacting the racialized communities, ethnic communities, and Indigenous communities.

Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, does not talk about any of these issues. I'm surprised that this bill does not even care about what Albertans talked about in the government's previous legislation, when the government brought the bill into the House to make changes to the victims of crime fund. The people – professionals, semiprofessionals, agencies, organizations – who are working in our province for decades successfully helping people during their difficult and challenging times spoke against the legislation this government was proposing and eventually passed. The government ignored them all. The people are still concerned that the changes they made to the victims of crime fund eroded the capability of those very agencies. They were there when those very victims needed help.

This was done because the government did not consult with any of the stakeholders. They did not consult with the victims. They did not consult with the agencies. These agencies and the people who are directly impacted by that legislation spoke out loudly against the government efforts and changes eventually passed in this House.

If the government was serious or the Justice minister was serious about making changes in the justice system, this was the time to address those very issues. Not only the people and stakeholders and agencies were concerned with the changes made to the victims of crime fund, but also some of those programs have already acknowledged and recognized what exists in our justice system: lack of support, lack of funding, lack of staff. This bill does not tackle anything.

It's very hard for us to support this bill. The government spent three years, from 2019 to 2022 – I would call it a wasted opportunity. If they recognized the problem and still could not come up with a plan and funding and resources in three years, when will they do that? It means the government is not serious about it.

This is not what I hear from my constituents. This is not what I hear from racialized communities. Their concerns are very different. There was a big incident in my community a few weeks back. There was a young gentleman at the age of 16 who was killed in a very, very bad and violent crime, the family's only child, a 16-year-old boy.

The people are concerned about their safety. Those are the questions that they're asking. I attended the vigil at the school, and thousands of people came out in support. They were looking for answers from the politicians. Unfortunately, the family had to speak out at that place. None of the government representatives reached out to the family, and they did not even show up for any of the public events either. Those are the concerns. I think politicians need to have answers for those questions.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to join? We are on Bill 20. I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair, for the opportunity to speak in committee to this Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. I appreciate the information sharing from my colleague, who works significantly with members of his community and was able to bring a piece or a perspective, I guess, to Bill 20 with regard to how individuals from racialized communities might see the Justice Statutes Amendment Act before us.

I had the opportunity in second to talk about this and to listen to my colleagues, particularly the critic for Justice from Calgary-Bhullar-McCall and the former Justice minister from Calgary-Mountain View. I can say that they centred in on several points, but the main takeaway for me and what I'd like to spend my time talking about is the victims of crime fund and the mess that's been made there by the UCP government.

You know, as a former Finance minister I certainly understand the desire to go looking for funds when you're in pretty dire straits in terms of revenues. We went through a significant negative WTI situation. These are challenges that both the bureaucracy and the cabinet council and the Finance minister and the Finance department struggle with because you've got to kind of understand where the revenues have cratered and what's going to backfill them.

It seems to me that the victims of crime fund was seen as an available pot of monies that happen as a result primarily of driving fine offences and the monies surcharged onto tickets, driving penalties. That probably seemed like a worthy and welcome amount of money to seize on to defer the costs of other police, protective, and justice system programs.

But today the situation is much different. Today the situation is a surplus in this province as a result of the significant rise in the price of oil. Regrettably, the world is in a different place than it was two, two and a half years ago, when these funds were seized on. The unfortunate crisis that is in Ukraine and the unconscionable actions of Russia have driven up the price of oil and energy resources in this world to, well, lengths that, frankly, you have to go back a lot of years, probably to – when was it? In 2004, '05, '06, somewhere in there, it spiked, but we haven't seen a spike in decades in this province.

Now we do. There is an overabundance of money in the treasury, and we don't have to take money away from – the government does not have to take money away from victims of crime anymore. They can go back to the way it was funded, Mr. Chair. They can go back and properly fund these programs out of treasury, not out of funds that are collected for people who have suffered horrendous personal circumstances as a result of crime in the community, crime in their homes, from their nearest and dearest sometimes.

The government is doing the wrong thing, and the government needs to change that. We as opposition members talked about this in 2020. We spent so much time. We had stakeholders come forward who had shared their most difficult personal circumstances with members of the media, with members of the public, with Albertans to try and get across how this is wrong. They're being denied what is theirs. There's less money for victims in the victims of crime fund now because of the government's actions, and this statutes amendment act further solidifies that wrongdoing. So, no, I won't stand up and support this. This act, this bill is doing wrong to victims, doing wrong to Albertans, and it doesn't have to be done.

We're in a different financial circumstance in this province now. The actions that were taken out of desperation before, to fund programs for justice, for prosecutors, salaries, don't have to be done. But instead of correcting that, private members of this government are standing behind a wrongdoing to Albertans. It's unconscionable. We have raised it over and over and over again, and it has no effect at all, but it does have an effect on victims. It does have an effect on people who have been harmed by crime in this province, and they are not getting their due from this government.

A 45-day limit is put on the ability to access this fund now. Forty-five days. When someone has been traumatized, 45 days is not enough time. You are nowhere – and I'm not talking about, you know, having the experience. I'm talking about listening to victims, survivors, trying to understand what their reality is. The reality is they need more time. So why is a 45-day limit being put on? Why? Why is the victims of crime fund not funded properly? Why are prosecutors and other justice system programs being funded out of this? I don't think it passes any smell test anymore.

The other changes include the removal of the current injury benefit and the witness to homicide benefit. The removal of the witness to homicide benefit may have a negative outcome as therapy is expensive, and someone who has witnessed the homicide of a loved one will likely need it. Like, that's an understatement, obviously. Someone who has witnessed the homicide of a loved one will likely need therapy, but that benefit is taken away. I don't know who on the other side can defend this. I don't know why you would want to defend that.

The financial benefits are being narrowed, Mr. Chair, to the people who have experienced severe crimes. If witnessing a homicide of a loved one is not a severe crime, to be able to access benefits, I don't know where that's going in terms of what is a severe crime, then.

We talked long and exhaustively when the government introduced Bill 16 in 2020. We said that that's going to be a problem. We are here today saying the same thing. It is a problem. We know it's a problem. Survivors have come forward and indicated that the victims of crime fund does not meet their needs. Instead of addressing that, we have got a government who is plowing ahead, saving funds from treasury when there are surplus funds, when programs should be able to be funded. The government is nickel and diming victims so that they have to do GoFundMe pages. They have to raise funds themselves. They have to take every sort of action to try to address their needs where previously – I'm not saying that the victims of crime fund was perfect, but it was there, and it was doing the job.

There were significant monies in it, Mr. Chair. There were, as I understand, about 70-plus million dollars. That can get eaten up pretty quickly if you're talking about salaries. That can kind of whittle down quickly when you're talking about ongoing operational expenses, which is what salaries are, which is what program support is, ongoing operation. Why is ongoing operation part of a victims' fund? You have to ask yourself. Ongoing operations are part of administration, are part of doing business, are what governments do.

We're just seeing this mess that's been made of the victims of crime fund further, as I said, legislated and put into place, and I and my colleagues oppose that. We need to get back to thinking about the original intent of this fund. While there are many other parts of this bill – the Corrections Act, the Justice of the Peace Act, the Missing Persons Act, the Youth Justice Act – the most egregious part is the one that I have spent the time on and the one that Albertans, I think, recognize as something that should be addressed.

We think that the wide range of community- and police-based services that are getting assistance as well as prosecutors need to be shifted, shifted to a place where the government acknowledges that they want to keep those programs going and properly fund them through available monies from treasury under the Ministry of Justice. That's what should be done, but instead we have to stand up and argue that victims should be treated properly. Any victim who is unable to access services because there are not the monies or there is a narrowing of parameters needs to hear this, needs to be aware that they are not getting the support that previously would have been offered to them.

I will at this point give way to a colleague who could probably argue better about the victims of crime fund and other things, but my opposition stays solid. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you very much, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has risen.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. Happy to rise this morning and follow up on my colleague from Calgary-Buffalo's comments. I don't know if I'll be much clearer than you. I think you've, you know, made the point fairly succinct here.

As he was mentioning, we are seeing various changes within Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, changes across the corrections, justice of the peace, missing persons, victims of crime and public safety, and the youth justice acts. Now, as some of the opening statements said, some of this is housekeeping, which, of course, I don't necessarily have a problem with. There are always times where you have to look at language, update it because terms may have changed, procedures may have changed and you have to have the language that reflects that, which, of course, does actually, you know, get me to thinking: why didn't we necessarily maybe hand that down to the red tape ministry? We've seen that quite a few times with legislation, where it seems to be handed down to the red tape ministry to try to justify the $10 million to $15 million that the government is spending on this endeavour in order to, I guess, at least look like you're doing something.

We certainly saw some of the housekeeping pieces of legislation that came through there that were questionable at times, whether they're actually red tape or not. You know, my favourite one to think of was when the former associate minister crowed very loudly about cutting red tape for Albertans so that they wouldn't have to pay $10 when cutting their Christmas trees. They still had to fill out all the paperwork that's required for that, but they didn't have to pay the $10. That was humorous at best. So I'm wondering why perhaps some of these changes weren't handed down to the red tape ministry like we've seen in the past.

But in correlation with Bill 20 I'm seeing some similarities in terms of how some of the changes are being grouped together. We've seen red tape bills that have come forward where you've got, you know, pretty much nothing controversial being brought forward in terms of changes but mashed in an omnibus style with some very concerning changes, to say the least. We currently have Bill 21 that's before us that has this kind of combination although Bill 20 is not what I would consider omnibus because all of these changes are under, at least, one ministry. Although they are multiple acts, they do revolve around Justice, so I'm a little bit more forgiving in that part.

But, again, whereas we have pieces that are changing that I don't necessarily have a problem with, we see a very distinct failure, as my friend from Calgary-Buffalo had mentioned earlier, around changes to the victims of crime fund. I guess you could almost say that it's a bit of a pattern, Mr. Chair, where decisions that are being made by this government are penny-wise but very pound-foolish. You know, we have a need to make lives more difficult for diabetics by taking away insulin pumps, yet we seem to have the money to go and chase Bigfoot. We seem to have to make the lives of AISH recipients more difficult and more uncertain, yet we seem to have plenty of money to hand out to very, very profitable major corporations. It's this type of thinking that really baffles me.

With the changes to the victims of crime fund, as my friend had stated earlier, you know, to deny these people access to services in times of great trauma and upheaval, potentially, in their lives begs the question of, you know: what's the government thinking here? Why is it they feel they need to do this? I mean, for instance, a change around having to report and access these funds within 45 days: Mr. Chair, I think everybody knows that for anybody experiencing, for instance, domestic violence or sexual crimes, the thought of even coming forward within 45 days – people can't get there. They're still trying to work through what even potentially just happened to them. What is this rush that the government has? Are they thinking, "Well, it's red tape, and we're trying to be more efficient"? You can't force these types of things to move forward. You have to work with the people experiencing these things.

So why they would come out with a victim or a survivor needs to access these funds within 45 days – come on. You have to come up with something at least a little bit better than that. Like, where did these 45 days come from? You know, what kind of consultations have you heard from victims, from survivors that said, "Oh, yeah; 45 days is plenty; not a problem"? I certainly haven't seen anybody come forward to me about that, and I've had the opportunity to interact over the years, not just over the course of the 30th Legislature but over the course of the 29th Legislature, when I got the honour to serve the constituents of Edmonton-Decore as well.

There's an organization that I sort of feel calls Edmonton-Decore home. The founder is a constituent, which is why I kind of, you know, try to lovingly make that connection with the riding. It's a support group for the victims of homicide in the Edmonton chapter here now. Some of the stories that these individuals tell, frankly, are absolutely heartbreaking. Mr. Chair. I cannot even begin to fathom trying to wrap my head around dealing with that, but these individuals are.

You know, with some of the changes, as my friend from Calgary-Buffalo had mentioned, around the funding of this program: there is so much more that could have been done with these funds. All I'd have to do is connect you with victims of homicide. I remember working diligently with them, trying to find some mental health supports for some of their members, because there was nothing out there for them. The victims of crime fund could have easily funded those kinds of supports for them. Quite frankly, I mean, I got lucky, Mr. Chair, and there was a little bit of help available through the PCN network. But, again, it's a little bit. There's so much more that could be done to help these folks.

Some people think that victims of homicide – I remember clearly this one story, Mr. Chair. Unfortunately, the individual's partner was involved in things that led to a very high-risk lifestyle, but that individual had no idea that that's what their partner was doing. That doesn't make the loss any less for them. It doesn't make the challenges that they end up facing any less. How can we help these individuals?

Again, these stories that I heard from the support group from victims of homicide and how they're trying to find ways, trying to find funding to be able to help their members cope with these losses: we could have easily made changes to help these folks. We have the money here, yet we've decided, "Well, we're going to siphon this off because we've got something else that we're more interested in doing." I mean, I'm sure there are members that can say that, well, these are changes that we can do to deal with other justice matters. Okay; fine. But, as I said, why then are you spending money chasing around Bigfoot? I keep joking with people now: "What's next? Ogoogo?" Are you going to start chasing that around?

It's this thinking that the only way we can dig ourselves out, as they see it, is to go after the ones that can least afford to be – I don't know – targeted, used to try to achieve those goals. Yet there are other opportunities that we can take. We didn't have to give a great big corporate handout of $4.7 billion. You know, I've talked to plenty of people, and they're saying that, well, they're not seeing the jobs being created for this money. We know for a fact that, I mean, there was one that just simply took the money and literally ran right for the border and crossed it.

I'm really hoping, perhaps, that members of the government will reconsider some of the changes. Again, I don't have problems with all of the changes in Bill 20. I get the housekeeping part, and that's fine. But why, going into an area, supposedly under, like I said, the guise of red tape reduction being more efficient, with all those great buzzwords – we're going to push a thumb down on those that can least defend themselves. At the very least, reconsider this 45 days. Come on. You're talking a month and a half. A month and a half.

We can do better, Mr. Chair. We have to do better, and we have an opportunity. We're here in Committee of the Whole. There are amendments that could be made. There are things that we could do differently. I would still like to hear some more discussion and debate about this. We can always talk about what changes could be best, but I definitely want to hear from the government side on how they arrived at this 45 days. That is just – that's unacceptable. You can't tell me that you found anybody that said that that was a good idea, that has experienced domestic violence, sexual crimes against them, that 45 days is plenty.

With that, like my friend from Calgary-Buffalo, I'll give way to some of my other colleagues to hear some of their other comments. Hopefully, we'll see some members of the government get up, provide some comments, answers, maybe, to some of the questions. I know that I've stated here, probably, some of the questions that my colleagues will also have around this. Again, when you have a bill where some changes are okay and other changes are very egregious and you expect me to be able to support that bill just because these other changes are okay – you know, I hate to say it, Mr. Chair. At this moment in time the way that these changes being proposed around victims of crime in Bill 20 – on that alone, I can't support it. I cannot in good conscience go back to people saying: yeah; I'm all in favour of giving you only 45 days to come forward. There's no way I can do that, and I won't.

Hopefully, we'll get a chance, maybe, to discuss this further, to propose some changes around that, and make services for people in times of great need, great crisis, great upheaval, and great loss so that they will get a little bit more of a fair shake than certainly what this section of Bill 20 is doing right now.

Thanks, Mr. Chair.

9:50

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Next I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has risen.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. Now, as my colleagues have noted, we have some real concerns with a particular portion of this bill, that being that it essentially is looking to enshrine and make permanent some troubling changes that this government has made to the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, changes which, essentially, have taken significant dollars away from their original intent, changes that have in fact made it more difficult for victims of crime to receive support.

Now, this is part of a troubling pattern with this government, Mr. Chair. They have a habit of robbing Peter to pay Paul. They made a number of promises, they have made a number of commitments, they have a number of ideological objectives, but rather than being direct with these with Albertans, rather than finding ways to fund those directly, they instead try to find ways using subterfuge and take a little from here, a little from there, take things away from other people to pursue their own ends. In so doing, they do a lot of damage. They hurt and disenfranchise a lot of Albertans. It's fundamentally dishonest and certainly not what I would expect from government.

In this particular case what we have are changes that this government first made when they introduced Bill 16 back in 2020, which changed the victims of crime fund to the victims of crime and crime prevention fund. Now, the fund had always been 100 per cent supported by a surcharge on fines issued by the police or the courts. Prior to that change the funds supported a wide range of community- and police-based services, and funding was available to individual victims of violent crimes to help with injuries and assistance with funerals, supplemental benefits for people with severe injuries, et cetera.

But this government, having run on a platform where they said that they wanted to show that they were going to reduce crime and put more dollars for that, saw the funds that were here for victims of crime and decided that they wanted to crack open that piggy bank. Bill 16 laid the groundwork for that, and indeed that is exactly what they proceeded to do. Now they are taking funds that were originally collected specifically to support victims of crime, and they are diverting them to other areas that have nothing to do with the victims of crime.

Now, they may claim, Mr. Chair, that, well, there were excess dollars there, there was a surplus in the account, you know, the need wasn't really there, so it was okay to redirect those dollars. But that is not what we are hearing from the actual organizations who provide those services or indeed from individuals who have been the victims of crime. Indeed, now they face further barriers under this government, where now they say that the victim must apply within 45 days of the crime occurring. Forty-five days. That's six weeks.

Now, imagine that you have been the victim of a serious crime, one that may have involved physical injury, one that may have involved serious emotional and psychological trauma. Imagine that you are also perhaps a marginalized individual, perhaps under the poverty line, perhaps have other challenges. Six weeks can go by pretty fast. If you don't know all of the systems that are in place, if you don't have all the supports, and even if you do, Mr. Chair, six weeks go by quickly.

But this government has decided, because they want to raid the victims of crime fund for their own political ends, to try to make themselves look better in their tough-on-crime approach, that they are going to put that cap on victims, force them to have only six weeks, and if you miss that deadline, tough luck; too bad. That is what they are saying to victims of crime in the province of Alberta, and they want to enshrine that now in law permanently through Bill 20. I think that's shameful, Mr. Chair. It is callous. It shows an utter disregard for the realities that individuals face, for the challenges that marginalized people, who are more often the victims of crime, face in these systems and are usually the ones, actually, who are in the greatest need.

But this government is choosing to increase bureaucracy and red tape for those individuals because they want to raid those dollars to make themselves look better rather than find those dollars – as my colleague from Calgary-Buffalo noted, this government is not short on funds at the moment. They have record oil revenues. They've given billions away to profitable corporations. Why are they trying to save pennies in the context of a provincial budget on the backs of the victims of crime?

Again, Mr. Chair, shameful behaviour, but this government, again, is very fond of doing this. They like to find little pockets where they can steal back – well, pardon me; that's likely unparliamentary language; I will correct that and withdraw that particular term – where they can yank dollars out. To quote the Simpsons, perhaps yonk dollars back. But, seriously, what we are talking about is that they try to look for ways that they can take dollars under the table from folks who they figure are not going to be able to push back, who are not part of their political voting base.

Member Ceci: Over the table. They're taking them over the table.

Mr. Shepherd: Fair enough. The Member for Calgary-Buffalo notes that they're taking over the table. That's true. They're not being shy about this in some respects.

But, of course, the fact is they are taking away from marginalized groups, people in need. As I noted, this is a pattern with this government. You know, they actually raised the victim fine surcharge, Mr. Chair, raised it from 15 per cent to 20 per cent, expect it to provide an increase from $40 million to $60 million so that they can shuffle more of those dollars over to another portion. They didn't raise that to help more victims of crime. They raised that so they can shuffle those dollars over to their own priorities and other initiatives.

It's stunning to me, Mr. Chair. This government continues to do this in so many other areas. You know, they've taken a larger share of municipal fine revenues. Again, this government could be honest and could find its own way to raise more revenues. If it wants to take more dollars away from Albertans, they could do so directly and honestly. Of course, they don't do that. They do sneaky things like bracket creep.

In this particular case, if they want to talk about how they are funding more in terms of police services or other things in terms of law enforcement to make a safer province for Albertans, they're taking a larger share of municipal fine revenues, Mr. Chair. So they are taking dollars away from municipalities that were being used to protect and support the public. The ironic thing here is that as this government crusades against photoradar, for example, they're taking a larger share of those photoradar dollars from municipalities at the same time as they are making it more difficult for municipalities to proceed with photoradar.

Now, Mr. Chair, of course, our party has been quite clear about our position on photoradar as well. We had taken some actions, and certainly the government has taken some actions, but it is hypocritical that this government on one hand says that it wants to stop this tax on the backs of Albertans while it pockets more of the revenue. Indeed, the province takes now about half of the revenue that is raised through photoradar. This government has cut municipal funding for policing. So they're not content to simply take more dollars away from the victims of crime; they've taken more dollars away to actually pay for the folks that are trying to prevent the crime or prosecute the crime. Then they want to pat themselves on the back and talk about how great they are for protecting Albertans.

This is a government, Mr. Chair, that continues to pursue the idea of an Alberta provincial police force despite the fact that a majority of Albertans reject that proposal. Pretty much every municipality in the province rejects that proposal because that proposal would cost Alberta approximately $200 million more annually than what they currently spend. It would come with a $366 million price tag for the transition, a transition which would take up to six years.

Again, this government is not interested in actually providing better protection for Albertans or in cost efficiency; it's interested in its own political grandstanding at the cost to Albertans, just as with these changes now they are taking dollars away from the victims of crime, making it harder for them to access services, making it harder for them to access supports, making it harder for the organizations which support these individuals. It is shameful, Mr. Chair, and it is unconscionable. It is the reason why I will not be voting in favour of Bill 20. Again, this government wants to brag about having balanced the budget, but you really have to ask: whose backs are they choosing to balance it on?

Now, as one of the members on the government side observed, yes, they have had a windfall of resource revenues, which is a really good reason why they don't have to pick on victims of crime or Albertans who use insulin pumps for that matter, Mr. Chair, another situation now where we have Albertans who are struggling, who are living with a chronic illness, requiring a simple piece of medical technology to allow them to live a normal life that saves millions in our health care system – those are the folks that this government feels that they should be taking dollars back from, not profitable corporations but individuals who need an insulin pump. These are the folks who they feel should live in fear and anxiety because of this government's choices. [interjections] Now, the members across are commenting and heckling. I can understand that. I'd feel uncomfortable if I was making these kinds of unconscionable decisions, too. I'd feel pretty conflicted.

What we have here is a government which, again, is not honest with Albertans, is not willing to be direct, looks for sneaky ways of subterfuge to try to shuffle dollars around and then hide the actual impacts of those decisions. That is what we have happening here with Bill 20.

Indeed, concerns continue to grow, and we've raised this previously, Mr. Chair. My colleagues have spoken out on this. We've proposed changes to protect the dollars that need to be available to support victims of crime. Indeed, Red Deer county council voted unanimously to call for the UCP to preserve a fund for victims of crime. The government did not listen.

Calgary resident Tarin Arndt, survivor of a serious physical assault – hit multiple times, pushed down a flight of stairs, and then her attacker went on to strangle her – said that if her assailant didn't kill her, she thought her posttraumatic stress disorder would. She had to take six months off work to access an intensive outpatient program to support her psychological and physical injuries. She applied to the victims of crime fund because it gave her hope. She said that it gave her a safety net, assurance that she wouldn't have to pay for services for something that she had never asked for. Her thoughts on this government's changes, Mr. Chair? "This . . . almost feels like another criminal act – it is stealing from the victims who need it the most." The government did not listen to Tarin.

Nikki Tighe, sexual assault survivor, didn't qualify for the victims of crime fund because she reported the crime over two years after her assault. Now, Ms Tighe said, "This money was meant to directly support those affected by crime. People like me need direct funds, and have not received it." She said that she did not feel that "taking money away from victims, and using it to fund policing initiatives in the province will help victims" like herself. She said, "Rather than creating incentives to take money away from the fund I want barriers reduced and more funds going directly to victims." This government did not listen to Ms Tighe, and indeed with Bill 20 they show that they do not intend to listen to these victims of crime.

You know, in June of last year we proposed an amendment to the legislation that would've ensured 75 per cent of the victims of crime fund would be reserved for victims and victim services agencies. A compromise, Mr. Chair. Seventy-five per cent: that would leave 25 per cent for this government to spirit away to whatever initiatives they feel they want to put it into rather than actually finding constructive ways to provide funding for policing initiatives. The government rejected that; 25 per cent taken away from victims of crime was not enough for the UCP government.

As I've said, Mr. Chair, I consider it shameful. I consider it a betrayal of the intent of the victims of crime fund, taking away from those who need it most. There are many other ways that the government could fund these policing initiatives. There are many other approaches it could take. They have their record oil revenues now. They want to argue that this was necessary two years ago; fine. But it is not now. For them to choose to enshrine that in law in Bill 20 is not acceptable for myself or my colleagues on this side of the House, so we will be voting against Bill 20.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members looking to join debate on Bill 20? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair and to the colleagues who spoke before me for laying out some of our caucus' concerns with the bill as proposed. I will do my best to add to the constructive feedback, and hopefully, if enough of us make enough creative presentations of the facts for the government caucus, we can see some movement either through amendments or through opposition.

When I think about the title, Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, I think about some of the promises that were made in the lead-up to the last election and some of the framing that was done on where the current government, the government that was given a mandate in the last election, stood in relation to victims, survivors, and Albertans who have experienced harm from others, who are seeking justice. Definitely, when I think about some of the lived experience of colleagues across the aisle, I know that there are folks there who probably would have, just knowing the statistics for Alberta, been the victims of crime in some way and that there are people there who have been part of law enforcement. I know that there are people who are retired Calgary city police as well as RCMP and others. I imagine that they have seen the impacts of injustice first-hand and have had to work with those who are victims or survivors in trying to seek justice.

I would say that when we saw a bill come forward that touched on five different pieces of legislation – those include the Corrections Act, the Justice of the Peace Act, the Missing Persons Act, the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, as well as the Youth Justice Act – I think a lot of people thought: let's see legislation that's going to bring about more justice and fairer compensation for the victims of crime. Certainly, that is on brand with some of the things that members across the aisle have in the past committed their life's work to and argued for in the lead-up to the last election. However, the results have not reflected the language that many have used in the past around respecting the order of law, respecting justice, and wanting to stand up for victims, or as we often say, survivors.

Let's touch just on that one piece of the five bills, the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act changes. The changes largely make changes that the UCP already made permanent. They replaced references to death benefits with funeral expense reimbursement. I don't why. You know, families have different ways of grieving and of processing their grief. I know that when my dad died, he made it very explicit that he didn't want us to have a funeral for him. That was not where he wanted our energy to be spent. In the days leading up to and the days following his death, he wanted us to be together as a nuclear family, and for people who wanted to visit him in the lead-up to that, he certainly welcomed it. But a funeral was not part of what he wanted for his death.

To replace death benefit with funeral expense reimbursement – you know, he wasn't a victim of crime. He died of natural causes, but that wouldn't have honoured his wishes. I don't know why we are dictating for those who have experienced a death as a result of being a victim of crime that their compensation only can be focused on funeral expense reimbursement. There might be other ways that the family and community most closely connected to the victim want to process that and honour that.

According to the government that does not change any benefit that Albertans may be eligible for, but the change is to reflect that they felt that the term "death benefit" wasn't adequate and that there isn't a benefit from the death. Well, you know, why would they put this into law and why would they limit it specifically to funeral expense reimbursement? It seems like nickel and diming families who are already experiencing a significant amount of grief, so why is this the government's priority when it comes to talking to victims and survivors? The name of the benefit/reimbursement has been changed in the act.

There's also been a disestablishment of the Criminal Injuries Review Board. The board was already disestablished in the transition section in section 22 of the act. It strikes out the transition sections 19 through 23. This makes a number of controversial changes that the UCP has already made – it actually brings them into law. Most of the transition sections were in place to deal with a class-action lawsuit.

Again, why is the government making these kinds of sweeping, permanent changes that have been seen as quite controversial when they could be focusing on the things that survivors and those who identify as victims have been telling the government would make their lives better? It seems like this isn't an actual change to benefit survivors; this is a change to try to put the government in a better legal situation. Probably not where most Albertans would expect the government – people who have in the past certainly expressed very overt empathy for victims of crime: probably not what they expected from this government when it comes to making changes to address victims of crime.

As we see again, you can't trust the UCP to actually follow through on things that they claim to virtue signal when it comes to actually bringing forward laws to help ordinary families. The trust again and again is broken between this government in the words that they profess and the actions that they actually bring forward when it comes to making changes in law.

There are also some changes to the Youth Justice Act. Just a little backstory. I was in university for a while. When I was in university, there was a summer that I applied on a – oh, I was going to say "internship." Maybe one of my colleagues here can help me out, maybe the former minister of labour. The summer . . .

Member Ceci: STEP.

Ms Hoffman: STEP, summer temporary employment program, a program that was dissolved by the Jim Prentice Conservatives, brought back under the NDP. What's happened with that today? It's gone again?

Member Ceci: Yeah.

Ms Gray: It's gone.

Ms Hoffman: It's gone again. Okay. Well, again, another cut to important programs that help Albertans.

It was the summer, probably around 2001 or 2002, and the Youth Criminal Justice Act . . .

Member Ceci: You're young.

Ms Hoffman: Thanks. My colleague from Calgary-Buffalo just talked about how he thinks I'm so young. I really appreciate that. Sometimes it's nice to hear that from a learned colleague. He's also pretty young.

It was around that time that the Youth Criminal Justice Act came into force here in Alberta. This, of course, is a further iteration of that act. I was hired as a STEP student with Alberta Community Crime Prevention originally. These are the kinds of programs that are in place when you have a government that works in partnership to support university students in acquiring additional life experience and training and also wants them to be able to afford to pay their own tuition. At that time tuition was not cheap, but with a 40-hour-a-week job and a part-time job throughout the year I could afford to go to school and buy books and have a little bit of an extra, you know, quality of life in my budget.

Working on the Youth Criminal Justice Act, that had just come into place – and through John Howard I was later able to do some work with them on developing some resources for presenters to be able to use in schools to communicate with youth about what the changes were in law and what their rights but also what their responsibilities were, because I know that there were a lot of people trying to pretend that everyone just got a free ride in this country until the day they turned the age of majority, but that certainly wasn't the case. It was important to tell children, youth what their rights were under the law but also what their responsibilities were.

So I wish that there were more STEP grants available for university students who – many are already experiencing right now the summertime, where they're working their hardest trying to find ways to make enough money to cover even a fraction of the tuition that's gone up over the last three years under the UCP in the province of Alberta. Instead of being able to find more opportunities to enrich their own learning and work experience or resumé building by having opportunities to work for nonprofits like the Alberta Community Crime Prevention Association, we see that the current government has decided to cancel that program and also has decided to make more changes to things like this.

These are exactly the types of changes that we could have young Albertans engaged in supporting the development of and the education of. I'm sure there are so many Alberta youth right now who are sitting attentively listening to this debate. What are some of the changes to the Youth Justice Act? They probably won't hear about it through organizations like John Howard who've also seen their funding cut. If they are able to provide this additional ongoing education, I certainly appreciate that they do everything they can with the donations that they have and the limited resources that they do have, but certainly they're in a tougher financial situation than they once were.

Some of the changes are to align the provincial act here, the Youth Justice Act, with changes that were made to the federal Criminal Code. Some of the changes are that a notification to parents can be given by a peace officer rather than solely by the officer in charge, so downloading more responsibilities to more individuals. It updates a section on forfeiture. According to the government the changes won't be – there won't be changes in policy, but we certainly wish that there was more opportunity for people to give further feedback on some of these areas of concern.

There are also some changes to the Criminal Injuries Review Board. Injury has been winding down since Bill 16, the victims of crime bill, which was subtitled (Strengthening Public Safety) Amendment Act, and that cut injury and witness-to-homicide benefits, which the board was responsible for.

Cutting witness-to-homicide benefits. For most of us, when we escape from the realities of the everyday and we turn on something outrageous on Netflix and we see, you know, a re-enactment or a portrayal of something that could be horrific – and anyone who's watched a scary movie with me will know that even that makes me scream, and I'm watching it on TV, right? I'm watching it on TV from a distance. It's not my lived experience, but it creates an emotional response for the person watching it. Being an actual witness to a homicide in real life, often people have connections to those who are experiencing that kind of horrific death. Cutting the benefits for people who are witnesses to homicides seems cruel, and it seems hurtful and incredibly disrespectful to people who have gone through such often traumatizing experiences.

The government is making all these changes at a time where they are boasting about falling backwards into a surplus of revenue, revenue that they did not expect. They certainly weren't accounting for the price of oil to be as high or sustained for as long as it is currently. I hope that none of us saw the horrific war that's unfolding in Ukraine when we were expecting to run and thinking about what kind of things we wanted to implement in a platform, but to know that this current government, at the same time that they are bragging about having record revenues and all this additional surplus, is doing things like cutting the supports for those who've been witnesses to homicide, I think, is terrible. I think it is wrong-headed, and I think it doesn't reflect the kinds of changes that most people, when they heard that a Conservative government was bringing forward a justice bill, would expect to see in black and white as it relates to the way Albertans who are dealing with this kind of trauma are being impacted.

Previously the UCP has also reduced victims of crime benefits for things like injury benefits, suffering an injury as a result of a crime, and now thanks to the current government, the current Premier and the UCP, there are fewer benefits for those who've experienced injury as a result of a crime. I think that again speaks to the lack of compassion and empathy and solidarity that the current government feels with ordinary Albertans who have faced the hardships of being a victim of crime.

To do a little bit more backstory on some of the changes – actually, Mr. Chair, would it be possible to have a time check?

The Deputy Chair: Four thirty-five.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you.

In 2020 the UCP introduced Bill 16, which I've touched on a little bit in previous comments, which changed the victims of crime fund to the victims of crime and crime prevention fund, as also mentioned by my colleague the MLA for Edmonton-City Centre. The fund has always been 100 per cent supported by the surcharge on fines issued by the police or by the courts. Previous to this change the fund supported a wide range of community and police-based services, and the funding was available to individual victims of violent crimes to help them deal with their injuries, assistance with funerals, and supplemental benefits for people with severe injuries.

When I think about this, I continue to reflect on the fact that these people have often gone through extremely difficult situations, horrific situations. When we think about that to the extreme, we think about those who are putting on a funeral for somebody who died as a direct result of being a victim of a crime. Bill 16 added an emergency accommodation or protective measures, access to counselling for sexual assault victims and families of homicide victims, and court support to victims and witnesses. That piece certainly would be a positive, making sure that those who are experiencing grief as a result of a crime have access to some supports for funeral expenses and counselling in particular.

When I think of one of the most recent very public murders that took place here in Edmonton, I can't help but think about the young man who was killed outside of a school. We've seen many youth charged with that crime here in Edmonton. I'm grateful that the family reached out and invited myself and some of my colleagues to attend the funeral, and I will say that it was an incredibly powerful memorial and a very difficult time for so many families who were in that room. It actually ended up being at least two rooms, maybe three rooms, because there were so many people who wanted to be there and show solidarity, including my colleague the MLA for Edmonton-Mill Woods and my colleague the MLA for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

When I think about the boys, the young men who were sitting at the front next to the open casket, and how much hurt you could very clearly see on their faces and the faces of so many others in the room and when I was thinking about the moment when the family began to move the body of the young man who had died as a result of this horrific murder out of the room, I still am overcome with the sound of so many women expressing their grief and sorrow vocally. It was really an incredibly powerful moment.

I couldn't help but think about the mom who was bearing her son and how, just 16 years earlier, his birth was a marker of so much hope and optimism for a family that had already sacrificed so much. One of the uncles who spoke at the funeral talked about everything the family gave up, including close relationships with family in proximity; their language, having to learn new languages; immigrating to a new culture; food; economic opportunities that existed there in their professions, that they had been trained in. Of course, like many families that come to Canada, their credentials, I imagine, didn't transfer directly. When I think about the nuclear family as well as the very broad extended family and the horrific . . . [Ms Hoffman's speaking time expired]

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Chair. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. Of course, we know that this particular piece of legislation amends five different acts: the Corrections Act, Justice of the Peace Act, Missing Persons Act, Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, and the Youth Justice Act.

Number one is the Corrections Act. It changes compensation rates for Alberta Parole Board members. They now can be set by order in council as opposed to regulation, bringing that in line with other agencies, boards, and commissions, which is fine.

Number two is the Justice of the Peace Act. It gives the Chief Judge of the Provincial Court of Alberta discretion to designate a justice of the peace as either part-time or full-time, meaning that the Chief Judge can change a designation between full-time and part-time if the term has not expired or other conditions are met. I didn't actually understand the scope of this. How many people are we talking about? I actually didn't realize. The most recent stats that I could find are that there are 136 full-time equivalent judges – I think that not all work full-time – but there are only 40 justices of the peace. I wasn't quite sure of the scope of this, but it makes sense to give some flexibility.

The third piece of legislation that I wanted to touch on is the Missing Persons Act. This legislation will add a definition of medical information. Now, the act already had provisions that allowed access to health information. It now allows new TV footage or other video recording to be used in a missing persons case. I think that makes a lot of sense, to update legislation. I think we all understand the need for speed or the need to use any information at hand to retrieve or find a missing person as quickly as possible. It also adds a section that a justice of the peace can seal court records relating to a missing person if that interferes with an investigation or endangers people. Then there's a piece that changes the timeline for review by a special committee of the Legislature and then adds some regulatory-making power that gives the government the ability to define any term not defined in the act. Again, I think it makes sense for anything that speeds up or adds teeth to the actions that are required when there is a missing person.

I didn't realize until I did a little bit of research that, you know, in Canada in any given year there are between 60,000 and 70,000 people that go missing for a variety of different reasons. Thankfully, the vast majority are found within seven days.

There's a National Centre for Missing Persons and Unidentified Remains. The earliest stats that I could find were 2019, when they noted that in Alberta just over 3,500 people were reported missing and for a variety of different reasons: parental abduction, relative abduction, stranger abduction, runaways. You know, happily, they noted that in 2019 there was only one person that was a victim of human trafficking and went missing for that reason.

Now, a couple of questions, as I looked at this legislation, were that it would be really great to hear from the government side what kind of consultation was done. And if we're opening up this piece of legislation for amendment, why were some things left out? I think that we're really in a state of constant improvement. I think that any time we open up legislation, it's incumbent on us to ask: how can we make this better? How can we make these processes stronger, anything that we can do? What was the consultation that happened? Was there a review of tools like Amber Alert? Was there any review about required education? And then was there anything around changes to regulation?

I know that in the sector that deals with very vulnerable people, whether that's seniors that reside within continuing care that have disabilities of some kind or impairments – people with disabilities, sadly, regularly go missing for a variety of reasons. Sometimes it is because of inadequate staffing levels, actually, or inadequate housing. They're just in places that they shouldn't be. They're living on their own when they shouldn't be. Maybe they only have a couple of hours of home care as opposed to wraparound supports. Dementia has become a very serious problem, and people go missing. Was there a review of this sector? I would love to hear that from the government.

Unfortunately, more often than not we see legislation that comes before us that is questionable in terms of the consultation that was done. It's often very narrow. It's often just sort of friendly groups that have been consulted. When we ask more broadly to stakeholders, "Have you heard about this? Were you consulted by government? Do you have anything to add? Do you have any concerns?" we hear that they've not been included in that consultation process. It would be great to hear from government what the consultation process was like on this particular piece of legislation.

The next piece of legislation that will be impacted with Bill 20 is the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act. Now, largely, the changes made with this act are to make the changes that the UCP brought in earlier permanent. As my colleagues have noted, it replaces all references to "death benefit" with "funeral expense reimbursement." According to government this doesn't change any benefit that an Albertan may be eligible for, but the change is to reflect that the term "death benefit" was inadequate as there isn't a benefit for death. Fair. There isn't really a benefit for death. The definition in the act stays the same, but the name of the benefit reimbursement is changed. That seems sort of largely an administrative change.

Now, I did want to stop and talk a little bit about the victims of crime. We know that there have been a lot of changes made to the victims of crime fund. There has been some serious spin coming from the other side about why they did what they did. There is a lot of money that has accumulated there, and instead of focusing on victims and individual Albertans, whether they be victims, whether they be witnesses, whether they be families of victims, a lot of the funds here have been used to increase policing and address rural crime.

Now, I am not saying that rural crime or urban crime is not a problem. It absolutely is, and we absolutely have to pay attention and do what we can to address some of the root problems. Now, we can have a whole other discussion on what that looks like, to address root problems, because this government has been horrible at doing that. They have increased poverty. We know this. They have slashed programs that address poverty. We know this.

One very simple example that nobody can turn away from is the fact that right away after being elected, this government used an omnibus bill to deindex benefits that were already well below any line of poverty, so income support. We know there are very vulnerable people that are on income support. Often these are disabled people that haven't yet applied for AISH, haven't qualified for AISH for whatever reason, are chronically unemployed, are mentally ill, are struggling with addiction, and they're trying to live on a base rate of income support that is actually under $900 per month for a single person. That is awful. You can't live on that. We know people have systematically been removed from this program. Supplemental benefits to this program that actually made it sort of passable have been systematically eliminated. We know this government has made poverty worse, which is a root cause of crime.

Once again, there's an example of this government's very short-term thinking, thinking in terms of election cycles, thinking in terms of budget cycles or talking points. They are not addressing the root cause of crime, one of the root causes, which is poverty. They cut affordable housing. They cut income supports. They do all kinds of things, and then they say: oh, but we're going to, you know, give policing more dollars. Well, that's fine, but you can't do one thing and not the other, and you can't do one thing and then claim that you're making the problem better. You are not. This government is not. Albertans know it. We know it. Everybody knows it.

There's also another problem. I wanted to address one of the changes that is made to witnesses of crime. Now, I can remember in January – it was around mid-January. It was a really cold morning in 2015. My office at the time was at LoSeCa Foundation in St. Albert. That is right across the street from the Apex Casino. It's no longer called Apex, but – actually, is it called Apex? Apex Casino was right across the street. We actually had a board retreat early in the morning, so I was headed to the office to meet with our board and saw all of these police cars, which is very unusual in St. Albert, surrounding this casino.

Now, there was a horrific incident that occurred there. I'm sure many in this House will recall, sadly, that that was where Constable David Matthew Wynn, who was 42 years old at the time, who was married and a father, who was an RCMP officer, was shot in the head and died. He was shot in that casino. He wasn't the only victim that early morning. I think it was about 3 o'clock in the morning that he was shot, but also Constable Derek Walter Bond, who was 49 years old, was an auxiliary officer with the RCMP, who was unarmed, was also shot. He did not die.

But this horrible, horrible crime happened early in the morning, 3 o'clock in the morning. The RCMP were there investigating I believe it was a stolen vehicle. It was a pickup truck in the parking lot of the Apex Casino. They went inside, and whatever happened happened. There was, obviously, a fatality inquiry after the incident, and it was noted that Constable Wynn was shot in the head, and it was at such close range that there was gunpowder residue on his forehead.

Now, I'm not telling you this to exploit this crime. I'm telling you this because I met some of the witnesses to that crime. There was a couple that I met not that long after the crime. Actually, weirdly enough, I met them in MP Cooper's office in St. Albert as they were trying to get some benefits as they were completely unable to return to normal life after witnessing the shootings that they saw at 3 o'clock in the morning in that casino in St. Albert. They were just unable – unable – to get the benefits that they needed.

I do believe that at the time they ended up on income support, which – as I noted earlier, income support is literally under $900 a month for a single person. You can't live on that. So as a couple – let's be generous – maybe they both got $900. Doubtful. A couple cannot live on under $2,000 a month safely. It's not possible. Anyway, I met them there, and just hearing about their struggles and hearing about their complaints, about the limited access to even counselling at the time – because they were witnesses, they could not get access to the other supports that victims of crime got. They couldn't get access to the amount of counselling that they needed. I've not been witness to a crime like that in my lifetime. I'm blessed that way. I cannot imagine what this couple went through, to see that right in front of them at 3 o'clock in the morning at a casino in St. Albert.

Anyway, fast-forward to a couple of weeks ago. I was at the St. Albert chamber Lifestyle Expo, which is a trade fair in St. Albert, at Servus Place. I was there for the weekend, you know, meeting constituents and meeting people that were stopping by. This couple came by. I looked at them, and they seemed vaguely familiar, but it had been years. They introduced themselves as this couple that I had met many years ago. I think it had been in 2017, so a couple of years after the shooting. They let me know who they were. It was: oh, my goodness; nice to see you. We had a little chat, and then they said: can we take you aside and tell you how it's been? Sure.

So we walked to the side, and we were chatting. This couple told me what life had been like from the time I met them in 2017 to 2022. Because they had not received the support that they needed, things had gotten progressively worse. They didn't have access to mental health supports. They ended up with some very severe addictions. One of the couple ended up with a pretty severe cancer diagnosis and was continuing to have treatment. I'm not entirely sure what that treatment plan looked like. He seemed quite positive that he would survive, but he had successfully transitioned from income support to AISH, thank goodness.

Now, let me just say that AISH benefits were also deindexed and are also well below the poverty line, but it's better than income support. So he had successfully transitioned to AISH. I'm guessing he was successful with his AISH application because there was an end-of-life diagnosis, because that's in the regulations. But, whatever, he had transitioned to AISH. But they had told me what the impact was in those years of not having the mental health supports they needed after witnessing a crime like that. Substance abuse was still an issue. Chronic unemployment, obviously, was still an issue. And then there was a physical disability or physical chronic illness.

These are real people. These are residents of St. Albert. They just happened to be at a casino at 3 o'clock in the morning in January of 2015, and they were witnesses to a crime, to a horrific shooting that ended the life of one RCMP officer and forever changed the life of an auxiliary RCMP officer. They'll never be the same. Actually, I think the city of St. Albert will never be the same.

The day of the funeral, that was held, actually, at Servus Place, I can remember lining up along the streets. The fire trucks were all there with the flags, and there were thousands of people lining the streets to pay their respects. I can remember meeting Shelly Wynn, you know, years after. It was a tragedy, but I'm not telling you about this crime because of the nature of the tragedy. I'm telling you about this because real people are impacted by this. For this government to make supports even more difficult for Albertans is a tragedy.

We come to this place to represent our constituents and to do right by them, and when we hear about where there's a hole or what we need to fix, it's incumbent on us to do better. Time and time again we stand up in this place and we tell the UCP government members and ministers and Premier that this is a problem. I'm more than willing to give you the benefit of the doubt. Perhaps this was an oversight. Perhaps this was a failure to consult. But you have time to fix it. Please fix it. It's a problem.

There are some positive things in this legislation. I think, you know, there are usually positive things in the legislation. Some of them are housekeeping to make things better, to make things faster, to reduce time, to update, and that is fine. But I think along with my colleagues we have gone through a few of the pieces of legislation that should probably be fixed, that should be altered.

I would love to hear from government members or from a minister to talk about their consultation. What did that look like? Who was consulted? How do you know that you did the best job that you could to make this legislation the best piece of legislation that you could?

I know that I would feel quite comforted to know that that work was done because I don't trust this government in terms of consultation. I have seen time and again that changes made impact people's lives in a very negative way, and I think that a lot of the time there are unintended consequences.

I know this government changed payment dates for AISH. Do I think they did it to harm people? No, I don't think that there was a malicious intent. I don't. I think that there was a failure to consult. I think that there was a failure to ask people who will be impacted by the legislation what that would do for them, and that caused harm. That caused people to be evicted, to be threatened to be evicted, to be unable to buy bus passes. It caused a lot of stress and confusion to people that – let’s be honest about this – are challenged sometimes to understand changes. Change is sometimes difficult. So I don’t think that there is always malicious intent, but I think that when you know better, I hope that you do better.

Mr. Chair, can I get a time check?

The Deputy Chair: One and a half.

Ms Renaud: Okay.

With that, I am going to end my comments and take my seat. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General has risen.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. As has been noted before, this piece of legislation, Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, is amending various different pieces of legislation under JSG: the Corrections Act, the Justice of the Peace Act, the Missing Persons Act, the Youth Justice Act, and the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act.

It seems that most of the comments from our friends opposite have been related to amendments related to the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act. I point out that these are really housekeeping changes that are proposed for the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act. The plan for this piece of legislation is to simply clean up some of the outdated wording and make the language more sensitive to grieving families.

I’ll give an example. One would be that the amendment would be to rename the “death benefit” to “funeral expense reimbursement.” This is in further response to advice that we’ve received from various interest groups about how using the word “benefit” when talking about the criminal death of a loved one is a concern. We wanted to be respectful to those families who are grieving, to be able to make that type of housekeeping change.

We’re also proposing changes to remove items that are no longer required; for example, the references to the old Criminal Injuries Review Board, of which in the past I had actually been a member, Mr. Chair. These references to the CIRB and provisions were only needed while a class-action settlement was completed. That settlement is now complete, so the board is no longer needed.

What we have heard, though, from members opposite is discussion about things related to victims of crime, which is actually not in Bill 20. I’ve heard a lot of concerns alleged about 45 days. Look, Mr. Chair, what I’d point out is that not only is this not in the legislation, but what our friends opposite are talking about is related to a review that two MLAs had done regarding victims’ services units and how victims’ services are provided throughout the province.

We are now reviewing the report that came out of the work that those two MLAs had done, and we intend to implement those changes. In the meantime, on a temporary basis two years ago, there were changes that were made to provide a temporary victims of crime assistance program. That was introduced, as I said, two years ago. It was designed only to provide victims of crime immediate access to emergency-based services and supports while other options were not accessible for an interim period while a future program was then being developed, coming out of, as I said, the report that came from those two MLAs.

Now, because the program was created specifically to address the immediate needs of victims in the aftermath of a crime, applications were to be made within 45 days of when the crime occurred. However, we did hear feedback from various folks, and the feedback was that the 45-day limit not always could be met. But I would point out that in policy – it’s not in legislation – that 45-day limit could be extended based on a review, and I understand that that had occurred in this temporary victims of crime assistance program. Now, we are currently reviewing the policy and are planning to extend the limit to two years in the near future. The new two-year limit could be extended further upon further review to account for historical crimes. So that is work that we are doing.

Again, Mr. Chair, this is not related to the legislation at hand. I’m happy to clarify the misconceptions that our friends opposite have about this legislation. With that, I will . . . [interjection] Okay.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any members looking to – I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has risen.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I am pleased to rise on Bill 20. I believe I’ve not spoken to it yet although I’ve read a lot about it, so it’s always a little bit confusing. I really appreciate the minister joining debate, and I appreciate very much his comments although I would – darn. I would have liked to get a little bit more clarity on victims of crime in particular. Admittedly, I was chatting with my colleague about pressing matters, but I do believe I heard that this bill is not – you know, my colleagues and I were chatting a lot about victims of crime and the egregious cuts to the victims of crime fund.

I believe that the minister was alluding to the fact that the victims of crime fund is not in fact directly implicated in this legislation. I definitely beg to differ from my understanding of Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, so if there is somebody else who can provide some clarity because it is quite clear that this bill amends multiple acts, including the Corrections Act, the Justice of the Peace Act, the Missing Persons Act, the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act, and the Youth Justice Act.

In the short amount of time that I have, I want to talk about victims of crime. Again, I’m happy to get some clarity as to what the minister was referring to. Essentially, what I see in Bill 20 is that the changes under the Victims of Crime and Public Safety Act basically make the changes that the UCP talked about earlier – gosh, that would have been in 2020, I think, when they started having conversations around victims of crime – permanent.

You know, I was sort of on the front lines when initially the conversations around changes to victims of crime came up. Immediately I had multiple women – they were actually all women – who reached out to me and either talked about how the victims of crime fund was life saving or talked about how they were now experiencing barriers in accessing funds through the victims of crime fund. I think about the stories that were shared with me around how without those funds some women would have never – again, it’s not just women; those are just the stories that are top of mind for me – been able to access critical counselling and therapy supports.

As I’m sure most folks in this Chamber are aware, counselling is expensive. It’s out of reach for many Albertans, particularly Albertans who don’t have access to benefits, right? You know, we’re talking upwards of $200, sometimes more, for a one-hour session. If you’ve been a victim of a horrific crime, you’re going to need more than five sessions, which is $1,000, which is the cap.

You know, oh, gosh, I have to say it again, because it’s very fresh in people’s minds right now, that it seems like this government continually just hopes that vulnerable folks can access supports on their own, that they have benefits and that they’ll be able to pick themselves up by their own bootstraps sort of thing, and we saw that very recently with the cuts to the insulin pump therapy program, right? Essentially, again, we're still seeking clarity on exactly what the next steps are.

I was inundated, after sharing my questions to the minister yesterday, with responses from people saying, like, you know: there's no way that I can afford this on my own, and this program was very much life-saving. So it's similar. I'll get back to Bill 20, but again it's a similar attack by this government on vulnerable folks. Folks with type 1 diabetes may no longer have access to life-saving diabetes supports. Folks who need access to critical therapy and counselling may not have access.

And the other big challenge we saw with victims of crime was the introducing of a 45-day window for applications for the fund. As has been said countless times in this Chamber, including this morning, somebody who's been a victim, a survivor of a violent crime – first of all, we know the statistics show that many survivors of sexual violence may not even report, and if they do report, it takes time. It takes a whole lot more time than a 45-day window.

Mr. Schow: The minister just clarified this.

Member Irwin: If the Member for Cardston-Siksika would like to stand up and provide more clarity . . .

Mr. Schow: I don't need to. The minister just did.

Member Irwin: . . . because I'm seeing in the act victims of crime – and perhaps the chair can remind folks to speak through him. Certainly, I've said it twice now. I would love just a bit more clarity around victims of crime. Again, the heckling of me is not too helpful. If I can get a little bit more clarity because, again, I'm reading the bill, I've got it in front of me, and that's what I'm seeing.

Again, you know, it's got to be tough to be a UCP MLA right now – right? – with countless examples of cruel, indefensible cuts. I'm hearing from folks in many of these ridings who are just so upset. The diabetes example is just one. I won't name them, but a number of rural supporters reached out to me and thanked us and our whole team, including my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre and our leader and others, for speaking out on this. They said that they're getting nothing – they're getting no response from their rural MLAs – and how happy they were that we continue to raise this issue.

So continue to take your constituents for granted. There are a lot of people who have diabetes in this province. There are a lot of people in this province who've been victims of sexual assault, sexual violence. In fact, the stats show that it's roughly 1 in 4 Albertans. If you continue to take every group of Albertans for granted, it's going to come back and bite you.

With that, Mr. Chair, I would like to conclude my remarks.

The Deputy Chair: Are there any other members wishing to join debate?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question on Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2022?

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 23 Professional Governance Act

[Adjourned debate May 10: Mr. Dach]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has risen.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise in second reading to speak to Bill 23, the Professional Governance Act. This is a big bill. This bill is going to replace nine current pieces of legislation; namely, the Agrology Profession Act; the Architects Act; the Chartered Professional Accountants Act; the Consulting Engineers of Alberta Act; the Engineering and Geoscience Professions Act; the Land Surveyors Act; the Professional and Occupational Associations Registration Act, POARA, which regulates 13 occupations; the Regulated Forest Management Profession Act; and the Veterinary Profession Act. That explains why this is a large piece of legislation.

Bill 23 was introduced to bring in more transparency and consistency when it comes to professional regulatory organizations, when it comes to making sure that these 22 PROs are operating in a way that protects the public interest, that there are clear and consistent guidelines, and that it is fair and transparent for Albertans to understand how they work.

Now, this bill that I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, is certainly not the complete story, and in second reading I hope to touch on a few of my concerns when it comes to Bill 23, starting with the amount of detail that will be in regulation and schedules. I'd like to talk about the impact that this bill will have on PROs of different sizes. I'd like to talk about how this bill is going to impact timelines for those PROs, the feedback we've gotten on the consultation that went into this bill, the new powers that this bill is going to give to the minister, the impact this bill will have on advocacy, and the modernization elements of it. We'll see if I can touch on all of those pieces within 15 minutes.

When I say this bill is not the complete story, what I mean is that this bill is deferring a huge, fundamental amount to regulations, and they anticipate there will be profession-specific schedules that need to be created in consultation with these professions, with a timeline that's already been set out with the announcement that they hope to have this all complete by January.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Let me tie this into some of my comments on consultation with stakeholders. A number of these 22 organizations have said that the consultation up to this point has been incredibly high level, very information out. They were not given drafts of the legislation in advance of its introduction. That sometimes is not possible, but certainly for something as fundamental as the legislation that governs their existence, I know the stakeholders were hoping to have more insight prior to this part. Now they're in a position of having to negotiate with the government to create their profession-specific schedules as well as all of the accompanying regulations that will bring this piece of legislation into action. Now, on top of that, they're also going to need to create their bylaws, and that's set out in the act, how that will happen. This is a huge amount of decision-making and work that is not available for us to discuss here in the act.

One of my major concerns with Bill 23 is how much has been deferred to the regulations and the specific schedules and how much uncertainty there is for the impacted stakeholders and for the organizations that are going to be impacted by Bill 23. I will suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that we have reached out to all of these 22 organizations, and it is not just my concern about the timelines and the lack of consultation. They shared those concerns as well. Certainly, they are very concerned about how limited the consultation has been so far and concerned that there was a predetermined outcome with the consultation as it took place so far.

The stakeholders, the 22 professional regulatory organizations, who collectively represent hundreds of thousands of working professionals in our province, who contribute to the economy, who contribute to our great province here in Alberta, are concerned. There's no way for the Official Opposition to really understand the ultimate direction that the government will go with the regulations and the schedules, because they do not exist, and I imagine the Official Opposition will not be invited to participate in those conversations. So here we are trying to advocate on behalf of these organizations with very, very little insight as to what that is going to look like and what the final form will be. That's an area of significant concern.

Now, the current nine acts also have 28 regulations, and one of the reasons for Bill 23 to exist is the idea that it's going to streamline, it's going to reduce the number of pieces, and it's going to modernize, which is absolutely correct because some of those pieces of legislation are 20, 30 years out. One of, I think, the positive things of Bill 23 is some of the modernization around allowing PROs to acknowledge the existence of electronic communication. Legislation written 30 years ago really didn't address e-mail, didn't address things like virtual meetings, which, of course, have become far more the norm through the pandemic. I think some of that updating, that modernization is positive, but there's so much more in this act.

I'd like to talk a little bit about the new powers that have been granted to the minister as well as the creation of a new role, the PGOs, the professional governance officers, because the changes and the new powers given to the minister have been described to me as incredibly heavy handed. They've been described to me as an overreach. While the government is pointing to professional regulatory legislation in B.C. as where this was modelled from, some of those new ministerial powers that are being described as incredibly heavy handed don't exist in the B.C. legislation.

In the news release and the announcements around Bill 23 I did not see any good explanation for why there are all these new powers for the minister, specifically powers that I know stakeholders are interested in learning more about because it addresses their fundamental existence, including the minister being able to revoke a PRO's designation entirely, the minister being able to appoint an administrator for the PRO. So if the minister feels that a PRO is not operating in the public's best interest or is not serving the Alberta public, if there are concerns of safety, appointing this administrator who can then be empowered to essentially run the PRO on behalf of the minister.

My question to this government is: have there been situations where this type of intervention, this very extreme taking over of an organization by the minister through his agent, has been necessary? In my time working with these 22 organizations, each one has, to my mind, approached the work they do in the public interest with professionalism and with a deep sense of responsibility. I'm very curious about the new ministerial powers of appointing an administrator as well as the empowering of the professional governance officers and all of the powers they are doing to oversee, to make sure that the public confidence is maintained, and to require PROs to comply with any directions of the PGO. What limits are there to this power? Again, just fundamentally, why did the government see this need? Are there examples in history of these PROs going off the rails and causing serious harm? In my time as a member of this Legislature, these past seven years, that's not something that I have been aware of. Now, the stakeholders impacted are quite concerned about what this may mean.

The minister is also going to be empowered to propose the amalgamation of two or more PROs. This is something that has happened and, in fact, happened during my time as minister of labour. But prior to this legislation I believe it was voluntary, negotiated. Two organizations coming together and choosing to combine for a variety of positive benefits, coming to that negotiated solution rather than the minister coming in and saying: okay; you two, you need to combine and play better together; I think that'll be more efficient. I'm very curious, given that we have seen successful amalgamations in forestry and accounting because of the groups involved choosing to take those steps, why Bill 23 includes the minister's power to propose amalgamation and to recommend amalgamation.

Of course, I'm certain that the stakeholders are quite concerned around the revoking of a PRO's designation, when and how that may be used and finding out more. Now, those concerns potentially could be allayed with some great communication between this government and the stakeholders. But I'll remind you, Mr. Speaker, that I've already spoken to the concern that there was not robust consultation on this and not a lot of information offered.

We've spoken a little bit about the modernization, some of the new powers, and the need, I think, for some examples. For those who are following along at home, section 20 was one of the sections that I'm concerned about, the revocation of designation and understanding more about what that would look like and in what cases that might be used and whether or not these types of sections are mirrored in other jurisdictions.

We've talked about consultation. I'll probably talk about that a few more times throughout my remarks.

I would also like to really just flag at this point that when we talk about 22 professional regulatory organizations, we are not talking about a homogeneous group. We are talking about some very, very different groups. I have not had the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to check every single PRO of these 22, but, as an example, the Association of School Business Officials of Alberta is now covered by Bill 23 rather than POARA, which I spoke about earlier.

Now, I mention them because this is a group that has 180 members. I believe they're organized with a voluntary board and maybe a small staff. Similarly, the Alberta Shorthand Reporters Association is a group that represents 350 members, and they have eight working members who form their volunteer council. So we've got two groups here that are very small, represent a few hundred – 180 in one case, 350 in another – members, and they will be falling under Bill 23, whose regulations are also going to apply to APEGA. APEGA is 70,000 members, Mr. Speaker. APEGA has a council. It has major staff with three different departments. It's operated by boards and committees. It has offices in Edmonton and Calgary. The work that APEGA needs to do in the public interest to manage its memberships, to manage its registrations is going to be significantly different than what the Alberta Shorthand Reporters Association and the Association of School Business Officials need to do. I'm concerned about so many of the sections of this legislation applying to all 22 organizations equally.

Now, I do want to recognize that there will be regulations and there will be profession-specific schedules, but this could be a lot of work for the implementation of eight volunteer members.

Oh, good heavens, I'm out of time already. I haven't even talked about several of my concerns. I thought this might happen. I look forward to the ability to talk more on Bill 23 as we continue, but certainly consultation with stakeholders is going to be incredibly important, finding out more about the details and the regulations and the schedules – time check, Mr. Speaker? – and making sure that we have a better understanding of how this January time frame is going to be met. These are some of the concerns that I have with Bill 23.

In my last, I think, 40 seconds or so I do want to flag that in section 67 this bill also implements some new timelines that I think could be incredibly difficult. Now, it's supposed to be aligning with the Labour Mobility Act and the fair registrations act, but the fair registration practices office and the fair registrations act put into legislation that PROs needed to make an interim decision within six months. This act says final decision within four months, and I'm very curious about how that was decided because the 2020 baseline questionnaire survey that was sent out to all these PROs never even asked them how long it takes to get to these decisions. So how does the government know that four months is going to be sufficient, especially for an organization as large as APEGA?

The Speaker: Hon. members, Bill 23 for second reading. The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 23, the Professional Governance Act. My colleague from Edmonton-Mill Woods, I think, has very ably laid out a number of real concerns that we have with this bill. With this bill, of course, we are here at second reading, so hopefully there is going to be opportunity for us to hear from the minister, from some of the members on the other side on a number of these questions, because as my colleague noted, this is a big bill.

This is an incredibly ambitious bill on behalf of this government, and there are many questions amongst the broad swath of regulators that are going to be affected by this legislation. Indeed, a lot of folks have started to take a look at it, you know, and Field Law did a review. Their comments on this bill were that for regulators this bill represents a massive change, leaves many critical details to regulations and schedules, and regulators will need to carefully review the transitional provisions, plan and engage with the ministry to ensure that these critical details are considered carefully.

Mr. Speaker, that immediately suggests to me, if they are saying that regulators will need to look at this very closely, plan how they're going to engage with the minister on this bill, that the minister perhaps has not done his work. If the fact is that it's going to be incumbent on regulators to sort through the mass of this bill, the many details, all of the potential regulations in order to be able to advocate to the minister that this does not affect them in a drastically negative way, that says to me that the minister should not be here with this bill yet. There is clearly a lot more consultation that needed to be done. There is clearly a lot more detail that needs to be on the table to understand the kinds of impacts this is going to have.

Again, this is a habit of this government, to bring substantive, massive bills into this House and then defer all of the actual meat of it to regulations, asking members in this House to debate and then approve considerable new powers for government with no details on how they actually intend to use them. Indeed, one of the substantial problems here is that again we have a bill before this House which proposes to substantially expand ministerial powers. Now, I've spoken at great length in this House, Mr. Speaker, about the number of times this government has brought this forward, attempted to drastically expand powers of ministers, and it has ended very badly.

We have seen how this government's ministers like to use these kinds of powers. It is often in ways that have utterly broken the trust of Albertans, have caused serious push-back, and forced this government then to have to retract on its actions, Bill 10, of course, being the one example where they awarded new and sweeping powers to the Minister of Health and certainly every minister in the government in the midst of a public emergency to create full, entirely new legislation without ever setting foot in the Legislature. They had to walk that one back, Mr. Speaker, at the cost of great time and expense.

Now, the other concern I have here, Mr. Speaker, is what they intend to do with this power they intend to award themselves. The minister is being given the power to determine the scope, the bylaws, even the existence of every regulatory body in the province of Alberta. My concern is that in many respects we have seen that this is an incredibly vindictive government, condescending, patronizing in its approach to those which fall under its governance.

I want to take a walk back, Mr. Speaker. If we want to take a look at how this government has interacted with regulatory bodies in the province of Alberta, let's dial the clock back to the summer of 2020. The then Minister of Health, having made disastrous attempts, after tearing up the provincial agreement with the Alberta Medical Association, with physicians in the province of Alberta, again through legislation that this government had passed, adding those new powers to the minister, then attempted to force through disastrous changes that had multiple MLAs in his own caucus rebelling against him because of the drastic impacts this was having in rural communities, where we saw entire teams of physicians either threatening to withdraw services or, in many cases, actually withdrawing services because the changes this minister wanted to force through would have made their ability to practise impossible.

So this government's own members had to push back against that minister to get some changes. How did the minister respond to that? Was that a moment of humility for that minister? Was that a moment where the minister sat back and reconsidered whether taking that kind of bullying and condescending approach towards physicians would be harmful to the goals that he actually had set out, not to mention the actual access to health for Albertans? No.

What we saw instead is that that minister then wrote a letter to the College of Physicians & Surgeons of Alberta. He wrote to them and said: I want you to change your standards to stop doctors from being able to withdraw their services. He wrote to them and said: you have until July 20 to change your standards to stop Alberta doctors from leaving their practices en masse. Now, the college registrar at that time replied that, well, there was no evidence that the current practice standards were in fact putting the safety of any patients at risk. Now, certainly, the situation was embarrassing the minister, it was certainly showing how poor the approach of the government was, but it was not in fact putting the safety of patients at risk. But the minister decided that rather than actually try to change his behaviour or reconsider the poor policy of the government, he should instead go to the CPSA and dictate that they change their standards so that he could continue with his aggressive approach.

That is what concerns me here, Mr. Speaker. We have seen with this government that the powers they already have, they use badly. They use them not in the best interests of Albertans. They don't use them in the best interests of supporting the professions. In this case doctors were very clear that to make the kinds of changes that the government was pushing for in the way they were pushing for them would essentially be shackling physicians to their clinics, to their practice, making it impossible for them potentially to be able to take a job elsewhere, to retire if they so choose. These are members that talk often about freedom and freedom from government regulation and government interference, but they are more than happy to weaponize it when they feel it suits their political ends.

I am concerned that with what we have here in Bill 23, awarding once again sweeping new powers to a minister with very little detail on how all of that's going to actually operate, all of that being deferred to regulation at some point down the road, which, again, will be done behind closed doors by the minister himself – I think there's good reason to question that. Albertans have been given examples time and again that this government cannot be trusted with that kind of power.

Now, of course, we have the opportunity – we're here in second reading. There's going to be plenty of room for debate, and perhaps we can get some clarity from the minister on how they intend for this to operate, on what consultations actually took place, on how they intend to mobilize this vast and sweeping change, as my colleague from Edmonton-Mill Woods noted, by next January. Mr. Speaker, this government has been barely able to hold it together over the last few weeks, months as they are caught up in their own political drama, and they are somehow going to push through this massive, sweeping reform and rewriting of how regulatory bodies in this province operate in the next nine months?

I have serious doubts about their ability to meet that timeline effectively, to do the consultation that's required for the vast number of bodies that are included. As my colleague from Edmonton-Mill Woods noted, vastly different groups of wildly varying sizes with very different mandates, very different focuses, very different levels of, for lack of a better term, risk to the public. This is not something to be done on the back of a napkin.

Again, with the track record of this government in how it exercises the kinds of powers it has – just thinking back just recently to March here, when this government went out of its way to introduce a piece of legislation solely to stop pretty much a single municipal jurisdiction in the province of Alberta from continuing with a mask mandate. That's the kind of petty vindictiveness we see from this government, using the vast powers that are put in their hands – for the benefit of the people of Alberta is the reason they wield that power, but that is certainly not how we have seen it used in multiple, multiple instances during the term of their government.

There are some very confusing aspects in this bill. PROs will now have three different sets of timelines to adhere to; 120 days, four months, to make a decision and notify an applicant of a decision in this act, but in the Labour Mobility Act, that deals with Canadian jurisdictions, it says that they must provide written acknowledgement of the application within 10 days and make a decision within 20 business days of receipt of a completed application and provide written notification of the decision within 10 business days. In the Fair Registration Practices Act it says that they must make an interim decision within six months of a completed application and a final decision within a reasonable amount of time. We need some clarity here, Mr. Speaker. What is this government trying to accomplish? What are the actual expectations? What is actually going to be required here?

Now, by the department's own admission, Mr. Speaker, the consultation that they held ahead of this was not broad across all organizations prior to the legislation being drafted. A bill this dense, having this wide of an implication for PROs, and they did not bother speaking to all of them before they put this bill out. The consultation was not broad, was not doing some heavy lifting there. If it was not broad, then by necessity it was narrow, and that is not what we should be seeing when we are bringing forward this kind of legislation providing such profound new powers to a minister, affecting so many organizations and thousands of organizations in the province of Alberta. [interjection] Certainly. Go ahead, Member.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for giving way for a short intervention. The member talked about consultation. I'm hoping that maybe that member would want to elaborate on his concerns about the government's consultation because the way I see it, the government did a lot of consultation on this bill, particularly from a number of very important stakeholders, not the least of which is the registrar and chief executive officer for the Association of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of Alberta. In addition, we have the registrar, the chief executive officer of Alberta Institute of Agrologists and, furthermore, the Chartered Professional Accountants of Alberta, just to name a few. I know that this is a general talking point coming from the members opposite about the lack of consultation, but I can assure Albertans that while the Member for Edmonton-City Centre gives his remarks, he is doing so in error, not referencing the many people that have been consulted on this to ensure that we're streamlining processes and cutting red tape for Albertans.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, it's lovely that the member is able to mention three organizations, suggests that there are many others. By all means, he could let us know precisely how many. I would welcome that number if you want to share exactly how many organizations were consulted.

All I can say is that the department themselves in our conversation with them when we had the opportunity, my understanding is likely during the bill briefing, said that the consultation was not broad across all organizations prior to the legislation. No one was provided with opportunities to provide input on the drafts of the legislation. No one was shown the actual drafts of the legislation, Mr. Speaker. Now, this is a government that recently killed my own private member's bill, said that it was not even worthy of debate because it required consultation, consultation that they said only government had the resources to undertake.

In this case, as they drafted this very legislation, they did not consult with a single one of these PROs. Not one. That's another habit this government has. They like to talk about how much they consulted by talking to people before they draft legislation and then not a word to anyone afterwards.

We'll have much more to say on this as we continue debate, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again it's my pleasure to rise in the House to speak to the bill, Bill 23, Professional Governance Act. This bill makes changes to nine acts and affects a number of organizations under, as the government stated – the announcement made that it will bring more consistency, transparency, and accountability for the professional regulatory organizations. These organizations do very important work. I've been a member and part of very similar organizations for the past 14 years, and I have witnessed, lived experience, the amount of work these organizations undertake in order to provide education to their members to advance their knowledge so they can advance their careers, they can advance their professional expertise to put them in a position where they can serve in the better way the best interests of, I would say, Albertans or their clients.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

At the same time these organizations do undertake the work of advocacy on behalf of their members, where they try to make sure that their members also get fair treatment for the work they are doing for the public and the work they are doing while serving the industry. If this were all about to, you know, promote the consistency, transparency, and accountability, we would have been more than happy to support this piece of legislation, but what the government says about this bill and what they propose in this are two different things. Even the government announcement: they tried to say that they are trying to make something in line with what already exists in the neighbouring province of British Columbia. That information is also not true.

As my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Meadows – Edmonton-Mill Woods. Pardon me.

Mr. Nielsen: It's pretty close.

Mr. Deol: That was my own riding. Mill Woods is also my neighbouring riding.

The bill affects these 22 PROs in three different ways. It imposes timelines and what they do for advocacy, and suddenly there's a slightly good thing that could be supported, that an organization – the process where it acknowledges that the technology exists in these days and technology is useful. Specifically, something coming from this government – I understand probably maybe one thing, as the member of government caucus said, named some of the organizations. Maybe this very recommendation coming from one of those organizations that were able to outreach and consult with is modernization.

But other than that, my caucus has worked and has been in touch with the majority – not majority; all of these organizations – did a number of those communications. All of the organizations said that the consultations will not happen or that if anyone replied, the consultation that they had was not broad enough, it didn't provide the proper feedback. A number of those changes that are being proposed in this bill were not asked for by them.

These are unprecedented changes that we are discussing under this bill. That bill that was passed gives sweeping powers to the minister that can change the whole process in this case. The minister will have the authority, and the PROs are concerned that the minister can, in section 20 of this bill, which would allow the minister to either dissolve or cease the existence of those PROs – these organizations, 22 organizations, which replied back to our request that we wanted their feedback, what they're thinking about this bill and where they stand on this: specifically, what they see is good faith in what they have advocated for and that they see this bill address that issue for the betterment of those organizations. So far there is none.

Tens of thousands of people are represented by these 22 organizations providing wonderful, wonderful services and contributions to our province. They'll be affected, and the minister did not consult properly with all those organizations before bringing this piece of legislation for debate in this House. The sweeping power changing the balance in the hands of the ministry is very concerning.

I do not understand how the minister actually decided to propose these changes even after we know the incident around that particular minister just leaving from one portfolio to another, specifically related to the personal behaviour of interpreting specific powers that do not exist in the system. There is no such precedent that any elected officials or elected member or the member of council would ever try to use those powers. [interjection] Sure.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, the Member for Edmonton-Meadows was commenting a little bit on the consultation or, shall I say, the lack of consultation. I sometimes refer to it as the government more consul-tolding people what's going to be happening. But I know that with some of your experiences in your past – for example, the Member for Cardston-Siksika was talking about this bill reducing red tape, yet part of this now has these organizations having to adhere to three different timelines around the approving for applications of registrations. I'm just wondering if maybe the Member for Edmonton-Meadows might share his thoughts around: does he think bringing in additional timelines sounds like red tape, or does that sound like more burdening red tape, thereby slowing down the process? Maybe he might share some of his thoughts on it.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, hon. member, for your intervention and allowing me to speak specifically on this red tape perspective the government always has. Something that really always concerned me and confused me: the government's understanding, particularly this UCP government's understanding, of red tape, the definition of red tape for them. When it has come to reducing red tape and barriers, we don't see, like – we just discussed the other bills, like, not a while ago. There was no simple piece of legislation that we could discuss that would help, probably, or make it easy for ordinary Albertans to seek justice in the justice system. So that is what it means to me for red tape, when you're talking about red tape: how you're contributing to your very citizens, Albertans, and make it easy for them to see the services they need. All the bills and the legislation we have discussed under the name of red tape: I have never heard anything from the government caucus members on how those changes are going to impact those very citizens, Albertans, and would make their life better by removing some of those legislations or making the legislation changes.

That is why a number of those particular organizations, specifically the organizations impacted by this piece of legislation, Bill 23 – none of them actually acknowledge that that is going to help them in a way to do their job, what they're doing right now. None of the organizations came out in the media publicly to support this Bill 23. That is very concerning after the episodes we have seen in the past months and particularly concerning the minister's behaviour, and now the minister is coming to a different portfolio and wants to propose sweeping changes into his hands so he could single-handedly be able to make changes, decide on behalf of 22 different organizations that are professionally serving their members.

Not only that; he will be able to dissolve and cease their status of working. It's totally unacceptable, particularly when it comes to the very ministry that has been – I will just try to stay within the range of parliamentary language and parliamentary behaviour, I would call it. But it is very serious. It's hard to express my concern and the concern of all those that are being affected by these changes and our constituents.

Where I am coming from, I said that, like, my organization was not probably under the definition of PRO but more of a self-regulatory organization. It has been so much concerned by what is happening for the past some years in this province. So when it comes to the brokers association that I was part of – and I'm still holding the designation – they're concerned with all the changes coming into the laws, and they're feeling helpless to advocate on behalf of their members.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to join debate? I do see the hon. Member for St. Albert has risen.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 23, Professional Governance Act. This is a hefty piece of legislation. You know, I just wanted to first comment on – there was an interjection earlier. I don't recall, actually, who was speaking, but one of the members opposite rose and sort of seemed a little defensive about the UCP's – the fact that they had consulted.

I think, you know, there's a lot more to consultation than just talking to friends or talking to one or two stakeholders, and I think it's really important for us to recognize that and talk about it. Honestly, I don't think that any government gets it a hundred per cent right, but I do think that there are some that don't get it right at all. I think that this UCP government has demonstrated time and again that their failure to consult has resulted in legislation that has a lot of unintended consequences, as I said earlier, and makes a lot of changes that are not in the best interest of Albertans.

One of the things that we have seen time and again with this government is a lack of transparency around their consultation. By transparency I mean: what is the purpose of the change? What problem is the government trying to address or fix, and what is the plan? The plan should be commensurate with the expected impact and scope of the proposed legislation. We don't see that. I mean, you know, all the way from – we don't actually get invited to many briefings anymore to even know what the legislation is about, let alone do we hear about the consultation plan, what tools are being used. Very often we see the very minimum being used by this UCP government. Often it's just an online survey, particularly during COVID. I understand that it was a difficult and trying time to try to consult with stakeholders, but I think that it's incumbent on governments to do far more than that.

I think if this government, if there are members that have more details about what the consultation included other than picking up the phone and talking to a couple of stakeholders or having an online satisfaction survey or an open survey – like, truly, what was the goal of the consultation? What was the problem that the legislation or the changes intended to solve? I think that that has been a problem with this government over and over again. We don't understand, number one, what the problem is, what problem they're trying to prevent, the problem they're trying to fix and, really, what the range of stakeholders is, not just friendlies, not just lobbyists but the whole range of stakeholders. Friends, maybe not friends, NGOs, community: who are the stakeholders? We don't get that.

Anyway, going back to the legislation, we do – as my colleagues have said, while we support the consistency and the transparency and accountability for the professional regulatory organizations and all areas of governance, the overreach of this bill is a little bit astounding, and it goes far beyond just the basic. Based on the proposed amendments, the professional regulatory organizations can be reduced to self-regulatory organizations in name only. Once again we see legislation that is opening the door for a ministerial overreach that is concerning.

I think it's important, again, as my colleagues have said and we continue to say over and over, that this government has probably stepped into their governing role with not a lot of trust, based on things that went on in their leadership race, in the election, but they have consistently eroded the public trust over the just over three years of their term so far. We have seen example after example of this government demonstrating they are not to be trusted. The leadership race: as I mentioned, I'm quite sure that there is still an open RCMP investigation going on. We have heard again and again of different people being interviewed. We still don't know what the results are, and now we're hearing rumblings of some allegations of problems in another race. Not surprising. We have seen questionable decisions made. We know, via lobbyist registries, who the lobbyists have contacted, who they are, and then, surprisingly, we see legislation or regulatory changes come in soon after that that don't benefit Albertans but actually benefit the lobbyists.

Again and again we see examples of this government that are not to be trusted. We have seen – coal mining, eastern slopes, curriculum, health care – example after example of this government eroding trust. That is why when we see a piece of legislation like Bill 23, which is massive – and my colleagues have talked about the extensive work that needs to go on after this is passed – it does give more power to the minister, and that is definitely concerning.

I would like to know. As I asked in an earlier debate on a separate piece of legislation – that was Bill 20, and I was happy to see the minister stand up and attempt to answer some of those questions. Maybe a minister will come back and answer some of these questions. Who precisely was consulted? I think the member not too long ago mentioned a couple of organizations that were consulted, but what was the consultation plan? What was the problem that was going to be addressed, and who specifically was consulted? Then what is the work plan after that?

Bear with me. Now, one of the concerning things is that this piece of legislation, Bill 23, will repeal governing statutes for 22 different professions and replace them with one umbrella statute. If that makes sense and if all of the professional organizations are okay with that and this is something that they and their memberships support and they've been consulted about and they see a path forward that is positive for them, that is one thing. If they do not, that is quite another. But I think I'm going to list them because I think it's important for people to understand who these organizations are.

We've got the Alberta Assessors' Association, Alberta Association of Architects: were they consulted? Alberta Association of Landscape Architects: were they consulted? Alberta Human Ecology and Home Economics Association: were they consulted by the UCP? Alberta Institute of Agrobiologists: were they consulted?

Alberta Land Surveyors' Association: did the UCP consult them? The Alberta Professional Planners Institute: were they consulted by the UCP? Alberta Shorthand Reporters Association: were they consulted by the UCP? Alberta Society of Professional Biologists: were they consulted by the UCP? I know the UCP sometimes has issue with science. I'd like to know that they were consulted. Alberta Veterinary Medical Association: I hope they were consulted, but we'd like clarity. Were they consulted? Association of Alberta Forest Management Professionals, a vitally important group: were they consulted? I'd also like to know if they were consulted when the rappel firefighters were cut.

Anyway, were the Association of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists, APEGA – yes, they were consulted. I think the member did note that. The Association of Science and Engineering Technology Professionals of Alberta: were they consulted? How about the Association of School Business Officials, the chemical profession, the Information Processing Society of Alberta, chartered professionals – yes, I do believe they were consulted – the Consulting Engineers of Alberta, Electrical Contractors Association, Institute of Certified Management Consultants, the Society of Local Government Managers of Alberta, and Supply Chain Management Association of Alberta?

The reason I'm listing these is that there are so many different associations and we only heard from one government member noting a couple of associations. So given the sweeping nature of this piece of legislation I think it's incumbent on this government to actually stand up and tell us the consultation that was done. Were these organizations consulted, what was the result, and how is that included in this piece of legislation?

The bill proposes to substantially expand ministerial powers to include determining the regulatory model for each organization. Again, I would hope that each and every organization impacted by this legislation was included in the consultation and it wasn't just an exercise of checking the box and saying: all done; we called a couple of organizations, and they're good.

The sweeping powers of a minister that this bill proposes, the appointment of professional governance officers in the department to inspect the PROs or undertake a designation review of the PRO: what does this mean in terms of the number of staff within government? I hear from this government all the time: we want smaller government; we want to spend less on bureaucracy, on bureaucrats. Okay. Fair enough. What does that mean? When you look at this legislation, is this legislation doing that, or does that mantra from the government members only come into play sometimes?

The bill also proposes to expand ministerial powers to include the ability to appoint an administrator to assist or take over the PRO, which is a professional regulatory organization.

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member; however, under Standing Order 4(2.1) we are adjourned until 1.30 p.m. today.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge has a statement to make.

Security Infrastructure Program

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When it comes to racism and hatred in Alberta, our UCP government has been very clear. We have absolutely zero tolerance for intolerance. Not just words; we have acted quickly to address rising instances of hate-motivated violence and vandalism in our communities. As part of our effort, last November we introduced the Alberta security infrastructure program, aimed at helping to protect faith-based facilities, groups, and organizations from hate-motivated attacks and racism. These grants were used to purchase security infrastructure and equipment and to provide valuable training and education. More than $1.2 million was provided to more than a hundred faith-based organizations.

Given the strong demand we are more than doubling funding, from $2 million to $5 million, for this, and we can say that we stand beside all those affected by these monstrous crimes. Despite the success and popularity of this program, we knew more needed to be done. Today we are also expanding this program so that faith-based groups and organizations can be reimbursed for security upgrades made since June 1, 2021, several months before this important program was first announced. We are also removing application period deadlines to make it easier for organizations to apply for support. As a result, the $5 million grant program for 2022-23 is now open for the entire year.

Mr. Speaker, this program is making a real impact for faith-based groups and communities who, unfortunately, may find themselves the target of violence and vandalism. We have seen Catholic churches burned down, mosques and gurdwaras vandalized with spray paint, and now we're taking a stand, side by side with our faith leaders and communities, against this. There is no home for hatred or violence in Alberta today, and we are making that clear.

Thank you.

Bereavement Leave for Pregnancy Loss

Member Irwin: Alberta's NDP will always be a force for compassion, inclusivity, and protection of workers' rights. We have continued this fight in so many ways, including the recognition of grief, anxiety, and other responses that may surround pregnancy loss and the need for bereavement leave to be inclusive. All forms of pregnancy loss must be supported, including abortion and termination for medical reasons.

At first the UCP chose to discriminate in terms of the kinds of pregnancy loss a person may experience. This did a serious injustice to folks who need compassion. We must leave no room for interpretation, and now, due to the pressure placed on this government by the NDP, stakeholders, community activists, and folks all across this province, any pregnancy that does not result in a live birth will be covered. This includes abortion and termination for medical reasons. This is a win for all Albertans.

We will always defend reproductive rights, and we've ensured that this government cannot get away with discriminating against anyone who has had an abortion and is seeking protected leave. We have guaranteed that people making the choice to terminate a pregnancy will be supported. I'm so proud of my caucus colleagues and of all those who support reproductive rights in successfully forcing the UCP to acknowledge abortion.

Alberta's NDP: we will defend reproductive rights. We will always fight this government to be inclusive and compassionate even as they've shown their unwillingness. We know that without much public pressure we cannot trust the UCP to uphold Albertans' right to health care and to safe work environments. An NDP government will move forward with the important work of making reproductive rights a priority, strengthening public health care, all while supporting workers and building a better province for all.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Alberta Junior Hockey League 2022 Championship

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today with news, great news, in fact. In a stunning victory over my Spruce Grove Saints, the Brooks Bandits became Alberta Junior Hockey League champions for the sixth time, capturing the Inter Pipeline Cup. After a first-round bye and sweeping the Canmore Eagles, this win was well deserved. With 2,200 fans packed into the Centennial Regional Arena, Brooks Bandits forward Ryan McAllister was awarded the Alberta Junior Hockey League most valuable player and top scorer award.

But, Mr. Speaker, the good news just doesn't stop there. Bandits coach and general manager Ryan Papaioannou also has been nominated for the Canadian Junior Hockey League coaching award. In the end, my beloved Spruce Grove Saints tried their hardest but struggled to come out on top, and I applaud their efforts and congratulate them on a hard-fought season. The Bandits are a tough team, the best, in fact, so this loss was not in vain but represented a valiant effort.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it's time to address the elephant in the Chamber. You might be wondering why I stand before you today wearing this stunningly beautiful Brooks Bandits jersey. I do so reluctantly; however, I must make good on a bet to my wonderful, intelligent colleague from Brooks-Medicine Hat, who's the bestest, super-duper MLA in the history of Alberta, and let me just say that Brooks-Medicine Hat is truly the greatest constituency in the province. From its vast agricultural landscapes to its abundance of natural resources and the hard-working people, any Albertan would be lucky to live, work, and raise a family there. Did I not say also that they have the best MLA?

Throughout this experience, Mr. Speaker, I have learned my lesson the hard way. Never again will I bet against the Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat or the Brooks Bandits, at least for a year. The Brooks Bandits are truly the greatest hockey team in the AJHL this season, and I hope all Albertans will join me as we cheer them on as they fight for the Centennial Cup in Estevan, Saskatchewan. Go, Bandits, go!

Thank you.

Premier's Leadership

Ms Hoffman: Alberta's current Premier is the least trusted Premier in Canada, and in case there was any question as to why Alberta's 18th Premier holds this unique distinction, let me share a couple of examples. The grassroots guarantee, the health care guarantee: both were clearly not worth the paper they were written on. The grassroots were told by the Premier that, despite what they think, he holds the pen. Public health care in Alberta is under attack because the UCP started a war with doctors and other health professionals during a pandemic.

Need some more examples? The Premier called for Albertans to take personal responsibility to follow the rules that he set, but then he had a boozy party with his favourite ministers on the roof of the sky palace, breaking those rules. The Premier says that he believes in the rule of law, but then he fires the commissioner investigating his leadership race. The Premier used to rail and rage in Ottawa about using inflation to hike personal income tax, but then he comes to Edmonton, and he changed the law so that he could tax inflation, taking a billion dollars away from Alberta families. The Premier talks about affordability, but then he lifts the cap on utilities. He promised rebates in March, but Albertans are still waiting. The Premier promised to be a servant leader, but he never told Albertans that that meant he'd be a servant to insurance lobbyists, who wanted him to lift the insurance cap and make driving a car unaffordable for many Alberta families.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

Ever since the Premier climbed down from his blue truck, he's been making promises to Albertans, promises that he repeatedly breaks. Albertans need a leader and a Premier that they can trust, someone that they can rely on to stand up for their best interests and to put them first. Good news, Mr. Speaker. She's running to be your Premier in the next election. The leader of Alberta's NDP cares about you, and you can trust her to stand up for your family, for public health care and public education, to make your life more affordable, to create a diversified economy, and to keep your family as her top priority.

1:40 Lemonade Day in Northern Alberta

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, I want to take a moment and talk about something most people like and some people have likely sold, lemonade. Specifically, I'd like to talk about the northern Alberta Lemonade Day, happening on June 18. Lemonade Day is a free and fun experiential learning program that teaches youth how to start, own, and operate their own business. Children from prekindergarten to high school learn to set goals, develop a business plan, establish a budget, seek investors, provide customer service, save for the future, and give back to the community. The main objective of Lemonade Day is to empower youth to take ownership of their lives and become productive members of society. Along the way kids acquire skills in goal setting and problem solving, and they gain self-esteem while having fun and being creative.

Community Futures, a nonprofit organization dedicated to building an economically diverse future in our region, plans the entire process and co-ordinates multiple tasting events across northern Alberta leading up to the big day. Although the program contributes to growing kids' entrepreneurial spirit, it also focuses on giving back to the community. The program encourages the kids to spend some, save some, and share some of their profits. In 2019 the kids donated over $9,000 to local charities of their choosing; in 2021 they donated over $7,000. Mr. Speaker, education goes beyond the classroom, and programs like these teach our kids soft and transferable skills they will need and undoubtedly use later on.

Last year I drove across my constituency to support as many Lemonade Day entrepreneurs as I could. The day was hard on the bladder but good for the soul. Aside from being a great community activity, Lemonade Day helps youth become the business leaders, social advocates, community volunteers, and forward-thinking citizens of tomorrow, so on June 18 across northern Alberta I encourage all MLAs, all community members to get out and support the future leaders in our communities through this great initiative.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Norma Vidal

Member Loyola: Last week the Chilean community in Alberta lost a truly dedicated community member, I would say a remarkable icon for peace and human rights. Known affectionately by many in my generation as Tia Norma, Norma Vidal was a phenomenal community organizer that participated in a number of groups, but her most notable accomplishment was that she was a truly amazing artist.

Norma came to Edmonton in 1975 as a result of the September 11, 1973, military coup in Chile. Soon after her arrival she helped to settle other refugees that were arriving for the same reason as her. In the first few years she dedicated herself to putting together an acting group for children so that they could have an outlet for expressing themselves and learn important skills of reading and reciting as well as acting. Norma also participated in folkloric music groups like the very well-known Tupac Amaru, that would share the cultural sounds and music that accompanied the human rights movement, also known as the new Chilean song.

In her later years Norma was also a pillar of the Latin-American women's association known as Amigas, through which she brought several cultural artists to Edmonton and to Alberta. Norma not only loved to act and sing, but she also enjoyed painting, drawing, and making sculptures out of stone. She illustrated a number of books and later in life also began to write her own, the latest one called A Cocktail Party.

Tia Norma, you will be missed, your strong and determined voice, that I remember inspired me to possess a plurality of thought and to never give up on our ideals as a community. Her voice and what she taught me will always accompany me. The whole community has lost an icon. Tia Norma, we love you, and may you always rest in power.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Integrated Emergency Medical and Fire Services

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Recently Alberta fire chiefs have been promoting an integrated emergency response model. They are educating elected officials as to the benefits of returning emergency medical services to urban municipalities as they recognize the challenges that EMS is facing today. Prior to 2008 municipalities employed an integrated model of EMS and fire services where the rescuers were trained as both paramedics skilled in advanced life support as well as firefighters skilled in hazard suppression and rescue. This gave municipalities an agile system that ensured the people responding could manage virtually any emergency.

Integrated ambulance crews inherently work with the fire crews supporting them. Not only was there a large team focused on patient treatment, but they're available to supplement EMS response. Whether they jumped on the backup ambulance or responded on a medically equipped fire truck, there was always someone available to respond to the call. This diversity within the job contributed to increased job satisfaction as it kept members mentally engaged and reduced the monotony of the job. The cost savings aren't just because you're paying one person to do two jobs, but the integrated model eliminates the need to have separate stations. There is no need to have EMS stations when you have established fire halls everywhere. The end result is over 30 per cent in savings for the taxpayer.

Ultimately, municipalities gave up EMS in 2008 because AHS offered to take over this budget item, collectively saving municipalities over $300 million. In 2009 the EMS budget was $329 million. Today the budget is over half a billion dollars.

Despite this infusion of money over the last decade-plus, our wait times for ambulances have increased. Code reds continue secretly as AHS stopped publicly reporting them, and rural ambulances are commonly pulled from their communities to serve in our largest urban centres. Sick time, low morale, and burnout of paramedics is inherent in this current system.

The integrated model appears to be a more cost-effective system with better employee working conditions, ultimately providing more holistic service to Albertans. This government needs to reconsider re-evaluating this integrated model of emergency response for the health and safety of Albertans.

Provincial Support for Edmonton

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, Edmonton needs a partner. That was the thrust of the mayor's state-of-the-city address this week calling out the UCP for their failure to invest in and support Alberta's capital city. His Worship told those in attendance that this UCP government has made Edmonton feel as if they don't matter and called on them to work with them and, most importantly, stop holding Edmonton's economy back.

Rather than addressing these real concerns, the UCP's Minister of Municipal Affairs instead complained that Edmonton doesn't praise his government enough. It's unfortunate, but it's clear as day that the words of the mayor were lost on the UCP, and sadly it seems this government does not value or respect the contributions or the residents of Alberta's second-largest city.

That's certainly what I'm hearing from many of my constituents, neighbours, and friends. Here in the heart of our city one of the biggest challenges remains how many of our neighbours are living houseless. Over the last two years their numbers have doubled and are expected to keep growing, about 2,800 people with no permanent home.

Yet for three consecutive budgets the UCP government has repeatedly refused to partner with the city of Edmonton and the government of Canada to invest in supportive housing. With federal support consecutive councils have invested millions to build 210 new units of supportive housing and over 300 more in converted hotels. Not one dollar from this government.

This despite the fact that, as Mayor Sohi noted, tackling houselessness, mental health, addictions, and trauma is a provincial responsibility and that providing these Albertans in need with the dignity of a home, with wraparound supports will save millions in costs in health care, social services, and the justice system. That benefits us all. Instead, this government broke their promise to ensure that benefits for those with the least would rise with inflation. They attack and undermine supports for harm reduction, increasing pressure on police, hospitals, and paramedics.

Edmonton deserves better, Mr. Speaker. My constituents, housed and unhoused, deserve better. They need a partner. Edmonton is looking for a government that will work with them, and the Alberta NDP is ready to step up and be that partner.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Hemp Industry Development

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government's low-tax, pro-business policies have positioned our province to be a global magnet for investment and innovation. Through our government's policies we are supporting economic diversification in our agriculture sector by investing in projects that will create new value-added hemp products.

In partnership with the federal government, through the emerging opportunities program, Alberta has awarded two grants totalling $900,000 to help grow the province's hemp industry. Inca Renewtech, a globally recognized hemp manufacturing company, will receive a grant of up to $400,000 to help fund the building of its new $72 million hemp processing facility in Vegreville. And Blue Sky Hemp Ventures, a global leader in hemp whole plant utilization, will receive a grant of $500,000 to advance a proposed $75 million hemp food processing plant in Alberta.

This investment will increase demand for Alberta-grown hemp while supporting new manufacturing and processing jobs for Albertans. Mr. Speaker, the Inca Renewtech investment is great news for my riding of Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville. The state-of-the-art, 200,000 square foot fibre processing and composites manufacturing facility is expected to be operational in early 2024 and create 70 jobs, scaling up to about a hundred jobs by 2026. This facility will also create demand for 45,000 tonnes of hemp biomass per year, adding $270 million in additional farm income over 25 years. This is a project that I was pleased to advocate for, and I'm thrilled that they have chosen my riding to build in.

I want to thank the minister and all my colleagues who played a role in bringing this important investment to fruition. These investments will no doubt bring new jobs to our communities and help continue to grow Alberta's economic prosperity. Our government's economic recovery plan is second to none, and this is just another example of its success. The project is a win for Alberta's clean tech sector, rural job creation, economic diversification, and my riding of Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has question 1.

Emergency Medical Services

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, when Albertans call 911 in an emergency, they expect the ambulance is on the way, but across the province we're seeing ambulances lined up outside of hospitals and a high volume of deep red alerts, when there are no ambulances available to respond. According to new data from AHS response times to life-threatening calls are climbing. The worst ones are now over 17 minutes, well over target, the longest wait on record, in fact, since AHS first started collecting this data. This is life and death. What is the Premier doing right now to reverse this trend he started?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education has risen.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Every province is seeing this kind of pressure. It's normal after two years of a pandemic. In fact, AHS has 230 more paramedics working today than they did two years ago. Budget 2022 has increased an additional $64 million to help ease the system pressures and make sure that EMS are more responsive to their communities. Again, this is something we're seeing not just in Alberta but right across Canada.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, those new positions are casual, not full-time. A big difference, and the acting Minister of Health should know it.

Now, part of the problem is that crews are getting stuck in Calgary and Edmonton for longer. In Calgary 10 per cent of ambulances are at the ER for as long as two hours and 45 minutes, over an hour longer than AHS's own target, and the worst measure, again, since they started collecting this data. This risks Albertans' health and increases pressure on already stressed EMS crews. To the Premier: is almost three hours stuck in the ER an acceptable time to him? And if not, what's he going to do to fix it?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes. We understand that there are pressures, but again I am reiterating the fact that we are taking steps to increase capacity. There's $28 million for additional ground crew, ambulances, and crews in addition to sustaining funding for helicopter air ambulance service such as STARS, HALO, and HERO; $22 million for increasing capacity in priority projects, including extension of ground ambulance contracts, supporting integrated operation centres, and interfacility transport; and an additional $14 million for the hours of work initiative and addressing crew fatigue. All of these are helping.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, if they are happening, they're not working, because these are the worst numbers ever, and they are going up.

I hear from EMS professionals every day, and they tell me they're burned out and frustrated with the incompetence of this UCP government. Today HSAA president Mike Parker called for paramedics to have three things done: one, do more to get paramedics off shift on time; two, go back to supporting safe-consumption sites and lowering overdoses; and, three, stop with casual contracts, all the casual contracts. Will the Premier commit today to acting on these reasonable, immediate, short-term, practical recommendations?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. AHS has also developed a 10-point tactical plan to address the pressures. Actions currently under way are making real progress, starting with more ambulances on the streets in the coming months; five each in Calgary and Edmonton each year for the next two years, for a total of 20 new ambulances. Also, we have stood up the Alberta EMS Provincial Advisory Committee, co-chaired by MLAs within this House, to work with stakeholders from across the EMS system and bring forward recommendations. We are expecting an interim report shortly.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Health Care System Capacity

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, every day this Premier, this government stands up, tries to take a victory lap on health care, but here's what Albertans are seeing: in Red Deer 14 ambulances backed up in the hospital parking lot waiting to get to the ER, in Whitecourt the cancellation of obstetrics for expecting parents going on two years running, in Edmonton dangerously long wait times for children at the Stollery, and in Calgary parents lined up outside to even get their kids a seat in the waiting room at the Alberta Children's hospital. To the Premier: is this what you mean when you say Alberta is back? Back to paying for the chaos of Conservative mismanagement in health care?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the MLA for Red Deer-North I'm extremely happy that our government is finally dealing with the issue of capacity within Red Deer. [interjections]

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In fact, the members opposite made a lot of empty promises. Zero – zero – work on any of those empty promises. We're adding $1.8 billion to expand the Red Deer hospital so we have capacity to deal with not only EMS problems but also with surgical problems in Red Deer.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, what they're adding are ambulances lined up outside the hospital, parents lined up outside the hospital, because this government has crashed the health care system. The pressure on this system, on emergency rooms is called access block. It's a sign of this government's failure. Most obviously, the lack of family doctors: in Lethbridge, 30,000 with no family doctor; Bow Valley, not a single doctor accepting new patients. Registration shows 140 fewer doctors in Alberta last year that left here. Why doesn't this Premier understand that their actions are blocking more Albertans from getting health care in their communities, and that is crashing our system?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again I'll remind the members opposite: four years they did nothing for Red Deer. Zero. Zero. That's one of the reasons I ran, so that we would actually address the problems in Red Deer, and we're going to; $1.8 billion is going to go a long way to address those issues. As far as Lethbridge is concerned, there are 14 active family medicine positions being advertised as we speak; 11 applicants have committed to the community and are awaiting their CPSA assessment. That means that there will be 11 new people coming to Lethbridge.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, did that minister run on driving doctors away from the Red Deer regional hospital? Because that's what her government has done. Indeed, this government talks a big game, but in reality they've pushed doctors, paramedics, health care workers to the brink, crisis getting worse every day, and Albertans are tired of their excuses. Packed ERs, kids waiting outside, ambulances lined up around the block, random closures at rural hospitals, fewer doctors, longer wait times, and this government's priority on health care is to take insulin pumps away from kids. What's the excuse?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that question from the members opposite, but here's the reality. COVID-19 revealed a wholly inadequate capacity in our health care system, capacity we inherited from the members opposite. We're dealing with it; $1.8 billion in hospital refurbishing, a new hospital in Red Deer, $1.8 billion added to Health's budget over the next three years to expand capacity to better serve Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Provincial Support for Edmonton

Member Ceci: "Edmonton deserves a fair deal. [Please] work with us. We are your capital city. We make outsized contributions. Please stop holding Edmonton's economy back." Those are the words of Edmonton mayor Amarjeet Sohi yesterday as he implored this UCP government to stop punishing the capital region, to stop stifling innovation, to stop behaving like the Edmonton region doesn't matter. Truer words have never been said. To the Premier: why does this government have such disrespect for Edmonton? Why is this government holding Edmonton's economy back? The mayor wants to know.

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, this government from day one has made sure that we focus on attracting jobs, attracting innovation, as well as attracting investment to this province. I want to know as well. Edmonton for the first time in its history – first time in its history – is in the top 50 in North America for innovation and technology. That happened under this government, not the NDP, otherwise known as the no-development party.

Member Ceci: The UCP ripped up the big-city charters. Let me quote Mayor Sohi again as he spoke to over 1,000 business leaders and community leaders yesterday at an event hosted at the Calgary Chamber. "Too often we are made to feel [like] Edmonton does not matter to the province. Please stop holding Edmonton's economy back." To the Premier. The Minister of Municipal Affairs attacked the mayor. Business leaders in the capital region disagree. They applauded the mayor. They have Edmonton's back. Why does this government treat Edmonton and the entire capital region economy with such disrespect?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. That's ridiculous. The reality is that we inherited a fiscal train wreck from the members opposite. We inherited a government that was spending increases of over 4 per cent per year. Instead of a $500 million budgeted surplus, we would be projecting a $6 billion deficit . . .

2:00

The Speaker: Order. The hon. minister has the opportunity to answer the question. I should be able to hear him.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, bottom line: we're bringing fiscal responsibility and sustainability to this province. On top of that, we're continuing to invest in Edmonton. Key investments: $588 million in LRT projects, $371 million assigned for the new Edmonton hospital, $142 million . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you. You know, if there's one truism of this government, it's just that they don't listen. Over 1,000 business and community leaders applauded the message delivered by the mayor yesterday. All we hear are the same deflections, the same denials. Is it this Premier's message to Edmonton's business leaders that they don't understand what's going on in their backyard? Or can this Premier explain why the UCP is holding the economy back? A thousand people stood and applauded the mayor and the message. What do you have to say?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, what we have to say to people across Alberta is that we have their backs. The unemployment rate in the province of Alberta today: 5.9 per cent, something Alberta never – let me say that again: never – experienced under the NDP, not once. This government is focused on job creation, creating the best possible business environment. The business community in Edmonton can rest assured that Alberta is back. We've got the best business community, the best environment in the entire country.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has a question.

Dene Tha' First Nation Flooding

Mr. Feehan: It is estimated that 1,100 people have been forced to evacuate from their homes in the Dene Tha' First Nation because of rising flood waters caused by heavy rain and melting snow. As of yesterday morning over 600 evacuees had been registered in High Level. Robby Didzena is a 19-year-old who stayed behind with volunteers to work to protect homes from flood damage. He told the media, quote: we are losing our homes to water, to Mother Nature; she's beating us. End quote. Can the Premier provide an update on the flooding situation and what supports are available right now to those who are forced to evacuate?

The Speaker: Correction: the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford. Thank you.

The hon. Minister of Children's Services has risen.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I do want to thank the member opposite for a very important question. Rainfall and snowmelt are creating flooding conditions in northwestern Alberta. I can tell you that Alberta's emergency management is in constant contact with the community. Transportation is also on the scene. The member is correct that an evacuation order has been issued for the residents of the Dene Tha' First Nation. Around 940 people have been affected by the flooding, and approximately 676 evacuees have been registered in High Level. Flood protection barriers are being set up around housing in the community, and Beaver First Nation is providing additional aid.

Mr. Feehan: Evacuees have been registered in High Level and other communities like La Crête and Rainbow Lake. For those who were forced to evacuate from the community, I can only imagine the pain, stress, and anxiety they are feeling as they wait to see when they will return home and what might need to be rebuilt after this devastating flood. Alberta needs to be there for them now and into the future to ensure that they are supported in every way they can be. Can the Premier please tell me what he is doing to ensure that everyone forced to evacuate their homes has access to mental health or medical support needed now and in the future? Please be specific. The people need this.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We do know that this is a difficult time for residents of the area. Our thoughts are, of course, with them as the flooding situation in the north is causing a tremendous impact on local highways. The water level is fluctuating, of course, due to snowmelt, but I can tell you that we are watching the situation closely, and we are there to support these residents in this community. In addition, there is also a First Nations field officer on-site assisting the emergency management team. As the member opposite likely knows, a state of local emergency has been issued due to localized flooding.

Mr. Feehan: It would be really nice if you built a berm or changed the road into the town. I spoke with the chief of the Dene Tha' First Nations this week to offer him the support of this caucus in the midst of this devastating crisis. While this community has faced flooding in the past, what is seen today is far and away worse than anything previously experienced. This likely means that the work and resources needed to rebuild and recover will be far and away larger than historically needed. Can the Premier please advise the House what specific actions his government will take to help the community prevent future natural disasters such as these?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I mentioned in my first response, flood protection barriers, tiger dams are being set up around housing in the community, and Beaver First Nation is providing additional aid. We are doing everything possible to ensure people can evacuate or use the roads in a safe and timely manner. Alberta Transportation has crews on the ground working around the clock to make sure the roads are passable. Repairs are under way, and as waters levels recede, more detailed repairs such as culvert replacements will begin. Motorists in the local area should expect delays, can check 511 for the latest traffic information as well, but we are there to support them.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod has a question to ask.

Federal Impact Assessment Act Court Ruling

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Trudeau Liberals were taught a lesson by Alberta's Court of Appeal in our fight to stand up to Justin Trudeau's quest for absolute control over Albertans and Alberta's resources. And the NDP, who called Alberta the embarrassing cousin within Canada while they were in office, all the while handing Trudeau more and more control over Albertans and their resources while in office, in typical fashion remain silent on this issue. To the minister of environment: how has Alberta's UCP government been fighting back the relentless assaults by the Trudeau-NDP alliance on Albertans and this province?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to Bill C-69, the no-more-pipelines law, this government took the Trudeau Liberals to court and won yesterday an important case that made it clear that the Trojan Horse that the Trudeau Liberals have tried to use to block our constitutional right to be able to develop our resources could not stand. Unfortunately, the Official Opposition, the NDP, both when they were government and in opposition, has chosen to stand with Trudeau as they try to block the birthright of Albertans. But, rest assured, this government will never let that happen.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that yesterday's court ruling was unequivocal – the highest court in Alberta called it “a classic example of legislative creep” and an “existential threat . . . to the division of powers guaranteed by [the] Constitution” – and given that this Trojan Horse legislation was an attack on Alberta's jurisdiction and our right to self-govern, can the Minister of Energy tell this House why the denial of the Trudeau government's no-more-pipelines bill is such excellent news for all Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member is right; this is excellent news. Alberta has a long and proud history of fighting for our right to develop our resources. In the 1970s Pierre Elliott Trudeau tried to take control of our natural resources. At that time it was to take our wealth. Well, Peter Lougheed fought him and won. Forty years later Justin Trudeau tried to take control of our natural resources through Bill C-69. His intent was to shut down our natural resources. Well, our government won the court case yesterday, and the court decision was a smackdown of Justin Trudeau's attempt to obliterate our constitutional rights, obliterate our natural resources . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Alberta knows that provinces are the ones best situated to make decisions for their own economies and given that Alberta deserves a fair deal from Ottawa, one that allows Albertans to harness the natural resources that belong to them, can the Minister of Energy tell this House what this means for the future of Alberta's energy sector?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. This means that Alberta's energy future is bright. Justin Trudeau will not have a veto over the development of our natural resources. Bill C-69 would have effectively rewritten the Constitution. It would have driven away investment and choked our oil and gas sector. We sit on the third-largest reserve of oil in the world and have an abundance of natural gas. The world is looking for these resources, especially as it weeds out Russian energy. We believe this energy should come from Alberta, so yesterday was a great day for Alberta. After six years of fighting with the Trudeau Liberals as they developed this legislation, we won, and the no more pipelines . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Agricultural Costs

Ms Sweet: Mr. Speaker, farmers are feeling the brunt of the cost-of-living crisis, which will continue to lead to increasing food prices. Fertilizer costs are out of reach for farmers, the price of diesel is surging, and many farmers are still recovering from a tough season last year. On top of that, Alberta farmers elected the UCP government, that jacks up prices on crop and livestock insurance. This government is too busy fighting with themselves to care about farmers or rural Alberta. When will Alberta farmers finally get some support from the UCP for all the costs they are facing?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, Forestry and Rural Economic Development.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. I do love the enthusiasm, and I do agree with her that it is a challenging time for farmers. Fuel prices are through the roof. Fertilizer is through the roof. So are commodity prices. This will be the most expensive planting season in Alberta and many places around the world. It will also have the most upside for our farmers.

2:10

Ms Sweet: If they get a crop.

Mr. Horner: Of course. That's why we have great insurance programs that we're so proud to make better. We have to make them better because the NDP signed on to the last set of programs in 2018, and we continue to . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the tax exemption for the farm fuel offered a comparative advantage, however, the UCP refused to honour the intent of that program, and given that the price of diesel has increased by over 50 per cent for some and farmers are reporting that this will add about $50,000 in costs this year and given that the increased price of fuel also adds costs on everything farmers need to ship – so not only are farmers paying more for fuel; the UCP removed the comparative advantage in the market – when will the agriculture minister finally provide actual help for farmers facing surging fuel prices?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I love this. I would just like to inform that side of the House that diesel and gas come from oil. You know, maybe you shouldn't stand on the steps saying, "No new approvals" and bring in things like the carbon tax. Your federal party joined with Trudeau. We brought in the fuel tax abatement, 13 cents on clear fuel, 4 cents for farmers. I wonder: do they want us to buy fuel for farmers? Is that what I'm hearing right now? Interesting proposal.

Ms Sweet: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that the UCP are raking in revenues from those high energy prices the minister just referenced, that farmers will have to figure out how they're going to handle their surging costs, and given that the minister of agriculture is in control of what supports he provides and what costs he can increase and given that the UCP's response to increased costs for farmers has been to do nothing and given that agriculture is facing so much pressure, yet the UCP jacked up crop insurance by 10 per cent to gain $40 million on the back of farmers when last year they had a decrease, how can the minister justify that?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, everyone in the agriculture sector is very proud of our ag insurance program. Last year: a historic payout, $2.7 billion out of a $3.3 billion fund. There's a 10 per cent formula increase in the formula. The majority of the increase in the premium is from the increase in the commodity price, as it should be and as farmers understand. Like I said, the most upside of any planting season in Alberta's history, and here's what else I know through AFSC: our insurance program participation is up. It's up on the crop side. It's up on the moisture . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Social Supports and Calgary Transit User Safety

Ms Sigurdson: Homelessness, mental illness, and drug poisonings are worse than ever. The UCP is making all of these crises deeper by taking housing funding away from Albertans on income support, refusing to fund mental health support, and withholding life-saving health care from Albertans who use substances. The UCP is pushing vulnerable Albertans onto the streets, seeking shelter in transit stations. In classic UCP fashion, instead of real solutions the associate minister decided to troll a Calgary city councillor on Twitter. Does this minister accept any responsibility for the explosion of homelessness, mental illness, and fatal drug poisoning happening on his watch?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This is a newflash to the member opposite, but Calgarians and citizens within municipalities also have rights as well. They have a right to ride the LRT without experiencing violence. They have a right to ride the train without sexual assault or open drug use. They have a right to not inhale second-hand smoke from crystal meth and from crack. As a former police officer, we have to understand that the police are part of the solution to this very, very complex problem. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that expanded supervised consumption services would reduce open drug use in Calgary transit stations and given that these services are proven to save the health care system millions of dollars and free up badly overstretched ambulance and emergency beds in Calgary, given that this minister's failure to act has made Calgary less safe for everyone, can the minister grow up, knock it off with the mean tweets . . .

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

Ms Sigurdson: . . . and actually take action to address the crises he has created in Calgary?

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 2:15.

The Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, there's been no reduction in services for supervised consumption sites. Let's start with that. My office has spoken with operators. It's actually been the city of Calgary that has slowed the approval process, not the government of Alberta. We certainly welcome the application for the supervised consumption site in the constituency of Edmonton-Strathcona. However, I have not heard from the MLA for Edmonton-Strathcona whether she supports a supervised consumption site that we would like to put in that area.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that these crises continue to get worse because of the UCP's failed approach and given that this juvenile behaviour from the associate minister proves that Albertans can't trust the UCP to address these problems and given that asking him questions will only lead to more division – these guys have had their chance to take these crises seriously, and they have failed, so to the people of Calgary: I want you to hear me. An NDP government will protect your community, strengthen public health care, and save lives.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, under the previous government the only people that could get help were the wealthy. That is shameful. We removed user fees so that anyone . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order.

The associate minister has the call.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, we removed user fees. We have created 8,000 spaces. We have created the virtual opioid dependency program, an award-winning program. These are just a small snippet of the things that we have been doing to help people with the illness of addiction. If the NDP had their way, they would be keeping people in perpetual states of pain and suffering. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie has a question.

Kindergarten to Grade 6 Draft Curriculum

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have been diligent in our work to renew the K to 6 curriculum. Our government promised a curriculum that will give our children the foundational skills that they need for success. As a parent of two this is very important to me. I have also spoken to hundreds of parents and teachers in Calgary-Currie and relayed their feedback to the Minister of Education, similar to my colleagues. I know there have been a number of announcements since January of this year on this topic. To the minister: can you please update us on what work has been done since the beginning of this year?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have done a great deal of work since January to make changes to the draft K to 6 curriculum and adjust the implementation timelines. In January we established a Curriculum Implementation Advisory Group to provide advice and recommendations on the implementation strategy and timelines for the new K to 6 curriculum. We also held virtual engagement sessions right across the province for all Albertans to have their feedback listened to. With that advice from the implementation advisory group we scaled back full implementation to three subjects and set aside $59 million . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The math, language arts, and physical education and wellness curricula K through 6 will be introduced this fall. Fort Vermilion piloted these subjects last year, and the students learning the new math and English curricula had on average two full years of growth in math and three full years of growth in English, which is amazing. As a parent of two and one going into kindergarten, we need to get this right. To the Minister of Education: can you please share with this House more about the data and research that informed the math and English curricula? [interjections]

The Speaker: The hon. minister is the one with the call.

Member LaGrange: I'm happy to, Mr. Speaker. These subjects have been based on science and advice from subject matter experts. For example, Dr. George Georgiou, who helped developed the English language arts curriculum, led world-class research on literacy in young learners. For his work he's been invited to participate in the Canadian Commission for UNESCO working group to examine pandemic impacts on elementary and secondary schools in Canada. In fact, Alberta is on the cutting edge, and focusing on these subjects will help our younger students strengthen their numeracy and literacy skills.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that most of the feedback I have received on the curriculum has been about the draft social studies curriculum and given that we have committed to listening to feedback from Albertans and making changes to the draft curriculum using that feedback, including individuals from Calgary-Currie's feedback, to the minister: can you please remind this House what steps have been taken to address the feedback specifically and what the next steps are as we move towards a new social studies curriculum for kindergarten to grade 6 students? [interjections]

2:20

The Speaker: Order.

One thing I am certain of is that the hon. Member for Calgary-Currie provided a significant amount of respect and decorum to all other colleagues inside the Assembly when they were asking questions. I would guess that he deserves and expects the same.

The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have been listening to the feedback of all Albertans and education stakeholders since the draft K to 6 curriculum was released. We heard Albertans' feedback loud and clear on social studies, and we went back to the drawing board. In fact, in December we went back to a new design blueprint on scope and sequence on social studies. Based on that feedback we have received thus far, we are making changes to the social studies design blueprint. Once the content changes are made, we will release the updated draft social studies curriculum in the coming months. I look forward to further engagement.

Electric Power Prices and Utility Rebate Timeline

Mr. Dang: Two-hundred and four days: that's six months and 21 days from now, when Albertans can hope to see their electricity rebates, maybe. That's the timeline for the solution that the UCP government has brought to Albertans who cannot use their stoves, their dryers, or even their computers because of limiters that are being placed by companies on their electricity usage, all because they cannot afford to keep up with the rising cost of utilities caused by this UCP government. This government has never let technical difficulties get in the way of helping wealthy companies make more money, so why are they dragging their feet when it comes to helping Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. When it comes to affordability, we're not dragging our feet. We're moving quickly on establishing a program and getting electricity rebates out the door. The associate minister is working expeditiously to that end. On top of that, we've come forward with the suspension of the fuel tax, giving every Albertan a 13-cents-a-litre saving every time they fill up. That has a very positive impact for every Alberta family, every Alberta senior, every Alberta business.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Albertans are, frankly, tired of hearing vague statements like the one we just heard, that they might get their rebates or the minister is working diligently, and given that they need real relief right now yet this government's plan is apparently to come up on another cold winter before providing this pittance of $150 relief, why won't the minister just admit that this rebate is not something Albertans can trust, like this government?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. That's ridiculous. We are moving forward on affordability measures. But what I find so hypocritical is that when the members opposite, the party that the member was part of prior to his misdemeanour – that party, when they were in government, created the conditions for increased costs: the carbon tax; early buyout of the power purchase agreements, costing Albertans $1.3 billion; excessive build of our transmission system. Those are the reasons why costs are so high.

Mr. Dang: Given that energy experts, including Joel MacDonald, found that this year Albertans are going to face colder days in the winter and hotter days in the heat waves in the summers – the pattern of getting a break on bills this summer might be a thing of the past for them – and given that the minister said that these rebates are nothing but a temporary solution, why won't the government finally do the right thing and cap the cost of electricity? Albertans don't need possible outcomes; they need guarantees, and they need them right now.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, I'm always amazed. The only solution the members opposite have is capping every problem we have. They failed to deal with the systemic issues that drive up costs. That's why they brought in the carbon tax. That's why they paid out the power purchase agreements early. That's why they overbuilt the transmission system, because they simply don't deal with the systemic issues driving up costs. This government is dealing with those issues. On top of that, we're coming out with electricity rebates. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Alberta Parole Board Decisions and Police Services

Mr. Sabir: Two years ago this government promised Alberta that a provincial parole board would provide a faster process than the federal parole board, but new data shows that the UCP's parole board has processed only 96 cases total in 15 months of operation. Over the same time, the federal board has processed 2,657 applications, or 28 times more. Is the latest Justice minister satisfied with the underperformance of this parole board? If not, how does he intend to fix it?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for highlighting the work that the Alberta Parole Board is doing and the fact that we have fulfilled the commitment in having a provincial parole board. Yes, I am satisfied and very happy with the hard work that the chair, Rick Hanson, and his parole board members are doing to make sure that we have greater accountability in having Albertans making decisions not just about conditional release but also on what the conditions are going to be for those who end up being released on parole.

Mr. Sabir: Given that the previous, previous, previous, previous Justice minister also promised Albertans a more transparent process but given that the board the UCP created doesn't release its decision, which is standard practice for the federal board, and given that the UCP has a terrible record of hiding the truth from Albertans at every turn, why did the UCP build a secret board, and will they commit to releasing all decisions publicly, as the federal board already does?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, as a former member of the federal parole board, that is not how our decisions – sorry. When I was on the federal parole board, how their decisions are released: people apply to be able to access those decisions. The key is making sure that victims are involved in the process all throughout, and people apply to have access to those decisions. Now, the chair is looking into ways in which we can more proactively have the decisions of the parole board released to the public, but of course we want to make sure that the very private information of victims continues to be kept private for those victims.

Mr. Sabir: Given that this is another expensive and pointless exercise that has done nothing to reduce crimes and given that the UCP is pursuing another of these projects with an expensive and unnecessary police force, which Alberta municipalities have overwhelmingly rejected, will the minister take the lesson of his underperforming provincial parole board and drop plans to spend hundreds of millions of dollars of additional tax money to form a provincial police force for political reasons?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, that is completely ridiculous. This is important work that the Alberta Parole Board is doing. It is doing excellent work in not even just making the decisions, the applications that come before them and making decisions about granting and denying parole. But the key is also having Albertans making decisions about what's right for the community and what's safe for the community and deciding what the conditions will be for the offenders when they go out into our communities, having Albertans making those decisions.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Taber-Warner.

Police Services in Coaldale

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First I want to give a shout-out to the Women's Health Coalition of Alberta and the good work that they do.

Since 2014 Coaldale has been paying 100 versus 70 per cent, an extra $500,000 per year, to pay for their policing needs compared to other communities throughout Canada. This means that Coaldale has had to allocate an extra $4 million over the past eight years to a line item that other communities don't have to. To the Minister of Justice: seeing as every other community only pays 70 per cent of their policing costs, what can be done for Coaldale?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for all the hard work that he does in standing up for his constituents in Coaldale. We support Coaldale's position, that the new entrants guideline should not apply to them. This is a guideline that applies to communities that were never policed by the RCMP, and the town of Coaldale was in fact policed by the RCMP for many decades. With and through the member's advocacy I plan to raise this issue with the Minister of Public Safety Canada to urge the federal government to reverse this unfair policy and how it's being attributed to the town of Coaldale.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Minister, for your answer.

Given that article 4.1, subarticle 4.3, of the provincial police service agreement states that “the Provincial Minister may, by giving notice in writing to the Federal Minister, include . . . any geographical area” in the police service agreement, would the minister be willing to add Coaldale into the province's police service agreement so that they only have to pay 70 per cent of costs?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Shandro: Yeah. This is an interesting request, Mr. Speaker. First of all, let me just start off by saying that we agree with Coaldale's position that it's unfair to apply the new entrants guideline to a town of 8,700 people. We are looking into seriously considering Coaldale's request, that the member has mentioned, regarding article 4. It was wonderful to be able to have the opportunity to meet with the town of Coaldale along with the hon. member, during which they made this request. We'll be looking into that and trying to see if this is an opportunity we might have in further bringing up this with the federal minister.

2:30

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for his answer. Given that Coaldale has been trying to talk or meet with the federal government to work through this issue for eight long years now and given that all they have gotten are crickets and roadblocks from the federal government, how would a made-in-Alberta provincial police strategy be more effective for Coaldale's policing needs?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think this situation does underscore why Alberta's government has been studying the feasibility of establishing a provincial police service here in the province. We have a responsibility to explore how a new policing model could improve public safety and provide more effective policing for everyone in the province no matter where they live. While no decision has been made, we recognize the need to speak to people across Alberta with a significant interest in the issue such as Indigenous communities and municipalities before determining next steps.

Collection of Race-based Data

Mr. Deol: Mr. Speaker, last week B.C. announced their plans to begin collecting race-based data to identify which populations are being underserved by government programs such as health care, the corrections system, education, and social assistance. This is something racialized groups have been calling for. My colleague the MLA for Edmonton-City Centre introduced a bill to answer these calls, and this government voted it down. Why is this government refusing to listen to Albertans and voting against the first step, to collect race-based data?

The Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Immigration and Multiculturalism.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. We welcome the intent of the proposed legislation to better understand the realities of racialized Albertans and to remove systemic barriers they face. We plan to address the challenges of racism, including the collection of race-based data, through more efficient and collaborative methods and in a way that considers Alberta's privacy law.

Mr. Deol: Given that you voted against the bill, given that other provinces are now starting to introduce legislation to collect race-based data to better meet the needs of racialized communities who face discrimination in both policy and their daily lives, and given that during the months of consultations with Albertans that my colleagues conducted, the first step that was identified was to collect the data, why is this government intent on making sure Albertans fall behind other provinces and voting down change-making policy?

The Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Immigration and Multiculturalism.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again to the member for the question. The recommendation that we had from the Alberta Anti-Racism Advisory Council had been worked on, and we're trying to find a way to address the issues properly. The antiracism action plan, currently under development, includes commitments for Alberta's government to collect and analyze race-based data in order to identify and address inequalities in our province.

Mr. Deol: Given that the B.C. legislation introduced was developed in partnership with the First Nations Leadership Council and Métis Nation B.C. – and this government has a terrible record of consulting and partnering with groups on policy and legislation – and given that multiple professors and experts agree that the collection of race-based data is the first step in addressing systemic racism, which is often caused by policies, practices, and procedures that appear neutral on paper, why does this government refuse to do their job and listen to Albertans who are calling for change?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. We are doing the work. In fact, we have done so much more work than the NDP did in four years. Between 2015 and 2019, you know, they should have gotten to deal with racism, discrimination, and systemic racism. In particular, the collection of race-based data is a complex one that requires adequate consultation. I am proud of the work that the Associate Minister of Immigration and Multiculturalism is going to be doing to make sure that we fully consult members of the community. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member for Calgary-Bhullar-McCall wants to ask another question, I encourage him to get back on the list.

Postsecondary Staff Associations and Bill 17

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour and Immigration brought forward a bill that contains changes to the labour code that no one saw coming. Bill 17 makes temporary exemptions to the labour code that were set to expire for postsecondary staff associations for July 1 and makes them permanent. This was a surprise to postsecondary students and staff that will be impacted by these changes. Can the Minister of Advanced Education please tell us: why would he sign off on changes that negatively impact thousands of his stakeholders without checking with them first?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. You know, when you listen to the members opposite ask these questions, I mean, you would think that they should know what they're talking about. This was a change that they actually brought in in 2017, and it was set to expire on July 1, 2022. We consulted with the stakeholders, and they have indicated that we need to make that particular change, that was brought in by the NDP in 2017, permanent. That's exactly what we have done.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that amendments to Bill 17 will remove the ability for impacted workers to decide for themselves, starting July 1, who undertakes the bargaining on their behalf and given that this bill now takes away those choices from those workers while allowing for an increase in power for the employers, can the same minister please explain why he believes that the employers of these workers have the right to decide how they exercise their bargaining rights but the workers do not?

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, again, this was a change that was brought in by the NDP in 2017, that they have been working with since 2017. They have come to us to say: we would want this to be permanent because it working; we should maintain the status quo. We do not want to upset something that's already working, and therefore we heeded their request to make it permanent.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that if Bill 17 passes in its current form, thousands of faculty, graduate students, and postdoctoral students will not be able to decide for themselves who represents them in collective bargaining and given that in other Canadian jurisdictions these same workers have robust labour rights and the right to choose, can the same minister please tell the Assembly how he plans to attract the best and brightest to teach and learn in Alberta when he's attacking their wages, silencing their voices, and doing all he can to actually drive them away?

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, given the expertise and understanding of the issues faced by their members, academic staff, graduate students, and postdoctoral fellow associations will continue to represent their members because they have built a great deal of expertise between 2017 and now. It is good for them. It is good for their students. I do want to thank those faculty associations and those institutions and the leaders of our universities that reached out to us to say: we want this to be permanent. I'm happy that we were able to deliver that to them.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Calgary-Cross.

Women in STEM and Skilled Trades Careers

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If this government is to continue to repair the economy after the disastrous NDP, all genders must have an equal opportunity to participate in this economy, yet women participating in STEM still face a landscape filled with systemic barriers. If there's any hope of our economy recovering fully once again, we must break down those barriers. To the Associate Minister of Status of Women: what is this government doing to ensure systemic barriers are removed and to ensure women can fully participate in STEM fields?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Status of Women.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, we know that the province's economic recovery will require an educated, skilled workforce. Upskilling and reskilling for Alberta women will be an important part of that recovery. We have announced $1 million in bursary programs to ensure that more women have the opportunity to pursue postsecondary education in STEM programs: Bow Valley College in Calgary, NorQuest College in Edmonton, and Yellowhead Tribal College in Edmonton. We've also tripled the funding for the women's economic challenge grant, and that's for a total of $3.6 million to enhance economic opportunities for women . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for her answer. Given that trades play a vital role within the Alberta economy and are vital to our day-to-day lives and given that women were historically discriminated against when participating in and learning the trades, to the same associate minister: what does this government plan to do to ensure full participation in the trades for Alberta women free from discrimination?

The Speaker: The hon. the associate minister.

2:40

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, we're really proud that we've allocated 2 and a half million dollars to Women Building Futures to achieve three goals: first, to address the growing shortage of skilled tradespeople in Alberta; second, we're empowering women to pursue rewarding careers in industries where women are traditionally underrepresented; and third, this investment recognizes that apprenticeship learning and skilled trades have every bit as much value, merit, and worth as a university degree. We also put a million dollars, as I said, into bursary programs. Bow Valley College and NorQuest College will both receive $400,000 and Yellowhead Tribal College $200,000. These bursaries will cover tuition fees and all wraparound services.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Amery: Thank you once again, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. minister. Given that STEM and trades fields have been historically dominated by men and given that there are numerous reports of women being bullied, harassed, and abused when participating in STEM and trades training and given that this government has already stated that they have a strong mandate to stop gender-based discrimination, to the same minister: what is this government planning to do to ensure women are protected from gender-based discrimination when participating in the trades and STEM?

Ms Issik: Thank you for the question. Mr. Speaker, in February Advanced Education and Status of Women co-announced 2 and a half million dollars in one-time grants to assist postsecondary institutions in updating their campus sexual violence policies and to develop a survey. Other than the provincial survey, funds can also be used to support and develop training programs, including sensitivity training programs for individuals involved in the complaint process. Alberta's government is committed to supporting all survivors of sexual assault and shifting to a culture that prevents violence from happening in the first place.

The Speaker: Hon. members, this concludes the time allotted for Oral Question Period. In 30 seconds or less we will return to the remainder of the daily Routine.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills I am pleased to present the committee's final report on Bill 206, Prohibiting Ownership of Agricultural Lands (Pension Plans and Trust Corporations) Act, sponsored by the Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock. This bill was referred to the committee on April 28, 2022. The report recommends that Bill 206 proceed. I request concurrence of the Assembly in the final report on Bill 206.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the motion for concurrence in the report on Bill 206, Prohibiting Ownership of Agricultural Lands (Pension Plans and Trust Corporations) Act, is a debatable motion pursuant to Standing Order 18(1)(b). Are there any members wishing to speak to the motion for concurrence? If so, please rise. I have noted a member who would like to speak to concurrence, which will now take place on the next available Monday.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Are there tablings? It looks like the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre may be rising.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my privilege today to introduce and table on behalf of the Friends of Medicare, members of which join us in the gallery today, a petition containing nearly 2,000 signatures calling on the Legislative Assembly of Alberta to immediately reverse the privatization of Alberta Precision Laboratories and to instead expand its duties and responsibilities for providing lab services publicly under Alberta Health Services.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have another tabling here for a person who had a vaccine injury. Actually, this one resulted in a death. Karen Burkart and her family are still waiting for autopsy reports for their son Tyler, 35 years old, six months later.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of hon. Mr. Glubish, Minister of Service Alberta, responses to questions raised by Mr. Loewen, hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley, March 7, 2022, Ministry of Service Alberta 2022-23 main estimates debate.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. At 2:15 the Deputy Government House Leader rose on a point of order.

Point of Order

Insulting Language

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order, citing Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j). At the time you noted just a moment ago, the Member for Edmonton-Riverview was asking a question, directing it to the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions, and at the time in her question, which was written on the paper, didn't appear to be ad libbed by any stretch of the imagination, the member said very clearly – and I do not need the benefit of the Blues; I have the benefit of pen and paper and memory – “[Will] the minister grow up.” Now, this is wildly inappropriate language, to say something so unparliamentary in this Chamber. These kinds of insults I don't believe have a place in the people's Chamber, and I would ask that that member apologize and withdraw.

The Speaker: The hon. Opposition House Leader to respond.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I believe this is a matter of debate. The turn of phrase “grow up” has never been ruled unparliamentary. In fact, in searching the Speaker's ruling database, I found that on April 16, 2008, the then Speaker told a member to “grow up,” because it is a common turn of phrase when someone is engaging in childish, mean-spirited behaviour, which the minister who was being introduced did when he trolled on Twitter a Calgary city councillor about issues of homelessness, mental illness, and fatal drug poisonings happening under his watch. Given that the Deputy Government House Leader has argued that it is a matter of debate when his ministers suggest that the opposition cannot read, I also suggest that it's incredibly thin-skinned of him to call a point of order on this. I believe it's a matter of debate, and I look forward to your ruling.

The Speaker: Are there others?

I am prepared to rule, and I do have the benefit of the Blues. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview said the following:

Given that this minister's failure to act has made Calgary less safe for everyone, can the minister grow up, knock it off with the mean tweets . . . [and] take action to address the crises he has created in Calgary?

While I agree that this phrase was directed solely at the minister and while I would agree that this type of language is unlikely to raise the level of decorum or assist in the level of debate here in the Assembly, I'm not sure that such a phrase rises to the level of a point of order. But I might remind members that what isn't unparliamentary today could be unparliamentary tomorrow depending on the way in which it is used. Ensuring that all members do not receive my ruling as a carte blanche opportunity to go around telling people to grow up – I think that if we focus on raising the level of decorum, all members and all Albertans will be well served. I consider this matter dealt with and concluded.

Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 17

Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022

The Chair: We are on amendment A1. Are there members wishing to join the debate on amendment A1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to rise in Committee of the Whole and speak to the amendment that was put forward by the government to Bill 17. For those who are following right now or maybe didn't catch debate earlier in committee, this bill seeks to amend the provisions around bereavement leave, and specifically it indicates that bereavement leave will be available in the event that the pregnancy of an employee ends other than as a result of a live birth or the pregnancy of the employee's spouse or common-law partner ends other than a result of a live birth. Then there's another provision as well, but I want to focus my comments on those two subsections, (b) and (c), of the government amendment.

I want to begin by saying that, you know, I do appreciate that this amendment – we've heard very clearly statements from the minister and from government members that they intend for this amendment to include abortion and terminations for medical reasons. I am pleased to hear that firm commitment from the government, that they do support bereavement leave for women and gender-diverse folks who have had an abortion or a termination for medical reasons as well as, of course, the other circumstances, stillbirth and miscarriage. This is a really important change.

Now, it does feel to me, Madam Chair, that there was an opportunity to be more specific in the language, and it does not surprise me that this government may be very deliberately trying to avoid using the word "abortion" in legislation. We know that that is a very divisive topic among the government members, and it feels like this is perhaps a way to try to avoid specifically using the word "abortion," but we know that it now will apply to abortion. While we think it would have been better to be clearer and more specific in the language, certainly the clarity that has been provided by the government members, that this language will ensure that employees who have experienced stillbirth, miscarriage, an abortion, and termination for medical reasons will be covered by the three days of unpaid job-protected bereavement leave, is very important indeed.

You know, I shared in this House the story of my own pregnancy losses and mentioned, of course, the statistics that many of us are aware of, which is that this is actually incredibly common, as is abortion, Madam Chair. We need to be very clear that this is – actually, 12,000 women in Alberta in 2020 had an abortion. This is a significant number of individuals and Albertans. While pregnancy loss is often not spoken of very clearly, it is important to realize that it does touch the lives of many, many Albertans, so we need to be clear and inclusive in our language. We've been consistent on this side of the House as members of the opposition in pushing this government to use inclusive language and to make sure that we are capturing all circumstances of pregnancy loss. I think that that's very important to note, that not only did the members of the Official Opposition do that, but of course Albertans were speaking out about that and wanted that clarity.

I also want to give credit to many of the stakeholders, including Aditi Loveridge with the pregnancy loss and infant care centre, who has been a very clear advocate and worked very carefully with all members to try to get the best language possible. I understand that the stakeholders believe that this is clear, that it will cover abortion, that it will cover termination for medical reasons, and for that reason we believe that, you know, we can support this amendment.

I also want to take this moment, though, Madam Chair, because we have heard some statements from the members on the government side who did not want to talk about abortion. In fact, we heard those statements from the Premier. We heard it, shockingly, from the Associate Minister of Status of Women, who, I believe, had declared at some point that she was actually pro choice yet was very reluctant and seemed to be contemptuous of discussing abortion in this House and called it a divisive issue and that perhaps it was wedge politics that was being played. I am certain we heard those same comments from the minister of labour. I had the opportunity to review Hansard from yesterday. I was not surprised but once again disappointed in the tone from the minister of labour.

But this is a very good example of why we have to continue to be vigilant about reproductive rights. You know, Albertans, Canadians, North Americans, people across the world were shocked by what's going on in the United States, that it appears to be evident that the decision in Roe versus Wade will be overturned by the Supreme Court in just a few weeks' time. What that will mean is that thousands, millions, actually, of women in the United States will lose access to abortion, and it will be a shocking reversal of years of progress on women's rights and women's reproductive health rights. To say that this is not an issue that affects Albertans and Canadians simply because we're a different country was so devoid of contact with reality, Madam Chair, that it was shocking. I mean, you could see the outpouring from Canadians and Albertans. Most importantly, the message was to be vigilant – to be vigilant – because we cannot take anything for granted.

In fact, what we have to be really clear about is that we don't actually have – we can't sit here in Canada, we can't sit here in Alberta and say that we have fantastic access to abortion in this country. In fact, we've all now seen the data which shows how far women across this country and in Alberta, particularly in rural Alberta, have to travel to access abortion. Yes, it has been decriminalized in Canada. That does not mean, by the way, Madam Chair, that it's the same thing as it's legal in Canada to seek an abortion, to have an abortion. It's been decriminalized, meaning there's no law on paper making it illegal or criminal. However, provinces hold significant power, through their responsibilities for health care, to limit or to expand access to abortion services. So we cannot be smug here in Alberta or in Canada about access to abortion rights, because it's clear that thousands of Alberta women have abortions and struggle to have access to them.

We know that there were steps that the former NDP government took to make that better, which included, you know, passing bubble legislation to make a protective zone around those spaces so women weren't being harassed to go to an abortion and seek what they're entitled to as their reproductive health rights. I'm proud that the NDP government did that. Of course, we saw the UCP members. Albertans – I was in Alberta; I was not an MLA at that time – watched every single UCP member at that time run out of this House to avoid having to talk about it. That's why we need to be vigilant in this House, because that's the party that's now government.

I'm also incredibly proud of the fact that the former NDP government made available Mifegymiso – I always struggle with the pronunciation, but I got it – which actually significantly expands access to abortion services for women who may not be able to travel. That was really important because it's a medication that could be accessed. That's incredibly important. I know we still have a lot of work to do to make sure that pharmacies make that drug available. Again, I'm going to go back to comments made by Dr. Emma Herrington about the limited understanding of pharmacies to actually make that drug available, but that's an important step. Again, we have members of the government who don't want to talk about abortion, who don't want to talk about the limited access, and who actually want – when they were, you know, in opposition, they actually ran away from discussion around protecting women who are seeking abortion services. So we have to be vigilant.

Not only do we have to be vigilant about protecting the rights that we have right now for abortion, but we actually have to work very hard to make sure that we're expanding access to abortion rights. Yes, when a piece of legislation is before this House – originally, Bill 17 was silent and actually not just silent; it actually limited bereavement leave to only stillbirth and miscarriage. This government was content at that time to say that employees, women and gender-diverse folks, who had experienced an abortion would just have to ask their employer for it.

I'm glad that we were vigilant, that Albertans were vigilant, that the stakeholders were and said: no; that is not good enough. We need to make sure that anybody who has had an abortion can also seek bereavement leave because if you look at the purpose behind bereavement leave, it's actually around recognizing what the women or the gender-diverse folk are experiencing. It is loss, and it is complicated. There are medical complications, but there's grief, there's anxiety, there is relief, Madam Chair. I want to be clear that not all abortions, pregnancy loss are the feelings – I don't think we do a good service to women when we pretend there's only one response to that experience. Women have complicated responses to pregnancy loss. Some may be grateful. Some may be relieved. Some may be heartbroken. Some may be devastated. But the fact is that we're talking about bereavement leave for these women because we recognize that this is about them.

So, too, is abortion. Abortion is women's rights. Abortion is women's health rights. It is reproductive rights. It's a human right. So we have to be vigilant to make sure we are being inclusive of that at all times.

The opportunity to make sure that this legislation better reflects the experiences of women and the very complicated circumstances in which they may experience pregnancy loss: it is important to be specific, and it is important that we continue to push and to challenge to make sure that women's health rights and reproductive health rights are protected and expanded. I know that I sit with a number of my colleagues in saying that we will be vigilant, but we will also work to make it better. We will also work to ensure that more women, more gender-diverse people have access to reproductive health rights wherever they live in this province. By doing that, Madam Chair, we're making sure that we truly are the inclusive society that we all want Alberta to be.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this amendment. I appreciate that it is going to ensure that women who have had an abortion, had a termination for medical reasons, experienced a stillbirth or a miscarriage or a pregnancy loss of any kind are covered by bereavement leave. This is about human decency. It's about compassion. It's about human rights. I'm glad that we were vigilant and that we stood up for these women and those who have experienced pregnancy loss.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on amendment A1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Madam Chair. It feels like we didn't even leave on this one, and I mean that, actually, in a respectful way because it's been actually a really important opportunity, I think, to be able to talk about, you know, these really important, pressing issues in the Legislature.

I want to start my remarks by just expressing my sincere gratitude. I'll start with my colleagues because they're right near me: my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud, who just spoke and who multiple times in this Chamber shared her own story of pregnancy loss, and, too, my colleague from St. Albert, who has been an absolute, you know, crusader when it comes to speaking out on reproductive rights. Many years ago, I believe, she first shared her story in the Legislature of accessing abortion, and I was proud that she was willing to share that again just yesterday. And to all my colleagues: the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, of course, for the work that she and our colleagues who were in government did to expand access to Mifegymiso, bubble-zone legislation. I mean, these are all key pieces that have very much advanced reproductive rights in this province.

More importantly than us – I just wanted to mention all of us because they were very fresh in my mind; I don't want to miss anyone – of course, are the folks who have been advocating. You know, I'll name some of the recent people in my mind, but I just think about people who have been on the front lines of this debate – right? – women and men. I can think of some strong women who have been protesting the right to choose for so long. We have a debt of gratitude to all those who've come before us.

But I must, of course, also point out, you know, as has been said a few times, Aditi Loveridge, who, as we all know, worked with this government and spoke with us as well multiple times. She's the head of the Pregnancy, Infant & Child Loss Support Centre. I promised I would get the name of her organization correct today because I'm certain I got it wrong yesterday.

And, yeah, I mean, I will say it, too: the Member for Sherwood Park, who started this conversation through a private member's bill. We went back and forth quite a bit on that committee, and I appreciate that he was willing to take that on as a private member because, as he knows and we all know, your opportunity to get a private member's bill is a rare one, right? I've not had the chance yet. You know, I know that many of my colleagues haven't either. So I commend that.

I just, you know, will share or I will, I guess, reiterate, actually, some of the comments from the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore, who, somewhat hypocritically, went on a fairly long conversation about the importance of private members' bills as well. Again, I appreciated her comments, but it's really disappointing when private members' bills from our side of the House are continually throttled at the committee level, particularly when I think about the most recent one on race-based data. That's really tough for us.

But let me get back to this amendment in front of us because I see the chair giving me a look. I appreciate that. You know what? I will give the labour minister props as well for being willing to work with Aditi and other stakeholders and being willing to put forth an amendment that addresses the significant concerns that we had.

So we'll move beyond that a little bit. I want to just talk a little bit about what we heard in the Chamber yesterday, so I may have to move a little bit away from collegiality here. My apologies, but I've got to get it on the record. We do have the minister saying – because, as I questioned, I queried multiple times in the Chamber yesterday prior to the minister providing clarifying remarks, we wanted it to be absolutely clear that without all forms of pregnancy loss named, you know, including miscarriage, stillbirth, abortion, termination for medical reasons – we wanted to ensure that this amendment would be inclusive of that, and the labour minister said: "Yes." I'm quoting Hansard directly. "Abortion, termination for medical reasons, and a number of other reasons," and he goes on to say: "There are much more circumstances under which women can need these procedures, so we want to make sure that they are not limited whatsoever."

I appreciate that although I do want to point out something that many stakeholders have said as well. We want to really ensure as well – and I talked about this yesterday. We are all learning. I don't think anybody here would claim to be an expert. I make mistakes in my language all the time. But just being more inclusive, to not just talk about women accessing abortion but also who's impacted – right? – even going back to the MLA for Sherwood Park's private member's bill, it's important that we talk about if there is a partner involved as well and the impact on that person, too.

Now, what’s troubling and what I need to get on the record today is the fact that that same minister then went on to talk about how this is classic NDP politics, identity politics, politics of division, that sort of thing, that we are “hung up on the word ‘abortion.’” You better believe we’re hung up on the word “abortion,” and Roe versus Wade, the looming overturning of Roe versus Wade, has made this conversation even more important and even more critical. Absolutely, we are hung up because we know how slippery the slope can be when it comes to rights being attacked, and we have to look no further than this UCP government to see rights being rolled back.

This was the same UCP government that in 2019 became the first provincial government in Canada to roll back 2SLGBTQ-plus rights with the pushing through of Bill Hate, Bill 8, and that’s a fact. So absolutely, we’re concerned. This is the same government that allowed Bill 207 to proceed. Some of them, of course, will say: well, we voted against it. But we know for a fact that there are members on the record supporting conscience rights legislation that would disproportionately impact women, queer, and trans folks accessing health care, and the number of stories I heard from Albertans during that debate, heartbreaking stories of queer and trans folks being denied health care all across this province, heartbreaking stories of women being denied birth control, at that time, in 2019, being denied from their health care provider a prescription for birth control – and don’t even get me started on the heartbreaking stories we heard about abortion access. We’ve shared a lot of those today.

I shared some stories yesterday from an abortion doula, Autumn Reinhardt-Simpson, who does amazing work all across this province trying to support folks who are trying to access an abortion. The stories are real, and they are happening across this province, and if anybody on that side of the House doesn’t believe that abortion access is an issue, let’s sit down. Let’s talk. Autumn has countless stories that she is willing to share with all of you. You know what? We could even drive to some of these communities and talk to people.

The Chair: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but if you could direct your comments through the chair, that would be great.

Member Irwin: Absolutely, Chair. Sorry; I get a little passionate about this when I’m being told I’m being divisive because it seems to me that being divisive sounds a whole lot like standing up for human rights. All right. So we need to get that on the record.

I very much need to just ensure once more from this amendment and the comments by the minister: this leave will cover abortion; no person will have to disclose to their employer why they need this leave beyond the loss of pregnancy. As was clearly outlined yesterday, we do not want people who are in one of their most difficult times to have to beg and justify why they are accessing bereavement leave. I want all members of this Assembly to support this. This is what this vote is about, to include all forms of pregnancy loss.

We want to ensure as well that when, you know, the government updates their websites, when the government takes on ensuring that there is education about the changes, those are clear, that it’s clearly specified for Albertans how they will access this bereavement leave and that all forms of pregnancy loss are included. We don’t want anyone to have to be navigating websites and reading through fine print; we want it to be absolutely clear.

My closing comment is that, you know, it’s been clear from this government that they’re not interested in supporting and uplifting reproductive rights, that they’ve got a Premier who is unwilling to even utter the words “abortion,” let alone “reproductive rights” or even “women,” for that matter. Albertans need a Premier and a government who understand these issues, who stand with women, who stand with gender-diverse folks, and they’ll find that in an NDP government.

Thank you.

[Motion on amendment A1 carried unanimously]

The Chair: We are back on the main bill, Bill 17, Committee of the Whole, obviously, with no amendments before us. Are there any members that wish to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I’m pleased to rise to join in the debate on Bill 17 at Committee of the Whole. I had an opportunity to speak to this bill briefly at second reading. At that time, knowing that Bill 17 does three things: reservists’ leave, a change to employment standards; bereavement leave, a change to employment standards; and then an amendment to the Labour Relations Code that impacts, specifically, academic staff, graduate students’ associations, and postdoctoral fellows’ associations, at second reading I raised some concerns about that third section but also wanted to have the opportunity to talk to stakeholders to find out more about those impacted and their thoughts.

During debate in question period today the minister of labour said that stakeholders had been consulted on changes in the Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022. What the changes do is that they give exclusive bargaining rights, they lock those in, for the associations that currently manage them. They were set to expire on July 1. These bargaining rights were put in place after a Supreme Court decision in 2015 because, of course, prior to that, many public servants and those in the academic world were denied the right to strike. So the government of the day, the NDP government, needed to respond to that Supreme Court ruling and return the right to strike, freedom of association, and other worker rights to public-sector staff, which they did in 2016, and then also in the academic setting, which came separately in 2017, taking additional time to consult with those impacted at the time.

Even during that consultation time, since about 2015, it's been known that the right to associate and to strike was coming in these different work environments. Now, when it was implemented by the NDP in 2017, exclusive bargaining rights were put in place for a period of five years set to expire on July 1, specifically because this was a new strike lockout regime. It was a time of serious change. There were concerns about the associations, faculty associations for example, being surprised by perhaps a lockout or being surprised by changing of bargaining agents at a time when they hadn't had a chance to get their feet under them. For these reasons, a temporary exclusivity on bargaining rights was put in place.

That was set to expire on July 1, and this was something the stakeholders were all very aware of. With this change in Bill 17 the exclusive bargaining rights are going to be left in indefinitely. Now, in second reading I talked about some of the potential challenges with that given the impact on Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms, specifically the freedom of association. I also said during second reading that we wanted to go away, talk a little bit more to those impacted, and what we have found is that not one of the major university graduate student associations or postdoctoral associations, including their labour relations committees, was consulted on this change. Quite a few of them are very, very concerned and upset because they had already started thinking about what would happen following July 1. There are also some major faculty associations in the province who do not support the changes in Bill 17.

So while we are in Committee of the Whole and we have the opportunity to ask questions and to pop up and down, I'm hoping to find out more about the consultation that was done. When I realized that CAFA and all of the major university graduate student associations and postdoctoral associations were telling us that they were not consulted, that is a matter of serious concern to me, Madam Chair. Removing the expiration and putting in exclusive bargaining rights indefinitely denies freedom of association and very likely makes this section of changes to the Labour Relations Code against Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms and against the rulings that were originally made that the NDP government was responding to, specifically rulings from the 2015 case that the RCMP brought against the federal government. That RCMP case affirmed the rights that are so important.

Right now what the government is saying with this change is that they know best who should represent these workers. I submit to you, Madam Chair, that I and Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms believe strongly that workers know best and workers should be able to choose who represents them. A point I would like to remake that I made at second reading is that even with the exclusive bargaining rights coming off, there's nothing to force these workers to change who their bargaining agent is. It just gives the workers the choice, the choice for what makes sense for them. To be very clear, academically employed students work in a very different-looking environment than many other workers, but they are workers, and they should have this right. I believe that the section in Bill 17 that removes this right would not be Charter compliant based off of previous Supreme Court rulings and based off of what the Charter says about freedom of association.

Now, a lot of these workers are now tuning in to this debate with a great deal of concern given they were not consulted on the changes, so I would like to read into the record just a small piece of that Supreme Court decision I mentioned, regarding the RCMP, brought against the federal government. In the Supreme Court decision there's a section specifically about "choice and independence are inherent to the nature and purpose of collective bargaining." Section 86. I think it is incredibly important for the debate that's happening here and the impact this will have on graduate student associations and postdoctoral fellow associations as well as faculty associations or academic staff. Within bargaining the Supreme Court ruling reads:

Hallmarks of employee choice in this context include the ability to form and join new associations, to change representatives, to set and change collective workplace goals, and to dissolve existing associations. Employee choice may lead to a diversity of associational structures and to competition between associations, but it is a form of exercise of freedom of association that is essential to the existence of employee organizations and to the maintenance of the confidence of members in them.

I have to emphasize, Madam Chair. The Supreme Court was incredibly clear that being able to form and join new associations, being able to change representatives, dissolve existing associations is a form of exercise of the freedom of association, and it is essential.

Bill 17 is removing that, taking these rights away from the workers and giving more rights to the employers. To be very clear, particularly grad students and postdoctoral students work under extreme power dynamics. Workers and employers have a power imbalance to begin with, but when it comes to grad students and postdoctoral students, it's even more torqued.

I certainly want to ask the minister about his consultation process and why we are hearing that graduate student associations and postdoctoral associations have been surprised by this change and were not consulted, particularly given this being a violation of labour rights of freedom of association and associations being put in a precarious position where decisions that they are being forced to make are being made by the government and not by the workers themselves.

I think that this section of Bill 17 removes the rights of workers to choose who represents them, and major stakeholders do not support it. To continue this discussion and to focus our comments on this particular section of Bill 17, at this point, Madam Chair, I would like to introduce an amendment.

The Chair: Hon. members, this will be known as amendment A2.

Hon. member, please proceed.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Can I get a time check?

The Chair: You have just under 11 minutes.

Ms Gray: Eleven minutes. Great. Thank you very much.

The amendment I've introduced is that I move that Bill 17, Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be amended by striking out section 2. To be clear, section 2 is the section that changes the Labour Relations Code. My proposal with this amendment is to very seriously remove this change from this piece of legislation based off of the feedback that the Official Opposition has heard from the thousands of workers who are graduate students, who are postdoctoral students, and some of them faculty, who are concerned about this change and who were not consulted on this change and do want the right to decide who represents them in bargaining.

What we've heard clearly is that these workers want that option to associate with other associations and increase their bargaining power. They do not support this change. There is clear precedent in the Supreme Court of Canada that the government cannot limit the freedoms of workers when it comes to collective bargaining.

Now, the question may be asked: if this is so terrible, then why did the NDP government lock in exclusive bargaining provisions? I would suggest that it was done on good advice and for good reason, but it was also done for a temporary period of time. It expiring was what allowed it to continue. It would not cause a Charter challenge because it was temporary given the new strike lockout regime. By removing this, I think that the government will experience Charter challenges for this section. I think it's incumbent upon the government to pass constitutional pieces of legislation.

Now, what this amendment does is it just takes this section out and removes the changes. It remains in place that there would be an expiry on July 1 and gives those workers that opportunity to choose on that date, July 1, 2022. Of course, the change was never intended to be permanent.

Within section 2, that is being stricken with this amendment, the government is not just looking to remove the deadline; they're looking to permanently limit the rights of workers while giving freedom to the employers and allowing those employers to band together to form employer organizations. As part of the debate on this – allow me to repeat for the record – I'd love to know more about the consultation and particularly if graduate students and postdoctoral fellow associations were actually consulted with. They tell us clearly that they were not. Secondly, why is there a change allowing employers to form employer organizations without a related or relational change to allow the student associations, the worker associations the same rights? I hope the government might be able to tell us that.

They have in their term in government interfered with bargaining of collective agreements. We certainly heard that that resulted in the strike in Lethbridge. Some associations have been unable to reach collective agreements because of secret bargaining mandates set by the UCP. We want our academically employed students, who are workers – really, our priority is that we want them to be able to focus on the work that they do. It's difficult for them when they are not labour relations experts, when there is high turnover, to have this responsibility. For some of them, they are interested in exploring other options and exercising those bargaining rights and exercising the right to freedom of association.

I have introduced this amendment, which removes section 2. I would ask to find out more about the consultation the minister has done. I would ask the minister to reflect on the Supreme Court decisions that have made clear that employee choice is critical when it comes to collective bargaining, including the choice to change representatives, and for what reason that would be removed from graduate student associations, postdoctoral associations, and faculty given the Supreme Court's very clear rulings. Then, of course, why is there within section 2 the allowance for employers to band together to form employer organizations without the same being offered for workers and worker associations?

These are some of my big questions. But, generally speaking, I think that this amendment is a good one and would improve Bill 17. It would remove the labour statutes piece, allow Bill 17 to implement the reservists' leave and the bereavement leave that have been discussed heavily in this place. Voting for this amendment would allow Bill 17 to move forward as a constitutional piece of legislation that would not likely be challenged. I think it makes sense to remove the section that violates freedom of association.

With those introductory comments on this amendment, Madam Chair, I will take my seat. I look forward to debate on this amendment.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Chair. I thank the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods for her debate on Bill 17. I can say for sure that I do not support the amendment that she has put forward for the simple reason that it would defeat the purpose of that aspect of Bill 17 that is before the floor of this Assembly. I think this is one of those amendments that, in my view, are ill-conceived because it presupposes that the amendment that is put forward before the floor of this Assembly should not be. You don't just put forward a brand new piece of legislation without it being thought through or consulted on or making sure that it would meet the intention for which the amendment was put forward in the first place.

Second, it identifies a problem which requires a legislative solution. That's exactly what Bill 17, all of Bill 17, all of the components of Bill 17, is meant to accomplish. The amendment proposed, again, by the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods would not permit bargaining agent exclusivity for academic staff, postsecondary students, and postdoctoral fellow associations beyond July 1, 2022. It will permit postsecondary institutions to have employer organizations as of July 1, 2022, as scheduled in the current legislation.

Madam Chair, I've listened to the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods talk about the Supreme Court of Canada's decision and the Charter concerns and all of those things. I can assure this Assembly that those concerns are absolutely ill-founded, have no business whatsoever. As currently drafted, Bill 17 grants academic staff, graduate student, and postdoctoral fellow associations the exclusive right to represent their members indefinitely to preserve the status quo at postsecondary institutions. It recognizes associations' expertise and experience in representing their members and that they have existing relationships with the postsecondary institutions. They have that right to be represented by their own – their own – association. That is exactly what is going on here.

In 2017, as I indicated earlier today, the members opposite introduced that change that grants academic staff, grad student, and postdoctoral fellow associations that exclusive right to represent themselves. We are not asking them to be represented by somebody else. It was the same people, the same staff. It is their association that is representing them. If the concerns raised in 2017 that led to that introduction in 2017 were a concern then, they are still a concern now. The only difference is that there was in 2017 a requirement that it would expire. This amendment would effectively allow that to expire and, you know, then bring uncertainty and confusion into our postsecondary institutions. We have heard from them that there is stability right now. At this point in time there is no reason whatsoever to upset the status quo. I have not heard anyone out there who says that we need to upset the current arrangement.

In fact, I have heard from some faculty associations who have been to my office thanking me for bringing forward this amendment. But, obviously, you know, Madam Chair, in matters of this nature, especially when you are dealing with the potential for different unions or bargaining agents to jostle for who represents a particular set of employees, there are bound to be differences in opinion. That is all right. That's why we are a democracy. That's why there are people who may not feel comfortable, who may not like that, but ultimately the role of government is stability, especially where there are no problems that require a dramatic overhaul.

It's an expiry date that has been removed to provide for exclusivity by the same people – the same people – that are part of that association. That was the request that was made by them to us, and we are honouring that request. I would urge all members of this Assembly and indeed my colleagues to vote down this amendment because it would defeat the purpose for which Bill 17 was put forward in the first place.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

3:50

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you. Just to briefly respond to the minister, you said that you had not heard from anyone opposed to this; you had heard from some faculty associations. One of the questions that I asked a few times in my remarks was: did you consult with graduate student associations or any postdoctoral fellow associations? Those associations are impacted by this legislation. They are made up of thousands of academically employed students, who are workers who have rights, and when we talked to them, they said that the government had not consulted them in any way, shape, or form. So we were the first people to talk to them when they are impacted by this. I do acknowledge that some faculty associations are supportive of exclusive bargaining rights indefinitely.

Secondly, I talked about the constitutionality of this change. Indefinite exclusive bargaining rights is a significant change and does make this likely unconstitutional because it locks this in permanently. When the change was put in place in 2017, there was a temporary exclusivity that was set to expire, and that expiry was incredibly important. You also talked about the associations having the experience and the expertise to do this work. That is without question, but workers should have the right to choose, and that is called freedom of association. Bill 17, with this change and should the amendment not be accepted, removes that right from those workers. I think that it's really important that it be flagged.

My follow-up questions to the minister are around consultation with graduate student associations and postdoctoral fellow associations. I have not heard of any such discussions and have specifically heard from those academically employed students that they do not support this, the unconstitutionality of locking in the exclusive bargaining rights given the Supreme Court rulings, some of which I have read into the record.

Finally, the question that I asked around employer associations and this section of Bill 17, which we proposed through the amendment to strike out: why does allowing those employer associations while not at the same time allowing an equivalent for the academically employed students or the workers make sense to the minister? That does not provide any balance and, on face value, does not make sense. I'd appreciate the minister's comments.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. Happy to rise this afternoon and follow up on some of the comments that I've been hearing here in the debate. I'll thank my colleague from Edmonton-Mill Woods for bringing this amendment forward, which I very much agree with. To the minister's comments that it would allow the expiry date to go through: that's the exact point.

See, I've spent some time as a labour activist, you know, at least a couple of decades, and spent the past seven years in this Chamber fighting for hard-working Albertans and their labour rights, so I've seen some things happen, come and go over the years, as they say. I can sum it up with: the right for workers to choose their bargaining agent is right up there with their right to strike. For those that now seem to be keeping score with regard to Supreme Court decisions as of late, both of those are Supreme Court decisions: the right to strike, the right to choose your bargaining agent.

Of course, I very much appreciate the history lesson that my friend from Edmonton-Mill Woods did so that we understand how we've gotten here today. I know from my time serving on the bargaining committee of my own workplace before I was an MLA that one of the biggest advantages I found during that time was one of my work colleagues, who was also the shop steward over the course of about 25 years at that point and had attended probably the last – I can't even remember now – six or seven bargaining sessions at that time. It was very much interesting watching my first set of negotiations. The company would kind of try to say, "Well, this is what happened," and she would say: "No. I was there. I know what was discussed. I have my notes, and that's not correct." The Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, who just happened to serve during the NDP government as the labour minister, had to deal with the Supreme Court decisions around the right to strike.

Now all of a sudden you have workers who have never had an opportunity to be in a position to withdraw their labour in the event of a dispute. This was something that's never been explored by them because they were simply denied it. They had to figure out how this whole labour relations thing works; hence, the decision to put an expiry date on that legislation that was brought forward. It gave them the opportunity to start working with this process, figuring out how things work, how things don't, what you can do, what you can't. At the end of that term they could then have absolutely every freedom, just like every other worker had had for decades, around being able to choose their bargaining agent.

Now, I've always said that if the bargaining agent is doing their job, members will never want to leave. It's that simple. I'm not saying that I've never heard of members wanting to leave their union, because I certainly have. I've heard of it. I've heard of these people approaching the union that I was a part of, the UFCW. The first step, though, was to work with their union to try to figure out where their members feel they're dropping the ball. But the bottom line is that if that can't be resolved, you have the right to leave and to find another bargaining agent.

Now, if that happens, for any current contract language that you have, all bets are off. I absolutely understand that. I would certainly never recommend willy-nilly that somebody just go and do that, because you then place yourself potentially in a position of losing all of that that you've negotiated over however many years that's happened. That is the risk you take. It's a very significant risk. Members should never ever take that decision lightly, but they have the opportunity to do that.

Now, the language contained here in Bill 17 locks in that bargaining agent, period, for groups, as was mentioned – graduate student associations, postdoctoral associations, and labour relations committees – representing over 5,000 Alberta workers. I shouldn't have to lecture the labour minister on his duty to consult with these people. They're saying that you didn't. I can only come to one conclusion, then, Madam Chair, that someone's info on that subject is not entirely accurate. It's either that the student associations', the postdoctoral associations' info is not correct, or it's the labour minister's info that's not correct. It's one or the other. And seeing as how we've done our homework, we've talked to these associations, and they say that they were not consulted: pretty good chance, it sounds like they weren't. So you're making changes without their input. You're not doing your duty.

As you can imagine, I very much support this amendment because, in my experience, over these past decades, with regard to labour relations, fighting for workers' rights to strike, to have good contract language, to choose their bargaining agent, if you pass this bill in this form, it will get challenged, and you'll lose. I'm telling you that right now. It will be challenged. You will lose, Minister.

Mr. Madu: No, we will not lose.

Mr. Nielsen: You will lose. I'm telling you that right now. I'm doing my best here to save you a whole bunch of aggravation, a whole bunch of time, and the province a bunch of money. We've seen too many of these kinds of decisions.

I'm sincerely hoping that the trip down memory lane from the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods and former labour minister, who dealt with this whole subject as it unfolded, and my comments, my experience dealing with language – we can get into a whole debate about language with the labour minister another time and my concerns with his. He'll change his mind. He'll reconsider accepting this amendment, and he'll urge his colleagues to do the same, because you cannot deny workers' right to choose their bargaining agent. It was a temporary measure to allow a sector that's never had the ability to do these things before to get their feet underneath them, to understand what's involved, how they need to proceed, the rules, all of that stuff. Now they get to do it just like everybody else does right now. Everybody else gets to choose their bargaining agent. You can't deny these folks the ability to do that because – I'm telling you, Minister – you're going to lose on that one.

I hope you'll reconsider. I really do because, as I said, Bill 17 as a whole: there's some good stuff in there, you know, with reservists. Certainly, we can have that discussion of whether I would've liked to have seen stronger language around women's reproductive rights and have the word "abortion" in there. Again, I don't know why I have to continue to lecture you about language being clear and concise, especially to somebody who's a lawyer. You should understand the importance of that. I would've liked to have seen stronger language. This is a little bit watered down, but let's not make the mistake with this labour relations side, because that's what it is. It's a mistake.

I look forward to hearing some other comments from other people as we go along.

The Chair: Are there others to speak to amendment A2? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Madam Chair, for the opportunity to address my colleague's amendment that's on the floor and to follow my colleague from Edmonton-Decore, who has a long association with this work around labour relations and organizing. It's really interesting to hear his views.

I want to focus on a couple of things. I want to focus on the lack of consultation that I think my colleague here spoke to eloquently, and I want to focus on the unconstitutionality of the government's actions.

You know, we've heard – and I'm pretty incredulous that the minister hasn't heard the same things that we have – that the changes proposed in this bill are not supported by the individuals that will be impacted by the removal of the expiration date to the exclusive right of academic staff associations and graduate student and postdoctoral fellow associations to choose their own bargaining representatives, bargaining agents. That is what we've heard, and I can't think of groups like graduate students and postgraduate students, people who are in many ways in a precarious situation in any event – they're working in an institution where they fully hope to graduate from someday, and it would seem already that there's a power imbalance. Their employer and the faculty in that situation have the power, the deans have the power to grant higher degrees to these people, the people who are working towards them. So I think that we need to respect and listen to and understand what their challenge is with not having the ability to find their own bargaining agent.

I can't understand why it's not understood that this was a temporary measure put in, not a permanent measure. It had a sunset date. It was very much our plan to remove it so that it aligned with the Supreme Court views. That's what it was put there for, to give, as my colleague said, some opportunity for a relatively new group of people who are bargaining, organizing, to give them time to put their feet under them before any kind of competitions for the right to bargain for that group were launched.

Certainly, it makes a lot of sense to me that we would bring this amendment forward. We've heard from those impacted by this change, as we have said repeatedly, that they were not consulted. It will put them in a lesser situation than they currently are in, and the fact that their employer organizations are allowed to form a collective to bargain is also something that causes tremendous pressure, potential harm to those bargaining groups of graduate students, postgraduate students, and faculty throughout the province.

I went to the picket lines of Lethbridge faculty – I didn't have to go far; it was in Calgary – and I've never seen faculty of a university picketing their university, their employer. I've never seen that in this province. But under this government we are seeing that now. We are seeing people – and it was 15 to 20 below. It was in January, February, and there were people freezing out on the picket line in Calgary against the University of Lethbridge because of the actions that that employer was taking against them. That's on this government.

Madam Chair, the changes proposed by the government are not fair. They will not be upheld, my colleague who has spent a lot more time in that situation than I have tells me. My other colleague here who has worked as a labour critic, worked as a labour minister says that what the current minister is doing will not stand up.

What we've heard is that we're talking about 5,000 student workers. That's just the graduate student associations or postdoctoral associations. We believe this to be a violation of their labour rights and freedom of association. We believe what we did was transitional, not absolute in terms of always existing, and what the government is doing is doing that. This bill and the way it's written suggest that the government knows best what these groups of graduate students, postdoctoral students, and faculty need, and we don't believe that to be true. This government is also taking the side of the institutions and allowing them something that they're not allowing these students, these groups of students, university graduates' associations, other associations.

How is that constitutional? Well, it's not. The RCMP challenged the federal government about their own ability to get their own bargaining agent, and they won with the federal government. Speaking of the RCMP, I met several of those individuals as they were touring across the province on their RCMP tours to inform Albertans about the bad ideas not uncoincidentally brought forward by the now minister of labour, who was then the Minister of Justice.

[Mrs. Frey in the chair]

The RCMP have succeeded in their ability to reach out to Albertans, towns, municipalities, and the outcome of that is that there is no support across the province for a change in the direction that the now minister of labour, then the Minister of Justice, believed that Albertans wanted to move in. I'm just bringing that up because I think there's a pattern here. The pattern is that the government believes they're acting in the best interests, yet again they are wrong.

The information – and we don't have all the resources. The government does. There are 23 of us on this side. There are 60-some on that side. There's a government bureaucracy. There's a minister and a ministry. We hear from that side that they haven't got any of this information. They think everything is hunky-dory. "Just say yes," is their view. Well, no.

This amendment is the right thing. This amendment should be supported. The minister says that he's not heard anyone upset with this arrangement. Then he goes on to say to his caucus colleagues there: just defeat this; this is a bad amendment. You know, he doesn't provide any justification. He doesn't answer the questions that were posed. "Just vote it down. We have the numbers," essentially, he was saying. "We can vote this down. We can vote the next one down. We can vote the one after that down."

Remember, there are over 5,000 people that'll be affected by this. These workers across the province: they may not be watching now. They may be busy with their studies. They may be trying to get ahead, you know, to provide the capacity that this province needs in employees in the future. They may be wanting to teach at these institutions in the future. But they'll learn about it. They'll find out that yet again this government has sided against workers and is supporting or allowing the academic institutions to get together but not giving the same consideration to the organizations, the associations that don't want this.

I said I would talk briefly about the lack of constitutionality that these actions obviously indicate. I brought up the RCMP as an example of what they did to challenge the representation that the federal government was not allowing. I think more and more that if we support bills like this or parts of bills like this, we will be mowing over the rights of people in the workforce to find their own bargaining agent.

I was represented for eight years by CUPE local 38, inside workers, at the city of Calgary. We had that right to choose CUPE or not. We were very satisfied with the actions of our bargaining agent – and I still am friends with and see some of those people today – but they knew and I knew that if their actions went offside with the majority of the people that they represented, they could be replaced.

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

You are taking away that right from a group of people, and they didn't ask for it. The minister hasn't stood up and said: yes, they want this; they want to never have the right to choose their own agent. It's not constitutional, it's not formed with the input of the people it's impacting, and it shouldn't be allowed in this bill.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there others to join the debate on amendment A2? Seeing none, I will call the question.

[Motion on amendment A2 lost]

The Chair: We're back on the main bill in Committee of the Whole, Bill 17. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: All right. Thank you very much, Madam Chair. It's unfortunate that all of the members of the Official Opposition were voting for that amendment but it did not pass. I'm not surprised because I think the government in bringing forward the changes in Bill 17 was doing so deliberately and likely in full awareness of the lack of consultation, the unconstitutionality, and the unfairness in creating employer associations and not providing the same for workers, but it was important to me that we try and remove that section. Given that we were not able to remove that section, we will have to proceed with talking about this section and potentially ways that we might be able to improve this section of the legislation.

Given that we now know that Bill 17, when finally voted on, will have the labour relations section as well as the employment standards section as well as both the reservists' leave and bereavement leave, Madam Chair, I wanted to make a request of you. Prior to the final vote on Bill 17 in Committee of the Whole I wanted to request that the votes on Bill 17's clauses be separated as follows: with sections 1(1) to 1(3) to be voted on as block A; sections 1(4) to 1(5) to be voted on as block B; section 2 to be voted on as block C. The reason is that the bill does deal with three separate issues: block A being reservists' leave, block B being bereavement leave due to loss of pregnancy, and block C on changes to the Labour Relations Code relating to postsecondary associations as bargaining agents. We did attempt to remove block C, which would have made Bill 17 more logically consistent, but that amendment has been defeated. So I make this request of you, Madam Chair.

4:20

The Chair: That would be agreeable with the chair.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I appreciate that.

Now, as we continue to debate Bill 17, I think that to focus my remarks, I would like to introduce another amendment at this point, Madam Chair.

Thank you to the pages for your help, as always.

The Chair: Hon. members, this will be known as amendment A3. Hon. member, please proceed.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 17, Labour Statutes Amendment Act, 2022, be amended in section 2 as follows: (a) by renumbering the proposed section 58.2 as 58.2(1) and adding the following after the proposed section 58.2(1):

(2) Despite subsection (1) and unless the Lieutenant Governor in Council prescribes a later date, divisions 4 to 9 apply effective July 1, 2023.

(b) by striking out subsections (3) to (5).

Now, the key to this amendment, Madam Chair and to my colleagues here in the Chamber, is that date. Given that we were not able to remove this section from Bill 17 despite what I would suggest were excellent arguments made by the Official Opposition, I would like to propose, and I hope that the government might seriously consider, that instead of making the change permanent, we extend the deadline by another year, to July 1, 2023. The reason for this extension is that we've heard extremely clearly from a number of faculty associations but also essentially all of the graduate student associations and postdoctoral fellow associations that we reached out to their lack of support for making the exclusive bargaining rights permanent, having those in indefinitely and impacting that freedom of association.

Now, I spoke earlier with the first amendment about the difference it makes when there is that deadline that will expire versus something that is permanent when it comes to something as restrictive as restricting workers' freedoms of association, which is a fundamental piece of Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I put forward this amendment in good faith because I believe that if there are concerns, extending that deadline an additional year would allow faculty associations who feel that they are not prepared yet additional time to prepare to communicate to their members. Again, I would like to make the point that these academically employed students as well as academic staff do have the option to remain with their current associations even after exclusive bargaining rights have been removed.

I would suggest that leading to the removal of exclusive bargaining rights is the best labour relations solution. Giving this additional year would allow the minister more time to consult. There are 5,000 student workers whose representatives disagree. They disagree, and they say that you did not even ask them. Now, through the debate at Committee of the Whole I have asked the minister a number of times to speak to the consultation. While he has referenced some faculty associations, there are other faculty associations that I know I've spoken to who disagree with the changes in Bill 17. Again, we have not found a graduate student association or postdoctoral fellows association who says that this government consulted with them. I think that's incredibly concerning, and I think it would be incumbent on the minister to be on the record with who he consulted with and who is impacted by these changes.

Five thousand students who are working in an extreme power dynamic, as I described earlier – to be clear, these students are graduate students. They are postdoctoral fellows who are also workers while doing their studies. They often have a work dynamic that is different than the average worker, but that does not mean that they don't deserve the rights that all workers deserve under Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms.
